BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—STATEMENT TO BE GIVEN TOMORROW

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the Leader of the Opposition asked me about the course which might be taken in connection with the private bill respecting capital punishment, and on an earlier occasion he asked me to give a statement outlining in general the legislative program for the balance of this session. I undertook to provide these two answers today.

Further discussion and consideration has been taking place between the house leader and the respective representatives of the other parties, and with leave of the house I simply point out that I will make my statement tomorrow.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Acting Secretary of State how soon he expects to be in a position to introduce the amendments to the Canada Elections Act?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think tomorrow in giving the program for the balance of the session the Prime Minister will cover this question.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT, REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION OF ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the civil service of Canada to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act, chapter 48 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1952.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES IN QUEBEC, FOR GRANTING ANNUITIES, ETC.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for four additional puisne judges of the superior court of Quebec; for the grant of annuities to judges upon attaining the age of 75 years; to remove anomalies in the present law relating to the grant of annuities under the act; and to alter the method of payment of travelling allowances to judges.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WHARF CONSTRUCTION, MALARTIC RIVER, QUE.

Motion No. 83—Mr. Dumas:

For a copy of all payrolls showing the names of those employed, the period of employment and the amount paid to each person, in connection with the reconstruction, during 1959, of a wharf located on the west bank of the Malartic river, range 4, in the township of Malartic, Quebec.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask the hon. member if he will be good enough to have this motion removed temporarily from the order paper until the Royal Canadian Mounted Police investigation is completed. When that is done I would be delighted to tell the hon. member immediately so the motion can be put on the order paper again.

Mr. Dumas: In view of what has been said by the minister, and by leave of the house, I am willing to withdraw this notice of motion for the time being.

Motions for Papers

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this notice of motion be withdrawn as suggested?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

QUETICO PARK, ONT.—USE BY U.S. TOURISTS AND OUTFITTERS

Motion No. 117—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, and reports originated and exchanged by any government department since January 1, 1958 with individuals, associations, the Ontario government, and the United States government and Minnesota State government, on the use of Quetico park by American tourists and outfitters.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): This is acceptable, Mr. Speaker, subject to the usual reservations.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations stated by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS AND AMENDMENTS

Motion No. 118—Mr. Robichaud (for Mr. Crestohl):

For a copy of the immigration regulations and all amendments to date; the orders in council approving same; all departmental rulings which are being used in determining the admissibility of immigrants under general and special circumstances and conditions.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member possibly this should stand, because the second part of the motion asks for material which cannot be produced.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this notice of motion should stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

CHIPPEWA INDIAN RESERVE, SARNIA

Motion No. 119—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Hellyer):

For a copy of all papers and other documents, filed by Dimensional Investments Limited with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration prior to its purchase of part of the Chippewa Indian reserve for the purpose of demonstrating its financial ability to undertake the proposed transaction.

[Mr. Dumas.]

Mr. Pickersgill: In that case, sir, perhaps the motion might stand until the hon. member returns.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this motion should stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—REPORTED THREAT TO DISPOSSESS KENNETH PLAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether she has received any representations on behalf of Mr. Kenneth Plain, a locatee on the Sarnia Indian reserve, who is alleged to be threatened with dispossession from his land? If so, what action has the minister taken?

Hon. Ellen Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the matter has not come to my personal attention. It may be in the department. I shall make inquiries.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister make inquiries and report to the house, because I am advised this dispossession of property is to take place in the very near future.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENTS FOR 1958-59 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the urgent need to supplement the incomes of western grain producers, is the minister in a position now to tell the house when the final payments on the 1958-59 crop year will be made, and the amount of such payment?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): During the unavoidable absence of the hon. member for Assiniboia—

Mr. Argue: Successful absence.

Mr. Churchill: —this question was asked and answered. The payments should be made almost any day now.

Mr. Argue: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister has promised these payments within the first or second week of June, is he able to say more precisely now when the payments will be made?

Mr. Churchill: I will ask the wheat board today and make sure.

Mr. Argue: You should not make those statements until you are sure.

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF FLOOR PRICE ON ONTARIO WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is now in a position to announce a floor price under the Agricultural Prices Support Act on Ontario grown wheat.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker. That is usually announced shortly before the end of the crop year, July 31. I expect we will be able to make an announcement on it fairly soon.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA FOR JULY MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether there is any agenda prepared for the federal-provincial conference to be held next July?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No agenda has yet been settled, Mr. Speaker. It is intended in a few days to have exchanges with the provinces in regard to what would be an acceptable agenda for all governments concerned.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED CANCER DANGER IN LIPSTICK COLOURS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is a very appropriate one before the holidays, and I am sure it will concern most of the members of the house.

In view of the fact that an investigation was undertaken by the United States food and drug administration to determine whether certain of the colours used by the lipstick industry are cancer-causing agents and that as a result certain doubts were raised; and in view of the possible peril which now menaces our fair sex, to say nothing of the imminent danger hovering over the entire unsuspecting male population of Canada, will the minister inform the house of any precaution his department is taking to protect the people of Canada from suffering the "kiss of death".

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. As far as the colours now being used in lipsticks are concerned, there is no evidence that amounts normally getting into the system could create any risk to health. Accordingly I am glad to be able to assure the hon. member that my department sees no danger in the use of lipsticks, either to those wearing them or to those with whom they might, so to speak, come in contact.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister make a personal investigation into this matter?

Mr. Pearkes: He did yesterday.

BOY SCOUTS ASSOCIATION

STATEMENT ON APPLICATION FOR CHANGE IN NAME

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Trinity-Conception asked if I had received an application from the Boy Scouts Association to change the name of the Canadian general council of the Boy Scouts Association to the Boy Scouts of Canada and, if so, what action had been taken.

The answer is that no such application has been received by myself or the department, and that I do not have the power under the Companies Act to change the name of the Canadian general council of the Boy Scouts Association, inasmuch as this is a corporation created by a private act of parliament and only parliament can change the name of the corporation.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—REPORTED REFUSAL OF NATIONAL BOARD TO PAY TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a recent article in the Vancouver Province which claims that the national harbours board, although the biggest property owner on the Vancouver waterfront, has refused to follow the federal and provincial government policy of making grants equal to taxes on its property, and would the minister comment on the suggestion that the national harbours board should share the construction and operating costs of fire boats in Vancouver harbour?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. National harbours board's payment of grants in lieu of services to the city of Vancouver is based on a formula identical to that used at other major cities where there are national harbours. In Vancouver a substantial portion of the facilities owned by the national harbours board is leased, and the information given to me is that upward of $555,000 of taxes is paid to the city by their tenants.

The national harbours board informs me that it makes an annual grant for the upkeep of the fire boat. Last year it amounted to $33,000. The cost of construction of fire boats in national harbours is borne by the municipality.

HEALTH INSURANCE

SASKATCHEWAN—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL AID FOR MEDICAL PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. F. Jones (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the premier of Saskatchewan has yet approached him for federal assistance to help pay for the Saskatchewan medical care program?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, he has not.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister or have his officials had any consultations of any kind with their opposite numbers in the province of Saskatchewan with regard to the medical care program proposed by the government of that province?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ELLIOT LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he is in a position to make an interim report on the work of the committee which has been set up to look into the question of assistance to Elliot Lake and other uranium communities?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Not at this stage, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Hees.]

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-74, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Is the minister going to make a statement, in view of the many matters of current interest that affect our Customs Tariff, such as the Russian trade possibilities, the Japanese quotas that are referred to in the resolutions and some other items, such as the GATT possibilities next fall?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker. To embark on a statement in relation to those subjects would, I think, be quite out of order. We are here dealing with Bill No. C-74, to amend the Customs Tariff. All the contents of this bill were indicated in the resolution which preceded the bill and which was given a very thorough review last week, on June 8, in the committee of ways and means.

This is one of those bills, like the Excise Tax Act, in which the resolutions set forth in detail the amendments that are to appear in the bill to follow, and the house will have observed that all the provisions of Bill No. C-74 have already been set forth in the resolutions which were approved last week. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, under the procedures of the house we are simply reviewing today, for the second time, what was already covered on June 8. I respectfully suggest that perhaps the best place for that review to be carried out would be in committee of the whole after second reading of the bill.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Finance on this bill if he would not find it within our procedures to give some indication of his reaction, and that of his colleagues, to the representations that were made recently by the mayor of Windsor and the municipalities concerned about the plight of the automobile industry. I ask this realizing full well, of course, that the government will be giving further consideration to these matters in the light of meetings which I understand are to take place this week between the members of the government and representatives of the automobile industry and, later in the following week, between members of the united automobile workers and the government. Would the minister consider whether this is the appropriate opportunity for him to indicate something which concerns the people in the community from which I come, and other communities, regarding any remedial measures the government has in mind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This would not be the appropriate time to discuss that subject. The subject is not related to the contents of this bill at all. There will be opportunities later in the session, if the hon. gentleman wishes to raise the question, when that matter can be discussed. These questions certainly do not relate to the bill now before the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This bill may not cover matters that would provide for remedial action, but it certainly is open to the minister or anyone else to re-examine the bill in the light of anything that is not covered and which might, if made applicable to a particular situation, be brought within the context of the measure before the house. However, I take it from the minister's reply that he is not in a position at the moment to make a report about a matter as important as this.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, I was rather disappointed that, in view of the many important negotiations that have taken place and are taking place which have a decided effect on our customs tariff, the minister did not take this opportunity to expand a bit about some of the items dealt with in the resolutions that were introduced on budget night, March 31.

The minister then indicated that we had ahead of us a very important conference in connection with our GATT trade agreements which would be initiated this fall and perhaps carry on for several months. In view of the fact that a good part of the amendments proposed in the bill relate to our GATT trade agreements, the minister should take the house and the country more into his confidence at this time. There was a discussion last week about the publicized offer of the United States government with respect to proposals it would make when the GATT conference convenes this autumn. We were particularly interested, of course, in those items which represent major matters of trade between Canada and the United States.

In that connection the United States government has advanced at this time what is called an "offer". I think the offer we have heard about should have been disclosed to the house. We were told rather abruptly that if it was something that was published in United States newspapers, members of parliament could look to those newspapers for information in this regard. However, as we are discussing a number of changes in the existing tariff schedules under the Customs Tariff Act, some of which may be affected by the negotiations next fall, I think before concluding the debate the minister should take us more into his confidence as to the present status of negotiations between Canada and the United States, the nation with which we principally trade.

With respect to the proposed changes before us, the minister has indicated that four of the resolutions which preceded the bill related to textile items. I think I am correct in saying that those items, with very minor exceptions, were dealt with by the tariff board, or shall I say that with minor exceptions the proposals put before us represent recommendations of the tariff board which has recently examined the textile tariff schedules. Because, as recommended by the tariff board, an increase in duties was involved, and because of the fact that some of these items were bound under our GATT trading agreement, it was necessary for the government to negotiate with the signatories to the GATT agreement who were affected by the proposed changes. In consequence, the minister indicated that about a score of items in the schedule to the bill involve a reduction in tariff duty because of the trading that took place with the principal suppliers of these commodities after the government reached the decision to increase some of the textile tariff import duties.

The minister indicated that some other reports with respect to textiles were momentarily expected from the tariff board. I think he referred to hosiery and knitted goods, and to woollen clothing. Certain other items were referred to on budget night as being under study by the tariff board, and the minister expected that reports thereon would be received soon. I hope that before closing the debate the minister will bring us up to date as to the studies that are under way.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit, I can say to him at once that there is nothing further to report since I made my statement on budget night.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister indicate later how soon he expects the reports of the tariff board on hosiery and knitted goods, woollen clothing and associated items and the others will be brought down? I take it that in many instances the items involved are bound under our GATT trading arrangements and would require negotiation with other countries before the minister could recommend changes in the tariff schedule to the house.

I am pleased to find that some of the recommendations of the organized farm community have received the attention of the government and are incorporated in proposed amendments in the schedule to the bill. However, I think the minister will recall that the interprovincial farm union, having in mind the minister's budget, made representations this year with respect to changes in practice that they believed had developed since this new government took office with regard to heavier imposts of duty involving the importation of used farm machinery. We see nothing in the bill dealing with that matter, which has rereceived the attention not only of this farm organization but of others.

When the minister replies I hope he will also give us some information about the currently worrying problem of trade with Russia. The attention of our country at large has been directed to the report that very soon at some of our eastern ports a substantial quantity of refined gasoline will be received; not the crude product that normally enters through the eastern ports but gasoline ready for sale. I believe that the minister or the cabinet has the authority under this act to alter the status of Russia as a trading partner. Am I not right in thinking that under section 6 of the act, I believe it is, the cabinet has the authority to establish what is a most favoured nation? I wonder whether the proposed importation of Russian gasoline has any relation to any executive change that has taken place since we last debated this measure. Because of the size of the proposed importation I think one would also want to know to what extent Russia has officially approached our government through its ambassador or through other channels in connection with this proposed new trading development.

Before the minister concludes the debate on amendments to the act I hope we will hear from him as to the present situation with respect to Canada's very obvious interest in the trade developments that have been taking place very recently in Europe and even outside Europe. I refer to what is colloquially called the report of the four wise men, about which there was discussion in Washington in April, and the proposal that perhaps Canada and the United States might participate in the trade agreements involving the Six and the Seven in Europe. In other words, perhaps the minister could indicate whether he feels it is imminent that Canada will belong to the European economic forum in conjunction with the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member not feel he is going rather far afield in connection with a bill that proposes specific amendments to the Customs Act, which does not really bring into debate the whole problem of international trade and tariffs?

Mr. Benidickson: What I had in mind, Mr. Speaker, was this. I think you will recognize that perhaps two thirds of the items that are before us in the schedule to this bill are subject to agreement that has been entered into at a GATT conference. My concern is that if today, we are considering passing legislation that affects these perhaps 125 items that are related to GATT, then what is the effect going to be on them in two or three months by reason of the negotiations that are presently taking place? I think certainly the ministry should indicate if only briefly to us what their present activities are in relation to these many items that are before us in these Customs Act amendments which change so many of these GATT schedules. The GATT conference is imminent. The possibility of discussions with the United States and these European trading units will all come into focus when this GATT conference takes place. This arouses curiosity as to whether there is some real purpose in passing this schedule if it is to be altered within two or three months' time at the GATT conference.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that these items could be debated at greater length when we consider the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance. However, I would hope that before we are asked to pass some of these items in committee of the whole, the Minister of Finance would report on the present negotiations that are taking place in these arenas that might very materially alter the effect of anything we are asked to do today.

I find, Mr. Speaker, that a number of items that one might have looked for in this schedule are omitted. The minister indicated on budget night that he felt this was not the appropriate time to make an extensive revision of some of these schedules. He was indicating that he was reserving his trading position because of the important conference that was to take place in the autumn under our treaty obligations under GATT. However, I am wondering about the omission of some items which have been the subject of discussion already this session and which are not before us today. I was wondering whether the minister has under review any possibility of revising our tariff arrangements in connection with the importation of drugs. I believe there is great alarm in our country today over the disclosure that the cost of many pharmaceutical items is much higher in Canada than in other countries of the world. I wonder whether the minister has any thought requesting the tariff board to review the situation in this particular industry.

I would hope before the debate is concluded that we would have, in relation to these items, a report from the minister in connection with some of the current developments that have taken place with regard to the recently negotiated Russian trade treaty. What about the quotas with respect to Japan, which are not before us legislatively but which you will recognize, Mr. Speaker, do affect items in the schedule, such as the silk item and other things? I should like to know to what extent the percentages that have been agreed upon with Japan with respect to certain trade categories compare with what applied in 1959. What is the proposal for 1960 with respect to some of the textile items?

I do not know of any other way by which we can properly discuss some of these trade agreements that have been made with Japan. We have to pass here the legislation. In this bill we have certain schedules; we arrive at certain rates of duty. Then some of those are altered by negotiation between the minister and for example Japan. I think before the government asks us to pass legislation of this kind the minister should report, as he has not yet done this session, specifically upon the negotiations with a very important trading nation such as Japan.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, on the second reading of any bill we discuss the principle of the main bill—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not of the main bill, only the amending bill.

Mr. Carter: —well, of the amendments, and their application to our economy. The tariff system is a weapon which the government can use to assist our economy and, in particular, certain industries which are having a difficult time to exist. Now, the fishing industry is one which derives two thirds of its dollar income from the foreign market. Of late, prices in the foreign market have not risen fast enough to keep pace with the increased costs of production and marketing. Consequently, if this industry is to survive, the government must do whatever is in its power to offset this disadvantage. I have looked through the schedule and I find on page 10, under item 124b, that the item which was formerly confined to squid has now been extended to include octopus and cuttlefish.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a matter which could be raised in committee. If the hon. member wishes to deal with a specific item in the schedule, then the committee is the proper place to do so.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister for that remark. I only referred to it because on looking through the schedule it appeared to be the only request made by the fisheries council of Canada to which the government has seen fit to accede. The fisheries council made several other requests, one of which was that some alteration be made in the wording of the item under which fishing vessels are imported. The item now refers to vessels of 100 feet, and the council requested a change to 80 feet.

The purpose of this tariff item is to protect the shipbuilding industry in Canada. These ships, however, are not built in Canada. The basis of the tariff item, the length of a ship, is not actually in accordance with scientific and technological developments that are taking place in this industry, because today a ship is built and designed for a certain purpose. A ship much smaller in length but of different design can very well do the same job and do it better than a ship 100 feet in length. In this connection I should like to draw the minister's attention to a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Fisheries Council of Canada. It reads as follows:

> Whereas some processors of fish are suffering severely from lack of suitable fishing vessels; and
> Whereas the federal government restricts the acquisition of the desired craft in the foreign markets through:
> (a) The necessity of having to secure permission from the Department of Transport to import a vessel—a restriction which we do not believe exists in the case of instruments of production in any other Canadian primary industry;
> (b) Heavy duties levied on vessels up to 100 feet in length when imported from most favoured nation countries; and
> Whereas experience has shown that larger vessels are going to play a more important part in production in future years;
> Therefore be it resolved that the Fisheries Council of Canada request the federal government to remove these hindrances to the adequate building up of the Canadian fishing fleet.

I urge the minister to reconsider the government's policy toward the fishing industry and in particular toward this request made by the Fisheries Council of Canada. Actually any reduction in the length of vessels under this item would be helpful especially if the length could be reduced to 80 feet.

The salt fish industry is the most depressed sector of the fishing industry. In my own province in particular we are trying to develop this industry and particularly to process the fish in our own province in order to give as much employment as possible to our own people. Therefore this 22½ per cent levy on salt fish dryers and on the parts which must be imported for the maintenance of these dryers is a heavy burden on this particular sector of the industry. I hope the minister will remove this tariff—and if he cannot do it now I hope he will do it as soon as possible—which I do not think adds a great deal to the revenue of the country but is a very heavy burden indeed on this depressed sector of the industry.

The other articles which the government—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been discussing something outside of the bill and has now indicated that he is going to discuss something else which, I take it, is also outside of the bill. This is a debate on a bill to amend the Customs Tariff. In fairness to all hon. members I think I am bound to raise the point which you yourself raised earlier, Mr. Speaker. This is not a wide ranging debate on trade; it is not a wide ranging debate on tariff questions. It is a debate on the principle of a bill to make certain specific changes in the Customs Tariff. That is all it is.

It is not in order to debate items that are outside the scope of this bill which is now before the house, namely Bill No. C-74. Otherwise the thousands of items that appear in the Customs Tariff would all be open to debate as to the proper rates upon them every time a bill to amend the Customs Tariff with respect to certain particular and named items is introduced in the house. We have had the resolution stage. We have had the budget debate. This matter could have been discussed there. We went all over these matters in the debate last week in the committee on ways and means on the resolution that preceded this bill. All these proposed amendments to the Customs Tariff were set out clearly and in extenso in the resolution which was approved. Here we are dealing simply with the most specific kind of amendments to the Customs Tariff which, in my respectful submission, would not give rise to a debate on trade or on the appropriate tariff treatment of commodities that are not embraced within the scope of Bill No. C-74.

Mr. Carter: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we are discussing the application of certain tariff principles as applied to certain industries. I was only endeavouring to give the minister some suggestions and to support the suggestions made by the Fisheries Council of Canada as to how these principles could be applied to the fishing industry, which is sorely in need of some change in government policy and in tariff policy in order to enable it to survive. I presume it could be done on various tariff items. I presume we might amend various items with respect to certain things, but I do not see what would be gained.

Mr. Speaker: Basically, what the minister urges on the point of order is correct. It is not in order to discuss in detail matters which are not in the bill; nor is it in order to discuss in detail matters which are in the bill at this stage. That discussion would properly come when the items are called one by one in the committee of the whole.

It is difficult to define exactly the limits of debate on a bill which covers a great many isolated and separate items. However, if the hon. member would limit himself to general principles I think he would be in order. For example, he has objected on the ground that some things might have been done in this bill for the fishing industry. I think it is in order to say in general terms that the bill does not do what ought to have been done. If he keeps his discussion to general terms I think it will be not only expeditious but in order.

Mr. Carter: You used the word "items", Mr. Speaker; I presume you did not mean tariff items, because this bill and the schedules name a number of tariff items to which I was not referring. I was referring particularly to certain tariff items right at the beginning, particularly to item 124b which is in the bill, but I was going on to indicate to the minister that there are many phases of the fishing industry which can be helped by an extension of the principle embodied in this bill, particularly in the case of life-saving equipment.

We have the Canada Shipping Act, which imposes certain regulations on ship owners. In complying with that act they are put to great expense. That expense today is a real handicap, and sometimes it is a real discouragement to the shipping industry and in particular to the fishing industry. I would think the minister would adopt the principle that in cases where equipment is necessary for lifesaving—a thing like that—the government should give the fullest possible encouragement to ship owners or vessel owners to get the best that is available on the market. The best available at the moment is this rubber life-saving raft which is very expensive and beyond the means of many. A reduction in the tariff or the placing of that item on the free list would be of great help not only to the fishing industry but to the coastal vessel industry and to the shipping industry in general.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Man-made fibre.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the operation by the Department of National Revenue, which will apply if we adopt this bill and the schedules attached to it, what consideration has the minister given to some of the representations of industry to the effect that they do not get adequate consideration with respect to such things as the refund of overpayment of duty when a tariff change takes place? I think the minister will be familiar with the representations made by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I am sure this organization has investigated this matter very thoroughly. Their members report that the Minister of National Revenue has certain privileges of appeal, and so on, and has a long time in which to exercise his discretion. But these things are not reciprocal, and the taxpayer does not get a report from the department automatically where there is a change in ruling or a change by statute. He has to go through the formal process of appealing if the department just do not see fit to recognize that they have made a mistake and that the law is new, and provide a refund.

The minister will remember receiving the Canadian Chamber of Commerce brief on this point. I refer him to page 13 of the brief presented this year to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue. I do not see any changes here which affect the matter. I suppose the changes would come perhaps in the Customs Act rather than in the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the brief to which the hon. member has referred was, it is true, directed on its face to both my colleague the Minister of National Revenue and myself, but in the presentation the Canadian Chamber of Commerce directed that portion of the brief to my colleague the Minister of National Revenue, to whom it properly belongs. This is not a matter affecting the Customs Tariff; it is a matter affecting rather the Customs Act, and the proper place for any such question to be raised would be on the estimates of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not completely satisfied about that. Everybody will recognize that we are changing the law here, and in consequence rates of duty are different. I am informed by the brief of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce that law changes somehow do not always come to the knowledge of the local customs collectors. Therefore taxpayers pay the former rate of duty, and the government does not readily make a refund without insisting that the taxpayer make a formal appeal.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce also says that appeals should not be expensive. It says the appeal procedure should be available through a travelling customs board of appeal similar to what is available in cases of income tax. Therefore if we are going to change these customs rates I hope the Minister of Finance will give consideration to relieving the taxpayers of any unnecessary red tape in connection with getting adjustments which are consequent upon the changes we may make now to these tariff schedules.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, it is a little while since this was before us last. Perhaps the minister might tell the committee how much of an over-all loss or gain in revenue these amendments are expected to produce for the treasury.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is expected that no substantial change will result to the treasury.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, clause 1 describes man-made fibre. I know that some fibres contain some percentage of rubber. Does this clause mean that if any fraction of rubber is present the fibre would be excluded under the definition?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The proposed definition of man-made fibre is sufficiently broad to include viscose, acetate, nylon, orlon, terylene, acrilan and similar fibres which are cellulose products or true synthetics. Polymers, the expression which is used in line 9 are substances composed of giant molecules which have been formed from union with simple molecules.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not recall whether this definition in this section of the bill specifically comes forward in a report of the tariff board. Frequently the tariff board, in response to a request from the Minister of Finance for investigation, does come up not only with specific recommendations for changes in rates of duty but also recommends certain changes in definition.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The tariff board did recommend this change.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it that with respect to this clause, Mr. Chairman, you would adopt some system of going over the individual items in the schedule seriatim. Last week it was found reasonably satisfactory to take the schedule page by page with a slight pause so that members of the committee could just examine the ten or so items on the page and determine whether or not they had the necessity of inquiring about any item.

The Chairman: I imagine the committee would have no objection to doing that. We could do it in two ways, possibly by calling the tariff items one by one as we study clause 2, or by going page by page when we come to schedule A.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Surely it is sufficient page by page, Mr. Chairman, as suggested by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. That was the practice followed in the committee of ways and means on June 8, and I think it was found to be quite adequate.

Mr. Regier: I would say that page by page would be acceptable provided the Chair is not too quick in accepting something as carried.

Mr. Benidickson: You will recognize, Mr. Chairman, that most of us have prepared our notes on the basis of the budget resolutions, and the items on these pages before us are not identical with the pages in the schedule of the resolution. But I am sure that with that—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The items are identical but the page numbering is not the same in the schedule to the bill as it was in the printed pamphlet of ways and means resolutions.

The Chairman: The only problem is this. If there is any specific amendment it should be made before we carry clause 2. That is why if we are only discussing the items it would be sufficient to call the schedule page by page.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder if the minister would indicate in connection with the items presented to us in part I of schedule A—and there are many of them—which items might involve a European country which is the principal supplier. I indicated in my remarks on second reading that naturally we should be concerned about Canada's trading position with respect to those countries in Europe which are setting up trading blocs which might adversely affect us. I think our trade with Europe is about 24 per cent of our over-all, total trade, going well above $1 billion. I wonder if the minister would indicate in connection with these items in schedule A whether any of them involve negotiations with European countries which would be the principal suppliers under our GATT trading agreement.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can do that when we come to schedule A, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. I think the understanding was that we were to deal with these page by page.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have not come to the schedule yet.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

[The Chairman.]

On clause 3—Schedule A further amended.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. Badanai: This clause in paragraph (a) refers to door opening weatherseal retainers. Does that mean weatherseal retainers on automobile doors? It also refers to reclining seat mechanisms. I presume this to mean the automatic seat adjustment in motor cars. Am I correct in that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This applies to the kind of mechanism which is used in some motor cars to enable the seat to go back and fold into a bed. This change applies only in the case of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mr. Badanai: Does this mean the tariff is being removed on these particular items?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Only when imported by a manufacturer who meets the requirements in regard to content. I point out that this applies only to mechanisms which are not of a class or kind made in Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is not a question of asking for further tariff protection but for the maintenance of what we have. I asked the minister a question a few moments ago, when the bill was presented, whether he had given consideration to the brief presented on behalf of the automobile communities of Canada. The minister said he thought it would be proper to deal with that at some other time; but as this very kind of question in principle is involved in some of the recommendations made, has the minister given careful consideration to whether or not this is the kind of thing that might be avoided at this time in order to provide a healthier economic state in the industry and for the maintenance of a higher level of employment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think probably the hon. member is not aware that this change was asked for by the Canadian automotive chamber of commerce and by the Canadian automotive parts manufacturers themselves.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The parts association, too?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: What about the employees?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I presume the employees are interested in this because it is designed, with respect to a type of article that is not made in Canada, to enable the manufacturers of a finished product in Canada to be more competitive either in the Canadian market or in the export market.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister's answer is at least enlightening in part. It indicates that the parts people have been asking for this, but that does not necessarily resolve the matter. For instance, one could refer to the fact that automatic transmissions are made outside of Canada; that a licence has been extended to the automobile manufacturers to have them made outside of Canada for another year. The fact that the manufacturers have agreed to this does not necessarily mean that it is the thing to do. It seems to me that the time has come when automatic transmissions ought to be made in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This has no application to that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; but this is an illustration of what I think is a weakness in the minister's statement. However, I bring it to his attention.

Mr. Benidickson: This clause refers back to the resolutions. It is on page 25 of the ways and means resolutions. I am wondering why the minister did not see fit to present this in the ordinary way; why instead of a separate resolution dealing with words it should not be presented as part of a resolution which would show, as is shown with respect to all these other items, the existing rate and the proposed rate. When we get it in words one has to go back to the library to find out how schedule A of the Customs Tariff of 1959 reads, and it is very complicated.

We have a proposal that those items be included in paragraph (a) 438c of the Customs Tariff schedule. I think the minister would agree with me that this is a long list of automotive parts. But then, after that is all recited, we find that the rate varies substantially according to circumstances. In the first place there would be a tariff rate of 17½ per cent on goods from a most favoured nation, such as the United States, if the parts were for use in the manufacture or repair of the goods enumerated in tariff items 410a, subparagraph 3, 424 and 438a or for use in the manufacture of parts thereof.

Will the minister indicate in connection with each of these items just the extent to which they have been manufactured in Canada in the past? If they were manufactured, what was the rate of duty? Will he indicate what change in the rate of duty is likely to follow as a result of the adoption of this clause? What have they been paying up to his introduction of the budget on March 31, and what is his information as to the rate of duty that is likely to be paid on these items after April 1, 1960?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the form of this clause is concerned, it is designed to assist the house. The change was set out in complete form in resolution No. 6 under the heading of Customs Tariff. The house was given the fullest information by that means. These changes relate to items that are all of great length in the Customs Tariff, and by setting them forth in this form it is much simpler, much clearer and much easier for the house to follow.

Mr. Benidickson: Maybe for the industry; not for the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These items are literally pages in length; therefore this is a much clearer way to set them forth to enable the house to grasp the effect of the changes proposed. Earlier I drew attention to the fact that these changes apply to goods of a class or kind not made in Canada. The imports have not been extensive. For instance, with respect to the door opening weatherseal retainers and the reclining seat mechanisms and swivel seat mechanisms, the imports of those parts in the 1960 model for this year are estimated at only $78,000.

The reference to the parts of the internal combustion engine is a technical amendment. The reference to air cleaners and cast aluminum road wheels applies to things of a class or kind not made in Canada when imported for use in the manufacture of trucks or buses which contain 40 per cent commonwealth content. The imports of these latter products in this present year are estimated at only $40,000, so that these are not large items.

The rates hitherto applicable have been 17½ per cent British preferential; 25 per cent most favoured nation. If they conform to the requirements in relation to content, that is to say 60 per cent commonwealth content in the case of those enumerated in subclause (a) and 40 per cent in the case of those in subclause (c), entry will be free.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, what the minister has said illustrates the concern I expressed earlier. I am not so sure that the question of the content required—the commonwealth content or the content required in the case of importations from non-commonwealth countries—cannot be adjusted without in any way increasing the tariff. I am not suggesting that, but this very provision violates one of the requests made in the submission to which I have already directed the committee's attention, where a request is made for an increase in the Canadian content requirement of vehicles manufactured in Canada and for a review of the whole formula respecting content as well as for the encouragement of Canadian content in imported vehicles. This may be a small item, less than $100,000—

Mr. Benidickson: Just part of it. Just one item was $78,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, just one. But the accumulation is important. One of the factors producing instability in the automobile industry at the present time, if that is a correct characterization, is the question of importations. If that can be dealt with in a way that will not prejudice tariff policy and so on it ought to be done, and I think it can be done by a change in the content requirement. What we are doing in this bill is going one step further along the lines generally complained of by the industry throughout the country.

Mr. Spencer: Mr. Chairman, before the minister answers that point I should like him to clear up the point raised earlier by the hon. member for Essex East. I should like the minister to set my own mind at ease on this point. I think perhaps I understand it and that the hon. member for Essex East does not fully comprehend it.

As I understand the purpose of the present amendment it is to admit these specific items which are not made in Canada at a lower rate of duty, in fact duty free, if they are utilized in the manufacture of certain vehicles in Canada. That in no way adversely affects the employment of men in Canada, as I understand it, because these commodities are not made in Canada at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am suggesting they should be; that is the point.

Mr. Spencer: The hon. member for Essex East has indicated that this amendment will have some bearing upon the point raised in a previous brief, that employment in Canada would be promoted by a change in the Canadian content. It is my understanding that this will have a beneficial effect, because when these items are incorporated into the vehicle—being articles not made in Canada and therefore not of Canadian content—it will mean that in order for the manufacturer to get these articles in duty free he will have to increase the other content of the automobile so as to come within the specified requirements respecting the Canadian content. By virtue of these things being done the manufacturer will have to incorporate into the vehicle a greater quantity of other Canadian-made products. The net result will be, of course, that some other item which at present is being imported will have to be incorporated into the vehicle, and that will be a Canadian-made commodity. I do not know whether that is the correct understanding, but I believe it is.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that is entirely the correct understanding. This change will have the effect of reducing the cost of production of the Canadian automobile or truck to the extent to which these particular parts are installed in the finished product. What the hon. member has said in regard to content is also entirely correct.

Mr. Benidickson: I can see that point, Mr. Chairman, and have no quarrel with it. Did the minister not say, however, that at the present time the effective protection is 25 per cent? Did he not say it is 17½ per cent British preferential and 25 per cent most favoured nation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, but I think these are imported largely from the United States.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. Up to the present time these articles have been protected to the extent of 25 per cent. They have paid a duty rate of 25 per cent. They will now come in free if not made in Canada; is that right?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They will become free under the changes now proposed, but this applies only to articles of this description of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: We will assume they are not made in Canada now. I assume there has been an encouragement to Canadian manufacturers to look at the possibility of making them by reason of a tariff of 25 per cent. That is to be taken away, so the encouragement for Canadian industry to look at this possibility is probably going to be considerably less than it was prior to this change.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the experience of the Canadian manufacturers is that the volume is so very small that they could not possibly hope to compete, and this is in line with requests that are often received in the case of components that enter into the Canadian manufacture of finished goods. Where there is no Canadian source, therefore request is made that the tariff be removed on these elements in order to assist the Canadian manufacturer to be competitive in relation to his finished product.

Mr. Benidickson: I see the point and am glad of the explanation, but I want to understand what the result will be. Heretofore these articles in 438c and 438d have been subject to a duty on import of 25 per cent. Inasmuch as they are not presently made in Canada they will come in duty free for the manufacturer of an automobile made in Canada. The next step would be that if at some future date someone started to make these items in Canada the duty would be 17½ per cent and not 25 per cent by reason of putting them into this schedule. Is that correct?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is right only in part. There is provision for the following rates: British preferential, free; most favoured nation, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent. That applies with respect to some of the items within the description contained in item 438c of the tariff, but only with respect to some.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, I see a general tariff rate of 30 per cent. We are not importing these particular items under either the British preferential tariff or the general tariff, are we, inasmuch as we manufacture automobiles of the type manfactured in the United States?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nearly all of these come from the United States. They are imported in small volume and are required now in connection with 1960 production programs.

Mr. Benidickson: Could I ask the minister another question. Has this change in tariff any relationship whatsoever to his negotiations with any country signatory to GATT in consequence of the government's decision to increase textile tariffs and its obligation to make some concessions elsewhere in the tariff schedule?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman, this change was made entirely at the request of the Canadian automotive chamber of commerce and the Canadian automotive parts manufacturers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think I have misunderstood the situation. I am not satisfied that the interpretation I have placed on this section is not correct in the light of administrative practice. I am certainly not satisfied that the matter of the required content is policed or has been policed to the extent required under the law. I am sure that if only $78,000 worth of goods are involved under this section that is not going to appreciably change the amount of imported parts that now go into the Canadian-made automobile. However, there is another aspect of this problem that was raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River which I think is important, having in mind my particular concern, and that is the question of the valuation placed on imported vehicles, especially from other than commonwealth countries, particularly those countries where the cost of production is considerably below that of this country or most western countries. I have in mind particularly the Soviet union. We have a treaty with the Soviet union.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the general tariff, is it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The matter of valuation under the Customs Act has nothing to do with the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River raised this question and inquired of the minister—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not relevant to this bill at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend says it is not relevant, but while he does not administer the Department of National Revenue and is not responsible for valuation, surely he can tell us what the policy of the government is with regard to the valuation that would be placed on products made in lower cost countries in competition with our own. I submit with confidence to the minister that under this bill the question put by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and now supported by me is in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sure the support of the hon. member for Essex East would almost make a question which is out of order in order but not quite. The subject matter of the hon. member's question does not relate to this bill at all. There will be proper occasions when that question can be raised, but this is not one of them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, I think it is, but the minister does not want to answer. All right.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I should like to clear up one point. Suppose in future people do enter into the manufacture of such products; would the duty then be automatically imposed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. Once it is manufactured in Canada then it comes out of this provision. This applies only in the case of goods of this description of a class or kind not made in Canada.

Mr. Pugh: So there will be no bar to anyone starting manufacturing in Canada at any time if it is a profitable venture.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; and that applies, of course, to a great many items in the tariff.

Mr. Benidickson: I understand that a declaration would have to be made in the Canada Gazette or something of that kind if someone started to manufacture these items. If that declaration were obtained after the commencement of manufacture, under what section would these articles then be in the tariff schedule?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The rates?

Mr. Benidickson: The minister said that the items would go out of this section.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The British preferential rate?

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think they go out. I think they are probably covered.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The most favoured nation rate will be 17½ per cent then.

Mr. Regier: I should like an explanation of a matter raised by the hon. member for Essex West and replied to by the minister. If these parts are not made in Canada I can understand that by reducing the tariff on them we enable the Canadian manufacturer to be more competitive when he attempts to dispose of his end product. However, if these parts are already imported into Canada, not being made in Canada, as a result of this amendment how would a manufacturer increase the Canadian content in his automobile?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The reference made by the hon. member for Essex West was to point out how this affects the finished product, not how it affects the imported article; because presumably there is no Canadian or commonwealth content in the part that is imported. He had reference to the Canadian or commonwealth content as applied to the finished product; therefore where it becomes a matter of measuring the Canadian or commonwealth content of the finished product it means that the other components in the finished product must make up the extent to which this particular component is not of commonwealth or Canadian content.

Mr. Regier: The minister has not yet answered my question. If these reclining seat mechanisms, swivel seat mechanisms and so on were imported before and importation is now being made a little easier by reducing the tariff as long as they are not manufactured in Canada, how then is the manufacturer under an obligation to increase his Canadian content in the completed automobile or truck?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in the case of the parts or mechanisms referred to in (a), this, as I pointed out, creates free entry for those so described when of a class or kind not made in Canada when imported by a Canadian automobile manufacturer who achieves a specified commonwealth content which in general in this respect is 60 per cent. I point out that due weight must be given to the words "of a class or kind not made in Canada" as applied to the change now before us.

Mr. Benidickson: We are dealing, of course, with just one alphabetical subsection of general item 438 of the tariff schedule. We are dealing with 438c, and I take it that item 438a deals with an entire automobile. Item 438a deals with importing an entire automobile, and I think we would be interested in relating the tariff rates on a complete unit to the rates that would apply to the importation of a part such as those referred to in clause 3 of the bill. If we are dealing with the importation of a completed automobile there would be free entry from a British commonwealth country, whereas the rate from the United States would be 17½ per cent plus, of course, the sales tax of 11 per cent. That would apply in each case, would it not?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, the tariff rates quoted by the hon. member are correct.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister indicate what tariff is imposed against the importation of a Canadian automobile into the United Kingdom or into the United States? What would be the rates against a Canadian automobile or a part such as those referred to in this clause if imported into the United Kingdom or the United States?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This goes quite outside the scope of this matter. I wish to be as obliging as I can when information is requested, but this is obviously outside the scope of the bill. I am not going to attempt to do more than give my friend an answer from memory on this point. I understand that the United Kingdom tariff rate under such circumstances is 20 per cent and the United States rate is, I think, 8.5 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: That pertains to parts?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is my recollection; again I am speaking only from memory. I wish that clearly understood.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister, but on the point of order I do not want him to indicate to the committee that this is anything in the nature of a favour. We are asked here, under clause 3, to make certain changes to our Customs Act. I say it is an appropriate question, when we are asked to amend our tariff schedule with respect to the United Kingdom, with respect to the United States and with respect to countries that are not under treaty as most favoured nations, to ask what, in return, are their tariff rates; and the minister should not indicate that it is a concession to give the information to the committee. In so far as the proviso about which he is speaking from memory is concerned, certainly

I accept that, but it is in order to ask what is the reciprocity with respect to these items.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If there were reciprocity the question would be appropriate. However, I have pointed out that there is no question of a concession in this respect. This is a change that was made at the request not of another importer, or in return for concessions made by another country, but of the Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What the minister has said is true, but it depends upon what the foundation of one's question is. Canadian automobile exports to Great Britain are subject to duty, while British exports of automobiles to Canada have free entry. Notwithstanding what has been said, is it a fact that the Canadian government is going to apply at the next GATT meeting in September for a revision of the restriction that would prevent Great Britain from applying to Canadian manufactured automobiles the same rate which British manufactured automobiles have in Canada? It does not seem right, and the minister has not answered, except with a political answer. I am trying to deal with this serious situation in an objective way. It does not seem right that a strong competitor such as Great Britain should enjoy in the automotive field the advantage she now has, particularly when the automobile industry in Canada is facing such serious competition and such a serious situation has resulted.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The United Kingdom enjoys, in this respect, simply those tariff advantages which were introduced by the government of which the hon. member was a member. We have made no change in that respect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just acknowledged that. At that time the situation was not serious. We do not always have to say, here is what was done 10 years ago. We are faced now with a serious situation. British competition is very serious in the automobile industry, because 26 per cent of the cars sold in Canada last year were made outside of Canada. This has a serious effect on the employment of thousands and thousands of people in this country.

I am simply asking the minister whether it is the intention of this government, at the next meeting of GATT, to have consideration given to this aspect of the problem. I have not been vigorous in any denunciation this morning, and the minister is not warranted in embarking upon that kind of debate; because it could be reciprocated. I am simply trying to deal with the minister in an objective way regarding a problem of vital concern to the community from which I come.

Mr. Benidickson: I am looking again at this schedule of related articles under item 438, which is the class dealing with automobiles and automobile parts in general. I think it is quite in order, when we are asked to accept these rates, to look at how they might relate to other subsections of the main item 438. Now, would the minister indicate why, if the items in 438b, of a class or kind not made in Canada, enter free under the British preferential tariff as well as under the most favoured nation tariff he proposes a 17 per cent tariff in connection with this item? I know there is a reason for it, but I have forgotten. I am asking why the differentiation between some items of a certain kind not made in Canada and others of a certain kind such as is proposed here in this section, 17½ per cent. Has this something to do with a treaty agreement? In particular I would inquire what rate would apply on such an article as the hon. member for Essex East inquired about and to which reference is made in the brief from the united automobile workers, the automatic transmission. What rate of duty is paid on that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The provisions of item 438b are not involved in the present amending bill, Mr. Chairman. I am told that those rates have been in effect since the tariff board made a report on that subject and effect was given to that report back about 1936. As to whether there are some items in 438b under the provisions of GATT, I am told that some of them are bound.

Mr. Benidickson: On the last question I raised, could the minister say, or one of his officials identify, in this item 438 what we laymen call the automatic transmissions? Apparently they are not made in Canada but are imported largely from the United States. If imported from the United States, what rate of duty is paid on that component?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are not under 438b at all; they are under 438n.

Mr. Benidickson: I just wanted to know under what section they were.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

On schedule A.

Mr. Benidickson: I think we have an agreement here, Mr. Chairman, that you will call the schedule page by page rather slowly in case hon. members have any questions beyond those raised on June 8 at the resolution stage.

Items 66b, 142, 160, 187e, 199m, 225c, 343, 347e, 414a, 414e, 463a, 463c, 465a, 465b agreed to.

505f: Southern yellow pine lumber, not further manufactured than planed on two sides, for use in the manufacture of flooring for motor trucks: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Regier: I wonder whether the minister would explain just what is involved in the change under 505f, southern yellow pine lumber. What was the rate before and what is the proposal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a new item which extends to the lumber in question the same tariff treatment when it is planed on two sides as has all along been applied when it is planed on one side only. This becomes necessary because of a change in practice in United States mills whereby it is difficult to obtain supplies of southern yellow pine planed on one side only.

Mr. Benidickson: I am sure the minister is correct. On the other hand I find it hard to reconcile that with the item as it appears, showing the proposed rate and the old rate on page 10 of the ways and means resolutions. There it was indicated that for an item of this importance, the former rate was British preferential 10 per cent and the proposed rate is free; the most favoured nation rate was 10 per cent and the rate now proposed is free.

I must confess that I was curious about this matter previously but forgot to raise the point when we were discussing it at the resolution stage. Is it simply a matter of planing on two sides as against one side only where we find a difference in rates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no change here in the case of lumber planed on one side only. It fell under these same rates previously. But formerly where it was planed on two sides it fell under item 505 and accordingly carried the rates of 10 per cent, 10 per cent and 25 per cent. This is designed simply to bring lumber that is planed on two sides within the scope of the rates applicable to lumber planed on one side only. This particular lumber is of a special kind which is required in the manufacture of Canadian truck bodies.

Mr. Benidickson: Did this enter in any way into the concessions? I find it is in the section dealing with concessions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, this was included within the scope of our negotiations with the United States.

Mr. Benidickson: It is more than just a rewriting of the schedule for the convenience of our government. It was an item of tariff trading when it was decided to increase the rates of duties against certain imports such as textiles.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It had been asked for by the United States. It had also been asked for by our own Canadian truck manufacturers. Therefore it was a logical one to use in the negotiations.

Mr. Herridge: In listening to the minister's explanation about the planing of lumber on one side and on two sides, I was wondering whether he was aware of the fact that lumber is surfaced on one side or four sides. That is the custom.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For the purpose of the Customs Tariff I am afraid it is not quite so scientific. It recognizes lumber planed on one side or planed on two sides. It is interesting to have the observation of the hon. member, but here the basis of distinction has been one side or two sides.

Mr. Regier: Can the minister tell us whether the Canadian lumber producers were consulted about this matter? I had heard previously that the policy of the government was in the first place to protect native Canadian enterprise as far as possible and in addition, if and when importation was necessary, to complete the manufacture within Canada in so far as was at all possible. I notice here an increase in importation and also an opening for labour to be employed outside of the borders of Canada. I wonder whether the minister can explain this matter. I have seen all kinds of floorings in motor trucks. They have been made up of all kinds of Canadian wood. At the moment I do not realize the urgent need for greater importation of southern yellow pine lumber.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have pointed out that this is a specialty. We are not dealing with it merely as an importation of softwood. It is a specialty used for a particular purpose. The Canadian Lumbermen's Association have been fully acquainted with the proposed change.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—236. Surgical dressings, antiseptic or aseptic, including absorbent cotton, lint, lamb's wool, tow, jute, oakum, whether imported singly or in combination one with another, but not stitched or otherwise manufactured; surgical trusses and suspensory bandages of all kinds; sanitary napkins, and abdominal supports: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 20 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. McMillan: With regard to item 236, surgical dressings, I note that the rates are now 10 per cent, 20 per cent and 35 per cent. Can the minister tell us what the rates are at the present time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As the hon. member will be aware from the provisions that appeared in the resolution which was before the committee of ways and means last week, there is no change in the rates. The only change is in the scope of the item, in this case the deletion of the words from the present item: "woven fabric of cotton weighing not more than seven and one half pounds per one hundred square yards". The change was recommended by the tariff board.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—410o. (iii) Mine roof and wall supports and support systems, of metal, including yielding props or chocks, but not including roof bolts or washers or nuts therefor, for use underground in mines; parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. Dumas: Can the minister tell the committee whether item 410o is a new item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: No. 410o is a mining item which was amended, was it not, in the ways and means committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: I have the old rates but not the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amendment did not change the rates.

Mr. Benidickson: There has been no change in the rates from the 22½ per cent most favoured nation tariff to 12½ per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amendment moved in committee simply added certain words to the resolution.

Mr. Benidickson: You eliminated certain paraphernalia in connection with it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. It is simply a clarification of intent. That was done by inserting the words "but not including roof bolts or washers or nuts therefor".

Mr. Benidickson: I note that it is almost one o'clock. Perhaps between now and when we resume the minister might be prepared to give us some information about item 522(3), coloured woven fabrics. Am I right in thinking that this is one of the important items of tariff increase? If so, perhaps the minister could give us an indication of what volume of trade was experienced in 1959 and what would be the next most important textile import item from the United States or Japan. What was the import in connection with this item from the United States or from various countries? What was the total volume, and is this one of the major changes in the schedule that is presented to us today?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. This item 522, subheading 3, consolidates a number of former items. The new item covers imports valued at approximately $45 million in 1959, substantially more than are covered in any other item in this resolution. The main source is the United States. Last year imports from the United States amounted to $36 million. The imports from other countries are relatively small by comparison. The next largest source was Japan, from which the imports amounted to $2,600,000.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think when we adjourned for luncheon we were discussing item 522(3), women fabrics, cotton, coloured. Is this the item which would include the bulk of most cloths which might to into the production of ladies' dresses and things of that kind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: I think I raised the question before the adjournment as to whether the minister would tell the committee what is the next largest item in the schedule in relation to volume of imports. He indicated that this involved imports of about $45 million last year. I wonder if he could even go beyond the second item and give us two or three illustrations so we would be more knowledgeable in the committee about the items which are important.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Item 520a, raw cotton, $52,866,000. Item 523a, $22 million in round figures; that is clothing and manufactures. Item 522(2), bleached cotton fabrics, $4,200,000 in round figures. Then item 522(1), the unbleached cotton fabrics, $10 million.

Mr. Benidickson: So we are dealing with items which in dollar volume of trade are very important in connection with the concessions with which we are presented, which this government has decided to give largely to the United States in reductions of duty. Am I right in thinking that the next item, 523a, clothing, wearing apparel, etc. is a substantial item also because it involves in trade $22 million, if that is what the minister said?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did mention item 523a, clothing, $22 million. I think the hon. member is not quite right in the conclusion he stated at the opening of his remarks just now. Many of the commodities have not any changed rates here. There are changes in rates as applied to some specific items here as indicated in italics, but many of these items are not changed. In the case of the changes, those which came from the tariff board—and these are all in that category—show some increases and some decreases, as I pointed out at the time of the budget speech.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman; but on the items we are discussing, with regard to item 522(3), coloured woven fabrics, wholly of cotton, we have had trade with the United States amounting to $45 million. Is the minister not proposing an increase of some 5 per cent in the tariff here? How does that affect the cost, say, of a woman's dress; shall I say the average cost, because I know the amount would vary considerably. If this ordinary type of woven cotton fabric was imported and the tariff increase was 5 per cent, what effect might that have on the eventual cost to the consumer in this country who was buying a modestly priced lady's dress?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The increase is not as great as that indicated by the hon. member; it is probably about 3 per cent. The actual comparison appeared in the pamphlet in which the resolutions were put before the committee of ways and means; but as applied to women's dresses in particular, I am told that on a $5 purchase this could make a difference of about 3 cents.

Mr. Benidickson: Is my hon. friend referring to the dress? I take it that he quarrels with me on relating the difference between the old rate of 17½ per cent and 3 cents per pound and the new proposed rate of 22½ per cent. I can quite understand when he says that does not mean a difference of 5 per cent. I think there is a difference of opinion between the trade and the department as to whether it is what the minister says, namely 2 per cent, or whether it is 3 per cent. Is there any new opinion on this since the dispute arose?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman; the figure, as I mentioned, was 3 per cent. I indicated that this might mean on a woman's dress 3 cents on a $5 purchase. This is the estimate given by the primary textiles institute. The department has given me an estimate of 3.9 cents on an article costing $8.95.

Mr. Benidickson: I assume that is on the cost to the manufacturer, and there is an assumption that the—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the retail price.

Item agreed to.

Items 520b, 521, 523a, 523b, 524, 530a, 530b, 530c, 530d, 531a, 531b, 531c, 531d, 532d, 532e, 550, 551a, 551b, 552a, 552b, 553 agreed to.

Customs tariff:—560a. Man-made fibres or glass fibres, not exceeding 12 inches in length: British preferential tariff, 5 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 15 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister satisfied that last Wednesday, June 8, he gave this committee a proper explanation of this item? There is some controversy in so far as the departure from the tariff board recommendation is concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The 560a item is a new one, which provides for the entry of man-made and glass fibres at 5 per cent British preferential, 12½ per cent most favoured nation and 15 per cent general tariff. These are as recommended by the tariff board. These were all included as part of the tariff board's recommendation IX(a). This replaces former item 557c.

Mr. Benidickson: I know it has been reported by the Financial Post that this item departs from the tariff board recommendation, in that the tariff board recommended 7½ per cent and the minister recommends 12½ per cent.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The tariff board recommendation was 5 per cent British preferential and 12½ per cent most favoured nation. For technical reasons advanced by the Canadian industry following publication of the report by the tariff board on reference No. 125—this is the report on silks, man-made fibres and products—the wording recommended by the tariff board has been amended by deleting the words "not containing wool or hair" and by subdividing the recommended item IX into this item and the three following. This item and all those which follow throughout the part of the schedule relating to synthetics have been formulated on the basis of the definition of man-made fibres recommended by the tariff board and implemented by resolution No. 1. Resolution No. 1 is reproduced in clause 1 of the bill.

Mr. Winch: By man-made fibres do you mean synthetics as differentiated from cotton, wool, or something like that?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes. It has application to what we commonly call synthetics.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Without referring to his official or to his book, will the minister satisfy my curiosity as to the real diversification of his knowledge by telling me what is meant in item 559e by nubs, slugs, slubs, neps or kemps?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are textile products. They are not nasty names.

Item agreed to.

Items 559a, 559b, 559c, 559d, 559e, 559f, 560b, 560c 560d, 560e, 561b, 561c, 561d agreed to.

Customs tariff—561a. Yarns and rovings, wholly of man-made fibres or filaments or of glass fibres or filaments, not more advanced than singles, not coloured, with not more than seven turns to the inch: British preferential tariff, 20 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 22½ per cent but not less than 22 cents per pound; general tariff, 35 per cent but not less than 28 cents per pound.

Mr. Benidickson: May I refer to item 561a? By reference back to the ways and means resolutions one notes an increase in the British preferential tariff from 5 per cent to 20 per cent in certain circumstances under this item. What is the reason for this when we are trying to increase our trade with the commonwealth? The same question would apply to the next item, 561b, where the increase on paper seems to be 7½ per cent to 22½ per cent with respect to some items referred to in this paragraph.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A roving, as hon. members are no doubt aware, is an attenuated strand of fibres from which yarn is spun. The increase here simply follows the recommendation of the tariff board, and I understand that the tariff board in making this recommendation took into account a very considerable change in the competitive situation since the original item with the 5 per cent British preferential rate was first written into the tariff.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: We continue with the next group of items.

Mr. Winch: I have not been able to find the item on which I should like to ask a question. I understood from the recent visit of the Australian trade commission that they expect in the near future to be able to export to Canada a type of wool fabric or garment which will enable them to compete with the modern washable non-ironing fabrics such as we have in our shirts today. This was announced in the newspapers. Is there any special duty on that type of fabric, or will it come in under any special provision of the Customs Tariff. I understand that Australia is the only country that has yet developed this system of treating wool, and its introduction would be most welcome.

Mr. Benidickson: May I address a question to the hon. member who has put the question to the minister? Is it not his understanding that this particular development is free from copyright or any other restriction so far as world trade is concerned? Canadians will be able to make the same fabrics though the Australian government, through its financial assistance, developed the product.

Mr. Winch: I do not know that. All I know is that I was most interested when I was in Australia last year to be told about the research and the work they were doing on the production of wool fabrics which would enable people to have garments such as we have in Canada today. An example is the shirt which is washable and does not need to be ironed.

I was told they were nearing the end of their research. I read in the papers last week a statement by a member of the Australian trade commission that they were now engaged in production of this material. Will this come under the tariff, or since it has been developed in a part of the commonwealth will it come in duty free?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have not the information the hon. member has about this particular product. I have heard nothing of the announcement to which he refers; consequently my answer must be somewhat reserved for that reason. If the product is entirely of wool then these items we are now dealing with in Bill No. C-74 would have no application whatever. It would be under a different item altogether in the tariff dealing with woollens. Beyond that it would not be wise for me to attempt to go until we know more about the particular product and the ingredients of it.

Items 561e, 562a, 562b, 562c, 562d, 562e, 562f, 562g, 562h, 563, 563a, 564 and 565 agreed to.

Customs tariff—573. Enamelled carriage, shelf and table oilcloth, and cork matting or carpets. British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, with respect to item 573 what change is involved in this schedule?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With reference to the item there is no change whatever in rates. The item itself continues without change that part of item 573 which relates to oilcloth and cork matting or carpets. Linoleum which formerly was included in item 573 is dealt with now in 573a. That is the change that has been made in 573.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—573a. Linoleum; felt base floor covering not including such materials in which are incorporated synthetic resin sheets or cellulose plastic sheets. British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. Benidickson: I see a reduction of 2½ per cent in the tariff under item 573a from 27½ per cent most favoured nation to 25 per cent, with respect to linoleum. What industry have we in Canada that is affected by this change?

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There are factories in Canada, Mr. Chairman, that produce linoleum. This is a very modest change indeed; it is only 2½ per cent. The new rates proposed will still provide for a very substantial level of protection to Canadian linoleum producers and a very substantial margin of preference for commonwealth imports.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—586. Anthracite coal; anthracite coal screenings and dust: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, 50 cents per ton.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, would the minister give us an explanation of 586 relating to anthracite coal screenings and dust?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I gave a full explanation of this item when we were in the committee of ways and means. The hon. member will find it in Hansard of June 8 at page 4687, in the second column.

Mr. Benidickson: Did the minister at that time explain clearly what type of anthracite coal paid entry 50 cents per ton on most favoured nation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought I did, Mr. Chairman. This applies to the screenings and the dust.

Mr. Winch: Is the 50 cents per ton on coal coming from the United States to Nova Scotia, a coal mining area of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The general tariff rate of 50 cents per ton did apply to screenings and dust coming into Canada from the United States, but under this item the import will now be free for the reasons which I gave. This matter has been discussed with the dominion coal board, and we have been assured that this tariff change will have no adverse effect on Canadian coal production.

Mr. Benidickson: In his reports from his officials perhaps the minister has information I have not as to the end use of anthracite coal screenings and dust in Canada. What is the purpose of the import? What largely is the product devoted to once it arrives?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is of particular interest in the production of pig iron, titanium and other products such as electric battery boxes.

Mr. Benidickson: Are some of the industries producing these products located in the maritimes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know that any of these industries are located in the maritime provinces. There are various Canadian industries that are interested in this. The point on which I put some emphasis when the subject was before the committee of ways and means on June 8 was that this had been studied by the dominion coal board and the board had satisfied itself and satisfied us that this change would have no adverse effect on Canadian producers.

Mr. Winch: That is the point I do not understand, and I was not present at the time. I recently visited Nova Scotia and am interested in the coal mining industry. I understand the use of this commodity is for heat, and that it is largely used on an industrial basis. Is the minister telling us that the report of the board, accepted by the government, was to the effect that the coal of the maritimes is not of such a nature that when made into screenings or dust it can be used for heat purposes, domestic or commercial? I am more interested in the commercial aspect, of course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The report does not go that far. There are geographical factors involved here and questions of marketing, I presume. The coal board, which after all has always before it the problem of markets for Nova Scotia coal, has studied this matter and reported to us that this change in the tariff rates on the screenings and dust would have no adverse effect on Canadian production.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this a public document? Has the report been made public?

Mr. Winch: Would the minister explain why a document of this importance has not been made public so we can see the basis on which the recommendation was made and accepted?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A great deal of information of a departmental nature comes to ministers which is used in giving statements to the house when the original information, in whatever form it may come, is not producible. That happens all the time.

Mr. Winch: Yes, but—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member realizes, I am sure, that when a proposal comes forward with respect to a matter of this kind, for a change in the tariff on coal in any form, we would not think of bringing it to the house without first having consulted the coal board. We consulted the coal board about this, and I have given the house the answer that the coal board has given us in relation to the inquiry we made of them.

Mr. Winch: The point that stumps me is that a change in the tariff is being recommended, as the minister admits, on the basis of information from the coal board, yet we cannot find out anything about the reasoning or purpose of the recommendation of the coal board which will permit the importation into the maritime provinces, a coal mining area, of anthracite coal screenings and dust. We do not understand how it can be said that it will have no effect on the coal mining industry. Surely it is reasonable for a member to ask the minister to tell us just on what basis the coal board says this change will have no effect. Surely we are entitled to know on what basis this finding was made. How can we accept or reject this change without knowing the basis upon which it is being made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I hope the hon. member is not going to go off on a tangent on this subject. I have made the sequence of events with respect to how this comes about quite clear. This is not a matter that arises from the coal board in the first place. The coal board did not initiate this matter by writing a formal report and sending it to us. We had representations from a number of Canadian producers who are interested in products in the production of which anthracite screenings and dust are employed. They asked for the removal of the tariff of 50 cents per ton. We examined the matter. Obviously there was some merit in the proposal, but before we took any action we consulted the coal board to ascertain whether, having regard to all the factors in the situation, the removal of the tariff of 50 cents per ton on anthracite screenings and dust would have any adverse effect whatsoever on Canadian production. After giving the matter due consideration their report to us was that it would not have any adverse effect on Canadian production. That is the whole story.

Mr. Benidickson: Is there any possibility of the committee obtaining a copy of the report, in view of the fact—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. It was a specific inquiry which was directed by my department to the coal board, and they have given a specific reply. It is not a case, as I pointed out, of some formal written report. It is not a communication of that nature. We would not think of moving in a situation like this without consulting the coal board in relation to the interests of Canadian producers, and nobody in the country is in closer contact with this situation than the dominion coal board.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister's words were that this change in the tariff did not originate with the dominion coal board. I can well understand that that goes without saying. However, it appears to be in the package of trade concessions that were made because the government decided that they wanted to hike the tariff rates on the import of certain textiles. Is that a fact? Is this one of the items that the government made use of to trade with some other GATT trading partner in order to increase the rates of duty on textiles?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is partly right. He is right to this extent, that this was one of the items that formed part of the package deal made with the United States; but after all in these negotiations we are looking about for opportunities to make use of situations where it is to Canada's advantage to have a reduction and to use that concession as a bargaining factor in the negotiations. It happened that this was one of those cases. It was fortunate that this was a case where we had an opportunity to use what was regarded by the United States as a concession without doing any harm to Canadian production, and at the same time assist certain Canadian producers of the products to which I have referred in a manner that might help them to reduce their costs of production and make them more competitive.

Mr. Benidickson: We do not know whether any harm has been done. The minister has the report and he does not make it available to anybody else. Perhaps he would tell us what the most recent statistics indicate as to the volume of imports at the 50 cents per ton rate or under the free rate from the United States.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the fiscal year 1958-59 imports were about 7,500 tons. We expect that figure will increase.

Mr. Benidickson: What would be the dollar value? Could the minister hazard a guess?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I do not have that information.

Mr. Winch: I think this only affects the maritime provinces, and I should like to ask the minister what Canadian producers feel they can reduce their production costs if they do not have to pay a tariff of 50 cents per ton.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have no precise information on that but, as in all these cases, the representations are that if the tariff comes off their competitive position is improved in fabricating the finished product.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Winch: From what source did these representations come? What type of Canadian producers said this would help to reduce their costs?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Manufacturers. I referred to the types of products, Mr. Chairman; pig iron, titanium and other products such as electric battery boxes.

Item agreed to.

Items 624a and 663f agreed to.

Mr. Benidickson: The committee will recognize that part II on page 8 has reference to another resolution that we dealt with in the committee of ways and means. I hope the minister will reassure us—I think he so indicated in committee of ways and means—that all these items, with the exception of the amendment presented to 538g, are simply rewording items and are not changes of consequence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are not even rewording; they are simply renumbering.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister say how these double rates work out, n.o.p. and so much per pound? Are both rates applied to every article, or can they be modified? There are notes here in certain cases that the total duty leviable shall not be in excess of 60 cents per pound. Is that the ceiling for the combined rates?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These are cumulative. You will see tariff rates expressed in percentage terms, which is ad valorem, and then you have certain specific rates that are applied, and the specific rate is expressed in cents. In the case to which the hon. member refers you have a ceiling applied in terms of a specific duty of 60 cents per pound. That establishes a ceiling on the combined application of the ad valorem and specific rates.

Mr. Carter: That is the combined rates; the two rates apply?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes; where there is a rate expressed in both ad valorem and specific terms, both apply. You see the word "and" in each case.

Items 532a, 532b and 532c agreed to.

Customs tariff—538a. Cotton yarns, wholly covered with a double layer of metallic strip in single strand only, when imported by manufacturers for use exclusively in the manufacture of electrical conductors, in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; most favoured nation tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent and 4 cents per pound.

Mr. Winch: There is one question I should like to ask in connection with this item. I hope the minister can give some information on this. I have always thought that Canada, as a copper and lead producing nation, could have a greater industry than she has at the present time, good as it is. Item 538a refers to cotton yarns, wholly covered with a double layer of metallic strip in single strand only for use exclusively in the manufacture of electrical conductors. Do certain manufacturers in Canada apply that type of covering to electrical conductors? I am wondering whether it is something of an infinitesimal nature of whether, as a lead and copper producing nation, it is something we could manufacture instead of importing.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I cannot be certain whether there is any of that particular type of metal strip involved here. Item 538a refers to cotton yarns wholly covered with a double layer of metallic strip in single strand only. I presume anything that corresponds with that will bring the commodity within the description of the item.

Mr. Winch: That is what I had in mind. I do not know whether or not anything of that type is being manufactured in Canada. If it is part of the cable industry, why is there any change in the tariff?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no change in the tariff created by this item. All we are doing is renumbering the item.

Mr. Benidickson: My hon. friend from Vancouver East referred to this copper item which may be bound with fabric. Could the minister indicate whether any proposals have been made by the United States to this country, which he will not divulge to the committee but which apparently have been publicized in Washington, include any offer of more lenient tariff relations between this country and the United States in so far as copper and some other products are concerned?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I must correct at once the impression left by the hon. member's remarks. The United States has not as yet made any offer at all, and presumably an offer will not be made until the GATT conference is convened later in the year. All that has happened so far has been that, in keeping with the practice of the United States, where the United States administration either of its own accord has considered using certain items for discussion purposes or has been asked to reduce the tariff on certain items in the United States, the administration puts out a notice of these particular items and any person in the United States who is interested in them has an opportunity of making representations to the United States tariff authorities. The mere publication of this list should not be interpreted as an offer made by the United States to Canada or any other country.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister has referred to this offer—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I said it was not an offer.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, it is a notice of some kind. Would the minister indicate to us, because we are so vitally interested in this matter, what steps any member of the cabinet or any of our ambassadors or any of our officials abroad take when they see this type of thing? What is the machinery that gets into operation? If the minister says it is not an offer could he indicate, after it is publicized, how it comes to his attention? Has he seen it? Perhaps he has not seen it. Last week the opposition made reference to the fact that they had seen it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I must point out that this has nothing to do with the matters now under consideration. All we are dealing with here is the matter of an amendment to certain items in the tariff, simply renumbering some of them. This matter that the hon. member wishes to raise can be raised on some other occasion, under the proper circumstances, but it has no application to the matter now before us.

Mr. Benidickson: You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that some explanation was made by the minister in connection with this particular procedure on the part of one of our partners in the GATT trade agreement. Surely if the minister puts on the record one side of the story, from then on it is open to other members of this committee to discuss the item.

The Chairman: If, as the minister points out, it is only a question of renumbering the items, it seems to me that at this point there could hardly be any relevant discussion.

Mr. Benidickson: Then could I assert that the minister was out of order in making the extensive remarks he did about the procedures under GATT in so far as our trading partner, the United States, was concerned?

The Chairman: If I understand correctly, at this point we are dealing with part II of Schedule A.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister a question. At least half a dozen times he has stated that things which are not covered by the bill before us can be raised on some other occasion. He always uses that phrase "some other occasion". There are two matters not covered here which I should like to raise. Would he mind indicating what the "some other occasion" is, under which we can raise these matters?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member will speak to me privately I shall be glad to discuss with him the matters he wishes to raise and indicate to him where I think they may be raised in the course of the business during the remainder of this session. Usually the estimates are the proper place to bring up such matters.

Item agreed to.

Items 538b, 538c, 538d, 538e, 538g, 538h, 538i, 538j, 538k, 538m, 538n, 538p and 90e agreed to.

Customs tariff—124b. Squid, octopus and cuttlefish: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. Benidickson: This item relates to the importation of squid, octopus and cuttlefish. What does that mean in volume?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The imports of squid, octopus and cuttlefish, which are used as bait by commercial fishermen on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, amount to about 2 million pounds annually.

Items 180a, 399d, 403, 409e and 437b agreed to.

Customs tariff—438f. Parts, n.o.p., electro-plated or not, whether finished or not, for automobiles, motor vehicles, electric trackless trolley buses, firefighting vehicles, ambulances and hearses, or chassis enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a, including engines, but not including ball or roller bearings, wireless receiving sets, die castings of zinc, electric storage batteries, parts of wood, tires and tubes or parts of which the component material of chief value is rubber: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the minister any comment to make on item 438f or 438g, which of course affect a number of important parts that go to make up an automobile?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In so far as item 438f is concerned the comment can be brief, because the only change in that item is the number. The previous number was 438f(1).

In so far as 438g is concerned, the purpose of the amendment involved here is to ensure that only brake linings and clutch facings are subject to the rates formerly applied under item 438f. The rates are as indicated there, free or 15 per cent British preferential, depending upon whether the linings are made wholly or in part from crude asbestos of British commonwealth origin or foreign asbestos, and 25 per cent under the most favoured nation tariff.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Winch.]

Customs tariff—237a. Deuterium oxide or heavy water; uranium in the form of pigs, ingots, billets or bars: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent; on and after July 1, 1962: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister to explain item 237a. I understood that Canada was a big producer of heavy water. We have a lot of uranium. We have heard a lot about it. I wonder if we do, at any time, import heavy water and, since we are a uranium producer, I am wondering why there is any question of importation in connection with this matter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I gave an explanation of this item in committee of ways and means on June 8, which the hon. member will find at page 4689 of Hansard, second column.

Mr. Benidickson: This is a rather important item in view of the industrial reverses of recent months. Perhaps the minister would condescend to put it on Hansard here for the benefit of those who do not read Hansard consecutively.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On that occasion I gave all the information that is available on the item. It was a full statement. All I would be doing now would be simply repeating word for word the self-same explanation.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister has done that on other occasions.

Mr. Winch: May I say that I am afraid we cannot always be in the House of Commons. We may be in a committee or in another place. This is exactly what happens.

Mr. Pearson: Is it anticipated that under this item there will be any imports of uranium in that form? Has there been any importation of uranium in the past? If there has been none and none is anticipated, then why this item?

Mr. Winch: And heavy water too.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The imports that we have had were as I pointed out on June 8. If I remember rightly I think it was the Leader of the Opposition who asked the question. Yes; as reported at page 4689 of Hansard he asked me to explain the changes, and at the conclusion of the statement I said:

In 1959 imports of heavy water amounted to $2,700,000. There were no imports of uranium metal.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the reason for the imports of heavy water? I seem to remember that in British Columbia during the last war a great many millions of dollars were spent to build a new Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company plant for the development of heavy water. I believe that the uranium studies being undertaken in Canada are on the use of heavy water. Therefore why do we now have the importation of heavy water when, if my understanding is correct, Canada is not only one of the largest producers but one of the greatest experimenters in heavy water? Why do we import heavy water?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The importing is done by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. It was at their request that we provided for the extension of this item, which would have expired on July 1, 1960. It is to be extended to July 1, 1962. They found it necessary to make importations of heavy water from elsewhere.

Mr. Winch: During the last war I believe it was C.M. and S. that produced heavy water. Are they still producing heavy water? I am just now told that after the war that plant was closed down, so that Canada no longer produces heavy water, or C.M. and S. no longer produces heavy water. It is no longer produced in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know for a fact whether Atomic Energy of Canada is producing any heavy water, but I know they have assured the government that they require to import heavy water. These importations in 1959 to which I have referred were importations on the part of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and they have asked for this extension in order to obviate an increase in their cost of production.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether, under our present regulations, it is possible for any individual or any private corporation to import uranium in any form into this country?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would not wish to give a positive answer on that matter. The fact is that there is no occasion for anybody to import uranium into Canada because Canada, after all, is a major producer of uranium. As I pointed out, there have been no imports and there is no reason to expect any. But this item is put forward in this form because of the fact that Canada is a substantial producer and this might be of assistance to us in our dealings with other countries.

Mr. Winch: May I ask one more question on this phase of the matter, as it is of great interest to me. I know for a fact that during the last war and for some time thereafter Canada was a big producer of heavy water. I am certain that my memory is correct that it was C.M. and S. that produced it. However, they have not been doing so now for a number of years. Now that Canada has been undertaking—and here again I am certain that my argument is correct—in this field of atomic energy research studies which other countries have not been doing, namely in the use of heavy water in some phase of that research, and as Canada no longer produces heavy water or has ceased to produce heavy water and inasmuch as we require it—as the minister said, it was on request that our research and studies on this should be continued—may I ask then why it is that for our own research, undertaken at the expense of the federal government, heavy water no longer being produced in Canada, we put a 25 per cent general tariff on the importation of something that we no longer produce ourselves? Just what is the answer to that question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am afraid the hon. member has misapprehended the effect of this item. The item merely renews for a further two-year period the free entry under the most favoured nation tariff of heavy water and uranium imports in the form specified.

Mr. Winch: Where else can you get it outside of the most favoured nation countries?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am referring to the most favoured nation tariff. This will allow free entry under the most favoured nation tariff.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall part III carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No. This morning I referred to a brief from the interprovincial farm union which was presented to the govenment with respect to used farm machinery. Before we carry this page perhaps the minister should make a comment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Let me say this. There is nothing on this page or indeed in this bill that refers to used farm machinery. If the hon. member wishes to ask any questions about the importation of used farm machinery, the proper minister to whom to direct that question would be my colleague the Minister of National Revenue at the appropriate time.

Mr. Benidickson: As you know, Mr. Chairman, we are amending basic tariff item No. 409 of the Customs Tariff. This is the item which deals with a great many agricultural products. Certain important industries in this country have made representations suggesting that certain amendments would be appropriate when this parliament is considering, as we are now doing, amendments to the schedule to this particular statute.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend will permit me to do so, may I point out that the only change created by item 409e(1) relates to magnets for veterinary use. There is no other change.

Mr. Benidickson: Quite so, but I think the agricultural industry feels that the minister has not gone far enough, and that there are proposals with respect to item 409 that could have been considered by the minister and could have been presented to this parliament today for amending this schedule.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the point we are discussing I should like to say this if I may, Mr. Chairman. As you know, there are well over 1,000 items in the Customs Tariff, and they apply to thousands of commodities. We are dealing here with one change and one only, namely magnets for veterinary use, for insertion in the stomach of cattle in order to withdraw pieces of wire or other metal that cattle may have swallowed. That is all we are dealing with here. Surely this is not an occasion upon which to embark at length on questions of what somebody may have thought ought to be the subject of amendments. Otherwise we could have thousands of them raised here.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not propose to talk about a thousand items, Mr. Chairman, on the schedule to the Customs Tariff. I propose to address myself only to section 409, of the Customs Tariff which deals with matters of import which are of interest to the Canadian agricultural community.

The minister has indicated to you and to this committee that he wants you to believe that we are only concerned with magnets for veterinary use. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that it would be quite appropriate to discuss at this time omissions from this proposed amendment, otherwise I think we are prohibited in opposition from proposing an amendment to this section which, although it does not mean anything in dollars and cents, might conceivably reduce the revenues of the crown. But we can see that the Minister of Finance is not prepared to allow this committee to discuss when this comes up annually for debate some of the items which are referred to always by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in their representations as items which should be changed in connection with tariff revisions affecting item 409. I was referring to farm machinery and I was referring also to used farm machinery. I am sorry that the Minister of Finance sees fit to cut off this discussion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of cutting off discussion at all. It has been pointed out before, and I am sure the hon. member is well aware of this, that questions pertaining to the importation of used farm machinery revolve round the questions of value for duty, and the Department of Finance has nothing to do with that. This bill has nothing whatever to do with that subject. That is a matter which should be raised with the Department of National Revenue and there will be an opportunity for raising any proper question related to the administration of that department when its estimates are before the committee of supply.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance has not readily understood what I had in mind in connection with the proposed discussion under tariff item 409. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has contended, and this is within the domain—

The Chairman: Order. I did not see fit to rule on the point of order raised by the minister because I understood the hon. member agreed it was well taken. As the only new wording of this section is "magnets for veterinary use" I do not think it would be relevant to discuss anything else.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, certainly you must agree that when we are looking at item 409e(1) we must have regard to the entire language in this large paragraph. The presentation of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture suggests that the ministry is not giving adequate regard to their needs when they have restrictive language in a section such as this, because—

The Chairman: Order. I cannot allow the hon. member to continue along this line. I think I made it clear that the only point which could be discussed is the item which added the words "magnets for veterinary use".

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I protest in the most vehement fashion over your suggestion that discussion must be related solely to four words in a paragraph which contains some 11 or 12 lines and which could be amended by this committee. I will accept your ruling for the moment but I do not agree with it, and I simply want the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to realize what has happened in this committee.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): After the rules of the house have been applied.

Item agreed to.

Items 90e, 124b, 180a, 237a, 399a, 403, 409e, 437b, 438f, 438g, and 438h agreed to.

Customs tariff—440m. Aircraft, not including engines, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe:

1. When of types or sizes not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, free; general tariff, 27½ per cent. On and after July 1, 1962: British preferential tariff, free; most-favoured-nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

2. When of types and sizes made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; most favoured nation tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on page 11 we have item 440m, aircraft not including engines. I wonder if the minister would explain to the committee what the present regulations are either when aircraft of this type are made in Canada or not made in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that the only change made here is in the effective date of the item. This provision will lapse on July 1, 1960 unless it is extended. The duty free privilege on aircraft and aircraft engines of types or sizes not made in Canada under these items will thus be extended for a period of two years. Items 440m and 440n were introduced in the 1952 budget and contained provision for the free entry of aircraft and aircraft engines of types or sizes not made in Canada for a three-year period. The free entry privilege on types or sizes not made in Canada was extended for a three-year period, from 1955 to 1958, and subsequently for a two-year period which, as I have said, expires on July 1, 1960. The limitation on the duty free entry privilege was included as a means of providing a basis for future tariff negotiation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What are the regulations which the minister has prescribed under this item? He has not prescribed any.

Mr. Benidickson: That was my question. I was quite well aware—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The minister referred to in this item is not the Minister of Finance but the Minister of National Revenue. These are national revenue regulations entirely.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely that does not free the minister from telling the house what the regulations are?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are precisely the same as they were when the hon. member was a minister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What were they then?

Mr. Benidickson: Our memories are sometimes not too good. We are asked to extend a certain legislative item, I quite realize that. But I think in summary form the minister might indicate to us what are the conditions under which aircraft are admitted to this country under these duty rates either when made in Canada or when not made in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be glad to ask my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to furnish a copy of these regulations to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps I may be included in that.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-73, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think a statement can be usefully made at this time, Mr. Speaker. This is a bill to bring about certain specific amendments to the Excise Tax Act. It is not a bill of general import; it is a bill containing specific amendments. All of those amendments were set out in full in the resolution and that resolution received careful review in the committee of ways and means on June 7 and June 8.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments to the Excise Tax which provide exemptions for coverings or containers for packaging and crating of eggs, butter and cheese, ice cream, paper boxes for bread, flour bags, milk and cream bottles and cream cans and other minor items are commendable, but in the over-all picture of the excise tax the amendments do not give relief to toilet goods which are basic health and beauty products and which, in all fairness, should have been considered in the amendments.

The women of Canada who are the principal users of these products have a real grievance against the government for continuing a 10 per cent tax on what is considered by all people of every civilized nation in the world as necessary as food and clothing.

This tax was imposed as an emergency measure in 1933, during the depths of the depression. Subsequently the tax has been sometimes raised and sometimes lowered. During this period the excise tax was removed from cameras, films and luggage and from golf clubs and golf balls. Even the excise tax on firearms and ammunition has been removed. I wonder what the people are thinking of a government which will remove the excise tax on guns or revolvers and keep it on lipstick.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) what has already been repeated in this house over and over again, namely the 7½ per cent tax on automobiles, the presence of which is discriminatory, in addition to being a threat to the already shaky employment situation in the industry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member has indicated that he proposes to discuss the so-called special excise tax on automobiles. There is nothing in this bill that relates to that subject in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This objection raised by the Minister of Finance is a most unusual one. Of course, we are getting accustomed to these constant procedural objections. He now raises the objection that because this Excise Tax Act does not remove the excise tax on a particular commodity one is precluded from discussing it for the simple reason that it is not referred to in the bill. What the hon. gentleman is seeking to do is to show that whereas certain commodities are given direct attention in the bill, he is of the opinion that automobiles should likewise be given that attention. Surely, we are not to be restricted in debate to the extent suggested by the Minister of Finance.

I might warn him that I, too, have something extensive to say on this subject. I am eager on that account to join my hon. friend who is seeking to speak on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member has the authority to support as broad an interpretation of the rules relevant to debate on second reading as he is proposing. This will is founded on a resolution which has been adopted by the house, and which appears on page 4663 of Hansard. It is in specific terms. The house having given authority to a bill being brought in on that resolution in specific terms, it would seem to me to have limited its consideration to matters which are contained in the bill. Although I have not felt that on second reading of a bill to make some changes in an act it was irrelevant to express in general terms that other things had not been done, I am sure I have no precedent to authorize me to recognize a debate on matters which are not in the bill and not relevant in the sense that an amendment could not be moved on the matters proposed to be discussed.

[Mr. Badanai.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I did not come prepared to deal with the procedural argument. I must say I regret I did not listen to what Your Honour had to say because I had just received a note about the death of a very distinguished gentleman who is not now a member of this house, a former colleague of mine. At the time my attention was diverted and I was not listening to the precedent Your Honour was giving. It does seem to me to be elementary common sense that one should be allowed to discuss on a bill that provides a positive remedy the question of whether that remedy should apply to other particular subject matters not referred to in the bill. I just cannot believe that there can be any other interpretation. However, I regret I was not listening to Your Honour.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I just point out that there is ample opportunity afforded to all hon. members in the budget debate to criticize what they regard as omissions in the budget proposals. For that purpose the house, under its rules, sets aside eight days of the session. That is the occasion where any hon. member can attack broadly, if he wishes, the budgetary proposals. If any hon. members wishes to say that the budget ought to have dealt in some way with this special tax, then that was the occasion on which that point should have been raised. Now hon. members are in effect seeking to turn the debate on second reading of this bill into another budget debate and, with great respect, they are not entitled to do that.

The resolutions which were approved by the committee of ways and means and which are embodied in the precise terms of this bill affect only the application of the sales tax to certain commodities. The bill has no reference whatever to the special excise tax. Nothing in this bill has any relation to that at all; it is an entirely different tax. There is nothing in this bill whatever, Mr. Speaker, that has any relationship to the special excise tax, or to the application of it to motor vehicles. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think it is perfectly plain that what is being attempted here is not a discussion pertinent to the principle of this bill but pertinent to something that lies entirely outside the scope of the bill and for which there was ample opportunity afforded to all hon. members to air their views in the budget debate two months ago.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this debate on the point of order, but I think the point which the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has made is well taken. It seems to me that the object of second reading is not so much to discuss the matters which are included in the various clauses of the bill but matters of a general nature which are affected by the bill. An example of that is the matter which the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) desires to discuss. I believe the hon. member has a right to do that.

The point which the Minister of Finance makes is that this opportunity has already been granted. It may be that it has been granted on more than one occasion, but in the interval it may happen that matters have arisen which did not make it possible at the time for the hon. member to raise the matters which he intends to raise now. I too, am in the same position as other hon. members. I have not in the few minutes at my disposal been able to lay my hands upon the citation in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms which covers the point. It seems to me that the general discussion at least to which these two members want to limit themselves is one that should be allowed at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could continue with his observations. There is no doubt that an amending bill does not open up for discussion the whole of the act which is to be amended. That, I think, must be observed. Therefore it is not in order to deal with other excise taxes with respect to which there is not an amendment. That has been well settled. The principle of the debate, it seems to me, involves comment in general terms on the policy of the government in selecting these particular items for amendment. To that extent I think that criticism of the bill in general terms would be a proper discussion of the principle of the bill but I would not think it would be in order to pursue any specific deficiency in the bill such as the hon. member for Fort William had in mind; that is, the complaint that there is no change in the tax on cosmetics, I think it was—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Automobiles.

Mr. Speaker: Automobiles was the immediate item under discussion. However, I would not rule out a general statement that the government might have more properly turned its attention to something else. I would not think it would be in order to pursue that in any detailed or extended way.

Mr. Chevrier: May I draw Your Honour's attention to citation No. 381 in Beauchesne's fourth edition which is not entirely pertinent but which does have some bearing on the subject before us. It reads:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

I think that would allow the hon. member to discuss the principle in that it affects in one way or another automobiles in his constituency.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member says, that is not particularly relevant. There are relevant rulings and I will give one or two at this moment just for the guidance of the hon. member who has the floor. The first is a quotation from Mr. Speaker Macdonald reported at page 237 of the Journals of the House of Commons for November 14, 1949:

> On the second reading of an amending bill—it is the principle of the amending bill, and not the principle of the act to be amended, which is the "business under consideration". The discussion must therefore relate exclusively to the principle of the amending bill.

It seems to me that if you permit discussion of the taxes in the act as a whole which are not dealt with by this amendment you are getting into the principle of the bill itself and not the amending bill.

On December 13, 1957 while the house was considering a motion for the second reading of Bill No. 232, to amend the Income Tax Act, the Speaker, as reported at page 2313 of Hansard, said:

> This is an act to amend the Income Tax Act and it is relevant, as I understand the precedents, to discuss the sections of the Income Tax Act which are to be amended by this bill but not to review the act as a whole.

There are a number of other quotations I could cite. Perhaps the hon. member would proceed with that in mind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I just intervene at this point. I hope your Honour will not mind my pointing out the following. I have been looking through some of the provisions of the bill. While I appreciate Your Honour's concern in the matter I notice that the bill contains reference to the following:

> Fire truck chassis for the permanent attachment thereon of fire fighting equipment to be used directly in fire fighting.

A fire truck chassis may be a formal fire truck or an ordinary truck. Then I notice there is reference to gasoline-powered and diesel-powered self-propelled trucks, etc. I am sure in this instance when the minister is proposing a removal of the tax on equipment of this kind we would the right to discuss its application to other kinds of trucks. Is that kind of debate not permitted under our rules? I cannot believe that Mr. Speaker Macdonald meant to say that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. member is not acquainted with the terms of the bill or the resolution that preceded it. This bill is not making any change whatever in the excise tax as applied to trucks or chassis, diesel locomotives or diesel engines or anything of the kind. The only changes are those that are underlined in the bill. The practice in these cases is simply to reproduce the entire schedule in the bill showing the changes that are made. The changes in this case are all underlined. There is no change whatever made by this bill in the tax applied under the Excise Tax Act to all those articles referred to by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I speak to the point of order. I have no reason to believe that we should treat any of these bills any differently on second reading from the treatment accorded any other bill presented to the house. I think the same field for discussion of the principles involved in the bill should be available. The sponsor of these bills in recent years has been the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) who is exceptionally ticklish.

I wish to refer Your Honour to the debate on second reading with respect to an amendment to the Income Tax Act on July 3, 1956 as reported at page 5621 of Hansard. The first opposition speaker at that time was the present Minister of Finance who with respect to discussion of a budget bill said:

> This cannot be a repetition of the budget debate nor, as the Speaker said on June 29, 1955, can the debate on second reading of the income tax amending bill be in itself a miniature budget debate. Had the rule been otherwise, there are many things that one would have wished to discuss at this time including questions as to the credit restrictions and other matters of a financial or fiscal nature which are calling for attention on the part of the house at this present time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is that not clear?

Mr. Benidickson: The present Minister of Finance went on to say:

> It is not always easy, Mr. Speaker, to define the principle of the annual income tax amending bill.

I say the same would apply to excise tax amendments. I continue:

> It is an annual bill and, in this respect, it presents an annual problem. In fact, the income tax amending bill is almost always just a collection of individual amendments, some related to each other and some quite heterogeneous.

We have here a collection of individual amendments. The minister then went on to say:

> It is desirable that there would be a periodical parliamentary review not only of what the government may consider each year to be necessary amendments to the Income Tax Act but of the Income Tax Act as a whole.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I certainly did not say that the second reading of a bill containing certain specific amendments was the place for that although I certainly argued that it was desirable to have a periodical review of the whole act. The hon. member has no right to wrench those words from their context and apply them as though they had reference to second reading of a bill to make specific amendments to the act.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Fort William could proceed bearing in mind that this is not a resumption of the budget debate but a discussion of the bill which is before the house.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I have not been in the habit of flouting the rules of the Chair. I regret very much being unable to point out some of the omissions in the Excise Tax Act. I am particularly concerned about the automobile industry, one of the major industries in the country.

There is no mention of the automobile industry in this act, that is quite true. But I should merely like to point out to the minister the great importance of this if we are to foster and promote an industry which has given much to the development of Canada and to employment. That is one of the reasons why I wanted to bring this subject to the attention of the house. I know that the minister has heard arguments for and against for a long time. Probably he is very tired of hearing this question brought up periodically. In the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act he has made provision, for example, that portrait photographs of individuals shall be exempt from sales tax. That is a very insignificant matter. It does not mean very much to individual members of the community and it does not really mean very much so far as employment is concerned.

The minister has also introduced a change with respect to perforated pipe for drainage purposes not exceeding four inches in inside diameter. Why there is a limitation to four inches I do not know. I cannot fathom some of these changes in the Excise Tax Act. There are other insignificant changes relating to ducts for warm air systems for heating buildings and laryngeal speaking aids. The latter change is a very good thing with which I agree wholeheartedly. In fact, so far as all the amendments are concerned which have been introduced by the Minister of Finance I would not be opposed to removing the tax entirely.

But there is one important omission from the bill which would provide a lot of employment and give the industry concerned a great lift. I should like to remind the minister of some of the things he said about the excise tax when he was in the opposition. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow me to refer to what the minister said on June 2, 1955, the occasion being the introduction of amendments to the Excise Tax Act which among other things provided for a reduction in the excise tax on automobiles from 15 to 10 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What year was this?

Mr. Badanai: June 2, 1955.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The excise tax, the very same type of bill that is now before the house.

Mr. Badanai: As found on page 4373 of Hansard the minister made the following statement at that time when he was in the opposition:

> There are several aspects of the resolution and of the excise and sales taxes broadly that I should like to comment upon briefly this evening. I suppose the leading feature of the proposal now under discussion is the proposed reduction in the excise tax on passenger automobiles from 15 to 10 per cent and the repeal of the excise tax on tires and tubes for automotive vehicles. The reduction in the excise tax on automobiles from 15 to 10 per cent is indeed welcome, but I should like to submit to the minister and to the committee that this tax is still too heavy.
> This tax was applied in the first instance and presumably continued today as a luxury tax; it was introduced under that guise.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is not even discussing the sales tax which is the only tax dealt with by this bill. He is discussing another tax entirely.

Mr. Speaker: I think that what the hon. member is reading is not related to the bill before the house. It deals with an amendment which was in that particular bill but not in this bill.

Mr. Badanai: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I thought I might be permitted to proceed with the quotation which to my mind is very pertinent to excise tax changes, and in my opinion this was one of the changes which would come under the act. Just because it is not listed in the measure I am not allowed to proceed with that particular feature. If I may be permitted to do so, however, I should like to refer to another omission. Perhaps the Speaker will not allow me to continue with this, but the omission I refer to is the fact that the tax on the soft drink industry has not been reduced. There is a sales tax levied—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is talking about the sales tax as applied to something that does not fall within the scope of this bill in any manner whatsoever. What he is seeking to do is to revive the budget debate. We are away past the budget debate now.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is dealing with the restrictiveness of the bill I would not prevent him from making general references to other items to illustrate his point but to pursue any particular item with respect to which there is no amendment would appear to be going beyond the scope of proper debate.

Mr. Benidickson: May I speak to the point of order? Since the change of government I think there have been some new rules introduced with respect to the enforcement of relevancy in the debate on budget resolutions and on second readings of bills. I want to indicate that leniency on these occasions is historic. May I point out that on June 2, 1955, when we were at the resolution stage of discussion of legislation identical with that now under debate on second reading, the present Minister of Finance said, as found at page 4373 of Hansard:

> There are several aspects of the resolution and of the excise and sales taxes broadly that I should like to comment upon briefly this evening.

He went ahead and did so and no member of the government of that day objected, nor did the chairman.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Evidently the remarks were quite in order.

Mr. Benidickson: Was there anything in any of those resolutions relating to reductions in sales taxes on clothing, boots and shoes, household furniture, and drugs and so on? Is there anything in the bill before us relating to these things? Is there anything there saying that the tax should not be imposed at the manufacturer's level because, in consequence of the the retailer's profit margin, it is increased to 20 per cent? Was there anything at that time to suggest that purchases by municipalities and school boards should be exempt from taxation?

I go to 1956 to show that the same speaker at that time was extended a leniency for which I appeal today. I refer to page 7145 of Hansard for August 7, 1956, at which time he said that he had comments he wished to make with respect to the sales tax in general. He said that he wanted to refer to the Canadian tax foundation recommendations and to refer the house to the study and report made by the Carter committee. He took a column of Hansard for that purpose. He went on to discuss the decision of the supreme court with respect to retailers' own brands. This, Mr. Speaker, was all at the resolution stage. I suggest that while there has not been closure a new rule has been adopted since the present government came into power in so far as discussion at the resolution stage is concerned.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is a reflection on the Speaker.

Mr. Benidickson: That has been respected by this side of the house. But now we come to the second stage of debate, and on grounds of principle it has always been the historic practice of the house, as I have indicated, to have a fairly wide discussion on second reading of items not covered by the bill. I think that this side of the house has been very respectful of the rule concerning relevancy in so far as resolutions are concerned. However, I say that a new type of closure is being introduced at the suggestion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is a reflection on the Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, it is not.

Mr. Benidickson: We will see whether or not it carries. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that all through the years this has been the practice, and I believe I could quote some remarks of yours with respect to the second reading of a taxation bill. I want to say that in my view there is no reference to a rule on the part of the previous administration, either by the Speaker or by objection from a member of the ministry, that would cut off a debate such as is being undertaken here with respect to things that should be in this bill and are not in it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A moment ago when you raised the question of precedent, Mr. Speaker, I frankly confessed I could not meet Your Honour's argument, and for the reason I stated at the time. However, I did say that I found it difficult to believe that Mr. Speaker Macdonald was drawing the conclusion which Your Honour was attaching to his decision. I have, however, come across a very interesting precedent. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) was referring to the debate which had taken place in this house in June, 1955 on an amendment to the Excise Tax Act but not particularly referring as he said, to automobiles. I find at page 4373 of Hansard for June 2, 1955 that no less a person than the present Minister of Finance, speaking for the opposition and addressing himself to a particular amendment, did not confine himself to that point, except to point out that the amendment was long overdue, just as one might now say that the abolition of the excise tax on automobiles was long overdue in view of the assurance given by my hon. friend and the government.

What my hon. friend did was to go on and talk about matters that were not included in the proposed amendments to the Excise Tax Act. Here is what he said, for instance:

When the government is announcing a reduction in the excise tax it is easy enough to content ourselves with welcoming it, but I ask the house to observe the commodities upon which it is proposed that the tax be reduced. All of these are commodities upon which a reduction in the taxes is justified and indeed overdue. But let us remind ourselves at the same time, Mr. Chairman, that there is a long list of commodities more closely and intimately related to the necessities of life than any of those on the list before us now, upon which no reduction of indirect taxes is proposed by the government. Do hon. members of this house keep adequately in their minds and on their consciences the fact that this government goes on levying under the Excise Tax Act taxes upon the very necessities of life, upon our clothing, our boots and shoes and household furniture, certain prepared foods, and indeed on many drugs and medicines that are essential to those who require them?

He goes on to discuss items that are not included in the amendments.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the hon. member, was that during the debate on the resolution?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It was on the resolution.

Mr. Speaker: May I say this, in an effort to dispose of this matter and get on with the debate. I did not stop the hon. member for Fort William. He is free to proceed. However, I have already indicated that I do not feel the limitation on discussion extends to the point of restricting the criticism of the bill because it does not go farther than it does or because it does not deal with other items. What I have said is that I would consider it improper to debate any particular section of the act which is not touched, on the basis that one would if moving an amendment to that section, which would be out of order. I think we can proceed on the basis of a general observation, such as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has just read, with respect to the scope of the bill; that would be in order on second reading.

Mr. Badanai: Then I assume that I may continue, Mr. Speaker, and touch upon some of the aspects of this act which have been overlooked by the minister. I am particularly interested in this measure because it could have been the means by which a considerable amount of employment could have been provided. I refer, of course, to an amendment to the Excise Tax Act which, of course, would affect the automobile industry. There are other businesses in addition to the automobile business, but I am particularly interested in the automobile business because it is one of the largest industries we have in Canada, employing a great number of people, and it is an industry from which the government derives a tremendous amount of money through taxes.

I understand that the amount of revenue which the government derives directly and indirectly from the automobile business is astronomical. Everyone knows that the average cost in taxes, licences and so on, to the owner of a motor vehicle is around $107. This data was collected in 1958, and I expect it applies equally in 1960. When you consider that the total registration of automobiles is around five million in Canada, that represents a total of $535 million which the operators of these motor vehicles pay the government annually for the privilege of driving. I am not taking into account all the taxes that are included in the retail price of the automobile.

The excise tax is a form of tax which the government levies in order to derive revenue for the purpose of carrying on the business of the nation. We all understand the necessity for taxation. It is here to stay as long as we live. In fact, we pay taxes not only when we are born but when we die. One needs only to inquire into the cost of a funeral to find out what it costs to die. In any event, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will let me say that the excise tax on automobiles is not only discriminatory because the automobile is the only major commodity subject to special tax but also because the employees of the automobile industry are the losers.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member misunderstood me. I indicated that it did not appear to me to be beyond the proper scope of debate to complain that this bill should have included other taxes. However, if the hon. member proposes to debate one specific tax, for instance the sales tax on automobiles, he would then, in effect, be discussing a section of the bill that relates to that tax and would not be illustrating the restrictiveness of this bill.

I appreciate that there is some difficulty in applying a rule of that kind but it can be applied and it has been applied; and it is left to the good sense of the hon. members of the house to make sure that remarks in that category—that is, remarks about matters which have been left out of the bill—are general ones. It seems to me that the hon. member is using the privilege of procedure at this time by going into detail on this specific item. I would ask him to come back to the general discussion of it.

Mr. Badanai: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am not thinking of doing anything except to respect your ruling. Therefore in a general way I say that the Excise Tax Act amendments as presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) are, in my judgment, inadequate. They will not meet the requirements of the Canadian people at the moment. May I give this as an example? I am not now referring to the automobile business because I have already said something about that matter. But inasmuch as the act mentions indirectly bottling works, may I say that we have in Canada bottling manufacturers who at the present moment are handicapped by the sales tax of 11 per cent. It is estimated that if relieved of the sales tax each of the approximately 575 bottling plants in Canada might employ three or four additional persons, making a total of between 1,600 and 2,200 men who could be lifted from the unemployment rolls by this particular industry. The removal of this particular tax is not included. In other words, I am merely suggesting a beneficial move that could be made by the government and which it has the power to make, in order to relieve the Canadian people from some unjust action and at the same time to make it possible for a number of employers to give employment to a greater number of people who are now on the relief rolls or are drawing unemployment insurance. I am sure the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) will be only too glad to know that certain excise tax changes would bring about a beneficial result in connection with the entire unemployment situation.

There are a number of things about which I should like to speak in connection with the Excise Tax Act amendment which are not included in this bill unfortunately but conclusions can be drawn from the fact that they are absent. That is one of the reasons why it was my intention to point out the omission. It is not always fair just to point out what is in. Sometimes it is important to know what the omissions are and what they could mean to the communities across Canada. I should like to ask the minister, if and when he considers it appropriate to do so, to bring in some amendments which are not included in this bill to amend the Excise Tax Act and which would reduce or eliminate the tax on automobiles. That is one of the things that is really of great importance to the automobile industry in general and to the people in Canada, in particular those who are working in the automobile plants. I have no doubt that the minister is acquainted with the submission made by the greater Windsor industrial commission in a brief prepared for consumption—

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member is disregarding entirely the direction I have given to him. If he has not some other submission to make which is relevant, I suggest that he resume his seat.

Mr. Badanai: I shall conclude, Mr. Speaker, by merely expressing a hope that the minister will take to heart some of the things that I have been attempting to say notwithstanding the interjections and objections that have been made. I know that he means well. However, I cannot help feeling that there are some things that can be done and that the government has the power to do. I am glad to see the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) now sitting beside his Minister of Finance. They have the power to do these things that would be beneficial to the country. The country expects them to do these things. The country expects the excise tax on automobiles to be removed as soon as possible.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Only because this matter is of the greatest importance, Mr. Speaker, do I run the risk of incurring displeasure. Because this matter is important and because one has a duty to perform, one must perform it in accordance with one's conscience and one's sense of obligation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And in accordance with the rules of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In so far as the rules of the house are concerned, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I shall try to do exactly what my friend the Minister of Finance did as a private member when he addressed himself not to the amendment to the Excise Tax Act but to those things which he thought should have been embraced by way of amendment to that act.

On the occasion to which I directed the attention of the house earlier when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) was speaking, the hon. member had been speaking to the introduction of amendments to the Excise Tax Act which were being moved to the resolution thereon; I refer to the resolution for leave to introduce Bill No. 418 to amend the Excise Tax Act. That last observation of mine is in answer to the question to which Your Honour directed my attention some few moments ago and to which I was unable to give an answer, Mr. Speaker. But I find that the Minister of Finance directed his attention for a very minor portion of the time to the amendment and then he went on to complain about excise taxes generally. However, he did not confine himself to excise taxes only. He talked also about the sales tax. He talked about hon. members of this house not being in order. My hon. friend is perhaps the best authority we have for going much further than anyone today has sought to go. I think it would be well to remind my hon. friend of some of the things he said about excise taxes generally. As reported at page 4375 of Hansard of June 2, 1955 he said this:

> It is well that we should remind ourselves also that these taxes are levied at the manufacturer's or producer's level and, as everyone knows, as these goods pass from hand to hand, to the wholesaler, to the jobber, to the retailer, and finally to the consumer, they attract mark-ups. Concrete cases have been given to the house on similar occasions without number in the past, to demonstrate beyond all challenge or question that a tax that begins as a 10 per cent tax at the manufacturer's level will in most cases become a tax of 20 per cent or more when the goods are sold by the retailer to the consumer.

Mr. Benidickson: That is what he said in 1956.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is interesting, by the way, that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River was piloting that legislation but he does not seem to have given the kind of difficulty to the opposition which almost at every turn today and in other debates the Minister of Finance gives. The Minister of Finance says that the particular matter of the excise tax on automobiles could have been raised on the budget. If it had the Minister of Finance would have found some pretext to raise some procedural objection which would include even mention in that debate, forgetting, of course, that events have taken place since the budget which well warrant the present discussion. If we were to try and raise this matter on the minister's departmental estimates he would rise in his place with righteous indignation and complain that this was a matter which did not involve administration.

Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which concerns thousands of people in this country and this is the only opportunity we have to raise it. I am not now dealing with a particular subject; I am dealing with the hon. minister's concept of the Excise Tax Act as enunciated by the former administration. What the hon. member said on that occasion still applies, but he has now given us an opportunity to remind him that the very objections which he raised to the Excise Tax Act of the previous administration continue to be adopted by him and this government. They were going to change everything, including the tax structure and the provision of tax relief as well.

Mr. Benidickson: And they have been three years in office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Three years in office, as the hon. member says. The consumer, as in the case of these direct taxes, is never told what portion of the price he pays for goods goes to taxes. Is the situation improved in that particular by the government of the right hon. gentleman who now sits with the Minister of Finance and who undoubtedly has come in to help the Minister of Finance in his present difficulties?

The minister went on:

> They are hidden; and because they are hidden they are popular with a government that chooses to go on levying these taxes and avoiding as far as it can the wrath of the taxpaying public, by not letting the taxpaying public know what portion of the price is collected by the government in taxes.

That still applies. Then the minister went on in these memorable words, and it is well he be reminded of them. Incidentally, all of this illustrates how apt and adept the Minister of Finance is in the passage of items which he brings into this house. I would suggest to him that if he would show a little more patience in these procedural obstructions which he raises so constantly he would find that his measures would get through the house much more rapidly than they do now. If any minister of this house has prolonged this session of parliament it is the Minister of Finance. However, he served a great purpose today in allowing us to remind him of some of the mischiefs of this kind of tax—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not now whether the hon. member for Essex East is under the apprehension that a point of order is being discussed, but he seems not yet to have got to the subject matter of the debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I must respectfully take issue with you on that. I am now dealing with the principle of this bill, not discussing what I particularly propose to come to. I am dealing with the principle of this bill and this is certainly in order; there can be no question about that.

Mr. Speaker: What I wish to comment on particularly is that the hon. member seems to be reverting to discussion of the point of order raised prior to his having risen to speak. Surely that has been disposed of and it is in order now to proceed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then I will proceed and I do not think I have said anything yet which could be regarded as properly out of order. The Minister of Finance went on:

> A tax of that kind as applied to the type of commodity of which I am speaking is doubly iniquitous.

What is the minister doing in this bill to amend the Excise Tax Act which could be regarded as a change of attitude from the former administration? What is there in this bill which is less iniquitous than the former excise tax amendments? Let the Minister of Finance admit that when he introduced this bill—and he gave us a very abbreviated statement today about its purposes and its intents—he was wrong when he made these famous observations in June of 1955. The minister continued:

> It is bad enough that there should be taxes upon these basic necessities of life, but far worse that they should be applied in such a manner as to go on attracting mark-ups, mark-ups on mark-ups, and mark-ups on mark-ups on mark-ups, all at the expense of the consumer.

There is nothing in this bill which changes that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, there is. The whole scope of the tax is reduced.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says yes, there is. If he would look at the underlined sections he will see a whole series of commodities which are not touched by these amendments at all. He will see cast iron soil pipes, on the next page structural steel for buildings, and so on, which has not been covered at all. Yet the minister says that by this bill he is doing something that is consistent with his denunciations of 1955. The minister continued:

> That is another feature of this tax which in my submission this house can no longer tolerate.

If the minister could no longer tolerate it in 1955, how does he tolerate it now when as a minister of the crown he has had the opportunity to do something about it? He continued:

> The government is not going to remove these taxes from the necessities of life, nor substitute a fairer system of collecting taxes than through the medium of indirect taxes in the way I have described. unless hon. mmebers of this house, aroused and indignant, make that demand.

That was the language of the minister.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is the best speech the hon. member has made in a long time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The parliamentary secretary who assists his minister by making these little hush-hush observations from time to time might well use his time more advantageously by reminding his chief of these eloquent words used on another occasion and which apply now in such great measure to the bill before the house.

This reflects the whole attitude of this government which has been in office now for three years, confronted day by day with their former declarations but which makes no changes whatsoever, notwithstanding the fact that the minister said that this situation was one which should arouse hon. members, make them indignant and cause them to enforce their demands on the government of the day.

The fact is that this bill is not only deficient for many reasons, including, to use the context of the hon. member's thinking, the very argument which I have quoted which the hon. member addressed to a former administration when discussing former legislation, but it is deficient because it fails to comply with promises made by hon. members opposite to the Canadian people. Now when one particular industry finds itself face to face with a serious economic situation, competition and very high unemployment, and when they are told on all fronts that if there was a removal of the excise tax there would be some improvement in that industry, the hon. minister, notwithstanding the assurances and the promises of the Prime Minister, sits in his seat in his third year of office and ignores these promises.

That is the gist of the complaint of the hon. member for Fort William. As one who represents the constituency where these automobile companies are situated, using the general application that the minister did when he was discussing amendments to the Excise Tax Act in 1955, I say in a general way, why is the excise tax on automobiles not completely removed? That was a promise given by the Prime Minister of this country to the people of Canada.

The minister and I have had an exchange of letters in this regard and only because I am afraid that he would object do I fail at this time to put this exchange of letters on the record. It is an exchange wherein he addressed me in the friendliest terms in the first letter but addressed me in the most distant manner in the third letter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Wait for the fourth now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This exchange would, I am sure, be most edifying. Notwithstanding what the minister has failed to do in this particular bill now before the house, my hon. friend cannot get away from these words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) uttered in my city on May 10, 1957:

> The present 10 per cent excise or "luxury" tax on new cars is discriminatory to automobile producing centres. Its continuance brings unjustified unemployment and should have been removed by the Liberal government at the last session of parliament.

It will be no answer to say that the previous administration should have done it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why not?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because unemployment was not then anything like as serious as it is today.

Hon. gentlemen receive delegations; they give all kinds of assurances. But the way to assure a delegation representing a community that feels it suffers from a serious economic situation is not by general words that give evidence of diplomatic skill; the way to prove one's sincerity in this matter is by concrete action.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

The Minister of Finance can now bring in a bill abolishing the excise tax on automobiles. While that in itself would not correct the situation, it would go a long way toward doing it and in closing I regret that my hon. friends greet my remarks with laughter.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Bond.

Mr. Benidickson: The regulations hitherto have been confined to a bond from a fidelity company, or something of that nature. Is not that so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The terms of the present act are set forth in the explanatory note, Mr. Chairman. This particular clause corresponds with paragraph 14 of the resolution.

Mr. Herridge: Section 35(4) of the present act reads as follows, according to the explanatory note:

> The security shall be by a chartered bank or by bond of an incorporated guarantee company authorized to do business in Canada, acceptable to the government of Canada, or by deposit of Dominion of Canada bonds.

The clause in the present bill reads:

> The security shall be by a chartered bank or by bond of an incorporated guarantee company authorized to do business in Canada, acceptable to the minister, or by deposit of bonds or other securities of or guaranteed by the government of Canada.

Can the minister explain why there is that change in wording, and why the wording now reads "acceptable to the minister", language which is not now in the present act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I may say, Mr. Chairman, this provision widens the scope of the securities which are acceptable. When providing bonds in this particular case some minister has to take the responsibility of passing on the acceptability of certain securities other than those of the Dominion of Canada. This duty is placed on the shoulders of the minister. The following words indicate that bonds or other securities of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada shall in all cases be acceptable.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Schedule III amended.

Mr. Benidickson: I assume we shall get to the schedule subsequently and call it page by page.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On the schedule.

The Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Mr. Benidickson: On the first page of the schedule we find certain underlined items such as drainage, waste, and vent copper tubing. Will the minister not acknowledge that the construction industry finds this rather a handicap; that they think it would be better to amend this schedule in a way which would provide a general exemption for tubes and pipes that had relation to irrigation, sewage and supply of water to homes, and so on?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This new exemption has been welcomed by the industry.

Mr. Benidickson: We were a bit careless last Wednesday in looking at the resolution item that referred to the articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture or production of building materials except hardware for doors and sash, and the words "except hardware for doors and sash" are underlined. I think the parliamentary secretary was piloting the legislation at the time. I do not blame him at all, but on reflection I find that this item did not exempt these items from sales tax but rather narrowed the opportunity for exemption from sales tax. Part of the paragraph reads "except hardware for doors and sash". If one looks at the main statute he finds that such things as locks and a number of other things that might appear on doors would normally be exempt. In our debate it was indicated that except for manufacture and production those other items would be normally exempt. I ask the minister to have a look at this paragraph. I am sure he recalls the debate of last week. What about the items that go into the manufacture of doors and sash that are in this specific item of the schedule? I think of locks, and so on. Are they still exempt.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, as I endeavoured to indicate last Wednesday, the purpose of this amendment is really to bring about uniformity and to make certain that however the hardware is used in doors and sashes it will be in the same status. In order to ascertain the tax status of the particular hardware one must look elsewhere in the particular schedule. What had been happening was that when hardware was in fact attached to a door or sash it was in a different tax status from when it was not so attached. This particular amendment brings about uniformity, puts all the hardware in the same status and thereby prevents the discriminations which heretofore existed.

Mr. Benidickson: I may be dense, Mr. Chairman, but I am not quite satisfied. In schedule 3 to the Excise Tax Act there is an item under the "building materials" section which refers to door and window screens and some other items related to doors.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, they continue.

Mr. Benidickson: I understood that the government had found that some articles were being added to doors that is felt should not be exempt from a sales tax. Be that as it may, is this doing what is intended. I assume that these items under "building materials" will be in the schedule:

> Articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture or production of the foregoing building materials, except hardware for doors and sash.

That is on page 3 of schedule 3. Some years ago—I believe in 1956 or 1957—we as a parliament extended the sales tax exemptions to quite a number of things including locks, and so on.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: Even if they are an article that is to be used in the manufacture or production of a door, are they to be exempt?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, I think I can assure my hon. friend that the items to which he refers—door and window screens, lock and latch sets and hinges, the type of thing which might be regarded as the basic hardware for doors and windows—will continue to be exempt and are not in any way affected by the proposed amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: Despite this peculiar language—

> —except hardware for doors and sash?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The language which my hon. friend finds peculiar only takes over into another section of the schedule the particular exemptions. In other words, the exemptions must be found and will be found elsewhere in the schedule. The hon. gentleman, for example, will find on page 2, some of the things to which I have referred, the latch sets, the lock sets, the hinges, sash, doors, and so on. This is simply a drafting technique of putting them over into other exempting sections of the schedule.

Mr. Benidickson: On the same page, Mr. Chairman, we are asked to deal with exemptions of a charitable nature and those relating to health, and other things. What has been the recent experience of the government with respect to appeals relating to drugs? I recall we got quite a number in the past relating to some drugs that were close to cortisone. I believe they were refinements of that drug but because they were not called cortisone, although very expensive and used widely in the cure of arthritis particularly, they were not exempt. I think of meticorten and things of that kind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): ACTH?

Mr. Benidickson: ACTH is specifically named in the appendix. I was thinking of meticorten and some other drugs close to cortisone. I know that if the hon. member for Sudbury were present he would deal generally with this item and say it is narrow and restricted. There are a great number of essential drugs prescribed today for some of our more prevalent diseases that are exceedingly expensive and should be added to this list. Would the minister comment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I think it is perfectly clear that at the present time the act taxes drugs except those that are made specifically exempt by enumeration in the schedule. Those that are exempted are now specifically enumerated in the schedule.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it the minister is not considering any extensions even up to date to include some of the new designations of these drugs?

Last week the hon. member for Nickel Belt dealt very effectively with the question of coverings. We have here a change of definition which I want to remind the committee will bring into tax for the first time under a new principle—not an old one as the minister referred to last week but under his new idea of what should be taxed—certain containers that have not heretofore borne a tax. This, in some instances, will be of considerable significance. This is also contrary to a ruling made by the tariff board, I believe, between now and the last time we had an opportunity to consider the language of the Excise Tax Act.

The minister referred to anomalies. The anomalies are in his mind. Some of these containers and coverings never bore a tax before but in the view of the present minister they should now bear a tax and he is proposing the amending language in the amendment to the act in order to gather tax upon these items which in the past have not been subject to tax.

[Mr. Bell (Carleton).]

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, I want to clear up one point under the heading of coverings. In the Okanagan we have a new method of handling fruit including apples in the orchard. The system is known as the bulk-bin method of handling. These bins are large in construction and hold approximately 50 bushels of apples. I understand that they have been used extensively in New Zealand and are in use here on an exprimental basis. I am wondering if the bins will come under the heading of coverings and be included in the exemption for boxes for fruit and vegetables.

I should also say with regard to the construction of the bins that they are a heavy box made of plywood with reinforced corners and have no covers. They hold many boxes of apples. The bins are taken to the orchard and are placed there by the packing houses. They are filled with apples and then taken back to the packing houses where they are emptied. The apples are run over the grader. In the alternative, the apples are left in the bins for storage purposes in cold storage until such time as they are taken out and run over the grader or processed in some other way.

The bins have proved to result in a substantial saving for the farmer. I know that prior to this they did not come under the exemptions in the act but because it has resulted in a saving to the farmer whose costs have been rising I am wondering if on that basis alone or on any other basis the bins could be included as an exemption under the act.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, if I have correctly apprehended the description of the particular box or container to which the hon. member refers it has not been exempt from taxation hitherto but it will be under this amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: We are glad to hear that indication from the minister. We remember, however, that this is not the original proposal for taxation change the minister intended to present to parliament. The original proposal was quite different. I am wondering if such a thing as a box for gathering apples or other agricultural produce would have been taxable under the proposition the minister presented on budget night, March 31? I am thinking of the boxes, baskets, crates, etc. that may not be used to actually deliver the product but are used to gather fruit from the orchard, and so on.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I believe not.

Mr. Herridge: What about the fruit grower who makes his own orchard boxes? There are quite a number who do that in our district. They are made on the property and not purchased.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no difference in that case.

Mr. Benidickson: When the minister made his budget speech on March 31 and gave notice of certain budget resolutions consequent upon his proposed tax changes he made some references. Would he indicate what change has been effected by the amendment passed by the committee of ways and means the other day in which the wording was much different from that in the resolution presented by him on budget night?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amendment which was approved in the committee of ways and means and which now is embodied in the bill accomplished the twofold purpose of clarifying the amendment and widening the exemptions.

Mr. Benidickson: What items would have been taxable under the proposal on budget night that are not now covered under the amended wording as presented to us in this schedule?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The original budget resolution contained the expression "and sold with the goods". There is a detailed enumeration here as applied to coverings used with respect to a number of foods which have been made specifically exempt. This clarifying amendment puts the question beyond all doubt and accomplishes, as has already been indicated today, a widening of the exemption.

Mr. Benidickson: What articles might not be exempt that would have been exempt from taxation under the ruling of the tariff board with respect to representations by the bread industry that their containers perhaps were covered by the former legislation? What items will not be exempt now and will bear the 11 per cent tax which would not have borne the tax before amendment of the act?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Some containers that are capable of repeated use might have been affected by the resolution as originally introduced.

Mr. Benidickson: Could the minister give some examples?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps the hon. member might read the amendment approved in the committee of ways and means. We are not going back now to discuss the original resolution that was amended in committee of ways and means and reported to the house. The present bill is based upon the resolution as amended in the committee of ways and means. With great respect, I think it is completely unprofitable to go back and ask what might have been the case if the resolution had not been amended in committee of ways and means. We have the amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not know whether the minister said "unprofitable" or "improper" but if he said "improper" I would certainly take issue with him. I think that at any stage of the debate members of the House of Commons are entitled to get from the ministry some explanation on the basis of the technical knowledge that is available to them about the bases for changes that they propose in legislation. This is one instance and I thought that the minister was perhaps not advocating this change in a haughty way. I thought he had perhaps discussed the matter with his officials and knew just which trades and articles of trade might be affected. I thought he would condescend to give that information to the committee.

Mr. Herridge: Is it not correct to say that the minister introduced the amendment exempting containers that would be used over and over again as a result of representations on the part of opposition members?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Chairman. The amendment was introduced as a result of representations we had had from some industries and the further study of the language that had been employed in the resolution as originally introduced.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I draw to the attention of the committee and particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River an error of which I was inadvertently guilty in the committee of ways and means. I refer to Hansard of June 8, page 4674. At that time the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River asked if the resolution would drop the restrictive words, "whose pelts have commercial value", and to that I gave the answer "yes".

I have to say that it was originally intended that these words would be dropped when the various exemptions in the schedule for feeds and feed supplements for livestock and fur-bearing animals were consolidated. However, it was apparently thought by the draftsman that it would not be proper to drop these words without a specific provision in the resolution itself.

I am advised, however, that the presence of these words in the bill in fact imposes no restriction on the exemption. The only fur-bearing animals one can think of whose pelts might be considered not to have commercial value would be household pets or perhaps some wild animals and rodents. Prepared cat and dog foods have been ruled to be exempt under one or more of the other exemptions for foodstuffs such as "fish and edible products thereof" or under the exemption for meats. Any other feed for fur-bearing animals would also be covered by the items listed under the heading "foodstuffs". Therefore, while my answer was erroneous the net effect is the same and in fact there is no real restriction on the exemption by the continuation of the particular words.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the parliamentary secretary for his explanation. When I saw the bill I was a bit alarmed in that it seemed to be in conflict with what I thought was a fairly positive assertion made by the hon. member last week. I was not aware that dog and cat foods were already exempted in some other way. May I say quickly that I have some doubts that the phrase "whose pelts have commercial value" is necessary, but I know that the parliamentary secretary has had the benefit of the advice of the law officers of the crown and I would certainly abide by the advice he has received. From the point of view of doubt, however, I think that consideration should be given on another occasion to the possibility of removing these words to which I referred last week.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, there is reference on this page to forest products when produced and sold by the individual settler or farmer. Does that include lumber?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not part of the amendment. We are only amending in respect of the words underlined.

Mr. Herridge: I realize that but I wanted to ask the question while this matter was before us. Does that include lumber and in what quantity?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Lumber is made exempt by the schedule as applied to building materials. The hon. member will see that on page 2 about nine lines from the bottom of the page.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I confess I have not done adequate research here. One item, item 692a, in the list of goods enumerated in customs tariff items is underlined. I have forgotten the significance of that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is the item that applies to presentations from abroad in recognition of the saving of human life.

The Chairman: Shall page 7 carry? Carried. Shall page 8 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I asked last week, on June 8, I believe, about an item at the bottom of page 8 which is underlined. The words are, "Materials for use only in the equipment and repair of ships over ten tons net register tonnage". The minister was kind enough to give an explanation at that time but after reviewing the explanation I was not completely satisfied. I found that the minister was clear when he said that the equipment or construction or anything relating to a ship sold for export would not be subject to the 11 per cent sales tax. However, I was not satisfied, in connection with the explanation given, that all items connected with the building of a ship in Canada for a Canadian customer had been in the past exempt and would in the future be exempt. I think the largest purchaser of ships in this country is actually the Canadian government. I hope we are not embarking on a rigmarole in which we impose a tax on the construction of ships of a very high value which, in turn, are purchased largely by the Canadian government and it is the sort of situation in which we take money from one pocket and put it into another.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): So far as the ships purchased by the federal government are concerned, the federal government pays sales tax just like any other purchaser.

Mr. Benidickson: No, that is not the answer. Have we always imposed the sales tax on the construction of ships over ten tons being built for a Canadian purchaser, government or otherwise?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman, except fishing boats or ships licensed for the Canadian coasting trade. The words are to be found on page 8, about three lines from the bottom of the page.

Mr. Herridge: With respect to this section, I may say there has been an increase in the use of diesel engines which makes it possible to use a smaller tug for towing purposes than was possible when steam power was used. Does this mean that if an individual interested in the lumber business built a tug of 9.5 tons he would escape this tax which is imposed in connection with the equipment and repair of such ships?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the ship is licensed to engage in the coasting trade, it is exempt. The hon. member will find the words at the bottom of page 8. Similarly, there is a provision in the first item, under marine and fisheries, about halfway down the page, which reads:

Boats bona fide purchased by fishermen for use in the fisheries, and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture, equipment or repair of such boats;

Mr. Herridge: This boat would be for use on inland and minor waters for towing purposes and not for fishing. My question was, if it were built of a tonnage of 9.5 tons, would it escape taxation under this section of the act?

Mr. Benidickson: This brings up a question which intrigues some of us. If a ship were one purchased by the Ontario Hydro, would it be subject to sales tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, if the ship was otherwise taxable.

Mr. Benidickson: What do you mean by "otherwise taxable"?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it were not licensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade and is not purchased for use by fishermen.

Mr. Benidickson: Let us say that the ship was to be used for inspection or for various purposes which I will not define by a department of the government of a province, would it escape taxation on the general ground that you do not impose taxation on the provincial government departments?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All purchases by provincial governments are exempt.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the situation—I think this is a situation about which we are all curious—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Section 46, subsection 2 of the act says:

A refund of taxes paid under Part IV, V or VI may be granted to a manufacturer, producer, wholesaler, jobber or other dealer on goods sold to Her Majesty in right of any province of Canada if the said goods are purchased by Her Majesty for any purpose other than—

Then some other provisions are mentioned. Section 46 is the governing provision.

Mr. Benidickson: If a ship were to be constructed for a crown company or a provincial entity would it be subject to a tax? I am thinking of Ontario Hydro, for instance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am told that the case put by the hon. member has not directly arisen. We do not know of a ship built in the way he mentions, so I think in the absence of something concrete I should not attempt to be specific in the interpretation of section 46.

Mr. Benidickson: In the territory which I represent, sometimes access to Ontario Hydro facilities representing many millions of dollars can be gained only by water and this requires the construction of a ship. I think analogous to that is the question of whether or not a province has the right to impose, under an act like this Excise Tax Act, a sales tax on a crown company, an entity of the federal government. Can the minister indicate whether or not a province which imposes—say British Columbia where they have a sales tax—such a tax has imposed the tax on a crown company out there?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am not aware of any particular case where British Columbia has sought to impose its sales tax on federal purchases or purchases by crown corporations. We have had a problem with respect to some provinces, and the matter is one under discussion at the present time.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River did not give the minister an opportunity to answer my question, so I will repeat it. Will a vessel with a tonnage of 9.5 tons used for towing purposes in the lumber industry in minor or inland waters be exempt from the tax under this clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it will depend entirely on whether the case can be brought under the clause here. I have made reference to ships licensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade. Let us return to the amendment with which we are dealing now. We are, Mr. Chairman, getting very far away from the amendment that is being made here. Here we are getting into the whole scope of this whole part of the schedule to the act whereas all that is involved in the amendment is this expression:

Materials for use only in the equipment and repair of ships over ten tons net register tonnage;

This amendment has application to materials. If the hon. member has a question as applied broadly to something outside of the amendment, if he will speak to me about it or give me the particular facts we shall be glad to get him a ruling on the particular case. However, I do not think it would be prudent on my part to attempt to make rulings right and left on matters that are not raised by this amendment.

Mr. Herridge: To put it more simply, my question is this. Does this amendment apply to ships or tugs used in inland or minor waters for towing purposes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, the amendment has no bearing on that situation.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not want to tread on the sensitive corns of the minister—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Fortunately, the minister has no corns.

Mr. Benidickson: —but I know there have been some sensitive spots of taxation as between the provinces and the federal government. I wonder whether this is another area in which, if we pass this particular item, there might be an element of further annoyance on the part of the province of Ontario and in particular on the part of the crown entity Ontario Hydro. Does a crown company like Polymer or Eldorado operating in Ontario pay taxes such as a gasoline tax imposed by the province of Ontario? Do they pay that tax? I think the matter has some relevance to the question of whether we should impose a tax on a ship that might be purchased by or built to the order of Ontario Hydro.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member has overlooked the fact that there has been a provision in the act all along. The only change this amendment makes is to delete the word "construction" from the present exemption. On June 8 I gave at some considerable length the reasons for the removal of the word "construction". They are to be found at pages 4681 and 4682 of Hansard of June 8. That is the one change that is involved here, namely taking out the word "construction".

Mr. Benidickson: On June 8 I was grateful for the minister's explanation in this regard. Now I have a new question, and it is this. If we accept this amendment, would a ship constructed at the instance of Ontario Hydro be subject to the 11 per cent sales tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The situation would be just the same as it was before the amendment was introduced.

Mr. Benidickson: I quite agree; but what are the facts? I am ignorant of the facts. I think the minister is much better informed than am I. He has in front of him two very knowledgeable officials who are in the taxing department. I wonder whether he would indicate just what are the facts.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I have already pointed out that in that case sales tax would be levied unless the ship was to be used in the coastal trade or was acquired for the use of fishermen.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, it is possible for the federal government to impose an 11 per cent sales tax on a crown company that is an entity of a province. In order to decide whether or not this procedure is fair or whether or not this provision should be amended to prohibit that procedure, perhaps the minister might indicate whether or not, on the other side, our federal crown companies such as those I have indicated—let us say Eldorado which operates in Ontario or Polymer which operates in Ontario—are assessed and pay a provincial tax such as a gasoline tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is aware of the fact that the provincial gasoline tax is a different type of tax altogether. It is not a tax that involves an assessment at all. So far as crown corporations are concerned, the only ones from which any attempt could be made to collect such a tax would be those that operate vehicles on the highways of the province in question. I do not wish to speak too generally concerning all the crown corporations. Some crown corporations undoubtedly have been affected by the sales tax but others obviously are not affected.

Mr. Benidickson: I think this is a matter of some consequence. We sometimes hear from the minister in other debates that everything is peace and harmony between the Conservative government at Ottawa and the Conservative government at Toronto. Then we read that, on the contrary, there is a real conflict in that there is a great dispute between these two governments as to which has the right to impose taxes on crown companies pertaining to the other. Here for instance, is a case in which the Ontario Hydro might be commandeering or building a ship. I want to know whether they would be taxed or whether the minister wants to tax them. I understand that the treasurer of Ontario takes very strong objection to paying certain sales taxes in connection with Ontario Hydro in respect of other purchases that Ontario Hydro has been making in recent years. I understand that similarly some of our federal crown companies think they should not pay the gasoline tax. I wonder whether this matter is being resolved and should like to get some information before we pass this schedule which, without amendment, might apply to the purchase of a ship by a province as much as by an individual.

Mr. Carter: I was going to express gratitude to the minister for this amendment but when he explained to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that the only change in the wording is that the word "construction" has been dropped I am at a loss to know whether or not I should be grateful to him. It looks as though this legislation is now taking a bigger crumb and giving us a smaller one in return.

First of all, I want to point out to the minister the difference in the way in which the fishing industry is treated as compared with the assistance given to other industries in this schedule. For example, on page 3 we have mentioned barrels and boxes for fruits and vegetables but we have nothing comparable for the fishing industry. On page 4 we have mentioned internal combustion traction engines. We use a great many of these in manufacturing and processing in connection with the fishing industry but there is nothing comparable for the fishing industry. Then on page 8 we find the heading "machinery and apparatus to be used in manufacture or production" and down near the bottom of that paragraph we find an item which reads as follows:

Gasoline-powered and diesel-powered self-propelled trucks mounted on rubber-tired wheels for off-highway use exclusively at mines and quarries;

Here is a special concession given to the mining industry. In the fishing industry we have similar types of vehicles employed but they do not enjoy this same concession or an equivalent one. We have here a particular paragraph which reads in part as follows:

Rope and cordage of cotton, hemp, manila or other vegetable fibre,—

And so on. The Fisheries Council of Canada request that in this particular item there should be included rope with wire strands which is essential and which is very costly. The minister has not seen fit to grant even that small request. Then on page 5 steel pens are mentioned; they are under farm and forest. We have aluminum pens in the fishing industry but no equivalent consideration is given to items like that.

In this particular amendment materials for use only in the equipment and repair of ships over ten tons net register tonnage, I would like the minister to explain just what is comprised in the term "materials". Does it include articles of equipment? I cannot think of many materials which could be used for equipping a ship. I can see that in repairing a ship you would need paint, sheathing, metalwork and other materials of that kind, but when you come to equip a ship you use articles. I wonder if the word "materials" can be interpreted as articles such as anchors, sails, compasses, and other equipment a ship would require?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the question obviously goes far beyond the scope of the amendment. The word "materials" has its ordinary meaning. Materials are being scrutinized under this act every day as applied to all manner of use. Much of the answer to the hon. member's question is to be found in the first clause under the heading "marine and fisheries". I would invite him to read that and I ask that discussion be confined to the changes being made here.

Mr. Benidickson: On this particular item which I referred to a few minutes ago I know that Ontario Hydro do require the construction of boats of this kind in my territory. I want to know whether the minister thinks they would pay a tax on them. They are a crown company provincially incorporated; they serve the province. I understand the provincial treasurer of Ontario has rebelled against paying taxes of this nature to the federal government and he thinks the same exemption should apply to the provincial crown company as applies under the British North America Act, I think it is, with respect to taxation from one level of government toward another.

I think it is material to the passing of this amendment to decide whether this is going to aggravate a field in which we have difficulty with the provinces. The minister is always inclined to say that everything is hunky-dory between the administration in Toronto and the Ottawa administration. I believe there is a real conflict. There is some withholding of taxes between the governments. It is a very nasty business and I think it might aggravate the situation—

The Chairman: Order. I did not intervene before but it seems to me the hon. member is really going too far in discussing such a big problem as one concerning the relations of the federal and provincial governments in the matter of taxation. I might point out to the hon. member that the only change which is brought forward by the schedule here relates to materials for use in the equipment and repair of ships over ten tons register tonnage. It does not refer to the purchase of boats by the Ontario Hydro or by a crown corporation in a provincial or federal field.

Mr. Benidickson: I am respectful of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, of course, but this is a matter which I indicated could conceivably be purchased by a crown company sponsored by a provincial government. I will overlook some of the broad issues, such as the withholding of taxes between one government and another and the standing off and ill will which seems to have been generated in consequence. But my question is whether, if we pass this, we are getting into a new arena of ill will because Ontario Hydro might be taxed under this section. I am asking the minister whether or not a ship or materials for a ship which might be purchased by a crown company of one of our provinces would, in the judgment of the officials sitting in front of him, be brought into taxation by the federal government and, if so, does the minister think under the present mood of the provincial government of Ontario that they would pay the tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer is the same as when I answered it for the third time and it is the same when I answer it for the fourth time.

Mr. Carter: I would like to ask the minister if it would not be clearer if articles and materials were included and underlined so as to bring it into line with the first paragraph? The first paragraph does say "Boats bona fide purchased by fishermen for use in the fisheries, and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture, equipment or repair of such boats". But when we get down to the amendment, "articles" is left out and we only have "materials for use only in the equipment and repair of ships over ten tons net register tonnage". Offhand I cannot think of any material which you use in equipping a boat. I can think of all kinds of articles, and I would like the minister to give me an illustration of the use of materials, if he can.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member insists on asking about things not involved in the amendment. I have already replied as to the meaning of "materials", the word contained in the amendment. It will continue to have the same meaning as it has had in the act in years past.

Mr. Benidickson: May I refer to the new item, perforated pipe for drainage purposes not exceeding four inches in inside diameter. It is a little late to request an amendment at this stage, but I would urge the minister very strongly to look at this for amendment next year, because I think our definitions are sometimes too confined and unnecessary. I think generally we could exempt a building material that was for drainage purposes, for house construction, for irrigation and for sewage and matters of that kind and have a little broader definition which would make it easier for those that deal in these materials and supply them. I think there have been representations from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce along these lines and I wonder if the department could not agree to something like that. I understand they would have some difficulty on the production side, but I think we have many precedents along this line of end purposes being the determining factor and I would hope that instead of having these amendments every year or every two years of dimensions of pipe, and so on, we might be a little wider in our description of the uses for which exemption would apply.

Mr. Benidickson: On page 11, Mr. Chairman, am I perfectly correct in my understanding that in connection with protrait photographs of individuals, which is bringing about this amendment to our traditional pattern of taxation of sales in the photographic industry, no tax will be imposed on the process or the value of the process of photofinishing without some new presentation at another time to this parliament?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I dealt with that subject very fully when we were in committee of ways and means. The hon. member will find the reference on page 4672 of Hansard in the second column.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, I can be assured that the efforts of the officers of the Department of National Revenue will cease now. They have approached the Department of Justice and endeavoured to get a ruling on this subject. I do not say they were endeavouring to get a ruling one way or the other, but they have been wondering whether the present law did not permit them to impose a sales tax on the value of photofinishing as a production. I take it we have a definite assurance from this government that while it is in office there will not be an administrative change unless some new amendment is presented to this parliament to bring it about.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to the statement I referred to, Mr. Chairman.

Schedule agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Benidickson: Next sitting of the house.

ESTATE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-65, to amend the Estate Tax Act.

Mr. Benidickson: I had hoped that perhaps we would have an introductory statement from the minister explaining the purpose of some of the amendments.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The house is already well aware of the purpose of the amendments to this bill. The resolution was reviewed by the committee of ways and means on May 9 and May 26. These are specific amendments, Mr. Speaker, to the Estate Tax Act.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this is, of course, the first amendment that we have had to the Estate Tax Act, which is a new act involving a number of new principles which became effective on July 1, 1959. We on this side complained previously that when the proposed legislation was presented in 1958, and referred to the banking and commerce committee, we were pressed unduly in a hasty fashion for passage of the bill, and with our small numbers we were not able to give the attention that we would have liked to certain sections that were not popular.

I wonder whether the minister would consider referring these amendments to the banking and commerce committee? They are the first amendments to the new basic act since it was introduced in 1958. My reason for asking that the bill be sent to the banking and commerce committee is not the contents of the amendments. I must confess that people familiar with this type of thing have in the interim given a great deal of study to the basic legislation. They have considered the effect of the legislation since it became the successor to the succession duty act on January 1, 1959. I think the accountants, the legal fraternity and the trust companies who have experience with beneficiaries under the new law would like perhaps to make some recommendations to this house after we have had this experience of some 18 months with a completely new principle of taxation following death.

The minister might indicate what his intentions are in that respect. I wish to say that on examining this amending bill I found a great deal of help in perusing something that I do not think is too usual in so far as our federal statutes and our federal administration are concerned. I refer to a statement made by the administrator of the Estate Tax Act, Mr. Linton, which was presented to the Canadian Tax Foundation. It is a very frank statement of what he expected was in the original legislation, and he indicated some of the problems in connection with it. It was a great help not only to us as legislators but to those who have reason to be interested in the Estate Tax Act. This is a very useful thing. On the income tax side perhaps some of our officials have not fraternized sufficiently with those who in practice have to deal with the Income Tax Act and similarly with the Excise Tax Act. All of us should be very grateful for Mr. Linton's review and analysis of the new act which was presented in the session of 1958 and became law in 1959.

I can recognize that some of the amendments presented to us in the amending bill are closely related to Mr. Linton's analysis because they seem to refer to some of the arenas which he indicated were perhaps new and in law may be doubtful arenas, and perhaps the original intentions of the government might in practice not be given effect to. To the extent that there was a bona fide and proper intent announced in our committee and in our legislative discussions of 1958 I do not think there will be very much quarrel about the amendments that clarify that intent or those intentions.

With respect to some other items, I am sure that all hon. members of the committee will want to examine them very carefully because I felt that in 1958 we had all too little time to examine this important measure which was a substitution of one style of taxation in the event of death for another. Since the opposition was inadequately manned at that time, I would hope that perhaps we might have another review in the committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Insurance proceeds as death benefit.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister would advise the committee of his intention with respect to this clause. Am I right in thinking that this does not involve a new principle but rather clarifies an intent the minister had when he introduced the original measure?

I referred at an earlier stage in a complimentary way to information that had been given to the country at large by the chief administrator of this tax legislation, Mr. Linton. I find that with respect to the original section 3 (1) (k) referred to in this clause Mr. Linton rather indicated that he thought this was covered by the original legislation.

On page 5 of the booklet published by the Canadian Tax Foundation entitled "A Review of the Estate Tax Act" with reference to section 3 (1) (k) of the original statute of 1958, Mr. Linton said:

> We hope that under these two paragraphs all kinds of benefits payable by way of superannuation, retirement, death benefit, pensions of any kind (whether voluntary or otherwise, enforceable or otherwise, contributory or otherwise,) are taxable.

I take it that perhaps the administration found some difficulty in the intervening period. I wonder if that is the reason for this clause. It will apparently bring into taxation benefits to the estate of a deceased under an insurance policy even if the policy was taken out by an employer of the deceased. This seems to be a reasonable conclusion but I wonder why the amendment is necessary. What is the conflict between the original law and this proposal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this clause is to ensure that death benefits arising out of employment which are now generally subject to estate tax will be taxable when they are in the form of life insurance payable to a beneficiary of the deceased. Although life insurance owned by the deceased at the time of his death is taxable, life insurance owned by the employer on the life of the deceased—for example under a company group insurance scheme—may at present escape tax even if payable to a beneficiary of the deceased. The proposed amendment will rectify this anomaly and in this respect will close what is a very obvious loophole.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Devise or bequest subject to provision against lapse.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, there is a reference here to something with which I confess I am not familiar. It refers to the regulations. Before we undertake debate on this clause would the minister indicate to the committee what the regulations are that are applicable to this clause?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Those are the regulations, Mr. Chairman, which apply to the calculation of present value of future periodic payments and are based upon the tables in relation to expectation of life.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe this relates to the subject of partial consideration, in other words an agreement prior to death to transfer certain assets in consideration of an agreement that an annuity will be paid. Am I right? What in effect is the difference? Is the difference mainly that the existing law omits reference to interest on the value of the payments that may have been received prior to death and that henceforth there will be regard not only to an arbitrary 5 per cent valuation on the annuity but also regard to the use of the amount of money that was received as an annuity?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is more than the interpretation placed upon it by the hon. member. The difference that the clause creates is clearly stated in the explanatory note, particularly the earlier portion of it. The explanatory note reads as follows:

[Mr. Benidickson.]

This amendment changes the method of determining the value of the consideration for property disposed of by the deceased during his lifetime in consideration of an annuity where the present value of the annuity at the date of the disposition exceeds the present value at the same date of a notional annuity computed on the basis of 5 per cent of the value of the property disposed of.

Mr. Benidickson: May I interrupt the minister to ask if the notional value is a 5 per cent interest calculation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the following words that illustrate the difference:

Under the existing method the consideration is the present value of the excess.

In other words the difference between the two calculations mentioned in the first sentence is that under the new method the consideration, as the explanatory note states:

—is the sum of the amounts of the excess of the actual payment made to the deceased over the notional annuity each year from the date of the commencement of the annuity to the date of his death, plus interest on those amounts.

The interest is a factor but that is not the entire difference between the two methods of calculation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I shall probably have some further remarks to make, Mr. Chairman.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Gifts subject to power to appoint or appropriate.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is a slight amendment to clause 4 of which I have given notice to hon. gentlemen opposite. I would ask my colleague, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, to move the amendment. It is in these words:

That Bill C-65, an act to amend the Estate Tax Act, be amended by striking out lines five and six on page 3 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"all of the resources of which, if any, were devoted to charitable activities carried on or to be carried on by it or to the".

Mr. Comtois: I so move.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Briefly, Mr. Chairman, the amendment would insert in line five the words "if any" after the word "which" and in line six after the words "carried on" the words "or to be carried on".

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 5—Idem.

Mr. Benidickson: I suppose this amendment is for clarification only. Since the original measure we have had an understanding that 50 per cent of the aggregate net value of an estate is free from taxation. Is this just for greater assurance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member said 50 per cent; I think he meant to say $50,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The purpose of this amendment is clarification. As the note says, it explicitly provides an exemption for an estate whose aggregate value does not exceed $50,000. On examination it has been found that the existing provision in the act does require clarification.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Situs of property.

Mr. Benidickson: I understand this interesting revision relates to property for which a situs might not have been determined up to the passing of the legislation. Is it correct that the chief point is that henceforth the situs of property, for which a situs has not been determined, will be determined under subclause 3?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The effect of subclause 3 is that where hitherto there has been no specific rule for determining the situs this paragraph will now provide a residuary rule of general application.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 12—Consent to transfer.

Mr. Benidickson: My impression was that these transfers would normally be from a corporation. I suppose the change relates to the amendments we made previously where we used the word "corporation" instead of "person" in connection with these matters.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, this change goes much further than that. This introduces quite an extension to the existing provisions of the act in relation to the consent to transfer and also those situations in which transfer may be made without waiting for consent.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with clause 12 it has been my feeling that some corporations such as banks have not been as lenient as I think the law permits them to be when a person dies and has a deposit in a bank. The present limitations are that without notice to the minister certain transfers can be made. I think the banking fraternity in general should look at this section and consider their opportunities for making transfers with notice to the minister, thus saving estates a great deal of expense. This probably will not appeal to the parliamentary secretary who practices in Ottawa. However, I have had some experience with this matter and I think that trust companies, banks and so on have not properly understood their opportunities here. I think they do not know that with notice to the minister they could be more generous in releasing moneys on deposit in their institutions and thus save the heirs to an estate the necessity of having probate which is sometimes unnecessarily insisted upon, I think.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13—Ignorance of death or interest of deceased.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with clause 13, has the government had, up to date, any experience in which the Canada Council was named in a bequest on which the law hitherto has not made it possible to have an allowance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand not.

Bill reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-69, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, concerning the motion introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), proposing the second reading of Bill C-69, I should like to deal with a project, referred to the other evening, when the estimates of the Department of Transport were under consideration. I should like to say a few words about the speech made in the house by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. English), as well as about the question of a railway in the Gaspe peninsula, a subject that has been talked about for years. I gave notice to the hon. member for Gaspe that I intended to deal with this matter tonight.

Canadian National Railways

Mr. Speaker, if I do so tonight, it is because the subject has been discussed for several years, and because I should like to remind the house of the eight proposed routes that were considered by the government of the time, and therefore by the Department of Transport. We considered that project, and more particularly the possibility of buying the Canada Gulf and Terminal railway, in 1927, 1930, 1943, 1946 and 1949. Of course, the government of the time did seriously consider the matter, and I should like here to put on the record the eight proposed routes that were considered at the time.

First of all, we had to consider the purchase, by the Canadian National Railways, of the Canada Gulf and Terminal, that is the railway linking Mont Joli with Matane.

Extension of the railway from Matane to Ste. Anne des Monts was also considered, as well as the building of a line which would go from Ste. Anne des Monts to Gaspe Copper Mines on the one side, and on the other side to the property of the Federal Metals Corporation.

We also considered a route which would extend from Sayabec to the property of the Federal Metals Corporation. Another route extended from Amqui to the same property.

Also considered was the possibility of building a railway line extending from Gaspe Copper Mines, to Gaspe, along the York river, and another one which would also extend from Gaspe to the property of Gaspe Copper mines, but along the St. John river.

Finally, a route was also considered that would extend from the C.N.R. Cascapedia to the property of the Federal Metals Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, that clearly indicates that we did, at the time, make a serious study of proposed routes for a railway line in the Gaspe peninsula.

I also recall that we had carefully considered the possibility of having the Canada Gulf and Terminal purchased by the Canadian National Railways but the difference between the price asked for the Canada Gulf and Terminal and the price suggested by the Canadian National Railways was to considerable that it was impossible to come to any agreement.

So that, the government did have the matter considered from every angle. Unfortunately, eight or ten years later, I am unable to remember all that happened at that time. However, I did get a map of the Gaspe peninsula and with this, added to the circumstances that I do recall, I can remember to a certain extent what took place at the time.

If my memory does not betray me, a member of parliament was particularly interested in that matter. It was the former hon. member for Gaspe, Mr. Leopold Langlois, who was parliamentary assistant to the postmaster general and then to the minister of transport. He tried, on various occasions, to get some agreement between the mine owners who, at that time, were to settle in the Murdochville area, and the officials of the Canadian National Railways with whom he had several talks, which have prepared the way for this government if it should decide to settle the matter.

At that time, the government built many railroads and branch lines throughout Canada, including several in the province of Quebec. We might mention, among others, the Barraute-Kiask Falls line, which the Canadian National built to service the timber limits, which, according to what the president of the C.N.R. told us recently, at a committee sitting, is a very profitable proposition. There was also the railway from Beattyville to Chibougamau, and the one from Chibougamau to St. Felicien, both built under the former government and now in operation. There was also a short line of some 50 miles, from Sherridon to Lynn Lake, in Manitoba. There has been another one of the same length in British Columbia, without mentioning several small lines in New Brunswick and Ontario. Having undertaken to build those lines at that time the government was unable to give closer attention to the required railroad in the Gaspe peninsula.

But in the meantime, circumstances have changed as the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. English) said in his remarks in this house, as may be seen on page 4476 of the official record. As a matter of fact, he pointed out to hon. members that the development of ore deposits and national resources now going on in that area might very well change the financial picture of a railroad. I was more particularly interested by what the hon. member said, as appears on page 4476 of Hansard dated June 2, 1960, and I quote:

> Ever since 1957, when I was first elected to represent the constituency of Gaspe, I have been asking that a railroad be built between Matane and Ste. Anne des Monts. I raised the matter in 1958 and 1959, and I raise it again in 1960.

With all due respect for the hon. member, I want to tell him that there are many members from the province of Quebec, on both sides of this house, who have requested this railway for many years. Now, not only must the hon. member request it, he must do more than that: he must act. He must convince the government that the circumstances have changed because of mining operations, because of the natural resources development in the peninsula, and because the volume of traffic has increased to such a degree that the government must build it now. When he made a speech here on June 2 last, he quoted, according to page 4478 of the English Hansard, the words of the Minister of Transport, as well as those of Mr. Gordon, president of the Canadian National Railways. Here is what the Minister of Transport said:

Mr. Chevrier: At page 4478 of the English text of Hansard of June 2, 1960. I quote:

> Railways are a prerequisite to and not a consequence of progress, because railways are indeed a factor of progress.

Later on, he quoted Mr. Gordon who had made a statement on the occasion of the official opening of the Chibougamau-Beattyville and Chibougamau-St. Felicien railway:

> "In a country such as this, where distance is a vital factor in the cost of goods, you cannot think of developing natural resources without thinking of railroads."

And the hon. member endorsed those two statements which, I agree, are excellent. The conclusion he came to was as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, I am most surprised. I wonder if really Mr. Gordon was serious when he made that statement. If he really was, why did he refuse that to the Liberal party for so many years, even at the time when my hon. friend the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) was Minister of Transport? Why did he refuse it, and why does he still refuse it?

Those are the words on which I want to make a few comments now.

I do not know what Mr. Gordon's attitude is today, because I left the department several years ago.

I do not know whether he has reconsidered the various locations, the least costly of which was $27 million at the time. But representations should be directed not so much to Mr. Gordon as to the government, and that is exactly what the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. English) seems to overlook entirely.

There is a tremendous difference between Canadian National policy and government policy. Usually, though not always, the Canadian National considers a project from a budget or financial angle, and looks at the profits and particularly the volume of traffic to be expected on the suggested railway line.

That is exactly why the Canadian National decided to build the line I mentioned a moment ago between Barraute and Kiask Falls, in Quebec, namely because the government-owned railway thought such a line would be profitable.

As Mr. Gordon indicated recently in the railway committee, the line has been highly profitable and since its establishment, has reaped handy profits for the government railway.

However, Mr. Speaker, the government too has its say. If the government, in the public interest and to promote the development of natural resources in a particular area reaches the conclusion that a railway is justified, all it has to do is to pay it a subsidy. That, in fact, is what the government did when it decided to build the line between Chibougamau and St. Felicien.

At that time, the Canadian National Railways told the government something like this: We are ready to build the railroad, but we know that we shall need some help during the first years and we urge the federal government to grant us subsidies. The government then decided to grant the railway an amount of $25,000 per mile. Therefore, I say to the government members, and particularly to the ministers who are now at their places and are listening to me that if they really mean to build a railway in the Gaspe peninsula, they have only to do it because there are already seven proposed routes ready for use. They are there. The government can go on and study them right now. That is the first thing I wanted to say.

The second is that since those routes were laid out—the last one was made in 1949, I think—two events took place in the peninsula: first, a great development of natural resources and second, a remarkable rise in the mining industry.

There is no need to go into details, since the hon. member for Gaspe, who is more familiar with the subject than I am, has already dealt with it.

There is also another reason that I wish to put forward. Following the development of the St. Lawrence seaway, traffic has increased between the ports on the north shore of the Gaspe peninsula, and those of Seven Islands, Baie Comeau and elsewhere. Traffic is heavier than in 1949. Conditions are therefore different in 1960, and financially they have changed to such an extent that the government now feels justified in building that particular railroad.

Personally, I am not fully informed on the matter, and I do not know what exactly has occurred since that time, nor have I seen the files. However, I should like to refresh the memory of my hon. friends who, of course, promised in the 1957 and 1958 elections to reconsider this railway line project.

I have no doubt that if they will pay a subsidy to the Canadian National in view of the industrial development going on in the peninsula and of the increased volume of shipping between the north and south shore, a favourable decision could certainly be reached with regard to this railway line.

What prompted me tonight is that the hon. member for Gaspe directed his remarks only to the government owned corporation, apparently in the belief that the decision rested only with that corporation.

The government owned corporation, namely the Canadian National, can make recommendations to the government, but it is not responsible for taking a decision on the matter. It is the government, with its ministers, it is the cabinet which considers proposed locations and reaches a conclusion.

For all those reasons, I thought I was justified in discussing the bill on second reading, and in reminding hon. members on the government side of their election promises with regard to this proposed railway.

Again may I emphasize that conditions have changed over the 11-year period.

Finally, I would ask them, in view of the fact that they have been in power for three years, not only to consider existing locations, and complete them if necessary, but also to make a thorough study of the scheme, if necessary—though I feel the studies have already gone far enough—and to reach a decision which would meet the wishes of the people who have been asking for this railway line for many years.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we in this group support the bill. On the previous stage of the bill we all had our particular innings and I personally am glad to see it pass.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, when we discussed the resolution prior to receiving this bill I indicated to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that perhaps we might inquire whether or not these capital expenditures in their forbidding entirety would be necessary. I asked that question inasmuch as last year, just within a few days of our approval of a similar bill involving substantial sums for the capital expenditures of Canadian National Railways, Canadian National Railways by approval, I think, of its small directorate decided that some $20 million odd were not necessary.

We have a large sum of money involved in the implications of the clauses of this bill before us. I think it involves an expenditure on the part of Canadian National Railways of about $200 million and another $86 million in capital expenditures for a subsidiary wholly owned by Canadian National Railways, namely our well known Trans-Canada Air Lines.

I am not going to repeat what I said at the resolution stage. We are not proposing in 1960 to spend on capital expenditures sums which could in any way be related to these tremendous sums which are involved in this bill. I think that as disclosed in the annual report of the Canadian Pacific railway, inclusive of expenditures that the competing road proposed to make for its air line the capital expenditure for 1960 for the Canadian Pacific railway was the sum of about $83 million. I indicated that I thought that the executive—and I meant the cabinet—should at some stage examine these matters and that when the cabinet presented to us as legislation a bill such as this bill it should be prepared to indicate that it had taken the responsibility beyond what we gathered was the responsibility taken when we discussed these matters at the resolution stage. I indicated then that there had been considerable paring with respect to the total requirements at various stages within the Canadian National railways organization. I also indicated in that debate that the paring seemed to stop at that point.

Apparently the cabinet—and the Minister of Finance is representing the cabinet in this instance—have the feeling that when this crown company presents a requirement for capital expenditures of this magnitude—and I have indicated it is about $200 million for the railway and $86 million for the subsidiary, Trans-Canada Air Lines—there is no paring after it arrives at the public's level of executive consideration, namely the cabinet. When I suggested that the minister might refer back to the experience of 1959 when even the crown company a few days after parliamentary consideration of the matter decided that they did not need some $23 million, the amount involved in last year's bill, the minister was a bit haughty at the suggestion that he should go back to the crown company and ask whether any such paring on the part of the crown company was likely within a few days or a few weeks of our consideration of the statute. The minister promised that eventually he would make some report to the house in that regard.

When we were discussing the resolution I indicated that unless there was some change in pattern either of budgeting or in custom and business done by the road the first four months operating experience of 1960 would show that the Minister of Finance would find that his budget calculations would be upset to the extent of $41 million. I related that to his very slender budget prospect of a surplus of $12 million and that, of course, was not picked out of the cocked hat.

At the resolution stage I pointed out that this was only one bill for capital requirements that would be presented this year on behalf of the crown company. I also pointed out that after our committee had given considerable study to the capital budget of Canadian National Railways we were presented by the government with another bill which involved a capital expenditure on behalf of the Canadian public of about $100 million for the Toronto terminal and for, I think, access facilities to the terminal. When I raised these points last week I did not get much satisfaction on the question why most of the expenditures for the Toronto terminal were not presented to parliament in a bill such as we have tonight. I asked why there was a difference in terminal costs of a capital nature in Toronto as compared with capital costs for terminals at Montreal, Moncton, Winnipeg and at other points that had hitherto always been taken care of in a bill similar to the one we have before us at the present time.

One of the reasons why I was curious about this was that a parliamentary committee was set up to examine the capital requirements of Canadian National Railways, its operating budget and, as I say, its capital expenditures and after it had finished its business we received from this government with respect to terminal requirements at Toronto a new bill altogether, something that we did not hear about when we had the opportunity to examine the officers of Canadian National Railways in a less formal manner in a committee of this house. An explanation of that has not yet been advanced. I think it should be.

I must indicate to all my colleagues that in the debate on the resolution stage prior to the introduction of this bill I had showed that the officers of Canadian National Railways were rather anxious to terminate their services before the parliamentary committee and get back to head office in Montreal. I have not the page references in Hansard before me but I recall that I was interrupted in my remarks by some hon. member who said, "Oh, oh". I said that perhaps in this respect I am understating the anxiety and desire of the executives of Canadian National Railways to be relieved of this inquiry and get back to Montreal.

I do not want to retract too much with respect to this statement, Mr. Speaker. I think it is well known that this examination of the accounts of this important crown company is all too hasty. It has always been that way. I do not say it is any different under the new regime from what it was under the old; but when I emphasize the aspect of understatement I feel I owe an apology to the vice president of Canadian National Railways, Mr. Dingle. At the committee meetings this session I raised the effect that certain capital expenditures had on the employees of Canadian National Railways in certain divisional points in the riding of Kenora-Rainy River. I want to say that while the committee itself was not prepared to receive evidence from the national and regional offices of the employees affected by this form of capital expenditure or automation, or whatever you wish to call it, when I reflect upon what I said last week at the resolution stage I think it was unfair perhaps to the vice president of the road, Mr. Dingle.

The committee would not listen to the union representatives or to the representatives from the community of Sioux Lookout, but I must say it was unfair because Mr. Dingle, vice president, was quite willing and anxious to stay over another day after our discussions had concluded. He saved the time of those delegations by staying here in Ottawa rather than going to Montreal, or asking them to come to Montreal. In fairness, I think I should make that statement, because Mr. Dingle's services and willingness to meet those people after the committee consideration was concluded were very much appreciated by all concerned.

I believe that we have here one or two items in clauses of the bill which are not similar to items that we normally have. The minister referred to one when he gave an explanation on the resolution stage.

We have here also a reference to certain adjustments which apparently are necessary in connection with relations between this crown company and the government in the government accounts. It relates away back to the 1957 operations. We should have an explanation of that. The minister should indicate whether or not the annual statements of Canadian National Railways for the year concerned, either 1957, 1958 or 1959, make proper reference to this item or whether it is something that we are in a sense being advised of by surprise.

I recall there was a depreciation item in the 1958 annual statement that I questioned last year in the 1959 committee sittings. I imagine that this even has an effect on the minister's budget. I feel that the fullest possible explanation should be given with respect to an item that relates as far back as 1957 when a change in government accounts is to be authorized by this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister not going to reply?

Mr. Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the last subject raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) was discussed very fully on a similar measure a year ago and I trust we will not have to exhume that debate and spend more of the time of the house in repeating it here tonight.

The hon. member attached considerable importance to what he had to say about the calculation of the deficit of Canadian National Railways. I do not wish to repeat what I said on the subject at the resolution stage on June 7. So far as the capital budget of the C.N.R. is concerned the management operates on the assumption that the capital budget will not be exceeded without further authorization from the government and the record shows that the management has never over-expended its authorized capital budget. The operating budget, that is the net position of deficit or surplus after all charges, is, of course, an entirely different matter.

Before the budget of the company was submitted to the government in February the management had conducted a detailed investigation of all economic indicators which would enable it to estimate the revenue and traffic volumes. The operating budget prepared at that time, that is to say, in February 1960, was the best forecast that could be made as of that time. If, however, actual traffic results prove to be disappointing as the year proceeds it is not possible nor practical to reduce the expense side of the operating forecast every week or every month as many of the major expense items are spread over the year, so that sudden stoppages or changes in work in hand would be imprudent and uneconomic.

To put it another way, the railway revenues are highly variable whereas its expenses tend to be much less variable when spread out over the period of a year. After the first quarter of a year if it becomes apparent that revenue and traffic volumes are at a materially lower rate than what had been forecast then management through its headquarters budget committee begins an intensive re-examination of all traffic, revenue and expense factors. If a downward trend persists during the second quarter then management again through its budget committee begins the process of reviewing the operating budget and year-end position. Of course, this becomes in effect virtually a continuous operation and that can be expected of the company this year.

I think all the other items that were raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River were discussed, and I may say discussed at some length, at the resolution stage of this measure on June 7 and I believe there would be no advantage in repeating what was then said.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question? The minister indicated that there would be a natural revision at the end of the first quarter of the operating year. We are now five months rather than three months advanced into 1960 with respect to information about the C.N.R. Does the minister still think that the deficit of the company will be $21 million or $23 million as indicated in his budget?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, what I said was that it was the best estimate that could be made at that time. It naturally will be subject to revision as the year proceeds. The management does as well as anybody can do in that respect. I do not think anyone can be infallible in the matter of an estimate.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Capital expenditures authorized.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, referring to clause 3(b) I should like to repeat briefly what I said earlier in connection with Trans-Canada Air Lines. It was indicated in the committee on railways and shipping that the year 1960 may not be a good one for T.C.A. in so far as its financial operations are concerned. I would think the main reason for this is the competition that the government has decided to allow foreign air carriers to enter into in so far as T.C.A. is concerned. I discussed this on a previous occasion in this chamber and will not repeat what I said then. Briefly, I think it should be brought to the attention of the minister because he is the Minister of Finance and responsible in large part for the discussions which are entered into between Canadian National Railways—through his officers—and Trans-Canada Air Lines in relation to the budgetary position of the railway company and its subsidiary, T.C.A.

It would strike me that two, if not three, of the bilaterals that have been entered into between Canada and foreign countries are creating a serious hardship upon T.C.A. In the first place, three foreign carriers now travel non-stop from Montreal to Chicago in competition with T.C.A. which is not able to go to Chicago without coming down at Toronto. In other words, because of the bilateral between Canada and the United States, T.C.A. does not have fifth freedom rights between Montreal and Chicago whereas the three foreign carriers—Alitalia, Lufthansa and Air France—possess those onward rights.

Then again, there is the position of T.C.A. vis-à-vis B.O.A.C. B.O.A.C. has been given by the Canadian government stop-off privileges at Toronto in competition with T.C.A. I believe that has worsened the financial position of T.C.A. to such an extent that T.C.A. has found it necessary to enter into a pooling arrangement with B.O.A.C. for the trans-Atlantic services.

I ask the minister in his conversations with his officers—who in turn will be speaking to the officers of these two national companies —to discuss the position outlined by hon. members of the opposition as we see it. If this is not rectified either by a curtailment of the privileges given foreign carriers or by renegotiation of the bilateral air agreement with the United States, then I am afraid the profit and loss position of T.C.A. for 1960 will be far more serious than it was in 1959.

The other day I asked the Prime Minister on the orders of the day if in his discussions with the President of the United States the question was raised of T.C.A. entering into the lucrative Florida market by way of stop-off and onward privileges at Miami. He replied that no discussion had been had between himself and the President of the United States. It seems to me that those members of the government who are responsible, the chief one in my opinion being the Secretary of State for External Affairs, for the renegotiation of bilaterals should do everything they can to convince the United States authorities that T.C.A. has been placed in an awkward position because of rights which are being given foreign carriers and refused to Canadian carriers. How is it that these foreign carriers, Air France, Alitalia, Lufthansa, can travel from Montreal to Chicago, Montreal to San Francisco, Montreal to Los Angeles, whereas the same privileges are not given to the Canadian carrier?

I think I have said enough to convince the minister that serious consideration should be given to what we on this side of the house think is a very important problem. We think that the principle of competition, which seems to have been engendered by the government since it has been in office, is causing our own carriers to be placed in an awkward and impossible position vis-à-vis other carriers from the point of view of financial results. With that in mind I would ask the minister to give the matter of these bilaterals his careful consideration.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we have just been treated to what is virtually a repeat performance on the part of the hon. member for Laurier. He gave us the same speech in the house on March 7 on a motion to resolve the house into committee of supply. He introduced an amendment to give effect to the views he then expressed and the house negatived that amendment on March 8. But if the hon. member thinks this is worth repeating I am sure the committee is glad to hear what he has to say.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as usual the Minister of Finance is rather contemptuous of suggestions that come from this side of the house, but may I point out to some of the backbenchers of the Conservative party that there are very large figures involved in clause 3. I talk to some of these gentlemen in the halls of the House of Commons and there they express some misgivings about advances such as are provided in clause 3 of the bill. The treasurer representing all the taxpayers of Canada is the Minister of Finance who is sitting in the house opposite us. I think he should indicate to us whether or not in three years he has seen fit to pare in any way any of the proposed capital expenditures for which authorization has been given to this crown company and, if so, when and to what extent.

I think we would like to hear from the minister what his projection is as to the possible earnings of the subsidiary of Canadian National Railways, Trans-Canada Air Lines; what they are likely to earn through betterment by virtue of the expenditure proposed in subclause 1 (b) of clause 3. The amount of $86 million by way of capital expenditures is forecast here. What is the minister's advice from this crown company as to its possible earnings and possible profit or loss for the year 1960?

In addition, with respect to subclause 1 (a) we find an item that I do not think is ordinarily found in a bill of this kind, a provision for working capital. In this case the requirement is $10 million. Would the minister indicate how frequently, historically speaking, Canadian National Railways has asked parliament to provide additional working capital, when this has occurred and the amount involved? Is this simply an item that goes into the debt structure? Otherwise, what rate of interest is paid on an advance of working capital of $10 million?

In connection with the apparent requirement for working capital there is a reference to the Victoria bridge and the St. Lawrence seaway. As I recall, when the committee on railways and shipping, government owned, considered this matter there was some question whether or not this amount would be refunded to Canadian National Railways and when. The Minister of Finance of all people surely knows whether the St. Lawrence seaway authority is likely to refund this money or whether some other source is likely to refund it and how soon it will be refunded. If it is going to be refunded in the near future there is a possibility that perhaps this sum would not be necessary.

I go back to a request I made when we were at the resolution stage. I asked the Minister of Finance very specifically, because I thought it was his duty, to go to Canadian National Railways and inquire whether there was any possibility of amendment with respect to these immense sums. I indicated it was my understanding that the figures that are the basis of this bill were prepared by them many months ago. Many millions of dollars are involved and perhaps in some instances the directorate and management have decided that as of June 13 these funds will not be expanded in 1960. In accordance with my request of last week, did the minister make these inquiries and, if so, what has he heard from the management? Can he assure the house that every dollar of these immense requirements is likely to be spent in 1960 and therefore these clauses of the bill should be passed without amendment? If there is any possibility that these items are not required in full, why should parliament be asked to be simply a rubber stamp for capital proposals made by Canadian National Railways five or six months ago which are not valid today?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, apparently the hon. member wishes me to present my credentials to the committee of the whole in relation to close supervision of the budgets of Canadian National Railways. All I can say to him is that I understand that the president and management of Canadian National Railways consider that the Minister of Finance has given their budget close scrutiny. Perhaps I need say no more than that on that score.

As to the various other matters that were touched upon by the hon. member, I think I might suggest to him, Mr. Chairman, that a lot of the information he seeks on the floor of this house is information which should have been obtained by him in the committee when the officials of the Canadian National Railways were there; that is the purpose of having such a committee. It is not for this committee to go into the details of the operating functions and financing of Canadian National Railways. I am happy to give to the committee any information that it is within my power to obtain, but I do think, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Benidickson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —it is a waste of the time of this committee to ask for information that should have been requested in the railway committee.

Mr. Benidickson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman: It is true I was a member of that committee. However, I want to say that the rules are very clear that the committee of the whole has jurisdiction above and beyond any committee of the house, and when we are dealing in sums like $300 million it is quite proper to ask the Minister of Finance for Canada about his examination of the need for expenditures under some of these headings.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Certainly it is quite proper to ask the Minister of Finance about his examination of these figures. We are not discussing that at the moment. What I was referring to was the attempt made here to ask for operating details pertaining to the functions of management of Canadian National Railways. I think the function of the committee, when it has the officials before it, is to obtain all information on that score. It is quite proper in this committee to ask the Minister of Finance for an accounting in relation to his functions and responsibilities, and I hope I shall be able to give that.

We were asked again, Mr. Chairman, about the $10 million of working capital to finance the temporary alterations of Victoria bridge to co-ordinate with the St. Lawrence seaway. Again I was asked about the matter of the claim in relation to the seaway. We were over this in the committee last week. I could repeat what I said then on this subject, but I feel it would be completely unprofitable to do so. It would be straight repetition because I dealt with this subject fully at that time.

Then we were asked questions about the anticipated operating results of Trans-Canada Air Lines this year. The hon. member must be aware that no net income is anticipated from Trans-Canada Air Lines this year. It had an operating net income in 1958 of approximately $550,000; that dropped in 1959 to approximately $152,000, and no net income from Trans-Canada Air Lines is anticipated by Canadian National Railways in 1960.

Mr. Benidickson: Do they expect a deficit and, if so, how much?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That information was all available in the committee. Apparently the hon. member dit not see fit even to ask for the tabling of the budget. I was amazed to find that—

Mr. Benidickson: There are many members of this committee who were not members of the other committee, and I am sure they would be interested.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no occasion for the hon. member to stand up and interrupt. I was surprised to find that the budget of Trans-Canada Air Lines had not been requested in the committee and was apparently not put on the record of the committee. I dealt with the requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines for this coming year in the committee on June 7. The clause under consideration is 3 (a) which indicates that the investment of the national system in Trans-Canada Air Lines during this calendar year, 1960, is $82,350,000. Subclause (b) indicates also that the capital expenditures for the calendar year 1961, prior to July 1, to be authorized amount to $86 million.

I reviewed in the committee of ways and means last week the reasons for these very large requirements. They relate to new equipment which Trans-Canada Air Lines has acquired. It is ordered and delivery is expected within these next few months. This is an existing commitment and must be met. It is regrettable, as I pointed out on June 7, that the requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines in this respect are not more evenly distributed from year to year. But that is the way the particular situation was met. Trans-Canada Air Lines considered that they required equipment and that equipment was authorized to keep the company in a position to give effective service and to meet competition.

In the last place, the hon. member asked about the possibility that some of the money to be authorized in this clause might not be required. I indicated on June 7 that most of the amount provided for equipment is to meet existing commitments. I drew attention, in line 5, to the fact that equipment will account for $34,977,000 of gross capital expenditure for the calendar year 1960. Of that amount, $20,707,000 represents the equipment which has already been authorized under financing and guarantee acts in prior years. This included 140 locomotives, 9 passenger train cars, 300 freight cars and 5 work equipment units. There is an additional amount of $5,638,000 for anticipated deliveries in 1960 consisting of a portion of the 1,366 freight cars and 5 work equipment units.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River spent some time at the last meeting discussing the 40 diesels. I pointed out to him then that the diesels were already authorized; indeed, they were part of a larger group of diesels that had already been authorized and some of the units had been delivered. The cost of the anticipated deliveries of equipment already authorized, as I have already indicated, is estimated at $20,707,000, leaving a balance of $12,200,000 to be paid out after 1960 on equipment purchased and authorized by prior acts. Of this $12,200,000, between $7 million and $8 million represents the cost of the 40 diesel units already authorized but not yet ordered. These sums form part of the total of $86 million provided for in clause 3(1)(b) now under discussion.

The president of Canadian National Railways, Mr. Gordon, told the special committee when he appeared before it in the last week of March that he did not know whether the 40 diesel units would in fact be ordered at that time. There is still no absolute certainty that they will be ordered. However, it is considered advisable to authorize the provision of funds for the purchase in case they should be needed. Should later surveys indicate that traffic would not warrant the purchase of these units at this time the orders will not be placed and the amount involved will lapse.

Mr. Drysdale: I should like to make one or two remarks on this particular item. On June 7 I spoke during the resolution stage in connection with the money that had been allocated to the Canadian National for trucking, the sum of $5 million. I should point out to the Minister of Finance that I laid the foundation for these remarks in the committee and established that I could not get the information at that particular time. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway also spoke in the committee. On June 8 there was a press release issued from Winnipeg by the Canadian National indicating the acquisition of some five truck lines. However, the press release did not indicate what proportion of the $5 million had been used by the Canadian National, nor did the press release indicate the long range plans of the Canadian National.

In fairness to Mr. Gordon, the president, I should indicate to the minister that I have written him today. The press release just came to my attention over the week end. I have written to Mr. Gordon inquiring about the expenditure of $5 million and the proportion. But I was wondering, since this matter has come before the committee, whether the Minister of Finance is in a position to indicate what proportion of the $5 million was spent in acquiring these five trucking lines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. Just today I received a copy of the release issued by Canadian National Railways in connection with the acquisition of these lines.

Mr. Chevrier: All members of the comittee received the letter.

Mr. Benidickson: Mine was not signed but I received it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Then I do not need to delay the committee by referring to the contents of this press release in relation to the acquisition of four trucking firms and the acquisition of an option on the fifth. The purpose of the Canadian National system in acquiring these trucking lines was indicated in the release.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance was rather scolding the members of this committee which, I thought, worked fairly diligently under a rather heavy handicap of three or four meetings a day. He scolded the committee for not asking for the budget of Trans-Canada Air Lines which he suggests was available if asked for. If it was not asked for at the last sittings of the committee, the committee was perhaps exhausted. I have no doubt that the minister is well aware of all these items. In this larger assembly of the committee of the whole of the House of Commons perhaps he might indicate what the budget of Trans-Canada Air Lines would have disclosed if we had been smarter and had asked for it. He perhaps has it. I should like to know now, belatedly, what the budget disclosed for Trans-Canada Air Lines with regard to a profit or loss in 1960.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. When the minister saw fit to cast these aspersions upon the diligence of the committee I am sure he must be well informed on this point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not brought that budget to this committee, Mr. Chairman.

If the hon. member wishes further information in detail on it, I will obtain it for him. So far as Trans-Canada Air Lines are concerned, we are dealing here with the capital requirements and the financing requirements they are making on Canadian National Railways. I have given the detailed information in that respect. If the hon. member wishes to go further and to ask with regard to the detailed operations of Trans-Canada Air Lines, I will obtain for him what information he indicates he wishes to have and will send it to him.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not the point, Mr. Chairman. We are asked here for the substantial sum of $86 million for capital expenditures related to Trans-Canada Air Lines, and I think all of us would want to know how that would be reflected upon the earnings position of this subsidiary of Canadian National Railways. I think it is fairly obvious to all members of the committee that the minister does not know. He apparently has not asked, before he asks the House of Commons to pass this bill, just how this will be translated into profit or loss with respect to Trans-Canada Air Lines. However, he gratuitously decided to say that the committee had been careless in not asking for this information when they had an opportunity to do so last March.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Of course the hon. gentleman is quite wrong. The capital budget of Trans-Canada Air Lines, which is the only budget of Trans-Canada Air Lines upon which the Minister of Finance is called upon to pass, as I thought the hon. member was well aware, shows the following: application of funds, property and equipment, $83,485,000; refinancing of loans—these are loans by the C.N.R.—$4 million; increased materials and supplies, $10,015,000; or a total of $97,500,000. The source of the funds is as follows: net income, nil, as I pointed out earlier; depreciation provision, $15,150,000. Deducting that sum from the earlier sum of $97,500,000, we have the requirement of $82,350,000 to be financed through Canadian National Railways and that is the amount appearing in clause 3 (1)(a).

Mr. Benidickson: The minister has indicated that the net income for Trans-Canada Air Lines is reported to him as nil. I am sure he must have made inquiry beyond that point. It is not just nil. There perhaps is a deficit. If there is a deficit, how much is expected in 1960 and how will it be provided for? Will it be done by the parent company, namely Canadian National Railways? Will we be obliged to provide for it in a clause in a bill similar to this one in a subsequent session or will it be provided for in an item in the estimates? Canadian National Railways have already indicated that they expect their deficit will be something about $20 million for 1960. I have suggested that unless they change their course it will be another $40 million beyond that figure. On these gigantic matters surely the Minister of Finance is taken into the confidence of these crown companies and he must have some estimate as to the expected operating results of Trans-Canada Air Lines, on a basis similar to that of the Canadian National Railways when many months ago they suggested to him that they would require the payment of a deficit of approximately $20 million. After four months of operation, as I say, we have found, that unless there is a change of trend, it will be some $40 million beyond that figure. Trans-Canada Air Lines is another big crown company. Surely they also have indicated to the Minister of Finance, even some months ago, what their forecast of profit or loss would be for the calendar year 1960.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already reported to the committee several times that Trans-Canada Air Lines anticipate no net income this year. That means that where they show what would appear to be an operating deficit, that deficit will have to be provided for out of depreciation allowance. Therefore there is no net income. The Minister of Finance does not pass on the operating deficit or the operating budget of Trans-Canada Air Lines. He passes only on the capital budget. I have already given that capital budget and have placed in on the record. The total requirement provided by this bill in respect to Trans-Canada Air Lines is the figure to which we have already referred, namely the figure of $82,350,000 which is included in the gross capital expenditures.

Mr. Benidickson: We all see that figure, but I think we are all interested in knowing whether or not that amount, if voted, would improve the profit position of Trans-Canada Air Lines and, in particular, what reference it has to 1960 operations. I am astounded to find that apparently the Minister of Finance has not inquired into these matters and is not able to inform the house about them regardless of their magnitude.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 10—Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. Benidickson: On this clause we are back to Trans-Canada Air Lines. Is the minister after reflection not able to indicate to parliament that he does get some forecast of operating results for a calendar year, such as 1960, from an important crown company like Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think I have already answered that about four or five times, Mr. Chairman.

On clause 11.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if the minister would give some indication of whether consideration has been given to revising de novo the capital revision act of the Canadian National Railways. As the minister knows, it was revised by act of parliament some years ago; I have forgotten exactly what the date of the legislation was.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It came into effect in 1952.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister says 1952. There was a deterioration of the budgetary operation of the Canadian National Railways in 1959 and I know that Canadian National Railways would not make any representations to the minister, but it is a matter which has to be determined by the government.

I remember when the legislation was passed earlier that it took a great deal of time before it was approved. A subcommittee of the cabinet was established composed of several ministers and many other officers of various departments, and it was after a careful and long study that the matter was finally determined and legislation introduced. I wonder if any consideration has been given to a revision of the capital structure of Canadian National Railways since that time?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, at the resolution stage on June 7 I pointed out that this provision in the bill is new as compared with the annual similar bill of other years. The effect of this clause is to extend the authority of the Minister of Finance to purchase the 4 per cent preferred stock for one year. It will expire under the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, to which reference has been made, on December 31, 1960. This is to extend it to 1961 so that it will be coterminous in that respect with the conclusion of the period within which the 20-year interest free obligation delivered to the minister by Canadian National Railways extends.

Obviously before December 31, 1961 plans will require to be made in relation to the future of the financial operations and financial structure in this respect of Canadian National Railways. This present provision will carry the present plan up to December 31, 1961 and before that date plans will have to be made as a result of the review of the whole picture.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the cabinet, either directly or indirectly through a subcommittee, giving study and consideration to the problem of capital revision?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, as to the particular method, I do not think I should be asked to disclose that. But I have indicated that before December 31, 1961 some provision will have to be made for the period following that date, and that will require action on the part of parliament, of course.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not too sure that I follow the minister. I can understand why he cannot indicate what method is being followed as to the consideration of this problem, and I have no fault to find with that. I am not too sure if I heard him aright, but I take it from what he has said that consideration in some form or other is being given to the capital structure after 1961, and may I go a step further, to the capital revision of the financial structure of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can assure the hon. member that this subject is not absent from my thoughts.

Mr. Benidickson: When we discussed these proposals at the resolution stage last week I made some calculations. I have not my notes in front of me but I pointed out to the committee that there had been a write-off of certain debts to the government in 1951, I think it was, of some substance. I think they amounted to about $800 million. I made a calculation that following the write-off of this debt of $800 million odd there were subsequently obligations incurred by Canadian National Railways such as referred to in this section, that is, purchases of preferred stock.

My recollection is that over the years since 1951, or shall I say January 1, 1952, it was less than $200 million. I think it was less than $200 million, but the minister will correct me if I am wrong. None the less the over-all obligation of Canadian National Railways in that period of eight years after revision and write-down of its debts still showed an increase of over-all debt, either to the government or to the public, by deficits or otherwise, of about $1 billion. Am I very far wrong in my rather rough figures which I am offering without notes?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At the time of the capital revision, which went into effect in 1952, the preferred stock acquired by the minister as at that time was $736,385,405. At May, 1961 the balance was $913,480,714.

Mr. Benidickson: May, 1960, you mean?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sorry, May, 1960. As at May, 1960 it is estimated to have reached $913,480,714.

Mr. Benidickson: That is helpful but I think the minister should also give the figure as to the over-all obligations outside of preferred stock of the road after the write-off in 1959, and the forecast proposed, as he has indicated, for a certain date in 1961, and will the total not approximate an increase of about $1 billion, as I have suggested?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In connection with the preferred stock I think I should give this figure to complete my statement. The figure at March 31, 1960, the close of that fiscal year, was $909,849,274. The principal amount outstanding on December 31, 1959 was $1,341,058,970.

Mr. Benidickson: What was it after the reorganization?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On December 31, 1952 it was $605,494,829.

Mr. Benidickson: What happens to the annual deficits, if incurred? Are they simply written off? They are assumed by the crown and do not go into the capital structure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are provided for as usual, in the final supplementary estimates which are passed in March of each year.

Mr. Benidickson: Once they are paid by the taxpayers they do not get into the figures such as the minister has given.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They go into the figures of the net debt.

Mr. Benidickson: Are they considered a liability?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is an interesting question to ask of a company whose relations with the government are such as those between Canadian National Railways and the government. When you talk about debt, these are all matters of accumulation, as the hon. gentleman can see by referring to page 39 of the printed annual statement of the Canadian National system.

Bill reported.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND APPLICATION, ETC.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-64, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

(Translation):

Mr. Armand Dumas (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I had thought the hon. minister would add something to the statement he made the other day, at the resolution stage. However, I intend to be very brief, because I would not want to hold up the adoption of this bill.

At the resolution stage, I called the attention of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) on the possibility of amending the act so as to increase the rate of assistance to gold mines. The fact that it was considered proper to increase the subsidy by 25 per cent, and that the part of the act related thereto has not been amended, constitutes, in my opinion, an anomaly.

At present, the rate of assistance to gold mines is determined by taking two thirds of the surplus differential between $26.50 and the cost price, the maximum being set up at $12.33. That is, in my opinion, the anomalous part of the act. If it was considered proper to amend the act, by increasing the subsidy by 25 per cent, I think an increase in the maximum rate should also have been considered. The subsidy was increased because it was believed that operation costs had increased, and that, in all fairness, things had to be arranged in such a way that our gold mines might be kept in production. It was felt that since the rate was increased, the subsidy should be increased by 25 per cent. However, mines whose operation costs reach $45 an ounce will not benefit from that subsidy in the same proportion as those whose production costs are less.

I hope the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys will consider the matter so as to do justice to some of those mines which may perhaps be compelled to close down if they do not get an increase in the maximum rate. It is true that there are perhaps only one or two, three at the most, of those mines throughout the country; however I know two of them which employ from 150 to 200 men, and if they had to close down tomorrow, some difficulties might ensue, most particularly because a good many miners are now out of work. I know the government does not wish to bring about a situation which might increase the number of unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, this piece of legislation we are now considering would also, I am told, include another anomaly, but one resulting instead from the enforcement of the regulation—my information is perhaps inaccurate. However, at the committee stage, or when he takes the floor to wind up the debate, perhaps the minister could give us some definite information about that.

I note that, for the year 1959, the total amount of subsidies will reach $11.7 million. This figure is taken from the statement made by the Minister on May 25, 1960, at the resolution stage. The total amount of the grants for the year 1958 was $11,138,000.

I also find, according to the report, that for 1958, a total amount of $6,884,000 had been paid in the form of assistance as of March 31, 1959, which means approximately 54 per cent of the whole amount—whereas a proportion of 80 per cent could have been expected. In fact, according to regulations, the government agrees immediately after the mines have reported on their production, to pay 80 per cent of the total amount of ounces produced, and the production costs.

I realize that it takes some time before the government is able to pay those 80 per cent. Nevertheless, I am astonished to find that, on March 31, 1959, only $6,884,000 had been paid out of a total of $11,138,000.

Therefore, the minister might perhaps, when we come to discuss article 1 of this bill, give us information which would throw some light on the picture.

Everybody agrees, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation has been of great benefit to the industry. For that reason, I have no intention of detaining hon. members any longer, because I believe that everyone here tonight wants the legislation to pass as soon as possible. I therefore am closing my remarks at this point.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we indicated our support of this measure at the resolution stage. There has been some criticism of the stand taken by myself and my colleagues, the hon. members for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and Timmins (Mr. Martin). The criticism has taken such an extreme form that I feel called upon not only to qualify it but to explain and to a certain extent attack the interpretation placed upon our remarks on this measure at the resolution stage.

In the June 2, 1960 issue of the Northern Miner an editorial entitled "Masters of Innuendo" appears. The editorial begins by saying:

> Socialists Peters and Fisher, C.C.F. members representing Timiskaming and Port Arthur respectively are up to their old tricks again. Two years ago when the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was up for renewal they indulged in an amazing display of innuendo. Now that E.G.M.A. is once more before the house, and they can hide behind the cloak of parliamentary immunity, they are at it again, doing their best to smear the gold mining industry by spreading false information.

An hon. Member: Is that true?

Mr. Fisher: I should like to make it perfectly clear that I am not hiding behind the cloak of parliamentary immunity in any remarks I make and if the Northern Miner wishes to give me a platform free from parliamentary immunity I will repeat anything I have said to date about gold mining.

This newspaper had some interesting things to say about the argument we presented some two years ago. At that time I wrote a letter to the editor of the newspaper setting a forth my position and suggesting he publish the letter. It was not published and I did not have the courtesy of a reply. I think it is an abomination when a member of parliament is accused of hiding behind a cloak of parliamentary immunity when he is only trying to underline the fact that the sum of $112 million, I believe—

An hon. Member: $131 million.

Mr. Fisher: My hon. friend says $131 million —will have been paid out this year in emergency aid to gold mines in Canada. In view of that amount it is our duty to be suspicious of the administration and the way things are going. If it is any consolation to the Northern Miner I am suspicious of many government departments and the way they spend their money as I am sure many hon. members are and should be. Surely it is our responsibility to check matters closely.

Our point throughout has been that we have not been completely satisfied with the checks carried on by the minister's officials in this regard. It is stated right in the act that the inspectors of the department have the right to go down into the mines and examine them. The minister's evidence is that they hardly ever do, that it is not considered necessary. In other words, the mines can be trusted and it is simply an accounting operation. Perhaps it is but I would feel much better if the provision in the act under which they can go down into the mines and inspect them was carried out.

It is not my purpose to smear the gold mines although I think I would have the right to do so from my past experience. After the war I returned and attempted to get a job in a mine but discovered that I was on the blacklist in northern Ontario for what were supposed to be some bunkhouse activities in a mine in which I formerly worked. I had only tried to see that we did not have money lopped off our pay without our consent and approval but for this I was put on the blacklist of all the mines in the Pickle lake and Red lake camps. I have some reason to be suspicious of the activities of gold mine management, but that is beside the point. Anyone who has travelled through northern Ontario or camped, portaged or canoed there will realize that there are thousands of mining prospects in gold that went through speculators and stock purchasers and collapsed. It has been said that only one out of approximately 1,000 mines in Ontario ever goes into production after the formation of a company. I say that to point out that there is every reason for us to be properly suspicious of the industry and of any group that receives $131 million out of the public treasury in order to keep the industry going. The article continues:

> These two are masters of innuendo. Mr. Fisher, in particular, is adept in the use of the ploy whereby he attempts to evade responsibility for what he says and tries to put the onus on somebody else. For instance, in charging the gold mines with "low grading" Mr. Fisher is cute enough to avoid making a direct accusation. He puts it in the mouth of other people by saying "every miner I have talked to . . . believes that low grading is going on."

I will repeat that every miner I have talked to thinks that low grading is going on. Last week I spoke to the electrical superintendent of a large mine. This man has worked in half a dozen large mines in northern Ontario. He says it is the easiest thing in the world for them to do.

An hon. Member: That is done to extend the life of the mine.

Mr. Fisher: I do not quarrel with that. I do not blame them for determining their ore grade. However, we should check to see that they are not low grading in the sense we mean. After all, when $131 million are being paid out of the public pocket we have every right to be suspicious. The editorial continues:

> Here's another example of the Fisher method of the false innuendo. Again, he tries to shift responsibility by saying, "the point was brought up by some people who correspond with me".

I took the case of one person who corresponded with me to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) and the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) will recall that I took up the case presented in another letter with his department. It related to this very matter. What is a member of parliament to do? The editorial goes on:

> This time he's concerned about the shareholders of the companies who get cost-aid. He says these companies take advantage of the act and yet never pay any dividends. The great example here, he says, is Little Long Lac. Now, is Mr. Fisher so ignorant of what goes on in his own riding that he doesn't know that the Little Long Lac mine closed seven years ago and, naturally, has not received cost-aid since. We think not. In fact, after having aired this bare-faced misstatement, Mr. Fisher later on reveals that he knows differently when he remarks that Little Long Lac receives cost-aid through some other subsidiaries.

This is simply a problem of semantics. I advanced the argument last year and again this year that Little Long Lac has become a large corporation, that is to say a management concern. The mine may have closed down seven years ago but it has built up a number of other mines which it manages in essence. One of these is the McLeod-Cockshutt mine. If you know anything about it, Mr. Speaker, you will be aware that it is a mine that is receiving cost-aid. It is in my constituency and a number of my constituents own stock in the mine. Since Little Long Lac took it over it has not paid a dividend. Before that dividends were paid regularly. The annual report of the company reveals no costs of exploration. The argument advanced by the management of Little Long Lac is that the shareholders really do not want the dividends but are interested in the value of the stock.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member during the course of his remarks but it is contrary to the rules to debate in this house with the editor of a newspaper outside the house and I believe that is exactly what the hon. member was doing. The hon. gentleman might have risen on a question of privilege in dealing with an editorial but he should not use that material as an exchange of opinion between himself and someone outside the house. I hope this will not stand as a precedent for debate.

Mr. Speaker: We had a similar point raised the other day. I think it is contrary to the rules of the house to introduce editorial opinion to support your argument but I am not sure it is a breach of the rules to refute opinions expressed outside the house. However, I shall look at the point the minister raises in case the hon. member who calls it ten o'clock wishes to pursue the editorial he has mentioned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: For tomorrow the first item will be No. 8 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister, which we have called to the attention of the house before, dealing with the tenure of office of judges. The second will be No. 9 on today's order paper, the motion in the name of the Minister of National Revenue to set up a select committee on broadcasting. The third item will be the bill we have just been considering having to do with the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. The fourth will be the second reading of Bill No. S-32, No. 1 on today's order paper, dealing with a bridge across the St. Lawrence river. If required, No. 5 will be No. 10 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance concerning amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the house leader indicate what we will be doing on Wednesday?

Mr. Churchill: If these legislative items proceed satisfactorily, on Wednesday we will go on with estimates starting with the continuation of the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration followed by post office and mines and technical surveys.

Mr. Chevrier: That is only in case we dispose of the items that have been named?

Mr. Churchill: I was thinking chiefly in terms of the setting up of a committee on broadcasting. Should that not be finished tomorrow we might carry on that debate on Wednesday, but we are hoping we will finish the five items I have mentioned.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN CHAIRMAN KHRUSHCHEV AND PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): First, Mr. Speaker, in order to assure that the house will have the latest information with regard to a letter written to me by Chairman Khrushchev and the reply, I wish to table the letter and the reply and, with the leave of the house, to have both printed as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to the printing of the tabled documents as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearson: Can the Prime Minister give us some indication of what the letter contains?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think the best procedure is for me to provide the hon. gentleman with copies. Then after perusal, possibly tomorrow, he might have some questions to ask respecting the exchange of correspondence. If that course is agreeable it will be followed.

[For correspondence referred to above see appendix]

STATEMENT ON FURTHER LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR SESSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): There are several matters to which I wish to refer. The first is this. I undertook to place before the house the general plan of the legislation to be introduced before this session ends.

The house, of course, is fully aware of the various items set forth in the speech from the throne on January 14, 1960. Generally speaking I think all the items referred to therein will have received the attention of the house before the session concludes, with one exception; that is the undertaking to bring in amendments to the Expropriation Act. The house will recall that an action was tried before Mr. Justice Thorson regarding the general field of expropriation, and that judgment laid open to perilous possibilities the expropriation proceedings which had been taken throughout the years. However, the Supreme Court of Canada reversed the judgment of Mr. Justice Thorson; therefore there is no immediate need at this session to proceed with the amendments to the Expropriation Act.

Now with respect to the matters yet to be dealt with; No. 1—and in numbering them in this way I do not, of course, undertake that they will be brought forward in this order—the bill of rights; No. 2, the act to set up the department of forestry; No. 3, the amendments to the Canada Elections Act; No. 4, the amendment to the Freight Rates Reduction Act made necessary by the probability that the royal commission on transportation will not have been able to report prior to the expiry date of the legislation now in effect, that date being July 31; No. 5, the Civil Service Act; No. 6, the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

In addition to these there are a number of matters of legislation now before the other place which will have to be dealt with here as well. There is the trade treaty with Russia; amendments to the Canada Shipping Act; amendments to the Criminal Code, and a bill respecting the international boundary. As I say, the four last named are now before the other place.

In general I think that covers the various matters which will be brought before the house this session in addition, of course, to such matters as are already on the order paper.

There is another matter on which the house desires information, and that has to do with the private bill on capital punishment introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). I am not going into the details of the discussion with regard thereto. I will, however, refer to one or two references in Hansard. On March 11, as reported on page 2012, a question was asked about what was going to be done in this connection. At that time the house leader said:

> The matter is under consideration, but I know the house is anxious to press on with some of the legislation that is on the order paper.

He added:

> This will not prevent subsequent consideration of the debate on capital punishment at a later date.

Then on March 21 the hon. member for Laurier asked me when the government intended to make arrangements for the resumption of the debate on the private bill concerning capital punishment now before the house. There was some discussion regarding certain statements made outside the house by hon. members, and my reply that day, as will be found on page 2252, was:

> At the present time the order paper contains a number of matters which require attention. When these matters have received consideration then, as the result of consultation among the house leader, the hon. gentleman and a representative of the C.C.F., a determination in this regard can be made.

While there were other references made on other occasions, I feel that those to which I have referred are sufficient to indicate a summary of the situation.

The interpretation given to the words I used in the house in connection with this matter was that a further day would be allowed or provided for. That being so, while there is much yet to be done, I feel the proper course to follow would be this. Consultation having taken place among the leader of the house, the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Assiniboia, if a motion made later on in the session to provide a private members' day were accepted by the house, then an opportunity would be provided to deal with this and other matters that are appropriate to a private members' day. In other words, the undertaking given is being carried out. The house will have an opportunity on a private members' day later in the session, when we have removed from the order paper many of the things which require to be done, to discuss the bill of the hon. member for York-Scarborough.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): We have reached June 14, and we began on January 14. The house has been in session now for five months and we have, on this five months' anniversary, received from the Prime Minister an indication of the work that remains to be done, including some important pieces of legislation which are not yet on the order paper. That is its own commentary on the manner in which the business of this house has been conducted.

May I mention first what the Prime Minister dealt with last. With regard to the private member's bill on capital punishment, the Prime Minister has indicated—and I have no quarrel whatever with the suggestion —that, if it is desired, a private members' day may be set aside on which this matter which has aroused so much interest in the country can be further discussed. I think the expression used by the Prime Minister was so that it could, if possible, be dealt with.

I do not know whether the Prime Minister had in mind using the expression "dealt with" coming to a decision by a vote of the house on this matter. If so, I am sure the Prime Minister will agree, as he has already indicated, that that decision can only be reached—in my view at least—if all those hon. members who wish to speak on this matter have had the same opportunity to do so as has been given to those who have already spoken. Perhaps, therefore, it will not be possible in a day to come to a decision on this matter, and possibly during the recess—if we do not run into the next session of parliament—the government may desire to give consideration to what action, if any, the government itself should take in a subsequent session.

So far as the business of the house is concerned, the Prime Minister has pointed out that there are seven or eight important pieces of legislation yet to be introduced, including a bill of rights. There are also, as I calculate, ten or eleven pieces of legislation in various stages of progress in the house at the present time. If these matters are to be given the consideration they deserve—and so far as we on this side of the house are concerned we will do our best to see that they get that kind of consideration—it is obvious that a good many weeks will be required before they can be dealt with. I am not complaining about that, but I think we should be quite aware of the situation. Consideration of all these items, some of which will require careful and long consideration, will surely mean that we cannot possibly finish the business of this house before the end of July.

Quite apart from the legislation, the list of which I have before me, including two or three new items the Prime Minister mentioned this morning, we have various committees sitting. Indeed, seven committees are meeting today and I believe ten committees met yesterday. This afternoon when we will presumably be discussing one of the most important subjects any Canadian parliament could discuss, the amendment of our constitution, there will be three committees meeting which will make it impossible for some hon. members to participate in that discussion. There is one important committee that has not yet even been set up, the committee on broadcasting. The committee considering the Civil Service Act amendments will require time to give these matters the consideration to which they are entitled. It is obvious that the work of this committee will take some time. There will be witnesses to be heard in the discussion of the amendments to the combines act. I hope that even in the light of the experience that has already taken place the defence expenditures committee will hear witnesses on that subject.

So far as the estimates are concerned we have finished one department, agriculture, except for the supplementaries. That is the only department of government the estimates of which have been concluded at the present time. I mention this so that no one will be in any doubt as to the amount of time that will be required this session to give the business of government the consideration to which it is entitled, and to carry on that business in a careful, methodical and efficient way.

In those circumstances we can look forward, I believe, to a very active and I hope constructive summer.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister outlined a very elaborate program that must be dealt with before the conclusion of this session. It has always seemed to me that it would help expedite the procedure during any session if we could have this kind of tabulation at the beginning so we would know at an early date the things that we would necessarily be dealing with during the session. As to a number of items, we have been uncertain whether the government was going to proceed with them or whether they would be dropped.

The Prime Minister has said that he is quite agreeable to having the debate on capital punishment come forward for a further day of debate. We in the C.C.F. would like to see this bill come to a vote, and we are quite prepared to give consideration at any time to a motion to provide for an additional day's debate on the bill to abolish capital punishment in the hope that a vote could be reached, and that the result of the vote would be to have the bill passed at this session.

I think the duty of the members of the House of Commons is to deal efficiently and carefully with the business as presented to the house. It is obvious from the list that has been given this morning and from the statement of the Leader of the Opposition that if there is no adjournment of this session, to be resumed at a later date, we shall be here for the summer. Now, a summer in Ottawa dealing with parliamentary duties puts many members of the House of Commons at a very great disadvantage. Many members have their families a long way from Ottawa; children are out of school during July and August, and this is the time when hon. members like to be with their families. Therefore it is a great sacrifice that members must make if the session continues.

Those of us who have had the experience of sitting in Ottawa during the summer months know that summer conditions in Ottawa, with the house meeting morning, afternoon and evening, to say the least are not conducive to the health of members of parliament. We feel that there is growing evidence to support the suggestion of the C.C.F. party that parliament would be enabled to deal more adequately with our legislation if we had a summer adjournment and came back later this year to conclude the remainder of the business of this session. However, with the Leader of the Opposition, we shall deal with each piece of legislation as it is presented to the house in a way that we think is in keeping with our duties.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank both hon. gentlemen for their ideas and the expression of their views. When the hon. member for Assiniboia says he could wish that such an elaborate program had been revealed earlier, I simply point out to him the fact that each and every portion of that program is set forth in the speech from the throne with the exception of the freight rates legislation, which could not have been anticipated in January last.

Mr. Pearson: The speech from the throne is not the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree with both hon. gentlemen that the proper responsibility of the House of Commons is to examine each piece of legislation carefully and exhaustively. All I can say in that regard is that I like parliament to be sitting, because it is very helpful to get the views of hon. members and to understand the thinking of Canadians as a whole. I think that is one of the reasons I suggested the setting up of a committee on rules, to the end that hon. members would be able, through that committee, to bring forward recommendations and suggestions which, without in any way limiting the first responsibility of the House of Commons for a careful examination, will assure efficient and effective discussion taking place without repetitious utterances which are not always synonymous with a careful examination.

Mr. Hellyer: Not even new rules would help a government like this one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know I had difficulty in controlling myself when the hon. member for Assiniboia was speaking, but I listened to his observations with attention because we have not heard from him lately. Naturally I listened with the fullest attention.

Mention was made of the number of committees, and certainly we have a large number of committees sitting. I think it could be said for the establishment of these committees, on a more extensive scale than ever before, that they have been effective and thorough and that the members of the various committees are entitled to the commendation of the house as a whole. I know it is difficult when important matters come before the house for committee members to be always present. But I hope, as I said earlier, that when such matters of great importance are before the house the committees, as a whole, would agree to the necessary measures of adjournment to the end that those members of the committees who wish to participate in those discussions would be given the opportunity to do so.

That is all I intend to say. I feel sure that if we apply ourselves with energy, without in any way diminishing or abdicating our responsibility, we shall be able, before this session concludes as a continuous session, to have dealt with all the matters to which reference has been made.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I wonder whether I might ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his remarks. I should like to refer particularly to his remark about liking parliament and his later remark about the committee work of the house. How does he reconcile his liking of parliament with the fact that he has so arranged the business that three very important committees, namely those on banking and commerce, agriculture and colonization and railways, canals and telegraph lines will be sitting today while the House of Commons itself is debating an amendment to our constitution, a most important matter in which many hon. members are very much interested? Yet they will be expected to attend committee hearings and miss the debate in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course the answer is obvious. The committees decide for themselves when they will sit.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: Did the defence expenditures committee decide for itself?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order; I suggest that further questions be reserved until orders of the day are called, which I shall do now, if there is nothing further under motions. The hon. member for Essex East.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Does the Prime Minister not recall saying that as Prime Minister and as leader of the house he would see to it that committee meetings were not held in a manner and at a time that would prevent members from discharging their responsibilities in this house? And if he recalls that, will he not agree that his answer to the hon. member for Ottawa West is not consistent with his earlier declaration?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The paraphrase by the hon. member of the answer I gave is one that I do not accept. I have no authority, as I pointed out, to interfere in any way with the committees. I expressed the hope that there would be, in no way, any interference and that committees would realize that when important matters arose in the house there would be justification for not sitting on such occasions. However, the determination of that matter is for the committees. I do not know of any objection that was raised—it has not been brought to my attention—to any sitting of a committee today, the date for this debate having been fixed last week, because such a sitting would in any way collide with the fact we have today a debate on an amendment to the constitution.

Mr. Robichaud: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker: I did raise an objection in the committee on mines and technical surveys yesterday.

[Later:]

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a reference he made earlier to the business of the house, and in particular to a statement or commitment he gave to the house on February 13, 1959, when he said this, as reported on page 990 of Hansard:

> I for one will say unequivocally that if at any time there is any action taken that would deny members of the opposition a fair opportunity of discharging their responsibility—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member is endeavouring rather to debate the question than to ask a question. If he has a question asking for information of fact and can put it, he is in order.

Mr. McIlraith: My question is as to the conduct of the business of the house with particular reference to today's business, and I think that is an appropriate subject.

Mr. Speaker: It would be appropriate if the hon. member asked the question without reading from Hansard.

Mr. McIlraith: Then I will put my question in this way. Why will the Prime Minister and the leader of this house not honour the commitment he gave—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is an argumentative one and does not seem to me to be appropriate either to the business of the house or to orders of the day.

Mr. McIlraith: Then, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to carry out the commitment he gave to the house on February 13, 1959, as reported on page 990 of Hansard and repeated on February 25, 1960, as reported on page 1435 of Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my commitments are carried out. The statement which I made then I do not alter in any way, except that I remember how much I was criticized for having made it. What I meant to convey, and still do, was that if at any time there is brought to my attention any unfairness in so far as a meeting of a committee is concerned which denies to hon. members of this house their full opportunity to be in this house, I shall, without in any way interfering, which I have no right to do, certainly bring to the attention of the committee concerned the fact that injustice should not be allowed. There has not been any injustice to anyone as far as I am informed.

Mr. McIlraith: In the light of the Prime Minister's answer to my earlier question, will he now arrange to have it made possible for hon. members of this house to be present for the debate on the amendment of the constitution today?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, again I say that I have no power to do that. If there has been any injustice to anyone by reason of meetings of committees taking place and denying hon. members the opportunity to be in the house to participate in those matters which concern them, I am sure the committees will assure and maintain the right of members to that opportunity.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

TRAINING PAMPHLET NO. 76—INQUIRY AS TO UNITED STATES INFLUENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to the major general, the Minister of National Defence. In view of the article in this morning's Globe and Mail entitled "Begone Drab Nights, R.C.A.F. Issues 118-Page Guide to Fun and Games", which deals with Royal Canadian Air Force pamphlet No. 76 and such games as blindfolded handshakers, barnyard din, the hot-rod race, etc., and in view of the recent publication of a similar pamphlet by the United States armed forces, would the minister inform the house whether the issuance of this pamphlet indicates the increasing influence of the United States air force over the training, procedures and practices of the Royal Canadian Air Force?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is a firm and emphatic denial. There is no increasing influence over the Royal Canadian Air Force by the United States air force. It might interest the hon. gentleman to know that this pamphlet was published in 1958. It is practically a rewording of a similar booklet which was published by the director of physical education and recreation of the Manitoba department of health and welfare. If the United States air force has recently issued a publication, as suggested by the hon. member, based on this pamphlet, then we are very pleased to co-operate with the United States air force.

Mr. Herridge: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's concluding remarks, in which he said that the United States armed forces have recently published a pamphlet similar to ours, would the minister table pamphlet No. 76 in order that we may see whether it contains similar instructions on how to serve drinks and how to wash the dog?

PUBLIC SERVICE

POSTAL EMPLOYEES—REPORTED DISSATISFACTION WITH RECENT SALARY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): May I ask a question of the Postmaster General. Is the Postmaster General aware that the Canadian postal employees association, representing 10,000 postal workers, is totally dissatisfied with the latest salary adjustments, according to reports in yesterday's newspaper? If so, does he intend satisfying these workers as he promised to do when he was a little, teeny-weeny member of parliament?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): The newspaper clipping from which the hon. member got his information, a copy of which he sent to me just a moment ago, indicates that this information is drawn from a letter written by this association to the Prime Minister. My job is to deliver the Prime Minister's mail, not to read it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF QUEEN'S PRINTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister put on the government agenda the nomination of the Queen's printer before the end of the session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see that the hon. member has now widened his field of operations, and I will just let him in on a secret. The answer is in the affirmative.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REPORTED PROPOSAL FOR SUMMIT CONFERENCE OF MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he will confirm or otherwise a report in this morning's press that the secretary general of NATO is coming to Ottawa to discuss with the Prime Minister a proposed summit conference of NATO members?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I noticed that report, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Spaak is coming to Ottawa to discuss in general problems in connection with NATO, a system of consultation which the hon. member knows was a regular course during the days he occupied the position of secretary of state for external affairs and which has been extended in the last couple of years under this administration. He comes here for the purpose of discussing those matters which are of interest to the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. In the course of those discussions I am sure there will be references and representations regarding the extension of the field of consultation. I shall certainly bring to his attention what I believe is the need, preceded by the necessary and complete discussion among the experts and the officials, for a NATO meeting of heads of state.

REPORTED CLOSING OF DEPARTMENTAL PRESS OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister confirm the report appearing in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the press office in the Department of External Affairs has been closed? If so, what arrangements, if any, are being made to take over the duties formerly provided by this office?

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There has been a minor adjustment in this branch of the department, but that adjustment makes no change in the furnishing of information.

Mr. Chevrier: I have a supplementary question. The report indicates that Mr. Arthur Blanchette will no longer be authorized to answer reporters' inquiries, and that henceforth reporters' questions will be answered by the offices of external affairs minister Howard Green and Prime Minister John Diefenbaker. The supplementary question is this. Are these two offices being linked together in so far as this press bureau is concerned?

Mr. Green: That does not mean any real change. Statements with regard to policy have not been made by this office for a long time.

DISARMAMENT—STATEMENTS RESPECTING POSITION OF WESTERN GROUP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement attributed to General Burns, as reported in the New York Times on Sunday last, and also the statement attributed to Mr. Moch, the delegate for France, yesterday in the session of the disarmament conference, that no member of the western group would take an independent position in the matter of disarmament, would the minister make a statement regarding those observations and more particularly on the discussions at the disarmament conference itself?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Perhaps that matter could be best dealt with tomorrow when we are dealing with the correspondence which was tabled today.

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—MEETING WITH WESTERN FARM ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house what progress has been made in arranging a meeting between the government and the liaison committee of western farm organizations to discuss western farm income deficiency?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think the question would be more appropriately answered by the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I have nothing definite I can tell the house at the present moment on that matter.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether negotiations are taking place for a meeting at an early date, as indicated by the Prime Minister on June 9?

Mr. Harkness: No negotiations are taking place. Several of the separate member organizations of the western liaison committee have written asking for this meeting. A date has not yet been set for it.

Mr. Argue: I have a further supplementary question. Is the government prepared to meet the liaison committee?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: In view of the previous answer it seems to me that the question becomes hypothetical.

Mr. Argue: There is no information in the minister's answer as to whether the government is prepared to meet the delegation, and the Prime Minister said this was the case.

Mr. Harkness: I think it has been made clear in this house on several occasions in the past, Mr. Speaker, that the government is willing to meet organizations of this sort at any appropriate time when the matter can be arranged and any useful discussion can be held.

HOUSING

NORTHERN ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR FURTHER LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. It arises out of a telegram I have received from the home builders association in an area in northern Ontario. I presume the minister has received a similar telegram. In view of the fact that only six loans have been made since January 1, and the fact that unemployment is considered to amount to 50 per cent in the building trades, will the minister consider making home loans available immediately so these may bring about a certain amount of relief from the present condition?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I want to thank the hon. member for this question and to assure him that the matter of loans is under our constant consideration, particularly in his area. If any announcement can be made I assure the house that it will be made.

Mr. Godin: I have a supplementary question. Owing to the fact that if the parade of homes is to be held in the first week of September the homes should be started now, would the minister care to tell the house the decision before the end of the week?

Mr. Walker: I make the same answer that I made to the first question, Mr. Speaker.

SUDBURY—REPORTED REFUSAL OF INSURANCE COMPANY LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Following correspondence received by me from the minister advising that a certain insurance company is prepared to lend money for building purposes, will he comment on a telegram received by the building trades council in Sudbury to the effect that no loans by the Canada Life Assurance Company have been considered in this area?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I will be happy to discuss this matter with the hon. member at any time to suit his convenience.

CRIMINAL LAW

OBSCENE LITERATURE—JUDICIAL DECISION RESPECTING "LADY CHATTERLEY'S LOVER"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. It stems from the decision of a Quebec judge that the book "Lady Chatterley's Lover" is obscene, a decision based upon the 1959 change in the Criminal Code. Has this decision the effect of banning the book throughout all of Canada as well? If not, by what stages may such a ban come into effect?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): That is too complicated a question to answer on the orders of the day, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member will look up the debate we had on this matter last year I think he will find that the matter was discussed in detail there, and will see the answer to the question he has asked.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Does the minister consider himself to be an expert on what constitutes obscene literature?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker. I leave that distinguished position to my friend the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL GRANT TO ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question on this agreeable and beautiful day. In view of the fact that the federal-provincial committee, sometimes known as the ministers' seminar or study group, met yesterday, and that the distinguished premier of Ontario is now visiting Ottawa—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot believe that applause is for me, Mr. Speaker. In view of all these things, may I ask the minister if he is in a position to state whether the federal proposals to the provinces will provide for the additional $100 million so frequently asked of this government by the distinguished premier of Ontario?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I am happy, Mr. Speaker, to say that I am in a position to confirm the fact that the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal questions met in this city yesterday and is still meeting today. I expect their meeting will conclude this afternoon. I am also happy to be in a position to confirm the fact that the premier of Ontario is visiting Ottawa today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have a supplementary question. I am sure the minister has forgotten what the question was. Will he indicate, while the premier of Ontario is in Ottawa, whether we have approached the time when he may expect some answers to his request for this additional sum of money from the federal government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am happy to be in a position to confirm the fact that the federal-provincial conference of June 25, 26 and 27 is approaching.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): June?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): July.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1958-59 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister report to the house the results of his conversation with the Canadian wheat board yesterday as to the amount of the final payment on last year's crop, and as to when this final payment will be made?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): If everything is settled satisfactorily an announcement will be made in the house tomorrow dealing with the final payment and the time at which the cheques will be issued.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—REPORTED THREAT TO DISPOSSESS KENNETH PLAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is in a position to answer the question I asked her about the locatee on the Sarnia Indian reserve?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will have an answer for the hon. member tomorrow. I received an answer but I did not think there was sufficient information in it, and I intend giving the hon. member a full answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope that when the hon. lady answers she will be able to assure the house—and I am asking now if she can—that no locatee will be dispossessed until he is fully paid.

JUDGES

AMENDMENT TO BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT—ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That a humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following words:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the commons of Canada in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that you may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to be expressed as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Act, 1867.

Whereas the Senate and commons of Canada in parliament assembled have submitted addresses to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. Section ninety nine of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"99. (1) Subject to subsection two of this section, the judges of the superior, district and county courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

(2) A judge of a superior, district or county court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age."

2. This act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1960, and the British North America Act, 1867 to 1952, and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960.

3. This act shall come into force on the first day of September nineteen hundred and sixty.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that a humble address be presented to Her Majesty I wish to summarize the nature of the address and point out at once that later on during the course of this debate, which I trust will be carried on by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), an amendment will be asked of the house in respect to the last paragraph, section 99, subsection 3, to which I will make detailed reference in a moment.

I begin by pointing out that section 99 now reads as follows:

—the judges of the superior, district and county courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Amendment to B.N.A. Act

The change, of course, is in respect to those courts mentioned—superior, district and county courts—to the effect that judges of those courts shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of 75 years or upon the coming into force of the section if at that time they have already attained that age.

I wish to point out immediately that there is nothing unusual in the course being followed in connection with this address. In 1906, in the revised statutes, legislation respecting judges of the Supreme Court of Canada provided for no retirement age. Then in 1927 an amendment was made to the Supreme Court Act and also to the Exchequer Court Act which in effect was similar to the one being requested of the house today. As hon. members know, in the original constitution of those courts there was no provision for retirement on the basis of age, and on March 25, 1927, an amendment was brought before the House of Commons which read:

Provided that each judge whether heretofore appointed or hereafter to be appointed shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of 75 years, or immediately, if he has already attained that age.

I feel that this legislation which we now introduce is exactly on a par with the legislation which was introduced in 1927 amending the Supreme Court Act. There was some discussion in the House of Commons at that time regarding the applicability of the legislation to existent judges, but it was answered by the then minister of justice. When the legislation found its way to the other place there was no discussion there of any consequence. The motion in the Senate was moved by Right Hon. Raoul Dandurand. There was some question raised by one of the opposition senators to the effect that the legislation applied to existent judges. He said he himself took no objection whatever, but there were one or two of his colleagues who would like to discuss the matter. However, they never did discuss it, and two days later the legislation was passed and came into effect bringing about a change respecting the two highest courts in the country which is now asked for in so far as the courts covered by this address are concerned.

I realize that it is always a matter of interest that we in Canada, an independent country within the commonwealth, have not yet secured the right to amend our own constitution. Endeavours have been made throughout the years; the subject has been discussed over and over again. To me it is a political paradox and inconsistent with Canada's status that Canada should be required to secure its amendments to the constitution, other than those amendments which come within the exclusive authority and jurisdiction of the federal parliament, by an address being taken to the mother of parliaments at Westminster. But we have no other course open to us, for up to the present time it has been found difficult if not impossible to secure agreement with the provinces as to the means whereby the authority to amend Canada's constitution shall be vested in the parliament of Canada with the approval or co-operation of the provinces as determined by agreement.

For that reason—and it is not because the United Kingdom parliament is anxious to retain its power or its authority—the change has not been made. I reiterate, it is because Canadians have been unable to agree on a method of amendment that would be generally acceptable. Indeed, in so far as the other countries of the commonwealth are concerned—the British commonwealth or the old commonwealth, whichever term you choose to use—Canada is the only country which has no provision made for the amendment of its own constitution.

To date there have been 17 occasions since 1867 when amendments to the British North America Act have been made. The question as to whether the consent of the provinces is or is not requisite does not have any application to the present motion, for all the provinces have agreed on the amendment. Indeed, each and every one of them has given complete support to the provision that the judges of these courts—the judges of the superior, district and county courts—should retire at the age of 75 years. Incidentally, all parts of the world which recognize the parliamentary and judical system have accepted this age as an appropriate one at which judges should retire.

I have mentioned the various occasions upon which this procedure has been used, and I think it would be of interest that I should refer to them in general. Each and all of the amendments to date have been as the result of an address or resolution, either joint or individual, passed by both houses, except in 1878, at which time an amendment was made providing for parliament's right to pass laws to examine witnesses and in 1895 when an amendment was passed to provide for the removal of doubts as to the right of parliament to set up the office of deputy speaker.

In so far as the amendment itself is concerned, I have already mentioned the fact that this is similar in nature to the one that was accepted in 1927 under the administration of Right Hon. Mackenzie King; and the fact that the suggestion of retirement at 75 has been accepted by all the attorneys general is a fairly effective answer to any criticism that might be made, representative as these provincial governments are of every variety of Canadian political thought. Indeed, the only Liberal government is the government of Newfoundland. I am sure that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), being a constitutional authority in his own right, will be much impressed in considering this matter and the attitude he will take on it by the fact that a letter from the attorney general of that province addressed to the Minister of Justice and incidentally concluding with the words "kindest regards"—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But the letter is addressed to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —reads as follows:

> The government of Newfoundland has no objection to the government of Canada requesting an amendment to the British North America Act—providing for the compulsory retirement of judges of the superior, county and district courts in each province on reaching the age of 75 years.

The letter in question appears in Votes and Proceedings of February 16, 1960.

I mentioned a moment ago the various motions that had been made for amendments to the British North America Act through the years, and for the purpose of the record I will place on Hansard the several amendments.

1. The amendment of 1871 was designed to remove doubts about the competence of the Canadian parliament to establish new provinces in the territories.

2. The amendment of 1875. In 1873 the Canadian parliament passed an act providing for the examination of witnesses on oath by committees of the Senate and House of Commons and the constitutionality of such an act was in question; hence the amendment.

3. The amendment of 1886. The purpose of this act was to empower the parliament of Canada to provide from time to time for the representation of the territories in the Senate and House of Commons.

4. The Canada (Ontario Boundary) Act of 1889, the object of which was to determine the boundaries of the province of Ontario in certain particulars.

5. The Canadian Speaker (Appointment of Deputy) Act of 1895 to which I have already made reference.

6. The amendment of 1907 to the British North America Act to remedy the difficulties involved in the application of section 118 of the British North America Act, which determined the amount of federal subsidies to the provinces.

7. The amendment of 1915, the object of which was to recast the composition of the Senate and to provide that a province should always be entitled to a minimum number of members in the House of Commons equal to the number of senators representing that province.

8. The amendment of 1916, the object of which was to lengthen the term of the existing parliament for one year in order to avoid an election at a critical stage of the war.

9. The amendment of 1930 to transfer the resources of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to those provinces.

10. The passing of the statute of Westminster in 1931 constituted in effect an amendment to the British North America Act particularly with reference to the application of the colonial laws validity act.

11. The amendment of 1940. By this act the authority to legislate on unemployment insurance was transferred from provincial to federal jurisdiction. This was a case in which all nine provinces assented to the proposed constitutional amendment.

12. The amendment of 1943. The object of this act was to suspend until after the war the operation of the constitutional provisions requiring that the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons be readjusted on the basis of the census of 1941. This was a very interesting amendment in so far as the reaction of the province of Quebec was concerned. The legislative assembly of Quebec unanimously protested against the proposal and requested the federal authorities to modify their position.

13. The amendment of 1946. The object of this act was to change the system of representation in the House of Commons. In this case there was no consultation with the provincial governments. This gave rise to some controversy. In the meantime, between 1943 and 1946, if I remember correctly, there had been a change in the administration in the province of Quebec. The provincial government again protested. The government of Mr. Mackenzie King contended that since the jurisdiction given to the federal parliament over certain matters is exclusive, no body other than parliament is competent under the constitution to decide on amending the constitutional rules which govern the exercise of that jurisdiction.

14. The amendment of 1949. The object of this act was to bring Newfoundland into confederation. Arguments were advanced at that time. The Progressive Conservative opposition contended that the constitution should not be varied in any important way except by consultation with the provinces, but that did not command the support of parliament and the address was passed.

15. The amending act of 1949. The object of this act was to enact a new section 91 (1) which gives power to the federal parliament to amend the constitution of Canada except in a number of matters concerning provincial sovereignty or minority rights and also concerning certain rights of the House of Commons. At that time protests were made by the premier of Quebec and the premier of Alberta against the proposed unilateral action of the federal parliament and requesting that the government resolution be held in abeyance until a proposed constitutional conference could meet. The premier of Ontario expressed doubt, and I quote—> —as to the advisability of dealing with the matter without first attempting general agreement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was not able to follow the beginning. What was the particular resolution involved?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was the all-comprehensive amendment that dealt with the right of the parliament of Canada to pass any amendments to the constitution which came exclusively within the federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which did not come within provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not the same thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; the hon. gentleman puts it in the negative form. I presume that putting it that way is more appropriate.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the language of the statute.

Mr. Diefenbaker: For the sake of accuracy I agree with the hon. gentleman on this occasion.

Mr. Pickersgill: It does not mean the same thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I mentioned what the attitude was. In any event, there was a vote in the house on the question. The amendment of the Conservative opposition at that time was that action should be deferred on the resolution until the proposed constitutional conference could deal with the whole problem of amending procedure, and that was negatived.

Then in 1951, following the federal-provincial conference held in December, 1950, it was decided to amend the British North America Act, by adding a section, 94 A, giving to the parliament of Canada the power to make laws in relation to old age pensions, provided that those laws would not affect the operation of any law, present or future, of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions. In this case there was unanimous consent on the part of all the provinces.

In 1952 there was a further amendment to provide for the readjustment of representation in the House of Commons, establishing a floor whereby the representation of any province would not fall by any more than 15 per cent in any one adjustment; subject, however, to the qualification that the rule would not work out in such a manner that the representation of a province with a smaller population would be greater than that of a province with a larger population. To that the Progressive Conservative opposition presented an amendment requesting previous consultation with the provinces with regard to the readjustment of representation, but the views of the opposition did not command the support of the house and were voted down by a vote of 121 to 27.

These are the amendments to date which have come before parliament in the 93 years since confederation. In so far as the merits of the measure are concerned, my learned and honourable colleague the Minister of Justice, will deal with those factors in detail, and also carry on the debate throughout its course.

I trust that the measure will appeal to the house. The judiciary represents the hard basis of freedom, and above everything else it must be assured that it shall operate as efficiently and effectively as it does honestly and objectively. The judiciary of Canada, of all the courts, have never been subject to challenge. Its inviolability is accepted by all. The assurance that our courts have at all times justice as their objective is recognized and accepted by all Canadians. The reason for the amendment is simply the fact that experience has shown that, while there are exceptions, when one attains the age of 75 in the judicial field it is an appropriate time and anniversary for retirement.

I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that there was one change in the resolution that the house would be asked to accept. Clause 99 subclause 3 reads:

> This act shall come into force on the first day of September nineteen hundred and sixty.

My colleague the Minister of Justice will move an amendment whenever his opportunity to speak comes, to change the date to the first day of March, 1961. The reasons which I advance in support of the change are, first, that when the resolution was placed on the order paper it was thought that it might be found possible to deal with it at an earlier time in the session, thereby making it appropriate to have the effective date September 1. This is an address to Her Majesty, praying that she will cause legislation to be enacted by the United Kingdom parliament, and it is not desirable that there be in the terms of such an address any limitation on time which could have the appearance of putting pressure on the sovereign to whom the prayer is addressed, or to the United Kingdom parliament which will be asked to deal with it.

Second, there are a number of adjustments which will have to be made at the time the legislation becomes effective. Parliament is being asked in other legislation, notice of which has been given in a resolution now before the house, to make changes in the pension provision affecting all judges, including those whose retirement becomes automatic by virtue of their reaching, or having reached, the age of 75. It seems appropriate, especially in dealing with the judiciary, that time be given to consider the nature and effect of such changes, and without there being any appearance of undue haste.

In view, therefore, of the fact that this resolution and the concurrent legislation are not being dealt with until some months after the speech from the throne, it is hoped that the house will agree to extend the period a further six months, and the clause will then read:

> This act shall come into force on the first day of March nineteen hundred and sixty one.

Sir, I think that is all I have to say with regard to this motion for an address. My hope is that it will commend itself to the house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Prime Minister has indicated—and I am not complaining about it—that this resolution will be further explained by the Minister of Justice. In view of that, perhaps the house would agree to have the Minister of Justice carry on now so that we can get the complete case for the proposal before we discuss it. We on this side would like to have the Minister of Justice follow the Prime Minister immediately.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No doubt there will be arguments raised and questions asked; and without in any way trying to press the Leader of the Opposition to give the house the benefit of his views, I feel that after he has expressed his views and after any other hon. members have done the same, then the Minister of Justice will be able to answer the arguments that have been raised or the questions propounded.

Mr. Pearson: I am quite happy naturally, Mr. Speaker, to fall into the normal procedure which has been mentioned by the Prime Minister. If the Minister of Justice, when he speaks, makes some of my observations unnecessary, then perhaps I shall not be accused of that repetitious irrelevancy which has been mentioned already this morning.

May I say at the very beginning that so far as the amendments to this address are concerned that have been proposed by the Prime Minister this morning, they are non-contentious, as I understand them. They are no doubt inevitable because of the delay in dealing with this matter in this House of Commons. It would not be possible, perhaps, to have all the necessary action taken here and in Westminster by the first day of September, 1960; therefore the change from that date to the first day of March, 1961, seems to me to be necessary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that there can be nothing much more important that can come before this house than a resolution which in effect, if it is adopted, amends our constitutional changes. This possibility could care in a matter of this kind because we are asking another parliament to take this action for us, for reasons which the Prime Minister explained this morning but which do not, as I understand the situation, cover all the provisions of this particular address.

However, I will come to that later. The necessity for special care and special consideration is made the greater because at this time, as the Prime Minister pointed out, we have at least the right, by action of the Canadian government, to amend our own constitution in respect of matters which are not exclusively within provincial jurisdiction; to that degree the amendment of our constitution has been cleared up, as the Prime Minister pointed out. There is no difficulty, of course, about matters which are exclusively provincial in character. There has been difficulty which up to the present has been insurmountable in respect of matters between those two extremes, matters which are of concern and interest and which fall in part within the jurisdiction of both federal and provincial governments.

Unfortunately over the years we have not been able to make any progress or very little progress in this field, so that the situation today is that this country of ours, which is a free and independent nation, this federal state, is still required to go to another parliament for action in respect of the amending of its own constitution in many important respects. Until we can reach agreement on this matter we will never be able to talk with the conviction with which we would like to talk about the sovereignty and independence of our country in these matters. I know that we have adopted this course by our own action, of our own free will. There is no question of any other jurisdiction imposing its will upon us.

As a matter of fact, our inability in this country to solve this constitutional problem is becoming more and more an embarrassment to the United Kingdom parliament itself. That parliament has already indicated in recent years that it would be very happy indeed to get rid of this responsibility, even if it is only, as I suppose it is now, a technical responsibility. The difficulty, of course, lies in the nature of our federal constitution; because I think we all agree in this house—I hope we all agree—that there can be no procedure for amending our own constitution which would be acceptable in Canada which does not preserve inviolate the rights of every province.

There can be no other solution found which would be acceptable. But sometimes we forget that the implication of this stand—and it is the only proper stand as I see it that we can take—might mean that a situation could arise where a provincial government, supported perhaps in the last election by not more than 25,000 or 30,000 Canadian electors, would have a veto power over certain constitutional changes. This possibility could arise because every province would have the same right as every other province in a matter which concerned all provinces. I do not see what other principle could be adopted if the matter concerned every province. This is the price we pay for our federal system.

We have managed to work it fairly successfully up to the present, but it does, in principle at least, imply a certain rigidity which attaches, I suppose to every federal structure and which might create its own difficulties if it is not effectively managed. When I use the word "managed" I do not mean managed in a way which would interfere in any way with the rights of any particular province. The Prime Minister has made quite a point of the fact that the Minister of Justice in respect of this particular amendment, has consulted every provincial government, and that is on the record in Hansard.

Now, the care and consideration which would naturally be required in respect to any amendment to the constitution is all the greater, and I think should be all the greater, for this particular government because of words the Prime Minister used earlier in this session, when he said as recorded on page 65 of Hansard:

> Here at this session of parliament, in order to secure an amendment to our constitution on a matter that is of national importance affecting the jurisdiction of both the federal and provincial parliaments and legislatures of our country, it is still necessary for us to seek an amendment from the parliament in the United Kingdom. My hope is that the time will not be too long delayed when as a result of an agreement between the federal and provincial authorities we will arrive at a point where this particular phase will be eliminated, to the end that we will be able within our own country to arrive at a basis for the amendment of our constitution agreeable to all and within the constitutional limitations of sections 91 and 92.

I think every member of this house will echo that hope, and add the hope that progress might be made in the solution of this problem. But in view of the situation that confronts us today, and the necessity of going to another parliament for an amendment, it seems to me that unless there is urgent need for such an amendment we should not ask the parliament at Westminster to discharge what is after all, in effect if not in law, our own responsibility in Canada. Even when there is no possible doubt about the matter being one that requires a British rather than a Canadian parliamentary decision, or a British decision in addition to a Canadian parliamentary decision, we should be careful.

The first question that occurs to me with regard to this address, Mr. Speaker, is whether there is any urgency about this matter, quite apart from the question of its desirability. I suggest that the Prime Minister has not made out any case for urgency. Indeed, a look at the resolution will indicate why it would not be easy to do so. This resolution seeks the adoption of an address to be presented to Her Majesty praying that she be pleased to cause to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom a measure to amend the British North America Act by repealing the present section 99 and replacing it with a new section which would, if it became law, contain two paragraphs which would read as follows, and I am not quoting from the address. The new section 99(1) would read as follows:

99. (1) Subject to subsection two of this section, the judges of the superior, district and county courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Subsection 2 of the new section 99 would read as follows:

(2) A judge of a superior, district or county court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age.

It is clear, then, that three changes are proposed in this resolution which, if carried and if action were taken in Great Britain, would amend our constitution. These three changes are as follows:

1. To provide, by an amendment to the B.N.A. Act, for the compulsory retirement of judges of the superior courts at the age of 75 years.

2. To add a provision to the British North America Act to the effect that judges of district and county courts shall be removable only on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

3. To fix in the constitution, by a provision in the British North America Act, the age of compulsory retirement of judges of district and county courts.

I should like to deal with each one of these changes separately. The first is the provision for the retirement of superior court judges, that is to say judges of the superior or supreme courts of the various provinces, including appeal courts. All such judges now hold office during good behaviour, that is to say, for life; and they do so, of course, because section 99 of the British North America Act, which it is now proposed to change, provides expressly as follows:

99. The judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

By this resolution the government is now proposing that all these judges of superior courts, without distinction, shall compulsorily retire at the age of 75 years. The proposed amendment does not say, as it might have said, that judges of the superior courts hereafter appointed shall cease to hold office when they attain the age of 75 years. Indeed, that was the course that was followed in the United Kingdom parliament in 1959, last year, in an amendment to the judicial pensions bill which applied only to judges hereafter appointed. That was the course that was followed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Fulton: They had the option to come under it.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, but it did not apply to existing judges. As I understand this British amendment—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—it did not prejudice the financial position of any judge appointed before the act was passed. This resolution is different, however. To all the judges now in office in these courts it says, "Although you were appointed for life, and although you accepted the appointment on that understanding, the government is proposing that these conditions should be altered and therefore you will now retire when you reach 75 years of age, even though you are still capable of performing the duties of your office".

We should realize that no amendment of the British North America Act is required in order to bring about the compulsory retirement of judges who are incapable of fulfilling their duties, whether or not they have attained the age of 75 years. The Judges Act makes this fact perfectly clear in section 31, which gives to the Minister of Justice the means of bringing about the retirement of any judge, whatever his age, who has become "incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office by reason of age or infirmity".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the Leader of the Opposition allow a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have looked into the matter, and I did not find any case in which this power had ever been used or exercised. Has he located any?

Mr. Pearson: No, I have not located any. In the case of superior court judges I have not found any cases. However, I must say I have not made any searching examination. No doubt the Minister of Justice has done so.

Mr. Fulton: I do not think there ever was one.

Mr. Pearson: Irrespective of that consideration, Mr. Speaker, what this amendment really seeks, I repeat, so far as those who are now in office are concerned, is the summary removal of superior court judges over 75 years of age—if the amendment is carried —on March 1, 1961, even though they are not necessarily incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of their office. That is what the present amendment boils down to so far as the present superior court judges are concerned.

The Prime Minister himself has given us no facts, or very little to go on, that would justify, in our view, the action the government desires this parliament to take and desires the parliament of Westminster to take in respect of superior court judges who are now in office. I should like to say at once, however, that I am not objecting to 75 years as the retiring age for superior court judges. I have read the discussions on this matter that have taken place in the past. The Prime Minister referred to some of them. We have had great service in this country from judges over 75 years of age. However, I think there is a great deal to be said for abolishing life appointments of this kind and for setting an age limit, if you like to call it that, of 75 years. If this proposed amendment applied only to judges hereafter appointed, we on this side would not quarrel with this part of it at all.

But of course, as I have just said, this resolution goes much further. It turns out of office on March 1, 1961 all judges of these courts who have attained the age of 75 years. That, in our view, if I may use the words of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett on a similar occasion when there was discussion of this question, involves a breach of the contract between the individual who holds office at the present time and the state, because his patent of office declares that he shall hold office during life or good behaviour.

Those who accepted appointments to the superior courts, many of them no doubt at very considerable financial sacrifice, undoubtedly did so on the understanding that so long as they were able to carry out the duties for which they were appointed they would continue to hold judicial office.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman say whether the statement of Mr. Bennett was accepted by the Mackenzie King government?

Mr. Pearson: No, it was not. I am coming back to that, and I am glad the Prime Minister has brought it to my attention. Mr. Bennett's views were not accepted at that time, but I shall be glad to point out that in a subsequent session the government realized that perhaps it had gone too far in this matter and took steps to rectify the situation in so far as existing judges were concerned.

Judges of the superior court at that time had every reason to believe that the terms upon which they accepted office, which were set forth with such clarity in the British North America Act itself and which therefore gave those terms a special constitutional sanctity, would be maintained, or at least would not be changed unilaterally in this way. But now these judges are to be told that despite the formal declaration of their patent of office, which was based on an express provision of our constitution, they will after a certain date, having attained 75 years of age, cease to be judges.

Now I come to the point which the Prime Minister mentioned about the precedent I cited, in so far as I was quoting Mr. Bennett as a precedent. I fully realize that in 1927—the Prime Minister mentioned this himself—the parliament of Canada provided for the compulsory retirement at the age of 75 years of judges of the supreme court of Canada and of the exchequer court, even though appointed during good behaviour. That action by parliament was within the constitution and it was done—but as it cannot be done in this case—by legislation of the Canadian parliament. It was, however, as I have indicated, very strongly attacked by Mr. Cahan, who called it a serious breach of contract, and by Mr. Bennett. I would like to read what Mr. Bennett said about it, because it was Mr. Bennett's words and the attitude taken by the opposition at that time that were probably responsible for subsequent legislation which rectified the situation about which

Mr. Bennett and Mr. Cahan had been particularly complaining. Mr. Bennett said in 1927, as reported on page 1556 of Hansard for that year:

> —it will be remembered that under the British North America Act a judge is appointed during good behaviour or for life and when his commission is issued one of the terms of the commission is that very provision that he should hold office during good behaviour or life.

Then later he said:

> I think we must have regard to the terms and conditions under which the original contract was made... although it may seem out of the ordinary that a judge should draw full salary when he is retired compulsorily, nevertheless good faith and morals, in my judgment, impose upon us that obligation and it is an obligation which we should not lightly disregard.

Finally he said:

> —I do not believe that the Canadian people would approve of our departing from the general principle that the government must—as in times past—have respect for the sanctity of a contract made between a servant of the crown when he entered the employment of the state...
> If this bill applied only to future appointments, it would not be so objectionable.

The minister of justice of that day, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, at first did not accept this view, and the government proceeded to put the bill through. It was passed and compulsory retirement of the supreme court and exchequer court judges at age 75 was brought into effect. Later legislation was introduced, as the Minister of Justice no doubt knows, which provided that all judges who were affected by the 1927 legislation should be granted an annuity equal to their full salary at the time of retirement, and therefore no judge from that time on—I think it was in 1929 or 1930 that the change was made—sufferred in a financial way from that legislation.

Notwithstanding the stand taken especially by Mr. Bennett and Mr. Cahan, and the Conservative opposition in 1927, in 1933 the solicitor general of a Conservative administration, Hon. Maurice Dupre, introduced legislation which attempted to do by indirection what his party had previously condemned when they were in opposition, namely to force judges of the superior courts to retire at age 75; not by direct action such as we have before us today, but by introducing a provision which would have reduced their salaries when they reached age 75, thus perhaps making it desirable for them to retire at that age.

That legislation was introduced by the Conservative government of that time, and Mr. King and Mr. Lapointe, among others, took very strong exception to that particular bill. It was passed, however, in the House of Commons but was killed in the Senate, notwithstanding an amendment moved by Mr. Jacobs, I think it was, to take the word "hereafter" out of the bill.

So, Mr. Speaker, we now have the situation that if this resolution is passed and this address is acted upon we will have a breach of contract with superior court judges. Because of that fact it is our duty to see that these new provisions regarding compulsory retirement should be made applicable only to those who are to be appointed hereafter as judges of superior courts. Knowing beforehand this limitation upon their tenure of office, those who are invited to become judges in the future can accept or refuse on the basis of those terms, and they would have no complaint if this action were taken.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: At the luncheon recess I was discussing the effect of his resolution on the tenure of office of judges of superior courts, and I was pointing out that if the resolution leads to an amendment of the British North America Act it will be a breach of contract in so far as these judges are concerned.

While I recognize that action of this kind was taken by a previous parliament in 1927 which dealt with the tenure of office and the compulsory retirement of judges of the supreme court and the exchequer court, apart from the fact that if that action was wrong then it is not right now, the government of that day did make provision to ensure that no judge was prejudiced financially by the action taken by parliament.

I realize that there is a resolution on the order paper which deals with pensions for superior court judges, and that some action may be taken by this government to deal with this question. I do not know what that action may be. It may be that provision will be made for a retirement allowance equal to the salary on retirement, or it may be judges will be granted the same kind of pension they would receive if they were retired for disability under the Judges Act. No doubt we will learn later what the government has in mind. But there is no question but that if this amendment to the act is made, judges who accepted office on certain conditions will be retired at 75, and this would be, I believe, a breach of contract.

There is a second question which arises, and that is the change which is proposed with regard to the procedure for removing district and county court judges. It is proposed in this resolution to request the addition to the British North America Act, that is to our constitution, of an express provision that judges of district and county courts shall, after September 1, 1960 according to the resolution and after March 1, 1961 according to the amendment, be removable only on an address of the Senate and House of Commons. The provision that county and the district court judges hold office during good behaviour is not, of course, in contrast to that affecting supreme court judges, to be found in the British North America Act. Their appointment has always been according to statutes of this parliament, which from time to time over the years have fixed the term of the appointment for as far back, if I am right, as 1882. Now it is proposed to change the procedure set forth in the Judges Act, which has remained substantially the same since parliament first legislated on this matter, and to substitute for the discreet but essentially fair process outlined in the Judges Act another procedure which apart from the fact that it will be enshrined in our constitution, would be characterized by great formality and, I believe, great publicity if it were ever adopted. Hereafter under this resolution, if the removal of a district or county court judge is sought for any reason, everything will have to be done under the spotlight that is always focused upon acts of parliament. There will be an atmosphere of unnecessary publicity, I think, for such an occasion.

It is essential of course that any proceedings, if they should ever be required, for the removal of a judge should be characterized by the greatest impartiality and justice, as I am sure they would be in any circumstances. But is it necessary that they should be carried out in what is bound to be distressing circumstances in the full glare of publicity which would attach to proceedings of this parliament? Surely our past experience in this country has been such that we can safely leave untouched what had been for many years, and still is, a satisfactory provision, even though the number of instances in which it has been applied is extremely limited if, indeed, it has been applied at all.

However, the government is going much further than merely changing the procedure to be followed if it proves necessary to remove a judge of a county or district court. This brings me to the third and last point I want to mention, and that concerns a further change which I think is altogether without precedent, namely a change which would fix in the British North America Act, in our constitution, the age for compulsory retirement of judges of district and county courts.

I do not know why the government is making this change in the constitution. The minister in the correspondence which has been tabled refers to serious doubts in regard to the constitutionality of action of this kind by the parliament of Canada. The Prime Minister has referred to the fact that the attorneys general of all the provinces have accepted the proposal, but there seems to be, at least in my mind, some ambiguity in regard to the acceptance of some of the attorneys general, or at least ambiguity in regard to the implications of the acceptance.

Turning to the appendix to Votes and Proceedings I find that the attorney general of British Columbia in his letter to the Minister of Justice, under date of November 4, 1959 said:

> —I agree wholeheartedly with this recommendation and would go further to suggest that if it is not possible to secure the unanimous consent of all ten provinces that the act be made applicable to those provinces who have expressed approval of the legislation through their executive council.

The attorney general of Saskatchewan in his reply to the minister dated July 20, 1959 had this to say:

> This government feels that it would prefer to have all provincial judges, including district court judges, retire at age 70 rather than age 75—

Mr. Fulton: Should the hon. member not read on?

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to read on:

> —but it is quite prepared to concur in an amendment to the British North America Act providing for superior court judges retiring at age 75 if the dominion and the other provinces are not prepared to concur in an amendment providing for their retirement at age 70.

We are proposing that this matter in regard to county court judges should be put in our constitution so that if in future any change of the kind suggested by the attorney general of Saskatchewan or the attorney general of any other province were desired it would have to be made by an amendment to the constitution, that is by going to the parliament of the United Kingdom.

The British North America Act in section 96 empowers the governor in council to appoint judges of the superior, district and county courts in each province except those of the courts of probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but it is only with respect to superior court judges that the British North America Act provides for tenure during good behaviour, that is to say normally for life. That section contains no such provision for district and county court judges. Indeed, after providing for their appointment the act is silent concerning them.

There is only one reasonable deduction to be drawn from this; that the parliament of Canada was meant to have and indeed has had and has exercised the necessary legislature authority over the terms of appointment of district and county court judges. This is confirmed by precedent. These judges have been subjected, without any constitutional question being raised, to acts of this parliament providing for compulsory retirement, acts of this parliament going back as far as 1903, I believe. Why is this change being made now?

There was a discussion of this matter in a debate in this house in 1927 to which I referred this morning. The then hon. member for Simcoe, Mr. Boys, a member of the opposition, as reported at page 1080 of the 1927 Hansard asked the following question of the then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe:

> Is there any special provision in the British North America Act with respect to the retirement of county court judges?

The then minister of justice replied "No", Mr. Boys went on to ask:

> Is it suggested that such legislation—

That is, Canadian legislation for the compulsory retirement of county court judges.

> —was ultra vires?

The then minister replied:

> No, not at all. Section 99 applies only to the judges of the superior courts.

Mr. Lapointe went on to add:

> There is nothing in the British North America Act preventing us from dealing with the tenure of office of county court judges.

Indeed the tenure of office of district and county court judges has long been established by federal statutes which parliament has been free to amend any time it saw fit without reference to any outside parliament. Now we propose to put it in the British North America Act that they must retire at 75. This will mean we will have to go to the parliament of the United Kingdom and ask it to amend our constitution accordingly in this matter. We are asked to accept the doctrine that henceforth any change in tenure of a district or county court judge would presumably not only have to be agreed to by every province but also by the parliament of the United Kingdom, which in the past has not been approached in these matters.

We are being told for instance I assume from this resolution, that while it is constitutional for the Canadian parliament under section 32 of the Judges Act to remove a district or county court judge for inability to perform his duties, it would be unconstitutional to remove him at the age of 75. Therefore this address seeks to replace our parliament by the British parliament in regard to something which was never previously considered to be a function of any other parliament but our own. It was never previously considered by any government to be that, even by governments representing the party to which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice belongs.

By this resolution parliament is asking that its own power to deal with the tenure of office of district and county court judges be now limited by the constitution, and that action to bring about such limitation be taken by the parliament of the United Kingdom. In other words we are being asked in 1960 to expatriate to Westminster a part of our own constitution. I ask the minister, what kind of colonial vision is this? I ask him, if he can, to justify taking action of this kind at this time; to go to the parliament of the United Kingdom to make a change in our constitution through action of that parliament in a matter with which we in this parliament over the years since 1882 have managed to deal.

For this and for the other reasons I have mentioned I move, seconded by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), that the resolution be amended in proposed section 99 as follows:

> That the words "district and county" be deleted from line two of subsection one; the words "district or county" and the word "whether" be deleted from line one of subsection two; the words "before or" be deleted from line two of subsection two, and all the words after the words "seventy five years" be deleted from subsection two.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be somewhat brief for reasons which are, of course, obvious. First of all, I do not consider myself an expert on constitutional matters. The second reason is that I have not had the time to work on this resolution as I should like to have done.

We have now reached the stage in the proceedings of this session where we have legislation, as one wit put it, by exhaustion. I am suffering from that and so are some other hon. members. Since the house rose at one o'clock I recorded a radio address to my constituents; I dictated several letters; I had an interview with two people and drank a hasty cup of coffee before coming down to the house. I mention that to you, sir, so that you will have some sympathy for members of this house who are plugging away under very difficult circumstances.

I might say that this group does support the purpose of this humble address which is to be presented to Her Majesty the Queen recommending certain amendments to the British North America Act. We support the purpose because we believe the terms of the resolution are a progressive step toward a further recognition of Canada as a nation, and of changing circumstances.

However, I must say that we do wonder to some extent whether the amendment has been caused solely by the government's concern for the efficient administration of justice. While the principle and purpose of the amendment are quite good, we are not altogether lacking in suspicion as to the reason for its advancement; but no doubt the Minister of Justice will deal with the matter further when he rises to speak.

When I was listening to the Leader of the Opposition prior to the noon recess I was interested in his belabouring of the government; in his indication that the Liberals had recognized that Canada was a nation and that the amendment of the constitution should be within the confines of this country, and that Canada should not be required to seek the legislation through another parliament. I must bring this to his attention. If I heard him correctly he quoted the former prime minister, Mackenzie King, in this respect, and mentioned something about his hoping that constitutional changes would take place that would bring the amending of the constitution strictly within the powers of the Canadian parliament. But I must bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that it was only a hope and that those words were uttered years ago. I must also bring to the attention of the house the fact that the Liberal party was in office for 22 years and that on this question, as on a good many questions, they hoped, but we did not get any action in that direction.

As compared with that, I want to bring to the attention of the house the policy of the C.C.F. The policy of the C.C.F. since its formation as a movement in 1932 has been that Canada as a self-governing nation should have the right to amend its own constitution without reference to another parliament. We recognize that these things cannot be done overnight, but I would challenge the Leader of the Opposition to bring to the house any evidence that the Liberal government took any steps in that direction, or any evidence of any conversations between former prime ministers and the appropriate persons in Great Britain with the end in view of changing the present practice so that Canada would have the right to change its own constitution. If there is that evidence I should be very willing to have it put forward, but I do not know of it. I just mention that point.

However, as far as this group are concerned, we have been advocating this change for years because, as I said before, we believe that Canada as a self-governing and independent nation should have the right to amend its own constitution. However when one considers and discusses this question I am sure that any fair person recognizes it is not all quite as simple and easy as it looks on the surface.

Now I deal with the resolution itself. Subsection 1 of the humble address reads as follows:

> Subject to subsection 2 of this section, the judges of the superior, district and county courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the governor general on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

While we support this section, I presume—and I am sure the Minister of Justice will correct me if I am wrong in this—that even prior to this amendment it was accepted throughout the years that the parliament of Canada had the right to take this action, although it was not so stated in the constitution. No doubt the Minister of Justice will inform us in that respect. However, we support this amendment and we believe it is better to put these powers in the constitution in language which is in exact terms. Subsection 2 reads:

> A judge of a superior, district or county court, whether appointed before or after the coming into force of this section, shall cease to hold office upon attaining the age of seventy five years, or upon the coming into force of this section if at that time he has already attained that age.

We support this amendment; we believe it is a progressive amendment. In fact it is the type of amendment that has been suggested by the C.C.F. for many years. The question of the earlier retirement of justices and judges has been brought up in our conventions, from time to time. In saying this I am not intending to cast any reflection on the gentlemen of the bench, as I am sure there are many members of the legal profession who have a better knowledge of this than I have. I am just an ordinary peasant farmer living in the backwoods. But we are all subject to the effects of age. I have been in courts myself where I have noticed the justices. While they have had a very creditable past and were recognized as authorities, on account of age they were testy and impatient, and at times I thought they were somewhat unfair to the legal counsel when they were presenting their arguments. That is natural as a result of age, and I think on that account this is a good amendment.

Second, I think it is quite unfair that people who would not otherwise suffer financially should continue to hold these very important and highly placed positions until very late in life, and not leave the vacancies which would provide opportunities for many of the younger members of the legal profession, barristers and solicitors, to serve their country in that capacity.

I think it is a sound argument that at 75 years of age a person who is considered to have served his country well in such a capacity should retire. I must say that when I make these remarks I am not intending them to apply to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) as a member of parliament, because he is a rather exceptional person, always an ornament to the house. But I must say frankly that at times I am inclined to look at life in a personal way. I frankly say that I could miss his cheery countenance on the other side. He always inspires me to speak when I look at him.

For these two sound reasons, first, the facts of life so far as age is concerned and second, the provision of opportunities for younger members of the bar to occupy these very important positions, we support section 2 of the amendment. So we agree with the Prime Minister when he said this morning—when I say we agree with the Prime Minister I mean we believe what he said this morning is worthy of support, because there are occasions when we do not agree with the Prime Minister—if I heard him correctly, that age 75 was an appropriate time or anniversary for retiring. I think that was very well put, to make it a sort of farewell party at the same time.

In any event, for the reasons I have stated we support this humble address. I might say as well, Mr. Speaker, that I understand these honourable gentlemen, the justices and judges, are reasonably well provided for by way of pension, and that they have the opportunity of enjoying their pension anywhere in the world. They have had this opportunity since the establishment of the pension scheme. I understand also that the pension is on a non-contributory basis, a very interesting aspect, since it is a pension for life after retirement at about 50 per cent of the salary paid. Well, I believe that is a very reasonable provision for justices and judges when compared with the pensions received by many people when they retire. So, in supporting this legislation, we believe we are supporting something that is a step in the right direction, that will be to the advantage of efficiency in the administration of justice, and that will provide opportunities for younger members of the legal profession while at the same time not causing any injustice or hardship to the persons particularly affected.

I have not had an opportunity of reading the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition very carefully. I just hurriedly consulted with the hon. member for Vancouver East before I rose and at this moment I would say on behalf of this group we are not inclined to support this amendment because we look upon it as a somewhat subtle attempt to emasculate the purpose of the legislation. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to emphasize the vital importance of the duties performed by judges. On consideration, one realizes readily that in the administration of justice, judges carry out a mandate that derives from the Creator himself.

The early Romans had given justice a divine status, and even in our modern times, I think that justice must hold a very high rank, because it is the very basis of our society.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) so rightly said this morning, we have been particularly fortunate in the choice of judges in this country. If the British system of justice is so highly regarded, not only in our country and in commonwealth countries, but throughout the world, it is due largely to the excellence of the judges who have presided over the various courts in Canada, or in Great Britain and in other commonwealth countries.

I should now like to consider some of the points raised by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

He said he is in favour of the retirement of judges at age 75 and, if I am not mistaken, he also favours compulsory retirement, because normally a man of 75 lacks the alertness and the working capacity of a younger man. I do not think anyone will deny that.

This does not mean, of course, that a person of 75 has outlived his usefulness to society.

Thinking of the plight that is now the lot of our older people, I remembered the words spoken a few days ago, in this building, by one of the most eminent Canadians we know, Dr. Wilder Penfield.

He has studied the psychological situation that each man has to face on reaching the age of retirement.

He said that a man who has reached 65, 70 or 75 certainly still had a contribution to make. Indeed he suggested that, when a man has reached the age of retirement, he should not confine himself to his room and patiently wait for the passing of the hours, the days and the years, waiting for death, but rather start on a second career. And that is the point I have in mind: a second career.

Is it not logical and normal that a man who has served his country with distinction in the very significant office of a judge might, at age 75,—i.e. the limit established by the resolution—go on retirement but continue to serve his people in another occupation where his wealth of experience will be of great help to him? That is why I believe that the principle of compulsory retirement for judges is an excellent one.

The Leader of the Opposition said that compulsory retirement is a good thing, but that it should not apply to judges already appointed, because there is some kind of contract between the state, which appointed the judge, and the judge himself. In other words, if I rightly understood his argument, he thinks that, once appointed, a judge has a vested right to continue to occupy his post until death. But what would happen if a judge, because of his health, was unable to continue exercising his functions or, for some personal reasons—which I would not like to mention—did not like to give up his position? If some judges have to cease their functions at age 75, I say that they should all be treated equally. Otherwise, we would have a rather abnormal situation. There would be two kinds of judges, that is: newly appointed judges who, on reaching age 75, would have to retire under the terms of the address we are submitting to Her Majesty, and, on the other hand, judges who would continue in office.

I say that the personal interest of judges now in office should not have priority over the general welfare of this country. Moreover, as the opposition leader stated, a man having reached a certain age loses some of his faculties. When saying this, he only repeated certain truths which were advanced by the great philosophers of the past, including Aristotle who stated that, when he gets old, a man loses not only his physical but also his mental vigour—in any event he certainly loses some of his adaptability.

The rolls of courts today are increasingly heavy, and judges need not only particularly acute minds and great legal ability, but also great physical endurance if they are to go on giving their full measure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We all agree on that point.

Mr. Martineau: In this respect, we agree: if some judges are to be retired, all should be.

The second point I want to raise is this. I do not see eye to eye with the Leader of the Opposition when he states that judges have a vested right, because that right entirely depends on the judge's ability to discharge the duties of his office. There is certainly no vested right for a judge.

The third point is that, according to the retirement system, a judge does not stand to lose much financially; in any case, he is in no way unfairly treated when he retires.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the hon. member—

Mr. Martineau: He is not abandoned, he is not left in want.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Could the hon. member tell us what pension plan is being proposed by the government? We have no information at all on that.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I am not discussing the details of a pension plan; I am merely saying that the judges who will be retired will come under a pension plan. Whether the plan is adequate or not—and I am convinced that it is, I do not wish to discuss the point, because I feel that it cannot be discussed in detail within the framework of this debate.

Therefore, from that standpoint, I certainly cannot accept the claims of the Leader of the Opposition.

The Leader of the Opposition also wondered why we had to proceed by way of a joint address of the house and the Senate to relieve a judge from his office. In my opinion, that system is the best, precisely because of the importance of the functions of a judge. And a judge should not be relieved of his office unless there are very serious reasons for it; besides, the very formalities attached to the procedure are a guarantee that it will not be lightly resorted to.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the address to be submitted to Her Majesty the Queen, in order to obtain a constitutional amendment.

The Prime Minister indicated this morning that since confederation—that is to say since 1867—there have been 17 occasions on which constitutional amendments were sought.

Today, another one is to be sought and we have not yet found a means that would meet the wish of everyone, that is to say, one that would allow us to amend our constitution ourselves. The Prime Minister said he hoped that, in the near future, some means could be found to completely repatriate our constitution, so that we would not have to resort to the services of a parliament of another country to amend our constitution as we see fit.

It is true that the restriction to the sovereignty or total independence of our country is a result of the very will of the Canadian government, of the people of Canada. However, we hope, Mr. Speaker, that this anomaly may soon be removed. I feel this is a matter which goes beyond the scope of a political debate, and that the most enlightened efforts, wills and brains of this country should strive to achieve that end.

Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that in a few years, our country will celebrate the centenary of its foundation. Would it not be a lofty objective, one worthy of our energies and our hope that, by that time, an agreement acceptable to all sections of our population, to all governments and to all ethnic groups will be entered into which will bring understanding between those various groups? Would this not indicate that our country has attained maturity?

It is not a matter of putting forward strict and dogmatic amendments; what is required is that discussions be held between groups to achieve a goal that everyone considers desirable.

This goal is surely not impracticable, and I remember that during his recent visit to Canada, General De Gaulle said something which struck me very much. He said that he had faith in the ability of human beings to find answer to their problems. In other words, he believes there is no problem, however serious, that cannot be solved by the concerted good will of men.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that it is with that attitude that we should approach this problem of the repatriation of the constitution which, I admit, is quite serious and is bound to interest all groups in our country.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad of having had the opportunity, during the debate on this resolution, to suggest the attitude we must take and that will surely lead us to the solution of the problem of the repatriation of the constitution.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When will the government start?

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the views which the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) may express will be such that they will help the government to find the right solution.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Indeed, but a start must be made.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue, (Mr. Martineau), I was rather surprised at some of his statements. He suggested that a man's efficiency and mental powers decrease with old age. He mentioned that he had come to that conclusion after listening to Dr. Penfield—

[Mr. Martineau.]

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. That is not at all what I suggested. I said that, in listening to Dr. Penfield, I understood that at a certain age, a man does not have the same working capacity, the same alacrity of mind, and that it is a good thing for him to change his occupation, to start on a second career; that even after giving up his first career, he can still contribute to the progress of his country.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, my statement and the correction made by the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscaminque amount practically to the same thing. The purpose is exactly the same.

May I remind him of this: there may be exceptions, cases where mental powers grow less, where the brain is less active, but this is not necessarily the case with everybody. I only wish to give a few examples.

Let us take the case of Dr. Penfield himself. Is there anyone with a more alert intelligence than Dr. Penfield? Yet he is over 70. John XXIII has been elected pope at the age of 78. Was he so elected because the church considered him an inadequate representative.

We have seen in the past—

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me—

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of privilege, it is only an explanation of his earlier statement.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: Is the hon. member aware that Dr. Penfield recently retired and is starting on a second career, that of a writer?

Mr. Caron: He has a perfect right to do so, but it should not stop him from availing himself of the privilege of continuing in the same field. He has enough knowledge and ability to do so.

Let us, for instance, take the case of Leo XIII, who was made pope at the age of 73 and remained in that high office until he was

93. He was recognized as an authority, not only in his time, but of all times. The encyclicals he wrote when he was 90 are still outstandingly valid today.

Let us now examine the case of Sir Thomas Chapais who, until the age of 93, was considered an outstanding authority in the field of Canadian history.

Therefore, that matter of lessened mental power cannot be made a general rule.

I admit it would be preferable, as Dr. Penfield said, that a man, at a certain age, should quit his regular occupations and enjoy leisure, or take up some hobby. On this I agree with the hon. member, but we cannot accept that, in general, a man's faculties dwindle with age. At least, if it is so for some people, I hope it will not happen to the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue or to myself. I hope to live beyond age 75.

Mr. Speaker, I did not rise only to say this to the hon. member. I simply wanted to say that, in my opinion, this is a backward resolution. We are losing ground instead of going forward. If we look into the history of our country, more particularly since 1887, we see that at all times we have striven to secure independence from the government in the British Isles.

In 1897, at the time of Queen Victoria's jubilee, Sir Wilfrid Laurier in a memorable speech, asked the British government to give more latitude to the governments of the dominions, which needed it to reach their full expansion. He was supported in this by General Smuts, of South Africa.

Later, in 1918, Sir Robert Borden insisted that Canada, which had taken part in the 1914-18 war, and which was still a colony at the time, be made a party to the Versailles treaty, and he signed that treaty on behalf of Canada. It was another step towards our independence.

In 1921, I believe, the Hon. Ernest Lapointe signed a fisheries treaty with the United States and, at the time, objected to the presence of a representative from the London government.

In 1927, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King set up the basis of what later on was to become the treaty of Westminster, in order to confer greater authority to Canada, and a greater measure of autonomy.

In 1931, Mr. Bennett signed this treaty of Westminster which granted us complete freedom and a status of equality with the London government. Later, the government eliminated appeals to the privy council and decided that the Queen would no longer be sovereign of England and the dominions, but the Queen of Canada, our own sovereign and not just the Queen of England. Those are the moves we have made since confederation and it shows we have always aimed at greater independence.

And now, this government is again going to ask London permission to do this or that. It will be said: "Oh, it is because this matter is not clear," as the Prime Minister said this morning.

If it is not clear, if there is some doubt, why do we not get the benefit of the doubt?

Besides, if we refer to the British North America Act, we see that in the field of exclusive powers of provincial legislatures, section 92, paragraph 16, says the following:

> Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

I admit that what is specified there as far as the provinces are concerned, is not specified from a federal point of view. We see there an indication that what is allowed in matters of a purely local or provincial nature should by that very fact, be allowed in matters of purely national nature. Reference to the Quebec resolutions will show that it was the intent of the fathers of confederation to establish that the federal government would have the exclusive right to legislate of itself in purely federal matters.

In paragraph 37, section 29, of the Quebec Resolutions, we note the following:

> And generally respecting all matters of a general character, not specially and exclusively reserved for the local governments and legislatures.

That proves, therefore, that the fathers of confederation wished that it be so, and that if that does not appear in the British North America Act proper, it is because it had been felt it was so clear that it was not necessary to include it.

Later, in the London Resolutions, paragraph 36, section 28, we note the following:

> And generally respecting all matters of a general character not specially and exclusively reserved for the local legislatures.

It may be inferred from the thinking of the fathers of confederation, at the time the discussions took place, either at Quebec or in London, that it was their wish to reserve to the various governments the various rights which were theirs.

The governments of the provinces, as I said a moment ago, in quoting section 92, have the right, in purely provincial matters, to legislate for themselves, in their own province, at any time. In reading over the report of the Quebec and London discussions, we realize that it was the intention of the fathers of confederation to grant that same privilege to the federal government, in purely national and federal matters.

I admit that where there is a dual character, that is a federal one and a provincial one, we might perhaps have the right—it seems to me, after a century, now that the Canadian nation has reached maturity, now that it is 93 years old—to be in a position to settle our own problems by ourselves.

I know Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent wanted to repatriate the constitution altogether in 1949, but the Quebec government opposed the move, claiming it feared the federalists. Well, there are those matters of a dual character, federal and provincial, which must still be submitted to the London government, for settlement. Besides, the sections of the B.N.A. Act, which I have quoted, seem to indicate that it was clearly the aim of the fathers of confederation to leave to the federal government and to the provincial governments the care of settling their own respective problems.

Now, if we examine the Statute of Westminster, which granted full freedom to Canada and to the other dominions of the time, we see in the third paragraph of the preamble the following:

Whereas it is in accord with the established constitutional position that no law hereafter made by the parliament of the United Kingdom shall extend to any of the said dominions as part of the law of that dominion otherwise than at the request and with the consent of that dominion.

Therefore, if we want to take a backward step, we may do so; if we want to go to London and ask the people there to render a judgment, to adopt a law, we can do so, but it is only at our request that it can be done. But if we are not compelled to do so, why should the government, seeing that all other governments, even Conservative, have sought to achieve greater freedom, take a retrograde step and ask the London government today to legislate in its stead? Section 2 reads as follows:

The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion.

No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this act by the parliament of a dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future act of parliament of the United Kingdom, or to any order, rule, or regulation made under any such act, and the powers of the parliament of a dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such act, order, rule or regulation in so far as the same is part of the law of the dominion.

[Mr. Caron.]

Any parliament can repeal, modify or improve legislation, without having to go to London. And the Statute of Westminster gives us the most absolute independence, as stated in section 2.

And in section 3, what do we see?

It is hereby declared and enacted that the parliament of a dominion has full power to make laws having extra-territorial operation.

And section 4 tells us:

No act of parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act shall extend or be deemed to extend, to a dominion as part of the law of that dominion, unless it is expressly declared in that act that that dominion has requested, and consented to, the enactment thereof.

It is therefore the dominion government that may do the asking; and never the London government. If it wants to take a retrograde step, that is its own business. It has the right to ask London to legislate on behalf of Canada. But, in my opinion, that would be a backward step. We should not go back to colonialism, under which we were governed before the Statute of Westminster. I suggest that no truly Canadian government has the right to take such a retrograde step; it should settle that problem itself, since this is a purely national problem, coming within the scope of its own responsibility.

And here is what we read in section 6 of the Statute of Westminster:

Without prejudice to a generality of the foregoing provision of this act, and as soon as the latter is in force, they must cease to be in effect in the dominions, section four of the Colonial

And section 7 reads as follows:

Courts of Admiralty Act—

(1) Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

(2) The provisions of section two of this act shall extend to laws made by any of the provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such provinces.

(3) The powers conferred by this act upon the Parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the provinces respectively.

Therefore, as regards matters within national or provincial jurisdiction, it is the government of Ottawa and the provincial governments which have the authority to legislate.

Is the matter now being considered a concern of ours as members of the federal parliament, or does it come under provincial jurisdiction? If it is a matter for the federal government, I do not see why we should be going to London for permission to do something that is already granted to us under the Statute of Westminster and, by inference, in the British North America Act.

In my opinion, we have no right to allow the government of Canada to take this backward step.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: Is the hon. member suggesting that the administration of justice and of courts is a strictly federal matter?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what he said.

Mr. Caron: I said, if this is a matter for the federal government, why should we go to London for permission to settle it, and if it is a provincial matter, why not let the provinces settle their own affairs.

If this matter comes under federal jurisdiction, why would we not have the right to settle it? If it is of provincial jurisdiction, why not let the provinces legislate in those cases?

In answer to the hon. member, I must say that, as far as courts of justice are concerned, there are strictly provincial courts, such as magistrate and municipal courts.

A few years ago, someone went so far as to question the right of provinces to establish such courts. It was being claimed that under the British North America Act the field of justice should be left entirely to the federal government.

But following an agreement between the provincial and federal governments, those courts were allowed to be established and, since that time, this legislation has been disregarded. However, there are still certain jurists who believe that the provinces have no right to establish those courts of justice.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member allow me another question?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: Does the hon. member know that the administration of the superior court, in the province of Quebec, comes under provincial jurisdiction, even if the judges of that court are appointed by the federal government?

Mr. Meunier: The appointments—

Mr. Caron: I think that part of the administration comes under provincial jurisdiction, but the appointments themselves are made by the federal government.

There is a definite relation between the appointment and the retirement of a person. The same government is responsible for appointing and retiring a judge.

Since the present act seeks to establish that judges may be retired at age 75, I suggest that this bill, which deals particularly with their removal or retirement, is of a general character and that we have a right to legislate in this matter, without any reference to the parliament in London.

Section 11 reads as follows:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Interpretation Act, 1889, the expression "colony" shall not, in any act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act, include a dominion or any province or state forming part of a dominion.

That is clearly to establish that we got rid of our colonial status in 1931, when the treaty of Westminster was signed.

Mr. Speaker, now that Canada has gained international status, now that it is a member state of the United Nations in its own right and not as a member of the British empire, and also a member of NATO in its own right, and not as part of the British empire, I maintain that the action now taken by this government is a step backward and that we have no right to let it be so.

If we want to legislate in this matter, the government may, if it sees fit, establish that judges are to be retired at age 75.

However, there are men who, at 75, have acquired a rare maturity, a very sound judgment, and who are endowed with a physical energy which enables them to continue in office. But—and that is the point I want to stress—if the legislation were to pass here in Canada the London parliament should not be asked to legislate in a field which is our own concern.

That is why I favour the proposed amendment, because I am satisfied that it would benefit Canada and safeguard our independence.

(Text):

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset to establish that in speaking now I will be speaking to the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) because I should like to deal with that matter inasmuch as the hon. gentleman did advance some arguments that require to be dealt with. As Your Honour knows, however, I do have to move an amendment myself and I should like to have it clear therefore that in speaking now I am speaking to the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition. At a later stage I will speak, I expect very briefly, mainly to move the amendment that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) indicated this morning should be moved.

I am certain that all hon. members appreciate and certainly I appreciate the spirit in which this subject has been approached by the hon. members who have taken part in this debate. Indeed, I appreciate very much the constructive if critical approach of the Leader of the Opposition to the resolution now before the house. With regard to his remarks concerning the position in connection with constitutional amendments generally, I think it is correct to say that there is no disagreement in principle between this side of the house and that side of the house. In fact, I thought I detected a substantial measure of agreement between what the Prime Minister had to say and what the Leader of the Opposition had to say in that regard.

This is not, it seems to me, a matter upon which one should indulge in a betting or racing contest. I know that when my hon. friends opposite had responsibility of office they made sincere and conscientious efforts to find a method under which, by general agreement, the constitution could be repatriated, brought home to Canada and made capable of amendment in Canada. It is true that on occasion one seeks to make political capital out of the failure of his opponents to solve the problems that confront us. But I think in this connection one should attempt—although one is not always successful at least one should attempt—to resist that temptation and approach this subject as I do on the basis that if my hon. friends were not successful that was something to be regretted by us indeed as much as by them.

With respect to this subject, this is an attempt that we intend to carry on sincerely and conscientiously. We have hopes of success. All I can say at the moment, however, is that we are working on that subject and that at a time when it seems appropriate, when we have been able to record some progress, then the Prime Minister will announce to the house what progress has been made. So with respect to the question of the constitutional amendment itself I am not going to go into detail because I think that at least in principle and with respect to objective there is no disagreement between us. I should like therefore to confine the detail of my remarks to the arguments and criticisms advanced by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the resolution itself.

The resolution, if I apprehended the hon. gentleman's remarks correctly, was criticized on three main grounds by the Leader of the Opposition and I shall deal with his three chief criticisms in a moment. But before making those criticisms the hon. member raised a general question, which was: Is there any urgency with respect to this proposal? As the hon. gentleman said, "Here you are amending the constitution; you are still having to do it in the old and time-honoured method by an address to Her Majesty praying that she will cause the United Kingdom parliament to take certain action," and therefore as the hon. gentleman said and I think quite properly, "you must be satisfied that there is urgency about the question when you are asking parliament to adopt such a resolution."

I should like then to deal briefly with the question of urgency. I think there is urgency about this and I believe the question of urgency can be answered on three grounds. First, there are the requests that have come from people who are outside the House of Commons and the government, but who are concerned with the position of the judiciary. Second, there are the efforts that have been made over the years to find some method of achieving this result, that is bringing about a situation under which the judges of superior courts will be retired at 75. Third, there is the fact that for the first time in the history of this matter we now have agreement of all the ten provinces that in fact this proposal should be put forward.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. gentleman repeat number one?

Mr. Fulton: The first ground on which I say there is urgency is that of an analysis of the requests received from persons and bodies outside parliament and the government itself. We in the government believe it is urgent and I bring to my support of that view the requests we and other governments have received over the years particularly from such organizations as the Canadian Bar Association.

I have here a list of the various occasions on which the Canadian Bar Association has requested such action. It may go back further than the period covered by my list but mine goes back as far as 1936 when there was a resolution of the council of the Canadian Bar Association urging upon the minister of justice to adopt the necessary means to put into effect the principle, and I quote:

—that a judge should generally retire when reaching the age of 75 years.

Then, in 1937, a report of the committee on the administration of civil justice of the Canadian Bar Association included the recommendation that the judges of superior courts of provinces should be subject to the same compulsory retirement rules as judges of the federal and county courts. In 1944 a resolution of the Ontario section of the Canadian Bar Association urged the establishment of a compulsory retirement age of superior court judges at 75. In June, 1952 there was a letter from the president of the Canadian Bar Association requesting the consideration of the requirement of judges of superior courts at 75; in 1953 a letter from the president of the Canadian Bar Association expressed the hope that the necessary amendment to the British North America Act would be passed soon. That was January 23, 1953.

On September 12, 1953 a resolution of the Canadian Bar Association urged the government of Canada to take the necessary step to bring about the compulsory retirement of superior court judges at the age of 75. Then on March 10, 1955 there was a letter from the president of the Canadian Bar Association, on behalf of the council of the bar, urging generally that action be taken to deal with this matter. The most recent one is the resolution of the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association in Vancouver on September 4, 1959, reading as follows:

Resolved that the Canadian Bar Association reiterates its recommendation for the compulsory retirement of superior court judges at the age of 75 years, and suggests that the question whether parliament has under the British North America Act No. 2, 1949, power to amend the constitution of Canada to so provide be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, over the period of years, at least from 1936 until the present, there have been no fewer than eight submissions from the governing body of the bar of Canada urging that the parliament of Canada take action to deal with this problem and to provide for a retirement age of judges of the superior courts at 75 years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As to the age of retirement there is no difference of opinion.

Mr. Fulton: Quite so. I am dealing now with the general question raised by the Leader of the Opposition as to whether there is urgency to deal with this matter. I think that what I have said establishes that, in the view of that organization, which apart from parliament itself is most responsible and has most responsibility as well as authority in this matter, it is a very urgent problem.

The second ground upon which I say the question of urgency raised is completely answered is the history of the efforts over the years to deal with this matter. Surely it would be agreed by my hon. friends opposite that if there was no urgency, governments of which they have been members and which their party has supported over the years would not have made the quite strenuous efforts which have been made to deal with this problem and find a solution of it. This, however, is the fact; the governments of which my hon. friends were supporters and of which some of my hon. friends were members, have made conscientious efforts to find a solution to this problem. It is a fact also that the solution which my hon. friends thought was the proper one when they had the responsibility, was to bring forward an amendment to the British North America Act to provide, with the consent of the provinces, that there should be inserted an amendment to section 99 of that act providing for compulsory retirement of superior court judges on reaching the age of 75.

Reference was made in passing by the Prime Minister this morning to some of those attempts. Perhaps I could just add some details. Not every attempt in this field has been by way of amendment of the British North America Act but I think the majority of them—and certainly the sound ones—have been along those lines. In 1920 consideration was given to the amendment of the British North America Act to provide for removal of judges by the governor in council upon the finding of a commission of inquiry that a judge was disabled from the due execution of his office by reason of age or permanent infirmity. Indeed, in 1920, the then minister of justice—and this, of course, was a Conservative minister of justice—introduced a resolution to this effect which, however, remained on the order paper all during that session and was not dealt with.

Then in 1926-27 there was the provision which has been referred to this morning dealing, of course, only with the Supreme Court of Canada and the exchequer court and not requiring a constitutional amendment. In 1933, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, there was what perhaps might be fairly described as an attempt to overcome the difficulty of the constitutional amendment and find another method of providing in effect for the retirement of judges of superior courts. That bill, although passed by the House of Commons, was defeated in the Senate.

Then in 1936 I am informed a bill was drafted giving superior court judges who had served 20 years or more and who resigned at 75 an annuity equal to their salaries, but nothing came of it.

In 1944 there was a further attempt by way of a private bill introduced by Mr. Stanley Knowles, on the same lines as the 1933 bill, except the retirement on salary would have applied at the age of 70 instead of 75. That bill did not pass the House of Commons.

In 1945 the then minister of justice, the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, made an attempt to reach an agreement with the provinces on this matter. On January 2, 1945 he wrote to the attorney general of each province suggesting for his consideration an amendment to the British North America Act to provide for the retirement of superior court judges upon reaching a certain age. He suggested that the matter should be brought up at the next dominion-provincial conference. Replies were received from six of the provinces, and there is a letter on file indicating the matter was placed on the agenda. However, at that time Alberta disagreed with the whole method of amending the constitution and wished to discuss this question in full. No replies seem to have been received from the provinces of British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia. My hon. friends will find a full statement by Mr. St. Laurent reported at page 2711 of the House of Commons debates for 1946, in which he outlined his attempts to get agreement on this matter and to have it discussed, and reported the failure of those efforts.

A further attempt was made in 1955 by my immediate predecessor in the position of minister of justice when Mr. Garson urged the Canadian Bar Asociation to suggest to the provincial attorneys general that they might co-operate with the government of Canada on this matter. The results of those efforts are recorded in a letter from the then president of the Canadian Bar Association to Mr. Garson, dated March 10, 1955, in which the president reported that all the provincial vice presidents had been in touch with the attorneys general of their respective provinces, and he records the result which again unfortunately was lack of unanimity. That letter from the then president of the Canadian Bar Association concludes with these two paragraphs:

> I have found that the members of the association all across Canada consider that this matter is an urgent one and that, in the interests of the administration of justice, action is required thereon.
> I would bespeak your early consideration of the earlier and continuing recommendation of the Canadian Bar Association.

Mr. Pugh: Will the minister indicate whether that which was requested was an amendment of the British North America Act?

Mr. Fulton: There have been a variety of requests. However, the majority of them have recognized that amendment of the British North America Act is the proper method of bringing about this result. There are letters from the bar association which refer specifically to the desirability of getting amendment of the British North America Act. The majority of the recommendations take that form. There are other letters which merely refer generally to the desirability of bringing about the retirement of judges of superior courts at age 75.

The last recommendation from the bar association, that is the one of 1959 to which I referred earlier, recognized that an amendment to the British North America Act is essential, and actually suggested that this question be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question? Has he any reference there that would indicate that the national bar association has at any time indicated that compulsory retirement of district or county court judges can be effected only by way of constitutional amendment?

Mr. Fulton: Oh, no, Mr. Speaker; I have not attempted to suggest that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that.

Mr. Fulton: I will come to the question of district and county court judges, in the course of my reply to one or two points made by the Leader of the Opposition. I am dealing, at this time, only with the question of urgency of the provision of a retirement age of 75 for superior court judges. I have, I believe, covered the second point in answer to the question of urgency, the answer which is given by the number of attempts made by governments over the years in Canada to find a formula under which this might be accomplished.

The third ground of urgency as to why this proposal should be put forward now and why the government urges upon parliament that it should adopt the resolution presenting the address is that for the first time in the history of this matter we do now have the unanimous consent of all ten provinces. This is the first time that has occurred during a period extending back at least as far as 1936, if not farther than that. I am not going to attempt to lay down any constitutional principle here, but I do suggest to my hon. friends that since governments are not bound by decisions of previous governments with respect to matters of this kind, I am not at all certain that it would be proper for me to obtain the consent of a province to a certain proposal in 1959, shall we say, and then not act upon that proposal until perhaps 1961. In my view, I am under an obligation to act promptly, and in so far as we present to parliament the consent of the provincial governments as a basis for what we are asking parliament to do, then I think parliament should proceed on the basis that it must act with reasonable expedition with respect to the proposal to which the provincial governments have consented.

I do not believe it would be a proper thing for a minister of justice, or a prime minister, to come before parliament two or three years from now and say, we had the consent of all the provincial governments back in 1959, so we are asking parliament now to act upon that consent or to act with the knowledge of that consent. My position is not to attempt to lay down any constitutional principles on this point; but my position is simply that as a responsible minister and a minister who expects to have good relations and businesslike relations with the ministers of provincial governments with whom I deal I cannot too long delay acting in accordance with the consent I have received. I do not believe good relations could be furthered or maintained if one were to wait for more than a reasonable period and then, without going back to the provinces, come before parliament and say that we did have the consent of the ten provinces.

I suggest to parliament, therefore, that having now for the first time in the history of this subject obtained the unanimous consent of the ten provinces, having it established as I conceive it to be established that this is a sound, desirable proposition, it is then incumbent upon parliament in the national interest to deal with the proposition while that consent of the provinces is real consent in the sense that it has recently been given.

I am quite certain I do not need to labour the point. All hon. members would agree with me that it would be, if not a breach of faith at least a straining of good relations, if we were to allow this matter to lie over for another year or two years and then attempt to deal with it, without going back to all the provinces to ascertain if they were of the same view as they had expressed in the latter part of 1959 when they consented to this proposal. I do state quite emphatically and categorically, Mr. Speaker, that it seems to me the question of urgency raised by the Leader of the Opposition is effectively answered on the three grounds I have advanced.

I should like, then, to go to the three specific criticisms that he made of the proposal contained in the address which we are asking parliament to adopt. One was that what is involved here amounts to a breach of contract with respect to the judges who have been appointed to office before this resolution is adopted by parliament. The second point was that he objected to the equation of district and county court judges on the one hand with superior court judges on the other in the resolution and the proposed address. The third point was that he criticized us for including the position of county and district court judges, in effect, under the constitution of Canada instead of leaving them where they have been in the past, in his submission, to be dealt with exclusively under the Judges Act with respect to their tenure of office.

I should like to leave the first point to the end because it seemed to me to be the most important of the points raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and go directly to the second point in which, if I understood him correctly, he objected to the equation of district and county court judges on the one hand with superior court judges on the other in so far as their tenure of office is concerned. In answer to this criticism I would point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that in my view this is a very proper equation to make. The only provision for retirement of county court judges at the present time is found in sections 31 to 33 of the Judges Act. This is a very difficult, far-reaching, and indeed I might almost say terrible procedure. This provision calls for the appointment of a commission by the minister of justice to inquire into the question of whether or not a judge has become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of his office by reason of age or infirmity. Then, sections 32 and 33 provide for the carrying on of that commission of inquiry, for the laying of the report before parliament.

This, I have described, as a very terrible method of procedure and one that, to my knowledge, if I recollect correctly, has only been resorted to once in the whole history of Canada. If I understand it correctly, this is the only procedure available at the present time for the removal from office of a district or county court judge prior to his reaching the age of 75 years.

It is true that the constitution does give the government or rather the governor general the power to appoint a district, county or superior court judge under section 96, but the constitution is silent on the removal of district and county court judges. Section 99 does provide for the removal of superior court judges. This is the reason I say that at the present time the only method of removal of county or district court judges, prior to reaching the age of 75 years when they automatically retire, is this very difficult and terrible provision under the Judges Act.

This situation, however, does not apply to superior court judges. In so far as superior court judges are concerned, there are three ways by which they can be removed from office at the present time. The first is by virtue of the provisions of section 99 which mentions good behaviour. There could be a court action bringing into question the good behaviour of a judge and calling for his removal; that would be the first method. Second, there is the simple method of an address of both houses of parliament, and I shall have more to say about this in connection with the alleged breach of contract. As I have said, section 99 provides that superior court judges can be removed by an address of both houses, and that is the second method.

I said there were three methods by which we could at the present time remove superior court judges, but actually we are providing the third method by this proposed address; that is that by the limitation on their age they will be removable or will cease to hold office at age 75 years. If therefore we did not include district and county court judges under the same general provisions we would have in effect only two methods of removing these judges whereas we would have three methods of removing superior court judges.

The other important feature to be considered in this connection is that we would not have provided for district and county court judges any security of office. They would not be appointed to hold office during good behaviour. There is an interesting comparison between the position of district and county court judges now and the position of superior court judges. Section 99 of the British North America Act provides that the judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour. It makes no mention whatsoever of the judges of district or county courts. It therefore seems to us to be entirely defensible that when we are instituting the last provision or the ultimate provision which now will make all judges appointed by the federal authority subject to termination of office at the age 75 years, that we should equate the conditions under which they hold their office, one with the other. It is therefore a perfectly proper and indeed a desirable thing that the conditions of tenure of office as well as the circumstances regarding the removal from office of district and county court judges on the one hand should be equated to and made similar with those conditions applicable to superior court judges on the other. We therefore propose to amend the constitution in order to make the situation clear.

With regard to the question of why it is desirable to place the district and county court judges provision in the constitution, may I point out that, as my letters to the provinces which are on record have indicated, it is our view that there is a question as to the constitutional validity of that provision of the Judges Act which now provides that county court judges should retire at age 75 years. May I point out that under section 92(14) of the British North America Act the provinces are given exclusive authority over the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction. In those provinces which have county and district courts the organization, constitution and authority of those courts are matters to be dealt with by the provinces in exactly the same way and to exactly the same extent, so far as I have been able to appreciate, as is the case with the superior courts. Both courts are regulated, organized and have their jurisdictions established by the provinces. It seems to me that the courts at both levels have their organization and jurisdiction established under the authority conferred on the provinces by section 92(14). If that be the case, then it seems to me to be an anomaly, and to raise a serious question as to why, if it requires a constitutional amendment, as I believe it does, to impose a retirement age of 75 years on judges of superior courts, it does not take the same sort of amendment to impose that same retirement age on county court judges.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because of the B.N.A. Act—

Mr. Fulton: The B.N.A. Act is silent on the point.

Mr. Pearson: It mentions others.

Mr. Fulton: The B.N.A. Act may mention others but it does not mention the retirement age of either county or superior court judges. The B.N.A. Act, section 96 states:

> 96. The governor general shall appoint the judges of the superior, district, and county courts in each province,—

That is all it says. Then in section 99 states as follows:

> 99. The judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the governor general on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

The B.N.A. Act is completely silent as to retiring age, whether it be with respect to district and county court judges or judges of superior courts. If therefore we say—as we say here—that it takes a constitutional amendment, with agreement of the provinces, to impose a retiring age on judges of the superior courts which are courts under provincial authority, then we say it takes a similar constitutional measure to impose a retiring age on judges of county and district courts which are also courts of provincial organization and authority.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because of the importance of this matter and because of the long standing practice on the part of all governments, has my hon. friend been able to find in the departmental files any suggestion on the part of his predecessor that there was in the British North America Act any implication that would warrant the interpretation with regard to district court judges that the Minister of Justice has given us this afternoon?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. I have discussed this matter at great length with my departmental officials because I realize that what I am doing is not to be lightly done. That is the view of my advisers. I do not wish to shelter behind their opinion or in any way to suggest that the responsibility is theirs. It is my view which coincides entirely with theirs—or shall I put it the other way, that their view coincides entirely with mine—and upon which I am resting my case here in the House of Commons this afternoon, that while the provision has not been challenged in the courts, it is true, there is involved a residual doubt as to the authority of this parliament to impose a retiring age on a judge of a county court, which court is organized and constituted by a province. If, as we believe is the case, it requires a constitutional amendment with the agreement of the provinces to impose a retiring age on superior court judges, then we should remove the residual doubt as to county courts. We are not changing the situation as to retirement age, we are merely removing a doubt as to the validity of the provision, by including district and county court judges in the same constitutional amendment in which we are now providing for the judges of superior courts with respect to their retiring age.

Mr. Pearson: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend but can he give us the date of the first act passed by this parliament which provided for the compulsory retirement of district and county court judges?

Mr. Fulton: Yes; I think it was 1920. No, it was 1912.

Mr. Pearson: It was prior to that time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was in 1889.

Mr. Pearson: 1903.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I should ask to be allowed to answer that question at the conclusion of my remarks and in the meantime I will get the authoritative information.

Having attempted and, I believe, having succeeded in establishing the desirability on constitutional grounds of making the same provision with respect to county and district court judges as is made in respect to superior court judges, may I deal with the third point made by the Leader of the Opposition, namely that this is a constitutionally regressive step. The Leader of the Opposition said that to enact now a constitutional amendment providing the retirement age of 75 years for district and county court judges means that if you want to change that retiring age, it will be necessary to go to the United Kingdom parliament for that change whereas, previously, when the authority for district and county court judges retirement age rested in the Judges Act it was not necessary to refer the matter to the United Kingdom parliament if you wanted to change that age.

With the facts of the argument I have no quarrel. It is quite true that if we now embody in the constitution a provision governing the retirement age for county court judges, we can only change it by further constitutional amendment. But again I think this is a desirable feature; and I think it is also desirable that the retirement age for superior court judges should be in the constitution rather than elsewhere. The reason is this. There has been criticism advanced in the country, criticism which must be dealt with, that parliament is being asked here by the government to make an attack upon and to remove the basis of the independence of the judiciary; that this is just the opening wedge for interference by the government with the judiciary because—this criticism runs—the government is now saying to parliament that with respect to those who have previously enjoyed a life tenure of office that tenure is now ended at 75 years of age.

Mr. Speaker, this is not in my view a criticism which can be substantiated because I do not think anyone disagrees with the principle that judges should be retired at 75. I do not think it has to be met on that ground, but perhaps it should be met on the ground that this is not giving the government as such—the executive—the right to determine the conditions under which judges will hold office or under which they will leave office.

I think it would have been most undesirable had we adopted one course which might have been adopted, and that is to ask for a constitutional amendment conferring upon the government of Canada the right to determine the retirement age.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what you should have done.

Mr. Fulton: That is not what we should have done. We were urged in some quarters to do this, and not to put the age in the amendment itself but to ask for an amendment which would say that the government or the governor in council or parliament may determine the retiring age of the judges. Hon. members are familiar with all the arguments in that regard and the argument as to whether or not it is more difficult to get a constitutional amendment than it is to get a bill through parliament. But by enshrining it in the constitution, I say that we have taken advantage of all the arguments made by my hon. friends and others in other spheres, that we are placing beyond the whim and reach of the government of the day the right to determine what shall be the retiring age. We can now only change this retiring age by asking parliament to enact a further constitutional amendment, and we do it this way quite deliberately simply because we think it is important that the principle should be maintained, that it is not this government or this parliament alone which determines the retirement age of judges of provincial courts. Since the judiciary is in fact established under the constitution, and the relationship between the judiciary, the executive and the legislatures is established by the British North America Act itself, we feel that this change and further changes as important as this should be made only as the result of a constitutional amendment and not placed within the reach of the unfettered legislative authority of one of the legislatures which make up the total of legislative authority in Canada.

That seems to me to be a very good reason for enshrining the age limit with regard to county and district court as well as superior court judges in the constitution. This, of course, is quite different from the case of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada. Those courts are creatures of the federal parliament exclusively. Their judges are not, as in the case of district, county and superior courts, joint responsibilities in the sense of being appointed under the federal authority in Canada to courts established under the authority of the legislature of a province. So we believe it to be quite sound to place the retirement ages of all judges of such courts in the constitution rather than under the legislative authority of the dominion parliament alone.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, surely the minister is replying to what could be regarded as a vote of want of confidence and therefore has unlimited time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think it would be preferable, rather than discuss the point raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for the house to give consent to the minister continuing his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister, before he goes on, if he could tell us how many superior court judges and how many district court judges it is estimated will be affected as a result of the completed act?

Mr. Fulton: Yes; may I answer that now. District court judges will not be affected at all because they already have a retirement age; we are merely continuing that by the address. With regard to superior court judges I think the figure is 12, but I have it here and I will give an authoritative answer later. That is, there are 12 who are now 75 or will be 75 by March 1, 1961.

I appreciate what the house has done with respect to extension of time, if it be an extension. I have a third point to deal with and I shall be as brief as I can, but I think it is the most important point, and that is the question whether there is in this proposal anything amounting to a breach of contract with judges who have already been appointed to the superior court.

Mr. Speaker, in my view this is a point which it is in a sense difficult to refute but which on a proper analysis of the situation can be refuted completely and specifically. I recognize this is a criticism which was made by Mr. Bennett of the legislation in 1927, although it was disregarded by the government of that day; but that does not seem to me to establish one way or the other the accuracy of the point, merely the fact that it was disregarded.

Mr. Pickersgill: Especially as that government changed its mind.

Mr. Fulton: It took it three years to do it, and they did it not because they realized the error of their ways; reading of history convinces me that they did it because they were embarrassed over the retirement of a particular judge three years later, but that may be a difference of interpretation too.

The fact of the matter is that there is in my view a fundamental fallacy in this argument that there is a sanctity of contract in this field which is being breached by the legislation now before the house. If hon. members will refer to section 99 of the British North America Act they will find it reads as follows:

> The judges of the superior court shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the governor general on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

The important thing to bear in mind in reading that section is that there is no mention there that the Senate and House of Commons must assign cause for the removal. I recognize fully that no Senate or House of Commons would act capriciously and simply vote an address to remove a judge from office because it pleased them to do it and it suited their fancy at the moment. It is true they would only act on what to them at that time was represented and accepted as good and sufficient cause. But the fact is that the British North America Act now says that a judge of the superior court can be removed from office by a joint address of the Senate and House of Commons. That is all it says on that point.

That is a provision that has been in the British North America Act since 1867. It is under that provision that every judge appointed to a superior court since 1867 has been appointed, and has been subject to being removed under the provisions of section 99 at any time that the Senate and House of Commons so decide.

What we are submitting to the House of Commons today is that the Senate and House of Commons should decide that the attainment of the age of 75 by a judge of the superior court is sufficient reason to suggest that his office be terminated. That is all that is being suggested. No new legislative principle is being introduced regarding the power of removal from office. All that is happening is that the House of Commons—and the Senate when the address comes up there—will be asked to lay it down as a sound and fundamental rule that with respect to judicial office the attainment of the age of 75 is sufficient reason for the demission of office. That is a right which the Senate and the House of Commons has today and has had since 1867.

On the basis that I have not heard a single member of this house suggest that the general principle of a retirement age at 75 is not sound, it seems to me that all we are asking this house to do is to make that rule of general application instead of leaving it to be applied in any specific case where it would have to proved with regard to a particular individual by a terrible and dreadful process, that he had in fact as a result of his attaining the age of 75 become incapacitated in the discharge of his judicial function. I recognize the solidity, if you like, of the point. It is an argument which requires to be dealt with, but in my view it can be dealt with and disposed of completely on that basis alone, as well as on a number of others that I should like to mention.

Mr. Pearson: Before the minister leaves that point, would he inform me, an unqualified layman on these matters, in view of his argument, what does the expression "good behaviour" mean?

Mr. Fulton: The expression "good behaviour" has been judicially interpreted on a number of occasions but, with respect to the Leader of the Opposition, that point does not arise in connection with the argument I have been making, since section 99 does not lay down any condition for the passage of an address by the Senate and the House of Commons. It says—and let me read the section again:

> The judges of the superior court shall hold office during good behaviour but shall be removable by the governor general on the address of the House of Commons—

Mr. Pearson: Surely one is related to the other.

Mr. Fulton: I have suggested it was obvious that the Senate and the House of Commons would not act on the basis of caprice or whim, and they are not being asked to do so now. They are being asked to establish that one of the good reasons for the removal of judges from office is the attainment of 75 years, and that is the simple principle before the house.

There are a number of other points I wish to deal with, and I will try to be brief. There is, in addition to the reasons I have advanced, the question of the necessity of uniformity. If we were to accept the argument of the Leader of the Opposition, the result would be that we would have a number of judges appointed prior to this year who could carry on after the age of 75 until they chose to retire or until they died. There would be a number of other judges appointed after this date who would have to retire at the age of 75. Thus there would be a lack of uniformity as between judges with regard to pension rights, retirement rights and terms of office. Apart from the arguments I have advanced on principle, it seems to me that this would be a most undesirable situation, and the undesirability of this situation outweighs in itself any argument advanced by the Leader of the Opposition on the other side.

Mr. Pearson: Is that not the situation in the United Kingdom now?

Mr. Fulton: That is the situation in the United Kingdom, but what suits the United Kingdom and what may be applicable there is their responsibility. What is applicable here is our responsibility to determine.

I suggest there is really not much prejudice —if this be one of the grounds of opposition —to the judges who will be affected. As has been pointed out, another resolution now on the order paper will provide for an amendment to the pensions provisions. This amendment will relate the pensions of all judges to the salaries they are now receiving. Whereas at the moment they are related to the salaries in effect before 1955, it will be provided that the judges affected by this measure will have their pension rates adjusted so that they will receive two thirds of the salary they now receive instead of two thirds of the 1955 salaries. It will not be as much, it is true, as though they went out in receipt of their full salaries, but they will retire in receipt of an appreciable advance in comparison with what they would have received had they retired without such provision.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In principle, the same as the situation in 1933.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all. Further, we shall be extending to March 1, 1961, by an amendment I shall be moving later, the effective date of this amendment so that there can be no suggestion that judges are being hurried out of office willy-nilly notwithstanding the many years of faithful service they have given.

Finally, I come back to the fact that we have the approval of the provinces. That approval was received on the basis of the letters which I wrote to them and which are recorded in Votes and Proceedings. These letters made no reference to any question of retroactivity with respect to this legislation; I believe I have used the wrong word: they made no reference to the possibility that judges previously appointed would not be affected by this legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: One way or the other.

Mr. Fulton: One way or the other, and it was not intended that the letters should create that impression. The letters and the discussion I had proceeded on the basis that the legislation would become effective immediately and with respect to all judges whether previously or subsequently appointed. It was on the basis of these letters and that discussion, that provincial consent was received.

In my view, therefore, it would not be open to me to suggest at this stage that I could consent to an amendment to give effect to the point made by the Leader of the Opposition. Before I could do so I believe I would have to go back to the provinces and ask further consent to what to my mind would be a new proposal rather than the proposal which we have placed before the House of Commons and the Senate.

For all these reasons, while I do not say that the arguments made by the Leader of the Opposition have not got weight—they have, and they must be dealt with, and I have attempted to do so openly and frankly—it is my submission that the interests of the country and the interests of the judiciary are served by imposing a retirement age on the judges of the superior courts and imposing it now so it will be of universal application. As a result, the position of the courts will be uniform throughout the country. The resolution is in the interest of the judiciary and in the interest of the public who go before the courts and are affected by the decisions of the courts; it is in accord with the consents we have received from the provinces and I hope the house will proceed on the basis of the address in its present form subject to the one amendment which I will move later.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has spoken with moderation and restraint, and I will endeavour to do the same, although it is very hard—

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry to interrupt. I was asked if I could give certain dates. I am advised that the first amendment as to age was in 1903, chapter 29 of the statutes. It was 80 years for county and district courts, which was changed to 75 years by the statute of 1913, chapter 28.

Mr. Pickersgill: As I was saying, the minister spoke with great moderation and restraint, and I shall endeavour to do the same, but again it is very hard for anyone who believes in parliament and the rights of parliament to speak with moderation and restraint after having listened to the last argument advanced by the minister, namely that the parliament of Canada as well as the parliament at Westminster must become a mere rubber stamp because the provincial governments have approved first—

Mr. Fulton: Oh no. May I—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what the minister said; that we could not amend this because he had already reached agreement with the provinces. I can just imagine—

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member permit me—

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister will allow me at least to finish my sentence.

Mr. Fulton: Very well, if the hon. member wishes to persist in this misstatement of fact.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can just imagine what would have been said by the Minister of Justice or by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to say nothing of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) if any hon. member of the previous administration had insulted parliament in that fashion. I do not think it was a deliberate insult—that is what makes it worse—it was an unconscious insult.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: May I be permitted to intervene at this point. In order that we may have the debate on a proper footing perhaps I may be permitted to point out that what I said was that I could not consent to the change without going back to the provinces. I did not say that was the only reason I would not consent; and the reason, as I made clear, is that I believe the present proposal is the best one. But in any event I could not unilaterally consent to the change without going back to the provinces. That is all I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest to the minister that he read his own correspondence with the provinces. The minister will find that with the exception of the government of Quebec in none of the rest of the correspondence is this matter, as I read the correspondence, spelled out in such detail. It is quite true that the hon. gentleman had additional correspondence with the government of Quebec which was not tabled at the time the rest was but I believe it has been made public since.

In any event we know that an address was adopted by the Quebec legislature. We also know that the question of county and district courts is quite irrelevant in the province of Quebec in any case. However, I do not intend to spend very much time on that argument because it is not intrinsically of any importance at all. It is only important as a reflection of the sad state of the minister's mind. What I really think is much more important is the doubt that was raised—and perhaps even more than a doubt in his own case—by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) in his reference to the British North America Act 1949, No. 2 which the Prime Minister erroneously referred to this morning as an amendment which gave to this parliament the power to amend the constitution in matters that came within the jurisdiction of this parliament. What it actually does, of course—and I think it is perhaps as well to read the relevant section of it—is to confer upon this parliament the capacity for:

> The amendment from time to time of the constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature of the government of a province—

The rest of it is irrelevant to this debate. That quotation may be found at page 476 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It is perfectly obvious, in spite of the minister's reference to the administration of justice in section 92, that no one would seriously argue for one moment that the legislature of any province could legislate with respect to the appointment of these judges, either superior court judges or county court judges, or with respect to their tenure; that an attempt on their part to legislate in this particular would be completely beyond their competence because the appointment of these judges at least and the tenure by implication, we argue, in the case of county court judges is given to this parliament; but at any rate the appointment is given to the governor in council and not the provincial governments—

Mr. Fulton: The governor general, if you want the accurate reference.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, the governor general, that is quite true. What can be argued, I think, is that it may come within the second part of this quotation:

> —or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature of the government of a province—

I know many eminent jurists in this country—indeed they are among the most eminent—who take the view that there would be no doubt since that amendment was made in 1949 that parliament could legislate with respect to the tenure of superior court judges. I am rather surprised since the minister emphasized so much the advice of the Canadian Bar Association that he did not take that advice which could have been taken last autumn right after they gave it in September, and make the reference they suggest to the supreme court, because it is perfectly obvious that the eminent members of the Canadian Bar Association who drafted the resolution were of the view that it was at least arguable that it was within the competence of this parliament to legislate in this matter or they would not have suggested a reference to the supreme court.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest it might have been because they never thought we would get the consent of the provinces, which in fact we did.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is making a reflection upon the bar association of Canada which I would not wish to make.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You are making a reflection on the provinces.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not like to suggest that the eminent members of the Canadian Bar Association would suggest to the government that it do something of dubious constitutional validity because they simply did not think it could be done in a proper way. I think more highly of the Canadian Bar Association than does the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: Is my hon. friend suggesting that this is an improper way we are embarking on now? Is my hon. friend suggesting it is improper to get the consent of the provinces?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I am suggesting that I agree with the Canadian Bar Association that there is a question, a doubt. That is all I am suggesting.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member does not suggest then that this is an improper way?

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all and if the minister will allow me to proceed as I allowed him to proceed he will soon find out.

Mr. McPhillips: Why do you not proceed with your law course; then maybe you will learn something.

Mr. Speaker: If hon. members wish to ask questions they should rise.

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. gentleman rose he would not be able to speak.

Mr. Pickersgill: You know, Mr. Speaker, one is awfully tempted to answer that question but I will resist the temptation. As I was saying when I was interrupted, I do not think that anyone would question that if the British parliament does do what this parliament is going to ask it to do, if the government is successful in getting this motion through in the form in which it wants to put it through, or even in the form in which we are willing to have it go through, I do not think there will be any doubt about the fact that the courts would say that so far as superior courts are concerned it would be valid.

There is some question in my mind, but it is only a question in my mind, and I do not consider I am a sufficiently eminent authority —I do not think perhaps anyone is because in the end it would have to be settled by the court of final resort—but there is some doubt that this parliament, even by a joint address, could confer again upon the British parliament a jurisdiction of which under the Statute of Westminster it would have appeared to have divested itself. There is no doubt that the British North America Act of 1867 as amended from time to time is the law of Canada and what we usually call the constitution of Canada, but there is nothing in that act which says anything whatever about the tenure of county and district court judges. I question whether in the year 1960 the parliament of Canada by an address can confer upon the British parliament a jurisdiction of which it divested itself when we ceased to be technically a colony in 1931. That it seems to me is a strong additional objection to those made by my leader to the inclusion of county and district courts.

I am going to deal in the opposite order with the arguments of the Minister of Justice and before dealing further with the subject I just mentioned I want to say something about this business of breach of contract. I must say that I thought I had heard the ultimate in casuistry in the past, but I never heard an argument that quite equals the argument put before us today by the Minister of Justice, the suggestion that because this parliament is sovereign it could or would or was designed or intended capriciously to remove judges without cause. The minister went on very quickly to say that we would never do it. I hope we would never do it, but I never thought I would hear any minister of justice get up in this house and say it is a theoretical possibility.

An hon. Member: We can do anything theoretically.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is part of a sentence; not a separate sentence, but part of a sentence the other part of which refers to good behaviour which, as the minister has said, is a term of art which has been defined by the courts. What I have understood and what I think most plain-minded people have always understood is that the only way a judge who was guilty of a breach of good behaviour could be removed was by an address of both houses but that this was merely a procedure which could be followed in cases where it was warranted.

Since 1867 we have had life tenure in the superior courts of this country and, as the Prime Minister pointed out this morning—and I do not go about looking for reasons to agree with the Prime Minister but this time I do—the courts of this country are held in as high repute as the courts of any other country, and the judges of this country in as high repute as the judges of any other country, notwithstanding the fact that they have had life tenure for 93 years and, indeed, in colonial times before that. It does not appear to me that they are suddenly, precipitately, going to deteriorate after March 1, or whatever the date is, 1961, and suddenly become corrupt and incompetent after the age of 75. If we have been able for 93 years to endure the regime that we have now I would think the country would not suffer damage by allowing those judges who have already been appointed to serve out the tenure on which they had accepted their positions from a government and a parliament and a country which on a whole have kept their word.

There is another gentleman with whom I did not often agree in his lifetime but with whom I certainly agree on this occasion. I think that what Mr. Bennett said in 1927 was right, and I am very proud of the fact that Mr. Lapointe came to see that it was right and was a big enough man to change his mind over it. I do not think there is anything to be ashamed of in that at all. But I do think with that precedent it is all the more shocking to ask us to take a course which I can only regard as a dishonourable one.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Martineau: Does the hon. member disagree with his leader who stated that he was in favour of the retirement of judges at 75?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the point.

Mr. Pickersgill: The parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister should take a course in listening because the Leader of the Opposition said at the very outset of his—

Mr. Ricard: He said he was in favour.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am answering the question. I allowed the hon. gentleman to ask it; I surely might be allowed the courtesy of answering it without any help from the hon. member from St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

Mr. Martineau: You need his help.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member can speak only from his seat.

Mr. Ricard: That is another one of your innuendoes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It does not expedite debate for hon. members to interrupt, particularly from their seats. If they have questions to put, the proper course is to rise and get the consent of the member who has the floor; otherwise they are duty bound to observe silence.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Leader of the Opposition said at the very outset of his remarks that we in this party are in favour of the retirement of judges, appointed after this legislation goes into effect, at the age of 75, but we do not believe we should unilaterally terminate existing contracts. I was astounded to hear the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) suggest that it was quite all right to terminate a contract unilaterally. I can imagine what the hon. gentleman and members of his party would have said if the government had brought in legislation to change unilaterally a collective agreement between labour and management and yet, because those judges are not allowed to enter into collective bargaining, apparently it is quite all right to treat them in a dishonourable fashion, to legislate unilaterally a change in their terms of employment.

Mr. Fulton: One more question on that point. Does the hon. gentleman suggest that even after the legislation of 1930 judges of the supreme court and the exchequer court were not compulsorily retired and their contracts terminated?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I do not suggest that. I do think that while I would not wish to do it and I would not wish to be a party to it, there would not be very much strength in my argument if the government put forward a proposal even for compulsory retirement on full salary. It then seems to me—

Mr. Fulton: That is the difference between us, then.

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I say to the minister I would not wish to be a party to that, but I would think my criticism would be on very much less solid ground if that were done, as was done in 1930.

Personally I do not think the country would suffer any very great damage from carrying on throughout the lifetime of those judges who do want to stay on after 75—and we know many of them do not, anyway—and are capable of doing it, and if they are not capable of doing it there is machinery now for dealing with them even though the governments have not often used it. They have never used the other machinery of a joint address. Therefore, I say, so far as I am concerned and so far as the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition is concerned, which I am supporting very strongly, I do think that to take this course is to take the course of dishonour.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. member permit another question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. gentleman assert that Mr. Lapointe and Mr. Mackenzie King acted with dishonour in 1927 in respect of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose that is really what my argument means. That is what Mr. Bennett said it was.

Mr. Fulton: No; Mr. Bennett never used the term "dishonour".

Mr. Pearson: Breach of contract.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have always considered a breach of contract dishonourable. That is the way I was brought up. I believe it was because Mr. Lapointe and Mr. Mackenzie King came to realize what they had done was not right that they changed their minds and were men enough to come into this house and have the law changed. I know we have been accused—we were accused a few years ago—of considering that we were infallible, but Liberals never have considered they were infallible; they have never considered that they could not learn, and even learn from their own mistakes, but I must say other hon. gentlemen make many more mistakes to learn from.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: The house again in committee of the whole on certain divorce bills.

Mr. Hanbidge: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to divorce bills may I get the consent of the house to deal with order No. 265, Bill No. S-31, to incorporate Northern Pipe Line Company, in advance of the other business of the house?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking for unanimous consent to take up order No. 265, the house in committee of the whole on Bill No. S-31, to incorporate the Northern Pipe Line Company, in advance of the other business of this hour. Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING

Bill No. S-31, to incorporate Northern Pipe Line Company—Mr. Hanbidge.

EARL BERNARD LAPIERRE

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-53, for the relief of Earl Bernard Lapierre—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the petition in this particular instance indicates that the petitioner and respondent were married on June 9, 1943, and also that they were domiciled in Canada, in the province of Quebec, both at the time of the marriage and on the date of this petition. In clause No. 6 of the petition there is an indication that adultery was committed on or about May 6, 1959, and the street address in the city of Montreal is given, as well as the name of the corespondent who is also indicated as living at the same address. Mr. R. A. Cohen appears as counsel for the petitioner.

The petitioner was sworn and gave certain evidence to the clerk of the committee with respect to his name, age, occupation and address. He is asked to give the particulars of the marriage. The first question is:

Q. Are you married?
A. Yes.

Then, he gives the name of his wife and when they were married, which was June 9, 1943, and which date coincides with the date given in the petition. He gives the religious faith to which he belongs, and that of his wife. Then he is shown his marriage certificate. He identifies it and indicates that the statements therein are true. The clerk of the committee states that there were no photographs filed in this particular case and subsequent evidence is given, which I shall relate in a moment, as to how the respondent was identified in this instance.

Then Mr. Cohen asks the petitioner his address, which he gives, and the petitioner indicates he has lived in the city of Montreal for 36 or 37 years which would be almost all of his life. Then Mr. Cohen inquires again about the date of the marriage, as follows:

Q. What year were you married?
A. June 9, 1943.
Q. How long did you live together?
A. About six months.

The next question relates to children and I shall dispense with that because we are forbidden to mention the children here. Then Mr. Cohen says:

Q. Now, after six months of marriage can you tell me why you separated?
A. Well, she was nervous and high strung, and she left a few times, and one time when I came home she was not there, and she never came back.
Q. Did you ever see her over a period of many years?
A. No.

I imagine he means he did not see her for some time, and then there is this question to clarify the situation:

Q. You never saw her since 1943?
A. I have seen her once or twice after that, but it was on the street.

Then he is asked about discussing the question of divorce with his wife, and he says he has not discussed the question of divorce. He indicates also that there is no hope of a reconciliation. The petitioner is asked:

Q. Do you know anything about this—

He gives the name of the corespondent, and the petitioner answers:

A. No, I have never met him. I seen him once on the street, but I never met him.

The subsequent questions are about when he went to see the lawyer, and so on. Then he is asked some questions about why he went to see the lawyer at that time.

Q. Can you tell us why you came at that time?
A. Well, I received a telephone call from her—well, my sister received a call from her, and I was to call her, and I did not get home until late that night, and I called the next day. That was at her mother's home. She had given that number.

This is, presumably, his wife who phoned, and then Senator Farquhar follows this point up by asking:

Q. What is that you said?
A. Doris called me at my home, and I was not home. I was working. My sister received the call and she told me to call her, but I did not call her that night, and the number to call was her mother's home, you see. So I called the next day, and her mother answered the phone.

Then Mr. Cohen wants to know something and asks if he could indicate something about that conversation. He answers:

A. I spoke to her mother, and she said: "You know, Doris does not live here. She is living on Souvenir street"—

Then he gives the name of the corespondent with whom she is living. Subsequently the petitioner went to see his lawyer, and Mr. Cohen asks:

Q. Did you meet anybody there?
A. You introduced me to Mr. Wiseman.
Q. An investigator?
A. Yes.
Q. Where did you go after that?
A. It was May 2. Mr. Wiseman and I went down to Souvenir street, and we waited on the street—I was at your office at about ten, and we waited from about 10.30 until two, and she came out with this man.
Q. Did you point your wife out to Mr. Wiseman?
A. Yes, she walked right up to us, and Mr. Wiseman told me to—

Here, he is interrupted by the chairman, Senator Croll, who asks:

Q. Did you speak to her?
A. Yes, I said: "Hello", and then he took over. He told me to go.

I imagine that was Mr. Wiseman who told him to go.

Q. You spoke to her?
A. I just said hello to her.
Q. While Wiseman was there?
A. He was right with me, yes.
Q. And—

Then he gives here the name of the co-respondent.

—was with her?
A. I believe it was—.

And the same name is given.

I am not sure.
Q. Some man was with her?
A. Yes.
Q. There can be no mistake that was your wife?
A. Oh, no.

This is the part which substitutes, I imagine, for the photographs, Mr. Chairman, and which was the personal identification, or I would imagine almost an introduction to the investigator, of the respondent. Then Mr. Cohen asks some questions with respect to collusion:

By Mr. Cohen:

Q. Did you ever place other men in the way of your wife?
A. No.
Q. And Mr.—

He gives here the name of the corespondent.

—in particular?
A. I never met Mr.—

Giving the corespondent's name.

—outside of that time.

Then Senator Farquhar wants to know why this marriage was discontinued after a six-month period. He asks this question:

Q. What reason did your wife give for leaving you? She must have had a reason.
A. I don't really think so. She was just high-strung and she was very nervous. She was only sixteen years old, I think, and she went home to her mother's place. I know that. I went to a lawyer and sent her a letter and he spoke to her on the phone and she just said she didn't want to live with me.

Then Mr. Cohen asks a question:

Q. How many years ago was that?
A. At the end of 1943.

Senator Gershaw queries further about this matter and asks the following questions:

Q. If she was so high-strung and nervous and only sixteen years old, did you try to console her and try to continue the marriage?
A. I called her back several times, and this lawyer I hired, he called her.
Q. I know, but what I mean is she was young and apparently sick. You said she was nervous and high-strung. Did you get any medical care for her?
A. No, she wasn't that bad that she needed medical care, I don't think. She wasn't that bad. She was just nervous and high-strung.

Then there are questions about work in the house and so on. Then Senator Croll asks how long they had known each other before marriage and the age of the petitioner when he was married and he indicates that he was 21, something like that.

Then Mr. Wiseman appears as a witness on behalf of the petitioner, and here we come to the question of proof of adultery. Mr. Cohen asks Mr. Wiseman questions, the first of which was as follows:

Q. Mr. Wiseman, I don't have a photograph to show you, but could you tell this committee when you saw the respondent—

He gives there the name of the respondent.

—for the first time.

A. She was pointed out to me by her husband on May 2, 1959.

Q. Where, sir?

A. By her place of domicile,—

He gives there the address which is the same as the address indicated in the petition as being that where adultery had taken place and also of the residence of the respondent and the corespondent. I might say that this is an instance of a common law arrangement. These two people had been living together for a number of years. Evidence to that effect was given later on. Mr. Wiseman is asked additional questions by Mr. Cohen about this particular meeting when the wife was pointed out to him:

Q. Could you tell us something about that meeting? How was she pointed out?

A. Mr.—

And he gives there the name of the petitioner.

—went with me simply because we didn't have a photograph. To make positive identification I requested he come with me, and he pointed his wife out to me when she came out of the building.

Q. Was there anybody else present?

A. The corespondent.

Q. You had never seen this man before that?

A. No.

Then there are questions again about the particular investigation. Mr. Wiseman answers by saying as follows:

A. Between May 2nd and May 6th, 1959, I conducted an investigation very discreetly, asking several people questions in the neighbourhood and I learned that the respondent was living with Mr.—

He gives here the name of the corespondent.

—as man and wife and was known as Mrs.—

He gives here the surname of the corespondent.

—at that address. On May 6th, 1959, my associate, Mr. O'Neil and myself proceeded to the domicile of the respondent, arriving shortly after 11 o'clock. We rang the bell of the domicile of the respondent and it was answered by her. We asked for Mrs.—

He gives here the married name of the respondent.

—and she first said "There is no Mrs.—"

He gives here that same name.

She was very sketchy about it. She said "I am Mrs.—,

And he gives here the surname of the corespondent.

—and I said "Aren't you known as Mrs.—?"

And he gives here her true name or married name.

—and at the same time I identified myself to her when I said that, and she said "Yes, I am Mrs.—"

And he gives here her correct name.

—and she asked me to come in. We went into the flat and the corespondent—

[Mr. Howard.]

And he gives here the name.

—was in there. They had evidently been watching television. The television set was on. I can remember quite well because the news was on at the time we arrived.

Q. What time was that?

A. Between 11 and 11.15.

Q. Could you describe to this committee Mrs.—?

And there is given here the name of the respondent.

A. I would say she is a woman in her early thirties, about five foot four, five foot five, with jet black hair, medium build, about 110 or 115.

Q. How did Mr.—

And here there is given the name of the corespondent.

—look?

A. Mr.— is a man in his mid or early thirties, quite tall, five foot eleven or six foot, fairly heavily built.

Q. Did you have any conversation with her?

A. Yes. As a matter of fact, they were most co-operative when they learned I was there, although she was a little surprised that Mr.—

And here there is given the name of the petitioner.

—was taking this action after a separation of over ten years. She seemed to be quite happy and they invited us in and we must have spent every bit of a half hour in the place. They were talkative people and he went on to explain that he was a chemist employed at C.I.L. and he was working on some photographic formula at the time for coloured picture for a polaroid camera, for instant colour shots.

Q. Were there any other people there?

A. No.

Q. Could you describe the house?

A. Yes, it is what I would call a five-room flat with a bedroom, living room-dining room combination and there was an archway and there was what I would call a utility room with a washer, a dryer and a deep freeze in there. It was all very orderly.

Q. Did they admit living there together as man and wife?

A. Oh, yes, and that they had been for quite a number of years.

Q. How long did you wait after you left the premises?

A. We were in the house for half an hour when they admitted being together, and through my prior investigation having learned they were living together as man and wife I didn't see any reason to wait when I came out. They were both dressed for bed, in pyjamas, just as any ordinary married couple would be or if I was spending the evening at home with my wife I would have been spending the evening just about in the same way.

Mr. Ronald O'Neil is called to give evidence. He was the partner of Mr. Wiseman. He is questioned by Mr. Cohen as follows:

Q. I don't have a photograph to show you, but could you describe to this committee if you ever saw a—?

A. —yes.

Q. Where did you see her?

A.—near Cannon street, Montreal.

Q. About what time?

A. 11.15, 11.10 p.m. on May 6, 1959.

Q. Could you describe to this committee what Mrs.—looked like?

A. She was about five five, five six, maybe 115 pounds.

Q. Approximate age?

A. Thirty two, thirty three, something like that, in that area.

Q. Did you go into this residence at—?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. Could you tell us what happened when you were inside?

A. A Mr. Wiseman and myself entered the premises and Mrs.—is the one who answered the door—that is the name she gave us when she answered the door, and Mr. Wiseman said "Are you Mrs.—?" and she said that she was Mrs.—and Mr. Wiseman said, "Aren't you Mrs.—?" and she said yes, and she invited us in and Mr. Wiseman told her what we were there for and she said "I don't understand it after so many years"—they had been separated ten years—"why he is doing that now?" We said "We don't know."

Q. Was there anybody else in the house?

A. Yes,—

Q. What did he look like?

A. He was a man of about thirty six, thirty seven, maybe six foot tall, 180, 190 pounds, somewhere in that area.

Q. Was there any conversation that went on that evening when you were in the apartment with Mrs.—, Mr. Wiseman, Mr.—and yourself?

A. Yes, Mr.—told us a bit of his history and what he was doing, and asked us how divorce worked and he thought there had to be pictures taken and he said he was working for C.I.L. colour pictures, and the conversation was regarding that kind of stuff.

Q. How were they dressed?

A. He was wearing apair of bluish-gray pyjamas.

Q. And Mrs.—?

A. She had on a pair of pink pyjamas with a house-coat or robe down to her knees.

Q. Did they admit in front of you that they were living as man and wife?

A. Yes, they had for several years.

By Senator Gershaw:

Q. From the general appearance of the place were you convinced that they had been living there as man and wife for some time?

A. Yes, I would say so. There was one bedroom with women's and men's clothes hanging in the clothes closet; there was only one bed in the house, a large double bed.

Q. A three quarters or double bed?

A. I don't think I would be able to recognize the difference.

Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to indicate all that for this reason. The petition says that on or about May 6, 1959, at a particular address adultery was committed. The preamble to the bill, which we have not read yet, indicates that the marriage was on such and such a date and that adultery had been proved by evidence adduced, and so on. I submit that it is jumping to conclusions to say that adultery took place on that particular day. If the basis of a common law arrangement is such that this could be ground for divorce perhaps there might be some validity to the suggestion that adultery had been proved.

According to the evidence, at no time during the half hour that these two investigators were on the premises talking with the respondent and corespondent did they get around to talking about adultery. They talked about polaroid cameras and photographic formulas, about why he would want to take action to get a divorce, and I presume they talked about a number of other things too. Presumably they went through the premises and got a good look at them because they give evidence of the number of rooms there, what was in them, such as a washer, dryer, deep-freeze, that there were clothes in the closets, and so on.

In my opinion all that has been proved is that this couple lived together as man and wife under a common law arrangement. From what we have been able to gather as to what is adultery, even though we are not allowed apparently to speculate about what the word means, that is not the case in this particular instance. That is why I went extensively into the evidence, to show that all that had been proved was that this couple were in their pyjamas and were spending the evening somewhat in the same manner as Mr. Wiseman would spend the evening with his wife if he were not out investigating divorce cases, and that they sat and talked for half an hour. While they admitted that they had been living together as man and wife and that there was a common law arrangement, I submit that that is the basis upon which we should consider granting this divorce, not on the basis of adultery having taken place, because according to the evidence given by Mr. Wiseman and Mr. O'Neil there is not a word about adultery. We do not know whether they discussed it in the half an hour they were there or whether they attempted to discover whether adultery had taken place between this particular couple on that particular day.

Mr. Chairman, I submit there is not one shred of evidence to indicate that adultery did take place. It may well have after the detectives left. This is a possibility if they were living together as man and wife but I submit that this is the basis upon which we should consider granting a divorce, their living together as common law man and wife, and not on the basis of adultery having been proved.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in this particular case, as in a number of other cases, we have the odd situation where a couple were married many years ago. They broke up in 1943. At that time the girl was 16, her husband was 21 or in that neighbourhood, and they lived apart with no particular attempt to dissolve the marriage for 16 years. They now come before us asking for dissolution of marriage and charging that adultery has taken place.

It has not been proved that this is the gentleman. If the case is to be accepted at face value it is not indicated whether this was the alliance that this young lady set up in 1943. In any case, from reading the evidence it is clearly indicated that no attempt made on the part of the husband during these years from 1943 to 1959 to do something about this situation and either relieve himself of an unwanted wife or the wife seek relief from a husband with whom she had no contact. On page 12 of the evidence appear the following questions:

Q. Did you ever see her over a period of many years?
A. No.
Q. You never saw her since 1943?
A. I have seen her once or twice after that but it was on the street.

Under English law, one of the discretionary bars is this matter of delay and it would seem to me that in this particular instance we have not got the whole story about what happened. It would seem to me that the husband would have been more interested at the time in retaining his wife. As a husband he would have been interested in keeping his wife with him. I am not too impressed about the evidence he gave as to her keeping house. He seemed sketchy about whether she kept house or not but he finally admitted she did. There must have been some loss about her leaving home.

Kent Power points out that discretionary bars are not absolute in the prevention of divorce but they are a large factor. He has this to say on page 82:

The delay which under the act of 1857 is a discretionary bar is "unreasonable delay" in presenting or prosecuting the petition. The same discretion exists in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

The reason these two provinces are mentioned is that both follow the original British law.

The delay of the respondent in putting in a defence is a factor to be considered in deciding whether cross-relief asked for therein should be granted. The reason for the court frowning on delay was thus expressed by Sir Francis Jeune in Johnson v. Johnson—

Mr. McCleave: We cannot allow this to go on. The hon. member is reading about a respondent's rights, the rights of respondents instead of the rights of petitioners. He has neglected the evidence on page 12 which clearly shows that the husband was not aware he had recourse to parliament until April, 1959. It is a typical type of debating such as we have heard for months and months; the reading of some evidence and then the picking up of a law book to try to get a paragraph to throw into the pot as well. I submit that what the hon. member is reading is completely irrelevant. It has nothing to do with the facts. If the hon. member would follow the argument as to how the husband found he had a cause of action he will find he is out of order.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: English law says that the defence or prosecution of the case must take place within a reasonable length of time, and I suggest that by no stretch of the imagination can 16 years be considered a reasonable length of time. A contract of marriage carries with it certain obligations and privileges and when those privileges are withdrawn the plaintiff has the right if he does not condone or connive, to take discretionary action as soon as possible. Sixteen years in this case constitutes in my opinion an unreasonable amount of delay. I should like to refer to what has been said in connection with other legal decisions which have been made by the courts on this question.

Mr. McCleave: If I may again refer to the point of order, may I point out that the cause of action was not discovered by the husband in 1943; it was discovered in April 1959. When he had a cause of action he pursued it forthwith, so this argument based on the marriage breaking up after 17 years is not relevant. The woman might have been anywhere during that time, living as a single person, by herself. We are getting into an irrelevant line of legal discussion. No matter how the hon. member tries to twist or interpret facts there is still sworn evidence, and it is the only evidence we have on this point.

Mr. Peters: If I may just continue the discussion on this aspect, I suggest that the fact that 16 years had gone by before an application was made is only an indication that the plaintiff in this particular case had made a liaison or a connection; he had found a girl friend, and therefore he was ready to pursue this—

Mr. McCleave: I rise on a question of privilege. I do not think any member of the House of Commons has the right to get up on his feet and make an allegation against a member of the general public who is not here to defend himself, without a jot or tittle of evidence to back it up. I think it is unjust and a corruption of the processes of the house for any hon. member to come in and abuse someone without one single solitary fact of evidence to support the allegation.

The Chairman: Of course, the hon. member has taken the responsibility for the statements he makes in this house. I can only say that for his guidance.

Mr. Peters: In discussing this matter of unreasonable delay I do so because I think it has some bearing on this case. I think this should answer the hon. member for Halifax who is concerned, or should be concerned, with this particular matter.

Mr. McCleave: So should you.

Mr. Peters: I am. I quote again:

The reasons why this court insists on steps being taken promptly, if they are to be taken at all, and why it should be very strenuous on the subject of delay, are that it is a terrible thing that people should be going about the world neither married nor unmarried, possibly liable to contract fresh and illegal matrimony and certainly exposed to temptation to commit adultery. That is a state of things which ought not to be prolonged for a moment longer than it can properly be avoided.

It goes on:

Referring to the argument that the stringent rules of earlier decisions had been relaxed, McLaurin said—

Mr. McCleave: Again I rise on a point of order. The point I have been trying to make, with success I imagine with everyone except the hon. member, is that if there was any evidence of any delay in bringing this case before parliament then the hon. member's reading would be relevant, but all the evidence we have on record here indicates that the man found his wife was living with somebody else in April, 1959. Apparently he did not know what she had been doing in the interim. That being so, he proceeded with due haste to present himself to parliament, and this talk about delay is, I submit, entirely irrelevant unless the hon. member can point to one jot of evidence which would help support his contention.

The Chairman: Of course, the rule of relevancy applies when we discuss this kind of bill just as when we are discussing any other kind of bill, but I must say I can hardly decide that an argument which would appear to be unfounded, as explained by the hon. member who rises on the point of order, is irrelevant. I cannot assess the value of the arguments that are brought forward by hon. members who have the floor. What the hon. member for Halifax says may be so. I think it would then be a matter for the hon. member for Halifax to answer when he has the floor.

Mr. Peters: I agree that we should have some ground for believing this, and I believe we have. I would just like to read some of the evidence which leads me to that conclusion:

Q. What year were you married?
A. June 9, 1943.
Q. How long did you live together?
A. About six months.
Q. Are there any children of this marriage?
A. No.
Q. Now after six months of marriage could you tell me why you separated?
A. Well, she was nervous and high strung and she left a few times and one time when I came home she was not there and she never came back.
Q. Did you ever see her over a period of many years?
A. No.
Q. You never saw her since 1943?
A. I have seen her once or twice after that, but it was on the street.
Q. Have you ever lived with her since 1943?
A. No.
Q. Now, did you ever discuss divorce with your wife?
A. No.
Q. Is there any hope of reconciliation?
A. No.
Q. Do you know anything about this Mr. Arthur Patterson personally?
A. No, I have never met him. I seen him once on the street but I never met him.
Q. When did you come to my office?
A. At the end of April.
Q. At the end of April, 1959?
A. Yes, that is right.
Q. Can you tell us why you came at that time?
A. Well, I received a telephone call from her —well, my sister received a call from her, and I was to call her, and I did not get home until late that night, and I called the next day. That was at her mother's home. She had given that number.

By Senator Farquhar:

Q. What is that you said?
A. Doris called me at my home, and I was not home. I was working. My sister received the call and she told me to call her, but I did not call her that night, and the number to call was her mother's home, you see. So I called the next day, and her mother answered the phone.

By Mr. Cohen:

Q. Would you tell us something about that conversation?
A. I spoke to her mother, and she said: "You know, Doris does not live here. She is living on Souvenir street with Mr. Patterson."
Q. So, what did you do?
A. I came to see you.
Q. You came to my office?
A. Yes.

I take it from that that he did not care what happened to his wife and over a period of 16 years made no serious attempt to contact her. Suddenly he decided she was doing something terrible. Did he know the reason for his wife's call? For all we know she may have lived with this man for 16 years, although the question was not asked.

The learned judges have spoken about the obligation that rests with the community not to place people in circumstances that may be conducive to the committing of adultery.

Mr. McCleave: I know the hon. member would like to be fair. Has he read the evidence on page 15 where the question is asked:

Q. Did they admit in front of you that they were living as man and wife?
A. Yes, they had for several years.

I suggest that "several" is far from 16 and and I think this simply buttresses the argument I made before.

Mr. Peters: I am pleased to have that pointed out but I think it makes no difference one way or the other. I do not object to the grounds that are indicated. I object because the divorce is sought 16 years after the husband was deserted. She may have lived with the man only a couple of years. I fail to find that.

Mr. McCleave: A quarter way down the page.

Mr. Peters: Oh yes, I see. You cannot legitimately draw the conclusion that he condoned her conduct but it is difficult to draw any other. We could understand the man's position if he came and said he had made attempts throughout the years to be reunited with his wife and had asked her to come back. It does not matter whether the alliance lasted 2 or 16 years. Divorce is being sought on the grounds of something that would likely have happened to either of them during the course of 16 years. After all, he was only 21 when the marriage broke up. I imagine they were not too grown up. Although these parties lived together for a time the divorce is sought not on the grounds of the alliance as a relief to the community and the end of an intolerable situation but on the grounds of adultery.

I doubt if many hon. members of this committee or the other place have satisfied themselves as to what constitutes adultery in legal terms. I will read the evidence which purports to show that adultery occurred. On page 14 Mr. C. Wiseman, a Montreal investigator who has figured in other cases was questioned by Mr. Cohen as follows:

Q. Could you tell us what happened with your investigation thereafter?

A. Between May 2nd and May 6th, 1959, I conducted an investigation very discreetly, asking several people questions in the neighbourhood and I learned that the respondent was living with Mr. Patterson as man and wife and was known as Mrs. Patterson at that address. On May 6th, 1959, my associate, Mr. O'Neil and myself proceeded to the domicile of the respondent, arriving shortly after 11 o'clock. We rang the bell of the domicile of the respondent and it was answered by her. We asked for Mrs. Lapierre and she first said "There is no Mrs. Lapierre". She was very sketchy about it. She said, "I am Mrs. Patterson" and I said "Aren't you known as Mrs. Lapierre?" and at the same time I identified myself to her when I said that, and she said "Yes, I am Mrs. Lapierre" and she asked me to come in. We went into the flat and the corespondent, Arthur Patterson, was in there. They had evidently been watching television. The television set was on. I can remember quite well because the news was on at the time we arrived.

In my opinion this is sufficient evidence to establish a common law alliance and yet it is not indicated that adultery had been committed. I would point out that before long this committee is going to be asked to rule on a number of cases where people did live together as man and wife for some time. We are being asked to grant an annulment when no cohabitation by these people has been established in the sense that marriage was consummated. I am suggesting that this type of common law evidence, while I think it is sufficient in my mind to grant the divorce, does not constitute adultery and adultery is one of the grounds that is mentioned in the petition before us today.

They go on to discuss the case; they talk about the things that were discussed. The corespondent and the respondent in this case were very cordial people. They discussed photography. I agree that this always interests me. The corespondent was of the impression that pictures should be taken in this type of situation; that pictures were necessary. He was surprised that they were not necessary. He was enlightened by the investigators who informed him what the procedure was.

This is a case where they did not break down the door. The atmosphere seemed to be fairly friendly and quite informal. The corespondent explained his photographic habits and the detectives explained their job and the requirements of their job. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate to me and I think to any hon. member that adultery in the true sense of the word was committed on this particular date. The questioning continued:

Q. Could you describe the house?

A. Yes, it was what I would call a 5-room flat with a bedroom, living room-dining room combination and there was an archway and there was what I would call a utility room with a washer, a dryer and a deep freeze in there. It was all very orderly.

It was all very orderly but the previous husband indicated the housekeeping was something that one could not be too proud about in so far as the previous marriage was concerned, but this is only an incidental thing. It does not carry too much weight or lend too much weight to the arguments of the plaintiff. I continue:

Q. Did they admit living together as man and wife?

A. Oh, yes, and that they had been for quite a number of years.

Q. How long did you wait after you left the premises?

A. We were in the house for half an hour when they admitted being together, and through my prior investigation having learned they were living together as man and wife I didn't see any reason to wait when I came out. They were both dressed for bed, in pyjamas, just as any ordinary married couple would be or if I was spending the evening at home with my wife I would have been spending the evening just about in the same way.

This again is an indication that a common law alliance had been set up, but I ask hon. members, would they not have to stretch their imaginations considerably to establish an adultery charge on those grounds? I would imagine that we would see people wandering around in this condition or a condition very similar to it—maybe the clothing would be a little more expensive—at most of the summer resorts where people sit around with not too much on, usually shorts and a halter and the men wearing shorts and swimming trunks, or whatever they are, that they sit around in. At the ski lodges they sit around with very little more on than this watching television. The apparel may be a little more costly because it is considered to be casual toggery, lounging wear instead of sleeping wear. There is very little difference in this case. We do not charge or claim that adultery has taken place in these other instances.

I am in complete agreement that the divorce could be granted in this case on other grounds and probably should be, but there has been no admission that adultery took place on this particular day.

I should like to draw your attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that they did not even wait to see whether these people remained there overnight. At no time did they stay or observe the house during the period that they normally stay around and watch places. They did not wait until 2.30 in the morning to see whether the people came out or to collect a few extra bucks. They did not wait because they found the people were both dressed for bed. They were a very congenial couple. I presume they saw no point in staying up and they said, "We will just go home." They didn't even stay outside the house.

Mr. McCleave: Why would they if they were living there as man and wife?

Mr. Peters: I do not know why they have to in other cases.

Mr. McCleave: Why would they have to?

Mr. Peters: I do not know why they have to in other cases. I think the grounds of common law are sufficient on which to grant the divorce.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member does not know what common law is. It has nothing to do with this case. He does not know what it means.

Mr. Peters: I am quite familiar with what a common law arrangement is.

Mr. McCleave: You will find you are absolutely wrong in saying that this one was. There is no common law attached to it at all.

Mr. Peters: I am suggesting that adultery is not proved in this case, and if adultery has not been committed and there is no common law, then on what do we grant the divorce? Certainly there is an indication that the two people are living together as man and wife.

Mr. McCleave: You are wrong.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member thinks I am wrong. I am quite happy to read what is the legal aspect of common law.

Mr. McCleave: You are legally wrong.

Mr. Peters: I do not know whether in the House of Commons you can be legally wrong. You may be wrong legally but I do not know whether you can be legally wrong.

Mr. McCleave: Legally wrong.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. McCleave: That is the best part of your speech today.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we would be quite happy to refer to this case again and point out what common law is.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, before you rise and report whatever progress has been made in the last hour I would simply point out that in a speech in the House of Commons in January an hon. member who is no longer here estimated that it cost $1,818 an hour to operate the House of Commons, and this has been the most expensive type of garbage bilge that this house has ever enjoyed for that amount of money.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: At eight o'clock the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

JUDGES

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for an address to Her Majesty the Queen praying that a measure be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom to amend the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, when the business of the house was interrupted at five o'clock I had, I think, rather thoroughly disposed of the shabby, casuistical arguments of the Minister of Justice, that in breaking a contract he was not breaking a contract because this was a sovereign parliament that could do anything anyway. This is the kind of argument that I hardly expected to hear from the Minister of Justice in a government that is proposing, later in this session, to introduce a bill of rights. I do not believe I need to labour that argument any longer, because I think it is equally important that I should deal with the two other arguments that the Minister of Justice made.

He seemed to argue that there was something unsatisfactory about the status and tenure of county and district court judges at the present time; that they did not have a security of tenure equal to that of high court judges. Of course, that is true, and it is well understood. There have been a good many cases I believe since confederation when county and district court judges have been removed by the procedure that is provided. I speak subject to correction, but I know of no case in which there has been an address of the two houses of parliament to remove a high court judge. In effect, what we will be asking the parliament at Westminster to do, if we pass this address in the form in which the government is asking to have it passed, is to make the county court judges virtually as irremovable as high court judges are now. I do not feel competent to discuss the question—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —of whether or not county court judges and high court judges should have the same tenure and the same status. I am not, and if the good wishes I see manifest in some parts of the house are any indication, there are many people who think I am never likely to be a member of the bar, and I am rather inclined to agree that is unlikely. Many of my learned friends on this side of the house are much more competent than I would ever be to discuss this question, and will discuss it.

In so far as the constitutional point is concerned, I do have some observations to make. My view is that if the tenure of county court judges should be assimilated to the tenure of high court judges, that would be a competent thing for this parliament to do. I must say I am quite unimpressed by the arguments of the Minister of Justice that in these latter days he has suddenly discovered that all his precedessors throughout history were wrong; that Sir John Macdonald was wrong when he thought this parliament was competent to legislate with respect to the tenure of county court judges; that Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was wrong when in 1903 he introduced a limitation on the age of county court judges; that Mr. Doherty was wrong when in 1913 he asked parliament, and parliament acceded, to reduce the age to 75 years. It does seem extraordinary, when one comes to think about some of the people who have occupied the position the minister now occupies that they could all have been wrong. There was Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, Mr. Edward Blake. There were ministers like Mr. Lapointe, Mr. St. Laurent and great legal luminaries like Mr. Bennett. It seems extraordinary that all these great lawyers of the past should have been mistaken in the view that parliament had undoubted jurisdiction, and that suddenly a great light dawned upon the hon. member for Kamloops when he became minister and he discovered that what had been done without any question up to this time had some constitutional doubt about it.

In my opinion, this is a preposterous suggestion. Like some other members of the house, I have known a few county court judges who have retired at the age of 75 rather unwillingly. Some of them were quite good lawyers and, if it is not disrespectful to say of a retired judge, some of them were rather cantankerous people, too. I would guess that if any of these gentlemen had suspected there was any constitutional flaw in the legislation by which they were retired they would have taken the case into court. If the minister did have a doubt, and I cannot believe that the minister is so self-assured about this matter as to think that where all the ministers of justice in the past were wrong he is right, we have a constitutional procedure for resolving these doubts. I refer to the procedure which was suggested by the bar association in the resolution which the minister himself read to us, the resolution that was adopted last September. It does seem to me very difficult to comprehend the course being followed.

The Canadian Bar Association did suggest to the government the course to take in dealing with this matter. After all, the bar association did not call into question the status of county court judges or district court judges; they only raised the question with respect to superior court judges. They suggested that at least there was an argument. Otherwise they would never have suggested, I submit, a reference to the supreme court. They suggested that at least there was an argument that it was competent for this parliament, under the terms of the second amendment of 1949 to the British North America Act, to legislate with respect to the tenure of superior court judges.

As I say, a reference to the court could have been made last September and by this time this parliament could have had the opinion of the supreme court as to whether it would be competent, as the bar association apparently thought it might be, to do it in this way. But the government has chosen to do it in the other way. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has indicated, we do not quarrel with that procedure with respect to superior court judges who may be appointed after the coming into force of this legislation, if the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition is accepted and if the address passes in the amended form, as we would be quite satisfied to have it pass. We feel that there will be no reasonable doubt if this is done, that it will be a valid amendment to the constitution and that it will be respected by the courts in so far as the superior court judges are concerned.

But with respect to county court judges there does not seem to us to be any kind of argument that can seriously be considered. I said earlier that I could not really believe that anyone would argue that a provincial legislature could validly legislate to determine the tenure of county court judges or superior court judges. I would certainly think that a provincial legislature could not legislate with respect to superior court judges as long as the British North America Act contains the present provision. But I suppose an argument could be made that in the constitution of the courts it might be possible for the provinces to limit the tenure of county court judges. But I repeat that it is surprising that such an argument never seems to have occurred to Sir John Macdonald or Sir Charles Fitzpatrick or to Mr. Charles Doherty, all of whom dealt with this matter and none of whom ever called into question the jurisdiction of this parliament over this matter.

In view of the fact that outside of the Minister of Justice nobody else seems to have had any doubts about this matter, I hope that the government, if it feels that this matter needs to be resolved, will do it by accepting the amendment offered by the Leader of the Opposition and will refer this question to the courts, if they feel a reference is needed. I myself confess that I do not feel that it is needed; I do not think there is any doubt that is worth considering. However, if they feel there is a doubt, I hope they will refer the matter to the courts. Surely it is the height of colonialism—and no other word can be applied to it—to seek to vest in Westminster a jurisdiction which they have never had—which they did not assume in 1867 and of which certainly, once the Statute of Westminster was passed, they divested themselves—and to seek to put into a British statute something no one has ever questioned since 1867 until the minister had this bright idea quite recently, namely the right of this parliament to do something which this parliament has done over and over again and which has been the basis of the tenure of county and district court judges since the year 1913 without any kind of question. It almost passes comprehension why a government should seek to be so abject.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Nonsense.

Mr. Pickersgill: What purpose they think this is going to serve it is very hard to perceive.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Argue it on a sensible basis.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member does not know what that means.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Carleton says "argue this on a sensible basis". If the hon. member for Carleton belongs to the school of thought that wants to vest in Westminster again the control of parts of the constitution of this country that have always since 1867 been vested in this parliament, I do not know what other convenient words could be found for such an attitude than a colonial attitude.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is the worst tommyrot I have ever heard.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can make a speech in his own time and refute the argument and give any good reason at all why this should be done. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I think there is some real question whether by an address of two houses of this parliament, we can properly and constitutionally vest once more in the parliament of Westminster something of which it divested itself at the time of the Statute of Westminster. This is not an amendment to the British North America Act at all. This is not an amendment at all. This is putting into the British North America Act something that has never been there. In so far as county and district courts are concerned, it is a new enactment. As far as superior court judges are concerned, I quite grant that it is an amendment and quite a valid one. Our only objection to that amendment—and, as I said before the dinner recess, it is a matter about which we feel strongly—is this breach of contract which we think is totally unnecessary in view of the fact that we have had this regime for 93 years and, as the Prime Minister said in his opening speech, the courts of this country and the judges of this country will compare favourably with those of any other country.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. gentleman indicate why he thinks the attorney general of Newfoundland agreed to this proposal in the light of the strictures which the hon. gentleman has been uttering?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not the keeper of any other man's conscience. I speak for myself in this house and I will go on doing so. If I disagree with any man, however eminent he may be, whether he is the attorney general of any province, the Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister or anyone else and if I think I have a sound view, in a free country and in a free parliament I will express those views. The hon. gentleman does not need to think that he embarrasses me in the slightest by asking a question of that sort. In the first place, of course, that letter from the attorney general of Newfoundland which the Prime Minister read earlier today and which I will not read into the record again merely says that they are quite agreeable to this amendment. But in the language of any of those letters, except the correspondence with the government of Quebec, there is nothing that indicates anything pro or con their feeling on the question of retroactive legislation.

Mr. Ricard: What is your stand?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well what my stand is. I stand for honouring contracts, not for breaking them. That is our view. I am sure the attorney general of any province receiving that letter from the minister would have thought that obviously the minister was not going to break contracts but that what he was going to do was to ask for legislation regarding the tenure of appointments to be made from now on and not to change the terms of employment, the terms of a contract between Her Majesty and the judges of this country; and that is what the government in this address is seeking to do.

The worst feature of it all is that we are content to dishonour ourselves in this parliament. We are asking the British parliament to pass an act breaking contracts in this country. We are asking the British parliament to say that the tenure of office and remuneration of judges which they accepted and the terms of their employment should be changed by a statute of another country than their own. It seems to me that this is a shocking disrespect for the parliament of another country, to ask them to rubber stamp legislation which is so manifestly unjust, as this would be, as applied to the present incumbents.

I want to make it very clear again that so far as any appointments that may be made, if this legislation goes through, after the passing of this act are concerned, we are entirely in favour of the 75 years retirement age for anyone who accepts his employment on that basis. We think that is quite right and proper, as far as I am concerned for the reasons the Prime Minister gave at the beginning of the discussion. But we think that it is equally wrong to make these unilateral changes, and we think it would be wrong in the case, above all, of the judges whose position and independence should be safeguarded above that of anybody else in the community.

I return again to this other totally unnecessary, totally uncalled for and totally hypothetical proposal with respect to county and district court judges. It really is quite impossible to comprehend why the government should want to do this. What do they think they are going to accomplish by doing it?

Mr. Ricard: You will vote against it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course we are going to vote against it, and we will vote against the breaches of contract too; let there be no doubt about that.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): You are voting against "Joey".

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member can say all the silly things he likes. We are concerned with the business of this parliament, not about debating with people outside it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): But surely with some reality too.

Mr. Pickersgill: What reality is there about this Alice in Wonderland legislation? It is totally unnecessary. It is a subject which has been covered without question by this parliament—

Mr. Pearson: For over 90 years.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as the Leader of the Opposition says, for over 90 years. It makes no sense at all.

We do hope that the government, having heard our arguments in this matter, will accept the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition, and if that is done it would seem to me there would be no difficulty at all about the amended resolution receiving the support of the whole house.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is on the main motion. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks he will close the debate.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose for which I rise now is to move the amendment to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) referred this afternoon but before doing so there are one or two other things which I think should be said. In my remarks this afternoon I attempted to keep the discussion on a factual and non-political level but in the remarks that he made during the course of the afternoon and so far this evening the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) did his best to remove the discussion from that sphere and take it into the sphere of Alice in Wonderland—to use a phrase the hon. member himself used.

Rumour has it that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate stayed up all last evening to prepare his address for today and I must say that after listening to him I can well believe that is a fact because his remarks did seem to lie more in the realm of dreamland and fantasy than in a realm in which his remarks could have any relationship or bearing on the facts of the situation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Just a plain nightmare.

Mr. Fulton: My friend the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) says, "Just a plain nightmare" but I think the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate were perhaps not nightmare so much as fantasy because fantasy, as I understand it, is a matter that has no relationship to reality, whereas nightmare is sometimes founded on reality.

The reality of this situation is that the government asks parliament to consent to an address to Her Majesty to bring in a provision that judges of the superior courts will retire at the age of 75. In this respect the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, in so far as he addressed himself to the proposition before the house, dealt with two subjects: First, the question of whether or not there is here a breach of contract; and, second, whether or not there is a retrograde step in placing the position of district and county court judges under the constitution.

I have seldom heard so distorted an argument as that made by the hon. gentleman to the effect that to seek to place the position of judges of district and county courts of Canada under the constitution is a retrograde step. Yet that was the argument made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all.

Mr. Fulton: In an attempt to bolster his political position the hon. gentleman used charges of colonialism and similar inept words. Of course if we were to follow the course of my hon. friends opposite and the government that preceded us of which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was a member there might be some foundation for that charge but as I said this afternoon it is our intention—and we believe it will be successful—that the constitution of Canada will be repatriated. That is unlike the history of this matter under our predecessors when I recall the minister of justice of those days riding into battle dressed in shining armour as the great emancipator, the one who was to free the constitution of the slavery in which it was then enthralled and whose efforts of course fell to the ground. From there on it seemed quite acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite including, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that they should rest there.

Mr. Pearson: What have you done?

Mr. Fulton: If, therefore, we were to be content with that position there might be some foundation for the hon. member's charge. But as it is, his charge rests on no surer foundation than a suggestion that it is improper to regulate the relationships between parliament, the executive and an important branch of the judiciary by reference to the constitution.

Of course, as I recall some of the things that were done by the former government I can well understand their resentment of the attempt now being made to place the position of the judiciary with respect to the county and district courts on the sure basis of the constitution—

Mr. Pearson: Of the British parliament.

Mr. Fulton: My friend the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Leader of the Opposition by his endorsement of that argument would prefer to have the judiciary—the county court judges particularly—left to have their tenure of office—

Mr. Pearson: In Canadian hands.

Mr. Fulton: —determined—

Mr. Pickersgill: By the parliament of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: —by the government with no reference to the constitution whatever.

[Mr. Fulton.]

To show how inept and inapplicable all these arguments are may I refer to a case of 1930 which dealt with the question of whether or not there is a breach of contract involved in the address which is before the house. I believe this is the only serious point that has been made by my hon. friends opposite. I attempted to deal with it on a factual basis this afternoon but nothing of factual argument appears to impress my hon. friends opposite so perhaps I might reinforce my argument by a reference to judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada and of the privy council which dealt with that case.

I must refer to the stand taken both by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when they charged us with introducing through this address a form of breach of contract. It was interesting, Mr. Speaker, as Your Honour will recall, shortly before five o'clock to find the seriousness with which my hon. friends held to that view. You remember the vigour with which they made the charge that this represents a breach of contract. But I am sure you will remember also the answer of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to two or three questions that were asked him in that regard when it became apparent that all he was concerned about was not principle but price, and the only thing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the minister has said something which he knows is completely untrue. The truth is I said I would not wish to be a party to this kind of proposition at all, but that my argument would not be as strong if the persons who are to be retired did not suffer at all financially. I said I would not be a party to it at all.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the sensitivity of the hon. gentleman. Just how he distinguishes between an argument which is strong and an argument which is less strong when neither of them rests on any secure foundation at all I am unable to say. The fact of the matter is that my hon. friend in effect agreed that the main difference between us was the extent to which—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I did not agree.

Mr. Fulton: —the judges who would be affected by this resolution might lose some monetary interest that they had in their present position.

Well, sir, that is a concern that I can understand, and I attempted to deal with it on a factual basis this afternoon by pointing out that they would not really suffer any great disadvantage in that the effective date of the change had been postponed to March 1 and in the interim we were bringing in substantial changes to the pension provision. Notwithstanding that argument, notwithstanding that my hon. friend had to agree that the real difference between us was price and not principle, he went on to repeat that there was here a breach of contract. Let me refer him to a case which arose as the result of certain actions taken by the government of Mr. Mackenzie King in 1930, as they affected the case of a Mr. Reilly. I think it was in 1923 that Mr. Clifford B. Reilly had been appointed a member of a commission dealing with pensions. The case of Clifford B. Reilly and His Majesty the King is reported in the Supreme Court of Canada Reports, 1932, and the case before the privy council is reported in the Law Reports, Appeal Cases, 1934.

Mr. Reilly had been appointed by order in council and by commission as a member of the federal appeal board under section 10 of an act to amend the Pension Act, 1923. His appointment was extended on a number of occasions, the last extension being for a period of five years from August 17, 1928. Now, notwithstanding the high regard which my hon. friends opposite had for this principle of sanctity of contract, notwithstanding that they had appointed a man and then extended his appointment at, he alleged, great personal sacrifice on assuming the office and on retaining it—they extended his appointment for a period of five years from August 17, 1928—my hon. friends opposite or their predecessors by solemn legislative enactment abolished the office as one of their last acts as a government on May 30, 1930. Mr. Reilly accordingly sued the crown, claiming damages for breach of contract—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Fulton: The Supreme Court of Canada in a judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Orde, judge ad hoc, gave the following judgment:

> Here there was no dismissal from office by the crown in the ordinary sense. Parliament abolished the office. The power of the crown to abolish a civil office and thereby to deprive the holder thereof of any right to further compensation is recognized in Young v. Waller. If in cases where its power is not restricted by statute the crown may abolish an office, a fortiori parliament which created it must surely possess the power.

This is a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, and I always understood, in spite of what he said this afternoon that my hon. friend, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, does have, when it consorts with his argument, a due regard for the courts of the land. Then I would hope that he would recognize that in this case the Supreme Court of Canada has itself established the basis of the refutation of his argument, his absurd argument, his nightmarish, fantastic argument, his Alice in Wonderland argument, that there is here a breach of contract—

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: —for the parliament under whose authority a man was appointed to office—

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister tell us whether the office that Mr. Reilly held was an office consecrated under the British North America Act guaranteeing tenure for life during good behaviour? If not, of course the case does not apply at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is that part of the question?

Mr. Fulton: It is quite obvious that even if I read the whole of the judgment my hon. friend would not agree with it, and therefore I am not going to read the judgment because the question is answered by what I have already said and quoted from the judgment.

Mr. Pickersgill: It has no bearing whatever.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the hon. member may be more impressed by the judgment of the privy council. As I say, Mr. Reilly appealed the case to the privy council. The judgment was given in the privy council by Lord Atkin, as reported at page 176 and 177 and following pages in Appeal Cases, 1934. Lord Atkin had this to say, among other things, with respect to the question of contract. You see, Mr. Speaker, what my hon. friends fail to realize is that they have based their case on the argument that there was a contract between the government and the judges who are appointed, and in so far as that is their allegation, then this case and this judgment are exactly in point. If my hon. friends would come to the heart of the matter and recognize that there is no contract then, of course, the situation might be different. I am taking it on their basis.

Mr. Pearson: What did Mr. Bennett say about it?

Mr. Fulton: If I have to get into Alice in Wonderland a little bit I apologize, but I have to follow the arguments that have been made. Lord Atkin said as follows:

> So far as the rights and obligations rested on contract, further performance of the contract had been made by statute impossible, and the contract was discharged.

Then this is an interesting part of the judgment:

> It is perhaps unnecessary to add that discharged means put an end to and does not mean broken. In the result, therefore, the appellant has failed to show a breach of contract on which to found damages.

Then Lord Atkin goes on a little later:

> Finally, and almost inevitably in such a case, an appeal was made to the British North America Act, and it was said that legislation abolishing the office without compensation was an interference with "property and civil rights". But, as before, if the right was in itself determinable by statute, there was no interference with it.

Then he continues:

> It would be strange that the dominion should have power to create an office but no power to abolish it except on the terms of awarding compensation apparently for the full term of the original office.

This is exactly what the hon. member is asking us to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fulton: Not for just a moment. They have agreed there is no difference in principle but only in price, and what they say is—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true.

Mr. Fulton: What they are saying in effect is because you are terminating the services you can only do it on the basis that you have to continue the salary.

My hon. friend has said his argument would not be nearly as strong if we were prepared to allow those judges to continue at the same salary even although they ceased to serve as judges which is, to my mind, an entirely untenable position. I come back to the point made by Lord Atkin that it would be strange that an authority or authorities having the power to create an office have no power to terminate it except on the condition that they should continue to pay compensation, measured by the full salary that the incumbents were receiving before the office was terminated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister now permit my question?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question is this: Is the minister contending that the dominion, in the sense Lord Atkin used it, created the office of superior court judge or that the office was created by the British North America Act, because if he takes that position his whole argument falls to the ground.

Mr. Fulton: I am contending that the right to appoint to the office of superior court judge is established under the British North America Act. What we are asking for is an amendment to the British North America Act to provide that judges cease to hold office on attaining the age of 75 years. The principles enunciated in the judgment to which I have referred are exactly applicable in this case. If the power to appoint to an office is established by statute, which is the British North America Act, and if that statute is amended in the proper constitutional method, to terminate the tenure of that office in a certain event, then any talk about breach of contract is just so much nonsense, so much fantasy, so much Alice in Wonderland, as was indulged in by the hon. member this afternoon.

Mr. Pearson: Page R. B. Bennett.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, I know the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was a fervent follower of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but it seems to me he is debating the amendment which has been disposed of by the house. He might proceed now to the main motion.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think I could establish a case to the contrary but I will not do so, because I think it is important that we should get to the amendment which I propose to move with regard to the extension of time for the effective date of the coming into force of this legislation.

I had intended to refer to the question of whether or not this proposal should be founded upon an amendment to the British North America Act, and to refer my hon. friends to some statements by Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, which I hope Your Honour will agree is a matter germane to the part of the discussion upon which I am now engaged.

There has been a question as to whether the main motion, which is the resolution before the house, should in fact be presented to the house by way of a constitutional amendment or whether it should have been referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for an opinion or whether, indeed, this parliament should not simply have assumed the right to amend the British North America Act instead of presenting an address to Her Majesty praying that the United Kingdom parliament should enact an amendment to the British North America Act. I think that what Mr. St. Laurent had to say in that regard is important, and I trust that whether or not the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council will be accepted as authorities by my hon. friends opposite, at least what was said by so eminent an authority as their recent leader and the recent prime minister of Canada will be accepted by them and might dispose of this argument.

In 1944, the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent had this to say as reported on page 2248 of Hansard of that day:

> Mr. Speaker, I think in about two minutes I can give the assurance that hon. members have sought, that at the very first opportunity the matter of an amendment to the British North America Act to deal with the provision which now gives judges of the provincial superior courts a life tenure in their office will be considered.

It was quite apparent that Mr. St. Laurent was prepared to introduce legislation or present to parliament a motion ending the so-called life tenure of superior court judges and to establish a retirement age. He went on to say this:

> This is in my opinion a matter which should not be presented for amendment to the imperial parliament without previous discussion with the provinces, because the administration of justice and the establishment of the courts are matters that are within provincial jurisdiction.

It was obvious that Mr. St. Laurent felt that before you could bring in legislation which in effect provided for the elimination of an office in the courts or touched on the organization of the courts, that was a matter upon which you had to have the consent of the provinces and you had to submit the legislation to the United Kingdom parliament. This is exactly what we are doing here.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister repeat the date of that?

Mr. Pickersgill: That was before the act of 1949.

Mr. Fulton: Before the act of 1949; yes, but if my friend is referring to the amendment to section 91 (1) of the British North America Act, let me direct my friend's attention to the important words of Mr. St. Laurent:

> —the administration of justice and the establishment of the courts are matters that are within provincial jurisdiction.

Surely my hon. friend, who has made this passing, fantastic reference to section 91 (1) of the British North America Act, will not contend that this subject is within the purview of section 91 (1) when he himself pointed out today that that section enacted in 1949 applies only to matters that are not within provincial jurisdiction. Mr. St. Laurent continued:

> It is my view that the proper procedure with respect to amendments to the British North America Act when dealing with any portion that gives jurisdiction to provincial legislatures should involve prior conference and consultation with the legislatures, and if it is sought to take away from them something which has been allotted to them, their consent should be obtained.

Then Mr. Bence interrupted:

> That is not the case here, may I suggest.

Mr. St. Laurent replied:

> I would consider that it is a case where there should be consultation with the provinces, because under section 92 they have jurisdiction in respect of the constitution of the courts, and section 99 is not placed specifically within dominion or provincial powers because it is something which affects both the powers of the governor in council and the powers of the provinces with regard to the setting up and the manning of the courts of justice. It is a matter which was on the agenda for discussion at the last provincial conference, and it certainly will be one of the matters to be considered at the next provincial conference.

As the house knows, unfortunately the government of that day was not able, nor was the following Liberal government able, to get any agreement whatever with the provinces with respect to this important matter. It was not until the year 1959, under the government of the present Prime Minister, that we were able to arrive at an agreement with the provinces with respect to this amendment. Now we find my hon. friends opposite indulging in the extraordinary tactics of suggesting that somehow or other, notwithstanding what their own former leader, an eminent prime minister and eminent jurist said, there is something improper, something vaguely doubtful about the method being followed by the present government in respect of the office of superior court judges. What we now see is quite the opposite from what I hoped and thought this afternoon would be the case, namely that my hon. friends opposite would recognize that, politics apart, here was a real step forward which could solve a constitutional dilemma of this country, on the contrary they appear to be so jealous and so activated by their jealousy they are prepared to attack what is being done on the flimsiest of grounds.

Mr. St. Laurent next discussed this subject in the House of Commons in 1946, as reported at page 2711 of Hansard, when he said, initially using a rhetorical question:

> Is it still the opinion of the Minister of Justice that an amendment to the British North America Act, which would provide power to retire judges at a stated age, would require the consent of the provincial legislatures? To that my answer is that, notwithstanding the vote of last night, I persist in that view. I attempted to make it clear in that debate that I considered there had been an allocation of jurisdiction and that this parliament had no right to deal with matters which had been allocated to the provincial legislatures, and that when there was joint responsibility, if any change was to be made that would affect such control as the provincial legislatures and governments have under the constitution, their consent would have to be obtained.

The present Prime Minister then asked:

Would it have to be the consent of all the provinces?

To this, Mr. St. Laurent replied:

In my opinion it would have to be the consent of all the provinces that would be affected thereby. I consider that they have been given jurisdiction sovereign powers, which they get not from this parliament but from the imperial parliament, and it is their jurisdiction; so we cannot take it from them without their consent, any more than if we wanted to take from a legislature of a state of the American union some of its powers.

Again, the present Prime Minister asked:

Every province would be in that position.

Mr. St. Laurent replied:

Every province would be in that position.
my view.

It is in recognition of that position that the government has introduced this proposal in the form in which it is before the house, namely a resolution asking this house to adopt an address to Her Majesty praying that she will cause to be laid before the United Kingdom parliament an amendment to the British North America Act. This amendment covers not only the retirement age of judges of superior courts but, in order to make the matter clear beyond any doubt, it asks the United Kingdom parliament to provide, by way of an addition to the constitution of Canada, that the judges of district and county courts will also have their retirement age at 75 years confirmed. Inasmuch as the constitution of district and county courts is a matter of provincial jurisdiction and inasmuch as they are covered by section 92 (14) of the British North America Act I am at a loss to understand why my hon. friends take the extraordinary position that it is a retrograde step to ask that the matter be regularized by having it included in the constitution.

As I have pointed out it is the objective of the present Prime Minister—and it is one which we believe he will be successful in achieving in the same way as we have been successful in achieving this constitutional step forward, unlike our predecessors—it is his objective to reach a measure of agreement, which will result in the repatriation of the constitution so that the control of all the judges of Canada will be brought back to the parliament and to the legislatures of Canada instead of being left, as now, in the United Kingdom. On that basis we say that not only does this proposal not require any defence but that what is being done is right and proper and will place the position of district and county court judges on the basis on which they should be.

Mr. Pearson: And on which they have never been.

Mr. Fulton: What would happen if they were not included in this address? One would have an extraordinary situation if he considers what would happen if they were left out. Section 1 would say that judges of superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour and shall be removable by the governor general on address of the Senate and House of Commons. Section 2 would say that judges of the superior, district and county courts shall cease to hold office on attaining the age of 75 years. This would be a most intolerable distinction and differentiation between the position of judges of district and county courts on the one hand and judges of superior courts on the other. Hence, on any basis on which you care to put it, Mr. Speaker, whether it be on the basis of rationalization of the position of judges of these courts or whether it be on the basis that we will not have any difference between judges of one court who are over 75 who may continue in office and judges who are appointed later but must retire at 75,—on whatever basis you put it—the proposal now before the house will bring a degree of rationality and a degree of order that is most desirable in establishing the position of the judges of our courts.

The only thing that remains then is to move the amendment on which I believe all parties in the house are agreed, namely that the effective date of the legislation to be adopted by the United Kingdom parliament be postponed to March 1, 1961. Accordingly, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), I move:

That the resolution be amended by deleting paragraph numbered "3" at the end thereof and substituting therefor the following:

3. This act shall come into force on the first day of March nineteen hundred and sixty one.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has just moved is, of course, necessary for the purposes which the government has in mind. However, I think I should point out that if this resolution had been proceeded with, as it should have been, much earlier than the present date, it would not have been necessary to provide for this amendment. In any event, the minister has not made clear that the amendment is really essential. However, there is nothing fundamental in the amendment itself, and one need not spend any time on it except to observe that once this resolution is passed the matter could be dealt with by the United Kingdom parliament, certainly before the end of the date referred to in the third clause of the section of which this is an amendment.

This is an important matter, as both the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) have indicated. Any matter affecting the constitution of our country is a matter of great importance; and generally speaking, this debate has reflected our appreciation of the importance of the matter. Certainly any question affecting the judiciary of our country—whether it be the judges of the district and county courts or of the superior courts or, for that matter, anyone holding judicial office—is a matter of great importance.

It is true that in this common law jurisdiction we do not have the same mathematical appreciation of the division of the functions of government which Montesquieu thought applied to the form of government in Britain and perforce in Canada. But the fact is that the legislature and the executive share with the judicial arm the important function of preserving order in our free society. Any step taken that in any way violates or depreciates the integrity or the security of the judiciary in any of these levels is or should be a matter of concern.

Mr. Pallett: Will the hon. member indicate the article from which he is quoting?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was not quoting from any article. I was simply saying, for my hon. friend's benefit, that the great French writer Montesquieu referred to the British system of government as being made up of the executive, the legislature and the judiciary. I hope my hon. friend, who has had some training in political science, will remember who Montesquieu was.

The Prime Minister said that there was nothing unusual in what was being done today.

Of course, I do not know whether he had in mind that on previous occasions addresses had been presented to the United Kingdom parliament with regard to differing proposed constitutional amendments. I think that what we are now doing is unusual in that we are seeking to endow through this parliament which owes its existence constitutionally to a legislature outside of this country an authority to that legislature which that legislative body never claimed or never had. We are also seeking to ask this other authority, the parliament of the United Kingdom, to assume and to continue to assume a power which we might have removed from the United Kingdom parliament and placed forever within our own country.

For example, I would have liked to have seen this amendment provide, not that the United Kingdom should fix the ages of judges but that we should receive from the United Kingdom parliament the power ourselves to determine the circumstances of retirement of our superior court judges as to age or any other circumstance of tenure. But that is not what is being done in the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister.

Much of the argument has surrounded an alleged breach of contract. In so far as superior court judges are concerned what is now proposed by the government is that not only with regard to judges to be appointed but judges who are now serving on the bench they shall serve under conditions that did not attend when they were appointed. Because of that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has argued that there is a breach of contract.

That in itself is an important matter. It is not the only point on which I would register complaint but it is a point of importance and one to which the Minister of Justice has addressed himself. He has said, of course, that to say there is a contract between the state and the judge under the circumstances outlined by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is nonsense, and he cites as his authority the Reilly case. The Reilly case had nothing to do with a judicial appointment whatsoever. There may have been a breach of contract in that particular case—I am not saying that there was because I am not familiar with the details—but certainly that case does not in any way help us in the particular instance.

We do have parallel situations. Some of these were referred to today by the Leader of the Opposition. He referred to the amendment of 1927 and the arguments made on that occasion by Mr. Bennett, who complained along with Mr. Cahan—and there were not at that time, and perhaps not since, two better lawyers serving as members of this house—about the particular amendment on the ground, inter alia, that this was a breach of contract that the judges had been appointed under circumstances which they had a right to assume gave them an unlimited tenure of office, except for removal because of bad behaviour.

Mr. Bennett had dealt with this matter forcefully. When in 1933 the then solicitor general, Mr. Dupre, on March 4, moved the first reading of a bill to amend the Judges Act to provide that any judge continuing in office after 75 should suffer a reduction in salary of an amount equal to that which he would receive at 75, the leader of the opposition of that day, reminding the house of the position taken by the opposition in 1930 which had caused Mr. Lapointe, the minister of justice of that day, to alter the course which he had adopted, went on to remind the house that the provisions of the bill appeared to violate contracts between the crown and members of the judiciary.

In support of this position Mr. Lapointe the then minister of justice quoted Mr. Bennett as having said in 1927, under circumstances that are exactly the same as those which now confront the house:

> What we are now doing involves a breach of the contract between the individual who holds office at the present time and the state, because his patent of office declares that he shall hold office during life or during good behaviour.

Then Mr. Bennett, in speaking of a particular judge, went on—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would allow me to intervene at this point in order to say that if he pursues this argument I think it should be by leave of the house. I have allowed him some latitude because I did not check the minister until he had introduced the case to which the hon. member who has the floor has now referred, but the point which concerns me is this. The amendment on which the house has voted was directed to a deletion of the words in subsection (2) of section 99, which when deleted remove the question of breach of contract from this debate. The house has negatived that principle now by its vote, and it would appear to me that just as the minister was out of order in pursuing the argument that a breach of contract would occur if this resolution were given effect to with respect to judges already appointed, so is the hon. member for Essex East out of order. Therefore he should not pursue that argument. If his argument with respect to breach of contract relates to judges appointed afterwards, that of course would put him in order; but I fail to see how this argument could relate to that matter.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on the point you have just raised you will recall that the Minister of Justice at the beginning of this debate made a long speech. He said that he would be moving subsequently another amendment but that he did not wish to take advantage of the second opportunity to make any more of a speech than to move the amendment, and he was right, of course, in moving an amendment. When the minister got up to move that amendment, he then took advantage of that opportunity to reply to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who had spoken before the original amendment was voted on. Therefore if the Minister of Justice can make that speech on the very point the hon. member is on now, surely the hon. member is entitled in his first speech to deal not only with the amendment but with the motion before the house in order to explain the stand we will be taking on the resolution.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Speaker: I have, of course, acknowledged the exact point which the Leader of the Opposition makes and I did not intervene until the hon. member for Essex East had fairly well dealt with what had been raised by the minister. I suggest that if he proceeds it should be by leave of the house, because it is clear he is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could raise a point of order in this context. Perhaps I should have raised it when you raised the point with the Minister of Justice. My point of order is that the house has negatived an amendment, it is true, but we are still surely debating whether this whole resolution should carry. What we are seeking to do now is to argue that the resolution contains offensive material and therefore should not be passed by the house.

Mr. Speaker: I am quite content, if the house is, that the hon. member proceed with the argument which he is making, but I felt I was duty bound to raise the point because I had raised it with the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of your ruling I do not know whether or not I have the leave of the house I do feel that the Minister of Justice spent some time on this point, I think quite properly in view of the importance of the subject. I submit an opportunity ought to be afforded to reply. But I am in the hands of the house and I do not know whether the house has extended its consent or not.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may proceed until objection is taken.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The point I was dealing with was that this very question had arisen and was dealt with by Mr. Bennett in terms similar to those used by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I had not completed the sentence that Mr. Bennett had used when speaking of the case of a particular judge. He said:

> That judge undoubtedly has a contract with the state which entitles him to receive a salary for life or until such time as he resigns. I think the government will be well advised to consider whether or not in all cases of this kind where the contract has been amended the judge should receive full salary. I think we must have regard to the terms and conditions under which the original contract was made. Although it may seem out of the ordinary that a judge should draw full salary when he is retired compulsorily, nevertheless good faith and morals in my judgment impose on us that obligation and it is an obligation we should not likely disregard.

So the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was in good company. It must seem obvious that even though there might have been no written contract there are all the elements present in an implied contract when a judge is appointed to office. The argument of breach of contract is a strong argument, and one with which the Minister of Justice has not properly dealt.

I submit there is another argument, one which is even stronger, one that should impress the Minister of Justice. The judiciary must in every way be independent. Judges must be able by virtue of their tenure to carry out their functions in such a manner as not to be open in any way to interference except with regard to the matter of good behaviour, whether by parliament or by any body or authority in the country. This was what Sir Winston Churchill had in mind on April 23, 1954 when this kind of question was being discussed. That right hon. gentleman had this to say of the judges, and I think his words apply with equal force to the present situation:

> There is nothing like them at all in our island. They are appointed for life. They cannot be dismissed by the executive government. They cannot be dismissed by the crown either by the prerogative or on the advice of ministers. They have to interpret the law according to their learning and conscience. They are distinguishable from the great officers of state and other servants of the executive, high or low, and from the leaders of commerce and industry. They are also clearly distinguishable from the holders of less exalted judicial office. Nothing but an address from both houses of parliament, assented to by the crown, can remove them.

With regard to those judges now on the bench, what is involved is this: we are interfering, by this measure, with their independence, an independence which is guaranteed to them under our system of law and under the governmental practice which prevails both here and in other commonwealth countries. That is what we are doing. It is not that we on this side of the house do not agree, in view of the acceptance in the public mind of a retiring age for judges, that the age of 75 is, perhaps the correct age. Our opposition does not arise because we are opposed to that principle. We are in favour of it, although we recognize that in our own country there have been judges away past the age of 75 who have rendered distinguished service in the prosecution of our system of law. Sir William Mulock, the late chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, Sir Lyman Duff, occur at once to my mind and we know the record in the United States of Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Holmes. We know the record of Lord Chief Justice Goddard in the United Kingdom, and other judicial luminaries who have contributed to the cause of justice notwithstanding their age. Nevertheless, we are in agreement with the government on the age of retirement. We ask simply that this should be applied in such a way as not to weaken the independence of the judiciary; that it should apply only to judges yet to be appointed, not to those who have already been appointed.

What is involved here is not only a breach of contract with regard to superior court judges but something more important. We are taking a step which I am sure any student or any serious lawyer would recognize as being a violation in principle of the necessary independence that must attach to the judiciary. Sir Winston Churchill felt so strongly on the subject that he went on in the same debate to say:

> The principle of the complete independence of the judiciary from the executive is the foundation of many things in our island life. It has been widely imitated in varying degrees throughout the free world. It is perhaps one of the deepest gulfs between us and all forms of totalitarian rule. The only subordination which a judge knows in his judicial capacity is that which he owes to the existing body of legal doctrine enunciated in years past by his brethren on the bench, past and present, and upon the laws passed by parliament which have received the royal assent. The judge has not only to do justice between man and man. He also —and this is one of his most important functions, considered incomprehensible in some large parts of the world—has to do justice between the citizens and the state. The British judiciary, with its traditions and record, is one of the greatest living assets of our race and people and the independence of the judiciary is a part of our message to the ever-growing world which is rising so swifty around us.

Those words apply no less to the judiciary in this country. We should hesitate before taking any step which could be regarded in any way as a violation of the independence of the judiciary which we all postulate as an essential condition of our legal system.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And which is perfectly preserved in this legislation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not believe that to be the case, if I may say so to the hon. member with respect, because we are saying to judges who have already been appointed for life: hereafter you will retire at the age of 75 years, notwithstanding the fact that when you were appointed no such limitation was part of the arrangement made by the government of the day. That certainly is an interference in theory at least, in principle, with the independence of those judges. One can conceive of situations—and I am not saying these presently exist, because I do not think the Prime Minister, who is a responsible lawyer, would concur—such as have happened in another country where the highest court was packed under conditions which caused the greatest controversy. Many learned societies and individuals in the United States were greatly concerned with the place of the judiciary in regard to the constitution as a result. That sort of thing could happen here. I am not saying that is the situation in the case before us. It is not, obviously. What I am saying is simply this: once a judge has been appointed for life we should not by an act of parliament take any step which they would not take in the United Kingdom parliament, as the words of Sir Winston Churchill so well establish.

With regard to the future, that is another matter. Judges if appointed in the future will know the circumstances and conditions of their appointment and if they are forced to retire at 75 no one could argue then that that compulsion or requirement in any way interfered with their tenure of office or with their independence. I am sure that the Prime Minister will agree that these words of Sir Winston Churchill have a cogency, a relevancy and an application to this situation in principle and it is the principle of the matter, of course, with which we are concerned.

The other matter on which we have differed from the administration is with regard to the position of district and county court judges. Those judges now hold their office under the Judges Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 159, section 35. As both the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the Leader of the Opposition stated, this provision is one of long standing. It has been in practice ever since this confederation of ours came into being. The first act taken by this parliament to fix the age of judges of the district or county courts was in 1903. No one at that time contested that it was within the exclusive competence of this parliament, without any reference to the United Kingdom parliament, to limit the tenure of district judges. That question has never arisen. Notwithstanding that the administration of justice in this country has been under Liberal and Conservative administration, distinguished ministers of justice like Sir Charles Doherty, Mr. Lapointe, Mr. Guthrie, Mr. St. Laurent—

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Fulton?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —have never questioned the right of this parliament to deal with the tenure of district court judges. To my knowledge the first suggestion ever made was in 1927 when a question was put to the then minister of justice by an hon. member of this house. The only other occasion to my knowledge when any doubt was raised about the situation is today through the resolution now before us. It will be remembered that in 1927 Mr. Boys, the then hon. member for Simcoe, addressed a question to the then minister of justice, Mr. Lapointe, in this form:

> While the minister is upon that point may I ask if there is any special provision in the British North America Act with respect to the retirement of county court judges? There was an amendment put through, if I remember correctly, in the year 1913 or the year 1914, providing for the compulsory retirement of county court judges upon reaching the age of 75 years. Is there any special provision in the British North America Act which provides for legislation of that character?

The minister said, "No". Mr. Cahan and Mr. Bennett were also active participants in the debate. They did not take exception to Mr. Lapointe's statement when he said:

> No, not at all, but I would point out that section 99 applies only to the judges of the superior courts.

There was never any doubt about that. Apart from the question asked by Mr. Boys, the first doubt expressed was the suggestion we now have had from the Minister of Justice. What is the argument he adduces? The hon. gentleman tabled some correspondence with the attorneys general. I have read that correspondence and I am not aware that there is any letter in which real doubt is expressed as to the constitutional competence of the federal parliament to deal with the tenure of district judges. There is no suggestion in any of those letters that warrants the grave doubt which the Minister of Justice has sought to indicate exists in this matter by the attorneys general of the provinces.

If there were any doubt surely rather than take what might be regarded as a regressive step the Minister of Justice, before withdrawing from this parliament a power which we say undoubtedly exists should have sought an opinion from the Supreme Court of Canada as to whether or not this matter of the tenure of district judges was or was not a matter that came within the exclusive competence of the parliament of Canada.

We are asked by this resolution that the power which we have had for so many years, the power to deal with the tenure of office of district and county court judges, the duration of their function and their removal from office, be limited by the constitution, and by asking for the approval of the provinces the present government may well have made it necessary in future to consult the provinces if further changes become desirable.

The present government by this action will impose on the United Kingdom parliament additional power at a time when the effort of all of us is to bring to this country in the course of time, and we hope at the earliest possible time, full power to amend our own constitution. That is what our objective is. What the Minister of Justice is now doing represents a regressive step. It will endow the United Kingdom parliament with a power which I am sure it does not want to exercise and which through the common endeavour of all of us in this house and I am sure of all provincial governments, we are anxious to see settled finally in this country once agreement can be obtained between the two senior levels of government.

Up until now this parliament has been free at any time to amend the constitution without reference to the provinces or to the British parliament in matters affecting the district and county court judges. The Prime Minister said that all of us in this house want to see reside in this country the power to amend our own constitution. The provinces now have that power in respect of matters that come under section 92 of the British North America Act. We have that power with regard to matters that come within our exclusive competence. But in respect of those matters that are of common concern to the federal government and the provinces the objective of most of us in this country, if agreement can be achieved on the part of the two senior levels of government, is to see that the power of constitutional amendment is given to the proper authority in this country.

What the minister is doing by this resolution is to reverse the process. If this resolution is passed, as undoubtedly it will be, it will extend to the parliament of the United Kingdom a power which since 1867 has resided outside the United Kingdom. Can anything be more unjustifiable in view of the fact that we all take pride in our sovereign status?

I ask the Minister of Justice to reconsider this particular phase of the resolution. I am sure that the point made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is valid. It is doubtful if we have any power to do what is proposed in the case of district court judges. It is certainly doubtful that the United Kingdom parliament will have any power to deal with this matter at all in so far as the tenure of district court judges is concerned. I should not be surprised if the United Kingdom parliament would refuse to deal with this particular phase of the resolution, as a matter outside its competence. If that should eventuate—and I am not so sure that it is not a pretty good anticipation—then we would be faced in this country with a most ridiculous situation.

By incorporating an express provision of the British North America Act in this resolution the government is now putting itself in the position of making it necessary hereafter to consult the provinces if at any time it seems desirable to change this provision and to seek from the British parliament a further amendment of the British North America Act. A moment ago my hon. friend referred to Mr. St. Laurent.

Mr. Martineau: Will the hon. member permit a question? Does he feel that the provinces should have been consulted on this particular address?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not saying whether or not it is a good thing that there was no consultation in this matter, but what I am saying is that it is our duty in this house to follow the constitution. The constitution of Canada, the British North America Act, by its clear, implicit terms does not impose any obligation on this parliament, or on the executive of this parliament, to consult the provinces with regard to the tenure of district court judges.

The situation with regard to superior court judges is different. Mr. St. Laurent took the position that with regard to superior court judges it was a matter of common concern to the federal and the provincial governments. It is not a question of what my hon. friend would like to see. The question is, what is the law? The law is clear in this regard. Section 96 of the British North America Act provides that the governor general shall appoint the judges of the superior district and county courts in each province except those of the courts of probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The act makes no provision whatsoever as to the tenure of offices of judges of the district and county courts; but section 99 does provide that—and it is worth while to read it:

> The judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Therefore it is not very difficult to see it is obvious that if the British North America Act provided only with respect to judges of the superior courts that they could hold office during good behaviour, that is to say for life, it must follow that no such condition attached to the appointment of district and county court judges, and that those who appointed them would be free to make the appointments for a lesser time than life. That has been the practice for 90 years of Liberal and Conservative administrations. That principle was practised in the days of Mr. Bennett, in the days of Sir Robert Borden, in the days of Mr. Meighen, in the days of Sir Charles Tupper, in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald, and now it is going to be changed by the Hon. Davie Fulton. Surely, that is the answer to my hon. friend.

Amendment to B.N.A. Act

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the hon. member a supplementary question? If that appears to be the answer of the hon. gentleman, if the provinces should have been consulted, then does it not follow that this parliament has not the right by itself to amend the constitution on a matter in which both the federal government and the provinces have an interest, a matter of mixed jurisdiction?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All I can say to my hon. friend is that if the foundation was as he stated then I would perhaps be inclined to find some reason for agreeing, but that is not the situation. The British North America Act is clear in the matter.

Mr. Martineau: Exactly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It does not say that the federal parliament is in any way restricted with regard to district court judges. If it said so, then obviously there would have to be consultation and there would be consultation. But what we are arguing now is that by including the district court judges in this particular address we are limiting unnecessarily, and I say unconstitutionally, our powers, powers actually given to us. Now we are seeking to extend these powers to an outside authority instead of getting additional power or greater freedom to amend our own constitution. What hon. gentlemen are now doing—it is apparent, unwittingly and unintentionally—is binding us more and more to an outside authority, the parliament of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Martineau: Answer the question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "answer the question". That surely is the situation.

We have argued the matter, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure it will be recognized that this is an important matter. There are differences of opinion. We find it difficult to understand how the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister can take the view which they must be assumed to take in this matter of the district court judges—

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I do not want to disturb him. When the hon. gentleman says it has not been done before does he forget the act to amend the Supreme Court Act in 1927?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I dealt with 1927. The act of 1927 dealt with superior court judges. I have been talking about district court judges.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With regard to 1927 there is no doubt that that was a move made along parallel lines by the then minister of justice. He corrected his position in 1930 by recognizing the validity of what Mr. Bennett had said. What I have been saying—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I interrupt the hon. member promptly when there is still one minute before ten—but his time has expired —in order to see whether the house is ready for the question.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time I have had the unhappy chore of following my namesake, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I must confess that I feel a bit inadequate to do so. I console myself in the fact that like a Holstein cow which gives a great volume of milk there is not too much butterfat in it.

As a relatively new member in this house, with only three years experience, I have listened very attentively to this debate today and I have come to the following conclusions. The Liberals are willing to retire any Tory judges at 75 years of age but not Liberal judges. The Tories are willing to retire Liberal judges at 75 years plus any future Tory judges who may be appointed. The C.C.F. are in the happy position that they are willing to retire both Liberal and Tory judges at 75 years of age.

Amendment (Mr. Fulton) agreed to, on division.

Resolution as amended agreed to, on division.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the house leader intends to do tomorrow?

Mr. Brooks: Tomorrow we will take item No. 5 on today's order paper, the house in committee on Bill No. C-71, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952. After that we shall go on with the estimates of the Post Office Department, followed by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

On Thursday we shall continue with the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, followed by the estimates not finished on Wednesday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

DISARMAMENT—LETTER AND SOVIET PROPOSALS—PRIME MINISTER'S REPLY

Text of Letter on disarmament dated June 2, 1960 from the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the U.S.S.R. to the Prime Minister of Canada.

His Excellency Mr. John G. Diefenbaker,
Prime Minister of Canada,
City of Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I would like to address you on the question of general and complete disarmament, which is the most important question confronting the world at the present time. Nowadays, in the age of atom, space rockets and electronics, the necessity to take daring and far-reaching actions aimed at finding a solution of the disarmament problem has become especially acute. Is it not obvious that now common sense cannot be reconciled any longer with the whirl of armaments, which is pulling toward an unprecedented disaster and which is indeed perniciously affecting all aspects of the life of society?

In the course of its preparations for the Paris conference of the heads of government, the Soviet government has worked out proposals which constitute the elaboration of the general and complete disarmament program which I, on behalf of the Soviet government submitted to the fourteenth session of the U.N. general assembly last September.

In those proposals we took into consideration certain observations expressed by our partners in negotiations and, in particular, the ideas expressed by the government of France to the effect that at the beginning of the implementation of the disarmament program measures should be undertaken to eliminate the means of delivering nuclear weapons to targets. Some other proposals put forward by a number of governments, including those made in the course of discussions in the ten-nation committee on disarmament, have also been taken into consideration. However, we were unfortunately unable to discuss those proposals at the meeting of the heads of government.

Latest developments have not reduced but on the contrary increased the determination of the Soviet government to seek a radical solution of the disarmament problem, the liquidation of the armaments race, which is dangerous and useless for the peoples. The Soviet government, being guided by its invariable policy of peaceful co-existence among states, intends, as it has before, to do everything necessary for the invigoration of the international situation and the improvement of relations among states.

Upon my return from Paris to Moscow the Soviet government discussed the situation obtained and came to the conclusion that it was necessary to submit the proposals on general and complete disarmament which had been prepared for the conference of the heads of government for the consideration by the governments of all states.

A relevant document containing the proposals of the Soviet government on the implementation of general and complete disarmament is transmitted to you together with this message.

We are convinced that these proposals meet the requirements set forth in the resolution on general and complete disarmament unanimously adopted by the U.N. general assembly on November 20, 1959.

I would like to draw your attention to the fact that the program of the Soviet government envisages already at the first stage prohibition and destruction of all means of delivering nuclear weapon missiles of all ranges, military aircraft, surface naval vessels which can be used as carriers of nuclear weapons, submarines of all classes and types, all artillery systems, as well as other means which can be used as carriers of atomic and hydrogen weapons.

Obviously, the security of states can be duly safeguarded if only all means, without exception, of delivering atomic and hydrogen weapons are eliminated from the armaments of states and are destroyed. It goes without saying that a simultaneous elimination of all military bases on foreign territories and withdrawal of foreign troops therefrom is necessary, since the retention of such bases and troops could be used for aggression against nearby states.

The implementation of these measures at the very beginning of the disarmament program would remove the danger of a surprise nuclear war being unleashed and would change radically the international situation.

At subsequent stages measures for the prohibition of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction, for the elimination of armies and war machinery of states would be put into practice, thus making it possible to preclude war from the life of human society finally and for all time and to put an end to the arms race.

With the gradual implementation of the disarmament program a part of the funds thus released should be used to render economic assistance to the underdeveloped countries.

You will see from our proposals that they contain detailed provisions for control over disarmament measures which would not allow anyone to evade the observance of the agreement on general and complete disarmament. We have worked out specific measures on control according to respective stages of the disarmament program, we have indicated objects for control, defined the structure and composition of the control body, the rights and powers of on the spot inspectors. Our new proposals containing detailed provisions for the control constitute still another proof of the Soviet union being in favour of a strict and effective control over disarmament.

The Soviet government believes that these proposals should be given a comprehensive study first of all in the ten-nation committee on disarmament which is to resume its work in Geneva in a few days.

I would also like to emphasize that the Soviet government entertains serious doubts that the western powers represented on this body really want disarmament. Although these powers did vote in the general assembly for the resolution on general and complete disarmament, the impression is that, in fact, they are not prepared to implement it.

As is known, the western powers came out in the committee with such a plan which, given all the desire, cannot be called a plan of general and complete disarmament. Even after the implementation of that plan there would remain armies, military aircraft, tanks, guns, military bases in foreign territories, general staffs and nuclear bombs. As a matter of fact, the western powers propose control without disarmament. Frankly speaking, such control is nothing else but intelligence and espionage.

No government attentive to the sovereign rights of states can accept this.

The Soviet union desires actual and complete disarmament, destruction of all types of weapons and establishment of a strict control over disarmament so that no one would be able to arm and no one would be able to threaten with war.

May I express, Mr. Prime Minister, the hope that the proposals of the Soviet government, prompted solely by the desire to facilitate and expedite the conclusion of an argeement on this most important question of our time, the question of general and complete disarmament, will meet with understanding and support of your government.

Respectfully,

N. Khrushchev.

The Basic Provisions of a Treaty on General and Complete Disarmament

On the 18th of September 1959 the Soviet government put forward for consideration by the United Nations a proposal for general and complete disarmament. It submitted that proposal, proceeding from a firm conviction that the complete disarmament of all states, elimination of all means of war constitute the most efficient and—under the existing conditions—the most practicable way to prevent the outbreak of a rocket and nuclear war, so disastrous for nations; and to ensure a lasting peace on earth.

The balance of power obtained at present in the world when an aggressor is not able to unleash war against peace-loving states with impunity; the destructive power, without parallel in the history of mankind, of the modern weapons, which are able to effect a quick annihilation of whole states; the feasibility of almost instantaneous delivery of such weapons to any point on the globe—all these factors make war as a means of solving international arguments an obvious folly. The peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, which the Soviet union, as well as other socialist countries, has always been championing, is a real fact. Peaceful coexistence, however, cannot be durable enough, peace cannot be considered to be reliably secured as long as the arms race is being continued, as long as states have at their disposal the means to attack other countries with lightning speed and possess gigantic stockpiles of weapons, nuclear weapons included.

Nowadays truly fantastic sums of money are being spent on armaments. Suffice it to say, that certain types of modern bombers cost more than their weight in gold. And is it not a fact that many types of armaments become obsolete even before they are shipped from the factories and are scrapped? The arms race becomes a senseless waste of human labour and of material. Sums at present spent by states to produce and stockpile weapons would alone suffice to put an end to starvation on the whole of the globe.

The fact that the energy of hundreds of millions of people and the values they create are spent on the preparation for war, whose inadmissibility becomes clearer with every day, cannot be tolerated any longer. The mankind of today with its wonderful achievements in conquering nature and developing spiritual values deserves a better fate.

At present the great goal, the dream of many generations—to put an end to wars, to preclude war from the life of human society altogether—have become practicable, possible to achieve. This goal can be achieved by means of destroying all types of weapons and disbanding all armies of the world, that is by general and complete disarmament. This is the only genuinely reliable basis, on which under the present conditions a lasting, unbreakable peace among all states can rest.

General and complete disarmament cannot give advantages to any party. This makes it possible to remove many of the obstacles which arose whenever it was only partial disarmament measures that were dealt with and when some states feared that the implementation of such measures might upset the balance of forces and prove detrimental to their security. The conclusion of an agreement on general and complete disarmament would also make it much easier to exercise international control over the disarmament measures for, if complete disarmament is arrived at, states will have no reasons to conceal anything from one another and it will be possible to exercise complete control.

The proposal of the Soviet union on general and complete disarmament met with enthusiastic approval in all the countries of the world. It added new strength to the aspirations of peoples to rid forever of the nightmarish threat of a rocket and nuclear war. No government opposed that proposal. The United Nations unanimously endorsed the idea of general and complete disarmament and confirmed that the question of such disarmament is the most important one facing the world today. The appeal of the U.N. general assembly to the governments to do their utmost to reach a constructive solution of this problem as soon as possible puts great moral obligation upon all states.

To implement that appeal of the United Nations and to make come true the hopes of people who call for disarmament, it is necessary that the governments on whom rests the main responsibility for reaching an international agreement on this question take concrete steps toward the preparation and conclusion of such an agreement without any further delay.

The Soviet government makes all efforts to achieve as soon as possible practical results in the disarmament talks—to work out and sign an agreement on general and complete disarmament.

As is known, the Soviet union's proposals of September 18, 1959, contain a concrete program for carrying out general and complete disarmament by three stages within the time limit of four years. It was proposed to effect at the first stage under international control a substantial reduction of conventional armed forces and armaments of states, at the second—to complete the elimination of the remaining contingents of these armed forces and to eliminate military bases on foreign territories and at the third—to destroy all types of nuclear and rocket weapons and to carry out other measures concluding general and complete disarmament.

When proposing this sequence of disarmament measures the Soviet union took into account the views of the western powers who referring at previous disarmament negotiations to the superiority of the U.S.S.R. in the armed forces and conventional armaments, spoke out for the measures in the field of nuclear disarmament to be put off to the last stage. As regards the Soviet government it has always been in favour of making a war with the use of weapons of mass destruction impossible and it considers the sooner it is carried out, the better.

During the meetings and talks among leading statesmen that have taken place in recent months, as well as in the course of the work of the 10-nation committee on disarmament which was entrusted with the elaboration of measures for the realisation of the decision of the U.N. general assembly on general and complete disarmament, the views and proposals of sides on the questions concerning disarmament have been set forth in detail and specified.

The Soviet government invariably upholding its proposal for general and complete disarmament as one consistent with the great goal of ensuring a durable peace on earth, in which all nations barring none are interested in, at the same time is prepared to take into consideration any constructive observations and wishes of other participants of the negotiations, that are conducive to the achievement of an agreement on the practical realisation of disarmament.

In the course of the negotiations an opinion was expressed by some powers, particularly by France, that disarmament should be started with the prohibition and destruction of the means of delivering to target nuclear, chemical and biological weapons such as war missiles, air force, naval vessels and so on, and at the same time the necessity for the simultaneous elimination by states of their military bases on foreign territories was taken into account.

The government of the U.S.S.R. is still of opinion that the order of carrying out disarmament measures stipulated in its proposal of September 18, 1959, is fully consistent with the goal of the practical realisation of general and complete disarmament. Nevertheless, trying to facilitate in every possible way an early achievement of agreement on this problem in the interests of ensuring a lasting and durable peace among all states, the Soviet government is again prepared to make steps forward to meet the western powers and to agree on a different sequence of carrying out disarmament measures, if that sequence is more acceptable to the western powers.

Being an ardent champion of the earliest deliverance of mankind from the threat of a rocket and nuclear war, the Soviet government proposes that agreement be reached to begin the process of general and complete disarmament by the prohibition and destruction under international control at the first stage of all means of carrying nuclear weapons to target with the simultaneous elimination of military bases on foreign territories.

When war missiles of all ranges, air force, submarines and surface naval vessels, artillery capable of firing nuclear shells and all other means of delivering to targets weapons of mass destruction will be eliminated and states will not have armed forces and military installations beyond their national borders, one country's attack against another with atomic and hydrogen weapons will become practically impossible.

Being desirous to reach this goal the Soviet union expresses its willingness to begin disarmament by the destruction of all means of delivering nuclear weapons to targets, notwithstanding its generally recognized superiority in the most modern and effective means of that kind, namely, in intercontinental ballistic missiles.

In this case during the next, second stage of the disarmament program such measures could be carried out as banning nuclear, biological and chemical weapons, destroying all their stocks and terminating their further manufacture. The menace of a nuclear war in whatever form would be removed for good. At the same time a considerable reduction of armed forces and conventional armaments of states would be carried out.

The third stage would mark the completion of general and complete disarmament, the disbanding of all armies, war ministries, general staffs, the abolition of military service and of military training of youth, the complete cessation of appropriating funds for military purposes.

It is proposed that all this disarmament program shall be implemented on the basis of an international treaty in the course of a definite period of time—within four years or during another period agreed upon, and under effective international control.

In the course of discussing the question of general and complete disarmament in international bodies a great deal of attention has been drawn to the question of measures to be taken for ensuring the peace and maintaining international law and order in the relations between states under the conditions of general and complete disarmament. The Soviet government proposes that the states parties to the treaty would jointly examine this question in detail so that in the course of the implementation of the third and final stage there would be taken necessary measures in accordance with the U.N. charter for the maintenance of peace in the conditions of general and complete disarmament including the obligation by states to place, when necessary, police (militia) detachments at the disposal of the security council to ensure keeping the peace. Naturally, such police (militia) detachments can be used exclusively for the maintenance of peace among nations and not for the suppression of peoples who are struggling for their independence and social progress, and not for the interference in the internal affairs of states.

It is proposed that all disarmament measures be implemented under strict international control from the beginning to the end. For this purpose the parties to the treaty shall set up an international control organization whose scope of competence will include all disarmament measures and will expand as these measures will be assuming still more comprehensive and far-reaching nature.

In accordance with the abovestated the Soviet government submits the draft basic provisions of a treaty on general and complete disarmament.

Basic provisions of a treaty on general and complete disarmament

The governments of the states members of the 10 nation committee on disarmament set up in 1959, being guided by the resolution of the XIV session of the U.N. general assembly of November 20, 1959, "On general and complete disarmament", in the interests of saying mankind from the threat of a new war and in the interests of securing stable and inviolable peace on earth recognize it necessary to proceed without delay to the practical solution of the task of general and complete disarmament, and have resolved to this end to work out a treaty on general and complete disarmament, which will include the following basic provisions:

I. General and complete disarmament envisages:

—the disbanding of all armed forces of states and the prohibition of their re-establishment in any form whatever;

—the prohibition and the destruction of all stockpiles of and the cessation of the manufacture of all kinds of armaments, including atomic, hydrogen, chemicals, bacteriological and other types of weapons of mass destruction;

—the destruction of all means for delivering the weapons of mass destruction to targets;

—the liquidation of all kinds of military bases, the withdrawal and the disbanding of all foreign troops stationed in the territory of any states;

—the abolition of all kinds of military services of citizens;

—the termination of military training of the population and the abolition of all military educational institutions;

—the abolition of war ministries, general staffs and their local agencies, as well as of all other military and paramilitary establishments and organizations;

—the discontinuance of the appropriation of funds for military purposes whether from state budgets or from public organizations and private individuals.

After the completion of general and complete disarmament states shall retain at their disposal only strictly limited contingents of police (militia), the size of which shall be agreed upon for each country and which shall be equipped with small firearms and intended for the maintenance of internal order and the protection of personal security of citizens.

II. General and complete disarmament shall be implemented by all states at one and the same strictly defined time which shall be agreed upon; and the disarmament process shall be carried out gradually, by three consecutive stages, having in mind that at no stage a state shall obtain military advantages, flowing from the course of disarmament, over other states.

For the consideration of the question of other states joining the agreement on general and complete disarmament a conference shall be held with all countries participating.

III. All disarmament measures from the beginning to the end shall be carried out under strict and effective international control, that is:

(a) immediately after the signing of the treaty a preparatory commission shall be set up, whose task will be to implement practical measures for establishing an international organization of control over general and complete disarmament;

(b) a control organization shall be set up within the framework of the United Nations on the treaty coming into force.

It shall consist of all states, parties to the treaty, and their representatives shall meet periodically for conferences to consider questions related to the carrying out of effective control over disarmament. The conference shall elect a control council, consisting of permanent and non-permanent members, which shall have its own local agencies. The control council shall consist of the representatives of socialist countries, the representatives of states that participate now in the western military and political alliances, and the representatives of neutral countries. Barring cases specially agreed upon, decisions in the control council shall be taken by the two third majority of votes on the questions of essence and on the questions of procedure —by a simple majority of votes.

(c) The control council shall effect practical guidance of the control system, work out instructions as well as make timely analysis and processing of reports it shall receive. States shall submit the information on their armed forces and armaments to the control council.

(d) The control organization shall have in all countries parties to the agreement its own personnel, recruited on the international basis with the principle of just geographical distribution taken into consideration, and in accordance with the provisions of the treaty. The control organization shall place its inspectors on the territories of states in such a way as to enable them to start exercising their functions the moment states begin the implementation of measures in the field of disarmament. Each party to the treaty shall undertake to ensure timely and unrestricted access to inspectors and inspection teams within its territory to any point where disarmament measures to be verified will be effected, or to any area where on the spot inspection of such measures will be carried out. With this purpose parties to the treaty shall at the expense of the control organization make all necessary means of transportation available to the personnel of the control organization for travelling within their territory.

(e) The control organization personnel shall enjoy on the territory of each party to the treaty such privileges and immunity that are necessary for independent and unrestricted implementation of control over the fulfillment of the disarmament treaty.

(f) All expenditures of the international control organization shall be covered at the expense of the states parties to the treaty. The scale of the contributions of states shall be fixed in the text of the treaty on general and complete disarmament.

The control organization shall at each stage have powers with regard to the scope and nature of measures in the field of disarmament.

The basic measures in the disarmament field are distributed by three stages of the program of general and complete disarmament in the following way:

The first stage

1. All means of delivering nuclear weapons shall be removed from the armed forces of states and destroyed; their manufacture shall be stopped. It includes:

—strategic and tactical missiles, pilotless planes of all types, all military aircraft capable of delivering nuclear weapon;

—surface naval vessels that can be used as carriers of nuclear weapon;

—submarines of all classes and types;

—all artillery systems as well as other means that can be used as carriers of atomic and hydrogen weapon.

2. All foreign troops shall be withdrawn from alien territories to within their national frontiers. Foreign military bases and depots of all kinds, both relinquished after the withdrawal of troops and alternate ones, shall be abolished.

3. From the very beginning of the first stage and until after the final destruction of all means of delivering nuclear weapons the putting into orbit or the placing in outer space of special devices, the crossing by naval vessels of the limits of their territorial waters and the flights beyond their national territory by military aircraft, capable of carrying weapons of mass destruction shall be prohibited.

4. The launching of rockets shall be carried out solely for peaceful purposes and in accordance with predetermined and mutually agreed criteria and shall be accompanied by agreed measures of verification including the inspection on the sites of launching such rockets.

5. States having at their disposal nuclear weapons shall undertake not to transfer such weapons or information necessary for the manufacture thereof to the states which do not possess such weapons. At the same time the states possessing no nuclear weapons shall undertake to refrain from the manufacture of such weapons.

6. Accordingly states shall reduce their military expenditures.

7. The following control measures shall be carried out at the first stage:

On the spot international control shall be established over the destruction of rocket weapons, military aircraft, surface naval vessels, submarines and other means which could be used as carriers of atomic and hydrogen weapons.

International inspection teams shall be dispatched to the places of deployment of military bases and troops on foreign territories to supervise the elimination of the said bases and the withdrawal of military personnel and troops to within their own national territories, control shall be also established on airfields and at ports to ensure these airfields and ports not being used for military purposes. At the same time the destruction of missile launching sites shall be carried out under the supervision of an international control organization with the exception to the sites which will be maintained for the launching of rockets for peaceful purposes.

The control organization will be entitled to unrestricted inspection of all enterprises, plants, factories and shipyards which were previously engaged fully or in part in the production of missiles, aircraft, surface naval vessels, submarines and all other means of delivering nuclear weapons to prevent clandestine production of armaments which could be used as carriers of atomic and hydrogen weapons. On agreement fixed control teams may be established at some works and intallations.

International inspection teams dispatched by the control organization shall be entitled to carry out comprehensive examination of rocket devices, being launched for peaceful purposes and to be present at the time of launching.

The inspectors shall communicate with the control council through existing channels of communication and there shall be provided such privileges which will ensure prompt delivery of reports and instructions.

8. At the first stage joint studies shall be undertaken of the measures on the discontinuance of the manufacture of nuclear, chemical and bacteriological weapons and on the destruction of the stockpiles of such types of weapons, i.e. of the measures which are to be implemented at the second stage.

9. The first stage must be accomplished within 1-1.5 years. The international control organization shall review the results of carrying out the measures of the first stage to report on them to the states parties to the treaty as well as to the security council and U.N. general assembly.

The second stage

1. There shall be a complete prohibition of nuclear, chemical, bacteriological and other weapons of mass destruction along with the cessation of the manufacture and the destruction of all the stockpiles thereof.

2. The armed forces of all states shall be reduced to agreed levels, the armed forces level for the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. shall not exceed 1.7 million men. Conventional weapons and ammunitions thus released shall be destroyed and military equipment shall be either destroyed or be used for peaceful purposes. Military expenditures of states shall be reduced accordingly.

3. The following measures of control shall be undertaken at the second stage:

Representatives of the control organization shall make on the spot inspection of the destruction of all available stockpiles of nuclear, chemical and bacteriological weapons. The control organization shall be entitled to inspect all enterprises engaged in the extraction of atomic raw materials, in the production or use of atomic materials and atomic energy. Fixed control teams may be established, subject to agreement, at some enterprises and installations.

On the spot international control shall be established to supervise the disbandment of troops and the destruction of armament.

Inspectors shall:

Supervise the exact and timely compliance with the decisions on the disbandment of military formations and units, elimination and destruction of material of conventional arms, military equipment and ammunition; report to the control council and to the government of the host country.

International inspection groups shall include experts depending on the nature of units subject to disbandment and the types of weapons to be destroyed.

The control organization shall have unrestricted access to the documents pertaining to budget allocations of states for military purposes including all the decrees of legislative and executive bodies on this subject.

4. Joint studies shall be undertaken at the second stage of the following measures to be implemented at the third stage;

(a) measures to assure compliance with the treaty on general and complete disarmament upon the implementation of all measures stipulated in such a treaty;

(b) measures to safeguard peace and security in accordance with the U.N. charter in the conditions of general and complete disarmament.

5. Similar to the transition from the first to the second stage, the international control organization shall sum up the results of the second stage steps to report them to the states parties to the treaty as well as to the security council and the general assembly of the United Nations

The third stage

1. The elimination of the armed forces of all states shall be completed. States shall retain at their disposal only strictly limited contingents of police (militia) the size of which shall be agreed upon for each country and which shall be equipped with small firearms and be intended for the maintenance of internal order and the protection of personal security of citizens.

2. All remaining types of conventional armaments and ammunitions both in the armed forces and in depots shall be destroyed and the military equipment shall be subject to destruction or use for peaceful purposes.

3. Military production at all factories shall be terminated including the manufacture of conventional armaments with the exception of the strictly limited manufacture of small firearms designed for the contingents of police (militia) retained by states after the completion of the program of general and complete disarmament.

4. War ministries, general staffs and all military and paramilitary establishments and organizations shall be abolished. All military training of reservists shall be terminated. In accordance with their respective constitutional procedures, states shall enact legislation prohibiting military education of young people and abolishing military service in all its forms.

5. The appropriation of funds for military purposes in any form, whether from state bodies and private individuals and public organizations, shall be discontinued. The funds released as a result of the implementation of general and complete disarmament shall be used to reduce or abolish taxation of the population, to subsidize national economies and to furnish economic and technical assistance to underdeveloped countries.

6. At the third stage the following additional measures on control shall be undertaken:

The international control organization shall send controllers for on the spot inspection of the abolition of war ministries, general staffs, all military and paramilitary establishments and organizations, and of the termination of military training and all other kinds of military activities.

Control shall be established over the discontinuance of the appropriation of funds for military purposes.

The control organization may, when necessary, institute a system of aerial observation and aerial photography over the territories of states.

7. After the implementation of the program of general and complete disarmament the control organization shall be preserved and shall carry out constant supervision over the implementation by states of the obligations assumed. The control council shall have the right to send mobile inspection teams to any point or any establishment in the territories of states.

States shall furnish to the control organization data concerning the places of deployment of the contingents of police (militia), their strength in every place (area) as well as any transfer of sizeable contingents of police (militia) near state boundaries. International inspection teams shall carry out comprehensive control so that the strength of police (militia) and their armaments be in conformity with norms agreed upon for each country.

8. Other measures worked out to assure compliance with the treaty on complete disarmament shall enter into force.

9. Measures for preserving peace and security in accordance with the UN charter shall be implemented. States shall undertake to place, when necessary, at the disposal of the security council formations out of the contingents of police (militia) remaining at the disposal of states.

Gradually with the implementation of the program of disarmament and the reduction of military expenditures of states the funds thus released as a result of this shall be partly used to render economic assistance to underdeveloped countries.

This is the proposal of the Soviet union concerning the order of the implementation of general and complete disarmament with considerations expressed by the western powers taken into account.

Submitting this proposal the Soviet government expresses its readiness to reach agreement on the implementation of disarmament on the basis of the present proposals constituting an elaboration of the program put forward on September 18, 1959. The most important thing is to conclude an agreement and to finally commence general and complete disarmament which is awaited by the peoples and urged by the United Nations. The Soviet government is prepared to do it without delay, without waste of time, and it expresses its sincere hope that other states will do likewise being fully conscious of the responsibility for disarmament which rests upon the governments of all states, particularly on the governments of great powers.

OTTAWA, June 6, 1960

Dear Mr. Chairman,

Thank you for your letter of June 2 enclosing a series of proposals on disarmament. The implications of these proposals will require careful study in consultation with other interested governments and in the light of other proposals which have been placed before the 10 nation committee in Geneva.

The government of Canada is now engaged in this process of study and consultation and for this reason I welcome your decision formally to present the proposals in the 10 nation committee where they can be the subject of discussion and clarification.

Yours sincerely,

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT OF AUTHORITY

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce the appointment of Robert James Rankin, vice-chairman of the national harbours board, to the office of president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority as of August 1. Mr. Rankin will succeed B. J. Roberts, C.B.E., president of the seaway authority since February, 1958, who retires on July 31. Mr. Rankin has been vice-chairman of the national harbours board since February 1, 1958.

In going to his new post Mr. Rankin will add to his already extensive experience in marine matters. He formerly served as chairman of the port of Halifax commission for five years, and was a member of the commission at the time of his appointment as vice-chairman of the national harbours board. He played a notable role prior to that appointment in the economic development of the Atlantic provinces, and was president of the Atlantic provinces economic council in 1957. He is a former newspaperman, joining the staff of the Halifax Herald in 1921 and rising to the post of managing editor of the Halifax Chronicle-Herald before being named vice-president and member of the board of directors. He is a past president of the Canadian Press, serving in that capacity from 1954 to 1956.

Mr. Rankin was born in Chatham, Ontario, a son of the late Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Rankin, and received his education in the schools there. His wife is the former Constance Marguerite Buckler of Annapolis Royal. They have two sons. Mr. Rankin is a veteran of world war I, serving as signals officer with the 1st battalion, C.E.F.

I would also like to refer to the notable contribution Mr. B. J. Roberts has made to Canada over a long period of years. He is a former member and chairman of the national harbours board and a former assistant deputy minister of finance. Over a period of 30 years he served on a number of important boards and commissions, and he was financial adviser to the British commonwealth air training plan during world war II. He was named a commander of the British empire after the war ended.

Mr. Roberts took over as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority early in 1958, and supervised the final year of construction and the operation of the project since its opening in April last year. His contribution to the present successful operation of the seaway has been a very real one indeed.

GRAIN

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1958-59 CROP

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave an undertaking to the house to make a statement on the final accounting for the 1958-59 pool account of the Canadian wheat board. In his unavoidable absence he has asked me to make his statement for him.

The 1958-59 pool account for wheat was closed as at May 20, 1960. The final accounting has been completed and I am now in a position to advise the house of the operating results of this pool.

Producers delivered 367.0 million bushels of wheat to the 1958-59 pool. An interim payment was made in respect of this pool in the period from February 22 to March 11, 1960 and involved the distribution of $36,699,415.19. After providing for payment costs and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act levy the final payment will amount to $33,919,322.24. The average final payment, therefore, basis producers' deliveries, will be 9.2425 cents per bushel.

The final payments on the principal grades of wheat delivered to the pool are as follows:

	Cents per bushel
No. 1 northern	9.374
No. 2 northern	9.869
No. 3 northern	6.342
No. 4 northern	5.009
No. 5 wheat	19.548
No. 6 wheat	24.518
No. 1 amber Durum	17.910
No. 2 amber Durum	16.784
No. 3 amber Durum	12.618
Extra No. 4 amber Durum	15.217
No. 4 amber Durum	7.707
No. 5 amber Durum	19.548
No. 6 amber Durum	24.518

Starred Questions

In respect to the principal grades of wheat delivered to the pool, the total prices realized by producers were slightly less than the total prices received for the preceding pool. Before deduction for the Prairie Farm Assistance Act levy the total realized prices are as follows:

	Dollars per bushel
	1958-59	1957-58
No. 1 northern	1.59569	1.62120
No. 2 northern	1.56069	1.58592
No. 3 northern	1.48507	1.49794
No. 4 northern	1.40161	1.39630

I have been advised by the Canadian wheat board that the issuance of cheques to producers will commence about June 15, and payment will be completed during the first week of July.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The statement made by the minister is very similar to the statement made a year ago at this time. It further emphasizes the desirability of retaining the wheat board organization, since it does mean that producers marketing a given grade and quality of grain receive the same price. Final payment this year is about one-quarter of a cent higher than the final payment last year. When one considers that the producers' cost has gone up by more than 5 per cent in that period, this emphasizes the continuing need for the government to take supplementary measures to increase farm income in the west.

STARRED QUESTIONS

PURCHASES OF PLAYS BY C.B.C.

Question No. 169—Mr. Pigeon:

1. How many plays (texts and copyrights) have been bought each year by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation since the French network was set up?
2. How many of these texts bought by the said corporation have been used each year?
3. What has been, for the same period, the total amount paid each year for the texts actually used?

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that they are able to provide data on the purchase and use of plays on the French television network for the past three and a half years, from July, 1956, at which time the script bureau in the Montreal studios was organized, until the end of 1959. However, to obtain the information prior to July, 1956 would entail a great number of man hours and a survey of daily records. Therefore it is hoped that the information I have here, and which because of its statistical nature it is proposed be printed as an appendix to Hansard, will be sufficient for the purpose of this question.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the statistical information referred to be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Expenditures for plays (texts and copyrights) for the Montreal region covers French and English plays:

Year 1952-53	$ 22,000
1954-55	244,000
1955-56	401,000
1956-57	556,000
1957-58	614,000
1959-60	633,000

We have no breakdown of the cost of French plays versus English plays. To abstract the payments made related to plays used on the French television network would require an analysis of weekly performers' payrolls for each year. This would entail a great deal of work, and it is therefore hoped that the above information will suffice.

RADIOLOGICAL PROTECTION REPORT, 1959

Question No. 177—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received a copy of the 1959 report of the international commission on radiological protection?

2. If so, has the government taken any steps to follow the recommendations of this report insofar as lowering the permissible strontium 90 level in food and water is concerned?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.

The answer to part 2 is as follows. The data contained in the new report of the international commission on radiological protection have been used in the preparation of the annual report of the radiation protection division for 1959. They will continue to form a basis for interpretation of the findings of my department until further recommendations are published by the international commission on radiological protection.

It is to be emphasized, however, that the recommended maximum permissible concentrations given in the new report do not refer to food, but only to air and water. Using additional data contained in the report, members of my department have calculated a maximum permissible level of strontium 90 in the average diet of Canadians. This figure is 79 micromicrocuries strontium 90 per gram of calcium as compared with the ICRP value for water of 33 micromicrocuries strontium 90 per litre. The previous permissible level for strontium 90 in the average Canadian diet based on the 1955 ICRP recommendations was similarly calculated to be 98 micromicrocuries per gram of calcium.

C.M.H.C. LOW COST MINIMUM HOUSE DESIGNS

Question No. 178—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation developed any so-called low-cost minimum house designs?

2. If so, how many, when, and to what estimated cost (by regions if there are estimated variations)?

3. How many such minimum houses have been started since the publicizing of the designs?

4. What is the pattern of such housing starts by region?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, since these answers involve much statistical information, are rather lengthy, and will in any event be printed in Hansard, may I ask for the consent of the house to dispense with the reading of the answers?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answers above referred to are as follows:]

STATELESS PERSONS—PERMANENT LANDINGS AND DEPORTATIONS

Question No. 181—Mr. Crestohl:

1. How many stateless persons who arrived in Canada in each of the years 1956, 1957, 1958 and 1959, were given permanent landing (a) on arrival; (b) after arrival?
2. How many were refused permanent landing?

6. To what other countries were these stateless persons deported from Canada? How many to each country?
7. How many were deported to countries commonly known as being behind the iron curtain?
8. How many were deported to countries commonly known as Arab countries?
9. How many are still in Canada without landing?
10. What is their status?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to parts 1 (a) and (b) is that it is not possible to distinguish in immigration records those persons granted permanent admission on arrival and those granted permanent admission at some time subsequent to their arrival.

The answer is 1956, 4,867; 1957, 7,725; 1958, 5,817; 1959, 2,785.

The answer to part 2 is, in 1956, 70; in 1957, 33; in 1958, 42; in 1959, 52.

The answer to part 3 is the same as the answer to part 2. These questions are synonymous.

The answer to question 4 is in 1956, 4; in 1957, 2; in 1958, 1; in 1959, 1.

The answer to question 5 is that it is not known whether the countries to which these people were deported were also the countries of their birth.

The answer to part 6 is that in 1956 one person went to Australia, one to Austria, one to Germany, one to the Republic of Sudan. In 1957 one went to Brazil, one to the United States of America. In 1958 one went to Austria and in 1959 one went to France.

The answer to part 7 is none.

The answer to part 8 is none.

The answer to part 9 is that the number is unknown.

Part 10 is answered by part 9.

Question No. 182—Mr. Hellyer:

1. Under the terms of the contract between Dimensional Investments Limited and the Chippewa Indian band for the purchase by Dimensional of part of the Indian reserve at Sarnia, what are the dates and amounts of payments due to date?
2. Have all payments been made on the dates due? If not, what extensions have been granted and for what periods in each case?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of this question is that due dates of payments and amounts are:

(a) On or before the signing of the agreement for sale, March 14, 1959, $1,101,435.63;

(b) Ten monthly instalments of $50,000 each commencing April 30, 1959, $500,000;

(c) Four quarterly instalments of $25,000 each commencing June 15, 1959, $100,000;

(d) For entitlement of conveyance of four parcels of land, $459,042.55;

(e) Two half yearly interest payments September 15, 1959 and March 15, 1960, $241,908.46.

In reply to the second part of the question I may say that all payments have been made on due date or within the 30 days' grace allowed by the sale agreement.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND INVESTMENT TRANSACTIONS

Question No. 183—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What changes were made in the investment portfolio of the unemployment insurance fund during the months of April and May of this year?
2. What were the amounts involved in the buying and selling of bonds and other securities?
3. On the individual transactions, what were the amounts of the profits realized or losses sustained?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, during the month of April the unemployment insurance fund sold $13 million of Canada bonds maturing September, 1965. On the sale there was a recorded book loss of $910,000. At the beginning of April the fund held $6½ million of treasury bills. These were disposed of during the month of April. There are several transactions—I perhaps should have mentioned this in my answer the other day—where the fund simply acquires bills to earn interest for a few days, when it has some money, but does not accumulate any treasury bills. Those that were purchased in April and simply held for a few days, and which were not reported to me the other day, were all disposed of in April.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is the third time this has happened.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The net result in April was that there was a net profit of $15,826.50 made on these transactions.

During the month of May bonds of the September, 1972 maturity totalling $8,750,000 par value were sold with a recorded book loss of $812,500. So far as treasury bills are concerned, there was one transaction where the commission simply held money in treasury bills for eight days in order to earn interest. It put in $500,000 and took it out at the end of eight days with a profit of $220. No treasury bills were held at either April 30 or May 31.

CIVIL DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 184—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What was the total amount spent in all departments of government during 1959-60 fiscal year on civil defence, survival and emergency measures?
2. What is the total amount of the estimated expenditures in all departments of government for the 1960-61 fiscal year for civil defence, survival and emergency measures?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this question should stand as an order for return, as the information has to come from more than one department.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CIVIL DEFENCE EXPENDITURES

Question No. 184—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What was the total amount spent in all departments of government during 1959-60 fiscal year on civil defence, survival and emergency measures?
2. What is the total amount of the estimated expenditures in all departments of government for the 1960-61 fiscal year for civil defence, survival and emergency measures?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

IMMIGRATION REGULATIONS AND AMENDMENTS

Motion No. 118—Mr. Crestohl:

For a copy of the immigration regulations and all amendments to-date; the orders-in-council approving same; all departmental rulings which are being used in determining the admissibility of immigrants under general and special circumstances and conditions.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of this motion, regulations under the Immigration Act are made by order in council and are printed in The Canada Gazette which, of course, is available. If the hon. member wishes we will be glad to gather them together for him.

With regard to the second part of the question, departmental rulings and decisions on individual immigration cases are not codified, and in any event they would be regarded as privileged documents. If the hon. member wishes me to supply him with the information as to the first part of the question I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the second part of the question refers to any departmental rulings which become general standards for admissibility into Canada. These are the only rulings in which I am interested, not individual rulings.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sorry, but under these circumstances I am afraid we consider these rulings to be privileged documents and, as I said, they are not codified. I could not collect them in any event.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I put the motion?

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, I do not think any good purpose would be served or that any satisfaction would be afforded to me by putting the motion. I trust I will be able to address myself to the minister and perhaps she will be able to give me information as to some departmental rulings which have become generally accepted.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

Motion No. 119—Mr. Hellyer:

For a copy of all papers and other documents, filed by Dimensional Investments Limited with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration prior to its purchase of part of the Chippewa Indian reserve for the purpose of demonstrating its financial ability to undertake the proposed transaction.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all of the information described in this motion was supplied on July 16, 1959, in response to notice of motion No. 105 moved by the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Speaker: In the circumstances, shall I put the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish the motion to be withdrawn?

Mr. Hellyer: I think what the minister is saying, Mr. Speaker, is that there are no such documents. There were none included in that return to which she has just referred. If there are no such papers I am willing to have the motion dropped.

Mrs. Fairclough: Everything was given to the hon. member.

Mr. McIlraith: Nothing was given to him.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that this motion be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER FROST RESPECTING FEDERAL GRANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any comment to make on a statement made by Premier Frost yesterday during what is described as a mixed business and pleasure trip to Ottawa, when he said that when he comes to Ottawa next month he will ask for much more than the $100 million he sought on the hustings in 1957. "I want a lot more now", said Mr. Frost.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is no comment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oliver Twist.

NATIONAL PARKS

POINT ROBERTS, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERNATIONAL SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister able to comment on the request he received from the lower mainland park advisory committee for information as to the progress being made toward the establishment of an international park at Point Roberts?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. I just received a similar letter myself this morning. I have not been able as yet to look into the question.

TRANSPORT

CHIGNECTO CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO INCLUSION IN ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether the announcement he made this morning of a new chairman for the St. Lawrence seaway authority foreshadows inclusion of the Chignecto canal in the St. Lawrence seaway?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the announcement I made spoke for itself.

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—COMMISSION REPORT ON PROPOSED RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister, and ask whether he has received any report or recommendation from the commission set up over a year ago to study the route of the proposed railway to Great Slave lake.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, sir.

Mr. Hardie: Does the right hon. gentleman not think that since this commission held its final hearing some time in November last, it is high time it made a decision?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been in communication with the chairman of the commission on a number of occasions, and I understand that the report will shortly be available. I was assured by the chief commissioner that he and those associated with him had given the matter the fullest consideration, and that they could not have given such consideration had they made an earlier report.

AIR TRANSPORT

DORVAL—REQUEST FOR REGULATION OF JET PLANE TAKE-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Pratt (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I am sorry not to have had an opportunity to send him notice of it. However, there has been a great exchange of correspondence and I am sure he is well aware of the situation. The question I should like to ask him is this. In view of the many complaints received by his department, is it his intention to prohibit jet aircraft from taking off from an airport such as Dorval during the normal hours of sleeping? If so, when? If not, why not?

Mr. Pearson: What are the normal hours?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I feel that the hon. member, being an aggressive, up to date and constructive member of this house, would not want Canada to do anything that would impede the progress of the jet age in conformity with what is being done in most other countries throughout the world today.

(Translation):

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, as a member for parliament interested in the welfare of my fellow citizens who have elected me for many years, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport which he might consider as supplementary to the one directed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier-Lasalle (Mr. Pratt).

Is it the minister's intention to meet today, as reported in the press, with his worship the mayor and the council members of Ville St. Laurent, who wish to make representations about the too frequent and intense noises made, in the last two months, by jet planes from Dorval airport flying over the residential district of Ville St. Laurent?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member talks at such speed, it is very hard for me to understand everything he says. I shall then take this question as notice and answer it tomorrow.

(Text):

Mr. Rouleau: May I then repeat my question in English? Is it the intention of the minister—

Mr. Speaker: What is the hon. member asking? Is he asking that he repeat his question?

Mr. Rouleau: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: It was translated. The question was translated, and the minister has taken it as notice.

Mr. Rouleau: If I may ask him the question in English, the question is very simple—

Mr. Speaker: I expect the answer would be the same in English as it was in French.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Your Honour has now raised the question of the principle of a matter which, I think, has been determined from time to time. There have been questions asked in French of ministers on the orders of the day, and either because the translation system was not functioning properly, as they have stated, or because the questions were of an urgent nature, those questions were repeated in English and Your Honour allowed them. In view of the fact that a similar question by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has been allowed, I think this question should be allowed in this case.

Mr. Hees: I would be glad to answer the hon. member's question, and am glad to be able to say that contrary to the policy followed by the government of which the hon. member was a supporter some years ago this government is very happy to see municipal representatives from any part of the country who wish to discuss any matter of importance with us. Naturally I shall be very glad to meet the deputation that wants to see me about this important question.

Mr. Rouleau: Is the minister going to see the delegation today?

Mr. Hees: I was not aware that they were in town today, but I will do everything I can to accommodate them and see them if a suitable time can be arranged.

(Translation):

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): In his reply to the member for Jacques Cartier-Lasalle (Mr. Pratt), the Minister of Transport suggested that it was difficult for him to satisfy the people of Dorval. Would he tell me whether he intends to do his utmost to ensure peace for residents of Ville St. Laurent who are represented in this house by a member of the opposition?

(Text):

Mr. Hees: I could understand enough of what the hon. member said to answer his question. I shall be very happy to listen to the representations put to me by the mayor of St. Laurent and his delegation. I will give them serious attention and do whatever is possible to accommodate the mayor and the delegation in respect to whatever they ask. Again I underline that this represents a great departure from the policy followed by the former government.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—STATEMENT ON REPORTED THREAT TO DISPOSSESS KENNETH PLAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) inquired concerning the reported eviction of Mr. Kenneth Plain, a member of the Sarnia band, from property held by him on the Sarnia Indian reserve.

Mr. Plain held two parcels of land that were surrendered by the band and sold on terms set by the band in the surrender itself. One parcel comprised 2 acres, the other 9.6 acres. For his interest in these two parcels together Mr. Plain agreed to accept $36,000. The 2 acre parcel has already been paid for in full and title transferred. Mr. Plain received $6,206.90. Total payments made to him amount to $12,612.49. While his valuation of his house located on the 2 acre parcel appears to have been included in the over-all price, he has the right to remove it within six months from the date the purchase price has been paid in full.

Mr. Plain apparently contends that he is not required to move his house until payment has been made in full for both parcels of land. They do not adjoin one another.

The matter has been studied from a legal and equitable standpoint, and it would appear that from neither angle is Mr. Plain on sound ground. Legally the conditions of sale are governed by the surrender itself and the sale contract, not by the option signed by him, which is invalid under section 28 of the Indian Act. The importance of the option is its evidence of his agreement as to price.

Equitably he has already received a substantial payment on account of his house, which was valued in 1957 at $7,000, and may move it. The balance owing on the 9.6 acre parcel will be paid to him when the sale of it is completed. If the sale should fall through his ownership of the parcel will be re-established, and he will retain what had been paid thereon.

The purchaser has given Mr. Plain more than the six months' notice required to move his house, and desires possession in order that the land may be used as intended. I may say that the matter is really outside the control of my department, as title has passed.

CHIPPEWA INDIAN RESERVE, SARNIA—SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the minister advise the house why she allowed the sale of $7 million worth of land to a company with a minimum capitalization of $40,000 without proof of their financial ability—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking a question which as I understand it relates to matters beyond the jurisdiction of the minister, who did not make the sale in question. Furthermore, the question seems to be more an argument than a search for information.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, surely the question is not beyond the jurisdiction of the minister. Whether or not it is argumentative, perhaps the minister would care to comment on the question.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is the decision that was taken has been justified, in that the payments have been made up to date and the Indians are now in possession of nearly $2.5 million.

SAUGEEN RESERVE—SURRENDER OF LAND FOR HIGHWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration regarding the action of the Ontario department of highways in building a highway through the Saugeen Indian reserve. Can the minister indicate what steps and procedures were followed leading up to the surrender of this land and, in particular, whether the requirements of the Indian Act relating to the band's decision to surrender this land were fully met?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The provisions of the Indian Act are always followed with regard to the surrender of Indian land. I make a particular point of seeing that the interests of the Indians are preserved. In this case, however, I will look into the matter further and get an answer for the hon. member.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING CANADIAN POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East asked about the disarmament conference, and today there may be further questions arising from the tabling by the Prime Minister yesterday of the exchange of letters between himself and Mr. Khrushchev about the latest Soviet disarmament proposals. Perhaps I could deal with this situation by making a brief statement on the Canadian position at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to make a statement at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: In the Canadian view it is important that in these negotiations all ten nations represented on the committee should lose no opportunity to explore every possible avenue of progress in disarmament. The Canadian delegation has constantly in mind, and tries to make certain that the whole committee bears in mind, that not only two nations or ten nations but all the nations of the world have a vital interest in disarmament. It is certain that the members of the committee will be held to account by the other nations of the world if they neglect opportunities for progress in disarmament.

It was in this spirit that the Prime Minister replied to Mr. Khrushchev's letter forwarding the latest Soviet proposals. The Canadian government wants these proposals to receive a patient and searching examination in the ten-nation committee, as marking the opening of a phase of detailed, business-like and uninterrupted negotiations. We believed that there should be no hasty, ill-considered reaction to the new Soviet proposals, but the most careful and constructive examination of these proposals in the committee which circumstances permit. General Burns has been instructed accordingly, and I am happy to say that the other members of the western five on the committee fully shared this view.

I am particularly glad to report this unanimous view of the western representatives because, as the house is aware, the members of the western group have had their differences from time to time in the past. The Canadian delegation for its part has, on several occasions, been instructed to present views contrary to those expressed by other members of the western five, whenever this seemed warranted. We would not hesitate to authorize the Canadian delegation to follow a similarly independent line again if circumstances so dictated. But for the present no such need exists, and M. Moch has rightly stressed the solidarity of the western five in the statement to which the hon. member for Essex East referred. The western five advanced their proposals some time ago and indicated their willingness to enter upon detailed negotiations. The eastern nations are now speaking in support of the new Soviet proposals of June 2, and have indicated that these provide a basis for negotiation. These latest proposals are now being further explained by the eastern countries, partly as a result of questioning by the western members of the committee.

In the course of this clarification on June 9 General Burns pointed to several examples of ways in which the new Soviet proposals represent an advance over earlier Soviet positions; for instance, with respect to the prohibition of weapons of mass destruction in outer space; the control over launching of rockets for peaceful purposes; the provision for a joint study of the cessation of production of nuclear weapons and destruction of stockpiles; and the inclusion of measures for peacekeeping machinery in accordance with the United Nations charter. In making this statement, General Burns emphasized that the Canadian delegation wished to approach the new Soviet proposals in the most constructive way. He chose the examples I have mentioned because they are among the measures to which the Canadian government attaches special significance.

It is my view that the time has come, perhaps through an examination of equivalent features of new Soviet proposals and the western proposals, to begin a process of negotiation of balanced concessions. This was the sort of package approach to which I referred earlier in the house when I reported on the NATO ministerial meeting at Istanbul. I should like to emphasize, however, that by "package" I do not mean that the one side or the other should hold out for its present proposals on an all or nothing basis; the packages I have in mind, as I have tried to explain, are smaller and would contain provisions of equivalent significance to both sides. The goal would remain general and complete disarmament under effective international control, but it would be accomplished by a stage by stage process throughout which concessions would be balanced in such a way that neither side would obtain a temporary military superiority.

For the first time in these negotiations the Soviet delegation has admitted that there will have to be some sort of international machinery to maintain peace in a disarmed world. The proposals are also considerably more detailed and therefore less obscure than the proposals Mr. Khrushchev made to the general assembly of the United Nations in 1959. They also make some provision for the initiation of a process of study before measures of disarmament are actually taken. This is important because no responsible government will agree to any disarmament proposal, much less a complex of disarmament measures, until it has reached a clear understanding with the other governments concerned of the exact implications of agreement.

Therefore I believe that attention should now be given to the possibility of negotiating on parts, if not on the whole, of the two plans. In the course of the next few days in Geneva General Burns will be making suggestions as to how this necessary process might be undertaken through joint studies.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the house will welcome this statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which in a general way brings us up to date in regard to the current discussions in the ten power disarmament committee. I must say, however, that we are not really further advanced in our appreciation of the possibilities of progress.

It will be remembered that when this matter was first discussed during the present session the minister expressed a strong note of optimism indicating that he believed that we would see progress in the field of disarmament. Unfortunately events have not borne out the minister's assurances and anticipations. The minister now tempers his optimism by the realities of the situation.

The last proposal of Chairman Khrushchev does not seem to represent anything fundamentally new or different from proposals already made, and seems to bear many resemblances to the proposal put forward by Mr. Jules Moch, the delegate of France, a short time ago, particularly the implementation of a partial disarmament program directed toward eliminating the means of delivering nuclear weapons to targets.

What I believe this parliament had hoped to receive from the minister, and what I believe this country expects to receive from the minister, is some indication of the government's determination to display the kind of independence about which the minister spoke when he participated in the foreign affairs debate in February in this house. As the minister said, Canada is a member of the ten power group. In some respects she holds the position of representing not only the viewpoint of Canadians but of the middle powers and the smaller nations of the world.

We have not yet had, it seems, any indication of the determination of this government and of its spokesmen to take independent positions where these can properly and constructively be taken. The minister referred to one of the initiatives that seemed to establish that the Canadian government had taken an independent position, but he did not give any indication of what that independent position was.

Mr. Green: I did not refer to one, I referred to several.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. We all realize that the minister is sincere in this matter, but as he has been told on several occasions this session, sincerity and optimism are no substitutes for effective contribution, and we can only hope that it will be possible for Canada to take a line which will bring about the kind of results which already have flowed from the initiative taken by France.

Canada expects her representatives and her government to live up to assurances given, namely to abandon the course of honest broker and pursue a course that reflected the independence of this nation and its determination to contribute to disarmament under conditions of security.

Mr. Green: May I point out to the hon. member that Canada has taken a stand with France on the place of nuclear weapons in disarmament. The hon. member does not want to see when Canada does take an independent stand; he just looks out of his blind eye.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it is not a fact—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: In due course the hon. member will have his chance to ask his question.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group are rather surprised at the negative and faint-hearted approach to the problems mentioned by the minister upon which the hon. member for Essex East has commented in his reply to the minister's statement. As I have said before, unless we have faith in ourselves and faith that we as Canadians can make a contribution toward disarmament and ultimate world peace, we will never get anywhere. That is necessary first.

We are pleased with the minister's approach and the tenor of his remarks, and we welcome his statement with reference to Canada being willing to take independent action if necessary. We trust that the minister will take strong and independent action, and will take an independent approach and view, when it is considered necessary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all the gloomy approach of the hon. member for Essex East, he must realize that these Soviet proposals represent concessions. Whether we agree with them or not they are proposals which contain concessions and indicate a certain change of view. We in this group say it is better to present proposals which contain concessions and present an opportunity for study by other people than to indulge in sabre rattling.

The C.C.F. party believes that this government should give serious consideration to all proposals from any source looking toward disarmament, and we say let us keep on exploring, as the minister indicated in his statement, every avenue toward a solution of these tremendous problems facing mankind at the present time.

FREIGHT RATES

RAPESEED—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Since the board of transport commissioners have announced the greatly regrettable decision of not classifying rapeseed as a grain, thus leaving this young grain industry in the west in a deplorable position, would the minister not consider it advisable as Minister of Transport to devise other ways and means by which this grain could be put on an equitable basis with other western grains as far as freight charges are concerned?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know how important this matter is to the constituents of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, because he has spoken to me about it on many occasions in a very progressive, constructive way typical of a first class member of parliament and typical of so many members of parliament who have been elected here during the past three years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: I can assure the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not recall that there is any election on at the present time.

Mr. Hees: As you know very well, Mr. Speaker, elections have no effect on our approach to public matters. However, I can assure the hon. member that this matter will be kept under very active consideration indeed.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the question which was directed to him concerning rapeseed. Has the minister given consideration to overruling the board of transport commissioners under the Railway Act, in the same manner that he has overruled other boards under his department?

Mr. Hees: As the hon. member knows very well, this government always gives consideration to any possible means of doing constructive and useful things for the people of this country.

Mr. McIlraith: Why don't you grow up?

An hon. Member: Look who's talking.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INVESTMENT PORTFOLIO OF FUND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the reply which the Minister of Finance gave me this morning with regard to starred question No. 183 dealing with the investment portfolio of the unemployment insurance fund, and the corrections included in his answer to some replies he gave erroneously several days ago, may I ask the minister whether he has a detailed table showing the portfolio of the unemployment insurance fund and whether he would mind tabling it so that we may have an opportunity of examining it.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): First, I cannot accept the statement made by the hon. member. As to the question he asks, I have not the portfolio here with me. If the hon. member wishes to have details of the portfolio as of a particular month's end I think there will be no difficulty about obtaining them. Perhaps he will indicate the month's end he has in mind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister give us a detailed statement showing the transactions during the last 12 months?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As I indicated in my answer in the house on June 10, it has not been the practice, certainly in periods that are close to the date of the questions, to give the details of the transactions.

What has been done in the past, as I indicated at that time, is to give month-end positions. That is what the hon. member asked for in his first question just now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We will put it on the order paper. Apparently that is the only way to get answers from this government.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING ABSENTEE PAYMENTS, RESIDENCE QUALIFICATIONS, ETC.

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. C-71, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Payment where recipient absent from Canada.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, there is nothing controversial in the bill. It was before the committee on veterans affairs, was carefully studied by that committee and has been recommended to this committee without amendment.

The purpose of this bill was explained when the resolution was before us a few days ago. Hon. members will recall that there are two main provisions. The first provides for the payment of the war veterans allowance to recipients outside of Canada. The second provision is designed to establish a corresponding Canadian residence qualification for former members of our armed forces or those of our allies who served during world war II, thus allowing treatment of these veterans on a basis similar to that now available to veterans of our armed forces or those of our allies who served in earlier wars. There is nothing further I need say at the present time, but I would be pleased to answer any questions hon. members have.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately I was not able to attend the sittings of the veterans committee when this bill was under discussion. For the purpose of clarification I should like to ask one or two questions which I think could be properly asked on this first clause.

As I understand the provisions of the War Veterans Allowance Act there are three separate groups of veterans who can qualify for these benefits. The first group comprises veterans who are 60 years of age and over who can qualify without a means test. The second group comprises veterans under 60 who can qualify if they are totally and permanently unemployable. The third group comprises veterans who are in receipt of a pension, but whose pension is less than the ceiling permitted under the veterans charter and therefore they are eligible to receive a supplementary payment through the war veterans allowance to bring their total income up to the ceiling.

I gather that all three groups are qualified to benefit under this bill provided they are in receipt of the allowance before they leave Canada and have resided here for 12 months piror to leaving, with the exception of the imperial veterans, of course, who have to be in Canada for 10 years to qualify.

Since the means test applies to these veterans, are they permitted to draw the war veterans allowance for a full 12 months while outside Canada? If so, what machinery exists in case their income changes during their absence? That would affect the means test under which they receive it.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo is quite correct in saying there are three types of war veterans allowance recipients. All are subject to the means test, even the veteran who is a pensioner. As far as the 12 months' residence period is concerned, those affected will be entitled to receive the war veterans allowance outside of Canada but they will be subject to a means test just the same. If they are living in Great Britain our offices there will see that a means test of some kind is applied. I refer to those who will leave Canada and go to Great Britain. Those in the United States who are properly qualified recipients when they leave Canada will also be subject to review by some official in our consular offices in the United States, or whatever country in which they may be living.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at length on the committee stage of this bill. Since it received second reading the bill has been studied by the members of the standing committee on veterans affairs. Most of their time was taken up in seeking information from the officials of the department on where this legislation would be administered. I agree that it does represent some new and probably unusual problems. In fact that was the reason given by the former minister for refusing to introduce legislation of this kind. He told us in the house and personally that it presented administrative problems too difficult for him to consider introducing the legislation. However, the committee on the whole was well satisfied with the answers given by the officials of the administration.

I think most of us realize that this is somewhat experimental. No doubt changes will be made in the procedures and practices in connection with the administration of this act overseas. I do suggest to the minister that it might be advisable for the department to publish a small pamphlet dealing with this act, to explain in simple language to persons who might apply just what the amendments mean. Although the bill is relatively simple to hon. members who have had some experience in reading legislation, and even though it might be quite clear to one who has dealt with legislation, it would not be clear to some people. I suggest it would be advisable to have a small pamphlet printed pointing out the terms of the legislation and informing the veterans or the dependants seeking information how to proceed to make application and what would happen with respect to their payments and so on when they went overseas. I make that suggestion. It could be done in a two-page pamphlet, and it would be of great assistance. The number that would be required would be relatively small indeed.

Mr. Brooks: I may say to the hon. member at once that we are making provision to carry out just the very idea he has expressed. We shall have rules and regulations that will explain the legislation and those who leave Canada will be informed of their rights.

Mr. Herridge: I am delighted to hear that. I have always been somewhat under the impression that there was a degree of mental telepathy between the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the member for Kootenay West. I am glad to have that confirmed.

Mr. Brooks: The Minister of Veterans Affairs made the suggestion first.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear it. I suggest that this legislation be given royal assent at the first opportunity so that the relatively small number of veterans' dependants, compared with the large number who come under the veterans charter, will be able to take advantage of it at the earliest possible opportunity.

In conclusion, I am sure I am speaking for members of all parties in this house when I say we are glad to know that this legislation when it is proclaimed will bring happiness to many people, particularly veterans' dependants.

Mr. Weichel: I believe that Bill No. C-71 is a step in the right direction. There may be certain problems, but we have great confidence in our minister, his deputy and his department to check on any problems that may arise. I give it wholehearted support.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, we indicated our support of this legislation on the resolution, and the fact that it has come back from the committee without any amendment of course gives no reason for us to change our position. I do not want to take time to repeat what we said at the resolution stage. There is just one question I should like to ask the minister. A veteran is in receipt of a war veterans allowance, and he leaves Canada for 12 months. I understand that during the 12 months he can continue to receive the allowance, provided he meets the conditions under which it is payable. Does he have to come back to Canada and stay in Canada another 12 months before he can leave again?

Mr. Brooks: If he is properly qualified when he leaves Canada—that is if he has been a resident here for at least 12 months and leaves, then he can stay out of Canada for as long as he likes; he does not have to come back again. If he had not the 12 months' qualification of residence before he leaves Canada, then he would have to come back and complete 12 months' residence before he would be qualified to receive the allowance for any longer period outside of Canada.

Mr. Carter: He does not have to return? How does he renew his application, directly to the department here in Ottawa or through some local agent?

Mr. Brooks: He does not need to, any more than if he had remained in Canada. He has the same rights outside of Canada, if he is a properly qualified war veterans allowance recipient, that he would have in Canada. If he has had 12 months' residence in Canada and leaves, he may continue to draw his allowance outside of Canada just the same as though he were living in Canada except, of course, that he will have to be subject to the means test. We will have regulations providing for that.

Mr. Carter: He does not have to return to Canada any more if he does not wish to?

Mr. Brooks: No.

An hon. Member: He just told you that.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

304. Departmental administration including Canada's share of the upkeep of the international bureaux at Berne and Montevideo, $1,926,670.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. This item will be found on page 59 of the blue book, and the details on page 410. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two in reply to the statement made by the Postmaster General when he replied to the hon. member for St. John's East on June 8. The hon. member for St. John's East had asked the Postmaster General to reconsider the present policy of not providing post office buildings for small revenue offices, and he went on to outline conditions in his own riding.

Earlier I had made a similar plea to the minister, as recorded at page 4298 of Hansard of May 27. In the course of my remarks on that day I suggested to the minister that the post office buildings were classified on the basis of revenue, because a post office building is not supplied unless the revenue exceeds $3,000. When the minister replied to me the same day he said, as recorded on page 4305 of Hansard:

> The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo spoke a little while ago, and I would tell him that the classification of post offices does not rest on revenue but rests on a unit of work basis.

The reply made by the minister to the hon. member for St. John's East on June 8 does not conform with the statement the minister made in replying to me. As found on page 4705 of Hansard the Postmaster General made the following reply to the hon. member for St. John's East:

> As to the hon. member for St. John's East who spoke about revenue post offices in Newfoundland, may I say that we can have but one policy for buildings right across Canada. I think the weakness in the suggestion he put forward—and I say this without any criticism—was contained in his own observation that in these areas where they would like to have a government building constructed they cannot afford one for themselves and the postmaster cannot afford to put a special one up because his revenue is only a few hundred dollars a year.

That was the very point I was trying to make. I do not want to take the time to elaborate on it, because I have already spoken about the matter on previous occasions. However, I think the Postmaster General's own argument is weak when he says that the policy is based on the revenue and that because these little post offices only generate revenue of a few hundred dollars they do not deserve any special consideration with respect to accommodation.

I wish to point out to the Postmaster General that the spending of 5 cents for a stamp in one of these small post offices, which has a total revenue of only $400 or $500 a year, generates probably $2 or $3 in revenue in some other post office in Canada. I know that most of the post offices in my riding are small revenue operations and come within this classification, but the revenue of the Moncton post office and of the St. John's post office is greatly increased because of the revenue generated in these small offices. A person sends a letter with a 5 cent stamp on it to a mail order house such as Eaton's or Simpson's in Moncton, Halifax or St. John's, and as a result the revenue in the other post office will be many times the 5 cent stamp. It may be a couple of dollars.

I think the minister's argument is weak on that score, because it is the total revenue of the post office and the need of the community that should be taken into account. I think these should be the overriding factors. I do not think it is fair to exclude small offices on the basis of revenue. I pointed out to the Postmaster General the other day that this results in discrimination between one postmaster and another. In his reply to the hon. member for St. John's East the other day the minister went on to say:

> In these circumstances there is very little point in putting up a special government building. We depend upon local quarters provided by the postmaster.

In my opinion such a policy is discriminatory as between one postmaster in one settlement and another postmaster in another settlement. An undue burden is placed on the postmaster when he has to find accommodation, and there is discrimination between settlements where such accommodation is readily available and other settlements of smaller size and smaller revenue where suitable accommodation is not available under any circumstances. I would ask the Postmaster General to take another look at the whole policy and see if something better than what we have at present cannot be worked out.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to lend my support to the query initiated by the hon. member for Port Arthur and supported by other members who have spoken as to the necessity for the use of the words "personal and confidential" on letters we get from the minister. I suppose I could read one letter I have here which is marked "personal and confidential" but because it is so marked perhaps it would not be wise for me to do so. Instead I will paraphrase it to indicate its contents, and in doing so I do not think I will be violating any confidence.

The letter contains two paragraphs comprising six lines in all. In the first paragraph I am requested to refer to a letter I wrote, and the second paragraph advises me that some information on the matter will be available shortly. That is the gist of the letter. The minister in his replies did not make any specific reference to this point, but as a result of the valid questions asked about the policy of using these words I would have thought that subsequently he might have taken steps to alter his approach to this matter. I find, however, that is not so, because this morning I received another communication from the minister relating to a matter coming under his jurisdiction and it is also marked "personal and confidential".

I realize there are circumstances under which letters might properly be so marked, but to make wholesale use of the words "personal and confidential" on such letters is in my opinion going beyond reasonable limits. I hope the minister will undertake to explain to the house his reasons for the use of the words "personal and confidential". Perhaps he will also undertake to lessen the use of these words on letters in order that members who receive communications from him may, with a clear conscience, communicate to the people responsible for the initiation of the matter in the first place the contents of the minister's letters so they may know what is taking place with respect to the problem of the individual or community, as the case may be.

I should like to deal with some local problems in my constituency, which is primarily a rural one, the largest urban community having a population of 10,000 or 11,000 people. The feeling I wish to convey to the minister applies to other governmental services as well as the postal service. However, so far as postal service is concerned the feeling exists in a number of these rural communities that they tend to suffer because the bulk of postal service and facilities is concentrated in the more heavily settled or urban areas. The people in the smaller communities tend to feel that they are left out of the scheme of things and are not given the consideration they should be given. This feeling relates to the building of post offices, the regularity with which mail is transported in and out of these smaller communities, and a number of other such matters.

Inasmuch as my constituency, as I said, is primarily rural, I should like to make reference to one or two problems there. I hope the minister will undertake to deal with them, either orally in his answers in the committee but more particularly administratively within his department.

We have one area which has just been opened up by an access road just north of Terrace. I refer to the communities along the Nass river. Prior to a road being built some 75 or 80 miles in length northward to the Nass river, the main contact was by steamer or by their boats down the Nass river to Prince Rupert. However, their main contact is developing with the community of Terrace and along the Nass river. Primarily the people are of Indian origin. There are four Indian villages containing approximately 1,800 people. The Indian affairs branch has recently established in Terrace a new agency which covers these particular Indian communities. That is just another indication that their point of contact with communities other than their own is now through Terrace rather than Prince Rupert, as it was formerly.

The postal service, of course, has not been good in the past although in recent months there have been some changes with regard to the system which existed. There is one community with approximately 400 people namely Greenville. I have been corresponding with the minister about this matter and the people, the band of Indians in that village of Greenville, have also been in communication with the department. I do not know whether they have been in communication with the minister directly but they have been in communication at least with officials of his department. The last time I inquired into this matter, which was a month or so ago, there was what I understand is classified as a winter service which makes a monthly mail delivery from November to April by steamboat or steamer not to the community of Greenville itself but to a community which is a port of call for steamers, called Kincolith.

It is not possible for steamers to operate up the Nass river to Greenville, so they call in at this community of Kincolith further down near the mouth of the Nass river. Then the mail is transferred from Kincolith up to Greenville by boats of individual residents. They follow the fishing industry, and they have quite a number of these boats. They use them to keep in touch with Kincolith and to pick up and deliver their mail. Then, of course, with the mail arriving once a month, many of the people find that unless they can have someone take the mail out for them and mail it at a larger community such as Prince Rupert or Terrace, their correspondence lags back for a period of two months. This is so especially in ordering materials and goods and supplies by mail. They find that they may receive communications on one steamer with respect to it and be prevented from answering until one month later, when the steamboat calls again at Kincolith.

This matter was raised quite extensively by a letter dated last December 2 from the Greenville council to Mr. Catterall, who I understand is district director of postal services in Vancouver. At least that is the designation given on this letter, and I believe that is the correct title. I wish to read only this one part of it. I might point out that the copy of the letter I have here to Mr. Catterall is dated December 2, 1959 and starts out by saying:

> Due to irregular mail schedule I just received your letter of October 29, 1959 a few days ago—

This is a reference to a letter from Mr. Catterall, district director of postal services in Vancouver, which was dated October 29, 1959 and which reached Greenville on the Nass river, as he said "a few days ago", which I would say would be somewhere near the end of November or the first part of December. It therefore took approximately a month from the date of the letter from Mr. Catterall for it to get from the Post Office Department in Vancouver to the people in Greenville.

I relate that incident only to indicate the time that is consumed and the delays involved in letters going into or out of this particular community of Greenville. I make reference only to that community, but others are in the same boat. The correspondence to which I have made reference here and the letter from Mr. Catterall had, in fact, reference to their request for a fortnightly service through Terrace via the road communication or road connection from Terrace up to the Nass river.

From being there and talking to the people I understand there is now postal service by road from Terrace to two other Indian villages on the Nass river, namely Aiyansh and Canyon city. Although the post office is at Aiyansh, there is a fortnightly service from Terrace up the Nass river to Aiyansh. The Greenville people desire—and quite justifiably so, because they are only a few miles down the river from Aiyansh—to be served by postal facilities on the same basis as the communities of Aiyansh and Canyon city. They request a fortnightly service by road from Terrace and back out that way again, because all their communications and their contacts with other communities, as I indicated earlier, are now through and into Terrace rather than the coastal area on down the river to Prince Rupert except during the fishing season, when they fish in and out of that area and use their boats.

[Mr. Howard.]

As I have said, I have had communications with the minister about this matter, and as far as I can gather from those communications the matter is still under study, in an attempt, I imagine, to get whatever statistical information is necessary as to the volume of mail incoming and outgoing, the regularity with which mail service might be supplied in the future, cost factors and things of that kind. If the minister has some knowledge or information with regard to that matter at this time, it would be helpful if he could indicate it to the committee and to me. However, if it is not immediately available, I will appreciate it greatly if he will tackle this problem with the usual assiduity with which he tackles other problems and will find a solution to it within the shortest possible time.

I also want to make reference, if I may, to another basic problem in the constituency which I represent. This is something about which the minister and I have corresponded, as have many other people, for quite a period of time. It has to do with letter carrier delivery service by postmen in the community of Kitimat.

I wonder if at this stage I might be permitted to make a reference to another matter. This dates back, incidentally, as far as I am personally concerned, to within a few days after I was honoured by being elected in June, 1957, but also goes beyond that to the activities of my predecessor in this house who also dealt with the question. I feel free to make reference to this particular letter from the Postmaster General because this is one which does not have "personal and confidential" marked on it. I might add that it is dated July 15, 1957, so perhaps it predates the institution of the personal and confidential system.

In any event, with respect to establishing postal facilities at Kitimat, the minister was kind enough to write a three-page reply to the query I posed and the request I made to him, and he rejected at that time the possibility of establishing a letter carrier delivery service for five reasons. I will make reference to those reasons without reading the letter itself, though if that is desired I will read it in its entirety to make sure that I do not misinterpret what it says.

But just to give a precis of the reasons for the rejection, the first was because of what might be called the pocket development of the community. There are areas in Kitimat which are fairly well populated and developed, and there are also areas in Kitimat which are relatively sparsely populated. The town planners of Kitimat laid out the program of construction so that it would function in this way, so there would be what you could call pocket development areas. Apparently this would entail a great deal more costly method of providing letter carrier service than if there was a large area of population such as there is, say, in the city of Ottawa, where there is block after block after block of dwellings.

The second reason was that the public transportation schedules there do not coincide, or did not at that time, with the times when transportation would be required by the letter carriers of the post office.

The third was that there is a substantial part of the population living in bunkhouses, staff houses or dormitories; that these people are not permanent residents, and that to provide a letter carrier service for them would mean that it would have to be discontinued when the dormitories or the staff houses closed down and the people moved out of the community because construction ceased or moved into permanent housing.

The fourth reason was that there was a very high level of employment at Kitimat and it would not be possible to recruit a suitable staff of letter carriers to keep it up to the necessary strength. I do not know whether this means that the salary structure in other employment would be sufficiently high to attract workers to a greater degree than would a lower salary schedule, but I imagine this is what it gets at.

Then finally, and I took issue with this as soon as I read it, it was stated that because of unusual climatic conditions in the area there would be considerable risk of interruption of delivery service during the winter months. I imagine the reference is to rain and snow. While it does rain in Kitimat, I do not think it rains any more there than in some of the other communities in that area.

These are the reasons given. I would like to point out that even though this was the initial objection there was not much validity to any of the five objections raised by the minister. In this regard I am sure the minister received communications from other individuals in Kitimat, although I do not know. However, because Kitimat was a new community and proceeded on a planned and orderly basis, it could be classified as pocket development, but I think in all fairness it is not too much different from any of these so-called suburban areas surrounding many of our larger cities today in which there are parks, playgrounds, shopping centres and an expanse of space between them. So this to me does not have that degree of validity which would warrant rejection of a letter carrier system, and it does not affect the distance a postman would have to walk. The neighbourhoods themselves are compact, and it is not much different from any of the modern suburban developments surrounding many of our cities.

With regard to the public transportation system in Kitimat, which everyone at that time admitted was not too good, the minister was sent a copy of the Kitimat bus schedule showing that buses ran continuously throughout the day from 7.05 a.m. until the last full through service at 7.35 in the evening. Then there were bus services following that time to selected areas. Throughout the day there was regular bus service from one end of the community to the other; and while it may not have been too good, it would not interfere in any way with the operations of a letter carrier. Now that we have these scooters perhaps you can disregard that point in any event.

The third point, as to there being a number of dormitories, staff houses, bunkhouses and so on has no validity either, because this was not considered in the initial request for letter carrier service by myself or the individuals concerned. The fact that they would be temporarily housed was not considered in the original request; we thought it should be excluded.

There was a high level of employment in Kitimat, but here I must draw a parallel between the city of Prince Rupert and Kitimat because we are in somewhat the same class, or were at that time, and have similar populations. The wage level in private industry in that city was comparable with Kitimat; but even if the high level of employment in Kitimat was used as an objection to establishing letter carrier service, I hope that does not imply that we need to have a large number of people unemployed before any sort of government services are established. Other than that I do not see what validity that argument has. If it was the wage level which was the deciding factor in engaging people, rather than their working for private industry, then it would seem to me that is a substantial and valid argument for increasing the salaries paid to letter carriers to make them comparable with industry.

The references to unusual climatic conditions, and so on, as I said are not too understandable because we have letter carrier service in Prince Rupert. I could file a great deal of information from the provincial department of agriculture, which conducts surveys of rainfall, snowfall and weather conditions throughout the communities, and I can say there is not too much difference between Prince Rupert and Kitimat so far as rain and snow are concerned. But the fact is that we have letter carrier delivery service in Prince Rupert but not in Kitimat.

Subsequent to these arguments being dispelled by additional correspondence which I had with the minister, I received a further communication from him. Again this is not classified as "personal and confidential", or at least there is no "personal and confidential" stamp on it. This was over a year ago and followed a detailed survey of Kitimat itself. This letter dealt exclusively with the number of points of call; the criterion used apparently is whether there will be a minimum of 2,500 points of call within what is called a compact, well-built area. That determines whether or not there will be a letter carrier service. At that time, in 1958, they were able to count only 2,240 calls at points where the necessary requirements were met. So there were 260 points of call less than the minimum number required.

Admittedly, since that time the construction program at Kitimat has been seriously curtailed. Some 1,700 or 1,800 construction employees were denied the right to work and continue the construction program at Kitimat. This dislocated the economy of Kitimat to a serious degree and resulted in many of the bunkhouses, staff houses and dormitories being closed, though I do not think that affected the over-all picture very much since these places were not included in the initial consideration which was given to this matter. It is true also that following the curtailment of construction the Aluminum Company of Canada proceeded to develop a more efficient system of production in the plant at Kitimat which resulted in a smaller number of people being employed to achieve the same volume of production. This also contributed to upsetting the economy of the area. Following this trend a number of vacancies occurred in the homes which had been built as permanent residences, and this state of affairs continued for a number of months.

However, I have been keeping in close touch with the development of the aluminum industry and the effect of this development on Kitimat. Gradually over the past few months there has been an increase in activity in the industry, up to a point where at the present time it is either in full production or close to full production having regard to the facilities available. There is once again an increase in community activity. Whether it is sufficient to make up for recent losses I do not know, but I think the most serious difficulties have been overcome and the effects of the economic collapse are being adjusted. Accordingly I think this would be a good time to consider making an additional investigation in order to see whether a letter carrier service can be established in Kitimat in future.

It has been indicated to me that my time has just about expired, so I will conclude by leaving that particular question for the minister to deal with.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, in my area postal services have improved considerably in the last three years. There is one little problem I should like to take up, and it has to do with the town of Dalhousie, an important and expanding community where the International Paper Company has just announced a development project which will double the capacity of its mill at a cost of some $8 million.

The town of Campbellton as well as the city of Edmundston and other towns of similar size have daily delivery of mail, and I understand the Post Office Department has every intention of introducing a daily delivery service in Dalhousie. I was in Dalhousie about a month ago and a delegation came to me wanting to know why places such as Campbellton could have daily delivery service while places such as Dalhousie had to wait so long to get them. I feel sure the minister will take whatever steps are necessary in this direction.

Another point I wish to raise concerns mail delivery in Madawaska county, where residents have been waiting now for over a year for the introduction of rural route services. The reason given for the delay is that there are no boxes available, but with so many people in this country out of work that does not appear to me a very strong reason, because I am sure that boxes could easily and quickly be provided.

I was pleased to get a letter from the minister yesterday, and I may tell him that though it was marked "personal and confidential" I had it published in the local newspaper, containing as it did information that rural route delivery of mail would be inaugurated in St. Joseph beginning July 1. I thank the minister very much for giving such prompt consideration to this matter. I live in an area where people live four or five to what is called a range—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, I was about to conclude my remarks when one o'clock came. The contractors who are awarded the contracts to which I referred accept them in many cases with a considerable personal sacrifice to themselves because the prices at which they are obliged to bid in order to get the work do not always give them sufficient money to encourage them to give the additional little services that people have come to expect.

In many outlying areas you will have a few people—perhaps 5, 10 or 15 families—living along what is called a range, or in French, rang. The contractors will by-pass those families. I feel that is a practice that should not be tolerated. Although perhaps few in number those people should have an equal right to have their mail delivered to their doors when the rural route systems are established. When bids are being called I believe it would be an excellent idea to make it clear in the tender form that these little areas wherever they may be, have to be serviced.

I am pleased to note that the establishment of rural route services in areas such as mine has been speeded up. In many communities that are small in size it is not easy or possible to secure a responsible person to act as postmaster. The establishment of rural route service is an excellent trend.

I wish now to raise what I consider to be an important point and one concerning which I have received many complaints. I have always felt that when a merchant in a small town or village is appointed as postmaster he is given a competitive advantage over the other merchants in the community. This leads to abuses because people are obliged to go to the store in any event to cash their family allowance or pension cheques and to get their mail. Naturally the merchant who serves as postmaster has a knowledge of their affairs and can advance them credit because he knows when their cheques will come in. Because they are already in the store they may prefer to make their purchases there. I feel that the merchants who complain of this have a legitimate complaint. The establishment of rural route systems such as that to be inaugurated in St. Joseph in Madawaska county will to a great degree eliminate the practice that leads to the abuses I have just mentioned. I feel it is wrong to appoint a small town or village merchant as postmaster for the reasons I have stated.

In some areas, of course, our people do not like the idea of having rural route service. In some areas the people prefer it over all other systems of service. I have in my riding a very fine community called Tidehead. They want a post office. It is a rather large community and it could serve as headquarters for the rural route mail for many communities adjoining Tidehead. I feel that more consideration should be given to the feelings of the people who live in the small communities. If they want a post office let us give them one and if they want rural route service let us see that they have it. I feel that the post office has to look on this enterprise as does any other business that is trying to give satisfaction to the people. In attempting to give that satisfaction the department should attempt to accommodate people in every way possible. I see no reason why we should wait any longer for daily delivery from door to door by carrier service in the town of Dalhousie.

In saying these things I also wish to congratulate the Postmaster General who has been extremely co-operative with me in anything I have had to do with his department. I can assure hon. members that the service has always been very speedy. I shall expect to see the points I have raised corrected and I am confident they will be. I am grateful for the opportunity of bringing these matters to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, when I look across the aisle and see the minister of socialist enterprise—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I object immediately.

Mr. Herridge: —memory opens the door to the near past. It seems such a short time ago that the present minister sat on the opposition benches pouring sulphurous language in a mellifluous voice over the head of the former postmaster general. We who have been here for some time have seen the evolution of a near rebel in opposition to a responsible minister. The hon. member for Port Arthur said, "A complete metamorphosis", and I think that is an excellent term because the minister has come out of his chrysalis. History repeats itself and advancing age and increased responsibility have had this mellowing effect. That is part of the democratic system.

The minister is doing a good job. He is doing many of the things for which he condemned the former minister and doing them in the same way. However, he has used his imagination and put new life into the department. I appreciate the courtesy with which he has dealt with any problems I have brought to his attention and the promptitude with which he has dealt with matters I have discussed. I give the minister full credit for industry, activity and imagination so far as the Post Office Department is concerned.

However, the minister has caused me at times an unnecessary amount of thought and labour because in reply to all my correspondence he marks it "personal and confidential", even if it is just a question of putting a new rail up on the village post office steps. I bring this up because I know other hon. members have been caused a tremendous amount of extra work, and he has overburdened many of us with this practice. I wonder whether there is some unknown recondite reason for the practice which we call the personal and confidential technique.

I want to show the committee what unnecessary work it is causing us. In order to do that I am going to read a letter. The name of the recipient of this letter is purely fictitious. It is not intended to refer to any person either living or dead. However, the subject matter of the letter represents in two or three paragraphs the kind of letters I have had to write to my constituents because I receive letters from the minister all marked "personal and confidential". This is a typical letter.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but I know the hon. member does not want to break the rules of the house. He will find a citation in the rules which prohibits the reading of imaginary letters.

Mr. Herridge: Pardon me; I have in effect changed only the name. The letter is composite in form.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Is this one complete letter exactly as received from the department?

Mr. Herridge: This is a letter I have composed as a result of my experience. The letter is addressed to:

Captain, The Honourable Algernon Claude Hamilton,
Old Cove, British Columbia
Re: Derelicton of duty,
Postmaster, Old Cove, B.C.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is completely out of order in reading imaginary letters.

Mr. Denis: No.

The Chairman: I would ask the Postmaster General to refer me to the rule because it seems to me if the letter was written by the hon. member it would be the same thing as if it were part of his speech.

Mr. Denis: The only thing you could accuse him of would be reading his speech.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am reading this letter to indicate the type of letter I have to write because every letter I receive from the Postmaster General is marked "personal and confidential". I think I am entitled to present my point of view and support my argument with this illustration. I know of no rule in the book which prevents my reading a letter which illustrates the correspondence I am required to write. May I continue, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If the hon. member has something else to say I suggest that he say it and in the meantime I shall find the rule in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

Mr. Herridge: I am not going to be put off easily in that way.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead, read the letter.

Mr. Herridge: In fairness I am giving the Postmaster General time to find the citation.

The Chairman: Maybe the Postmaster General is referring to citation 158 on page 134 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, which reads as follows:

It is against the general principles which govern debate to read to the house an imaginary letter supposed to have been written by one of the sitting members of parliament.

Does this meet the point the minister has in mind. I doubt whether on this citation I can draw the line that the Postmaster General has indicated. If the hon. member who is speaking says that it is the kind of letter that he himself has written, or that he is supposed to have written from time to time, I do not think this citation would apply. To my way of thinking this means a letter written by some other hon. member.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I thank you for finding me the citation from your more adequate references. It is exactly the one I was looking for. It says:

It is against the general principles which govern debate to read to the house—

This is what the hon. member is intending to do.

—an imaginary letter—

He has already said that is what it is.

—supposed to have been written by one of the sitting members of parliament.

I am a sitting member of parliament at the present time and the hon. member is ascribing the letter to me.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member has indicated that the letter he wished to quote is one that he would write or that he ordinarily writes to one of his constituents, and not a letter from the Postmaster General, if I heard him correctly.

Mr. Herridge: This is purely the type of letter I am required to write because of this personal and confidential technique. I will now proceed with the letter:

My dear Algernon:

I have discussed the contents of your letter of March 1, last, with the appropriate person. However, it would not be what is played at Lords to divulge his name.

Before proceeding with your complaint, I shall answer your query as to what sort of a chap the Postmaster General is. While from your point of view he wears the wrong coloured tie, and has been known to enter the House of Commons in a vest of style and colour that would cause you some dismay, I must, in fairness, say his heart is in the right place, he is most industrious and his unconventional vests do indicate an imagination that I think has had a beneficial effect on the administration since he took office.

Now to your complaint. The letter I have received from the appropriate person is marked "personal and confidential". Therefore, I find it necessary to write allegorically and all I can say is that with my knowledge of the appropriate person's ability to smell a rat when he sees it hovering in the air, and later to nip it in the bud, I am confident that the administrative "dry-rot" you brought to my attention will be lopped off in due course, to your complete satisfaction.

While you may convey the information contained in this letter to this village post office patrons, on no account disclose the source of your information. However, you have my permission to say it came from an authoritative but undisclosed Ottawa source.

Trusting I have made the situation quite clear in a personal and confidential way, I remain

Your old Comrade-in-Arms.

Mr. Pugh: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I think we ought to have the correspondence completed. I wonder whether we can have the reply to that letter filed? I simply want it because I want to see what a member of parliament looks like when he starts writing letters to himself.

Mr. Lambert: For purposes of information may I ask the erudite member how one smells a rat hovering in the air and nips it in the bud.

Mr. Herridge: I can answer that. I have used that allegorical statement as a result of reading a Conservative member's remarks made in the British House of Commons in 1876.

I have drawn this to the minister's attention and I am sure he will reconsider this technique because, mind you, in addition to marking it "personal and confidential" he sends a tissue copy of his letter. I do not know what to do with it. I have not been able to find any use for it to date. I do hope the minister will find his way clear to change his technique.

When I receive a letter marked "personal and confidential" I treat it as personal and confidential, but I do wish the personal and confidential would apply to, shall I say, strictly confidential matters and I do not mind when necessary on personal matters. I would ask the minister to comment on this question when he replies. I am not the only one who has suffered from this practice. Members on the government side have also expressed their adverse opinion of it. As a matter of fact, this is one of the major criticisms this afternoon.

Having said that, I now proceed. As I see it, a member's responsibilities when it comes to discussing estimates are two in number. The first is to deal with the policies of the department in general, if he has any criticism of same, and the second is to bring to the attention of the committee any particular problem that concerns his constituents, and that is what most members do when they discuss estimates.

Before I proceed with a few remarks about general policy, I wish to say in all sincerity, because we hear some sections of the civil service criticized on occasions, that the Canadian people are very fortunate in having an excellent, efficient and first-class staff in the Post Office Department from the deputy minister right down through the administrative level. We accept this service daily without realizing the planning and consideration that has to go into the distribution of mail in Canada to the satisfaction of the public every day of the year. I think we should recognize that fact. Any matters I have brought to the attention of the minister or his senior officials have always been approached from the point of view that people would adopt who are operating a successful socialist enterprise for the public advantage.

With respect to the staff throughout the country we should also recognize the very good service that is rendered by the many people in the more humble positions. The service goes on day after day and is accepted just as we accept the work of the tracklayer on the railways in carrying out his monotonous daily task so that we may travel with speed and in comfort. I hope that the minister will use all his influence to see that the excellent services rendered by post office staffs and postmen tramping their beats are recognized by adequate increases in their salaries to conform with the increased cost of living.

I have a few other matters to bring to the minister's attention. A constituent of mine wrote me about a question that concerns civil rights. I wrote the minister about it and I have his reply here but I cannot quote it because it is marked "personal and confidential". I think the gentleman who wrote me has a point. The minister in writing to me indicated that he thought—how shall I put it—in view of it being marked confidential that he had made the implicit explicit, but I cannot agree. That is all I can say at the present time. In any event, this gentleman wrote me and said:

> I would appreciate any information that is available on a matter which offhand I would consider as coming under civil rights. I am not familiar with what category my subject would come under other than civil rights.
> Now as I understand, under our form of government the individual can live a private life, his business being his own in so far as the general public is concerned as long as he abides by the law. We have to fill out forms for income taxes, we give certain information for voters' lists, answer questions when we take on employment with a firm; we also give the post office our name and our address and we as in my case rent a box with a number from said post office. Now I would take from this that the information given each of the above is strictly for their own use and not for release to the general public.
> Now it has come to my attention that a person can purchase from any post office in Canada for the sum of $2 a list of citizens that gives their name, address in the area which they choose to have knowledge of. I do not think this is the correct thing to do. The post office is a government agency and should not be used as an information bureau.

He goes on to say:

> I would go to the post office and inquire, and the only answer was that if I put a stamp on it and mailed it they would see it got to the party.

He is referring to when he went to the post office to inquire about a person's address.

> In short they were not allowed to divulge a person's mailing address. I can see the wisdom to this; they in those years respected the privacy of the individual. This present system leaves you open to a shower of phony advertising literature and such, it may be lucrative to the post office but the post office is supposed to be a very private business. I think stern measures should be taken to tighten up and attend to the business of handling mail and nothing in the way of as I said before of being an information bureau for a $2 bill.

I think my correspondent has a point there. He says he has gone to the post office and asked for the address of a person and has been told that if he will put a stamp on the letter they will supply the address and forward it but will not give the address. At the same time apparently a commercial company by paying $2 can get a list of the patrons of a certain post office and on the basis of that list distribute their advertising literature. Personally I think my correspondent has a point. I promised him to raise the question on the estimates of the Post Office Department and I should like the minister to deal with it briefly when he replies to the eulogies and criticisms from the opposition benches.

I have one other suggestion and it has to do with stamps. I must say that on the whole I think there has been an improvement in the design and quality of the stamps issued by the Post Office Department since the minister came into office. But I do suggest that possibly there could be considerable improvement if there was an opportunity provided for Canadians living in all sections of Canada and having various backgrounds and aptitudes to make some contribution to the design of these stamps. I suggest it would be a good idea to have some form of competition for Canadian artists who do this kind of work so that the minister's selection will not be confined to a few professionals who submit designs but will be made on as wide a base of talent in this direction as Canada can provide.

I have also been asked to mention to the minister that some remarkable subjects for stamp design are to be found in the Kootenays. There is the Kootenay-Columbia district, the Indians and their particularly interesting chiefs, the Thompson period, the Hudson Bay period, the stern-wheel steamers and various well known characters in mining, lumbering and agriculture. I have been asked to mention that because we in the Kootenay district are under the impression that we have not received due recognition from several of the government departments, including the Post Office Department, that go in for illustrating certain books and stamps.

I come now to the local and the concrete. The residents of Rossland were very pleased when the Department of Public Works decided to build a new post office.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he not think that the present member for Kootenay West is perhaps a qualified person to be considered as a subject for a stamp design?

Mr. Herridge: I welcome the hon. member's fine suggestion but I have always understood that high rank and station and great contributions to the state should not be recognized until the person is dead. As a matter of fact, I would rather have a new post office or two while I am alive. The people of Rossland were very pleased when it was decided to build a new post office. The first recommendation was to renovate the old one. After going through the building it was my personal opinion that it would be a waste of money, that it would cost a great deal more to renovate the old building than was anticipated, and once again, as usual, the member for Kootenay West was correct. The public works staff reinvestigated the whole situation and it was decided finally to build a new post office. I hope that every effort will be made to meet the responsible persons in Rossland such as members of the city council and representatives of the chamber of commerce and other organizations so that the new post office will be located in the very best site possible to serve the interests of Rossland people. I understand this building is now being given consideration and will be undertaken next year.

I also want to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General the necessity of the officials in his department watching developments in the Kootenay district closely, particularly the need of changes at times in rural routes. There is one district where there were only five people a few years ago and at the present time there are 1,000. The development in the district is causing changes that will require adjustment in the service given. I cannot think of any drastic or particular one at the present time but I bring the matter to the minister's attention because of the changes occurring from increases in population, the building of new highways, the introduction of new bus services and transportation services and so on.

I come now to a problem that concerns the little village that is closest to where I live, namely the not well known but well situated and beautiful village of Nakusp. The chamber of commerce, the women's institute and the organizations there have been concerned in the last year or two about the time it takes to get mail from Vancouver into our district. The time is such that on occasion business people are required to use the long distance telephone much more than would be necessary if the mail service was a bit faster. It has been suggested that the minister's officials give consideration to the bus leaving Nelson a few hours later than it leaves at the present time so that it can bring mail there after the plane arrives at Castlegar in the afternoon. I mention this matter because of complaints and ask the minister to have it checked.

The minister knows that for some years I have urged the necessity of a postal bag from Revelstoke to Nakusp and distribution from there to all points south as far as Edgewood. I know the minister's officials investigated the situation and found that the volume of mail was somewhat small. I was very surprised to hear the cost of handling this bag in view of the fact that it is a government ferry that runs from Arrowhead to Nakusp and mail is brought up from Revelstoke to Arrowhead on contract. I thought it would cost a dollar a day or something of that sort. I cannot see any reason for the expense that was indicated by the report I received. However, I will let that matter rest at the present time.

I want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that a new highway is being built now and that it is likely that in the future there will be a bus running from Revelstoke south to Nelson via Nakusp. I urge that the officials of the department watch these developments so that they can take advantage of these changed transportation circumstances as soon as possible after they occur.

I have had one or two other complaints, although this is a minor one. In a number of places I have been informed that the rural mail list is often incomplete or inaccurate as to the address concerned or as to occupation. I suppose the minister does not live as close to the rank and file as do I. I live among the people. I am not in an exalted position. However, I hear what the ordinary person has to say about public affairs.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I not only live among the people; I am one of the people.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear that. I am glad to know the minister is human. With regard to those sitting on the government benches there have been a few cases where I doubted that. However, even in a thing like an incorrect occupation, dissatisfaction can be caused. I had a gentleman come to me who is manager of a lumberyard, and he was down in the post office directory from year to year as a labourer. A person's occupation should be correctly stated. I have had a few of these cases brought to my attention. I urge that the local postmasters should be asked to check these lists; and not just send the old list in annually but to check the list carefully and to make certain that the address and the occupation of every patron is correct. That is not a very socialist suggestion but I represent all the people of Kootenay West. This suggestion comes from some of my Conservative friends but I am quite willing to advance it when they elect me as their representative to serve all the people.

I have one more suggestion to make, and it is my last one. I have received a few letters complaining of the low pay of the casual help employed in the larger post offices such as those in Trail and Nelson. I have also had letters from a few other points dealing with the situation in general. If my information is correct, it appears to me that the pay received by casual help in British Columbia for work in the post office on certain occasions is very much below the prevailing rates; in fact I am informed in some cases it is 50 per cent of the prevailing rate. When the Department of Public Works lets a contract in a district the contractor must agree to pay prevailing rates. I suggest that consideration be given to the prevailing rates in any district when casual help is being employed.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I once again want to emphasize this fact. Tremendous progress is taking place in Kootenay West. Tremendous developments are in sight and expansion is going on now at a rapid rate, and it will continue to go on in this garden of Eden in Canada. I urge that the minister's officials keep a close watch on these developments and these changing situations so that they will be ready at the first opportunity to adjust, rearrange or increase the services that are now provided so that they will continue to provide the efficient service that we have enjoyed throughout the years.

Mr. Aiken: In common with other hon. members who have made some comment on the estimates of the Postmaster General, I should like to commence by complimenting him and his department on the excellent services they have been giving. Representing as I do a riding which is mainly rural and which has a number of rural routes and small post offices, I find that a great deal of the work I have to do relates to the Post Office Department. I must say that with very few exceptions I have received very good service and have been able to give good service to those people who wrote to me with problems or complaints.

There are just two matters which I should like to draw to the attention of the Postmaster General and the officials this afternoon. The first one relates to the tender system for rural routes. As we all know, the present system is—and I think properly so—that the lowest tenderer on the rural route is awarded the job. I think this is a fair system to be undertaken. However, I have found a number of difficulties that I think should be carefully considered by the department. In a number of cases there is evidence that a contractor or a proposed contractor will make a bid which is excessively low, much lower than that of all the other people who have bid. I feel that sometimes the person who has made this low bid has not done so properly. He may have one of three reasons for making an extremely low bid. The first one is that he may have wanted to eliminate all the other competition on the route and then hope to come back to the department in two years and get an increase back to what he should have had in the first place. In a number of cases I think there is definite evidence that people have put in ridiculously low bids and they go along just on the expectation they will apply and get an increase later on.

Another reason that this thing happens is that the person is incapable of estimating his job properly. The third is that he may not be properly equipped and that although he is able to give an estimate, he may do a poor job. After all, he is carrying the royal mail and the person who is selected ought to have proper equipment and ought to be able to give good service. My request to the Postmaster General is that in cases where he receives a bid which is quite low in comparison with other tenders he should make an independent investigation to see whether the person who is bidding is actually the proper person for doing the job and capable of carrying the mail in a satisfactory way.

The second matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention concerns the urban mail delivery service in the town of Parry Sound. This has been one of the matters that the residents of that town have been requesting for some years. They have a post office which has sufficient revenue for mail delivery service door to door. They are just a little short of the number of persons required for mail delivery service. A check was made within the past year and at first it was thought that there were enough people, but subsequently it turned out on a re-check that there were not enough. It has been drawn to my attention that people who were potential customers were not counted for some reason or other as householders, and I therefore urge the Postmaster General to have a further check made as soon as possible of the number of householders qualified to receive mail to see if a few extra people can be found so that mail delivery can be provided to this town, which is actually increasing very rapidly each year in population and industry.

With those two matters and the compliments I gave to the Postmaster General I should just like to add that as regards the rural mail delivery services particularly the department has given very good co-operation in any extension of rural mail routes where requested, and they have stretched their regulations to the limit in lots of cases in order to give good mail delivery service.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) stated earlier, it cannot be said that the present Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) is doing much worse than his predecessor, but we are always surprised to find that the former critic of the Post Office Department did not introduce the changes he was suggesting when he was in the opposition.

However, what struck me most, and what amused me particularly in the minister's introductory statement on his departmental estimates, is his remarks about visiting post offices at all hours of the day or night and noting the cheerfulness of postal workers.

That part of his speech struck me for two reasons. In the first place, it is rather unusual for a Postmaster General to go about post offices by day and by night to check on the cheerfulness of his staff. It is somewhat outside the bounds of logic.

Then again, does not the minister trust his employees? If he does not, well let him replace them, and let him tell us his reasons for doing so, namely that they are incompetent.

A minister going through post offices at two or three in the morning to check up on the cheerfulness of his personnel, that is really laughable.

Besides, I note that the minister is laughing just now. He might well do so, because if he had thought twice, he would not have said that.

The minister said he noted the cheerfulness of the staff.

Well, he must have made his visits at the wrong hours, because I have been meeting large numbers of post office employees, and civil servants generally—particularly people working outdoors—and I can assure you their mood is not so cheerful as that.

If there is one minister who is being criticized by his staff at this time for his lack of action, it is certainly the Postmaster General.

His employees have been trying to get raises for their colleagues. Raises have been granted to 50,000 employees, but not to postal workers. In fact, postal workers seem to have been placed at the bottom of the list.

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Grafftey: Could the hon. member cite a single case in support of his statements to the house?

Mr. Caron: It is not my practice to reveal my sources of information, because I would not want government employees to be penalized for daring to talk to a Liberal member.

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member—

Mr. Caron: If my hon. friend would get out of his hole in the ground, he might find a good many dissatisfied people in his own constituency. Besides, it is a matter of common knowledge.

Mr. Grafftey: That is not true, and that is no answer.

Mr. Caron: You only have to take a look at the civil servants' newspaper to see how much dissatisfaction there is, and in the same paper, you will see the complaints of postal employees, who are of course dissatisfied with their present situation, because the raises to which they are entitled are being held up.

All we have to do is to look around and see what is going on. Members of parliament should not be asked to give their sources of information; it could only mean trouble for those who gave out the information. I know there is discontent, and especially people are wondering whether the delay in granting postal workers the raise they were promised is not meant as a punishment for those who have been waging the great battle for salary increases. They were the ones who carried the battle, and it now seems as if someone is out to punish them for it; in fact they will probably be the last to get the promised raise. If there are people in fact, who really fought the great battle for civil service salary increases—

Mr. Grafftey: Please be responsible, be responsible.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, would you tell that thing over there to shut up? I am sick and tired of my hon. friend's interventions. In the matter of irresponsibility, I have never seen the like of him.

I wonder whether this delay in granting the requested increases is not a punishment inflicted on postal workers. In fact not only will they not get their increases immediately but, judging from the present attitude of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) there will be no retroactivity, whether they get their raise in two or three days, or in a month, they will not benefit from the retroactivity granted to the 50,000 who already got their increase in April.

They stand to lose hundreds of thousands of dollars because they waged the battle to help Canadian civil servants who were ill paid, particularly since the election of the present government.

The present minister may have fine qualities, he may have great accomplishments to his credit, but he certainly slipped in failing to insist on salary increases for the people who deliver the mail day in and day out, rain or shine, summer and winter, under extremes of hot and cold weather, carrying heavy bags to serve the public. I think those people deserved a better deal than they have received.

The minister, who introduced the use of scooters in his department, also referred to small carts that are being put to the test, similar to those used to carry golf clubs. I have had the opportunity to discuss this with a few mail carriers, and their reaction was that the idea was absolutely unthinkable and that, for all practical purposes, they could not accept them. They have been wondering whether the minister was thinking of using this new device to throw an additional load on the already overburdened workers and thus cut down the staff.

Why not buy them a horse and cart, as used by bread and milk salesmen who do not travel very fast and go from door to door.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, postal employees have certainly not received the consideration they deserved from their minister, and I hope that when their raises do come—as they are bound to eventually—the minister will see that they be retroactive to April 1, as in the case of the first 50,000 who got their raises. Then, perhaps, they might be able to believe that the minister has really looked after his departmental staff.

I do not want to take too much time, because I would hate to be accused of delaying the Post Office Department's estimates, but there is one thing I should like to submit to the minister. It is known that the city of Hull has been expanding considerably, and that, in addition to the old section on the eastern side of Brewers creek we now have a new section on the western side, which already has grown larger than the old.

The post office has a sort of little nook there where mail carriers go and fetch the mail they have to deliver. Furthermore, boxes have to be installed on street corners, from which mail carriers may pick up additional mail for delivery. That area includes four important districts, that is Tetreau, Wright, Lafontaine and Dollard. Consequently, it would be necessary and urgent that the Post Office Department build another post office there which would, first of all, allow mail carriers to pick up their bagful of mail; at the same time we would be rid of those horrible boxes that stand on street corners, especially in the most developed areas, which are so picturesque.

Mr. Chairman, several members have already referred to that mania of the Postmaster General's of writing "personal and confidential" letters. Besides, you know very well that a letter is not necessarily of a personal and confidential nature just because its sender has chosen to write in those words at the top of the sheet. To be genuinely so, such letters must be of a personal and confidential character. In fact, I will quote one of them, even, if it is not considered delicate to do so. It is a letter which is in no way of a personal or confidential character, and I wrote to the minister to tell him that I did not consider it as such. Furthermore, after having advised the minister, I sent a copy of it to the persons concerned and I had a right to, because it was in no way of a personal or confidential character. Under the circumstances, I was fully justified to do what I did. Here is the letter referred to:

Personal and confidential

Dear Mr. Caron:

This is in reference to your letter of May 10, in which you ask that letter carrier service be established in Gatineau.

An inquiry to establish whether Gatineau meets the required conditions for mail carrier service has just been completed. The matter is still under consideration but no decision has yet been taken. I am sorry I am unable to give you a definite answer at this time, but I hope to be in a position to do so in the near future.

Sincerely,

William Hamilton,

Postmaster General.

Can anyone look upon that letter as being a personal and confidential letter? Is the minister out to prevent members of parliament from transmitting to their constituents the news they get from departments? I do not know. I would not like to accuse the minister unfairly, but I am inclined to believe that there is something there which borders on mania. I would ask him, whenever he wants a letter to be personal and confidential, to include in it facts that are genuinely of a personal and confidential nature. However, as everyone knows, letters such as the one I have just read are not of a personal or confidential character.

I have another one of the same type, in which there is absolutely nothing of a personal and confidential character—I do not want to take time to read it—and in which the minister advises me that the matter does not come under his department; and he adds:

I am sending a copy of your letter to the Minister of Public Works.

Is there anything personal and confidential in those two letters?

I ask the minister to change his ways by sending us replies that will allow us to supply information to those concerned.

I shall now revert to the subject of door to door delivery in Gatineau. The population of this town numbers 13,000 at present. Some people have to travel one and a half miles to get their mail and post their letters. The minister will perhaps claim that he is following the established practice. I admit that this was probably the practice followed in the past, but I remember that when he was on this side of the house, the present Potsmaster General urged the government to bring about all necessary changes. He is now holding that office and it is his own responsibility. If changes had to be made when he was in the opposition, why does he not make them now that he is in a position to do so?

It will be claimed perhaps that the population is not high enough and that the volume of business is not such as to justify the building of a post office. The reason for this is obvious enough. Deprived of proper facilities, those people deal with the Hull or Ottawa post office, and the local post office pays the piper. If proper service was provided, we would have the required volume of business.

Moreover, even with door to door delivery, people would have to go to the post office to purchase postage stamps. Stamp distribution centres should be established in various places for this purpose. Nothing is easier than to allow certain grocers or merchants to sell postage stamps and enable the public to purchase the stamps they need. In this way, the volume of business of the Gatineau post office would reach the required figure.

Moreover, the minister would have made one of the improvements he was asking for when he was sitting on this side of the house.

Well, I remind him of the past, of the great improvements he used to ask for, in short, I ask him to remember everything he said when he was on this side. For instance, he stated that postal service should be available to the public, that it was a public service and that the reason for the existence of the Post Office Department was the public.

I am asking him for the same thing. Let him carry out what he suggested. Let him make the postal system available to the people who need it, by making a few changes and a few improvements. Even if it is impossible to have a door to door delivery service immediately, let there be, at least, some letter boxes, and a few merchants should be allowed to sell stamps, so that people who want to post their letters will not have to walk one and a half miles to do so.

I must say that, as far as Gatineau Point is concerned, I submitted the matter to the minister who received me very courteously —I have to admit that the minister is always urbane when we approach him—and I asked him to have the post office enlarged. At the present time, there are up to three families using the same postal box, because the population is constantly growing. In fact, from 3,500 it has gone up to over 7,000, and the post office is now too small. There is no more room to put in letter boxes in the present building, because it is not large enough. The municipality of Gatineau Point cannot be satisfied in this way.

(Text):

As far as the municipality of Gatineau Point is concerned, as well as Gatineau itself, there too the department should put up letter boxes for the posting of mail from that community, and business people should be allowed to sell stamps, so that the citizens need not walk great distances to buy them, because some people have to walk up to a mile and a half to get to the post office.

I therefore ask the minister to look after these matters. Anyhow, he cannot do otherwise, because he himself advocated those changes when he was sitting on this side of the house. Well, now that he is sitting on government benches and that he has the necessary authority, let him proceed with those changes he was asking for, and we will not begrudge him our approval.

(Text):

Mr. Drysdale: I should like to take this opportunity to make one or two remarks. As the representative of a fast-growing community in western Canada I should like to draw certain matters to the attention of the Postmaster General. I hasten to assure the hon. gentleman that my words are not words of criticism but of constructive suggestion and, later on, there may even be words of commendation.

The municipality of Burnaby has a population of some 100,000 and an area of 40 square miles. Yet Burnaby is without its own central post office. New Westminster and Vancouver have complete postal facilities. If consideration is being given to the establishment of a federal building in central Burnaby I would suggest the location be in the vicinity of our municipal hall. I feel that consideration should be given to the establishment of a post office for Burnaby.

I also suggest that the Postmaster General give attention to the idea of having a Burnaby postmark. I realize that these things are perhaps relatively insignificant in the view of other hon. members of the committee but anyone who realizes the pride of a municipality or city will realize the importance of the suggestions I am advancing.

In forwarding these suggestions I feel I should also bring to the minister's attention the fact that there is discussion in the Vancouver area concerning the metropolitanization of the whole area. I would point out that Burnaby is the heart of the lower mainland, the geographic centre of the mainland of lower British Columbia. I think he should give consideration to the long range possibilities of the establishment of a post office in the Burnaby area. In the last 20 years the population of Burnaby has risen from 50,000 to 100,000 within an area of 40 square miles and with the present dynamic leadership being given in the community not only by the municipal council but by the board of trade there is every indication that the population will perhaps double again in the next 10 or 15 years.

I wish also to direct the minister's attention to a similar situation existing in the municipality of Richmond which I also represent. Strangely enough the population of this area also doubled in the last 20 years. Richmond has a present population, I believe, of 40,000 and covers an area of 57 square miles. I would point out that all airmail from the Vancouver area goes through Richmond because the Vancouver international air port is located there. I wonder if the minister would also give consideration to the establishment of a central post office in Richmond. We would like to see it located in the federal building in that area.

From time to time I understand that the Postmaster General receives certain complaints. I am at times critical when I feel that criticism is justified but I should like to point out to the minister that since my election in 1958 I have had occasion to bring to his attention only three or four complaints regarding the postal service in my riding. I have no hesitation in saying that in each instance the minister had the situation thoroughly investigated and in every case I received a satisfactory reply.

I wish to express appreciation to the minister for his being of assistance to me in another matter. Some criticism appeared in the local newspapers in my riding concerning the postal service in the area. I thought perhaps the criticism was not based on fact. The minister was kind enough to make arrangements under which I was able to take the four local editors from Burnaby and Richmond on a tour of the Vancouver post office. They were able to ask any questions they wished and an effort was made to explain anything which caused them difficulty. Since that time I have seen no criticism editorially in those newspapers.

Having worked in post offices during Christmas vacations I have developed a first hand approach to the subject of this department based on my experience as a letter carrier and sorter of mail. I am amazed at the few mistakes that are made by the post offices. I feel that some hon. members in presenting the complaints they have received magnify the minor mistakes that have been made. I would suggest that this is out of all proportion. The minister's department is probably subject to attack more than any other department for the reason that through every letter, post card and circular the Postmaster General representatively goes into the homes of Canadians. If there is any delay in the receipt of good news or bad or any minor delay in mail delivery we tend to ascribe the difficulties to the Postmaster General.

In studying the situation in my area and in attempting to bring problems or complaints to the attention of local departmental officials in both Vancouver and Burnaby I have found a genuine interest on their part in correcting any of the real or alleged delays. A suggestion was made to me which I will pass on because it may be valuable to other hon. members. When a person complains about delay in receiving a letter I am always pleased if they send me the particular letter so that I can then trace it and assist in discovering the reason for the delay. This provides the post office officials with an opportunity to clear up the difficulty.

I appreciate having had this opportunity to bring forward these few points which I know will be of interest to my constituents and to commend the minister on the excellent job he is doing.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks concerning problems of general interest relative to the question of good relationships between the Post Office Department and the public. I feel this is of importance because this department more than any other department of government is in daily contact with Canadian citizens through the postal services.

I have a file of letters here. All the numerous communications I have had with the minister's department have been dealt with courteously but the replies have been marked "personal and confidential" and therefore it will be difficult for me to deal with some of the problems I have in mind.

The first problem with which I wish to deal concerns the amalgamation of the city of Sudbury. Amalgamations are a common occurrence today and have taken place not only in Sudbury but elsewhere in Ontario. A part of my riding was amalgamated with the city of Sudbury and this has created a problem for the postal department. I am proud of the fact that the amalgamation took place but the residents of the area affected are entitled to expect the same postal services that are provided elsewhere in the municipality. I realize that this cannot be done immediately and I know that the local officials in Sudbury are investigating the matter of adequate postal services in this area. I appreciate, too, that this situation developed shortly after the government took office. I know that the personnel of the department in Sudbury are making every effort to have action taken on the question.

I feel that in instances like this the Post Office Department should take the initiative in having special studies made. A lack of action in this respect creates poor public relations between the department and the local citizens. I urge the minister to have a study made as rapidly as possible. If this were done it would reduce the number of complaints that are sent to members of parliament and the Postmaster General. People write to us because they have no one else to whom they can address their complaints. I appreciate very much receiving those complaints. It is their right to make the complaints and it is my duty to listen to them. I am certainly willing to receive them and pass them on to the minister on every occasion.

In this area, of course, some people have rural service only. Under the amalgamation the area became part of the greater city of Sudbury. Therefore, the people feel that they should receive door to door service promptly. Based on the population of the subdivision of this area, they should receive it.

Without quoting the actual words of the letters of the Postmaster General, his last letter simply indicated to me that the investigation which he told me was going on a month or two before had not even begun. This is the type of thing I find very hard to explain to my constituents, and it is difficult for them to feel satisfied with the approach of the minister to this problem. This is not an absolutely grave complaint but it is a proper one. I am sure the minister will realize that if there is a change in the community life and his department is affected he should make absolutely sure that he has the staff in the field to take care of the change. Possibly the personnel in the Sudbury area are overloaded with work; possibly they cannot find the time to make the investigation which is required to rearrange certain routes and give to the citizens the postal service which will be as good as that formerly given to the limited city of Sudbury. The citizens could be notified as soon as it is done, or they should be told that it will be done shortly. If that were done they would realize that it is not possible to make the change and rearrange the postal services in a few weeks or a month. If the matter is long delayed, especially as we were advised that the investigation which we were told was going on had not even begun some months after, the people should be informed about it.

I think it is proper that the minister should be advised that a rapid study of the problem should be made. The acuteness of the problem was known to his department, no doubt, long before this amalgamation application. I know that the one in Sudbury was discussed for at least three or four years. The citizens knew in advance that the amalgamation would take place on January 1 the following year. The department should have known that and that was the time to make the study. I am not saying that the amalgamation took place five years ago; I am saying that the application was made five years ago and the amalgamation took place since the present Postmaster General took office. Therefore he has the previous experience to know something about it and also he has the facilities since he became the Postmaster General.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I would like also to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General the problem of the Val Caron post office. I am glad to make these few comments to him in French, knowing that he understands this language quite well.

I have had the opportunity to make representations to the minister for more than two years with regard to the Val Caron post office. According to his replies, the situation there would be satisfactory. I want to point out to the minister that the Val Caron post office—I am not talking about the service, but about the building itself—and even though there are some in even worse shape—is located in an old garage which has been converted to the purpose. I personally know the town of Val Caron and the whole neighbouring area, and I can assure the minister that the building which houses the postal service is not at all adequate for this village. People who are forced to use it have to face difficulties, particularly in the wintertime, that do not exist anywhere else.

I am happy to tell the house that at Palmer, not far from there, the minister has built a post office in a municipality almost similar to that of Val Caron. People of that town are quite proud of their new post office.

I feel it would be appropriate to consider the situation which prevails at Val Caron. It seems to me that we could rent a more suitable building or allow the owner of the garage that houses the post office to put up a building of which my fellow citizens would be proud, a building more in harmony with its surroundings.

Mr. Chairman, now that I have made those few remarks, I must say that I have always received favourable consideration from the minister, even if he did not always give me satisfaction.

(Text):

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, it is a privilege for me to speak on behalf of my constituency of St. Boniface, not to make complaints but to express my commendation of and thanks for the service given to the people of St. Boniface in the new area of Windsor Park, by granting them door to door service. In Charleswood we had door to door service last year, and this year we have received the drop rate of four cents on mail. We tried hard to obtain the four cent rate for the town of Transcona, and this month it has also been extended to that town. It has also been extended to places as far away as 10 miles from the city of St. Boniface, such as the village of St. Norbert and Fort Whyte, St. Charles, Pacific Junction, Tod post office in the municipality of St. Vital, and Birds Hill.

It is remarkable how well the people have been served since 1957. The year 1957 was the first time there was an improvement in that district by having a door to door delivery in the town of Transcona. Now the whole district, the metropolitan area of greater Winnipeg, has received the four cent rate.

I should like to thank the minister, his department and also the employees in the city of St. Boniface very much for their co-operation and their faithful service in the conduct of their duties.

There is another improvement that is being planned, namely the new post office for the city of St. Boniface. I understand this building will conform with the improvements in a city of 35,000 people which is growing fast, and it will harmonize with all the wonderful buildings that the city of St. Boniface is already blessed with. As you know, the city of St. Boniface is one of the oldest cities west of the capital. It has a French speaking population, is a city of culture and has wonderful buildings. I am sure the new building will conform to the present architectural style and the importance of such a city.

I should like to make one request. I believe the Post Office Department should issue a stamp to commemorate the religious character of Christmas and counteract the emphasis on commercialism. I know that the Post Office Department has issued many worthy stamps to commemorate different historic events and I think the department should not forget to commemorate the nativity, the greatest event so far as Christianity throughout the world is concerned. I am sure this will be done. I do not want to take more time as many hon. members wish to speak. I have nothing but thanks to offer to the minister and his department.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to speak very long on this subject today but there are two or three matters I should like to raise at this time. The first, and certainly one of the most important that the minister should consider, is the pay and remuneration of the letter carriers. I think the rate of pay these men are receiving is disgraceful. I know that other speakers have referred to the yeoman service they render in all kinds of weather and certainly that is even more applicable in the area from which I come. The letter carriers have to go out when the temperature is 35, 40, 45 or 50 degrees below zero and sometimes have to wade through a couple of feet of snow that has fallen during the night. To me it is wonderful how they can even carry on their work. Certainly their rate of pay is in no way commensurate with the duties they perform for the public.

I have known some cases where letter carriers, after building up a few year's seniority in the department, have endeavoured to build themselves homes and when they came to pay the bills they found they had to leave the department, thus losing their seniority and all their benefits, and go back to work in the mines for a period of five years or so until they had reduced their mortgages before they could go back to the work of their choice in the department. I think it is a disgrace that they should lose all of their back benefits and I suggest that the minister should look into the matter very carefully and see if something cannot be done.

There is another small matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond said, while it may not be of vital national importance it certainly is important to the people in the particular area of my riding. I refer to the condition of the present post office premises in the combined towns of Ramore and Holtyre. The building is certainly not intended for this type of work. It cannot be expanded, and if the minister's inspectors would go there I think they certainly would agree with the local people that there is a very great need for a new postal building to serve these two communities.

There is one other matter that has been brought to my attention by more than one person and has to do with what is possibly a policy of the minister's department. To illustrate the point I should like to refer to the remarks of the minister when he first introduced his estimates on May 27. As found at the bottom of page 4282 of Hansard, he said at that time:

> In any organization as large as the Post Office Department the relations between management and staff are of critical importance.

I am glad to see that the minister realizes the importance of good relations between the employees and the employer, particularly in an undertaking as important as our postal service. As found in the second column on the same page he went on to say:

> During my term as Postmaster General I have had ample opportunity to study these men and women at their work. I have made a practice of dropping in unexpectedly and at odd hours of the day and night. I have been in offices at midnight; I have been in offices at 6 a.m., and I have been in offices at just about every interval between those two times. I never failed to be impressed with the employees' cheerfulness, their capability and their determination to do their work swiftly and well. I have found in the postal service a quality of devotion and integrity that is, perhaps, unusual in this day of materialism and mass production.

I should like to commend the minister for those remarks, particularly his reference to the devotion to duty of postal employees, but with reference to the first part of his remarks I am wondering how they tie in with certain complaints I have received. Probably the minister can explain whether a matter of policy that is applied across the country is involved. The complaints brought to my attention have to do with the new post office and federal building nearing completion in the town of Timmins. Although I have not seen it yet, I have been given to understand that there is what I believe is called an observation gallery in the building. I understand that the gallery is closed in with one-way glass. In other words, people can look out through this glass but people cannot look in. I understand that the purpose is for supervision of the employees and so on. I should like to ask hon. members whether they would feel completely at ease in their work if they realized that at any time big brother, the Postmaster General, might be looking over their shoulders. The employees who have brought this matter to my attention say that they have a sort of creepy feeling. They never know who is watching them and when and they feel that their integrity is being questioned more than it should be. As I say, I do not know if this is a departmental policy and possibly the minister could give some explanation of the matter. These complaints have been brought to my attention and I thought it was only right that I should bring them forward for the consideration of the minister.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak for only a minute or two. First of all, may I say that I think the minister is deserving of a compliment from myself as a member for a riding for which very little was done for a good number of years. Since my election in 1958 I along with other members from the area have been able to get the minister to consider plans for the establishment and erection of a new post office in the riding of Edmonton East. These facilities have been needed for a good many years and I wish to congratulate the minister on the way he has approached this problem and on the fact that the matter is finally in the planning stage.

The second problem I wish to bring to the minister's attention is one that has been brought to the attention of former ministers of the department by the east Edmonton businessmen's association. I refer to the need for facilities in the 118th avenue area. This is a section of the city of Edmonton where for some years business has been carried on in much the same way as in a small suburban town on the outskirts of a city.

There is suitable development in this area and the minister is aware of it as he visited this particular area with me last fall. I hope that serious consideration will be given to the establishment very soon of facilities in this area.

The second problem is one respecting a small town in the outskirts of my riding of Edmonton East, namely the town of Beverly. Ten years ago when this small town had a population of 2,500 people there were two postal facilities, namely two drug stores. The population of this area is now in excess of 10,000 people and they are being served by those two small drug stores some 40 blocks apart. I understand the minister is initiating an investigation into this particular area and service, and I hope that some good news will be forthcoming very soon in this regard.

I have only one other point to mention and this was brought to my attention by the hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac. It is with respect to postage on overseas shipments to underprivileged countries and disaster areas. I am speaking specifically of shipments made by our welfare organizations which are obliged to pay the full postal rate on these shipments. I suggest that this is a burden on these organizations.

Mr. Regier: I do not intend unduly to delay the passage of item No. 1 of the estimates, Mr. Chairman. However, I believe the minister realizes that once we overcome the hurdle of item No. 1 there ought to be little delay in processing the remaining items under his department. I want to underline the point I made on May 27 which was not replied to at that time. I realize the minister was very optimistic and hoped that after a brief reply we might agree to the passage of item No. 1 at the time. I refer to my plea that the number necessary under the regulations for the institution of door to door delivery be greatly reduced. With all the unemployment we have in Canada at the present time and also with the changes in the living habits of the Canadian population, I feel that the old regulation calling for a minimum of 2,500 calls in any post office before door to door delivery is begun is in line for major consideration. I believe that half of that number ought to be adequate.

I know there are problems of hiring men and giving them the five-day week when giving delivery for six days a week is involved. However, according to my calculations, a community having 1,250 householders would require four men, with three men always on the go. To those four men we might even, under these conditions, be able to grant the eight-hour day and the five-day week.

I think that a new look might be taken at this problem. I would ask the minister whether some consideration will be given to this proposal. I think it might enable the department to pay a little more attention to municipal boundaries if this were done. In my riding it would enable the people of Port Moody to receive their mail via the Port Moody post office rather than, as is the case under present conditions, roughly one third of them having to get their mail out of the New Westminster post office in order to have the advantage of door to door delivery.

I should like to underline the pleas made in this chamber by the hon. member for New Westminster and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond that growing and relatively new communities in major urban areas surrounding larger cities be supplied with separate post offices of their own. The minister's reply to the hon. member for New Westminster with regard to the Newton post office is found at page 4704 of Hansard. The minister had this to say:

> I believe he also knows that we are looking at the question of a post office building for that area. However, we do not want to be drawn into the erection of a building on a specific location in an area which is expanding and growing as rapidly as is that one until at least there is some firm indication as to the pattern of growth which is going to take place in the years ahead.

I recall that a number of years ago, if not as recently as one year ago, there was in the estimates an item for the building of a new post office in Newton. If the government knew as early as that time that a new post office was needed in that area or that municipality, and had obviously agreed that it was going to build one or that one ought to be built, I must ask the minister in all sincerity whether that item was in the estimates at the time for political reasons only or whether there was any degree of sincerity toward obtaining a vote in this chamber for the supplying of the people of Newton with a post office. In particular, I should like him to explain why after the decision by the House of Commons to allow the building of a federal building at Newton there are apparently now no plans to proceed or even to use the money that was originally allowed.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond underlined the growing need for a post office in Burnaby in order to meet the requirements of the residents of Burnaby. I do not agree at all with his contention that there is only a small number of complaints as to the delivery of mail in Burnaby. In my experience the service rendered with regard to the delivery of mail has declined from year to year. It is my contention that the delivery of mail is going to decline in efficiency until at long last the government is going to grant us our own distribution arrangements.

I should also like the minister to explain what the present attitude of his department is with regard to the rental of post office buildings. I know the former minister of public works took a very firm position in this regard. It was his opinion, which was expressed in this house, that wherever possible the Department of Public Works ought to own the building and that there ought to be no arrangement whereby the department would grant a rental lease to an individual, who would then take that lease, go to the bank and obtain the loan necessary to finance entirely the cost of a building and who would be able to repay the whole of the cost of the building out of the rentals outlined in the lease, and then at the end of a five, seven or ten-year period he would remain the owner of the building toward the ownership of which he had supplied nothing except a little bit of organizational ability.

We have at this time a building in North Burnaby not owned by the department. We have a building in Port Moody not owned by the government and there is a building on the Kingsway not owned by the government. The rental in at least one of these three cases is one of the highest rentals on a square footage basis that the Post Office Department is obligated to pay anywhere in the dominion. I would like to see the attitude of the government expressed as being identical with the attitude expressed a year or more ago, and I would like to see a little more action on the part of the government to implement this attitude, and that they either purchase existing buildings or erect their own buildings wherever it is economically right to do so, rather than renting buildings at exorbitant rates.

I should also like to make one additional reference to the reply of the minister to the representations of the hon. member for Vancouver East. The attitude of our group is that the taxpayers of Canada ought not to subsidize the distribution of advertising through the mails. I noted the minister's reply both on May 27 and again on June 8 when he emphasized that it is very important that there be the widest distribution of newspapers and magazines into the homes of the people of Canada.

I agree with that basic attitude of the minister. However, it is not the appearance and the distribution of the magazines and newspapers and other educational media that we take exception to; we feel that there is an undue amount of brain washing already in eixstence on the Canadian cultural scene and we do not like to see the post office being misused in order to enhance the interests of the advertisers of our nation.

The minister also said, as reported on page 4705 of Hansard for June 8:

> —I see no necessity to ask the house to authorize any increase in the first-class postal rate.

May I assure the minister that neither the hon. member for Vancouver East nor any other member of our group advocated an increase in first-class postal rates at this or at any other time. However, we now adopt the attitude that the minister adopted when he was in opposition in 1954 when he advocated that the users of first-class mail be not penalized in order to make possible the distribution of the very heavy burden of advertising, which is indeed a heavy burden on our employees in the Post Office Department.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): May I ask the hon. member a question before he resumes his seat. Did I understand him to say that the attitude of his group was that the taxpayers of Canada should not be asked to contribute to what I think he said was a subsidy on this particular class of mail?

Mr. Regier: We do not mind a subsidy on the distribution of educational information such as contained in text books, novels, newspapers or magazines. However, we do take very serious objection to the post office having to subsidize the commercial advertising enterprises of Canada.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity of bringing to the attention of the minister a problem which is of vital importance to the residents of one of our enterprising young communities in northern Manitoba. At the community of Snow Lake, Manitoba the people are receiving at the present time only tri-weekly mail service. This service has been going on for some time and up until very recently it was possibly the best service which could be provided by the Post Office Department because at that time there was only tri-weekly service on the trains travelling on the Hudson bay line from The Pas to Churchill. But now with further development at the new townsite of Thompson, Canadian National Railways have now inaugurated a daily service going northwards out of The Pas, and I would like the minister to give the very fullest consideration to investigating this situation to see if it would not be possible to take advantage of the new train service to give the people of Snow Lake a daily mail service.

In yesterday's mail I received a letter from the local administrator of that point. Attached to that letter was a very lengthy petition signed by the majority of the residents of Snow Lake. I understand that the original of this petition has been directed to the minister, and I sincerely request that this matter be given every consideration. I would like to point out that I am sure the people of Snow Lake would be very gratified to know that plans are under way for the construction of a new post office, and I certainly hope that this will be carried out as quickly as possible. The postmaster at Snow Lake has been performing very satisfactory service under sometimes adverse conditions due to lack of space in relation to the volume of mail which comes into this new community. This is a mining community, everyone there is employed, and I am quite sure I am safe in saying that there is a large volume of mail going in and out of Snow Lake.

There is one more small matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister concerning another point in northern Manitoba, Cranberry Portage. Some time ago complaints came in from the residents of Cranberry Portage in relation to the facilities of the post office at that point. As the result of these complaints an investigation took place and all of the complaints were fully investigated. One of the recommendations which came out of the investigation by the officials who made the investigation was that it was very desirable to have a post office at that point located in a separate self-contained building entirely apart from the building which it is now in, which also houses a general store. In January this recommendation went in and I was advised by the Post Office Department that they felt this should be done. I should like the minister to investigate this problem and, if possible, advise me as to just what progress has been made.

In closing I should like to commend the minister on the work he has been doing in operating the department and to thank him for the co-operation I have had in the past. I should also like to make a strong plea to him to see if improved mail services cannot be had for the people of Snow Lake. I do not believe it would be too difficult. Snow Lake is located about 36 miles off the Hudson bay line and has access by road to the railhead at Wekusko and trains arrive in Wekusko every day. It may need some new arrangement with the contractor who transports the mail from Wekusko to Snow Lake, but this mail contractor has some obligation to meet each train every day in other work which he performs and I do not think it would be too difficult to make arrangments for mail to be carried between Wekusko and Snow Lake.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): I should like to ask the minister briefly about a matter in connection with curbside mail boxes. We have one in the riding which I represent which was put in on a trial basis. I believe there are others in other parts of Canada. I should like to have the minister tell us what success they have had with these curbside mail boxes where you can drive up in your car and put your mail in the box. It has been very popular in the city of St. Catharines and I understand there has been a request for a few more. The one we have was one of the first put in, but I think there could be some improvement in the design of the box itself. The one important factor is to make it weather-proof so that wind driven snow cannot get into the box. There are two types of curbside boxes. There is one with a conveyor belt that takes the mail into the post offices. I am not thinking of that. I am thinking of the boxes placed on residential streets where you can drive up in your car, put the mail in it and drive away.

Mr. Garland: I am reluctant to add an off note to what seems to be a happy afternoon with compliments flying and, I am sure, compliments which are well deserved in some cases, but there is a matter which I feel is my duty to raise. Before doing so I should like to take this opportunity to say that Canada is fortunate in having such a high calibre of civil servant across the country, and of that group none are more loyal or more devoted than those employed in the Post Office Department.

My question arises from two directives which were issued during 1959 in the Post Office Department and which seem to me to smell strongly of political meddling in the public service. It has to do with the functions of civil servants carrying out their normal duties and I think it adversely affects this important postal service to the Canadian people. Perhaps I could explain best and more briefly by citing an example of the appointment of a subpostmaster or the transfer and appointment of a subpostmaster.

With the development which has taken place in this country and around many of the large cities of this country I think this is becoming more and more of a problem as more and more of these offices are required to be opened. As I said, I think I can best explain by taking an instance where a subpostmaster resigns. Normally the procedure to be followed as I understand it would be for officials to explore the possibilities, to reexamine the area with a view to appointing a new subpostmaster. Now I understand that on the basis of a directive from Ottawa dated February 17, 1959 which dealt with the transfer and appointment of subpostmasters, and a further one of May 26, 1959 which dealt with the opening of subpost offices, postal officials from coast to coast have been affected, and as a result of those directives they are unable to take the necessary action to maintain this service. On the contrary they must wait for instructions, and any applications, I understand, that are received locally, and this applies to all Canada, must be forwarded to Ottawa for approval, which seems to me can only mean political approval.

That is a backward step. It is a step which I think interferes with the normal functions of officials of the Post Office Department. That sort of thing may have been good enough back in the old horse and buggy days but I do not think it is good enough for 1960 and I would ask the Postmaster General if he will give serious consideration to rescinding these two directives, the one of February 17 dealing with the transfer and appointment of subpostmasters and the one of May 26 dealing with the opening of subpost offices. I ask him if he will consider rescinding these directives which I believe are politically inspired.

Mr. McFarlane: I should like to make a few brief remarks on the subject of the postal service through Nelson and points east and point out, first of all, that at the present time there is a very close connection with the postal service at Nelson. I understand that one truck brings the mail into Nelson and the other leaves almost immediately, so that if the Vancouver mail truck is late getting in the mail is held up indefinitely until a connection can be made. I would suggest that more leeway be allowed in connecting truck times between Nelson and points east.

Another point I wish to raise concerns registered mail services. I do not think we are providing the service that we should provide to many of the rural communities. I had an instance brought to my attention where a letter was registered at a point in the lake Windermere valley to another point eight miles away. In view of the regulations which require, apparently, that the letter has to go to a subpost office, by the time it had gone around it was 10 days before the letter was finally received although there was only such a short distance involved. So I would like to suggest that a small bag or pouch be utilized for this purpose so that registered mail could be handled without this serious delay.

Another point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister concerns airmail service. I feel that in many of these smaller communities especially in our area when first-class mail is picked up it should be immediately transferred to a point where it will connect with air mail service. It should be forwarded by air mail from the distribution point rather than being transported by truck as it is at the present time.

I should like to cite an example of what I mean. If a letter is mailed in Creston in time to catch the mail truck out of Creston at ten o'clock in the morning the letter is taken to Cranbrook. It travels by truck until it reaches Calgary the following day. It is late getting into Calgary and it is not delivered in Calgary until the following morning. If that first-class mail out of Creston were transferred at the post office in Cranbrook to the air mail service it would be in Calgary within four hours after mailing in Creston.

This is something to which we should give consideration. We are giving air mail service to the larger centres and I feel similar services could be provided to smaller communities rather than allowing first-class mail to take the usual course of delivery.

Apart from these suggestions I have made we are very well satisfied with the rules and regulations of the Post Office Department. I believe that the Postmaster General is turning out sound regulations and that he and his staff are doing an excellent job of mail delivery under conditions that are often difficult in our part of the country, particularly in the winter months. I would be grateful if the two or three matters I have mentioned could be given consideration. I do not feel it is asking too much to have given to people in rural areas the postal service that is given to people in larger centres.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the Post Office Department is one of the most highly socialized operations in the world today. We want it to be as efficient as possible because it proves something we want proved not only here but throughout the world.

Mr. McCleave: We will keep the hon. member away from it then.

Mr. Peters: Canada has done a good job in supplying mail service at a reasonable price and the results are highly satisfactory. The salaries of postal employees come under the Civil Service Act and do not come within the purview of the minister. The Postmaster General should pay closer attention to the wages and working conditions in post offices than he has in the past.

The minister spoke of his visits to post offices throughout Canada and stated that he arrived at all hours of the day and night. When I worked in the mines we sometimes had bosses drop in unexpectedly. Mines are dark, dismal and not well lighted and sometimes we would take a long lunch hour. We never appreciated unexpected visits from our boss under those circumstances. I draw this to the minister's attention.

I suggest that if we raised the salaries of postal employees we would not have to have snooper systems or runways and pilfering would be reduced. I appreciate that runways are not only a technological advance but serve as a check on employees. The days are gone when supervision of this kind is required. We should improve salary standards and working conditions.

Progress has been made in terms of promotions within the department but the progress is not fast enough to suit me. I recently travelled on a train with a friend with whom I had worked in a mine. He is an honest and conscientious employee. He accepted a job in the Post Office Department in Ottawa two or three years ago and although the wages were adequate and the working conditions not unpleasant he has already grown dissatisfied with the lack of opportunities for promotion or advancement. I have heard this from other employees of post offices including the one at Kirkland Lake of which I have knowledge. Promotions are not always accorded under civil service regulations on the basis of seniority or in accordance with skill or acquired knowledge. Often someone is brought in from outside which precludes opportunities for advancement among the local employees.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit me to make a statement at this point. If the hon. member will look in the official gallery he will see the deputy minister who started off his career as a clerk in the department. He will see another official, just below the deputy minister in rank, who began his career as a letter carrier. He will also observe another couple of fellows in the official gallery who started off slugging mail bags somewhere in the back of a post office. If the hon. gentleman would direct his attention to the table of the house I believe he would see another man who started off in the Post Office Department as well. I believe that is a pretty good answer to there being inadequate opportunities for advancement within the department. The answer can be found in the gentlemen sitting up in the official gallery.

Mr. Peters: I am amazed and gratified by that information. My hon. friend described the situation as he sees it. It may be that promotions are slow through no fault of the system but through a failure of the departmental officials to disseminate information about opportunities for advancement among employees of the department.

There are a number of other problems that I should like to discuss. Some of them affect the wage structure of the postal employees for the work they do. I have had complaints in my riding from people getting $270 a month on which they have to keep a family. They are doing a job which involves walking up to 14 miles a day carrying heavy mail bags. They have responsibility for confidential matters and for financial documents. They have responsibility that is considerably above that which would be given to an individual in any other industry at that rate of pay. I think they have grounds for complaint.

In many instances they object to the fact that they cannot use their own cars for transporting their mail sacks from the general post office to where they are going to deliver their mail. Most of them have cars and they would like to throw the bag in the back seat and drive 20 or 30 blocks and then pick up their route from there and leave the car parked on a side street and pick it up again after they are through. They tell me they are not allowed to do this. This may be true of only one or two post offices, but it is true in one. They object to this; they think they should be allowed to use their cars. There may be very good reasons why they are not allowed to use them, but in the smaller communities they could use the same system that is used in the suburbs of large cities where they have pick-up depots. The mail is taken to those depots and the mail man, instead of going to the main post office gets his mail from this particular depot. This may be an answer in part to the problem.

We have another problem that affects my riding because it is an urban and rural riding. I refer to the matter of rural mail delivery. The minister may say that this is not general, and I will agree. It is not even general in my riding, but it happens to be general in this particular area. We have asked for a survey to be made to see whether something can be done to solve this particular problem. I understand the department is working on it. I received this letter which will explain the problem fairly well:

> As you probably know, this rural route is operated from Charlton some seven miles west of Englehart. At present we enjoy thrice weekly delivery and pick-up, i.e., Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. There is an R.R. 2 also serviced from Charlton which only gets twice weekly delivery.
> Though only having three deliveries a week is bad enough, yet the length of time taken for mail to reach us from outside points, and the time for mail picked up here to get to its destination is absolutely unbelievable.
> For instance, a letter requiring an immediate reply is received here on a Thursday. The reply is picked up on the Saturday. It does not leave Charlton until the following Monday and its arrival, say, in Toronto is on Tuesday and delivery there may not be till Wednesday. Mail for Kirkland Lake some 25 miles away has to be placed on the train, taken to North Bay then after sorting brought back by train to Swastika thence to Kirkland.
> Incoming mail is just as bad. It takes papers (and letters) just as long to reach us from Kirkland as from Toronto.

Toronto is 400 miles away. I continue:

> Papers published in Kirkland on Friday are not delivered here till the next Tuesday, the Toronto papers for the same day also arriving at the same time.
> Letters from Tarzwell, only a few miles north of here are first taken to Swastika, thence to North Bay, then back to Englehart, then to Charlton and finally, days later, arrive at their addressees.

He goes on to say it is useless to complain to the officials and this is the part I should like to read:

> Just one additional delivery through the week, on Monday, would mean an awful lot to us, and, if such could be effected I would certainly see that you are given the credit for bringing this about.

He wrote me another letter subsequent to this and this is what he said in part:

> I have another glaring example of the inefficient, inadequate mail service in this locality.
> At 10.03 p.m. on March 18 a telegram was handed in to Canadian National Telegraphs in Toronto. It was received in Englehart the same night. As we, in this modern community have no phones, the wire was mailed to me on Saturday, March 19. I received it at 11 a.m. Tuesday March 22.

Luckily, the telegram only announced the birth of a grand-daughter, but the whole point is that it would have been the same had the wire carried the news of a death or a fatal illness. And, of course, it could happen to anyone living on these ill-served mail routes.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the "Telegram"—

This is the Telegram newspaper.

—of Saturday, March 19 carried the birth announcement. It arrived at the same time as the telegram which was sent some 24 hours earlier. And we in Canada are so far ahead of other nations in our ways of life, or are we?

All I want to do is to point out that we have problems and some of these problems concern our rural delivery routes. We have not kept up to date on those routes as we have in the urban areas. In my opinion we have the opportunity now of combining many of the rural routes, particularly in my area. I cannot speak for other areas but I think that conditions there are much about the same. The rural routes were laid out when we were driving horses, when the mail, certainly in the wintertime, had to be delivered by horse-drawn conveyances and the routes had to be kept to certain limits. Now automobiles are used in the summer time and in the main the routes are all snowplowed in the winter time. It would be a very simple matter in some instances to combine two and in other instances more than two rural delivery routes so that mail could be delivered much faster and much more effectively than it is at the present time.

On a number of occasions I have asked for changes in these mail routes. The method of proceeding is to take out a petition. When a petition is taken out it makes a lot of people angry because it means changing from a rural post office to rural delivery. After the petition is taken out, and overwhelmingly those petitions are in favour of one type of service or the other, nothing happens. In some cases this action is repeated two or three times over a period of four or five years with the same result.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The hon. member refers to some cases. Will he give me two or three examples?

Mr. Peters: I am thinking of one in particular, namely Uno Park. The second one is Thornloe. I have been involved in the one at Uno Park on two occasions. I do not know what the result is of the last request of two or three months ago but I do know that a gentleman who took out the petition, who had raised the matter with me the first time, tells me that none of his close neighbours will talk to him any more because they wanted the post office instead of the rural delivery, and yet the petition was quite highly supported.

This type of thing does not make for good relations in the community when it is done on this basis. The situation is changing. Conditions must have been laid down in the first place for establishing the set-up that was established. Conditions change all the time. I am thinking of road clearance and snow removal in the wintertime. Conditions are vastly changed from what they were. This means that the service can be changed and in many instances better service can be given.

We have another problem that I am concerned with which is in the transitional stage now. To date it has not produced any bad results in my area but I think it can and will, and also in Cochrane north. I refer to the sorting of mail on trains. There used to be mail cars on all O.N.R. trains but now sorting is done only on some of them. It meant that when the post office closed at six o'clock, or at whatever time it might close, people who wanted to get mail on the train would go to the station and drop their mail in the appropriate box, depending on whether the letter was to go north or south, and the mail would be delivered the next morning. The service from Ottawa or Toronto to northern Ontario is very fast provided certain conditions are met. If I mail a letter at four o'clock this afternoon and it leaves our subpost office and goes to the station directly rather than going through the main post office it will be delivered in Kirkland Lake tomorrow afternoon. If it goes through the local post office it may be a matter of many days. If it happens to be a brown envelope it will sometimes take four or five days, but normally first-class mail will be delivered immediately.

This situation is repeated all along the line, and one reason that return mail service has been so satisfactory is that the mail is sorted on the train by the postal staff. Even in the case of mail addressed to a small community ten miles away from the point of mailing, the postal staff are able to operate speedily enough to be able to drop this mail off at its destination although it may only be a few miles away. Service to these communities takes one day or less.

I am told that a number of postal employees have been taken off the northern run, that the sorting is only done at the centres now and that the mail is transported by truck. As a result, there is no service available to many of the small communities as was the case before. If mail is left at the post office after hours it remains there until the next day because obviously there is nobody there to sort it. The truck driver can only handle sorted mail and mail cannot be given to the truck driver to take to its destination until it is sorted because he is hired on the basis of conveying mail and not to handle or deal with it in any other way. There would be no cancellation of the stamps if the truck driver were to take such mail and I understand he is instructed not to do so, which I think is quite right.

We in northern Ontario would like more consideration to be given to this matter before any further curtailment in the sorting of mail on mail cars takes place. It may be that reconsideration can be given to those areas where this practice has been discontinued because it was serving a very useful purpose and providing a service that we need badly. We are a long distance from the main centres and a great deal of our business is done by mail. Telegrams are even more difficult to deliver to many of the small communities. Our mail service has been very satisfactory and we would like to see it kept on as high a level of efficiency as possible.

I have seen the situation that has developed in other areas of Ontario and which may develop in our area. I can remember being in southwestern Ontario a few years ago and a letter from Toronto to Dundalk, Orangeville or Collingwood took five days to get to its destination. I know that because my cheque used to be sent to me by mail and I would go to the post office every day for five or six days before I got my cheque. I hope that the minister, in giving consideration to the better distribution of mail to small communities, will take this matter into account. I have talked to people in the area I have mentioned and the mail service there is no better now than it was when I was there.

I suggest that the same thing could happen in northern Ontario and I say there is no reason why it should. We have been very satisfied with the mail service we have had and we would like to continue to receive that type of service. Therefore I ask the minister to give very careful consideration to the matter of changing from the sorting of mail on the train and using a truck distribution service instead. In the limited areas where the new service has been used or where it has not been possible to give service by rail because of the discontinuation of rail service to communities such as Matachewan the results have not been very satisfactory. When the railway went into that area the postal service was much better than it is now with the present system of transportation by truck and bus.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to say very much on this item but I cannot help adding some words in praise of the Post Office Department. I think it should be said that the administrative staff of the department is excellent. As Canadians we should be proud of our post office system. I do not take anything away, of course, from the hard working minister because in working hard and giving attention to his department I think he rates as high as anyone who has occupied that office in the past. My heart does not bleed too much for the situation of the administrative staff generally. I think their conditions of work are good and their salaries are fairly well rated at the present time.

But I am always interested in learning more about the mail sorters and the men who deliver the mail. I should like the minister to bring me up to date as to their situation. I have always thought that these men are entitled to special consideration. Although they are not professionals as far as education is concerned, they are professionals having regard to the service they give. They make our lives a little more cheerful when we go to the door to receive our mail. I do not know whether they are trained that way, but I like to see the postman come to my door. In spite of any trouble he may have in his home life, he always seems to forget that, always inquires about me and tries to find out if he can be helpful. For that alone I think they should receive special consideration with respect to their remuneration.

There is one situation that always worries me. These men toil under rather heavy loads that we would not like to have to carry every day. There has been some improvement in this regard in recent years, but there still must be some men who after five, ten or fifteen years become physically not as able to do the job and cannot carry on. This applies also to some sorters whose work involves the use of their eyes and physical effort. I should like to know what happens to these men if after a period of time they cannot carry on their work. Are they placed in positions in other sections of the department at equal remuneration or do many have to leave their employment altogether? It is my impression that there are not many who lose their positions on account of the fact that they cannot carry on the work they have been doing. I hope the minister will be able to answer this question and at the same time I hope he will be able to tell the committee that he appreciates as much as any other member that the sorters and the men who carry our mail are entitled to special consideration in their rates of pay. I hope he will lead the fight at all times, as he should, to see that the civil service commission realizes that our letter carriers are not just people who are walking the streets and throwing letters in mail boxes but are professionals in their field. I think all members of the house will agree with me on that.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the minister that I am not rising with anything but good will for him and for the department. Over the years I have found that the department takes into consideration in a very friendly spirit representations made to it by members of parliament, no matter what their political persuasion may be. I have always been pleased, as I say, with the investigations that have been taking place as a result of inquiries I have made or suggestions I have advanced to the Post Office Department. If I have any criticism at all, it is not of the personnel in the head office or in the district offices; it is rather I think of a system that has developed, shall I say.

While they respond with the utmost consideration to suggestions that have come from me as to improvements in services, over the years I have developed the feeling that somehow, perhaps under pressure from treasury board, there has been an extra consciousness of the budget and a fear of adding anything different or new to the budget. Sometimes they find it necessary to do something after a community or after a member of parliament makes a request. I sometimes think they should perhaps initiate some of these things themselves much more quickly when conditions change.

A great number of trains have been taken off. I sometimes think that the staff itself has not been too quick to adopt alternatives to replace perhaps a daily service to which we were accustomed to; and, for instance, when local trains are no longer in existence, to substitute transportation by truck or otherwise. Too often they seem to wait for a nudge from the community or from the member of parliament. I think the difficulty does not lie in the fact that they do not see these things. Rather I think the difficulty lies in the fact that they have had such a great amount of pressure upon them as to the need of not increasing their expenses that we sometimes find it necessary to make suggestions more often than we seem to be obliged to in connection with some other departments.

I do not want to repeat some of the excellent suggestions that have been made today, last Wednesday and on a previous occasion when the minister was before us with the administration item. I think perhaps I might be introducing something that has not been discussed so far. I want to draw the attention of the minister and his officials to the fact that in some of the northern areas of our country where the population might be predominantly Indian we have in recent years been experiencing a change in the life that is being led there. Instead of sending many of the youngsters out to residential schools there has been a trend to establish day schools. Instead of sending the people out to hospitals and to doctors there has developed a pattern of small nursing stations through the community. I think the minister will be well acquainted with the fact that the economics branch of Indian affairs is attempting to have projects for timber resources development and the development of fisheries in the lakes in order to guide them to try to develop these activities. In consequence, their existence to a great extent is not the nomadic, moving-around type of existence as they have had in the past. We have now in many places—and certainly this situation applies in the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River—greater permanency in the life that is being led there. In consequence, air services are improved. The local services are on a regular basis rather than on a charter basis in many instances I could indicate to the department. Inasmuch as this regular schedule service is available at several of the headquarters of our bands I feel that a careful look should be given to the desirability of establishing the normal postal services that would be provided to that number of people if they were situated in any other part of the country. There is greater permanency now. The nomadic life is not being led. I think there is justification for setting up postal services.

There are one or two other items upon which the minister would perhaps care to comment either now or when we meet the appropriate item in his estimates. We are all aware that the annual report that is publicly available refers to the year ending something more than a year ago. Perhaps the minister might give us an indication of what has happened in the meantime with respect to commemorative stamps and perhaps he might give us an outline of what his schedule is with respect to new stamps for the present fiscal year.

In the annual report of the department for the year ended March 31, 1959 I note that the minister indicated the numbers of post office savings banks that are provided. Can he break that figure down as to the number of points in which there are postal savings banks but in which there would not be a branch of one of our chartered banks.

I have had some experience with the benefits that have developed from the easing of regulations which are referred to on page 11 of the same report. The wording of the report is as follows:

—the regulations restricting letter carrier delivery across vacant land have been eased.

I wonder whether it would not be appropriate for us to have on Hansard, from the experience gained, a short description of the effects of these new regulations. I certainly know that in one of the larger communities of my area this easing has proved helpful because, by reason of the terrain in our part of northern Ontario where we have a great deal of water and a number of rocks, we have settlements established in fingers of the area which are sometimes quite a distance from the centre of the community.

Reference was made the other day, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Port Arthur, to the possibility of establishing group boxes in some of our communities where settlement is now some distance from the one and only post office in the community. In both instances I think he was referring to communities which have not a population that would under present regulations, justify the establishment of a letter carrier delivery system. In his reply last Wednesday the minister did not completely give me the information that I perhaps would be seeking, namely whether or not delivery by means of group boxes can be provided even in communities where letter carrier delivery service has not been established.

The other item with regard to which I would appreciate having some information on record because there is a great deal of interest in the matter is what the progress has been in the minimum numbers of householders that have been required over the years before the Post Office Department would entertain a request for letter carrier service. I think the number is now 2,500. But as I recall it, the last time in my constituency that we were able to persuade the department to institute a new letter carrier service the figure prevailing then was either 1,600 or 1,800. I was just wondering when the 2,500 unit figure was established.

In the debate and in the departmental report reference has been made to marine services. Does the postal transportation department provide marine mail service except by utilizing some already existing water carrier that is operating on a schedule similar to the arrangements that have been provided historically by the railway? If not, in what circumstances does the department enter into the establishment of new contracts with carriers perhaps carrying only mail?

I am not going to repeat at any length the feelings that have been expressed by hon. members on all sides of the chamber that the services provided by our letter carriers and some of our more humble clerks and sorters in the offices do not, under present conditions, seem to be remunerated on a scale that to many of us seems to be comparable and fair with respect to other occupations, both those in the non-government service in our highly organized union communities and indeed in some of the other departments.

I gave a specific illustration to the minister which rather continues to arouse my concern. I think in a community like Rainy River the postmaster has responsibilities, but without detailed information of the functions of that post and the funcitons of non-managerial numbers of the staff of the customs or immigration branch, I do not think his responsibilities are comparable with that of a routine member of the staff at the border point who would inspect visitors. I think that is an example and perhaps the post office has not been able to be as persuasive in the matter of increased salaries for some of its personnel as have some other departments. I think the difference in salary between those two posts is about $1,500. In my view there is no comparison between the attitude taken by the members of the community as to the responsibility of the postmaster himself and one who is not the senior man in either the department of customs or the department of immigration, one who is simply doing border checking at that point without the responsibilities of management.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I have in my riding an association called the superannuated civil servants. I have had several meetings with their executive in regard to a problem which is not properly a problem of the Postmaster General but which I should like to draw to his attention and ask his good offices to try to further the aims of this group.

A prime problem in a large city is that of casual help at Christmastime and the postmaster likes to get experienced personnel to act as straw bosses, so to speak, foremen, over help which has had no previous post office experience. But according to the act which governs superannuation and pensions, these men cannot earn in any one month more than they earned at the time they left the service. This is a very fair regulation and a very right and proper one. However, I think its application to casual help could bear a little looking into because I know of one case where a man in the city of Vancouver worked through at the request of the postmaster and his pay had to be adjusted to 65 cents an hour because it simply went over the amount he was allowed to earn. In other cases they have to make a refund.

I have had letters on this and I have seen the letters which deal with it. The department has acted according to the letter of the law, but I would like the Postmaster General, if he would, to confer with his colleague the Minister of Finance and see whether some arrangement can be made whereby casual help who are only employed for a few weeks or a month might be exempted from these regulations.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I shall only take a moment of the minister's time but I want to draw to his attention one or two difficulties we are having at Sudbury, particularly since the amalgamation which took place on January 1 of this year.

In this amalgamated area naturally the four cents local postage rate will apply, with the exception of one area. I have had a great amount of correspondence complaining about people who receive their mail at this particular post office, which is not a sub, where letters have been mailed to them carrying a four cents stamp but when they go to pick up their mail they are charged two cents extra for this service.

I might say that this area is much closer to the city than some of the annexed areas which are already, and have been for some time, enjoying carrier service, with the exception of the one area about which I am speaking. I know that this post office was recently renovated by the Post Office Department and I would presume that a lease of some length has been taken on this building. However, I suggest that when this lease is over this post office be removed and the area that it serves can then in many cases apply for carrier service which is enjoyed by other areas much further removed from the central post office in the city, areas such as Minnow Lake, Gatchell, New Sudbury and part of Lockerby, the community of which I am speaking. All these areas are already enjoying letter carrier service, but the area around this post office is not.

At the same time there are two areas adjacent to it on either side which would like to qualify for rural route delivery and have community boxes established, but due to the location of the post office I am led to believe that rural route service cannot apply within half a mile of either side of a recognized post office. If such is the case I hope it will be looked into and that service can be given to these two areas in the form of a rural route service, which they will be pleased to get instead of having to travel the great distance to this post office. I know that many of the people living in these areas are having their mail delivered to their business addresses in the city rather than trying to pick it up at the Lockerby post office.

The particular beef I have, of course, is the four cents stamp and the two cents additional at this one post office, but nowhere else in the amalgamated area.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) to a stamp that was sent to me recently, from a source I cannot reveal.

At first sight, I thought it was a prehistoric animal, but using a magnifying glass, I was able to read the name of the Hon. Wilfrid Labbe, a member of the Union Nationale and of Mr. Barrette's cabinet.

May I also suggest to the minister that there should be a rule against affixing such stamps to letters. The one I have here gives the impression of being a current issue, and I really do not think we should tolerate the use of such stamps on correspondence that is sent and delivered through the Post Office Department.

We owe it to ourselves to allow all charitable organizations to use promotion stamps, but surely not stamps such as the one I received, which incidentally was quite unattractive. Besides, in my estimation envelopes are no place for such stamps.

I therefore ask the minister to inquire as to whether stamps of this type, used purely for election purposes—because such stamps are misleadingly similar to regular stamps—might have been cancelled in post offices, thus causing the government to lose revenue.

I leave the matter with the minister, and I am sending the stamp over to him so that he may have a look at it. However, I would ask him to return it, because after June 22, such stamps will become rarities, indeed, and I would like to hang on to that one.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I would like to clear up one or two small points which I made in my previous remarks when I was talking about the scope of the football pools in Britain. Apparently I understated the number of pools and the amount of business they did. I was really only referring to one pool, and while it is the largest of the pool organizations it is only one of eight comparable organizations.

There is one other point which might make it right and proper in terms of Tory pride to go along with. For example, the equivalent to our Minister of Finance in Great Britain also has a type of legalized gamble going, in that people who buy certain types of bonds and savings certificates over there have what amounts to an opportunity to win big prizes.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I might just point out that when the hon. member discussed this the other day the Postmaster General referred to the fact that this came under the Criminal Code. I do not think, therefore, that the hon. gentleman can continue along that line.

Mr. Fisher: I imagined it was affected by the operations of the Post Office Department, but I could be mistaken. Anyway I have had some mail since making my remarks which indicates that there are a substantial number of people desperately trying to play the football pools who are fed up with the attempts of the Postmaster General to block their efforts.

I turn now to something which I know is the responsibility of the minister. This is something which the hon. member for Vancouver East brought up. He compared the attitude of the minister toward the loss in carrying newspapers and periodicals in the old days with his actions now. One of the points in which I would be interested is the relationship in the loss, which I understand to be about $26 million—I say "loss" but I really mean loss of revenue, because that is what it is, rather than an actual loss—between the carrying of a large number of United States periodicals which now come to our country and the Canadian periodicals and newspapers. Could the minister give us a breakdown? These are newspapers as against periodicals, although I know that technically a newspaper is a periodical. There are only 100 daily newspapers in Canada at the moment and there are not too many weeklies. I wonder if the minister would have any kind of a break-down so that we could analyse this $26 million loss in revenue to see if it would not be possible to kill two birds with one stone, that is, to get more revenue and to give Canadian periodicals an advantage as compared with the United States magazines which come in and not only take away circulation but advertising revenue.

I know this could be looked upon as an extra tax, and there may be difficulties about dealing with magazines coming in from another country. I get magazines sent to me very week from Britain and it always seems fantastic that a big bundle of magazines can come in all the way from London for a one and a half penny stamp. Maybe there has been some international agreement worked out, but if it is a fact we are losing so much revenue, and if a substantial proportion of it is the result of carrying United States and other foreign periodicals, we might consider some agreement to raise the price to the post office for carrying it.

One of the ironies about the newspaper situation in Canada today is a political one. I do not know of a newspaper in Canada that claims to be anything other than a spokesman of free enterprise. I am thinking especially of a Thompson paper or a paper such as the Globe and Mail which I understand has the largest circulation of any newspaper in Canada. These newspapers are preeminently for private enterprise and it always puzzled me to think that there might be this inconsistency about free enterprise. There is, of course, the fact that these free enterprises allow their employees in Ottawa to exist in government rooms at government expense down the third floor corridor, for example. But here is a bigger and more costly thing. We have these free enterprisers being, in effect, subsidized by the public purse if this loss of $26 million represents substantially the fact that the post office is carrying Canadian newspapers and periodicals. For that reason I should like to get a closer idea of the relative amount. I would like to know how much subsidy we are giving to these free enterprisers to publish free enterprise Canadian newspapers.

Take the Globe and Mail, for example, which takes delight in pointing out all the subsidies on western wheat and all the subsidies paid to farmers in general. These papers continually preach the gospel of free enterprise, rugged individualism, standing on your own two feet and so on, yet this is a paper which I understand has the largest mailed circulation of any daily newspaper in Canada and as a consequence this free enterprise operation is in receipt of substantial assistance from the government.

There is another aspect of this question which I suppose the minister has already considered. That is the question of the reason for this subsidy. If the minister looks at volume 2 of the History of Canadian Journalism, which is a book writen by a journalist whose name is Craick—perhaps the hon. gentleman has already done so; it really is not a history of Canadian journalism, but the story of Canadian publishers; it is a rather dull story except that they have always been lobbying down in Ottawa to keep this particular privilege—

Mr. Grafftey: You are very wordy. You take up a lot of time.

Mr. Fisher: If it were worth while, I would appreciate the hon. member's comment. But this story indicates that shortly after confederation—

Mr. Grafftey: Stop lecturing to us and get to the point.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: Lecture, lecture, lecture.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fisher: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am always willing to defer to people who would like to take the floor, but if the hon. member refuses to get up—

Mr. Grafftey: Tiresome forensics.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fisher: These publishers right after confederation, came to Ottawa every time it appeared that parliament was trying to get the post office to raise the charges on this particular kind of mail and their argument always was that they performed a primary role in educating the Canadian people. I think this argument probably had much greater substance in the nineteenth century than it has today when educational advantages are so much more evident and when people can turn to the schools, to books, to public libraries and to radio and television services. So it seems to me that this particular argument in favour of this kind of subsidy no longer stands.

The argument used to be that to many people on back farms and in distant parts of Canada the newspapers were the only means of providing cheap information. It does not seem to me that this argument stands up any longer, so I think we should ask these free enterprisers to be free enterprisers and stop leaning on the Canadian government in this regard.

The last point I wish to make relates to post office employees. I think every member of parliament has had conversations with the postal carriers, and I think it is generally agreed that this particular group, as a result of the rationalization of the department which bespeaks efficiency, works rather hard. It is my general impression that it is almost impossible for them to have a soft touch.

In terms of requests for increased wages they are not in the bargaining position that trade unionists are. Two things are pointed out to them in reply to their arguments for higher pay. They are often told that there is a waiting list of people who want to become letter carriers. There is no market demand competing for their services as there is in the case of dentists or people in other occupations. The other factor is that the services they render to the post office are of little use beyond the postal service. In other words, it is almost impossible for a letter carrier to work for three of four years and then value that service in the labour market at a high level because it is not sufficiently specialized to make him much more useful an employee than someone who enters the labour market for the first time.

According to postal employees with whom I have spoken the factors I have outlined render it difficult for them to present a case. There is no competition in the labour market for their services and there is no increment in their earning value when they are working for the department. This is becoming more and more the fate of many people in the kind of employment situation we are building up today with large organizations in which there is no particular specialization. I hope the minister will realize that these are factors that the employees have little chance to change.

Another related factor is that the income level at which these men happen to be is not a very high one. Indeed, it seems to me that it is one of the lowest in the civil service just in terms of the physical exertion and mental alertness that are required. That kind of physical exertion and mental alertness has no parallel value in the market place and yet it seems to me it should be recognized by putting it on a higher base of pay. I hope the minister is pressing his colleagues and especially the Minister of Finance who is the important minister in this area with all the energy and persuasion at his command to see that this group of employees gets an increase in pay and I hope a substantially higher minimum. By that I mean between $300 and $700, somewhere in that range. If we could return to our constituencies with the good news already abroad I know it would make it pleasanter for members of parliament.

I may be out of order in raising the following point because it relates to privileges of members of parliament. Has the minister had any discussion with anyone about the question of the parliamentary frank that we have as members? Has there been any thought of extending it for a longer period? No one would want to see hon. members using the frank on a year-round basis for the purpose of mailing out party propaganda and circulars and so on. I know that other hon. members I have talked to have a problem similar to mine and especially those hon. members from Quebec and the maritimes. The parliamentary frank is a great convenience. There is more than the question of the cost of stamps involved. It would be a great convenience if we could have franking privileges both in Ottawa and in our constituencies for most of the year. With the sessions becoming so lengthy and with the regular follow-up that is required on much of the correspondence one has, the purchase of postage stamps is a substantial financial whack. In addition there is the added annoying inconvenience of going out to purchase the stamps, sticking them on, and so on, the cost of which has to be met by a group of people who do not have great resources.

Has the minister the power of initiating any discussion along these lines or, as a member of parliament, would the minister consider taking up the suggestion and seeing what the people who have the power and initiative may think or feel about it?

Mr. Howard: Will the minister reply?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I will try to be as brief as possible at this point. Some of the questions raised have been answered and I shall attempt to deal with some of the other matters in general terms. As hon. members have perhaps come to know, when there are certain points which require so much detail that they cannot be dealt with successfully and succinctly here in the committee it has been our practice to write the hon. member concerned immediately following the debate giving him the information requested.

As I have stated, some of the points raised come up year after year. I have come to the conclusion that this is almost automatic in the post office service. I wish to make the following brief excursion because I think it is interesting. I was interested to learn that what we thought was a new and modern process, the idea of photographing letters on reduced strips of film and sending the filmstrips by air mail, goes back not only through the wars but through peacetime to the Franco-German war of 1871 when the French post office successfully worked out such a system.

According to "An Outline of Postal History and Practice", a most interesting book, the French post office photographed letters at that time on to thin films of collodion. As the book states:

> The films were rolled up tightly and placed in a small quill, which was attached to one of the tail feathers of the bird.

The bird was a carrier pigeon which served as the basis of the air mail delivery of those letters. Several hundreds of thousands of letters at that time were sent in this fashion between the United Kingdom and France almost 100 years ago. I believe this illustrates my point that the same kind of questions do crop up from time to time here in the committee.

A number of hon. members dealt with the question of salaries. I know that they know that this is basically a matter for the Minister of Finance. I think they also realize that it is one that is receiving sympathetic consideration at the present time and that I am personally very much aware both of their views and of those of the post office employees.

When speaking of the employees of the department I should on their behalf express the thanks of every one of them for the kind things which have been said about them here today. The hon. member for St. Denis earlier on took issue with me for having reported to the committee the accomplishments of the Post Office Department. I make no apology for doing so but I am very much aware, as I also pointed out at that time, that our success is based not only on the efforts of any one individual but on the tremendous efforts of a vast group of people.

The second thing that appeared to arouse the interest and curiosity of many hon. members was the use of the phrase "personal and confidential" on a fair amount of my correspondence. I was actually happy to find that this was referred to by approximately 12 hon. members many of whom made special speeches on this subject because when we reach the point at which the use of the phrase "personal and confidential" on a letter which goes to a member of parliament is the subject for debate in the consideration of the estimates of this department we have certainly reached a point at which there is apparently not too much in the department itself and its administration to be criticized. In reaching that point hon. members are, as it were, scraping the very bottom of the barrel.

Actually the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville gave us an example illustrating one of the principal reasons why this phrase is used on my correspondence when he said a letter sent to him had not been opened until he could open it himself and this caused him to miss an invitation which I had sent to him. I regret the fact that he missed the invitation, but members of parliament are writing me constantly on various matters, many of which are of interest only to themselves, many of which as far as I know they do not want bruited around too widely. As a result, I have tried, by marking these letters in this way, to ensure that the information goes directly to the member of parliament and is used by him as he sees fit. In many instances members have come to me and said, "I have this letter; have you any objection to the information being used?" And invariably, or almost invariably, I have said, "Absolutely not". But at least this does respect a member of parliament and insures the fact that the information goes directly to him.

Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, I remember getting a letter on one occasion from the hon. member for Essex East when he was a minister. It brought birthday greetings and it was marked "personal". I think probably the same sort of thing applied at that time.

Individual problems such as those of the hon. member for Skeena, as I have said, we will deal with and report on. Since he spoke this morning I have been able to get some information. In so far as the service at this community of Nass river is concerned, we are attempting to improve its quality. We have got a contractor all ready to do it along the route, but now we have to cross the river and at the moment we are looking for somebody who will contract a boat service across the river at Greenville because the route is on the far side, as he knows. We hope to be successful in that respect.

The hon. member mentioned the letter carrier service in Kitimat. As he knows so well, our requirement is 2,500 houses. The present number is substantially under that; it is at the 2,000 mark, that is actually occupied houses, at the moment, and as soon as it reaches the 2,500 mark we will be delighted to institute the service there because other considerations such as weather are not going to stop the post office; I assure him of that.

The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska made a number of interesting points. In the case of Dalhousie, we look forward to introducing letter carrier service there but it has not reached our requirements. I can assure him there is no shortage of rural mail boxes, nor are we overlooking areas where it is possible to give rural mail service.

The hon. member for Kootenay West said that his major criticism was with regard to the use of "personal and confidential" on letters and then he went on and spoke for 20 minutes on other matters so that his criticism in that respect must have been very forceful indeed. He asked us to keep post office lists more exact in so far as occupations are concerned. We do our best in that respect. Having indicated he likes to use the lists, he then criticized us for having them or, rather, he suggested someone else had criticized us for having them; that that information was information which should not be made available. Actually these lists are basically similar to those that one will find in a telephone directory, in electoral lists or anywhere else. The information is exactly the same although it may be arranged in a slightly different way by the post offices.

The reason, of course, that we do not give forwarding addresses from post offices is that in many instances this is information not respecting that particular post office but another one far away, and we are not interested in becoming an information service for bill collectors and the like. However, the regular publication of lists of patrons of a particular post office is quite a legitimate process. I appreciated the hon. member's observations on the question of stamp design and the other matters which I will deal with because they were particular points of interest only to him. I will deal with them as soon as we can get the information for him.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka suggested that in some instances people tendered too low for rural mail routes, and suggested there was something rather wrong and improper in this. There is an act of parliament which lays down the obligation. It says "shall" not "may" in so far as the Postmaster General is concerned in requiring him toward the tender to the lowest suitable tenderer. In those circumstances we follow the wishes of parliament. We will be delighted to supply letter carrier service to Parry Sound as soon as they reach the required number of householders.

I was grateful for the observations of the hon. member for Hull, although I am sorry he objects to my visiting post offices. I appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond and those of the hon. member for Nickel Belt. We will do our best to meet their suggestions.

It was very nice of the hon. member for St. Boniface to say the kind things he did about the new service they are getting in his area. The hon. member for Timmins again spoke on certain questions. There is one particularly that I think I should mention. This is a misunderstanding on his part in so far as observation galleries in post offices are concerned. They are there for one purpose only, and that is the detection of theft by employees in the department. They are specifically not used—our employees are forbidden to use them—for the normal purposes of supervision. They come into operation only when investigation or complaint has disclosed the fact that in a given post office thefts seem to be occurring. At that time investigators who are officially authorized to do it move into those galleries because we have found that post office employees tend not to steal mail when somebody is standing three feet behind them and looking over their shoulders. Therefore our investigators move into those galleries and watch the men from there and this is the only purpose for which they are used.

The hon. member for Edmonton East raised a number of points which we will attempt to deal with, as did the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, dealing specifically with the minimum number of calls required for letter carrier delivery. This is something which has been changed from time to time by the department and which we are always watching with considerable interest. As the hon. member for Churchill knows, certain matters are now under study in so far as the points he raised are concerned.

The hon. member for Lincoln asked specifically regarding curbside mail boxes. We have had a reasonable degree of success with those in certain communities. In other communities, interestingly enough, they have proved, for whatever reason we do not know, not to have the same popularity. Our general practice is to introduce them into whatever communities would like to have them.

The hon. member for Nipissing raised the question of subpostmasters and that those were now being handled from Ottawa. He implied that he saw political motives in this change, motives which I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, do not exist. The basic problem is simply this. Subpost offices are located in large cities as he knows, or at least in cities, and in many cities there is a tendency, because they do not know anybody in the post office, for the storekeeper or whoever is interested to write to Ottawa. We have decided, rather than overlook some people to centralize all those requests in one place, together with the report from the local people, and then make a decision on that basis. In this way no one is overlooked and it is also possible to take the veterans preference and other matters into consideration.

We are already investigating the matters which the member for Kootenay East raised. With respect to what the hon. member for Timiskaming said, I think I dealt with his remarks by pointing out the people in the gallery who have been with the Post Office Department for 30 or 40 years—I am tremendously proud to be associated with a department of this kind—and who started at the bottom and have ended up at the top. With respect to the question of dissemination of information on promotions, if you have the initiative, Mr. Chairman, you get where you want to go. Promotional opportunities are advertised in every branch of the department.

The hon. member inferred that we were falling behind because we were not sorting mail on the trains as much as we used to and he said that we should go back to this practice. In many cases we would be delighted to go back to it but unfortunately we have been forced off the trains and into the use of trucks because of the elimination of trips, the elimination of trains, the introduction of rail diesel cars which do not have the facilities and similar reasons. Actually the voluntary doing away with a sortation car on a train in order to go to the road is, to the best of my knowledge, an unheard of thing in the department. It is only when we have to that we do it.

I thank the hon. member for Ottawa East for his very kind words with reference to the Post Office Department. I can tell him that in most cases, interestingly enough, letter carriers are able to carry on until their retirement age. I will probably get hit over the head for saying this but may I say that I do not know of any group of men anywhere in the country who are more genuinely enthusiastic about their job. I think that is what makes them happy when they call on the hon. member and other people. Most of them stay with their jobs until they retire. Those who do not are absorbed internally within the department, almost always as sorters for whom there is a steady demand.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River raised a good number of fairly technical points which I think can perhaps be dealt with directly by correspondence. The hon. member for Vancouver South referred to the question of superannuation. This is very definitely under study at the present time and personally I agree with the point of view he expressed. With respect to the points raised by the hon. member for Sudbury and the question of amalgamation within his area, we are doing our best to work this out to the satisfaction of the citizens of Sudbury. The hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont referred to imitation stamps. They cannot be confused with regular stamps unless our regulations are broken because on the face of the envelope we only allow our own stamps. These other stamps are quite welcome on the back of envelopes. There is no opportunity for confusion there.

The hon. member for Port Arthur raised a number of technical points. On the question of payment of postage on periodicals I come back to the basic fact that we are in the peculiar position of being next door to a large country which has a large circulation of its publications in our nation. We have to choose between refusing all revenue from them, which happens in some cases, or in other cases allowing them to be mailed in Canada at our rates. It is a nice balance actually to try to determine what the rate picture should be.

So far as the parliamentary frank is concerned, that is entirely a matter for parliament itself to decide. It is written into the statute and it would require an act of parliament to change it. I have sympathy with the hon. member but on the other hand I am very much aware of the fact that all other people throughout Canada use stamps on their correspondence. Therefore I am inclined to think that members of parliament might want to use stamps on their correspondence when parliament is not sitting.

Mr. Fisher: On that point may I mention this factor? Many people are aware that it is not necessary to put stamps on letters to members of parliament but they are not aware that this privilege lapses within 10 days of the end of a session. Then the member not only has to put up the nickle for the stamp but also has to pay the forfeit. This does not happen rarely but quite often. The minister has a public relations department and perhaps he could do a better job of advertising this situation than individual members of parliament.

I should also like to ask him whether it it is possible for him to procure a breakdown of the figure of $26 million in rough categories as to Canadian and United States periodicals versus newspapers.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): There is nothing on file here nor with my officials in the gallery on this point. So far as Canadian publications are concerned, I think it would be difficult, if not impossible, to differentiate between magazines and newspapers. I may be wrong but from memory I think they are bulked together for the purposes of our accounts. However, we certainly could work out some sort of figures to indicate the relationship between publications mailed from the United States and those which are mailed in Canada. I would be glad to develop some figures along those lines.

Mr. Fisher: I appreciate that. I am not asking that the information be given in the house. The minister can send it to me. I imagine that in building up the figure of $26 million some cost factors had to be taken into account. I imagine it is item by item rather than by weight. If the minister could give us some of these factors I should like to have them.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): We will be glad to try to work this out for the hon. member and get any information he requires because I think it would be of interest to all.

Mr. Howard: I have one or two comments with respect to the "personal and confidential" matter. This is not a case of scraping the bottom of the barrel but rather it is a matter of concern to the individual who has a letter addressed to him. As I understood the minister he said that such letters may be used by those who received them as they see fit. Therefore I assume that I can disregard any reference to "personal and confidential" on letters from now on and use them as I see fit. That is what I understood the minister to say.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): What I actually said was that a number of members had got in touch with me and said that they would like to use the information and I told them to go ahead and use it as they saw fit. However, I am not slow to take a hint. I must say that I will not put "personal and confidential" on as much of my correspondence as has been the case up until now. On the other hand, if members find information turning up in other places and causing them some difficulty, I do not want them to come back and say that I did not do what I said I was going to do. As I say, I am quick to take a hint.

Item agreed to.

305. Operations including salaries and other expenses of staff post offices, district offices, railway mail service staffs, and supplies, equipment and other items for revenue post offices, including administration, $105,664,147.

Mr. Howard: In the details of this item on page 415 there is a reference to mail bags, the third item on that page, and the amount this year is $753,000 odd. The next item is one for uniforms and letter carrier satchels. It is my understanding that the initial making and repairing afterwards of all mail bags is done in our federal penitentiaries.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No, Mr. Chairman. We still operate on the basis of tender so far as mail bags are concerned. I would say that approximately 50 per cent go to the penitentiaries. Some contracts are also let to private contractors. However, repairs are done in the penitentiaries.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report certain resolutions and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I do not want to hurry the committee but we have only a few items remaining here. As we have a long day tomorrow, if the estimates went through tonight it might help a great deal, even if we go on for a few minutes longer now.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 305 carry?

Mr. Howard: I have another point I wish to deal with. This may take somewhat longer than the minister contemplates. However, I do not know. The minister indicates the amount of approximately $753,000 for mail bags. This includes the initial cost. Is this for new mail bags this year or is it for new mail bags plus repairs to old ones?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): This is our estimate for new mail bags plus the work done in repairing old ones for which we are obliged to pay this year.

Mr. Howard: As to the cost item, how do you relate the cost of making mail bags and repairing them in a penitentiary by inmates? What rate per hour or per unit is charged as compared with what you are obliged to pay on a tender basis?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As an example, out letter bags, the small ones, run about $1.95; the larger ones run about $2.98 plus the clamp locks. The repairs are paid at the rate of 30 cents a bag.

Mr. Howard: You have some mail bags made in penitentiaries. I refer to new ones. What is your cost with respect to those made in penitentiaries? As to the $1.95 for the small ones and $2.98 for the large ones, that is your tender or estimated cost of having that work done by industry. I was wondering what that same cost is for making them new in the penitentiaries.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Actually the prices I quoted were the last prices which we had actually paid. I have this information right here. However, I do not have the figure split between those bags made in penitentiaries and those made by private industry. I would have to send out and get that information. I thought the hon. member had it. However, the basic principle is this. We call for tenders and we follow the principle of going to the lowest tenderer with, however, the reservation that a portion of this work must go to the penitentiaries. Hence there will be occasions on which we will be obliged to pass over a low tender in order to put work into a penitentiary.

Mr. Howard: The minister has indicated that the information about the cost charged by the Department of Justice or the penitentiary branch to his department would be somewhere.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): May I just add one brief statement, namely that the penitentiaries, of course, if they are not low, must come down to be low before they get the contract.

Mr. Howard: The Department of Justice or the penitentiaries bid? Is that what happens?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is right.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Howard: Perhaps this might be something that might be dealt with more appropriately under the penitentiaries branch in order to see whether they are competing fairly. I imagine the wages paid in the penitentiaries are somewhat less than those paid in private industry and would have a bearing on whether or not the penitentiary is able to compete with industry in this matter.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think that is something which should be discussed with the Department of Justice.

Mr. Denis: We have a complaint about the Casselman post office building on which the inscription is only in English. As 99.9 per cent of the population is French, I hope the Postmaster General will see the Minister of Public Works about this matter.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If anything over 30 per cent of the people who are using that post office are French, we will certainly see that a bilingual sign is put on it. That is our principle.

If 99.9 per cent of the population are French, as the hon. gentleman suggests, we will just put on a French sign.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply of this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the acting house leader can indicate what the business will be for the rest of the week.

Mr. Brooks: Tomorrow, as announced in the business last night, I may tell the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that he will have his day in court as we are taking up the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. After that we will take those of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and, if we have time, those of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would that be the business for Friday as well?

Mr. Brooks: No. The business for Friday will be announced tomorrow night.

Mr. Herridge: If I may be permitted to make an observation at this time, as a representative of the socialist and therefore orderly thinking and planning group, may I say that we should like to know why it is necessary to keep bobbing around with the estimates. We should like, as far as possible, to take one set of estimates and to complete them before going on to others. We know that on occasion the ministers are obliged to be absent from the chamber. However, I think it makes for much more orderly debate to have as far as possible the estimates completed one after the other.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps I might rise on a question of privilege on this matter and explain to the house that the government made a change last evening in order to suit the convenience of the official opposition because of certain unexpected things that happened today.

It being eight minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TRAVEL BUREAU—ADVERTISING AND PUBLICITY EXPENDITURES

Seventh report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORTED RESIGNATION OF CUBAN AMBASSADOR TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether it is a fact that the ambassador of Cuba to Canada has resigned and has asked permission to remain in Canada.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I had an interview yesterday afternoon with the Cuban ambassador to Canada, and he advised me that he was submitting his resignation to his government. At that time nothing was said to me about asking permission to remain in Canada, but I was in the midst of a meeting on the Columbia river negotiations and did not have very much time. I believe that subsequently he did raise this question, and that matter is, of course, being given careful consideration.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DELIVERY AND QUOTA POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the fact that, generally, grain delivery quotas on the prairies are lower now than they were a year ago. Between 300 and 400 points a year ago were on the 7 or 8-bushel quota, whereas there are none this year. Could the minister tell the house whether quotas are likely to exceed 6 bushels per acre at the end of the crop year, and could he comment on the progress that is being made toward providing equalized quotas and equal opportunities for delivery by July 31?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is just in order to provide equalized opportunity and equalize quotas that greater attention has been paid this year to the quota distribution system. Actually it is better this year than it was last year. At the end of May last year there were 88 points on the 3-bushel quota and this year there are only 3. Last year there were 709 on the 4-bushel quota and this year 335. Last year there were 556 on the 5-bushel quota and this year 1,128. Last year there were 274 on the 6-bushel quota and this year 541. This indicates an improved condition. There were a number on the 7-bushel quota last year but that was not a clear picture of conditions, because in some of those areas the 7-bushel quota could not be fulfilled. This year an attempt is being made to bring everybody up to the 6-bushel quota across the board before there is any move made to raise it higher, and so far it has worked out very satisfactorily.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Is the minister in a position to say whether grain deliveries this year are likely to equal those of last year, or will they remain as they are now, behind those of last year?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, that is a question based on statistical information which we would have to assemble. The hon. member asks for a forecast to July 31. It is not possible at this moment to determine accurately what will be the final marketing of grain by July 31. If the hon. member wants the statistical information I think we could supply it if he would put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Argue: I have the statistical information in my hand. I wonder if we can make up the 30 million bushels in deliveries we are now short from a year ago?

Mr. Churchill: Every effort will be made to equal the amounts that were delivered last year, but here again it is not possible to forecast at this time just what the position will be by July 31.

ALBERTA AND SASKATCHEWAN—CANCELLATION OF FEDERAL SHARE OF SEED GRAIN LOANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. When will the government announce its decision on loans for seed grain to needy pioneer settlers in western Canada?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to make this announcement some time ago. I am glad to have the opportunity this morning to answer the question of the hon. member for Melville.

Between 1876 and 1925 the federal government advanced loans for seed grain, fodder for animals and other relief to needy settlers in western Canada. Supplementary advances which were made in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan between 1919 and 1923 were implemented on a 50-50 joint federal-provincial basis. These advances were secured by liens registered against the homesteads, pre-emptions and other lands of the settlers concerned.

From 1927 to the present time the total principal indebtedness has been reduced from $16 million to approximately $200,000, through an extended program of compromise settlements; outright cancellation where extenuating circumstances justified such action; tax and mortgage foreclosure proceedings, or reversion of the lands to the crown. All the liens registered against lands in British Columbia and Manitoba were discharged or released some time ago, and payments in respect of the remaining Alberta and Saskatchewan indebtedness have fallen off in recent years due to unfavourable crop conditions.

Investigation has revealed that the majority of the outstanding accounts are registered against marginal or submarginal farms owned by small unit operators, many of whom suffered severe crop damage during the past winter, and further payments would cause unwarranted financial hardship.

Therefore cabinet has granted approval for cancellation of the remainder of the federal share of seed grain indebtedness, and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan have concurred in this recommendation with respect to the 1919-1923 joint federal-provincial advances.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the practice is growing, apparently, for the ministry to make statements and announcements of policy on the orders of the day when, under our procedure, it is not possible to make the comments which the opposition should be entitled to make. This procedure has been followed not only by the present minister but by others on preceding days. I should think Your Honour would find it helpful to remind the ministers of this government that statements of this kind should be made on motions.

[Mr. Ormiston.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know this has happened in the past; it happened under the former government. I am not going to disagree with the hon. member, and I am sure the house would be glad to concur in giving him an opportunity to make his observations.

Mr. Speaker: If an answer to a question is in effect a statement, I think the suggestion the Prime Minister makes is a very appropriate one because the resorting to question and answer to make what is an official announcement should not deprive members of the house, or at least representatives of the two opposition parties, of the opportunity to comment. Yesterday leave was given to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to make a statement in answering a question and there was an opportunity for comment. The answer which has given rise to the hon. member's point of order was, I think, rather long and perhaps more in the nature of a statement than an answer appropriate to the question that was asked.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the point of order, I would point out that in the particular case today leave was not granted, and I would simply say to the Prime Minister that I should have thought that he, as the head of the government, would support the position we have taken.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I take it that observations are in order, and I also have a supplementary question. These old seed grain liens have been a burden for some producers in western Canada for a very long time. Over the years I have had some experience in negotiating settlements for producers having difficulty in making the required payments, and I must say in all fairness that the officials of the department have been most generous in scaling down the amount of the indebtedness so the farmers could meet their obligations. Now that the total amount is down to such a small figure as $200,000 I think the action of the federal government in cancelling the federal portion of the remaining debt is probably an efficient way to deal with the matter.

My supplementary question has to do with this point. I was wondering whether this welcome but rather limited statement as to the cancelling of the seed grain liens was the government's alternative to the western farm delegation which has requested deficiency payments.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I think the observation of the hon. member for Assiniboia is hardly warranted. The government, as is well known—

Mr. Argue: This is the half a peanut I was talking about.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —is willing to do anything at any time to help the farmers of western Canada, and this is just another indication of our policy.

TRANSPORT

LAKEHEAD—REQUEST FOR LONGER WAITING TIME FOR FREIGHT CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. However, in his absence perhaps the parliamentary secretary will take it as notice.

Railways serving the ports of Duluth, Minnesota and Superior, Wisconsin have raised from two to seven days the period of free time during which goods wagons or freight cars may stand at the dock without charge to the shipper. Would the minister bring this to the attention of Canadian railroads and recommend that they take similar action in order to improve the competitive position of Fort William and Port Arthur in relation to these two United States ports?

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take that question as notice in the minister's absence. I am sure the minister will bring this to the attention of the railway officials and the hon. member will probably receive his reply from the railway officials.

NATIONAL PARKS

POINT ROBERTS, B.C.—STATEMENT ON ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERNATIONAL SITE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a question asked yesterday morning by the hon. member for Vancouver East in connection with the establishment of an international park at Point Roberts in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

Interdepartmental consultation has taken place in Ottawa, and the various facets of the proposal for an international park at Point Roberts have been carefully examined. There are certain practical difficulties. One difficulty is that the land involved does not lie wholly within the control of the federal government. There would have to be some move made by the provincial government in support of the establishment of such a park and also, of course, there would have to be some initiative shown by the United States federal government. If the provincial government makes a move and is willing to cooperate the federal government would certainly give very sympathetic consideration to this proposal.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has any approach been made to the federal government by the provincial government or the parks commission of British Columbia? I take it that no approach whatever has been made.

Mr. Green: So far as I can ascertain no approach has been made by the provincial government. Letters may have been written in earlier days by the lower mainland parks association, or whatever the proper name of the organization is, but I am told by my officials that no approach whatever has been made by the provincial government.

FINANCE

EXCELSIOR LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—CONTROL BY U.S. INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement made to the press last week by Major General Bruce Matthews, president of the Excelsior Life Insurance Company and president of the national Liberal federation, to the effect that he and members of his family have sold their interest in the Excelsior Life to American interests, would the minister tell the house whether the government has the power to prevent control of the assets of this company, totalling over $100 million and representing the savings of thousands of Canadian policyholders, from passing into foreign hands?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is a matter of regret on the part of all of us that the control of this fine old Canadian life insurance company should be passing out of Canadian hands. It is, however, a corporation which was incorporated under the laws of the province of Ontario in 1889. It did register with the federal authorities in 1897 and has operated under the normal federal supervision since that time, as do a few but very few provincially incorporated life insurance companies. But this gives parliament and the government no authority or jurisdiction in this situation. The legislation which I introduced in the autumn of 1957 and which was passed by parliament applies, of course, to life insurance companies under federal jurisdiction. Accordingly, neither parliament nor the government has any authority or jurisdiction to interfere with the transfer of control of this company to foreign hands.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question. Did the government intervene informally in this matter in order to prevent this happening as was done successfully by the previous government in a similar situation involving another insurance company?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, there were discussions between General Matthews and the superintendent of insurance in relation to this subject. I did not discuss the matter personally with General Matthews, but I was made acquainted with the results of the discussions between the federal superintendent of insurance and General Matthews. The views of the federal authorities in this respect I think are well known, and the policy of the government is well known. There was some information asked of General Matthews by the superintendent of insurance, I am told, which General Matthews did not feel he was prepared to give. I point out, however, that this is a matter that falls under provincial rather than federal jurisdiction.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether he does not feel that he personally, as Minister of Finance, if he had wished and if it were the government's desire and policy, could have intervened, just as the previous administration did in the case of an attempt by outsiders to purchase a dominant interest in the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the previous administration did at any time intervene with a view to preventing the control of any Canadian life insurance companies from passing into foreign hands, then I can only say they were singularly unsuccessful.

Mr. Pearson: Inaccurate again.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): One of the reasons we as a government, very soon after taking office, in fact during the first session after the election in 1957, asked parliament to pass legislation in this field with a view to preventing control of Canadian life insurance companies from passing into foreign hands, was that the control of five substantial Canadian life insurance companies had already passed into foreign hands under the previous government. This was the background against which this legislation was introduced in 1957.

The hon. member has just referred particularly to the Sun Life Assurance Company. I do not know why he claims any credit for the government of which he was a member in that respect. I have some information on this subject which indicates that credit for preventing the loss of control of this corporation should go to someone who was not connected with the former government at all, and I hope was not a supporter of it.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): May I ask a further supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister accept my congratulations upon being so well and so fully informed on so casual a question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thank the hon. member for his kind message, which I accept in good part. I might say I accept it with due appreciation. I may tell him, however, that for some days I have been expecting that somebody would be asking a question on this matter. I had thought that perhaps one of the members opposite would take advantage of the opportunity to ask this question. The matter has been referred to in the press from time to time of late, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. Would the minister consider initiating taxation policies that would act as a deterrent in cases like this with respect to the transfer of companies?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is asking for a declaration of fiscal policy on orders of the day which is contrary to any practice of the house. Furthermore, the matter has been debated rather extensively up to this point. I think it might be dropped.

QUEBEC

INQUIRY AS TO BETTING ODDS ON PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVES IN ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister whether he could inform the house what odds are being offered by the national director of the Progressive Conservative party on the election of one Progressive Conservative member in the Quebec provincial election?

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REPORTED CENSUS OF PEOPLE OF CHINESE ORIGIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. Can the minister indicate whether the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are presently conducting a so called census, or are undertaking to obtain information by questionnaire, of people of Chinese origin across Canada? If so, under what authority is such a census being undertaken, and can the minister also indicate whether the Chinese people are obliged to answer any such questions?

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): I will take the question as notice and an answer will be given in due course.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SAUGEEN RESERVE—STATEMENT ON SURRENDER OF LAND FOR HIGHWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena made some inquiries with reference to land required for highway purposes in Ontario. I presume he had reference to highway No. 21 which passes through Saugeen Indian reserve No. 29.

The highways department of the province of Ontario is desirous of securing sufficient land to widen and improve this highway, and it has been negotiating with the council of the Chippewas of the Saugeen band in an effort to reach agreement as to the conditions on which the land required for widening would be made available. Negotiations are still under way, and in the meantime the land has not been made available to the province.

The normal procedure in handling applications for lands required for public purposes is to require the applicant to reach agreement with the Indians concerned. When such agreement has been reached the land is made available under section 35 of the Indian Act by order of the governor in council. As I stated yesterday, the provisions of the Indian Act are always followed in matters of this kind.

AIRPORTS

OTTAWA, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO OFFICIAL OPENING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport, in the absence of the minister, in view of the fact that the air terminal at Uplands was opened unofficially yesterday by a former prime minister of Canada, whether the government has any plans for an official opening and, if so, when it will take place.

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport): We will take that as notice and let you know, Jack.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member was not addressing the Chair.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RETIREMENT POLICY RESPECTING CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AT ARMY BASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether it is the policy of this department or the policy of the government that civilian employees at army bases must be discharged at the age of 70 whether or not they are capable of working on? I ask the question because—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that question might better be on the order paper.

Mr. Winch: Might I say that I know of a case where on the basis of orders from Ottawa a man was discharged because he was 70 years of age and—

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Winch: I wanted to ask the minister direct.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING OF FISCAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Minister of Finance able to report on the dominion-provincial annual "seminar" which has been held in Ottawa this week?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any seminar being held. I am aware, however, that an important, useful and constructive meeting of the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal questions was held in this city on Monday and Tuesday. It was called for the purpose of preparing in its field for the plenary conference to be held in this city on July 25, 26 and 27.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Has the minister any comment to make, in view of what he has just said about the reported statement of the premier of Ontario, namely that since Ontario needs more moneys, which are apparently not going to come from the federal government, Ontario proposes to no longer continue leaving to the federal government the collection of taxes which it feels belongs to that province?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, all the present agreements under which direct tax fields or standard tax fields are rented under the provisions of the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to the federal government expire on March 31, 1962. It will be a matter for decision on the part of all governments concerned as to what arrangements they wish to have made in this field after that date.

The hon. member certainly does not need to be assured that this federal government will never attempt in any way, shape or form to dictate to the provinces what they shall do in fields of jurisdiction belonging to them.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance, who described this meeting as constructive, whether the meeting was successful in constructing an agenda for the conference in July, and if it is the intention of the government, as was done by the former administration, to make that agenda public before the meeting.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was asked questions just a few days ago concerning the agenda, and I made an answer at that time. Perhaps it has not come to the attention of the hon. member, but I then indicated that in due course, and in part in the light of the discussions which were held in the continuing committee on Monday and Tuesday of a preparatory nature, communication will be had with the provincial governments in relation to the agenda. There will be no attempt to dictate to any provincial government what shall or shall not go on the agenda; that will be a matter for consultation and general decision.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister's last remark intended to try to repair the obviously deteriorating situation which now prevails as between Ontario and the federal government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This discussion seems to have gone beyond the earnest search for information. I suggest that it be dropped at this point, unless the minister feels there is an inference which has been drawn to which he should reply.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I feel there is a very erroneous and misleading inference in the hon. member's last question. Let me say to him that when he talks about deterioration I think he is drawing on his own imagination. Far from there being any deterioration in relations between the federal and provincial governments, I think they were never better than they are today. My last answer was given not with a view to repairing anything lacking in those relations but with a view to repairing the faulty knowledge and memory of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might ask a supplementary question. Would the minister say that the relations of the federal government with all the provincial governments are better than they have ever been before?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was speaking in general terms—

Mr. Speaker: Order, I think an expression of opinion on that question would be beyond the administrative jurisdiction of the minister and had better not be recorded.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Immigration branch—

50. Administration of the Immigration Act, $1,219,129.

The Chairman: Order. It was agreed we would continue with discussion of item No. 50. This item will be found on page 13 of the blue book, the details on page 134. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on this item the other day I believe some of the remarks which were credited to me were erroneously recorded and the implications drawn from them were not correct; therefore I think I should not leave this particular impression.

We were very critical of the immigration policies as they affect the immigration of Chinese, and of the problems which have developed in the investigations now taking place into this sort of immigration. We were very surprised to note that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate appears to be either in charge of the department here or in very close connection with it. Rather than being chastised by the minister of immigration, I found that this task fell upon the former minister of immigration who proceeded to undertake this duty as either the minister or the ex-minister or the associate minister or whatever he considers himself to be.

Speaking of this, newspapers across the country picked up a chance remark which was made during the speech of another member and attributed it to me. I was reported to have said that the whole Department of Citizenship and Immigration is rotten. This was certainly not my intention. It was not in the context of my remarks. I have an obligation to make it very clear that I do not consider this to be the case, and never did. I have the highest regard for the civil service in general, and though I am not familiar with most of the people in the civil service who are attached to the Department of Immigration I presume that their honesty and integrity are similar to those in the other branches of the civil service, and beyond reproach.

However, I still consider that the reported infractions of the Immigration Act as they affect Chinese citizens could not have been entirely unknown. We have been told according to newspaper reports that as many as 11,000 Chinese may have come to Canada illegally in the last number of years, and I suggest this is a matter that not only those officials in Hong Kong who are appointed on a part-time basis to carry out investigations and the questioning of applicants must have known about. There must have been officials elsewhere in the department who had some knowledge of irregularities through reports which must have come in continually over the years indicating that irregularities were taking place in the department. If we are to believe or even to suspect that such breaches of the immigration regulations have taken place, we can only come to the conclusion that there have been officials throughout the department who must have known or suspected that all was not as it should be.

I am not alone in drawing this conclusion. We have been told that over the years there have been continual releases of personnel in Hong Kong, particularly in the interpretation and investigation branch where local people were employed, and that from time to time problems were raised. One of the reasons we are so concerned about this matter is that we believe there should be no discrimination with regard to immigration into Canada. We think that the present law as it affects the Chinese people is discriminatory and not in keeping with what the Canadian people believe should be the case in a country free from discrimination, a country which treats people of all races and creeds as being equal.

If these stories are true, in connection particularly with the immigration of Asiatic people, then I think some overhaul of the department is necessary in order to see that these infractions do not take place in the future. This would mean to me that the act itself should be changed so it would not be necessary for these infractions to take place, or so that no encouragement should be given for them to take place.

We are concerned about this matter for another reason. We sat on a committee this year which investigated a situation that involved infractions of rules and regulations, and I believe there have been infractions of these rules and regulations. While the R.C.M.P. have investigated those cases, with only one or two exceptions they have not been able to ascertain who was responsible for the infractions or even the extent of the infractions.

I believe this will be the situation in relation to the department of immigration. It does not seem fair to me that all the Chinese people in Canada should be suspect because there have been infractions of the immigration law. I do not think it is legitimate that a questionnaire should be circulated and that the Chinese people should be asked to make certain commitments and certain statements to the R.C.M.P. or anyone else that would not be asked of people of other nationalities or other new citizens. I think these practices are discriminatory, and I do not believe they should be engaged in. It would seem to me that one should at least be fair to the people who have come here. Most of those who came in, even if they came to this country legally, paid their money and expected that they would be allowed to stay here, and have since tried their best to be good citizens. I believe many of them have been here for some time now, and have proven themselves to be good citizens.

I am not saying anything in the House of Commons, and I do not intend to say anything here, that I would not say any place else. I have been accused recently, as have other members, of doing so. It seems to me a nice way of saying that you are abusing your parliamentary immunity. I do not know what this involves. I am not sure I even know what it is. I have never been shy about voicing my opinions in any place; I think this is a freedom to which Canadians are entitled, but I do not think that should be so here any more than anywhere else. If there is a regulation which gives us some preference I have not used it and do not intend to use it.

I think this matter is so serious that I believe the minister should set up a commission immediately to investigate it. I will talk to the Chinese people with whom I have come into contact about appearing before such a commission if I can assure myself that discrimination will not be used against them and that they can accept the guarantees which are given. To date I agree with the Chinese association in its statement that it will not ask the Chinese people to testify or appear because it does not believe they will be given that immunity which they were promised in such a half hearted way. If immunity is to be granted, let the minister say she will guarantee it and that the government will stand behind it.

In this country we do not have a fifth amendment. When people testify they do so knowing very well that anything said under oath may be used against them, and unless the minister can take responsibility for allowing this right which is given in one country in particular by the fifth amendment I do not believe these people will come forward to testify. I would be happy to ask those with whom I come into contact to do so, but I will only ask them to appear if they can be reasonably certain that the assurances given by the commission will be sufficient to prevent their deportation and arrest for infractions which have taken place.

We have no objection to those people who are involved paying the full penalty of the law, since presumably they broke it and received remuneration for doing so knowing well, I imagine, what they were doing. But if any immigrants came in on that basis they have a right to protection. If they come forward the minister should be able to solve a problem that has bothered the department for many years. I suggest that an investigation take place in the department. I am sure the minister has nothing to hide. The people should be given immunity so they could come forward and we could clear up the problem. We are a country relatively free of discrimination as to race, colour or creed, and this freedom should apply in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

If the minister sets up a commission I will examine the guarantees given, and if I am satisfied with them I will ask the Chinese people in my constituency and those I know elsewhere to come forward; but I will do so only if I am sure they will not be deported on the basis of their testimony.

Certain people throughout the department must have known about the situation. I condemn them for the stand they have taken. They could have made a report at any time, on which report I am sure the minister would have acted. If we can believe the newspaper reports, they failed to come forward. My condemnation does not apply to the average employee of the department for whom I have the regard I have for most members of the civil service.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister wish to say something in reply to the hon. member for Timiskaming?

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think it is necessary, because I made a statement last week after the plea was made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I feel that my statement was comprehensive and well understood.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wanted to embark on a different subject and that is why I thought I should first give the hon. lady a chance to say anything she had to say at this point.

I wish to speak about the question of the amendment to the act to which the hon. lady referred in her opening statement the other day. As a preface to what I have to say I should like to read from Hansard of April 29, 1955, when I was the minister of this department and my estimates were before the committee of supply. Certain observations were made at that time by the hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister of Canada about the act and the regulations under which the department was then and still is—and I emphasize "still is"—operating, because there has been no change of any substance made, as the hon. lady indicated herself quite clearly in her opening statement.

I do not want to read unnecessary extracts from the debate, so I will start at the end of the first column on page 3320. These are the words of the present Prime Minister then sitting in opposition as the hon. member for Prince Albert:

> —I come to the other matters that were being discussed this afternoon, that is the regulations and the application of those regulations by the department. I think however much the minister may endeavour to explain them away, the regulations are unjustifiable in their present form. They are interpreted according to the whim and caprice of the individual official. They bring about in consequence a denial of fundamental rights. They constitute in fact arbitrary lawlessness.

The Prime Minister went on to say as reported at page 3321:

> If that is not done—

That is, some changes made.

> —are we going back to the days of the star chamber where appointees of the crown sat, made their decisions and placed themselves above the law? That is my main criticism of the department of immigration today. I do not lay the slightest personal wrongdoing at the feet of the minister. But I do say that the minister, having inherited the department and having had seven or eight months to clear away these wrongs—and they are wrongs—we have a right to ask today, "What have you done? Why have you not acted? What is the reason that equity and law have been pushed aside and the arbitrary say-so of an individual in a department has been placed above the law of the land?"

For three years now the hon. gentleman who described the procedures and regulations of the department in those terms has had the final responsibility for the government of Canada, and no change whatsoever of any consequence has been made in what the Prime Minister when he sat over here described as "arbitrary lawlessness" and said the opposition had a right to ask:

> What have you done? Why have you not acted? What is the reason that equity and law have been pushed aside and the arbitrary say-so of an individual in a department has been placed above the law of the land?

Those were serious charges by a very eminent member of the bar of Canada made five years ago, and for three of those five years that hon. gentleman has been Prime Minister of this country and has apparently continued to tolerate this arbitrary lawlessness, as he described it. I did not agree with the hon. gentleman at the time nor do I agree with him now, but that was presumably the view with which he was opposing the government. The hon. gentleman presumably said it with sincerity and meant it. I think we should ask the minister to tell us what arbitrary lawlessness that existed in the department when she became minister has been ended, and how it has been ended, and to described in detail what has been substituted for what the Prime Minister described in these words:

> What is the reason that equity and law have been pushed aside and the arbitrary say-so of an individual in a department has been placed above the law of the land?

That is what the Prime Minister said was the state of affairs in the department. The hon. gentleman said that five years ago. It is true that the Prime Minister does not seem to remember this very well, because I have in my hand a document tabled in response to a motion I made for papers.

I read an article in the Toronto Telegram, a newspaper that is not notoriously unfavourable to the present administration. This newspaper published a series of articles by George Brimmell, one of their reporters, who came to see the minister and myself and a number of other people before he wrote the series. In one of the articles which appeared on March 11, 1960 Mr. Brimmell said:

> In April, 1955, while he was in opposition, John Diefenbaker accused the immigration department of "arbitrary lawlessness" in its administration. He said the department was tangled in red tape which is "in some cases administered... by sawdust Caesars who believe they are above the law."

I might say that if this is examined in its context—and I have the context here—the hon. gentleman did not in those terms apply it to me although indirectly that application may have been intended. I would think it was rather intended to apply to the officials of the department. Mr. Brimmell's article goes on to state:

> Mr. Diefenbaker said then that fundamental rights are denied because unjustifiable regulations were "interpreted according to the whim and caprice of the individual official."
> If that was true in 1955, in what way had the situation changed since Mr. Diefenbaker assumed power in 1957?

This was published in a newspaper which I am sure is more friendly to the present government than any other newspaper in this country today, and for good reasons having nothing to do with its being a newspaper.

> If that was true in 1955, in what way had the situation changed since Mr. Diefenbaker assumed power in 1957?
> This question was put to Mr. Diefenbaker's office by the Telegram.

They drew the Prime Minister's attention to this correspondence, and this was the reply:

> A letter from the Prime Minister's executive assistant said that "Mr. Diefenbaker did not recall the specific occasion in question, nor did we have a copy of the clipping readily available for him"—

I make nothing of this. It is in Hansard; there was no question of a clipping. I continue:

> "—and under all the circumstances, he felt it better not to comment."

Well, that may have been a very wise view to take. I must say that I put a motion on the order paper to get this correspondence and, because of the technical wording of my motion, I was told there was no such correspondence. I then got in touch with the Prime Minister's executive assistant who explained the circumstances to me—and very reasonably, I think—and gave me the full text of the letter that he in fact wrote to Mr. Brimmell. I would be quite prepared, if there is need to do so, to put the whole letter on the record, but the substance of it is given in the article and I do not think it would serve any particular purpose. I just wanted to be quite sure that I was not in any way being unfair in quoting only part of what appeared in this letter.

Now, my question is this. Does the minister, after two years in her present office, feel that the Prime Minister was right in 1955 when he described this department as being in a state of arbitrary lawlessness, and when he said that "equity and law have been pushed aside and the arbitrary say-so of an individual in a department has been placed above the law of the land"? Does the minister feel that this is the state of affairs that prevails in her department? If she does feel that, what has she done about it; because in so far as the enumeration which the hon. lady gave the other day is concerned, there was really nothing—perhaps to be completely fair I ought to recall what that enumeration was. These were the changes which the hon. lady said had been made since the present government took office. This is to be found at page 4711 of Hansard of June 9, 1960. They are numbered, and read as follows:

> 1. One of our first moves after taking office was to change the regulation which had formerly prevented Canadian residents of Asian origin from sponsoring the admission of their spouses and children until they became Canadian citizens.

This, it is true, did make it possible for certain persons who had not previously been allowed to apply for their relatives, to apply for them, but it did not change in any way the conditions attendant upon those applications, so that if those applications were decided by arbitrary lawlessness before, this made no difference; it merely provided a few more cases which could be decided by the arbitrary lawlessness. So this could not have removed the arbitrary lawlessness that the Prime Minister was so eloquent about in those days when he occupied a position of irresponsibility, sitting over here on this side of the house.

2. Next, the immigration appeal board was strengthened and its scope expanded.

Well, I would be quite interested to hear in what way the immigration appeal board, which I set up, has been strengthened. Perhaps when the hon. lady replies she can indicate how it has been strengthened. Has it been strengthened in personnel; has it been given any greater powers than it had before, or has it been given any greater scope? I understand it has been given greater scope. At a later stage I want to ask a few specific questions about that additional scope.

I took the view, when I recommended that the immigration appeal board should be set up, that under the terms of the act there was really nothing that could be adjudicated by a board in the normal sense of the word "adjudication" except with respect to landed immigrants; that landed immigrants, once they were landed, had certain rights in this country and their rights ought to be protected, and should be given the power to appeal where they could be represented by counsel who would be there to protect those rights. I also took the view that persons who were not landed immigrants but who happened to be visitors and were ordered deported, could hardly form a useful subject of any adjudication because there were no rights involved. What was involved was a judgment which this parliament saw fit, when the Immigration Act was last enacted, to impose upon the minister and ultimately upon nobody else. And even though the minister, or I when I was minister, might wish to take away those appeals from the minister altogether we could not have done it because parliament imposed that duty upon us and we had to perform it. We could get someone to assist us and that is what the board, and that is all the board, can do under the law as it now stands.

I am sure the hon. lady will agree with that without any question. So any arbitrary lawlessness that may have existed, to use the words of the Prime Minister, certainly could not have been taken away by any change in the immigration appeal board, because the immigration appeal board in the past had jurisdiction to hear all the cases of those persons who had rights under the act, and to hear them publicly and with counsel representing them.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

The third change the hon. lady referred to was:

3. A new policy governing temporary residents of Canada was announced in August, 1958 which made it possible to regularize the status of several thousands of persons who had previously entered the country on a non-immigrant basis.

Well, now, lest the hon. lady try to get away with any view that this would take away that arbitrary lawlessness, it was, of course, just another arbitrary regulation, and a regulation which I consistently refused even to consider when I was minister. I am wrong in using the term "regulation"; it was an edict of the hon. lady. It is not a regulation. There is nothing in the regulations to say that after a certain date which escapes me at the moment, I think early in 1959, visitors would not be processed in Canada but would have to go back home and reapply.

That was, in my view, an arbitrary act by the minister. I said so at the time; I condemned it the other day when I was speaking, and I still think it is a very unfortunate policy which ought to be changed. But in no way could it have been said to reduce any arbitrary conduct there may have been in the past. It certainly was an increase of it. I think it was an arbitrary act.

4. In co-operation with the provinces, significant improvements were made in measures providing for the welfare of immigrants after arrival.

I congratulated the hon. lady when she announced those changes and I am very happy to congratulate her again. This was a policy in which I took a great deal of interest when I was in the department, and my predecessor also took an interest in it. I am very glad the hon. lady has gone on in that direction because I think, speaking generally, the provincial governments, because they are in this business and Canada is not, have much better agencies for looking after welfare, and that it is much better to make arrangements with the provincial governments to have this done wherever it can be done on a satisfactory basis. I think the steps taken by the hon. lady in this field were progressive ones, just as I think those that we took previously also were progressive.

5. Another important change, which I announced to the house only last month, simplified the arrangements by which residents of Canada may bring fiancees to this country.

Of course that is just an administrative arrangement. There is really no provision for this in the regulations at all. I think what the hon. lady did was a very sensible thing, but it was just another step in the direction of liberalization which has gone on steadily over the period since the Chinese immigration act was repealed in 1946. It had nothing whatever to do with the so-called arbitrary lawlessness to which the Prime Minister referred when he was over here in the speech he made in April, 1955.

I think the time has come when the minister should tell us whether she thinks the Prime Minister was right. Mind you, the Prime Minister was not talking about the minister at that time. I read the paragraph where he said he specifically exempted the minister from any wrongdoing. He was talking about the regulations and about the officials who administer the regulations when he described this situation as a state of arbitrary lawlessness. If it was a state of arbitrary lawlessness in 1955, surely a prime minister who is going to keep us here to consider a bill of rights later this session ought to do something first about rights which five years ago he said were not being respected. I do think we are entitled to know from the minister whether, in the light of experience, she at least thinks the Prime Minister was wrong in what he said in 1955.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, when this estimate was last before the committee I had spoken for only five minutes when the adjournment hour came. I dealt briefly with the question of the deputy minister taking office, and I said at that time that I was going to direct the attention of the house to a few matters that had been brought to my attention by my constituents in general, by veterans, Legion branches, trade unionists and members of the Chinese community in my constituency. I am going to do so now as briefly as possible.

Before proceeding further I wish to emphasize once again that we believe a great deal of the dissatisfaction with immigration into Canada at the present time arises because we do not have a planned immigration policy. I do not underestimate all the difficulties. I have had a lot to do with immigrants from various countries. I do not underestimate the difficulties at all, but we do suggest that the greater part of our trouble arises from the fact that we have no planned immigration policy.

We in this group believe that immigrants should be processed at their point of origin, and that when it is decided that they are qualified to come forward they should be brought here only when employment and housing are available. As long as we continue this hit-or-miss policy we will find immigrants—and I do not blame the immigrants —taking jobs away from Canadians who are unemployed when the immigrants arrive, or competing with Canadians for housing that is in short supply. We think this is most unfair, particularly to unemployed Canadians, because we believe our first responsibility is to Canadians. While we have an over-all responsibility to accept as many people in Canada as we can properly absorb, our first responsibility is to Canadians and at the present time to the nearly half a million Canadians who are unemployed.

I suppose it is because of the unplanned immigration policy and its effects throughout the years, particularly in recent months in the light of unusually high unemployment, that I have received a number of letters very critical of our immigration policy. The present policy at times creates unnecessary ill will. As I have brought to the attention of the house before, a case came to my notice just a year ago involving a man born in the city of Nelson. He brought up his family there, served and fought for this country for five years, has four children and was unemployed for six months. Day after day he went to the unemployment insurance office seeking work. I do not blame the immigrant in this case, but this is the sort of situation that creates ill will on the part of Canadians and is unfair to the immigrants as well. A job is open and this unemployed Canadian finds it being taken by an immigrant from another country, who arrived two days before.

Therefore I want to emphasize the point of view of this group that we believe there has to be a planned immigration policy to provide for the bringing forward of these people at a time when they can be employed, or can go to relatives who will guarantee to maintain them until they can obtain employment through normal channels, and at such time as they can obtain housing without competing with Canadians for housing which is in short supply in certain areas.

In that connection I want to mention another matter that has been brought to my attention by various unions in my constituency and also by farmers' representatives and others. I refer to the view, in which we in this group believe, that all employment placement should be the responsibility of the national employment service. We do not agree with the division of responsibility for the placing in employment of unemployed persons. The national employment service is there and its officials are trying to do a good job. They are not provided with the facilities to travel throughout every district in order to find employment for people from day to day.

I am not blaming the immigration officials for the situation, but it is their responsibility and they work hard at carrying it out. They are instructed to travel throughout their districts in order to secure employment for immigrants who are going to arrive within a few days or a week. Very often the immigration official arrives at a mill, a lumber camp or a mine and finds that there is a job open. As a result an immigrant who has been in Canada only a few days gets the job in the lumber camp, mill or mine while in the same district there are unemployed Canadians, some of them veterans, who in some cases have had their names registered with the national employment service for months.

Therefore I suggest that all employment placement should come under the direction of the national employment service, in fairness to the Canadian unemployed and in fairness to immigrants who often incur unnecessary ill will, which is understandable when citizens who have been unemployed for a number of months find that under their noses someone steps in and takes a job. In fairness to all concerned we think our suggestion should be adopted.

In speaking this morning I am not just giving my own views but am expressing the views of various groups in my constituency, as I have said before. We think a planned immigration policy based on sound principles should give consideration to all citizens within the commonwealth. There is no doubt that at the present time there is gross discrimination against persons coming from certain sections of the commonwealth. While we deny entry to Canada at the present time to a coloured person from another section of the commonwealth who may have fought for freedom against nazism, we allow some nazis of low repute into this country.

I get that information not from trade unions but from persons of German origin who were in Hitler's concentration camps and in a few cases from employees of one or two of Krupp's subsidiaries that are operating in Canada today. We let these people in without any question at all, and to indicate the unfairness of this policy I am going to refer to a matter I brought to the attention of the house on June 26, 1954. Personally I feel very strongly about this question. At that time during the debate on the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration I brought to the minister's attention the fact that five persons had been admitted to Canada who had been sentenced by the French government either to death or to long imprisonment.

[Mr. Herridge.]

The first was found guilty of anti-national actions against France and sentenced in absentia to imprisonment at hard labour for life and to national degradation for life, July 3, 1945, by the court of justice of Agen. The second was sentenced to five years imprisonment and to national degradation for life by the court of justice of Toulouse for collaborationist sentiments. The third was sentenced in absentia to the death penalty and forfeiture of all his property for treason on January 10, 1945, by the court of justice of Toulouse. The fourth was sentenced in absentia by the court of justice of La Haute-Savoie to imprisonment at hard labour for life, national degradation for life and forfeiture of all property, on February 26, 1946, for collaboration with the enemy. The fifth was sentenced on March 28, 1945, in absentia to death as guilty for dealings in time of war with a foreign power with a view to encouraging that power against France. He was an inspector in the Waffen S.S., and that means he was serving the German gestapo very well indeed.

All these men entered Canada under false names, with false passports, and were provided with false visas. I might say that a high French government official stated that they belonged to an organization that murdered the French minister, Georges Mandel, in the forest of Fontainebleau, massacred resistors, and betrayed allied parachutists who were hidden by brave Frenchmen. These parachutists may have included some of our own men.

At that time, I went on to deal with the matter at greater length. I might say the French government of the day requested the government of Canada to deport these people to France. We were supplied with the judgments by representatives of the French government; that is why I have them, and with the evidence. The French government was deeply concerned about this. I can remember reading the evidence in one case, and one of these men who is today a Canadian citizen was found guilty of hanging his brother Frenchman from a hook in a small cell, in the presence of the gestapo, applying a blowtorch and burning his body in various places, in an effort to get him to reveal the identity of other members of the underground.

There was similar evidence with respect to the others. These people were admitted to this country and were granted citizenship at that time. As I said before, these people now have the right to say "I am a Canadian citizen". We in this group protest very strongly indeed against this action on the part of the Canadian government, because it indicates a type of thinking and discrimination which we feel is totally unjustified and most unfair.

At that time we admitted persons of this type, and there are others like them. I have had correspondence with a very interesting employee of the Krupp interests who gave information about some of these people. I do not question any normal citizen who had to fight for his country. However, we have let a few nazi beauties into this country, yet at the same time we have denied entry to a poor girl like Miss Rebrin, whose case is now before the courts so I am not allowed to say much about it. I have received letters from Francis Noel-Baker and a number of other people pointing out what they consider to be the injustice in this case.

I mention these things to illustrate the unfairness at the present time. I might say these people were admitted at the discretion of the minister of the day, by order in council. These people were considered fit to become Canadian citizens. In fact the minister has the power under section 10 of the Canadian Citizenship Act, which reads:

> The minister may, in his discretion, grant a certificate of citizenship to any person who is not a Canadian citizen and who makes application for that purpose and satisfies the court that,
> (b) he has been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence therein;
> (d) he is of good character;

I should like to see how anyone could consider the people I have mentioned to be of good character. I have documentary evidence to support my argument, because at that time the French ambassador supplied us with the information and indicated to us the indignation of the French government of the day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I mention these matters briefly to indicate the practice of discrimination. I do not say these cases happened under the jurisdiction of the present minister—it was the prior government—but the same principle applies. It is the principle of gross discrimination against citizens of the commonwealth and orientals in general, as well as other good citizens, who are prevented from entering or residing in this country on the basis of very flimsy evidence indeed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman, before he passes on to another topic, would permit me to ask him one question. As I listened to him I gathered that his argument was that there should be no discrimination as between the countries of the commonwealth, from which I think one would infer that immigrants from the commonwealth would have preference over immigrants from other places. However, the hon. member for Timiskaming said that the principle of his party was that there should be no discrimination regardless of the place from which people come. Which is the policy of his party?

Mr. Herridge: I suspected what the hon. member's question was going to be when he rose. Our policy is the principle non-discrimination, applied with intelligence and common sense. When you say "non-discrimination", that does not mean you could bring into this country, suddenly, large numbers of persons of other races and other colours and retain the proper economic and social atmosphere. The hon. member knows exactly what we mean. We mean that we are opposed to discrimination in principle. We believe in the government making every effort possible to overcome it. We believe in a common sense approach to the problem, therefore the hon. member knows we would not suggest for a moment that, let us say, five million Asiatics should be admitted to Canada next year, or anything of that sort.

Mr. Crestohl: You preach a perfect paradox.

Mr. Pickersgill: You believe in non-discriminatory discrimination.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member mentioned the perfect paradox, but I note that he is only the parrot.

I must go on to mention the brief presented by the Chinese benevolent association from its national headquarters, 108 Pender street, Vancouver, British Columbia. I am not going to read this brief. There has been a considerable amount of discussion of this question, and I am not going to be repetitious and restate this case. This brief makes certain representations to the minister with respect to the recent allegations by officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do urge the minister to give serious consideration to these representations. We have not a large representation of Chinese in the district from which I come. I have known the older ones for many years, and I believe there are only 200 or 300 in Kootenay West. They make very good citizens. I have noticed one very interesting aspect of their life, and that is that you never find them applying for government assistance. They always manage to look after themselves or one another.

I do want to read the concluding paragraph of this brief, which has this to say:

> Now be it therefore resolved that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration be called upon to clarify the position of her department on the recent allegations in the press so that the misleading impression that there is a community-wide conspiracy to land immigrants illegally and use them for slave labour may be corrected or clarified.

The minister has taken some steps in that direction, but I hope she makes it even more definitive before this debate is concluded. The brief goes on to say:

Furthermore, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration be requested to humanize the immigration laws and regulations and to remove all existing discriminations against Chinese and orientals.

I do urge the minister and the government to give serious consideration to the representations of this group, and to make those representations applicable as far as possible.

Mr. Fairclough: Would the hon. member say what is the date of the document he was reading?

Mr. Herridge: June 3, 1960.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): When he referred to some five million orientals coming into the country, is it the policy of his party to have a quota system set up for every country which sends emigrants to Canada?

Mr. Herridge: No, I do not think I should say we believe in a quota system. We believe in a common sense approach based on the principle of non-discrimination, which would bring representatives of various races into this country so they can be properly absorbed as far as the orderly development of the nation is concerned, and obtain the necessary housing without displacing Canadians.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit another question? I have always considered that he was one member of this house who was singularly free of cant and hypocrisy, and I say that as a compliment to him. I think it would be very helpful to all of us to know what the hon. gentleman really means by non-discrimination.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. gentleman has asked me to describe what I mean by non-discrimination, or what we mean by it. When we say we believe in non-discrimination, we approach this problem from a Christian point of view. We believe in the brotherhood of man and the applying of that principle to the limit of our ability considering all the circumstances concerned. I hope the hon. gentleman does not consider that a hypocritical answer.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the hon. gentleman permit another question? Would he consider that was non-discrimination with strings or without strings?

Mr. Herridge: We do not believe in strings of any kind. We call this non-discrimination with common sense, as I said before.

Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I wish to bring to the attention of the committee and that is the question of landed immigrants, which has been raised several times before by hon. members of all parties. I am referring to how people from the United States come to this country and register as landed immigrants but have no intention of staying here. This happens mostly with construction workers, people who work on pipe lines and things like that. As a matter of fact I saw in the newspapers recently that the foreman of the crew putting in the gas pipe line to serve the restaurant and cafeteria of this House of Commons is a United States citizen. I thought that was most interesting, but I presume there is not a single man unemployed and available in Canada who could do that job and that is the reason this man is here. I am sure the minister will be able to give us that assurance when she speaks in reply.

We can all understand the case of a genuine landed immigrant, but in my constituency these United States citizens come to Canada as landed immigrants and therefore have a right to get employment as such. They work here for three or four months and then they go back again. What can we do about that? I think that is a question which has to be given consideration in fairness to Canadian citizens. This landed immigrant business has been worked to the limit in some places, with hundreds and hundreds of them coming across the line.

Mr. Chairman, let me tell you how I proved this on one occasion. In British Columbia if you are going to become a landed immigrant you are required to take out a licence for your car; if you are only a visitor you get a visitor's permit and are not required to take out a licence for some months. I asked the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to check up on some of these landed immigrants; not one of them had taken out a Canadian licence but all had visitors' permits. I think that is a section of the act which does want redrafting and drawing much tighter than it is now, in fairness to all Canadians.

In conclusion let me say that the members of this group realize the necessity for a complete revision of the Immigration Act. We realize that this is no light task and that there are many angles to be considered. I do not suppose there are many acts which present as many problems in drafting as a revised Immigration Act, and I well recognize that. But I think it is essential—

Mrs. Fairclough: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to interrupt his comments here. What he says is perfectly true, and that is precisely why we have not been able to bring in any amendment to the act before now, because I do not want to bring in a half-baked piece of legislation which will not stand the test of time. That is precisely the reason there has not been any revision before now.

Mr. Crestohl: That is the first time we have heard that explanation, and that is quite understandable.

Mr. Herridge: I can well appreciate the minister's explanation. Personally I would prefer to see a little more time taken so we will have a document which is as foolproof as possible presented to this house. I recognize the quite unusual difficulties in drafting an act of this kind, but again I say it is necessary to have a completely revised Immigration Act if we are going to have a sound and just immigration policy based on definitive principles.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, since last week when we were discussing these estimates I have had occasion to submit some questions to the minister, and I want to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate her department and her officials for the speed and accuracy with which some rather complicated questions were so efficiently dealt. I must confess that I did not expect a reply to be given within 24 or 48 hours, but I was delighted to see that the department's records are so well and accurately kept and I was pleased they were made available to me so quickly.

At the same time I would like to say that I was pleased to see from these replies that no deportations were ordered to iron curtain countries or to African countries. It certainly does disclose the attitude of the immigration department in safeguarding human lives, and I think there is no other department which has such humanised laws. The hon. member who has just taken his seat also used that term.

I would like to touch on the same subject matter the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate touched on when he spoke of the facilities which should be given to people who are deported and wish to take their cases before the courts. I would refer, as did the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, to statements made on previous occasions by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Justice. They argued very logically, forcefully and humanly when they were sitting on this side of the house that people should be told what they are accused of or what they are convicted of, virtually, when they are ordered to be deported and they are not now given the reason.

I do not know whether there is a difference in that regard between landed and non-landed immigrants, but I want to refer to a statement made by the present Minister of Justice on August 7, 1956, when he was sitting in opposition. I have not the full quotation from Hansard because I will only read that part which I think is applicable. As reported on page 7162 of Hansard for August 7, 1956, he said:

> I refer, of course, particularly to the refusal of the department to inform prospective immigrants who are rejected of the reasons for their rejection, which practice is carried over in a number of cases to a refusal to inform people who land in Canada and against whom orders for deportation are made of the reasons for those orders. We have said before and we say again that this practice is absolutely unjustified and that it is contrary to the principle of justice upon which this country's system rests.

The Minister of Justice straightforwardly and, I was about to say, very nobly, declared that to place an immigrant in a position where he is virtually convicted, the sentence being to leave the country, without being given the reason is to do something which militates against decency and good judgment. It is possible that this may have been necessary during time of war in order to preserve Canadian security. It may be that this practice was determined during the last war, or at the end of the war. I do not know; but surely at the present time it is no longer necessary.

That is another reason why the minister should give active consideration to revising the act, and I say revising rather than amending because the minister told us a few minutes ago why it would be difficult to amend the act. I point out to her that the act was last revised in 1953, at which time some basic changes were made. I think the time has now come when she should accelerate the attention she is giving to the complete revision of the measure.

I do not know whether parliament gets the full facts when decisions or rulings are made by regulation or order in council. Members of this house do not have placed before them the regulation which decides or the rule which modifies the conditions under which an immigrant can enter the country. When I asked in my question the other day for departmental decisions as to cases, I was not concerned with the departmental decision on any particular case. It seemed to me that a decision is made in one case and that in the course of time it determines other cases as well; it becomes a standard.

I was not pinpointing any particular case. I was asking if there were departmental decisions of this type. If I am not correct about that—and the minister has indicated that I might be in error—then I should like the position to be made clear. Those are the type of departmental decisions that I mean. I do not even know that any exist, but I want to make sure whether there are any which are being used as standards affecting immigration into this country.

Let us take, for example, the statement the minister made on August 23, 1958 with respect to people who were in Canada as non-immigrants, and who were here for six months or a year. The minister wisely and humanely decided to let those people apply. I do not know whether that decision was made by order in council or by the minister herself. The first time we heard about it was when the minister announced it.

Take the announcement made by the minister recently with respect to fiancees. Was that done by order in council or was it a decision of the minister or a decision of the department to give some relief in this direction? I am not criticizing that decision. On the contrary, I praise it; but I am wondering why decisions of that kind are not placed before parliament for approval or rejection or amendment.

That is why I have asked so many questions on these matters. We do know that cases where the circumstances appear to be identical are, on occasion, decided differently with the result that people are left wondering. There may, of course, be circumstances on the files which are not disclosed but which would explain the difference in the decisions, but I think these circumstances should be disclosed in order to avoid any misunderstanding or even harsh thoughts about what has happened. People are human. They may inadvertently have some unkind thoughts when they see two cases where the circumstances appear to be identical decided in different ways.

I present these thoughts to the minister not with a view to being critical but in order to let the department know what members of parliament think about certain situations. We realize that this is a department which is very difficult to administer, and I have said at almost every opportunity how grateful I am to the department for being so understanding from time to time, and I say now that we are getting some fast and considerate service.

I want to say a word of commendation also to the parliamentary secretary to the minister. Some weeks ago I brought a simple matter to his attention, a matter which required an immediate reply. I did not want to burden the officials or the minister with it, but I did trouble the parliamentary secretary and he gave attention to it very promptly. I certainly want to express my gratitude for that. I feel that this is the time for it, and that it is also the time to be critical.

I can only underscore my sincere plea to the minister that she could do this country no better service than to see that the act is revised and made uniform; that it be consolidated, together with all the orders in council, in order that it may be not only a clear-cut statement of policy but also a clear guide to just who is and who is not admissible to this country. These things should not be left to orders in council or ministerial decisions or entirely to the discretion of the inquiry officer.

I know there must be some discretion given to these men and that they exercise it well, but such discretion is dangerous if one makes it final. We do not know what mood a particular official may be in. He may be distressed by domestic problems when he makes a decision. His decision has to be respected, but all I ask is that we do not allow it to be final as if it were a decision of the supreme court. We should allow facilities for review. It seems to me that when it is referred to a board of appeal this again is a departmental board, and there may be some concern for the position of an inquiry officer who is, after all, a colleague. There might be some uncontrollable influences involved of an intangible nature. If a man feels aggrieved and wants to take the matter to the courts he should be allowed to do so.

I urge the minister to take another look at section 39. I do not suggest that the bill standing in my name that seeks to amend section 39 is a panacea or cure-all, and I am prepared to withdraw it at any time or to agree to let the minister draft one in her own name or to convert and adapt mine and make it her own bill. I do not seek kudos for the bill. I am only eager to see that every immigrant, whether landed or not, is given justice and has his day in court. I think the act as it stands is in need of revision but would serve as an excellent foundation for a new act. If reviewed, amended and revised I do not think there would be an immigration act in the world capable of surpassing it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could make a few general comments on the remarks, suggestions and criticisms of the hon. member for Cartier. First of all I should like to assure him that the decisions which are made in individual cases, to which he has referred, are not used as rulings by the department, simply because no two cases are ever exactly alike. It is true that from time to time people ask, "Why were my relatives not admitted when this group are over here in exactly the same circumstances?" They are not in exactly the same circumstances. We find that time after time. So long as the minister is charged with exercising discretion then I must do that.

I agree with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that, if parliament wished to take away from the minister the discretionary power, it would certainly lighten my task very considerably. I would no longer be able to admit anyone by order in council. I am not sure that is what the hon. member for Cartier wants. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate just made a plea for more use of orders in council and the hon. member for Cartier says we should have less, that the act itself should stipulate who can or cannot enter the country and we should adhere rigidly to those classification. I am unable to agree with the hon. gentleman on that point. I believe there must be flexibility even though it makes the job of the minister more onerous.

The hon. member referred specifically to the statement I made in the house in August, 1958 and also to the one I made a few days ago with reference to fiancees. The very reason these statements were made in this chamber was to permit hon. members to comment on them, to disagree with them if they wish, and in neither case was there any noticeable disagreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, would the hon. lady not agree—

Mrs. Fairclough: I hasten to assure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I was just about to qualify that statement. As the hon. gentleman was probably just about to say, he did have some comments to make with reference to the policy announced in August of 1958, but I think he would agree with me that there was not a prolonged debate nor was there a great amount of objection raised in either of these instances.

But that is not the point I wanted to make. The point is that the house was informed of the changes. The information was brought forward and presented to hon. members for their approval or disapproval as the case may be. I think it could scarcely be expected that every change in the regulations and every administrative ruling should be submitted to parliament for debate. They would be held in abeyance for many months if that were done, and it would be tantamount to amending the regulations or the act as the case may be.

With respect to a revision of the act, I possibly have been guilty of some loose expressions referring to amendment when I meant revision, or referring to revision when I meant amendment, but I hope hon. members will forgive me. What we do propose is a revision of the act. Quite apart from any alterations which may be made with respect to admissible groups we feel that the present act has probably had a few patches put on it here and there and is no longer as understandable a document as it might be. It is seven years old, as the hon. member has said, and I would hope to put it into a little more lucid form so there will not be the misunderstandings that have occurred in the past.

I can assure hon. members that as soon as the department and the government are ready with a revision of the act, ample opportunity will be given to all hon. members to voice their approval or disapproval and to make suggestions. It is my intention to make the draft act available not only to hon. members of the committee for their consideration but also to members of interested groups, including the voluntary agencies which work so closely with the department in the encouragement and care of new residents coming into Canada and also the various church groups, labour groups and others who are interested. I hope that all will have an opportunity to express their views.

I might say that the views expressed by these organizations in the past, sometimes in a formal way and sometimes by letters and resolutions, have been carefully considered and will continue to be given close attention regardless of the source from which they come. We do not pass lightly over or toss aside expressions of opinion; they are given careful consideration indeed. That may assist in explaining why the introduction of the revision has taken so long. I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay West that this is a matter that should not be hurried just for the sake of bringing in a new act, much as I should have liked to introduce it before now. I believe it is better to take time and make sure that the opinions of all have been carefully considered. In this way we will finally have a workable piece of legislation, one that will meet the approval of all groups of Canadians who have an interest in this department of government.

I had not intended to devote this time to answering specific questions that were raised, but I thought these few comments would be of interest to hon. members of the committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall vote 50 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. The hon. lady had the floor at one o'clock and said there were several specific points she intended to answer. Does she wish to do that now?

Mrs. Fairclough: I had not intended specifically to answer the individual points, because we will be coming back to them later and I did not wish to have the same questions coming up and repeated, so it might be just as well if I answered them all at the one time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very well. I want to make a few observations of a more or less general character. I noticed that just before one o'clock the hon. lady said it was her intention, when she had a draft bill—I am not sure whether she said a draft bill or a draft act; I do not think it makes any difference—to consult organizations, groups interested in immigration, and also to make it available to members of the house. I assume what the hon. lady would do is what is often done in the case of major revisions of legislation and what, I may say parenthetically, I hope this government, if it is going to act responsibly, is going to do about the Civil Service Act; that is to give it first reading in one session and leave it until another session so there is adequate opportunity for the public to consider it. If before the end of this session the hon. lady could give first reading to her bill it seems to me this would be an admirable way to expedite its passage in another session. If it could be brought in with the understanding that it would get no more than first reading, so it would be published, then it seems to me there would be a good opportunity during the recess to have everyone interested look at it. Then when the new bill was introduced in another session, as was done with the Income Tax Act and innumerable statutes, a lot more progress would be made, because many of the representations would be known. I just offer that as a suggestion.

Since we met last week I have been thinking about something that I spoke about somewhat tentatively at that time, and that is this very awkward problem of dealing with visitors who have been ordered deported. I listened with the respect that I always accord to the hon. member for Cartier when he spoke this morning, because the hon. member has had perhaps as much experience with the problems of immigrants and would-be immigrants as any hon. member in this house. There is no member who is more genuinely concerned in seeing that we have a sound immigration policy, and no member who does more to help would-be immigrants to this country, than the hon. member for Cartier.

The hon. member is also a lawyer. He was very impressive and made a very eloquent plea for the rule of law. There are, as the hon. lady and I both know from our experience, real difficulties in this field. I would be the first to admit that a landed immigrant has rights and that those rights should be protected and, in my view, protected more adequately than they are under the present law or than it is possible to do under the present law because of section 39 of the act, which I think should be taken out when it is revised. I agree with the hon. member for Cartier about that, and that represents a conversion on my part. But I have been thinking a good deal about this question of how to deal with and satisfy that craving for natural justice that we all have in respect of visitors or applicants at the border who are ordered deported. If someone comes to the office in London or Paris and applies to become an immigrant to Canada and is turned down, that is the end of it unless he comes back again and gets turned down again or accepted.

No one that I have ever heard has ever suggested that those persons have any legal rights at all. I always took the view—and I really find it very hard to rationally take any other view—that a person who had never been landed as an immigrant, who had never been accepted for immigration, but who happened to find himself in Canada or in a Canadian port, was in a different legal position from someone who applied, say, in Rome, and should have any preferential treatment. The fact is that once they set foot on Canadian soil, for whatever reason, under the act they have to go through a certain process before a special inquiry officer and they have to be ordered deported, and for that reason this kind of deportation is similar in the public mind to the deportation which is ordered from time to time for landed immigrants because of a definite breach of the law; and a landed immigrant cannot be deported except for a definite breach of the law, of which the minister has to inform him.

There is a lot of misunderstanding about that also. I was accused over and over again by very eminent lawyers like the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice of refusing to tell landed immigrants why they were being deported. I did not have any right under the law, of course, to refuse, and I never did refuse or attempt to refuse, because there is an obligation.

In the other case, however, there is no right and therefore no obligation on the minister. These are the most difficult kind of cases. They are the kind of cases concerning one or two of which I still have some rather painful memories, and the minister has had at least three or four of them in recent times. I think it might be worth considering whether, when we amend the law, we should take away from the minister this obligation and impose it upon some tribunal which would have the final say in the matter; not a tribunal clothed with judicial power, because there is nothing to adjudicate, but a tribunal to make sure there are substantial reasons why the deportation should stand.

I think there is perhaps no more disagreeable task in the whole government of Canada than that of having to justify these deportations without being able to give reasons for them. On that point I must say I have not altered my views at all. It seems to me that a person who has never been landed in this country, but is simply applying for landing cannot as a rule be given a reason for the refusal. There may be cases when it should be done, where there are curable defects or something of that sort and where they would otherwise be desirable immigrants. But if you do it in every case you impose two disabilities on that person. The first is the disability of being turned down and the second is the disability of being branded.

I agree with the judge of the supreme court of British Columbia who the other day had some rather harsh things to say about the minister in one notorious case which we cannot discuss in full in the house because it is still before the courts. The minister had given reasons in the house which were different from those which were alleged before the court. The judge said that he did not see why these other reasons should have been given, and I agree with him. I think it is just part of the gaff that the hon. lady is paid a minister's salary to take, and she just has to take it, as I took it. I took a good deal of it from some hon. gentlemen who sat over here at that time, but may I say that I have never, in any of these cases, attacked the present minister on the kind of grounds on which I was attacked by the present Minister of Justice, the Prime Minister and certain other people who were then over here. I have not done so because I know something of what these problems are.

The Minister of Justice challenged me the other day when I asserted that the minister had accepted the view I took, the view Mr. Mackenzie King took, and the view every parliament since confederation has taken, that the parliament of Canada has the exclusive say as to who shall enter this country, and that there is no right on the part of anyone to immigrate. The minister stated that very clearly the other day, and I said I was very glad to see that the Minister of Justice accepted the view which I think is the only possible one. The minister suggested that he had never had any other view. At that time I did not have before me what I have today, his remarks as found on page 1164 of Hansard for February 15, 1955, at which time he said:

> However, perhaps the most immediately pertinent portion of our criticism of government policy lies within that portion of our motion—

This was a want of confidence motion that the present minister had offered on that particular day.

> —which says that in its administration it denies simple justice to Canadians and non-Canadians alike. Our reasons for this criticism are summarized in our objections to the government's position, repeatedly stated in this house and in correspondence, that there are no rights attached to immigration; that it is a matter of discretion only and cannot be made a matter of law. That is the position that has been taken in this house by the former minister. It has been inherited by the present minister—

Myself.

> —and is confirmed by him in his letters; that is to say, with respect to those applying for admission to Canada, or who are applied for by Canadians in Canada, there are not legal rights; that the whole thing is a matter of discretion. Such a decision is a denial of the rights of Canadians and can only make, as it has done, for administrative chaos amounting in fact by its very nature and extent to inevitable administrative lawlessness.

I just cite that since the Minister of Justice was so categorical in saying he had not changed his opinion. I thought perhaps he should be reminded of the fact that he has apparently changed it if these plain words meant anything when he said them and were not just the chaff of opposition. I hate to suggest, particularly when the minister is not here, that the Minister of Justice ever said anything in this house that he did not say with complete sincerity, but he cannot have it both ways. He either meant what he said then and has now changed his mind, or he did not mean what he said then.

I am grateful to the hon. member for Cartier for drawing attention to something I had overlooked, the fact that in 1956 the Minister of Justice reiterated in somewhat different language the same views which he no longer holds. The hon. member for Cartier read the extract from page 7162 of Hansard for August 7, 1956. At that time the minister said:

> We have brought to the attention of the department on numerous occasions the very situation which is bound to create this type of case in the policy pursued by that department. I refer, of course, particularly to the refusal of the department to inform prospective immigrants who are rejected of the reasons for their rejection, which practice is carried over in a number of cases to a refusal to inform people who land in Canada and against whom orders for deportation are made of the reasons for those orders. We have said before and we say again that this practice is absolutely unjustified—

"Absolutely unjustified". I draw the hon. lady's attention to that remark and ask her to remind the Minister of Justice of those words.

—that it is contrary to the principles of justice upon which this country's system rests.

When the Minister of Justice first became a member of the government he administered this department for several months, and he has his share of the collective responsibility for the department today. The hon. lady has administered it ever since. I know that the hon. lady has repeatedly expressed exactly the same views about these matters that I expressed when I was minister. I asked the present Minister of Justice on one occasion, while he still had responsibility for the department, whether he had changed his view about this matter, and he said he was giving it the gravest possible consideration but that he had not reached any conclusion. Obviously the fact is that the government has either seen that the Minister of Justice was wrong in what he said when he was over here or, as the Minister of Justice put it, they are carrying on a lawless administration.

Earlier today I referred to the remarks of the Prime Minister. I have not had an answer from the minister yet. I know she is saving her answers for a little later, and perhaps she will tell us then whether it is the intention of the government in the new legislation or as an administrative practice to start giving reasons to prospective immigrants for their rejection; and, if she intends to do that, whether she intends to allow these reasons to be argued out before some kind of tribunal and how she intends to deal with the administrative problem that would be involved if there is any thought that we are going to maintain immigration even at the very much reduced level it reached last year, a little more than one third of what it was when we were in office.

On that point, sir, I could quote eloquent statements by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice. The hon. lady is very lucky in that when she was over here she criticized the Department of Labour and not the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I assume that there was at least some kind of unified Progressive Conservative policy in those days, although I must say the evidences that there may be any now are very slender indeed. If there was, I assume she must have agreed with those attacks which were made upon me every year I was minister, that I was not bringing enough people into this country; that it was not being populated. When you look at the record, sir, you see what has happened.

I venture to say the indications are that immigration in the year 1960 will be no greater than it was in 1959, despite the Prime Minister's generous offer in London a short time ago that tens of thousands of immigrants would be welcomed to this country and there would be no trouble in finding jobs for them. I do say that I hope, before too many of the tens of thousands of job-seekers come to this country under any immigration policy, the minister will see that her colleague the Minister of Labour first tells those Canadians who are looking for jobs where the jobs are and gives them a chance to take them; because, as has been repeatedly pointed out from this side of the chamber, many of these job opportunities to which reference has been made are in categories that many a Canadian would be very happy to fill if he were given the opportunity.

Now, sir, I want to repeat that I do believe, after three years of Progressive Conservative government, which was going to end the arbitrary lawlessness—those are the words the Prime Minister used—in this department, and which has so far made no substantial change in the act or regulations, we should be told either that the government has come to the conclusion that the Prime Minister did not know what he was talking about five years ago, and that the Minister of Justice did not know what he was talking about four or five years ago, or we should be told why the government has not done anything about it in three years.

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall be glad to tell the hon. member a few things. He had something to say a moment ago about the number of immigrants who came into Canada in 1959 as compared with 1957. I draw to the hon. member's attention something he has probably forgotten, that his administration ended after five months of 1957—

Mr. Pickersgill: Six months, all but nine days.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, five months and ten days.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, June 21.

Mrs. Fairclough: In any event, I do not believe he can lay claim to having brought into Canada the largest number of immigrants in any year since 1913, nor can he say that the number who came in 1957 were the normal number. If my memory serves me well I think the average over a 10-year period was something in the nature of 155,000. Now, as the hon. member well knows, when you bring in a great many more than your normal number it takes a little while to digest them. In addition to that, the motives which impelled these people to come here in any given year are something which only the immigrant himself understands. I think it is safe to say that a great many people came into Canada in 1957 for various reasons who possibly might have planned to come in 1958 or in 1959. However, there were reasons why they hurried and came a little sooner than they otherwise intended to. I believe that happens at any time. It is not a situation that is applicable only to the year 1957.

Then it takes a while for these people to be digested, shall we say, into the economy of the country. Probably some of them are not digested even yet. I disagree with the hon. member in his prognostication for the current year. It is a little early to say precisely what will happen; however, I think last year was the low year. I agree that Canada could absorb these people. I just wonder what the hon. member means. In one breath he says we have not enough immigration, that this is the lowest ebb we have reached and we should be having 280,000 per year, the same as in 1957—

Mr. Pickersgill: No. I know the hon. lady does not want to misrepresent me. I did not say we are not having enough immigrants. I think we are bringing in all the immigrants that we can digest, so long as we have a depressed economy such as we have had for most of the last three years.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am glad the hon. member finally made himself clear, because he left the impression that he was criticizing this government for not bringing in the number of immigrants that we had under the previous administration. In the next breath he says we should not bring them in so long as we have unemployment. I believe you have to make up your mind which of these two points of view you want to adopt.

Mr. Pickersgill: I made that very clear the other day.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like also to reply to the criticism the hon. member levelled at the Prime Minister this morning. I draw to his attention the fact that the remarks of the Prime Minister which the hon. member quoted were made in April, 1955. At that time we had no immigration appeal board; there was no such thing. I submit that, largely because of the criticisms levelled by the Prime Minister and the present Minister of Justice, the hon. member did, in his capacity as minister at that time, institute the appeal board in the following year, 1956.

I draw to his attention also the fact that even when he did set up this board it had no power whatever to deal with other than landed immigrants. When this government came into power one of the first things it did, after careful consideration, was to extend the scope of that board, as I announced in this house last year, so that anyone who was in Canada, whether landed immigrant or non-immigrant, could appeal to that board.

The way the matter stands now, regardless of the status of the individual he has recourse to the immigration appeal board. I would be the last person to say that I feel this is the final, ultimately desirable situation. We are still watching it and we are watching it very closely. I think there will be other alterations made. I do not know what they will be at this moment, and I do not want to anticipate a new act or the provsions of that act. The hon. member has asked me if I could give an indication of the suggestions I propose to make. I am sorry, but I must answer that in the negative; because until such time as—the hon. member shakes his head, and I am sorry if I misunderstood him—we have agreement amongst the various departments of government concerned, and until we know what the provisions of the act are going to be—until we are reasonably sure that what we propose is going to be a workable arrangement—I think it would be wrong for me to anticipate the introduction of any of the controversial points.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not quarrel with that.

Mrs. Fairclough: I had intended to give some further information with regard to the immigration appeal board. Possibly I should point out to the committee that since the scope of the board was broadened the number of appeals to that board has doubled. The number of appeals from October 1, 1959 to date has doubled as compared with the number which were heard by the board under the former, more restrictive rules. I think, Mr. Chairman, this is an indication of the interest there is and the fact that those who previously had no recourse to any kind of tribunal now can come forward and make their voices heard before that board.

I might go further and say that at the time I made this announcement there was some critical comment in some sections of the press, which accused the minister of attempting to evade some of her duties. Let me point out now, as I did at that time, that such is not the case. Even after these people have been heard by the immigration appeal board they still have the same recourse to the minister which they had previously.

Mr. Pickersgill: If I could for one moment reply to the point raised; I will not say anything new. The minister said that the immigration of 1957 was not normal. The hon. member for Kootenay West said that we never had normal immigration, but I do not know what normal is.

Mrs. Fairclough: Let us say average.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. lady says 150,000 a year, she has been about two thirds right for the last two years, accepting her definition of normal. As for the suggestion that because the present government came into office on June 21, 1957 and the decision they made was to stop all open placement immigration from that time on, they can claim even the faintest kind of credit for any of the immigration in that year is really so preposterous that I would not have thought so intelligent a person as the minister would have considered making such a claim.

When I was speaking the other day I said I thought that as long as we had the large scale unemployment which we unfortunately seem to be having now, in summer as well as winter, I did not think there should be any open placement immigration. I want to make that clear at once. The surest way to kill immigration altogether is to bring to this country by false advertising people who have no connection with it, and have them walk the streets for months looking for jobs, or have them lose a job or get a substandard job; then three months later they go home again and advertise what a poor country this is. The worst blow to desirable immigration in this country for years and years, in my opinion, was the way the Arrow contract was ended, with the consequences that had on our British immigration. The minister knows what I am talking about here.

But what I actually said was that this was so different from the advertisements. We were castigated over and over again. It was the Liberal view, and it is the Liberal view today, that immigration should be geared to the absorptive capacity of the country. We were told by the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister that our immigration was far too low. In fact the Prime Minister got the figure up in the exuberance of the election campaign of 1957, less than six weeks before the government stopped all open placement immigration. He told a very select organization in Ontario that immigration should be 600,000 a year; at least that is what it worked out to. He said an increase of 4 per cent a year. It was the extraordinary difference between what members of the Progressive Conservative opposition said on immigration and the practice since that I was drawing to the attention of the committee. The fact that I draw to the attention of the committee the contradictions of hon. members opposite does not mean that I share their views, because in most cases I do not.

The hon. lady said the immigration appeal board had not been established in 1955 when the criticism was made by the Prime Minister, and that is quite right. But I also point out to the hon. lady that of the cases to which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice referred, I cannot remember one single case of a landed immigrant, although there may have been the odd one. I think they were all cases of persons who had never been accepted as immigrants, which was the cause of this charge of lawlessness. I have never for one moment contested the fact that a person who was a landed immigrant had rights. I always said that; but no distinction was made, as the quotation I read from the Minister of Justice shows quite clearly.

It is true that the immigration appeal board now hears appeals by visitors, but I have no idea on what basis they do that, and I would be interested to hear the hon. lady tell us on what basis they hear those appeals. I do not mean that there is an order in council empowering them to do that, but I would like to know what criterion they use and how they go about it. It does not seem to me that there is any law upon which they can determine a case; they must merely act as a substitute or a screen for the minister.

I have no objection to that. I think the minister was very wise, and perhaps I might have saved myself a little agony if I had done that, too. But it seemed to me, and it seems to me still, that it was rather difficult to give a tribunal the capacity to decide something when it had no law on which to make the decision. In the case of a landed immigrant we know that the reason for deportation has to be precisely stated, under what section of the act it comes and what the circumstances are. But in the case of visitors all that is said is that they are not suitable, and that is all that under the law can be said unless you want to say that they are in one of the prohibited classes. I think the minister will agree, considering what the prohibited classes are, that that is casting a very severe reflection upon an applicant, and one would want to be sure one was right before making such reflections.

Therefore I would be interested to know on what basis the decisions are made and what criterion is used by the board in dealing with the applications of visitors. It seems to me that is the only point that has not been dealt with by the minister which requires any further clarification.

Mr. Van Horne: Mr. Chairman, I just want to comment on this hocus-pocus of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. Here is a minister of immigration of a former government, in the dying days of the Liberal party, now dead. I would like to say that as far as the people of Canada are concerned they certainly appreciate the attitude of this government in doing away with hocus-pocus in the immigration department of the sort of which we had an example this afternoon. I can very well remember the present Prime Minister in the 1957 and 1958 election campaigns making it very clear that no country had more sympathy than Canada for people who wished to come here when it was not wise to bring people here for whom jobs were not available and while this country could not absorb them. Do not forget that they were the days of the Liberal party when unemployment was at a peak.

I suggest that if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had spent as much effort, when his government approved the St. Lawrence seaway, in getting them to approve and build the Chignecto canal, he would not be called a renegade in the maritime provinces today.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in view of what the hon. member who has just sat down has said, perhaps the minister will enlighten me on one point before this item passes. In April, 1957, when the Prime Minister was speaking about accelerating immigration, he laid down as a desirable yardstick 4 per cent per year of the population, which at that date would have meant 640,000 immigrants per year, although the population is now higher. Is that still the yardstick for the government?

Mrs. Fairclough: As I said in my opening statement, we think, very much in common with some members of the opposition, that Canada should bring in immigrants according to the absorptive capacity of our country. I do not think you can set any percentage figure at all. I have not the Prime Minister's remarks on that occasion before me, and I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition has them—

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I have.

Mrs. Fairclough: —but if my memory serves me well he was talking in general terms over a long range period, and relating it to prognostications of population which I believe were gleaned from one of the royal commission reports. This is just my memory of the matter, and I should not really comment when I am so vague as to the origin, but I can assure the Leader of the Opposition it was not a specific statement having regard to each and every year taken in the long run.

Mr. Pearson: My memory has been reinforced by an account of the Prime Minister's speech which I have before me from the Globe and Mail, Toronto, April 27, 1957. There was no doubt the Prime Minister was relating our experience to that of Australia. He said Australian experience over the years had shown them they could absorb 4 per cent per year and Canada could do so also; that that was a good yardstick. I take it from the minister that this 4 per cent has now gone the way of the 15 per cent.

Mr. Badanai: My honourable and distinguished friend from Bonavista-Twillingate has, I am afraid, covered the subject on which I had intended to speak. However, there is a situation which I should like to draw to the attention of the minister based upon the statement the hon. lady made in her opening remarks on June 9, as reported in Hansard of that date at page 4711. I quote:

> A new policy governing temporary residents of Canada was announced in August, 1958 which made it possible to regularize the status of several thousands of persons who had previously entered the country on a non-immigrant basis.

This statement of policy seems to be in contradiction to the experience of a young woman who came to Canada on a visitor's visa and who, while she was here, met an eligible bachelor, a fine young man, who fell in love with her and proposed marriage. The first intimation I had of this romance came to me in a letter from Rev. L. Mulder, pastor of the Christian Reformed church, which I shall read for the information of the committee. It is addressed to me:

> One of our eligible bachelors in our congregation has a problem, and after hearing about it I promised to write you about it.
> Four months ago a girl came from Holland on a visitor's visa to visit relatives in the lakehead. She realized that she could not make the decision to stay here if she wanted to. Bachelor began to see the girl and they now have firm plans to get married next spring. The boy is about 30, the girl 25 years of age. They went to the immigration here to ask permission for the girl to stay here. No sir, law was law. Even if they were going to get married next spring—

This, by the way, was last August.

> —the girl first has to make the journey back to Holland and then immigrate properly. This involves extra money for nothing the couple argues, but to no avail, the immigration does not budge. Is there any appeal possible as far as you know, or is it better not to make any fuss and make a round trip to Holland?
> Could you please let us know the best plan of campaign?
> The young gent is not yet a Canadian citizen; does that make any difference?

I immediately took up this matter with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. She in turn asked her private secretary to look into the matter. In due course I received a reply, which I am going to read; it is addressed to me:

This is with reference to Miss Hoey's letter of September 9, 1959, concerning Miss Antje Bolt of Holland who desires to remain in Canada permanently.

According to a report received from the immigration officials in Fort William, this young lady entered Canada as a visitor on April 1, 1959. She has made inquiries regarding the possibility of being allowed to remain in Canada and the Fort William officials have explained the situation to her.

I would refer you to a statement made by my minister in the house on August 23, 1958, in connection with immigration procedure in dealing with non-immigrants. A person who applies at a visa office for temporary admission to Canada is required to sign a statement to the effect he understands he is being allowed to enter Canada on a temporary basis only and will effect departure from Canada on or before the expiration of the period of authorized temporary stay. He further signifies that he will not apply to remain in Canada permanently and that he understands failure to leave voluntarily in accordance with the undertaking renders him liable to deportation. May I point out that Miss Bolt signed the non-immigrant undertaking at the visa office in The Hague prior to coming to Canada.

It is the policy of this department to discourage non-immigrants who arrive in this country after August 31, 1958, from applying for landing. As a consequence it is, therefore, not possible to take favourable action on behalf of Miss Bolt. I can only suggest that on her return to Holland a formal application for her admission be filed by her fiance at the Fort William office or she make application on her own at The Hague office.

I realize that this advice comes as a disappointment to the parties concerned but I am sure you will understand the department would not be justified, in fairness to other cases, in making an exception in this particular instance.

That is where the matter ended. I deplore very much indeed this lack of appreciation for love and romance on the part of some members of the department who should have given special consideration to this case at once, particularly as the department is presided over by a charming lady such as we have in the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Leaving the spirit of romance aside, the very principle enunciated by the minister in the statement which I read a minute ago, if it is a statement which has any validity at all, should certainly have applied to this girl.

I should like a statement from the minister with regard to this particular case and similar cases, of which there must be a considerable number in the country. It appears to me that when a couple meet in Canada and one of the parties concerned is only here on a temporary basis, he or she should be considered for permanent admission. They should be allowed to get married and have children and populate the country, which would be far more desirable in the long run; that is, to have many children to populate the country as we want it to be populated.

The minister has already indicated that amendments to the act will not be forthcoming during this session. I do not fully agree with all the statements made by my distinguished colleague, the former minister of citizenship and immigration, though I have great respect for his good judgment. There are also certain aspects of the statements which were made by the late Mr. Mackenzie King about which I have some reservations. I would not wish to enter into that matter now, because I am waiting for the government to bring in the amendments to the Immigration Act. That will be the appropriate time for me and others to enter into a discussion of what will be best for Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I want to set the hon. member's mind at rest. I can assure him that the course of true love is constantly being smoothed for a great many couples by this department. I do not know the extension of stay; perhaps it was for a year or more. We usually have young people say they intend to marry and they give a specific period of time, say three or four months or something like that. We extend the visit to take care of that intention, and then if the young couple marry we of course would not separate husband and wife. We would certainly land the new spouse. But that is not always the case. Many young people say they have fallen in love and intend to marry, but then when landed they decide the love was not quite as true as they thought. I recall one case in which one man managed to bring in seven or eight different fiancees, until the department finally decided that this was scarcely a true indication of his intentions.

I can assure the hon. member that although all these cases have to be viewed on an individual basis, we do what we can to assist them. I do not know what the final outcome of this particular case was, whether or not the young lady went back to Holland. If she had given a definite or even an approximate date which had not been too far in the future, and had asked for an extension, she certainly would have been given an extension of her visitor's visa.

Mr. Badanai: Will the minister allow me one question? Has there been a case of a couple marrying prior to asking permission to remain, and have they received that permission?

Mrs. Fairclough: The young lady would have to undergo health examinations, of course. This opens up a field with very broad ramifications. We do not separate families. Even if she had not complied strictly with the immigration regulations we would have advised her as to how she should conduct herself in order to remain in Canada with her husband.

Mr. Pearson: In other words, what is required is to prove your matrimonial intentions.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have three or four questions I should like to ask at once, and then the minister could answer them all. I do not intend to make any more speeches, but I should like to bring to the minister's attention a case that has interested me. I do not like to enter into a discussion of individual cases, and unless the minister wants me to I will not mention the name in this file. I know the minister has received many representations with respect to this case. The only ground on which the case was turned down was that the person being applied for was a half sister instead of a full sister of the person applying. I do not know what the legal advisers of the department would say about whether a half sister is a sister within the meaning of the regulations.

I know what I would have done with this case if it had not been within the regulations. I would have submitted it to the governor in council for approval on the basis of the facts I have. I admit that it is not always possible to have all the facts in these cases. There may be some other reason that has not been given. On the face of it, and based on such information as I have available to me, this person was otherwise eligible except for this particular circumstance. The person had come here as a visitor, as people sometimes do from countries behind the iron curtain because it is easier to come as a visitor than as a immigrant, and subsequently wished to change status. This happened after that regrettable administrative decision of 1958.

I think the minister made an awful mistake when she said earlier, especially in my hearing, that because I categorically objected only once to that statement of policy in 1958 there was very little opposition to it. If I have to repeat my objections one hundred times in order to convince the minister that I am utterly opposed to it I shall attempt to do so, but I hope she will take it that I have repeated my objection a hundred times.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, I am convinced.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that regulation which forces people who are already in this country to go home and then apply—the people being otherwise eligible—is stupid and inhuman and should not be carried on one day longer. If I can make my views on that subject any more emphatic I should like to do so. I think that in marginal cases like the one I am referring to now, of a half sister, if that is the only objection it should not be considered an objection at all in sponsored cases.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is not, either, Mr. Chairman. We have made no difference at all between half sisters and sisters. If the person were otherwise admissible the fact that she was a half sister would not bar her from entry to the country. If she has been refused entry I should think there would have been other circumstances.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not intend to go over the file here in the committee, because in my opinion that would be an abuse. I will let the minister have another look at it privately.

Mrs. Fairclough: We definitely do let in half sisters the same as sisters.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have another question to pursue. I asked the Prime Minister one day just at the time the Prime Minister of Japan was here whether there had been any discussion about a revival of the gentleman's agreement, or any change in the conditions of admission of would-be Japanese immigrants. The minister perhaps saw or had drawn to her attention a letter written by the Japanese ambassador which appeared in the New Canadian of February 6, 1960. I referred to that in the house at the time. The Japanese ambassador said in his letter:

> During the recent visit to Ottawa of Prime Minister Kishi, the question of immigration was discussed with Canadian government leaders.

In dealing with the matter in the house the Prime Minister stated, as reported at page 258 of Hansard of January 25, 1960:

> I speak from memory but I do not think there was any consideration given or any discussion of that subject.

I should point out that I was being much more specific on that occasion. I referred then to the pre-war agreement. We also know there was some talk about admitting some Japanese to the province of Saskatchewan to aid in the establishment of an industry there. If there is anything new at all about immigration from Japan I think the minister should tell us about it.

The hon. lady should also tell us whether there have been any developments with respect to the admission of immigrants from the British West Indies. The minister will recall that I said on one or two occasions, both when I was minister and since, that it would have been my intention, had I remained in the government, to recommend to my colleagues the establishment of a regime for the British West Indies similar to that which exists in respect to India, Pakistan and Ceylon; namely, to establish some kind of quota by agreement with the federation.

I did not think that was practical before the federation was founded. As a matter of fact I had a secret aspiration to go there as a representative of the Canadian government on the occasion the federation was established, but it was another minister of citizenship and immigration who went instead. I would have hoped that this visit would melt the heart of the hon. lady and make her realize that an improved regime should be introduced which would meet this peculiarly difficult situation. It is a difficult situation, and I do not pretend it is not.

I wish also to make a request of the government concerning the residual health and welfare care of refugees who are privately sponsored. I still think that if in this world refugee year we are to play a part at all commensurate with the capacity of this country, the present serious difficulty should be overcome and could be overcome by the government at very little cost to the Canadian taxpayers.

There is one other matter I do want to bring to the minister's attention. The minister may know something about the Canadian-British education committee. I do not know whether she does. If she does not, I do know that some of her officials know something about it. This is an organization which exists in London for the purpose of promoting the attendance at Canadian universities of school boys, matriculants, from the schools of the United Kingdom. It is not an immigration scheme at all; but it does seem to me that it might well be worth the while of the government to look into this scheme and see whether the residual value of assisting this committee in its activities might not be productive of a very good kind of immigrant who is otherwise very hard to get. I do not want to take up the time of the committee. I just wanted to mention it so there would be a reference to it in Hansard and I should be glad to show the correspondence to the minister.

Mrs. Fairclough: I thank the hon. member for his suggestions. I do not know precisely what the reason is but, of course, we do not have an immigration office in Japan; also, we do not have a great many applications for entry. In 1959, 191 Japanese came into Canada. That is not a very great number; it is the highest of any year since the war. It has been creeping up. The years 1957, 1958 and 1959 are all pretty much on a par, and in 1957 there was an increase, and the number was nearly double what it had been the year before; there were 178 in 1957; 188 in 1958; and 191 in 1959. When we have requests for special cases, of course, we do our best to co-operate. The Saskatchewan situation is an example.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has anything been done about it?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes; it is being worked on. Arrangements are being carried forward through the department with respect to whatever establishment is required to set up the industry described. I do not think I can go farther than that because I cannot give details.

With regard to the West Indies there is, of course, a quota but not on the same basis as that for India, Pakistan and Ceylon. It is a quota of domestics and the quota was established, as the hon. member knows, after consultation with the government of the West Indies, based largely on the capacity of the West Indies government to train those domestics. Prior to federation two or three of the islands had quotas allotted to them. After federation representations were made by the West Indies minister responsible for an increase in the number and the number was increased by 50, so that at the present time there are 250 from the West Indies proper and 30 from British Guiana. My understanding is that this is pretty much all they can train in a year. They might squeeze in a few more. These people go to training schools and come here supposedly as properly trained domestics, having regard to the work which they will be required to do while in Canada.

However, in addition to those domestics who come forward, there are a certain number of specially qualified persons who come in simply because they have qualifications which are of value to Canada. These would include in some instances students who had come up here to pursue higher education and who, upon completion of their education, would apply to remain because they would have no difficulty whatsoever in securing employment. In fact, sometimes employment is offered to them because of their particular qualities and capabilities. Some of those people come in and then, of course, any person who is in the country may apply for his or her relatives, and some of those come in, with the result that over the last two years approximately 1,200 people have come in from the British West Indies. There again the number has grown over the years, and those two years are the highest of any years. I think this is a general explanation.

Mr. Pearson: May I say just a word about this. I understand that the West Indies situation represents a quota within a quota, a quota in numbers which is qualified by limitation to a certain occupation, namely domestic service, and that the governments of the West Indies take responsibility for the training and certifying as to the training of those who come here?

Mrs. Fairclough: That is correct.

Mr. Pearson: The Canadian government authorities take no responsibility for that. When they come here I take it they are supposed to be engaged in domestic service. Does the department have any record as to how long they stay in domestic service, how many of them leave domestic service, and if they do leave domestic service, is there any intervention on the part of the authorities to try to persuade them to go back to the occupation which they undertook to follow when they came into the country?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, Mr. Chairman; we do not follow them up unless they come back to us and ask for employment; unless their employment terminates we would not have any record of them. We do not follow any of the immigrants once they are in the country. In so far as their placements is concernd, we turn them over to the national employment service and placement is made through that service.

Mr. Herridge: I have just one question on this item. Can the minister inform the committee what percentage of the loans which were given to assist passages is uncollected, and if there is any difficulty in collecting from any particular group? I have been informed by the officials that they are behind in some cases.

Mrs. Fairclough: I can get that information for the hon. member. Since the scheme first went into operation on February 1, 1951, there have been 75,559 loans for a total of $19,127,558, of which $15 million odd has been collected. This does not indicate that the remainder are all delinquents. Repayments are being made all the time. I can find out for the hon. member what the amount is that we consider to be bad debts. I presume that is what he wants to know.

Mr. Herridge: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: I will get that information.

Mr. Dumas: Can the minister tell the committee whether the Canadian immigration centre on St. Antoine street in Montreal has been closed? If it has been closed, were the employees there integrated into some other department?

Mrs. Fairclough: This was discussed in the house some time ago, Mr. Chairman. The hall was closed. It was an unsatisfactory place and there had been a great many complaints about it. Finally, it was closed. We tried to place the employees wherever we could. Some of them, very few of them, did not want to be placed. Some of them were transferred to Quebec. Those who did not wish to go to Quebec—we consulted with the national employment service—in some instances we had them transferred to other departments of government. I do not know whether I can give the hon. member the exact number. Nine of them were re-assigned either in this department or in two other departments; two of them retired and the rest of them were taken care of either in Quebec or in some other employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just before the item carries I should like to say to the minister that I think it would be a good idea if the government would give consideration to establishing a quota for the West Indies without an occupational limitation. The occupational limitation was only established very reluctantly by the previous government in the first place. I can speak about this because I do not think there was anything I did as minister that I did more reluctantly. It was done not because anyone in Canada was asking for it but because of representations received in the first instance from the government of Jamaica. I am not suggesting any large scale immigration. I do not think the West Indian community in Canada or anyone else really wants to see mass immigration. I do think that if we could have a quota such as the Indian quota—I do not mean in numbers because I have no suggestion as to numbers—which would include any kind of occupation and did not impose an occupational limitation it would be more consonant with the dignity of the new federation and would make for better relations.

Mrs. Fairclough: I cannot speak from statistics at the moment but my impression is that a reasonable number come in now under the situation as I have described it. I know that persons who come to me and complain about the lack of immigration from the West Indies are always amazed when I tell them how many have actually come to Canada. I remember having one gentleman in my office about six months ago who complained very bitterly and said that he thought there should be a quota, as the hon. member has said, over and above the domestic quota. I said, "How many do you think should be allowed to come in from the West Indies in any one year"? He said, "Oh, I would think possibly 500 in addition to the domestic quota". I said, "That would be 750". He said, "Yes". I said, "Well, 1,200 came in". He was amazed. He said, "That is not true; that could not possibly be true". I said, "It is true". I had great difficulty in convincing him that was a fact. I think there is a great deal of misinformation abroad. People do not realize that there is actually not a large but a very steady flow. There might be something to be said for some different arrangement, but I can assure the hon. member that we are watching this situation all the time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should not like any misunderstanding to arise. I would not suggest for one minute that there should be a quota as a substitute for close relative sponsorship. I regard close relative sponsorship as the best means of immigration there is, and I think that our experience since the war has shown us that it is. But it did seem to me that in addition a small quota that was not restricted as to occupation might perhaps be symbolic in the same way as the Indian, Pakistan and Ceylon quotas if the government of the West Indies wanted it. Of course, if they do not want it it would serve no purpose whatever.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is a very interesting point because generally speaking I do not like quotas.

Mr. Pickersgill: Nor do I.

Mrs. Fairclough: In the case of Ceylon and Pakistan they have not taken up their quotas at any time although they exist. In the case of India we made arrangements a year ago that each quota number would apply to a family unit instead of to an individual, which eased matters considerably in that regard. The quota was also split 50-50, I believe, between open placements and relatives. As a result of making relatives or family units half of the quota instead of an individual quota I think the situation is in fair shape there. If we did the same thing for the West Indies I would think that in the long run we would probably wind up with just about what we have today.

Mr. Pickersgill: That could well be. I am not pressing this unduly. I though it might remove a sense of grievance. I should like to say this right now to the hon. lady so that there will be no misunderstanding. If there is any suggestion by the government of Japan that they would like to have the pre-war gentlemen's agreement revived I would hope the government would welcome that suggestion.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, there are difficulties with respect to quotas and, as the minister knows, in principle it is certainly not the best way to deal with immigration. As I recall, the value of the quota as applied to Pakistan, India and Ceylon was not so much in the number that came under the quota but that it removed a feeling of discrimination which had existed before because it put Canadians going into those countries on the same basis as nationals of those countries coming into Canada. So they no longer had a feeling of discrimination. If the same principle could be applied to the federation of the West Indies, and if the government there felt that there was a kind of discrimination against them, it might be useful from that point of view.

Item agreed to.

505. Administration of the Immigration Act—further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. lady would tell us why she needs more money when immigration is going down.

Mrs. Fairclough: Increasing costs arising mostly from increases in salaries.

Item agreed to.

52. Field and inspectional service, abroad, $2,150,979.

Mr. Peters: What is the situation in Hong Kong with relation to departmental employees and those hired on a casual basis?

Mrs. Fairclough: As I announced in the house some time ago, the head of our inspection services visited Hong Kong and brought back several recommendations, some of which have already been put into effect. They are purely administrative. He will, of course, be inspecting operations in all countries but he made this special trip because of the complaints which had been received.

Item agreed to.

53. Trans-oceanic and inland transportation and other assistance for immigrants and settlers, subject to the approval of treasury board, including care en route and while awaiting employment; and payments to the provinces pursuant to agreements entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, in respect of expenses incurred by the provinces for indigent immigrants, $2,100,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. lady figures up to the latest available date as to the amount paid out by way of assistance to immigrants and the number of persons who have benefited therefrom? I do not mean family assistance.

Mrs. Fairclough: You mean welfare assistance?

Mr. Pickersgill: Welfare assistance.

Mrs. Fairclough: In 1959-60 the amount for food and shelter was $92,196.35, about one tenth of the amount for 1958-59 which was $986,000 odd. In 1957-58 the amount was $5,732,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: But in that year it included transportation as well.

Mrs. Fairclough: That could be.

Mr. Pickersgill: It included transportation of the Hungarians.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is probably quite right. Is the hon. member interested in family assistance?

Mr. Pickersgill: Family assistance is just family allowances under another name.

Mrs. Fairclough: I cannot give the hon. member the total number of persons assisted because it varies from month to month. In 1959 the minimum number was 251 in November and the maximum number was 1,282 in January. That gives a general picture.

Mr. Pickersgill: That included dependants as well?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. lady say whether very many of the Hungarian refugees are now receiving assistance from the department?

Mrs. Fairclough: I think I can say no to that. These reports were coming in regularly but of late the figures have dwindled to the point where it was scarcely worth reporting any more. I do not have a specific report on the matter. If the hon. member is interested I can secure the information.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to have it put on the record at some stage because, speaking personally, I take great pride in the fact that we brought to this country—the present government continued what we started—37,000 of these Hungarian refugees who had nothing but the clothes on their backs and practically all of them have established themselves in this country and are earning their own living today.

Mrs. Fairclough: This is really just an amplification of what I said. In January, 1959, which is a year and a half ago, there were 349 Hungarian refugees receiving assistance. My officials tell me that since that time the number has dwindled to such a point that we no longer keep track of them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very glad to hear that.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Vote No. 54?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it was understood that we would go back to vote 47, Mr. Chairman.

Citizenship—

47. Citizenship registration branch, $716,892.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the hon. lady if she has a statement she would like to make on this branch.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have a few short remarks. During the calendar year 1959 the number of applications for Canadian citizenship were lower than for the preceding year. The number of persons acquiring Canadian citizenship dropped from 84,000 in 1958 to 71,000 in 1959. There was a similar drop in the number of Canadian citizens who applied for certificates of proof of citizenship. This number dropped from 49,000 in 1958 to 44,000 in 1959. During the year 1959 one new Canadian citizenship court was established in Hamilton, Ontario. In the current calendar year, one new court of Canadian citizenship, located at London, Ontario, has already been opened and additional courts of Canadian citizenship will be opened in Winnipeg, Edmonton, Vancouver and we hope in Moncton, New Brunswick. These new courts will bring to eight the total number of citizenship courts in operation.

I might add that while I know a good many of the county court judges who handled these applications in the past have been wonderful court judges and have taken a great interest in the applicants, I still feel that a uniform system is desirable. I hope that the day will come when most of our applicants for Canadian citizenship will go through our own departmental courts and not be forced to make their applications in courts which are primarily set up for the purpose of dealing with criminal and civil cases.

Mr. Pickersgill: In so far as the courts are concerned, I must say that I cannot forbear doing a little boasting. I was responsible for the establishment of the first two courts in Toronto and Montreal. I took a great deal of satisfaction from the fact that these courts cost the taxpayers nothing. I think not only do they cost the taxpayers nothing but they provide such an infinitely better—I use the word "infinitely" almost in its correct etymological sense—service, a service so much better that there was no comparison. I would be interested in knowing something about the economics of the two new courts, perhaps the Hamilton one is the only one upon which the minister would have statistics. Is the Hamilton court costing the taxpayers something or is it paying for itself?

Mrs. Fairclough: It was only started last year, so has just had about six months operation. However, even so, it reported a net revenue of $2,280.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the hon. lady give the comparative costs of the courts in Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal?

Mrs. Fairclough: I could, but not in its entirety because the Hamilton court has not been operating for a full year. I really do not have a proper comparison.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps all we need would be the numbers of the staffs of these courts?

Mrs. Fairclough: The staff at Montreal is 12; in Toronto, it is 15; and in Hamilton it is 5.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to take a minute or two to mention a couple of things. In the first place, I wonder if the minister thinks that the decline in the number of applicants is something that can be explained by a decline five years earlier—I would have to do a little arithmetic myself to see whether it would be—in the number of immigrants that year? I am wondering if it is following some pattern or if there is some other reason why the number has fallen off. I would be interested also in knowing whether there has been any improvement in the number of applications from British subjects for citizenship. I think the experience of the department was that the number was not as large in relation to other applicants, perhaps because they felt citizenship did not confer quite as great an advantage upon them as it did upon others. Some of us were rather disappointed that the number was not larger.

I would be interested to know also if the minister can tell us something about what promotional activities the department is carrying on with a view to urging people to make their applications promptly, and to bring before them the advantages of citizenship. Having listened to the hon. member for Fort William speak the last time the estimates were before the committee concerning the requirement of a knowledge of the English or French languages, I would say that on the first occasion when the citizenship act may again be before parliament for some reason—I would not go so far as to say we ought to make a special amendment for this purpose only—some clarification of the language should be made to indicate that some discretion should be shown by judges in connection with this matter. I was asked five years ago by someone in the committee on estimates what I thought would be an adequate knowledge of the English or French languages in the case of an applicant. I said if the applicant were someone who was employed, particularly if he was employed driving a motor car, I thought he ought to be able to read and speak pretty well. On the other hand, if the applicant was a housewife who had several young children to bring up and very little time for much association with other people in the community or an older person who would not be in the employment stream, I thought if they could say "God Save the Queen"—maybe it was the king then—I would regard that as a fairly adequate knowledge.

I think it is desirable that citizens generally know the languages of the country. Some of the members of the treasury benches, knowing something of the difficulty even of learning one of the languages of their own country and also some of the advantages of doing so, would perhaps be more sympathetic now than they might have been at an earlier time toward some of these applicants. It seems to me some of these judges have been unduly conscientious, if I might perhaps use that word, about this requirement. Perhaps we should seek the next time the act is amended to do something to make that point clear. I agree completely with the hon. member for Fort William, who brought this matter before us the other day, that the last thing we want to do is to deny the mothers of families who have brought up good Canadian citizens many of them born in this country, citizenship simply because they have not had the time or the facility to learn to speak one of the official languages as well as the judges of the county courts speak it. I do want very warmly indeed to second what was so ably said the other day by the hon. member for Fort William.

Mrs. Fairclough: As the hon. member knows we have a much better chance of making these suggestions to the presidents of our courts under the department than to the judges who, after all, are all-powerful in their own particular courts. While the minister might have some discretion if a case is approved by a judge, she has none whatever if the case is turned down by a judge. So so far as that is concerned I have no control over it, but I do think that as these courts are set up the situation will be improved.

I also think that through the advent of television more and more people will acquire a reasonable working knowledge of one of our two languages in Canada than possibly they did heretofore, because it is much easier to follow the television where action is joined with words than to follow radio where they only hear the sound. I think television is a great teacher for new people coming in.

I cannot give the hon. member any figures for 1959, but those persons from commonwealth countries who applied for citizenship in 1957 numbered 8,650. This had increased to 10,235 in 1958 and I would think there is a similar increase for 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: Notwithstanding the general decline.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes. We have been promoting this. There is a new poster which is displayed in post offices and other public places in all parts of Canada which urges people to apply for citizenship. It particularly draws attention to the fact that British subjects should apply for Canadian citizenship. We have advertisements in the ethnic press, and generally speaking promotion is going on all the time. Our liaison officers in various parts of the country also do their part.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just parenthetically may I say to the hon. lady that I do not think advertisements in the ethnic press would draw many British subjects to them.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, I did not relate them to British subjects. I meant that that was one of our promotional activities.

Item agreed to.

48. Citizenship branch, $785,159.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. lady anything to say about this vote?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, I have. For the past two years the citizenship branch has been taking advantage of a reduced immigration flow to shift its attention from the more immediate problems of reception to those of social adjustment. More particularly this year efforts have been concentrated on language instruction and on integration at the neighbourhood level.

In the field of language classes, intensified liaison and promotional work with school authorities and throughout the immigrant population kept the national enrolment at close to 50,000, only slightly below previous levels. Teaching costs and free textbook distribution for beginners went down by less than 3.5 per cent. At the same time greater attention than ever was being paid to meeting special needs such as continued instruction throughout the summer, day courses for housewives, shift workers and hospital patients, and crash programs for immigrants awaiting placement. A gratifying measure of co-operation was secured from educational authorities in these fields throughout the vast majority of metropolitan centres. Finally, in addition to assisting in the conduct of a five regional week-end course for teachers of immigrants, the branch has been able to organize, with the co-operation of all provinces having a substantial immigrant population, a national six-week summer course for teachers at Toronto. The purpose of this training is to build up a core of skilful teachers and supervisors which would ensure that the teaching of English or French to immigrants is conducted by the most efficient methods.

At the neighbourhood level the branch has redoubled its efforts to bring about early acceptance and integration of newcomers. With the help of a special film produced in several languages a national program with home and school and parent-teacher associations was initiated to interpret the educational problems of immigrant children to Canadians and to encourage immigrant participation in community action. Significant progress was also made in drawing immigrants into the membership of community centres, scouts and guides, women's institutes, credit unions, junior chambers of commerce, and in securing immigrant representation on boards of community agencies. At the same time the branch has encouraged and assisted local radio, television or press representatives in the production of feature series on the lives and contributions of immigrants.

Throughout world refugee year the liaison officers of the branch have contributed their services to the organization and activities of committees, both at the national and local levels.

In March, 1960 the citizenship branch completed a long awaited revision of several monographs of ethnic groups published under the title of "Notes on the Canadian family tree". This publication is now on sale at the Queen's printer.

A growing emphasis has been placed by the branch on the fostering of sound community attitudes among the younger generation. Last year the branch promoted an increased number of leadership training courses for young adults from various religious, racial and ethnic backgrounds. It continued to encourage wider community participation in observances of brotherhood and citizenship weeks. Furthermore, considerably more attention is being paid this year to the organization of appropriate festivities for Dominion day in various Canadian centres, and I might say notably here in Ottawa. The branch has also been very closely associated with advance plans for Canada's centenary both among voluntary organizations and at the government level.

Mr. Peters: I just want to ask while we are on the citizenship branch, if we are still issuing citizenship cards like those available after the war and, if so, how many people got those cards and whether they are used to any extent for travelling, and that sort of thing?

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the hon. member mean the miniature certificate? This program was started in 1954, and to date 143,815 miniature certificates have been issued.

Mr. Peters: Can the minister tell us what the cost is and how you would go about getting these certificates.

Mrs. Fairclough: Any of our courts will supply an application form. The applicant is required to have the form completed and two passport type photographs sent along with it. The fee is $2.

Mr. Pickersgill: Do these certificates pay for themselves?

Ms. Fairclough: I am sure they do in human satisfaction.

Mr. Pickersgill: I find that mine which was signed by myself was very useful, but I wondered if the $2 covered the cost. I would think it did quite adequately, but I do not know whether the department has any statistics.

Mrs. Fairclough: I hesitate to mention this. I do not want to be accused of making a great profit, but I understand that in 1954 the cost was 49 cents. Now, of course, it will be a little more than that, but I can assure the hon. member that they still pay for themselves.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very pleased to hear that because I certainly think they are worth the $2 which they cost. I never go out without mine and I have found it very useful on a good many occasions and I know a lot of other people who have too.

I just wanted to make one or two general observations with respect to the citizenship branch. I think the time has come when the minister should give very serious consideration to the amalgamation of the citizenship registration branch and the citizenship branch. It seems to me that with the establishment more generally across Canada of citizenship courts there could be a very much closer co-ordination, although I know there is a good deal of co-ordination already, there would be a more thorough focusing of attention upon immigrants and would-be citizens if the two branches were combined.

I do not say that should be done immediately, but I do think that very serious thought should be given, as far as possible, to reducing overhead and head office expenses and that sort of expense. In many cases I think it would be found that the functions of the two branches are so closely connected that there might well be, perhaps at a time when some changes in personnel are to be made anyway, consideration given to amalgamation.

I should also like to say a word or two about the publications of the citizenship branch. If I say anything which seems to be a little critical it would be very easy for the minister to say, "Why didn't you do something about it when you were there?" I suggested to the minister last year, and I think she has taken my advice to some limited extent, that we ought to put a value on many of these publications of a more general character. I am not referring so much to those specifically directed to the language instruction of immigrants because I am heartily in favour of that as long as it is done efficiently. But I do think that if perhaps some of these other publications were put to the acid test of price we might find we could make some savings to the treasury which I am sure would be welcome to the Minister of Finance and to the taxpayers. I know that of the total cost of the government of Canada the amount spent on the citizenship branch is small, but that applies to a great many other departments, and unless we apply economies wherever we can the cost of government will keep growing and growing.

I feel about a lot of government publications that if there were any way of getting them stopped it would be a wonderful thing, at least for members of parliament, and when it gets to the point that you have to spend much of your time every day moving them from one side of your desk to the other and, if one is conscientious, thinking you should be reading these things, one begins to wonder whether there is not some way of saving not only the taxpayers money but all the energy and the time of many other people in the country.

I do not intend to say anything about any of the publications specifically, but I do think this is one area where a good deal of thought might be given to co-ordination and amalgamation as a goal, and not too distant a goal either, in order to bring about a reduction in cost.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am pleased to hear the hon. member speak in that vein because I feel much the same myself. As a matter of fact this year we have cut our appropriation from $53,725 to $21,600 and the number of publications we are putting out this year has been reduced. Some of the more popular ones will have to be reprinted; ones which I am sure the hon. gentleman would think very useful. Nevertheless, this year we are only reprinting ten publications.

Mr. Howard: I should just like to pose one question to the minister. This is something to which critical reference has been made from time to time, and perhaps some action is afoot to correct it, or perhaps it has been corrected already. I make reference to the variation in approach used by various judges in dealing with applications for citizenship.

From my limited knowledge I understand that one judge may be strict, for argument sake, in his manner of questioning of applicants and in the type of questions and the degree of proficiency with which he wants those questions answered, compared with another judge who might be, for argument sake, more lenient. In fact the situation has been established, in some cases, where some areas of a province or some provinces become known as easy places for a person to pass the test of citizenship in so far as the questions asked are concerned compared with another country or another place in the province.

I wonder what consideration has been given to attempting to develop some unified approach that judges would follow in asking questions of applicants for citizenship in order that there can be a fairly uniform approach to this question across the country rather than having it vary from province to province or from county to county within the same province.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think I have discussed that point with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when I was speaking. We really do not have any control over county court judges. That is one of the main reasons we would like to set up our own courts, because then we could suggest uniform procedures. I agree with the hon. member that it would be definitely advisable to have uniform procedures wherever they could be obtained.

Mr. Howard: I must apologize for not being here when this matter was being discussed earlier. However, it is not a question of attempting to control the county court judges and suggesting to them that they must ask certain questions or things of that nature. This arises out of a discussion I had with Judge Schultz in the county of Prince Rupert. He is a judge appointed during the last couple of years and he, as well as the citizenship council in Prince Rupert, believe that perhaps the proper procedure might be to have a list of types of questions which judges might use to advantage in obtaining information so as to ensure a greater degree of uniformity across the country.

Mrs. Fairclough: We had some such scheme for a while, but it was not very popular with the judges.

Item agreed to.

Indian affairs branch—

54. Administration, $703,460.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the minister wishes to make a statement.

Mrs. Fairclough: On this first item of Indian affairs I think it would be appropriate for me to tell the committee something about the trip I made through western Canada last summer when it was my fortunate experience to come into personal touch with a considerable cross-section of our Indian population. I travelled some ten thousand miles, meeting Indians from 53 bands representative of over 220 reserves. From Island Lake in Manitoba to the coast of British Columbia I visited Indian families in their homes, discussed problems with band chiefs and councillors and saw the people at work in their many and varied occupations. Everywhere my attention was drawn to Indian schools, houses, community halls and other facilities on reserves.

Throughout the country I found a common interest by Indians in improved housing, advancement in education, community development and economic prosperity. Band chiefs and councillors are as one in their willingness to participate more fully in the administration of band affairs. From all bands I experienced a forthright, friendly reception which is characteristic of the human warmth of our Indian people. With these attributes they are going forward rapidly in their successful adjustment to the Canadian social and economic environment. It is indeed a privilege to work with them.

As already mentioned, Indian band councils are taking an increasing interest in the administration of band affairs. Approximately two thirds of all bands are now under the elective system and I am pleased to note that during the fiscal year just ended a number of Indian women were successful candidates in band elections, bringing to a total of six the number of Indian women holding the office of chief and 73 as councillors, 10 of whom were elected under the tribal custom.

The 1960-61 main estimates for Indian affairs show an increase of $3,581,296 over 1959-60. The major portion of this increase is attributable to two basic important fields, namely education and welfare.

I feel that too much emphasis cannot be placed on our educational program, for it is only through the processes of education that we can enable our Indian people, on their own initiative and resources, to advance to higher economic and social levels. To further emphasize this point I would state that of the total appropriation for Indian affairs, 59.8 per cent will be used for educational purposes.

Again this year there has been a very marked increase in the number of Indian pupils receiving an education. For the 1959-60 fiscal year the figures show a total enrolment of 40,637 pupils of whom 9,479 are enrolled at non-Indian schools, universities, teachers' colleges and commercial and trade schools. This latter figure represents an increase of nearly 1,300 over last year. Particularly encouraging is the increase in the number of students enrolled at the university level which has now reached 58 including those enrolled in grade 13.

In recent years a program of organizing education committees composed of Indian band members was introduced to deal with school matters on the reserves. It is hoped that these will become embryonic school boards and in this way give to the Indian people an element of control and direction in the field of education which should be of vital concern to them. I am pleased to report that the number of these committees now stands at 19, an increase of 6 over the previous fiscal year.

Each year there has been an interest expressed in the scholarship program of the department and during the 1959-60 fiscal year 17 scholarship awards were made to outstanding Indian students. This represents an expenditure of $14,375 for this purpose.

It is proposed to construct during the fiscal year 118 classrooms together with other necessary construction and including 74 staff residences at an estimated total cost of $7,362,500 which includes all necessary equipment, and provision has been made for substantial contributions toward construction of provincial schools which would enable the joint education of Indian and non-Indian children. Both the Indian day and residential school programs have been maintained at the same level.

There has been a steady development of adult education programs designed primarily to attack the problem of illiteracy which is to be found on many of the reserves. During the 1958-59 fiscal year this program served 857 students but the numbers have increased for the 1959-60 year. The returns show a total enrolment of 1,223 with the greatest numbers enrolled in literacy and homemaking courses.

During the last fiscal year a record total of 1,465 houses were built on Indian reserves and in Indian communities across Canada and another 228 units were started. This is a larger number of houses than has been built in any previous year. The achievement is particularly noteworthy since standards have been steadily improved and the costs of material and labour have continued to increase. These houses were financed from the $2 million in public funds in the 1959-60 estimates and the contribution from the Indians themselves in the form of labour, cash, materials, band funds and V.L.A. grants. I should like to pay particular tribute to the increased measure of responsibility being assumed by individual Indians and band councils who, through their co-operation and participation, have made this achievement possible.

It is proposed to maintain the same rate of expenditure for Indian housing in 1960-61. There will be increased emphasis on better standards of construction, improved sanitary facilities and adequate community planning. Every effort will be made to encourage greater participation of the prospective Indian home owner in the planning, financing and construction of his house. Special attention will be given to the needs of Indians in northern and remote areas in order to bring housing in such Indian communities up to an acceptable standard as soon as possible.

It will be noted that there is an increase in operating costs for welfare of $1,375,313. When presenting the estimates for 1959-60 I mentioned the introduction of revised methods and improved standards of relief administration on behalf of Indians. It is a pleasure to report that these methods and the new rates which went into effect April 1, 1959 have proved to be generally satisfactory. Indians, on the whole, have responded splendidly to the responsibility which the management of this income placed in their hands under the new procedures. They have fully justified our confidence in their ability to do so. Indigent members of 20 per cent of the bands in Canada now receive relief assistance in cash and it is planned to extend this practice to additional bands this year.

I should like to make it clear that the scales of assistance established are for food only. In addition, assistance is granted, as necessary, in individual cases for such purposes as fuel, clothing, necessary household equipment and shelter. I should like to stress that the assistance granted is subject to a means test.

It is an important objective of my department to make it possible for Indians to have access to the same sources of assistance in time of need as other persons in the province in which they live. I announced to the house on April 8 last that the federal government is prepared to negotiate agreements with the governments of the various provinces for the extension of the normal provincial services to persons residing on Indian reserves. The purpose is to avoid the development of exclusive welfare services on reserves which would tend to set Indians apart from other Canadians and would duplicate existing provincial programs in adjacent non-Indian communities. I said that in negotiating these agreements the federal government is prepared to pay a reasonable share of the cost of the benefits over and above the federal contribution under existing federal-provincial agreements such as the Unemployment Assistance Act. In addition, this government is prepared to share with provinces reasonable costs of additional staff and of administration required. In cases where provincial welfare programs are normally administered by municipalities, my department will be prepared to negotiate agreements which will enable bands to fulfil the same functions and discharge the same responsibilities.

I also announced on April 8 that in future my department will undertake to provide essential welfare services on behalf of certain categories of non-Indians on reserves. The principal concern is for women of Indian origin who have lost Indian status through enfranchisement or marriage but who have no alternative but to return to friends and relatives on the reserves. The decision to implement this policy was based on humanitarian considerations. Essential assistance to these people when in need can now be provided in the same manner and to the same extent as for persons of Indian status on the reserves in similar circumstances.

Last year I informed you of the establishment of a new division, one of the prime functions of which is to promote the employment of Indians. Placement officers are now functioning in the eight administrative regions. From the inception of the placement program in April, 1957 approximately 500 individuals have been established in permanent employment and 4,000 in rural and seasonal occupations. Almost half of these placements were made during the fiscal year just ended.

One hundred revolving fund loans in the total amount of $109,209.78 were approved during the last fiscal year to assist Indians to become established. While a higher proportion of this amount was used to develop the agriculture industry, the department also supplied repayable advances to enable Indians to purchase seed, farming equipment and other supplies. A number of foundation livestock herds were made available to Indians in the prairie provinces. The increase in the item for equipment and supplies will make possible the continuation and further expansion of this program.

In continuation of the accelerated forestry inventory program initiated two years ago in British Columbia arrangements have been made with the forestry branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to carry out forest surveys on all forested Indian reserves east of the Rockies, beginning in 1961. This project will include a re-survey of reserves in northern Ontario carried out by the forestry branch during the period 1949 to 1952.

It is also planned to continue the forest inventory of reserves in British Columbia this coming season. This project, under the supervision of a firm of forest consultants, has so far produced survey reports covering approximately one half the forested acreage. During this past winter a forest survey on the Restigouche Indian reserve in Quebec was also carried out by a forest consultant firm.

The services of the forestry branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and provincial forestry departments are utilized to a wide extent. The over-all policy is to bring under forest management as much of the timbered area of Indian reserves as possible with a view, where possible, to placing reserve forestry on a perpetual yield basis.

The Indian Act provides for the transfer to bands of control over revenue fund expenditures. Some progress has been made in this direction. Three bands in the southern Ontario region have taken over such control, and one band in British Columbia has agreed to assume similar responsibility. Others are giving serious consideration to the matter. The taking over of responsibility for management and control of revenue fund expenditures has been proposed to several additional band councils, but it will be appreciated that this is a matter that cannot be pressed unduly. The desire for greater responsibility and control over their own affairs must in the final analysis emanate from the Indian community itself.

Meanwhile, improved administrative services for Indians residing in more remote areas is occupying the attention of my department. For example, at the start of this fiscal year a new administrative region was established to service Indians in the Northwest Territories. This is to be known as the district of Mackenzie region with headquarters at Fort Smith. This step has been taken to provide better supervision over the affairs of the Indian population in the Northwest Territories. Under the district of Mackenzie region an additional agency will come into operation at Fort Simpson.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make any extended general references in reply to the statement that the hon. lady has just made. I recognize that in view of the fact there is a joint committee of the two houses sitting discussing the Indian Act and Indian matters generally there is perhaps not the same need here in this committee at this particular session for extended observations which might be repetitious. Since the government has insisted on so many committees sitting at once during the session I have found it impossible to attend the Indian affairs committee without staying away from another committee where I have a more urgent responsibility. I would not like to inflict upon other hon. members a repetition of matters that may have been rather thoroughly discussed there.

I must say, as I have said on previous occasions when the minister's estimates were before the committee, that I find it much easier to agree with the minister's general approach to the Indian affairs branch of the department than I do to agree with her general approach to the problems of immigration. The minister, it seems to me, is following precisely along the lines that were established by my predecessor and hers, Mr. Harris, who really with the new Indian Act and with the new administration which accompanied it did make a very great advance in this field over what had been done before.

We all know it was one of those regrettable incidents of the second world war that the Indian affairs branch, and some other branches of the civil government did get somewhat neglected—and I do not think anybody was really to blame for this except the urgency of meeting the demands for manpower that did seem to most of us, rightly or wrongly, to be the more urgent task at that time.

However, I do want to reiterate in the most emphatic language I can the view which I hold and which I think, judging from an earlier debate in this session—you do not need to worry, Mr. Chairman; I am not going to seek to traverse that subject—seemed to be the general view of the house, namely the idea that the goal of our policy should be voluntary integration of Indians just as rapidly as that can be accomplished. I do not think there should be any compulsion whatever put upon them. I think that has to be made abundantly clear because, rightly or wrongly—I am afraid sometimes rightly—a lot of Indians have the feeling that what we mean by integration is neglect, and this is certainly not what I mean. What I mean by integration is that I should like to see the Canadian citizenship of Indians become so much a matter of pride that that would be what they would be most proud of, without, of course, neglecting in any way that appropriate pride of ancestry, that proper pride in their individual characteristics and in their traditions, many of which traditions we would not, I think, find it unprofitable to follow.

Integration is not possible without encouraging in the Indians a sense of self-reliance. It seems to me that in order to get that sense of self-reliance that is going to be essential if the Indians are to feel they do not have to regard their reserves and certain other special privileges as a kind of crutch in life, it must be based on a feeling of genuine equality. This means that they must have available to them equal opportunities and if we are going to be fair to them at all I would say a little better than equal opportunities for education. It also means that they must have more than just education. They must have an increased capacity and an increased desire instilled in them to manage their own affairs and also to share in managing the affairs of the community in which they live. Therefore, I am very glad indeed to hear the minister say that this business—one could wish it were something else but it is one of those inescapable necessities at the present time—of giving to the Indians a greater responsibility for the distribution of relief, paying relief in cash instead of in kind, is one step in the right direction.

Any kind of step that can be taken to give band councils more responsibility and more capacity to look after their own affairs and to establish a less paternalistic approach to the whole matter is, in my view, highly desirable. The other thing we have to recognize increasingly is that because of modern sanitation, because of better housing for which we are all very grateful, the relatively high birth rate among the Indian population in Canada is resulting in a rapid increase in the Indian population, which means that every year there must be available to the Indians substantially more jobs, or more economic opportunities of one kind and another than there were in the previous year if they are simply to maintain their existing standard of living and not even to increase it. We cannot be satisfied if they alone maintain their existing standard of living. Certainly most of these economic opportunities and most of these jobs are not going to be found on the reserves. This is why it seems to me that next to education the most important thing in the Indian affairs department is the conscious development of economic opportunities, the encouragement of the Indians to accept employment and the encouragement of employers to accept Indians, which is just as important.

I want to say again, as I think I have said every year, that during the time I was minister I had the benefit, which I am told the minister has not got for many reasons, of the services in this field of Mr. Mel Jack who in my view had the right conception of this matter and the right attitude to it, the attitude that we must not be too paternalistic, that we must encourage the Indians to plunge in and take these jobs and must encourage employers to make these opportunities available and treat the Indians like their other employees, show them consideration but also expect them to pull their weight. All these things which were started at that time have proved to be a surprising success.

I remember the difficulties we had at first in getting farmers in Alberta to consider having the Indians help them with their sugar beets. I understand that the farmers now almost come on hands and knees to the minister. I remember the first discussions I had with some representatives of the mining community in northern Ontario who wanted me to facilitate a search for miners in Europe. I asked them why they should go to Europe when right on their own doorstep they had these original Canadians who needed jobs. They thought I was being very ridiculous.

Mr. Thrasher: Did you say that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I said that and I was supported by Mr. Mel Jack who followed up the matter. As a matter of fact, we did persuade some of these people to accept Indians and they were astonished at their success. Of course, some of the Indians did not succeed but some immigrants do not succeed and some other native-born Canadians do not succeed. There is nothing unique about a failure, but in one or two of these cases there was in the beginning something that was close to being unique about success.

I believe that these two things, education and normal employment in the integrated Canadian society, are the road and the only road to the creation of a healthy, respectable and prideful relationship between the Indians and the other citizens of Canada. I am afraid it will not be true no matter what efforts are made but nevertheless I hope that some of the younger members of the house will live long enough to see the day when the minister's office of superintendent general of Indian affairs is no longer needed, when we will no longer need an Indian affairs branch and when no distinction of any kind will be made between Indians and other Canadians.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, in rising to make a few remarks on this item may I say that I hope the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was not including himself among those who might not live long enough to see the discontinuance of the office of superintendent general of Indian affairs. I should like to see that happy event occur with the greatest possible speed, not that I want to see the present minister, as long as she remains minister, partially unemployed but because I think that this is the most advantageous result to which we can look forward. The one branch of the government with which I have perhaps had more contact and more correspondence than any other is the Indian affairs branch. I sometimes wonder whether the director, Colonel Jones, does not get a bit fed up with hearing from me, and I should like to express publicly to Colonel Jones and the other officials of the Indian affairs branch in its various divisions my appreciation of their kindness, the speed with which they have answered all my queries and the consideration they have given to any problems I have brought to their attention. I am sure that any other hon. members who have had occasion to discuss matters with officials of the branch will wish to express the same appreciation.

I should also like to express my appreciation to the minister for having established a new agency at Terrace which is located in the community from which I come. This will be of great assistance in the departmental administration of the affairs of the Indian bands now in the Terrace agency and which before were some considerable distance from the agency under which they were placed. I am sure the new agency will assist immeasurably in dealing with the problems of the Indian people in the bands concerned. In addition, other Indian agencies will have less administrative work to do with respect to these bands.

The minister referred to the institution of the practice of making welfare payments by cash or cheque rather than in kind. She indicated that this had been instituted in some agencies and that during the coming year the intention is to expand the making of welfare payments by cheque. I have had some communication with the department about this matter and I should like to see the practice extended as soon as possible, especially with respect to the Babine agency whose headquarters are at Hazelton, also in my constituency. It may be that steps are already underway to institute the making of welfare payments by cheque in this agency.

The reason I should like to see it done there as soon as possible is that the Indian people who come under the Babine agency are in close touch with and speak the same language as many of those coming under the Skeena river agency and the Terrace agency. They follow the same line of work, fishing, and at this time of the year or a little earlier they congregate in Prince Rupert and other coastal points. I understand that the system of payment by cheque is in effect in both the Terrace and Skeena river agencies and this causes some conflict because the Indian people of the Babine agency meet their relatives and friends, find that they are receiving welfare payments by cheque and want to know why this is not so in the Babine agency. I would appreciate it if this could be speeded up as much as possible.

The minister and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate also made reference to educational facilities and opportunities for our Indian people. To me this is also a most important aspect of the work of the Indian affairs branch. I am pleased to se the continuing increase in the amount of the appropriation for educational purposes and opportunities. In the past not only the Indians but other people have been denied the opportunity to obtain an education or have been restricted to a certain degree of education. To my mind this is an important factor in the advancement of our native Indians and in assisting them to become integrated and to advance to the position where they will be in the same class and on the same footing as those who are not Indians.

The minister made some reference to surveying reserves for timber purposes and this is a commendable approach. With respect to the sale of reserve lands, I should like to emphasize that everything possible should be done, having regard to the circumstances, to see that generally the policy of the department is to discourage the sale of Indian reserve land as much as possible and to concentrate, if possible, on leases or rental arrangements. We have seen an instance or two in which the sale of reserve lands or part of the reserve lands has not been of any long term economic or other advantage to the Indians themselves. I think, perhaps, if the policy were one of not encouraging the sale of reserve lands it would be most beneficial in the long run to the Indian people themselves and to society as a whole.

In so far as the Indian affairs committee is concerned I, like the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, sit on two other committees, the meetings of which coincide in point of time with the meetings of the Indian affairs committee. I have found it difficult at times to be in boths places at once and, therefore, have had to miss some of the proceedings of the Indian affairs committee, which is regrettable. However, I believe all members of the committee who have attended the meetings have been impressed by the calibre of the Indians who have appeared before that committee, by the clarity with which they have expressed themselves, the manner in which their briefs were prepared and presented, and the understanding that they have had of the points and problems which they have presented. As I have said, this impressed me greatly, as I am sure it impressed other members of the committee.

One of the things which I believe we must attempt to develop, and this has been emphasized on a number of occasions by a number of people—this is not an original thought of mine—is the need to develop in Canada the highest possible degree of mutual understanding and respect. Probably the emphasis should be placed on that phase of mutual understanding and respect that is necessary on the part of non-Indian people generally, because there are many non-Indian people in Canada who because of geographic factors or economic factors do not come into contact with the Indian people. Consequently they have a very scanty understanding, if any, of the way of life of Indian people or their problems. The more that we can bring the non-Indian people to understand, respect and appreciate the cultural background, history and heritage of our Indian people, the better opportunity there will be in the future for the Indian people to play a greater role in our society as well as contributing to their own welfare and their own well-being.

Perhaps as a part of this program we should participate as much as possible in teaching the Indian children themselves as much as we know of the history of their own people so that they, too, can understand and appreciate their own cultural heritage, their own cultural background. I know from talking to Indian people living in villages which are relatively isolated that their knowledge of their background, their history, was greater than that of Indian people who have been in close contact with society or with non-Indians because they have been close to urban areas and their contact with their own people has been less than in the other case. There is a tendency for these children to forget or to lack any understanding of their own people and their own background. Perhaps this could also be a contributing factor to the development of that mutual respect and understanding of each other that is so necessary, and in conjunction with the educational approach perhaps could result in progress for our Indian people toward self-sufficiency and toward regarding themselves less as an inferior race and more as a proud race.

There has been some reference to the question of enfranchisement, which is another factor connected with this whole problem. I certainly congratulate the minister on her approach to this question. I believe that we should, without hesitation and without any qualms, eliminate the compulsory section of the Indian Act which deals with enfranchisement. I refer to the section of the act under which an Indian or a band can be enfranchised compulsorily whether or not they want it. I think this section should be removed from the act. I do not believe there is much purpose in retaining the other enfranchisement section. This is a recent thought that I have developed after listening to the presentations made to the committee and as a result of discussions I have had outside the committee. I know that there will be problems arising from the complete elimination of any reference in the act to enfranchisement. This does not necessarily have the connotation which we normally attach to the word "enfranchisement", which means the Indian is no longer an Indian within the meaning of the act; is no longer a member of the band; has no longer a right on the reserve and is in the same class as non-Indian people.

I believe that Indians should have complete freedom to live upon the reserve or to leave that reserve, to come and go as they please, a freedom which they have at the moment and which many Indians exercise. I know a number of them, and some of them are in very responsible positions in society. Some of them are still members of the band, although they have not been on the reserve for many years. They still retain that connection, and some of them live many hundreds of miles from their home reserve. This situation can exist at the moment.

The enfranchisement section, as I understand it, was designed to be an attraction to Indians to leave the reserve and become non-Indians, in effect, in so far as the legal definition under the Indian Act is concerned. Some of the Indians have taken advantage of this section, have become enfranchised for a variety of reasons, but these reasons I feel are gradually diminishing. The more we progress toward the removal of the restrictive sections of the Indian Act, the more we move toward equality of status, the less reason there is for the enfranchisement section. I know there will be complications here in so far as band funds are concerned, and whether the Indian will have the opportunity of taking with him his per capita share from those band funds. However, I do not believe the difficulty is insurmountable. There are various ways of overcoming it.

I think this is the understanding of the Indians that we want to have, and an appreciation of the fact they have a vested interest in this country, more so than I have or other non-Indians have. We should recognize this fact and say to the Indian that he can continue to live on the reserve if he so desires or he can leave it, but it is not necessary for him to give up entirely his Indian status and thus cut himself off completely from ever returning to the reserve or to his Indian status. If you remove the enfranchisement sections from the act, as I say, this problem can be overcome.

So far as local control is concerned this too will be a contributing factor in the integration process. I draw attention especially to the word "integration" because it has been given the connotation that the Indian must become one of us and forget all about the fact that he is an Indian. I do not mean that by the word integration. I mean that in order to add to the respect of the Indian himself and in order to add to the mutual respect and understanding which we should have for each other, and in order that he may overcome what inferiority complex may have been developed in him through the activities of non-Indians, we should to a very large measure as quickly as possible and as much as possible give to the Indian and the band councils the right to run their own affairs. I think the minister said that there were three bands in southern Ontario and one in British Columbia, but in any event there were four bands in Canada who now have control over their own band funds without any authority from the minister to administer them. This is working in the direction of local control and of self-sufficiency, self-development and self-operation of their own affairs. I think this should be expanded as quickly as possible.

I know that errors will be made, and that is understandable. There is not a municipal council in existence in Canada that has not made an error at some time or other about the disposition of its revenue. I do not think there has ever been a government of Canada that in some way or another has not made some error in the administration of moneys which it collects or spends, or any provincial government either, for that matter. I know that I have made a number of mistakes in the manner in which I spend my money, and I do not seem to learn from them either. But the more we give the bands the administration of their own affairs and the making of their own bylaws on the reserve and the right to expend their own moneys, the more we will be asking them to learn and the quicker will they be able to develop those abilities to reach a higher status in society.

I should like to make one other reference to those sections of the Indian Act which deal with the liquor question. I believe it was at the last session when another hon. gentleman held the position you now hold Mr. Chairman, that I got into some difficulties when making reference to some individuals in society who had provided liquor for some Indians, but I do not intend to get into that field today although it is still a valid point. The provisions in the Indian Act relating to liquor for Indians are such that the initiative rests with the provincial governments and it is initially up to the provincial governments to decide on the liquor question with regard to Indians and decide to what extent Indians may be in posession of liquor within the province.

Perhaps I can relate this briefly. The first of these approaches is for the provincial government by proclamation to declare that an Indian can consume liquor in licensed premises only. That is the only place he can have a drink. He cannot buy liquor in a liquor store or a wine store, or whatever it is, in a particular province and take it home. He cannot come into my house and have a drink with me because that would be illegal; it is within the province.

The second step, which is again by proclamation, is that the Indian can be in possession of liquor within the province but not on the reserve. This would allow an Indian to be able to consume liquor in a licensed premises such as a beer parlour or cocktail bar and would also give him the right to come into my home at my invitation and have a drink with me. It would also give him the right to buy liquor at a liquor store and transport it to his place of residence if it was not on a reserve, but he could not take it on the reserve.

The final and complete authority is that he be allowed to have liquor on the reserve if the majority of the band members vote by plebiscite or referendum to have it on that particular reserve.

In various parts of Canada there are differents degrees of availability to Indians of liquor, and I would like to deal with one which exists in British Columbia because I think it is rather an asinine one. It has operated there ever since 1951 or 1952 when the provincial government proclaimed that the Indian had the right to consume liquor in licensed premises, and that is as far as he could go. He cannot have it on the reserve or have it in his possession anywhere in the province; he can only go into a beer parlour or into a cocktail bar, buy a drink and drink it there. This has been the law for a number of years.

However, the attorney general of British Columbia, Attorney General Bonner, has said it is entirely up to the Indians whether they want liquor or not, that it has nothing to do with his government. I submit that Attorney General Bonner is just passing the buck and refusing to deal with the question, or he does not know what he is talking about and has not paid any attention to the Indian Act or the liquor act of British Columbia. It is at this stage entirely within the jurisdiction of the Indian act of British Columbia to proclaim the next step of his being in possession within the province.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did he ever attempt to discuss this matter with the premier of British Columbia?

Mr. Howard: I have tried on a number of occasions to discuss many matters with the premier of British Columbia and I have had the same degree of success as did the Minister of Finance. It just is not possible to discuss anything with Premier Bennett.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought that would be the answer.

Mr. Howard: In fact I have written him letters about a number of things, I have still not had a reply, and the last letters were written four or five years ago.

An hon. Member: They must have got lost.

Mr. Howard: That is not the Post Office Department's fault either because I know he did get the letters.

So that this is merely a buck passing game that Attorney General Bonner is engaged in in the province of British Columbia, or it indicates how inefficient he is. He should not be in that position if he does not know about the liquor act of British Columbia or about the Indian Act.

There is another even more ridiculous system which exists in British Columbia with respect to liquor and perhaps this system also exists in other provinces, but I do not know. Right now by proclamation of the province an Indian can consume liquor in a licensed premises. The Indian Act calls it "a public place". However, if an Indian who is a veteran belongs to the Canadian Legion which has a liquor licence, while he is allowed to consume liquor in a beer parlour he cannot go into the licensed premises of the Canadian Legion. That shows you how ridiculous these things are.

I raised this matter with Colonel McGugan, chairman of the liquor control board of British Columbia and with the minister, and I had correspondence with them and with the Canadian Legion about it, but it remains a fact. This again is an overstrict and perhaps foolish interpretation given by the provincial government authorities. Let hon. members imagine, if they can, an Indian who is a veteran having the right to go into a public place to consume liquor and yet not having the right to go into his own Canadian Legion to which he belongs and which, perhaps, he helped to build and to finance. We can see how foolish is the application of our liquor laws to our Indian native people.

As far as these liquor laws are concerned, I think Indians should have the same rights, privileges and responsibilities as everybody else. I can never forget the conclusive argument used by Mr. Frank Calder, C.C.F. M.L.A. in British Columbia when dealing with people who do not want Indians to have liquor. Frank used to say: yes, it is true. The Indian, when he becomes drunk, becomes obnoxious; he wobbles all over the place; he cannot control his emotions, uses unkind language, wants to fight; in fact, he is almost as bad as a drunken white man. This, I think, sums it up. There is not too much difference between one and the other.

If we could arrange that Indians should have the same rights and the same responsibilities with regard to liquor as do other citizens of Canada we would be taking another step on the road to equality and eventually we might come to the point mentioned by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when we would no longer have to address the hon. lady in her capacity as superintendent general of Indian affairs.

Mr. Wratten: I should like to draw to the attention of the minister a problem which I brought up in 1958 when the present Minister of Justice was acting minister of citizenship and immigration. This has to do with the administration of justice on the Six Nations reserve which is adjacent to the city of Brantford which I represent.

Before anyone becomes excited about this item of justice being dealt with by the federal government, I want to emphasize the fact that the Territorial Lands Act made the Six Nations reserve a part of the county of Brant for everything but municipal purposes. That is the reason we get no taxes whatsoever from the township of Tuscarora to help toward the cost of the administration of justice in the county of Brant. Both the city of Brantford and the county of Brant have to pay the full cost of maintaining magistrates courts, county courts and supreme court hearings if cases come up on the reserve.

I made quite a statement in 1958, and after that was given some publicity in the newspapers and brought to the attention of the provincial government they did come through with a grant of $1 per capita up to $3,500 to help toward these costs. One of the problems I brought out at that time was the fact that in the period I was talking about there was $3,390 paid in fees in the magistrate's court. Of this, $2,200 went to the dominion government and $689 went back to the Six Nations reserve on account of the classification of cases that came before the court. It seems a point of irony that the federal government, which does not contribute one cent toward these costs, should get the biggest share of the fines taken in this magistrate's court. I have just a short statement of some of the costs and how it works out. In the county and the city for this last year it worked out at $1.79 per capita. That is the net direct charge for the administration of justice, shared by the county and the city in 1959.

Also we have quite a problem in trying to find out how many people there actually are on the reserve. If you talk to some officials they say there are perhaps 3,500, but other officials, who like to feel they have a somewhat bigger job than some people appreciate, claim there are 6,000. This makes quite a difference in the grants we get from the Ontario government and it makes a big difference to the cost of administering justice in the county and magistrate's courts.

The city and the county are both responsible for the maintenance of juveniles committed to training schools from their respective municipalities, and included in the administration of justice figure above is a charge for one boy and one girl who are not band Indians. The cost was charged to the county of Brant and shared by the city and the county—it amounted to $501.30. There are also the juvenile and family courts. The net direct charge for these and for the probation office in 1959 was $5,469, shared by the city and the county. The people of Tuscarora and the Six Nations reserve use this court and it is available to them just as it is to the people of the city and the county. In addition, the court house supplies heating, maintenance and other features which are necessary for the sittings of these juvenile and family courts.

There is another problem. You will remember that last year when we had the uprising down on the reserve—quite a turnout that was down there—a number of young chaps were arrested and brought into court. But through the intervention of some individuals the cases were dismissed. However, the costs of the crown attorney who prosecuted in these cases have not been picked up for payment by anybody and therefore they went back to the city and county for payment. I do not think it should be the responsibility of the city or the county to pay costs when cases are dismissed.

We have also to pay for the supreme court sittings with regard to any criminal cases that come from the reserve. Last year a resident of the reserve was arrested for murder and lodged in the county jail. She was not in her right mind. That meant we had to have matrons on 24-hour duty at all times. We also had, finally, to take her to St. Thomas where she had to be examined by doctors, and the extra cost over and above the direct charges such as maintenance while in jail, constables' attendance in court, the crown attorney's fees, sheriff's fees and sheriff's office expenses amounted to $3,113.

There is money available in the Six Nations fund. They assume they are wards of the federal government, and the federal government showed that they realized that this is part of their jurisdiction because not too long ago—some few years ago—they put the R.C.M.P. down there to police this reserve. So I think it is only fair and just that the federal government should make money available for the Six Nations Indians or the township of Tuscarora to pay their share of magistrate's court and county court costs to the city and to the county of Brant. This has been a problem we have had to put up with for a long number of years. I should like the minister to take note of the fact that we would like to have a fair share of the cost come from this reserve.

Another problem I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is that of fire protection on the reserve. Indeed there is no fire protection on the reserve at this time. Some day we are going to be faced with a serious fire on this reserve that will result in the death of children and grown-ups and because of the lack of fire protection there the cry will go out that the fire departments of the township of Brantford and Brantford city should have gone to the reserve and looked after the fire. The fire department of the city of Brantford has responded to calls on the reserve but it was not able to obtain an agreement with the council there to pay for these calls and so the service has been discontinued.

After the township established its volunteer fire brigade it responded to the first call on the reserve and was told it would be paid for it. Unfortunately the promise was not kept and the township has never been paid. Just recently another fire broke out on the reserve and a call for urgent assistance went out to the township fire department. The assurance was given that the township would be paid for the call. After the call was completed and the fire put out the township was informed by the reserve that there was no money available to pay for fire protection. The cost of the call amounted to over $300 in wages for the men and equipment. The township has now absolutely cut off the reserve from any more calls and thus the reserve is left without any fire protection whatever.

I feel it would be the better part of wisdom to have some kind of fire truck—a pumper, perhaps, even a used one obtained through war assets or something like that—put on the reserve to give the people there some protection. I know that the men on the reserve would be only too willing to man the engine. It would also give them a sense of pride in ownership in having a fire truck down there to look after their own fires.

I have been on the reserve several times. One bad feature of sending a fire truck to the reserve from the township of Brantford is that the bridge on the main road leading into reserve bears a sign indicating that the maximum load is eight tons. When a call comes through from the reserve we are asked to send down a fire truck costing $25,000, carrying several hundred gallons of water and weighing considerably over eight tons. If the bridge should collapse and the truck be destroyed the township would have to replace it because it seems impossible to obtain money from federal funds or through any other means for fire protection on the reserve.

I wish to speak now on behalf of the people on the reserve. They are in great need of a bridge across the Grand river at Onondaga. To get from the reserve to the eastern part of the city of Brantford or any point east of the city necessitates travelling through the downtown area of the city in order to get back to a point just across the river. A small part of the reserve is located across the river in the township of Onondaga. To travel from one part of the reserve to the other part across the river involves travelling several miles. I know the Indians have a certain amount of money for use in the construction and maintenance of roads and that sort of thing. The Ontario government contributes to the same extent it does to other municipalities in the province. They do not, however, have sufficient money in their annual road budget to provide a bridge over the river. I urge the minister and her officials to investigate the problem and to help the people on the reserve in this respect. I know anything that could be done would be greatly appreciated.

Before taking my seat I wish to emphasize again the first problem I raised. We would appreciate assistance from the federal government to meet the cost of the administration of justice in the city of Brantford.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if no other hon. member of the committee wants to speak in more general terms I should like to say something about a specific matter concerning which the minister will not be surprised to hear me make some observations. There has recently been a great deal of publicity in the press about the activities of a certain corporation which is called Dimensional Investments Limited which, according to the information I have, bought for the sum of $6,521,946 a considerable part of the Sarnia Indian reserve.

The first thing I want to say about this matter is that for a somewhat smaller part of this reserve—there was not very much difference in the area and it was somewhat similar if my information is correct and, if it is not, the minister will correct me because she will have the facts—I had virtually completed a sale which was approved by the band in 1957 for the sum of $7,902,000. The sale fell through because the purchasers were not in the final analysis able to put up the money.

I may say that I was very relieved when that sale fell through because in the period during which it was being negotiated I had very considerable doubts about whether it was a wise thing to sell this property at all. I discussed this on more than one occasion with the officials. I said, here is this very valuable property on the edge of one of the fastest growing industrial communities in Canada, a community which is growing very largely because of expenditures made by the federal government during the war and which gives every appearance of continuing to grow very rapidly far into the future because of the very modern industries located there, industries such as synthetics industries, petrochemical industries, ordinary chemical industries for that matter, and others. I could not get it out of my head all through this period that we should not sell this land at all, that it was too valuable to be sold and that it should remain indefinitely a trust for the Indian band who occupied it.

I made up my mind when the sale fell through that if I had any further responsibility in the matter—I was relieved of that responsibility not long after—I would not again consent to any of these sales regardless of the price, that the proper way to deal with these matters was to create a trust and enter into long term leases so that the Indians could maintain a continuing interest in what was originally theirs.

It is true that according to land values at that time the sum of nearly $8 million we were proposing to sell this for was a very good price indeed. If the Indian reserve had been ordinary property on which taxes had to be paid no doubt I would have agreed that it was a very sound business transaction. I am not questioning that at all. In retrospect I still think it was. But when we consider that Indian reserves are not liable to taxation and that it costs nothing to hold the property except any loss of revenue that there may be—the normal business considerations do not enter into these transactions in that particular respect; that is to say there is not the same overhead that has to be met in continuing to hold the land—I must say I am surprised that the present government should have been willing to agree to the sale of this land for approximately $1,400,000 less than the previous administration thought was a fair price for it.

I would question the transaction on that ground alone if there were no other circumstances connected with it; but the circumstances connected with this transaction, of which we do not know all yet, are such that one has even graver doubts, in the light of some of the other information that has been published and is uncontradicted. According to the best information I can get, the average price per acre paid for this land—the whole of this land that was sold to Dimensional from this reserve—was $2,093. This land was not all sold at exactly the same price per acre, and part of this land was resold to the Ontario Hydro almost before the ink was dry on the first contract for a price that works out to $6,944 an acre.

With respect to the part of the land that was taken by Hydro, the price received from Dimensional by the Indians was $2,000, so that by executing one contract and then reselling to an agency of the crown in Ontario this company made a profit of practically $5,000 an acre, which the Indians ought to have had if the land was worth that much. If that land was worth that much to the Hydro, a provident administration of the Indian affairs department would have got that much for it and they would not have sold it for less.

I am not saying it was worth that to Hydro at all; I am not saying that, because it is a matter that is not under the jurisdiction of this parliament and it is being discussed in another place before a royal commission, and I do not propose to argue for one minute about that. The Ontario Hydro may have paid three and a half times too much for this land, and the only defence the minister will have is to say that, because she sold it for $2,000 and promptly the Ontario Hydro paid $5,000 an acre more for it. That is two and a half times as much. So that either the minister sold it at a bargain or Ontario Hydro paid an extravagant price. We cannot get away from that.

The minister cannot plead, of course, that she did not know the Ontario Hydro wanted this land, or at least that her officials did not know that the Ontario Hydro wanted the land, because that is on the record. It is on the record that certain approaches were made by Ontario Hydro. The minister has made it very clear, if I remember correctly—and I am speaking here from memory, and if I am wrong the minister will correct me at once and I will make the correction—that the Ontario Hydro never came to her or to the department to have this land expropriated.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: It also has been published that they did approach the government, the Indian affairs branch at any rate, with a view to discussing the possibilities of its being acquired by negotiation. At least, that is what I have been informed and if I am wrong about that I think it ought to be denied right away.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, there is some element of truth in that but what I should like to point out is that it was not a decision of the department, it was a decision of the Indians themselves. They refused to sell this parcel of land to Hydro because it cut right through the centre of the block of land of which they wished to dispose. It took the very best part right from the centre; it depreciated the value of the other property around it, and they said no, they wanted to sell the whole block and, as my hon. friend knows, there is some land in that particular block that is not worth very much.

Mr. Pickersgill: Some of the land may not be worth very much for growing cherries. This land is in an area where all the land is worth a great deal because it is in a growing industrial area and it does not really matter much in a growing industrial area unless there is an Alp, and there are no Alps around Sarnia. It does not matter much whether it is good land or swamp land. With modern machinery you can soon fix that up; therefore, I am not very much impressed by that particular argument.

Whether the Indians were or were not willing to sell the land to Hydro I am not so sure; but if the Indians had been told that Hydro was willing to pay $7,000 an acre, when all they were going to get was $2,000 otherwise, they might have taken a very different view of it.

We also have had some very strange things taking place. I accept the word of the minister, and I accept her word on this point unreservedly and it is not just because I am required to do that by the rules of the house. The minister knows what I mean when I say I accept her word unreservedly because a responsible minister in the legislature of Ontario has categorically contradicted the minister. I have in front of me an extract from the Toronto Telegram of June 9, 1959, in which Mr. Macaulay is reported as saying and I will read his exact words:

> Hydro officials twice had been refused permission to expropriate by Colonel H. M. Jones, director of Indian affairs.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says "that is not true" and I say "I accept your word unreservedly". I want the plain implication of what she said to be understood. In other words, what she said is that what Mr. Macaulay said is not true. Let us not have any beating about the bush with respect to it. This was the Mr. Macaulay who was a responsible minister in another jurisdiction who authorized the payment of $7,000 an acre for this land that the minister had sold a few days before for $2,000 an acre.

Mr. Lennard: No, the Indians sold it.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the Indians did not sell it. No Indian land can be sold without the permission of the superintendent general.

Mr. Lennard: They agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman, if he wants to make one of his numerous speeches and contradict me, may do it.

Mr. Lennard: Not very often.

Mr. Pickersgill: The fact is that no Indian land can be sold without the permission of the superintendent general, and the superintendent general has an inescapable trust, an obligation as a trust to see that to the best of his or her judgment a provident sale from the point of view of the Indians is made.

No one can have any doubt that if land that the minister sold one day was bought a few days later by a crown agency in another jurisdiction for a profit of two and a half times the price that there is something pretty odd looking about the transaction. I say the minister may have got all it was worth and Hydro may have been grossly extravagant. I am not admitting that; I do not think the minister got all it was worth because I think this whole tract of land—in fact a slightly smaller tract—was worth $8 million. The minister sold it for $6,500,000. Therefore, I do not think, apart from the question of Hydro at all, that this was a provident transaction.

But I do say that in the light of the information I have now put on the record, information that is publicly on the record, this appears to have been a very improvident transaction. I say that the government and the minister, knowing that Hydro was interested in acquiring part of this property, should have explored to the full the implications of that and should have satisfied themselves before they sold this at a much lower price to someone else that in fact it was a wise thing to sell to anybody, and they should have found out what was the maximum price that Hydro would feel it necessary to pay for this land and let the Indians know that so that they would be in possession of all the facts before any sale was made. In the light of these facts which have not been contradicted anywhere it does seem to me that this was a very improvident transaction.

Then there are other features about which one or two questions have been asked recently. There is the question, for example, of the locatee to whom I referred in questions I asked on the orders of the day earlier this week. This locatee received options on two pieces of land for which he had location tickets. One of them contained a house which I think the minister said was worth $7,000. He received $12,000 for the whole property. The latest information I have is that the purchaser has had second thoughts about the matter, but until recently it was proposed that this man's house would be demolished if he had not removed it by the first of July. I am glad to learn that the purchaser has had second thoughts about that.

But this is another of the extraordinary features of this transaction that make it more difficult than ever to understand. When the minister interrupted me a few moments ago she said that one reason why the Indians did not want to sell this land to Hydro was that it would take a chunk of land out of the middle of the tract and make the remainder less valuable. That would be a lot more convincing if the minister had not agreed to a contract out of which the company can weasel if it wants to but under which it gets title to parts of the land as it pays.

It seems to me that that destroys the minister's argument that she could not sell part of the land without destroying the value of the rest because she has already given title to part of the land to this company. She has given them a patent which they in turn have transferred to someone else for one part of that land and before the whole tract is paid for.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think the hon. member should clarify that statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that this company is to pay $6½ million for the whole property and that they have not paid it all yet.

Mrs. Fairclough: No. Just to put the record straight, may I say that they have paid about 40 per cent of the whole purchase price and they have patents for 10 per cent. If the deal falls through tomorrow the Indians get 90 per cent of the land back and 40 per cent of the money.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why should they get patents on any until they have paid in full?

Mrs. Fairclough: That is the contract.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister's argument is sound that it had to be sold en bloc or that its value would be destroyed if any part of it was sold, I would say an agreement should not have been entered into to issue patents to any part of it until all of it was sold. I dare say the minister is going to say that I made the same kind of contract.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, the hon. member is saying that is my argument and it is not my argument; it is the Indians' argument.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister says this is the Indians' argument.

Mrs. Fairclough: I never made any such statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is quite right. I was quite unintentionally misrepresenting her and that is the last thing I want to do. But the minister, of course, has a responsibility which she cannot escape for permitting this sale to be made. If she thought, notwithstanding the views that the Indians had about it, that it was not a provident transaction she should not have made it. My argument is that on the face of the facts I have already alleged it is hard to see how anyone could possibly regard this as a provident transaction. I wish to make it very clear that I am not accusing the minister of anything except bad judgment. I think it was very bad judgment to be willing to sell for $6½ million in 1959 what a purchaser in 1957 was willing to pay $8 million for.

Mrs. Fairclough: He was not willing to pay it; in fact, he reneged on the deal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, and I might say that the proposed purchaser at that time appears to have been a rather more substantial person than this company with curious dimensions.

Mrs. Fairclough: He was certainly very cautious.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps with reason; perhaps he had something to be cautious about.

Mrs. Fairclough: He obviously had; he thought the price was too high.

Mr. Pickersgill: The more one reads in the press of the inquiry into this operation the more one wonders what "dimensions" there were, but again that is in another jurisdiction and not in ours. The minister has a perfect right, if she can make a good deal, to sell something to scoundrels. There is no law against selling something to scoundrels. I am not saying these people are scoundrels, but she can sell to anybody as long as she can get the money and I admit she is getting a substantial amount of money. There is every probability she will get all the money.

But I still say that if the Indians took the view that the land should not be parcelled up, if they took the view it had to be sold en bloc to get the full value for it, then it was an improvident thing to agree to give title to any part of it until the whole transaction was completed. It certainly has affected the particular locatee about whom I raised questions earlier this week. I do not attach undue importance to this very small part of the whole transaction but it is important. This locatee had two pieces of property and he has lost title to one of them without any assurance that he is going to get paid for the other. He has the hope but there is no assurance of any kind. He argues, I believe, that he should be paid the full amount for both tracts before being expected to vacate the property.

As I say, this is just one aspect of this very strange transaction. It does seem to me that when the minister replies, as I feel sure she wishes to do, she should tell us first of all why she came to the conclusion that this property should be sold at all. In view of the fact that there had been a decline of a million and a half in two years in what anyone was presumably willing to pay for this property, would it not have been wiser to wait a few years more in that growing industrial community of Sarnia to see whether someone might not offer a better price? After all, it was a time of recession when the minister was making this sale. She might have waited for that boom to come along about which the Minister of Finance was boasting last December and the price might have gone up to $10 million instead of merely $6½ million, to the great advantage of the Indians.

There does not seem to me to have been any very great urgency. It is not as though the Indian band at Sarnia was a collection of paupers. I have visited the reserve and most of these people are earning very good incomes. They are regularly employed and there was no urgent economic need to sell the land from the point of view of providing for the Indians. Therefore I think the minister should tell us why she was willing to take a cut in price of a million and a half to authorize this sale.

I think she should also tell us the whole story, everything the department knows with respect to its relations with Hydro in the greatest possible detail. She should tell us when they first came to see the department and what relations, so far as there is any record, the department or the Indians had with Hydro. She should tell us just how it was, knowing the great interest that Hydro professed to have in this matter, this property was sold without any effort being made to discover whether Hydro was promptly going to pay a great deal more for part of the land. In view of the intimate relations which exist between Her Majesty's present advisers and the government of Ontario it should not have been hard to find that out before this transaction was completed. I think we should be told the whole story. I think we should be told why it was that the minister was willing to authorize a contract which would grant title to bits and pieces of this land before the whole transaction was completed.

Now, this does suggest that it was a real estate operation. I believe there are other features of it that would suggest the same thing. It does seem to me that we are entitled to be told why there was any necessity for agreeing to give letters patent, that is title, to any part of this property until the purchase price had been paid for the whole of it, particularly in view of the fact that the Indians, as the minister herself has said, felt that the sale of parts of the land would destroy the value of the other parts that were not sold.

There is the risk, of course,—there is still a risk because the whole purchase price has not been paid—that part of the price may not be paid and that the whole transaction may not be completed. The minister said a few moments ago—I want to be completely accurate about this—that title had been given to only 10 per cent of the tract of land and that she had received, on behalf of the Indians, 40 per cent of the purchase price. It could happen that 90 per cent of the land would come back to the Indians and they would have 40 per cent of the price, according to the facts she has stated. This would not invalidate the fact that the sale of a small part, and this part sold to Hydro was a very small part, according to the Indians, might destroy a great deal of the value of the rest of the land.

If I could recapitulate very briefly these three points on which I think the minister should give us a very full explanation, I would ask why there was any hurry to sell for $6.5 million something which only two years earlier was said to be worth $8 million. Why not wait until the recession was over? Why not wait until values had appreciated a little more in the Sarnia area? There is no cost connected with holding this land, as I pointed out earlier. The position would not be the same as that of a private holder who would have to pay taxes and all sorts of other charges. This was Indian land and therefore it cost nothing to hold it. Why was there any hurry about this at all or any need to take a price so much less than a purchaser had been willing to pay and undoubtedly would have paid if there had not been some change in the economic climate?

Mrs. Fairclough: You have no substantiation for that statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have no substantiation for that statement, that is quite true. I cannot be quite sure. They were reasonably substantial people and they spent a lot of money before the transaction was on the verge of approval, so it is unlikely that these people would have done that if they had not had serious intentions. However, whether they had or not, it seemed to the previous administration that something like $8 million was a fair price for this property. If it was, then $6.5 million was certainly not a fair price for it.

The second point is, why was there not a complete investigation of what Hydro would have been willing to pay for this property before any sale was completed? The third question is, why was a contract made which permitted title to be given to bits and pieces of the property before the whole price was paid? Now, I think it is only fair to let the minister have a chance to reply to those questions.

Mrs. Fairclough: In the first place, the hon. member keeps harping back to this figure of $8 million which, so far as I am concerned, is a purely fictitious figure.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister does not mean that there was not a contract?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, I do not mean that. Perhaps I should say fictitious valuation because at no time was one cent of money deposited as a guarantee or as evidence of good faith. Then the company, after holding up proceedings for a considerable length of time, finally reneged and refused to pay the $8 million. They said, we are not interested; it is not worth that much money.

Now subsequent investigations proved that the $6.5 million was a very fair valuation. We had no less than three separate and distinct valuations of that property, and every one reported that $6.5 million was an excellent valuation. In fact I do not believe any of the valuations came within several hundred thousand dollars of the $6.5 million. Moreover, the property, within any reasonable or foreseeable time, would not enhance in value at all.

The hon. member has asked why we did not explore to the full the possibilities. We did explore to the full every possibility that presented itself. I have taken the position, and I shall continue to take the position, that the Indians are entitled to say what they want to do with their own land, provided they all agree about it. The majority voted in favour of this proposition. It was explained to them fully what they were up against. Hydro at no time made an offer to my department, so far as I know, and at no time did they make an offer to the Indians. They had no offer in dollars and cents; they made no overtures which indicated they were prepared to pay any specific sum of money for any specific parcel of land. I draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that the actual parcel of land comprised about 173 acres, and even had they paid $5,000 an acre, as a supposition—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what they had to pay, $6,944.

Mrs. Fairclough: All right; even supposing they had paid that, the Indians would have received $865,000. They now have $2¼ million.

Mr. Pickersgill: They would have had the rest of the land, too.

Mrs. Fairclough: All right; what they wanted was money. I think they have a right to say if they want to sell their property if the deal appears to be a good deal. I think they have a right to say what they want to do with their own land. The hon. member talks about vesting the Indians with more authority to handle their own affairs; that they should be encouraged to become educated and take their place in the business and industrial community. Then he turns around and, in a deal like this, says no, the Indian does not know enough to decide what he wants to do with his own land.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that, and the hon. lady should not misrepresent what I said. I said that the hon. lady had a responsibility, a sacred trust, which she could not escape by saying the Indians wanted to do something with this land.

Mrs. Fairclough: So far as I am concerned, I discharged my responsibility with proper judgment and in good faith. I am not ashamed of this deal. I think it is a good deal. I think the Indians are well protected, and I have no apologies to make for it.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, at the supper adjournment at six o'clock the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was drawing attention to the sale of a particular parcel of land and the minister in her reply misinterpreted, I think, what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was getting at; at least I got a different interpretation. The minister indicated that on the one hand the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was advocating a principle which I also advocated, that more control and authority should be given to Indians over their own decisions and activities; on the other hand he was asking for interference and control by the minister in some of the things which the Indians wanted to do, including in this instance the sale of the particular parcel of land.

As the act stands at the present time the minister, being a minister of the crown, in my opinion is the one person who should be administering Indian lands in trust for Indians, because land is held by the crown in trust for them. This also applied to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate when he was in the position the hon. lady is in at the moment.

Holding lands in trust indicates that that trust should be carefully looked after and the interests of the Indians protected in each instance. I am not going to get into a discussion with respect to the sale of this particular piece of land at Sarnia. However, I have had occasion to come across sales of land on Indian reserves in the past which would lead me to believe that perhaps the interests of the Indians have not been fully and properly protected, and perhaps in the initial instance this falls on the shoulders of the Indian protector or agent in explaining to band councils and to bands the effects which might accrue from the sale of any particular parcel of band land or land of a locatee.

I have had occasion to become interested in at least three particular sales which come to mind offhand over which difficulties have arisen after the sale had taken place, and this would indicate that the interests of the Indian had not been fully protected before the sale. If this continues it is leaving the impression with the Indian that perhaps he should not even consider selling any additional parcels of land because he would end up on the short side of things when the sale is over.

As an example, one individual, a locatee on the Hazelton reserve, about ten years ago or so sold some land or agreed to sell land of his to the local school board for the purpose of building a school. As I understand it, the money was paid promptly by the school board to the Indian affairs branch and it took this individual, Mr. Ben Mackenzie, some seven years from the time the land was sold to the school board and the school board paid the money to the Indian affairs branch until he received payment. This of course raised considerable doubt in his mind as to whether his interests had been properly looked after.

Another instance occurred on the same reserve with another sale of a piece of land, this time to the department of highways of the province of British Columbia, involving a number of locatees. When I was in the provincial legislature, which would be perhaps 1954 or thereabouts, speaking from memory, I saw a copy of a letter and a list comprising the names of individual members of that band, the amount of land that had been used for highway purposes and the value of that particular land. It went on month after month after month stretching into two or three years before these particular payments were cleared up, even although the money was transmitted from the department of highways of the province of British Columbia to the Indian affairs branch in very short order. In fact I do not know whether it has all been paid yet. Incidentally, this involved the difficulty of assessing or discovering who the locatees were or who the heirs of the locatees were. In any event there was a long period of delay before the individuals concerned received payment for their particular pieces of land which had been surrendered for the purposes of the provincial department of highways.

Another recent instance about which I have had some correspondence with the department involves the Kitasoo band who for a period of ten years had leased part of their reserve to Todd Brothers canneries so that a cannery could be established there where the Indians could work. Then about a year or so ago an undertaking was made to sell this particular piece of land to Todd Brothers rather than to lease it. I think in this instance the Indian superintendent or someone did not fully explain to the Indians what the consequences might be flowing from the sale of this particular piece of land to the cannery, for this is what the Indians discovered afterwards and they are now regretting that they undertook this particular sale. After the land had been sold outright, Todd Brothers closed up, and the canneries no longer exist. The Indians now find that they cannot work the land because they sold it. They cannot work in the canneries because they are shut down. And since they sold the land, they find they became subject to income tax while working for Todd Brothers, which was not the case before.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member unnecessarily, but does he have the dates of these transactions?

Mr. Howard: I am sorry, but I have not. Offhand I would say this was this year, or perhaps a year ago, or maybe two.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not recall ever signing any agreement to sell. I would be interested to have the details.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. lady would permit, perhaps some other hon. member may desire to take part in this discussion. If I may be excused, I think I can take this out of my files without too much difficulty and bring it back. I do not think there was an agreement of sale, but an arrangement to sell. I think I could get this out of my file so as to present it in a formal way to the minister with reference to the correspondence as well. That is all I have to say at this time. I will try to be back before the estimates pass.

Mr. Hellyer: Before the supper recess the minister said, if I understood her correctly, that had the Indians sold the land directly to the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario they would only have received $865,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not exactly right. I said, had they sold it, and had they got the top offer. So I think it is slightly hypothetical.

Mr. Hellyer: I think we should ask the minister for some explanation, because the price the hydro commission actually paid for 173 acres was approximately $1,200,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not $5,000 an acre which was the amount specified by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can clear that up. The figure was $6,944 an acre that the Hydro paid, and I said the figure the Indians got was about $2,000. The difference was $5,000 an acre. If you take it to be $7,000 an acre, my hon. friend's figure is about correct.

Mr. Hellyer: It is the difference between $815,000 and $1,200,000 and that is a rather sizeable sum even for ordinary people. I do not think it is picayune.

I was just reading from the file of an order made by this house for the production of copies of all communications including memoranda of telephone conversations since January 1, 1958 between Ontario Hydro or any of its officials and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or any of her officials regarding the acquisition by Ontario Hydro of land on the Sarnia Indian reserve.

There are a number of points about this correspondence and one in particular about which the minister can perhaps furnish an explanation. On December 5, 1958 there was a letter addressed to the chief and councillors of the Sarnia Indian reserve signed by Mr. C. F. S. Tidy for the director of property which refers to an appraisal for the sale of 30 acres of the Indian land to the hydro-electric commission. Throughout this whole correspondence, from the beginning to the end, there is no mention of any amount of land larger than 30 acres in this period until December 5, 1958. The next letter of December 16, advises that the band had withdrawn permission for the proposed purchase of this 30 acres by the Hydro-electric commission. There is no further correspondence between the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the government of Canada until June 5, 1959, and then there is the letter addressed to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, University avenue, Toronto, Ontario. It is signed by Mr. D. Vogt for W. C. Bethune, chief, reserves and trusts, and reads in part:

> Dear Sir:
> The attached letters patent have been issued to your commission at the request of Dimensional Investments Limited, with respect to 173.82 acres on the Sarnia Indian Reserve.

The obvious conclusion here is that sometime between the previous December and June 5, 1959 when these letters patent were issued, the Hydro decided that they had to have, not 30 acres, as they had been negotiating for for some period of time, but 173.82 acres. What has not been explained is why there should have been this increase in the amount of land desired, and we should of course be very interested to know if the minister had any advance notice that the requirements of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario had been suddenly magnified from a mere 30 acres to 173 acres. This afternoon the minister again told us, echoing, if I may say so, words used by Mr. Macauley in explaining this whole situation, that the lands which had been transferred to Ontario Hydro were among the best lands on the reserve, prime lands and that they were therefore entitled to a prime price.

Mrs. Fairclough: I object. I never said any such thing.

Mr. Hellyer: If you will check the record, Mr. Chairman, you will find that the hon. lady indicated this afternoon that these were preferred lands.

Mrs. Fairclough: I never said any such thing. I said they cut right across the reserve and interfered with the sale of other lands. I never said anything about their value.

Mr. Hellyer: They cut right across the reserve. I accept the hon. lady's interpretation. They were lands underneath the existing transmission wires, including rights of way already owned by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not my problem.

Mr. Hellyer: Of all the land, what could be less useful for industrial purposes? What could be less useful than land immediately under hydro transmission wires? This was the reason the hon. lady gave for not having obtained a higher price.

Mrs. Fairclough: It was not.

Mr. Hellyer: Selling off a parcel of this land, she said, would affect and depreciate the land which remains to the Indian band. In fact a very substantial proportion of these lands were under hydro transmission wires and, as I say, already owned by the hydro-electric power commission of the provincial government.

Mrs. Fairclough: In that case we got a good price.

Mr. Hellyer: The price you got was not very good. Dimensional Investment got a good price, I would say.

Mrs. Fairclough: We got a good price if the land was valueless, as you say.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister also told us that 40 per cent of the moneys have been received on this transaction and only 10 per cent of the land has been deeded; only 10 per cent has been released to the company, and yet half of this total money was that paid over by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario for which it got approximately 5 per cent of the total land.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is their problem.

Mr. Hellyer: One other point is the financial ability of this company to complete this transaction. In reply to a question in the house the other day the minister said that the proof of the pudding was in the eating.

Mrs. Fairclough: Who said that?

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. lady did.

Mrs. Fairclough: I never did.

Mr. Hellyer: I am paraphrasing.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I object. The hon. gentleman quotes me then when I object comes back and says he is paraphrasing me. Let the hon. member quote me precisely or not at all.

Mr. Hellyer: I will be very happy to do that in just a moment, Mr. Chairman, when we can locate the reference.

Mrs. Fairclough: When your secretary, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, locates it.

Mr. Hellyer: I object and I think rightly so that a minister of the crown would sell or would allow to be sold $6 million or $7 million worth of Indian land to a company with a capitalization of $40,000 which had not filed any proof of its financial ability to complete the transaction.

Mr. Spencer: What is strange about that?

Mr. Hellyer: The minister told us—

Mr. Clancy: No she did not. You are making that statement.

Mr. Hellyer: —that all the documents had been tabled and they included no document whatsoever indicating the financial ability of this company to undertake a transaction of this size. The only possible excuse that the minister could have would have been the assurance that moneys were forthcoming, in fact some advance knowledge that this transaction with Ontario Hydro was about to take place because only a transaction of that magnitude—a $1,200,000 transaction with Ontario Hydro—would have provided the equity capital necessary for the company to have been in a position to close this transaction on the due date.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I really do not like to interrupt the hon. member but I wonder if he would mind explaining to the committee the relationship between capitalization and the financial assets of any company which is incorporated?

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member does not know anything.

Mr. Hellyer: What I would like the minister to explain to the committee—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member does not know what he is talking about; he does not know the difference.

Mr. Hellyer: —is how she would think a company which had a capitalization of only $40,000 and which had demonstrated no additional capacity—

Mr. Pallett: Just answer the question.

Mr. Hellyer: —to undertake a deal of this magnitude would be in a position—

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member has just been scalped.

Mr. Hellyer: —to undertake and carry out the purchase of $7 million worth of land.

Mr. Nesbitt: Capitalization has nothing to do with capital assets.

Mr. Pickersgill: It had none.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the point; it had none in this case.

Mr. Grafftey: Give the hon. member enough rope and he will hang himself.

Mr. Hellyer: In deference to the minister I should like to read the reply she gave me in the house the other day.

An hon. Member: Page?

Mr. Nesbitt: Be sure to read the whole statement; do not lift it out of context.

Mr. Hellyer: I refer to page 4952 of yesterday's Hansard. On orders of the day I addressed a question to the minister in these words:

> Would the minister advise the house why she allowed the sale of $7 million worth of land to a company with a minimum capitalization of $40,000 without proof of their financial ability—

At that point I was interrupted. The hon. lady's reply was:

> Mr. Speaker, all I can say is the decision that was taken has been justified, in that the payments have been made up to date and the Indians are now in possession of nearly $2.5 million.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is right.

Mr. Hellyer: Surely, Mr. Chairman, when that statement is interpreted as meaning that the proof of the pudding is in the eating it is not being unfair to the hon. lady.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what it means.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure upon reflection the hon. lady would agree with that. We would like the hon. lady to tell us whether or not she had advance knowledge that Ontario Hydro was going to purchase this amount of land from Dimensional Investments Limited and whether or not she had advance knowledge that the requirements of land would be increased from 30 to 187 acres and whether or not the knowledge of this proposed transaction was a factor in the decision to allow the sale of this considerable tract of land to a company which otherwise would have been financially unable to undertake it.

Mrs. Fairclough: The answer, Mr. Chairman, is no. At no time was I aware that there was to be a sale. I knew that Ontario Hydro wanted land, of course, but at the time the sale was arranged there was a great deal of doubt as to whether Ontario Hydro was going to buy these lands or go all the way around the reserve.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. lady if she knew at the time the sale was made that Ontario Hydro had transmission lines running across its property already and had an easement for those lands?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have in my hand a plan which indicates that the transmission lines do not go right through the middle of the property. That is according to this diagram, if it is a correct one, and I must say it was published in a very reputable newspaper—

Mr. Clancy: The Star?

Mr. Pickersgill: —and I have never seen anyone attempt to refute it. Far from being in the middle of the property the diagram indictates that the transmission lines are in one corner of the reserve. In the light of the additional information the hon. member for Trinity has given to the committee this evening to the effect that Ontario Hydro already had an easement over this property and already had a transmission line there, nothing could be more absurd than the statement the minister says the Indians made to her the effect of which was that they feared that to sell this part of the land to Ontario Hydro would destroy the value of the rest of the land because it is perfectly clear—and I must confess this is something I did not fully appreciate when I was speaking this afternoon—that the least valuable part of that land for industrial purposes would be that part over which Ontario Hydro already had an easement and a transmission line. In those circumstances it obviously would have a limited use for any industrial purposes as compared with other parts of the property.

It also seems to me very extraordinary that the department knowing that Ontario Hydro was interested in this matter should have consented to this sale of this property to a company which, without prejudging the verdict of a royal commission, does not seem to have been one of the best known, most obviously substantial and most reputable financial firms in the country. I believe it is extraordinary that the land should have been sold to the company without it having filed proof that it had a capacity to carry through this deal. It is very odd that immediately after it was sold an agency of the crown, the Ontario Hydro, which had previously had conversations with the minister's department, should promptly have bought this land. I would have thought that ordinary elementary prudence on the part of the minister would have dictated another course of action.

I assumed until I heard the things the hon. lady said about Mr. Macaulay this afternoon which may change that relationship that up until the time she said he was not telling the truth—

Mrs. Fairclough: I said no such thing. The hon. member has paraphrased enough.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady said that what he said was not true.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member read from a newspaper article.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I read from the report of the proceedings of the royal commission.

Mrs. Fairclough: I said that a given fact was not true.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady said that what Mr. Macaulay said was not true. Maybe that is not saying that Mr. Macaulay was not stating the truth. If the hon. lady wants to split that hair she can split it.

Mr. Nesbitt: At least she does not twist it as the hon. member does.

Mr. Pickersgill: But before the hon. lady gave him the character she gave him this afternoon I assumed she was on speaking terms with him and that she was also probably on speaking terms with the premier of Ontario although he did say about her in another matter concerning which I have a clipping which I have not read out of deference to the hon. lady that she did not know what she was talking about.

Mrs. Fairclough: Go ahead and read it.

Mr. Aiken: There are other people like that.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would suggest that in a grave matter of this nature involving the trust of the original inhabitants of this country and in the light of what has already appeared before this royal commission no hon. member of the Conservative party should regard it as a joking matter. The fact of the matter is that immediately after this considerable portion of land was sold to this real estate firm they promptly resold it to another agency of the crown, an agency of the provincial crown, for enough money to pay for something like one third of the whole cost of the whole tract; that is to say, they paid $1,200,000 odd for a tract that the minister sold for one fifth—

Mrs. Fairclough: Your arithmetic is terrible.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is quicker at arithmetic than I am only this evening, not this afternoon, as the hon. member for Trinity pointed out. But the plain fact of the matter is that we cannot get around the fact that either this land was worth $7,000 an acre, which is what Hydro paid for it, in which case the Indians ought to have got that $7,000 an acre and not somebody else, or it was worth only $2,000 an acre. Of course that is not the minister's responsibility, but Hydro is certainly wasting the money of the users of electricity in Ontario. That is not the business of this parliament. But I would have thought that before entering into this transaction with this company, which does not seem to have been very well known before this transaction began, the minister or her officials would have found out precisely what Hydro really wanted and what they were willing to pay for it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Why should we? We were not looking for purchasers?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady says she was not looking for purchasers.

Mrs. Fairclough: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is by far the most damaging statement the hon. lady has made—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Let hon. members consider the implications of that remark. The hon. lady is trustee for the Indians. She says she was not looking for purchasers. "The first fellow that came along and offers me a price for it I will give it to him."

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): She did not say that.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is exactly what she means, when she says she was not looking for purchasers. She should have been, and she was negligent in her duties to the Indians, negligent in her trust, in not doing it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Just before the dinner recess the hon. member said he would not sell at any price. Now he tells me I should have been looking for a purchaser.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady should not have sold it at all if she was not looking for purchasers.

Mrs. Fairclough: So, I should have been looking for purchasers? Go on!

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. lady would not mind possessing her soul in patience or replying after I finish. If she has a correction to make I shall be very glad to have the correction made. I have tried very carefully not to distort any of the hon. member's remarks or observations. I have spoken very slowly and I have asked at every stage for her to correct any statement of fact if it were wrong. I suggest that the hon. lady carry on the debate in the same fashion instead of seeking to distort the things I say.

I say, in my opinion, this land should not have been sold at all to anybody. But I go on to say that if it was going to be sold to anybody it was the hon. lady's duty to look for purchasers and get the best possible price, and these two positions are perfectly compatible.

Mrs. Fairclough: We did.

Mr. Pickersgill: I repeat that. I do not think the land should have been sold at all. That was the conclusion I came to and that was why I was relieved when the transaction that I agreed to for $8 million did not go through, because I had come to the conclusion while those negotiations were going on that it was a mistake to sell it at all and I do not think it should have been sold at all. But if it was going to be sold, then the minister had the duty—and she cannot hide behind the Indians—to see that the best possible price should be got for it. She did not get the best possible price for it because she sold it to those real estate operators who promptly resold a relatively small part of it for the difference between $2,000 an acre and $7,000 an acre, and if that is not a pretty exorbitant profit for a real estate operator to make on Indian lands in a week or two, well, it is really one of the most questionable transactions I think that has ever taken place.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, balderdash.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, well, of course, I suppose to the hon. lady and the people over there a mere matter of $5,000 an acre profit to some real estate operator is very small potatoes but it is not to the Indians.

An hon. Member: They have not made that profit yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: They have sold the land. Hydro has paid the money. The hon. member says they have not made that profit. There is one thing that seems to be very clear. Not only have they made that profit but this is what gave them the necessary funds to carry on the rest of the transaction, or a good part of it. The hon. lady gave no reply whatever to the point which I still think is the most fundamental point of all, namely that it was considered that this land was worth $8 million in 1957.

Mrs. Fairclough: It was not.

Mr. Pickersgill: I considered it was worth $8 million.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is the hon. member a real estate evaluator?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. The evaluators of the department considered that this was a proper price.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, they did not.

Mr. Pickersgill: The transaction was recommended to me by the present officials and I agreed to it at $8 million, and two years later, in a recession, when the hon. lady sold this land for $1,500,000 less, there was no compulsion to sell it at all at that particular time. Even if Hydro had never entered into this picture at all it would have been a very questionable and imprudent transaction. When you think that no sooner is the contract executed than a part of it is resold at a profit on the original price of $2,000 an acre of $5,000 an acre it really does become a fantastic operation. It does seem to me that the hon. lady owes a different and better explanation than we have had yet.

Mr. Howard: I wish to make reference to the subject matter of the Kitasoo Indian reserve No. 1, British Columbia, on which I wanted some information. I have a letter, and I find an error arose in connection with it, and perhaps inadvertently placed the hon. lady in the position of being responsible for this transaction, but such was not the case. It was not my intention to do anything like that. Other arrangements were made in which the interests of the Indians were not fully and properly protected, or they were not fully explained to them by whoever undertook the explanation. The letter which I have in my hand is dated June 3, 1960 from the director, and reads:

> Re: Kitasoo Indian Reserve No. 1,
> British Columbia and
> J. H. Todd and Sons, Limited.
> As requested in your letter dated May 31, 1960, I attach a photostat copy of release granted to J. H. Todd and Sons Limited for a period of 10 years from January 1, 1941.
> The land sale was a cash transaction and was not preceded by an agreement of sale. On receipt of the agreed purchase price of $21,000 letters patent were issued.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the hon. member know when they were issued? What is the date?

Mr. Howard: I will refer to another letter which precedes this one, which is dated May 27, 1960. Part of the letter reads:

> The sale was completed in accordance with the terms of the surrender and letters patent issued for the 15 acres of land on March 4, 1955. The $21,000 received was earmarked, at the request of the Indians, for use in connection with a water supply system.

I expect that clears up that point. I should like to reiterate that I do not think the interests of the Indians were protected in this particular sale. Whoever the person was who participated in the transaction as the liaison man, and presumably it would be the Indian superintendent at Bella Coola, he appears to have acted more as agent for J. H. Todd and Sons than he did for the Indians because it was not until subsequent to the sale and closing down of the cannery that the Indians realized the full impact of the sale of this land. As I said, they discovered that they not only do not have the land now but they have no opportunity to work in the cannery because J. H. Todd and Sons have arbitrarily closed the cannery and said that they are not going to operate it any longer.

In addition, the Indians have made another discovery. While working for J. H. Todd and Sons after the sale was completed they discovered that they were subject to the payment of income tax on the money received whereas they were not subject to income tax while the lease was in effect and the income was derived from use of their land. I only raise this case along with two instances involving individual locatees on another reserve to point out that in all instances the interests of the Indians were not properly protected. The results that would flow from the sale of their land were not thoroughly explained to them.

As I said in my opening remarks, I think it should be the policy of the department to attempt to promote leases and rentals, if that is desirable, rather than sales because a sale is such a final transaction. I suppose it would be possible for the Indians to buy back the land from J. H. Todd and Sons. Presumably that is so but the chances of its happening are practically nil. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned that it should not be the policy of the department to allow the Indians to sell their land. I endorse that view completely and I have always been of that opinion. I am only sorry that they did not have the same interest during the time that my friend and his colleagues were in office. Perhaps we will profit now by the experience gained in such cases as that on the Kitasoo Indian reserve to which I have referred.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, I should like—

The Chairman: I understand that the hon. member for Oxford wishes to put a question.

Mr. Nesbitt: It was with reference to the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Trinity, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Skeena.

The Chairman: I have recognized the hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks with regard to one or two problems facing the Indians of our country that have been brought to my attention. Some of these problems I have observed myself and others have been brought to my attention by people living in northern Manitoba. At the outset I should like to express my appreciation to the minister, the director of the branch, Colonel Jones, and the Indian agents in northern Manitoba and their field men for the co-operation they have given me during the past three years. I should also like to tell the minister that the people of this area were very pleased that she was able to visit northern Manitoba last summer. She was not able to go to all the reserves and we hope that she will be able to come back to that area in the near future.

Personally I do not believe that the people of Canada generally realize what a tremendous amount of work is being carried out by the Indian affairs branch in an endeavour to solve the many problems with which the Indians are faced. One only has to make a few trips into these outlying areas with an Indian agent and meet the band leaders and councillors to come to a realization of just how much work the branch is doing to solve the many problems and, believe me, there are still many to be solved.

There is one specific problem very evident in the northern part of the country to which I should like to see serious consideration given. I may say that I brought a specific case to the attention of the director of the branch very recently. We were not able to do too much about it because possibly the matter was left too late but we will be forever faced with the same problem unless something is done. The problem has to do with the situation that arises when the Indian affairs branch and other departments such as northern affairs and national defence are planning the construction of establishments in outlying areas of northern Canada. I refer to the construction of hospitals, nursing stations, Indian residential schools and so on. In their construction one thing that must be provided is an adequate electric power supply. In many cases when such buildings are constructed they are located close to an Indian reservation or possibly a small settlement inhabited by people of the Indian race.

When planning the power requirements for these establishments I should like to see consideration given to making a preliminary survey of the possibility of providing for the electric power requirements of the Indian people who live adjacent to the hospital, school or whatever the building is. I realize that when plans for power installations are planned an effort is made to arrive at a reasonable estimate of how much power may be needed by the particular building in the future and allowance is made for that but I cannot see why it would not be possible to make allowance for additional power for the Indian people living adjacent these areas. If provision is not made for such power when planning these government establishments the people in these areas will be a long time before they get the benefit of electric power.

The reason I bring this matter to the attention of the minister at this time is that it is my understanding that up until this time it has been the feeling of the department, possibly a reasonable one, that to do what I have suggested would create a tremendous amount of extra work for them which is not actually in their field. It is claimed that it would create work in making surveys of the necessary extensions of power, that it would create an obligation on the department to establish the rates to be charged and would also create obligations with respect to the distribution of the power and collection of accounts.

That does seem like quite a large assignment to give any government department but I think there is a good solution for that, especially in Manitoba, and I do not see why the same solution could not be applied in other provinces confronted with the same problem. I have very good assurance from the Manitoba power commission that they would welcome the opportunity of purchasing excess power from any source if there was a reasonable market for that power in the vicinity. They have told me they would be quite willing not only to purchase the power but to arrange for its distribution and to set the rates and collect the accounts. With such an arrangement having been suggested by the Manitoba power commission, I think that many of the problems are overcome.

I should like to say once again that generally government departments do not take some of these things into consideration and do not realize that they have an obligation, as government departments, to the people of Canada living in these outlying areas to bring to them some of these amenities of life. If we do not do that, we are not doing our job. I know that this is a problem which exists all over the northern part of our country. I believe it is only reasonable to assume that most of the provincial authorities who are operating hydro systems and power commissions would be willing to go along on the same basis as the Manitoba power commission has done in at least two different places in northern Manitoba. At The Pas Indian reserve the Manitoba power commission is supplying power, and at another point, Cranberry Portage, the Manitoba power commission is purchasing power from a national defence establishment and selling it to the residents of that community. If the Manitoba power commission had not adopted this attitude, the people in many of these outlying areas would be waiting many years for this service which we in the urban areas accept as our birthright.

There is one other problem I should like to mention. Some of the hon. members referred to welfare cases today and said they were pleased to see the department was inaugurating a policy of paying by cheque or by cash instead of in kind. This seems to be very welcome news. I may be wrong in this, but after visiting many of these reserves and seeing the tremendous amount of welfare benefits being paid out in some cases and the amount of work of a minor nature which needs to be done on the reserve, I am wondering if these people should not be paid for doing the work. In this way a lot of the small jobs could be completed around these reserves by day labourers, and I cannot see how it would cost so much more. I do believe the people would be happier, if work for wages were available instead of relief or welfare for those people in fit condition to do the work which needs to be done.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have just one brief remark to make, Mr. Chairman. There has been some reference on several occasions during the debate this evening to people misleading the house. I should like to direct my remarks to the remarks made by the hon. member for Trinity. I fully realize the hon. member for Trinity is not a lawyer, but he is eminent in other fields. I think there was one thing the hon. member for Trinity kept saying repeatedly and that was that this company which purchased this land from the Indians in Sarnia had a capitalization of $40,000. The inference that anyone who is not conversant with the technicalities of corporation law would draw is that the only assets of the company were $40,000. This is most certainly not the case.

It is customary, in the province of Ontario when a company is incorporated to incorporate with a capitalization of $40,000. It simply means that the par value of the authorized shares to be issued then or at some time in the future is $40,000. It has no relationship whatever to the actual assets of the company. I am sure the hon. member must know that.

He has had some experience in corporate dealings, I understand, and if indeed he does know it, the only conclusion can be that he attempted to mislead the committee. If he did not know it, then he should be more careful about what he is saying, because I believe it is a clear attempt to mislead the committee.

Mr. Hellyer: On the contrary, I was attempting to lead the committee. The matter of capitalization, as the hon. member for Oxford has just said, is not necessarily indicative of the total assets or net worth of the company. This was a newly incorporated company, however, which had no other assets. The total of its assets was limited by the extent of its capitalization, under the law of the province of Ontario, so that its assets were equal to its total capitalization or something less than that. No financial documents whatever were filed by the company, as has been ably demonstrated, to indicate it had any assets whatever, even within the $40,000 of its capitalization or over and beyond that. I am surprised that a learned counsel would not be able to determine this for himself. I hope I will not have to retain him to do legal work for any company with which I am connected.

Mr. Nesbitt: It is quite clear you do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. Hellyer: I think it is quite irresponsible for the minister to authorize the sale of millions of dollars worth of land held in trust for an Indian band to a newly formed company with a capitalization of $40,000 and with no demonstration of assets, even to that extent.

I should like to ask the minister if, in fact, March 14 was the final date for completion of this sale. I hope that is the correct word, and if it is not the hon. member for Oxford will fill me in with the correct one.

Mrs. Fairclough: March 14 of what year?

Mr. Hellyer: Of 1959.

Mrs. Fairclough: The agreement was signed on March 14, 1959. The total sale price must be paid within two years time, which means it has about nine months yet to run. In addition to the sale price, there have been adequate safeguards incorporated into the agreement and the Indians receive interest on their funds in addition to the price that was agreed upon.

There have been a lot of very peculiar statements made here tonight, and between the pseudo real estate valuators who cannot even add and the financial experts who do not know the difference between capitalization and assets we have had ourselves quite a field day.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suppose the hon. lady could set the record right.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, I cannot be bothered. I am here in my capacity as a minister to defend my department. I am not here to give lessons in economics and real estate valuation to hon. members.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. lady has said that she is not here to give lessons in economics. Nobody wants lessons in economics, but we are entitled in this committee to an accounting of the business of this country, particularly when it is business done in trust for the original inhabitants of this country, and that is what the hon. lady refuses to give; indulging in innuendo and insinuations instead of dealing with facts.

Mrs. Fairclough: All right, Mr. Chairman, I shall do my best to put the record straight. However, I cannot be held responsible for those who will not listen or will not understand. Back in the time when my hon. friend was charged with the responsibility of this department he tells us that he had an offer of $8 million for this land.

Mr. Pickersgill: Approximately $7,902,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: All right, we will not quibble over $100,000. He never got one plugged nickel, not one.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is quite right.

Mrs. Fairclough: Ultimately the people who were supposed to have given this offer withdrew, after having held up the sale of the land for a considerable time to any other prospective purchaser, or if they did not, the minister did in the hope of getting $8 million. They decided on one of two things; either that they did not have $8 million or that the land was not worth it.

In the meantime the Indians, having been encouraged by the minister to think there was a sale going on, went out and bought sundry things—automobiles, deep freezes, electric refrigerators, washing machines, all manner of things, and got themselves well and truly in debt. And the sale fell through.

Ultimately another group came along and offered to buy this property, and I think it is no secret that their first offer was considerably lower than the price at which the agreement was drawn up.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would hope so.

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member would hope it was lower?

Mr. Pickersgill: I hope the hon. lady would get more than the first offer.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have not been in business for more years than I like to admit without learning a few tricks from the trade.

In any event the Indians, quite properly, were concerned about their financial obligations. They had no intention of hiding behind the protection offered them in the act and failing to live up to their financial commitments. They had been led to believe that they had a proper sale coming up. This new company came along and it made an offer. We turned that offer down. We took the precaution of engaging the services of an independent evaluator who went into this situation and gave us a full report, not only on the immediate value of the land but its potential having regard to other land which had been sold in the vicinity, having regard also to other land that was available for sale in the vicinity and taking into account the projected rate of industrial progress which was anticipated. Finally we received from them an evaluation and that evaluation was $5,500,000.

We were not satisfied completely with that so we asked the officials of the Veterans Land Act if they would give us an evaluation quite independently, without any reference to the firm which had made an evaluation and with no consultation with them. As a matter of fact they did not know who the firm was that had made an evaluation. They came up with a valuation of $5,600,000. So I think, Mr. Chairman, if we got $6,500,000 for the Indians we did pretty well.

I have no intention of arguing any case for a subsequent buyer, whether they made offers, whether they wanted anything, what they were willing to pay, what they had already done, or anything. That is no concern of mine. The thing which is my concern is that I get for the Indians the best possible price I can get having regard to the value of the land and its potential, and I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that that is what I did do. Not only did I get them the best possible price but I protected them under the terms of this contract and, as I have said before today, if this contract falls through tomorrow, if perchance the company concerned defaults in its payments, the Indians will have received something in the nature of $2,500,000 and will have sold about 10 per cent of the land which was for sale.

I cannot understand what the hon. member is talking about. I would think that there is some kind of a herring being drawn across the path here. I have not quite discovered what it is.

Mr. Pearson: A herring from Toronto.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think the hon. member is right there. I have an idea that the criticisms which have been directed at this department are not intended for this department at all but are intended for some other place. As far as I am concerned I think I did a good job for the Indians. I think I made a good deal for them, and as I said immediately before adjournment at six o'clock I have no apologies to make to anyone for this particular sale.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the hon. lady has just told us again that she got the best possible price for the land, but she did not. A small part of the land was in fact sold approximately simultaneously for $5,000 an acre more than the hon. lady got for it.

Mr. Thrasher: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Thrasher: Would the hon. member be prepared to pay $5,000 an acre for the balance of the land?

Mr. Hellyer: From what I know of the situation I would not want an acre of it at any price.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, did I hear the hon. member say that he would not want an acre of it now at any price?

Mr. Hellyer: That is exactly what I said. That is not the particular type of land development in which I am interested. The hon. lady told us earlier that she did not know that Ontario Hydro was interested in buying a larger acreage of this land.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not true, I did not say that. I said that I did not know how much they wanted, which is true.

Mr. Hellyer: But she knew there were intermediate negotiations being carried on during this period between December, 1958 and June, 1959; is that not correct?

Mrs. Fairclough: That is not exactly correct. We knew that Ontario Hydro was interested in acquiring some land; I could not help but know that. After all, they had their power lines over this land, as has been said, but at no time was any offer made to any department. So far as I know no offer was made in dollars and cents to the Indians, but I will not answer to that completely.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, this explains something of which we were not aware earlier this evening. The hon. lady did know that these intermediate negotiations were being carried on. Surely her curiosity would have been such that she would have made an effort to determine not only the extent of the lands required by Ontario Hydro but also what they were willing at that time to pay for them. Did the hon. lady know, for instance, that three days before the completion of the sale Ontario Hydro paid over the approximately $1,200,000 to Dimensional Investments Limited which was held in trust for several days pending completion of the sale, the funds of which were in fact turned over to her as trustee for the Indian band?

Mrs. Fairclough: The ultimate disposition of lands is not my concern. The hon. member is a merchant, or supposed to be, and if I sell him a gross of articles it is no concern of mine what he sells a dozen for.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think that deserves a little comment. The hon. member for Trinity has shown us something which I did not know myself until this evening. Apparently three days before the minister sold the land the company she sold it to had already sold a part of it for $5,000 an acre more than she sold it for. The cheque of Ontario Hydro was delivered to Dimensional, according to this information, on March 11 and the minister did not sell until March 14, and Dimensional used the $7,000 an acre from Hydro to pay the minister $2,000 an acre. If she thinks it was not her business to know what kind of customer she was dealing with, I think we ought to have another minister as a trustee for the Indians.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, obviously the hon. member has not a clue what he is talking about. I do not have any police force to go out and find who is doing what or who is—

Mr. Pickersgill: You do not speak to the Ontario government.

Mrs. Fairclough: Certainly not; I run my department. I do not meddle in other people's affairs, and I think that is a good rule for many people to follow.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite willing to leave it there and let the public decide.

Mrs. Fairclough: I think you had better.

Mr. Pearson: The only people to suffer were the Indians.

Mrs. Fairclough: They did not suffer one little bit; don't worry.

Mr. Pickersgill: Five thousand dollars an acre.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, to—

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Fisher: In Ontario we have all been waiting for a crown prince to emerge behind Hon. Leslie Frost and there is speculation of the position being taken up by the Hon. Robert Macaulay. It would be a tragedy if the minister were to dynamite the prospects of that energetic and able young man.

I wanted to ask the minister a specific question. An indication was given to me last year in answer to a question that a good deal of Indian land is going to be brought under forest management. I should like an indication as to the pace at which this plan is to proceed. The department now has two foresters, and forest consultants are being acquired. I should like to know something about these consultants, their experience and qualifications, and I should like to know especially about the plans in the province of Ontario. I should also like to know more about the amount of consultation which goes on between the provincial department and the minister's department. I personally have brought the replies of the minister to the attention of foresters in different parts of Ontario and they still feel that the plans are inadequate to meet the needs of Indians having regard to the type of land that is available, and especially from the point of view that the federal government has a very able forestry branch service.

The next point I wanted to make concerns the appropriations and plans of the department through the Indian agents for working with the Indians in the light of the fact that they are going to have the vote. I know the whole question of the Indians having a vote becomes a problem for the political parties and the general organizations. I have already pointed out to the minister that we have a situation in Ontario where many of the northern Indians cannot read or write and are therefore particularly open and vulnerable to suggestions by those who are closest to them. I do not want to make a blatant accusation that Indian agents in the part of the country I represent are agents for the Conservative party, because I cannot prove it, but I will ask the minister to look at the statistics in areas where Indians have the vote in elections and ask her whether doubts would not occur in her mind about the impartiality of Indian agents in those areas. Now that Indians do have a vote in this part of Canada I should like to have an assurance from the hon. lady that instructions will go out to the agents so as to remove the possibility that the agents themselves or the immediate families may be influencing the vote.

Mr. Grafftey: You had better go to Saskatchewan and find out what your party does there.

Mr. Fisher: I do not know about Saskatchewan, but I know about my own constituency. The statistics hit you right between the eyes. If you get a situation where in one poll one party gets 200 votes and the other party gets 5 votes, suspicions are bound to occur, and all I am asking of the minister is that she should look into it.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not know if the hon. member would like me to reply now, but the superintendents are, of course, federal employees. They are engaged on the terms of the civil service commission and I cannot see what possible connection their employment has with a provincial election.

Mr. Fisher: What I am bringing up with the minister at the present time is that these gentlemen are, as she knows, men of influence among the Indians and I am just suggesting that if we look at the provincial pattern in my constituency we have an indication that the Indians are being subjected to some very close influence, because they all vote for a Conservative candidate.

Mr. Grafftey: That is so much nonsense and you know it.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi has interjected "that is so much nonsense and you know it". All I know is that he is full of nonsense if he cannot get on his feet and put up a better argument than that. I do not happen to have some of the advantages which the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi has, but I am trying to do my best to bring up a point in which I believe and to explain why I take the attitude I do. Take Lansdowne House in the north where the population is 99 per cent Indian. They are all voting one way and when Indian agents are moving around there one has to have suspicions. I am just presenting those suspicions to the minister and suggest that in view of the pattern we are getting at election times she should issue warnings to her agents and see that no one has an opportunity to exert influence of this kind.

Mrs. Fairclough: Under the terms of the Civil Service Act any civil servant who engages in partisan activities is subject to punishment. I cannot think of an answer to the hon. gentleman's allegation unless it is that the Indians are further advanced than we thought they were. But I can assure the hon. member that as to federal employees engaging in provincial partisan activity, the staff are in my opinion too smart for that. I do not think they would do it. If the hon. member has proof to the contrary other than the odd coincidence of figures I will be glad to look into it.

Mr. Fisher: The minister can call it coincidence if she cares to. Another question I want to ask the hon. lady is an explanation of the situation at McDiarmid reserve and what the plans are there and what future efforts are going to be made if any to get the Indians at the north end of lake Nipigon and that country that feeds into there into an advantageous a situation as the Indians at McDiarmid are going to be in. We are pleased with this particular method. The Indians themselves are very satisfied, but they are concerned about their friends, relatives and other Indians at the other end of the lake and toward the Hudson Bay watershed where many of them are attracted by that kind of development just as they were from the other side of the lake.

I wondered whether there was any plan to move these people into the same kind of improved conditions. I have had letters from people in the region north of the lake—tourist agents and people like that—saying that the condition of the Indians especially in midwinter and early spring is much more serious than it has been in the lower part of the lake.

I read with interest as I am sure many hon. members did an announcement in yesterday's paper to the effect that Bishop O'Grady plans to open a new school. Despite the fact it will be partially supported by Roman Catholic church funds it will be a non-denominational school. I am interested in the long range implications of this announcement. This seems to be a break with tradition. We would appreciate an explanation of this from the minister. Does this herald a larger move of this nature in the educational field?

Mrs. Fairclough: With regard to the McDiarmid situation and in fact the whole situation in northern Ontario my department is presently in negotiation with the province of Ontario with regard to lands and locations and so on. I can assure my hon. friend that we are most anxious that these people shall have proper facilities not only for their own comfort but for the education of their children. We cannot move any faster than our co-operative efforts with the province will dictate. However, we are not lagging at all and are proceeding as rapidly as we can.

With regard to Bishop O'Grady I find it difficult to express myself because the bishop is doing such a magnificent job. As a matter of fact he puts such pressure on the department at times that we are hard put to it to answer his demands. We know that he is working for the good of the Indians and is doing his best under difficult circumstances. In so far as co-operation with the department is concerned his situation is not different from that of anyone else. Where there is an effort on the part of a denominational institution to educate Indians whether in an entirely Indian school or an integrated school the department picks up the tab for the Indians' share. I must say again that I think Bishop O'Grady with his tremendous enthusiasm is doing a wonderful job for the Indians in British Columbia and I should like to have that on the record.

Mr. Fisher: That seemed apparent from the story but I was interested in the fact that the school although under church support would be non-denominational. Is this the forerunner of a broader policy? Is it intended to have the non-denominational aspect of the school apply only to certain grades?

Mrs. Fairclough: This is not our school but a church school. How it is administered is entirely up to the group concerned. I find it intriguing. I did not see the press release and can speak only from a general knowledge of the bishop's splendid work.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, like many other hon. members I have a great many Indians in my constituency although I must confess I have not had the—what shall I call it—coincidental electoral problem to which my friend the hon. member for Port Arthur referred a moment ago. However, as the minister knows an educational problem has existed for many years among the Indians in Algoma East. I am not going to speak about that at the moment because I know the department has done its best in that regard.

Perhaps before this item passes I may be permitted to express my appreciation for the courtesy and thoughtful consideration given by the officers in connection with every request I have made of them. In view of the fact that a moment ago I provoked the minister into a somewhat extreme expletive perhaps she may permit me to include her in that comment because the hon. lady has always been very courteous in dealing with the requests I have made of her.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister will be well aware that we have a file of correspondence going back over several years relating to the problem of Indians who are not permanently settled in Red Lake in the northern part of my area but are sort of semi—

Mrs. Fairclough: Transients?

Mr. Benidickson: They are becoming assimilated in part. This is a development which I think should be encouraged because we have mining employment and other types of employment which are more advantageous than the very uncertain type of livelihood that is available a few miles beyond Red Lake where they simply rely on trapping and fishing.

As I said, my file must be a foot thick and it goes back some five or six years. It involves discussions with the board of education of the province because Red Lake is not on reserve territory. It was always my understanding that the Indian affairs branch would welcome a pilot program such as has been urged by the citizens of Red Lake particularly represented by the chamber of commerce under which the buck would not be passed continually between the province and the federal government, the province taking the attitude that these people are basically a federal responsibility and the federal government saying that for a good part of the year the people live off the reserve and thus should be the responsibility of local school board or the province of Ontario.

I have always been assured that the department was willing to make a contribution to what I have called over the years a bridge program under which there would be encouragement for these people to move a few miles south and get employment where industrial developments that have gone north are located. They are the people who should be attracted to employment of this kind but the buck continues to be passed.

We have public schools and separate schools but a very few Indians have been taken into the two schools. I have read speeches of the recent minister of education of the province of Ontario wherein he has said that he feels the Indians of northern Ontario are the responsibility of the province and this responsibility could be taken over by the provincial government. However, we are not getting very far.

I wish now to mention a development of which we should be thoroughly ashamed. Because these children have been neglected a United States church organization, a missionary group—they regard this as a foreign mission—has come in to the civilized northern part of our province and established a school. We should be ashamed of ourselves at having a United States missionary group come in to look after our Indian children. The Amish church missionary group have been running a marvellous school there for four or five years. There is no question of the need for this. Everyone else was washing their hands of the responsibility for these children. The group has carried on the school without assistance from the province, the town or the federal government. I believe the normal capacity of the school is about 40 or 50 children.

In addition to that if the children become neglected as they sometimes do—the parents push off to their former pursuits in trapping and fishing and leave Red Lake perhaps when employment is not steady for them—they even offer them board and lodging. I believe that compensation has recently been established with respect to the boarding where the parents have gone back to the reserve. I feel that this institution deserves some consideration.

I do not think adequate pressure has been put upon the school authorities of the province, first, to make sure that the truancy laws in so far as Indians are concerned are enforced. They have been ignored, in my opinion, and in consequence if the parents do not deliver their children to school they simply sit there on the outskirts of the Red Lake community with nobody taking responsibility for them and they receive no education. I must give credit to the department in that where it was felt that we could look with confidence to the parents residing fairly steadily at Red Lake a number of the children have been placed in residential schools to the south. This is very much appreciated by me particularly and has relieved the school situation in Red Lake, but it is a very bad situation when everybody says it is somebody else's job.

Mrs. Fairclough: The hon. member is quite right. It has been a source of considerable concern to the department. The remote areas, of course, bring their own problems and while we could not exactly call Red Lake remote in the sense that some of them are, nevertheless it is not close to any large municipality. However, I am glad the hon. member mentioned it. We have put as many Indians as we could in residential schools. We have done our best also to try to impress upon the municipality and the province what their responsibility is and I do hope we can resolve this difficulty before too long.

Mr. Benidickson: Three or four years ago it was indicated to me that as a token of our interest, even though technically those people were not residing on Indian reserves—this was a unique situation—on a voluntary basis for a period of years—I had a term of about five years in mind—with the idea of encouraging the getting to grips with this situation, the department would make a nominal contribution, perhaps what would be the equivalent of the local school board contribution in an unorganized territory, which is about 5 per cent of the over-all cost. Is the department still willing to assist in this matter by making a contribution of that kind?

Mrs. Fairclough: It is true, that we agreed to that contribution but unfortunately the necessary co-operation was not forthcoming from other quarters.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister seems to have a hard time with the government of Ontario.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister a question or two, but first of all I hope she can give me some answers to questions asked earlier. I should like to ask her two specific things. One thing which disturbed me, and I suppose the minister, was an accident which occurred last year north of the Winnipeg river when a helicopter crashed. A number of people lost their lives. I know enough about the background of the matter to realize that it was an accident, but there was the question of the necessity of flight at night. We have a long tradition up north that a flight becomes a mercy flight only when it is decided how important the emergency is. I should like to know something of the instructions the doctors have in certain areas as to how important an emergency is?

Mrs. Fairclough: This is not under my department. Doctors operate under the Department of National Health and Welfare. I do not know whether the hon. member was in the house today when I made my initial statement, but I dealt at some length with the forestry situation. I think the answers to his questions are incorporated in that statement.

Mr. Fisher: I am sorry, I was not in the committee at the time. The minister says that the question of the accident does not come under her department. The point is, as I understand it, two Indians lost their lives in this particular accident. The need, or the urgency, must be spelled out to a certain degree by members of her department or by the Indians themselves. I should like to know where the responsibility lies. We do not want the occurrence of another accident like this one if, as I understand it, to a considerable extent the accident was caused by flying the helicopter at night. There should be some liaison between the two departments that would control these things because mercy flights are all very well but if you are going to risk life to that extent it becomes quite a gamble.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would agree with the hon. member but I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, the accident to which he refers is not one with which I am familiar. I would have to have more information on it.

Mr. Fisher: The next question I wish to ask the minister has to do with something that has been brought to my attention by people who are attached to forestry companies. The minister knows that whole blocks of land all across the area of northwest Ontario contain trap lines. The minister also knows that the provincial government and the department of lands and forests, I believe, have a number of trapping areas in which Indians get preference. I understand from foresters and other personnel of the bush to whom I have talked that Indians are falling away from these particular jobs, or are tending to let trap lines go. I know that in one particular belt 40 or 45 miles wide, where there are a number of trap lines laid out, I heard last year no one is trapping there at all. I was just wondering whether there is an accelerating pattern right across the north of Indians getting out of trapping and failing to keep going those licensed trap lines set out for them by the provincial government? What is the trend?

Mrs. Fairclough: The majority of them are operating their trap lines. I think this must be an isolated incident. Again, if I had the particulars of the specific locality and the particular line referred to I might be able to get some information for my hon. friend. But in general the Indians are most anxious to maintain the trap lines so long as they get return from them. I cannot give an answer to the specific line because I do not know.

Mr. Fisher: I will be specific. In the minister's annual report I find the following:

> Trapping is still a very important factor in the Indian economy and will be for many years yet. This type of work, arduous though it may be, is accepted by those Indians who have not been in close touch with industrial development.

The point is, I could point out to the minister that my constituency contains almost one third of all Ontario. This might explain to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi my interest in the Indian vote. You have that large territory, and it is a considerable element in the matter, all the way from Hearst on the east to Sioux Lookout on the west, which is a stretch of over 365 to 370 miles in breadth. I understand that on the north line of the C.N.R. almost all the bush has been taken up and held by the large organizations such as Marathon, Kimberley-Clark, St. Lawrence Corporation, Abitibi, and so on. These firms are operating in this area. I know they are tending to pull Indians away from the trap line. I wanted to know what the trend was, whether anything can be done to keep the Indians in this kind of work or whether we are moving to the stage where in our part of the country we can rule out Indians as trappers?

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I would have to check the particular case. I do know that a great many Indians up in that area are working for those companies.

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mrs. Fairclough: Whether they have time to maintain trap lines also is problematical, but I would be very glad to get a report from the superintendent and give the hon. member a detailed report of what is the situation. I can assure him that in the country as a whole the Indians are not losing their interest in trap lines where they still get results from their operation.

Item agreed to.

Economic development of Indians—

60. Operation and maintenance, including an amount of $5,700 for grants to promote Indian agriculture, handicrafts and economic enterprises generally, $938,688.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this is carried I should like the minister to bring us up to date very briefly on this economic development.

Mrs. Fairclough: We have recently installed as head of the department Mr. Battle whom the hon. member will remember as one of our very valuable staff members, and we now have eight officers working across the country with two more just about to commence operations. Like the hon. member, I am keenly interested in this matter. I think it is a most important part of our administrative work and one that I think is catching on. It is certainly the case that the more employers who use Indian labour the more enthusiasts we have. There is an age-old prejudice involved. We do not know where it got started but it has existed for a long time. However, as employers use Indian labour they find it is a very valuable and worth while move. With the way the division is growing I think we will be able to report very tangible results in a short time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I must congratulate the minister on the appointment of Mr. Battle for whom I have the highest regard.

Mr. Fisher: The minister says that she has eight officers. Are any of them working in northern and northwestern Ontario?

Mrs. Fairclough: We do have an officer working in that area.

Mr. Fisher: The minister may be aware that in Longlac there is a fair every fall and a certain amount of support for the fair is received from the Department of Agriculture. I understand they are not getting any support from the minister's department, but since there is an Indian reserve in juxtaposition to the community and a large number of Indians take an interest in the fair I wonder whether it would be possible for the branch to make a grant to support the fair and perhaps give the Indians an opportunity to play a bigger role in the community.

Mrs. Fairclough: We will be glad to look into the matter. Our man works out of North Bay. I am told that in our vote we have $200 specifically earmarked for that particular fair.

Mr. Hardie: I think this division is not only attempting to place Indians in positions in industry but also assisting Indians who are still interested in trapping and hunting. For instance, I talked to Mr. Jones last year about getting the Indians in the Fort McPherson and Good Hope areas of the Northwest Territories back into country that has not been utilized for trapping and hunting for many years. He said at that time that money had been set aside and would be spent last year. I am wondering whether the money was spent last year on these projects and whether there is money in the estimates this year to carry on these projects.

Mrs. Fairclough: There was money spent last year and we have money this year. I can give the hon. member the figures in a moment if he is interested. We have to look them up.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister made a reference to North Bay. I think all the officials know it is an old story with me that I continue to be very disappointed at the failure to recognize that North Bay is many hundreds of miles from the part of the country I represent. I think it is 800 or 900 miles away, and in my view it is just nonsense to think that we can operate any more efficiently on a decentralized basis with authority in North Bay than we could if Kenora, the district north of Kenora and the Rainy river district communicated directly with headquarters. It is not the fault of the people at North Bay. It is the matter of the distance and that fact has not been appreciated by somebody in setting up the organizational chart.

In my view North Bay simply constitutes another place where maill is held up because it eventually has to go to headquarters anyway. There are simply not enough days in the few summer months when construction is carried on for the people at North Bay to take the time to travel 800 or 900 miles to Kenora. Many items have to wait to receive the stamp of approval at North Bay before they are sent to headquarters for a further stamp of approval. In my opinion the North Bay office is just another post office that holds up things. I feel that geography is being ignored and that if we have to have a decentralized organization there certainly should be a regional office much nearer to the field. I referred to the distance of 800 or 900 miles. We have no high school accommodation and our Indian children have to be sent 800 or 900 miles for a high school education. Separation from families on a basis of that kind is completely unsound.

Item agreed to.

Education—

62. Administration, operation and maintenance, $19,578,651.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to hold up my own estimates but I should like to tell the committee about a very interesting experiment that we are initiating this year. I have long felt that there is tremendous artistic talent of many kinds among our Indian children. As hon. members know, we have had a scholarship fund but heretofore scholarships have been awarded from the fund in the scholastic field and for vocational training, nursing and so on.

I became very much interested in the possibilities for artists, musicians and others who might have special talent which would not be covered particularly by the usual definition of scholarship. I am happy to say that among the 17 scholarships awarded in the past year there were two granted to artists and two to musicians. I was very pleased about this and I got in touch with some friends of mine who are in the music business. The outcome of our negotiations is that we have made arrangements with the Royal Conservatory of Music, and with their very generous co-operation their examiners, when they are in the field from coast to coast, will adjudicate for us with respect to individual students who are recommended to us at the local level as having particular talent.

By this means we hope to encourage and bring forward young people with exceptional talent at a time when encouragement and training will do them some good. We are also exploring the art field in the same manner. I thought the committee might like to know that a special effort is being made to try to help these young people who have specific talents in the arts and educate them at a time of life when they need this help.

Mr. Regier: What progress is being made toward the integration of Indians in the ordinary public schools of Canada? I know this move has been under way for a number of years. Would the minister also explain what is meant in the details on pages 148 and 149 by employees listed as teacher aides? There are 37 of them in the day schools and 52 in the residential schools and also 13 part-time teacher aides in the residential schools. Exactly what do these people do?

Mrs. Fairclough: These teacher aides are all Indians who are training, and then being sent on to professional teachers' training.

Mr. Regier: May I ask, are they in charge of a classroom?

Mrs. Fairclough: Not without supervision, no.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the wage levels and the supply? I notice the wage levels are well below the wage levels of the ordinary public school teachers, at least in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and I imagine also Ontario.

Mrs. Fairclough: Is the hon. member speaking of teachers or teacher aides?

Mr. Regier: No, teachers.

Mrs. Fairclough: The salaries paid to our teachers are on a par with the salaries paid in the respective provinces, you see. This is an over-all description of the salaries, and some of the provinces differ. There are certain provinces in Canada where the wage scales are much lower than in others.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister claiming that the wages paid to teachers in Indian schools vary from province to province?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, ours is an over-all standard, but it is based on the average of the salaries paid across the country by the various provinces.

Mr. Regier: May I then ask, how is the department making out with the recruitment of teachers in Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia? Does this particular matter have any relationship to the engagement of so-called teacher aides?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, there is no relationship there, Mr. Chairman. The work of teacher aides, while it is useful to us, is largely one of training. When you get into the provinces the hon. member has enumerated the salaries are probably higher than in some of the other provinces and it is true we do have difficulty in recruiting teachers. However, I do not believe the difficulty has been so severe that we have been unable to staff our classrooms.

In some of the provinces of Canada our teachers are probably making more than the average teacher in the province. As the hon. member knows, we are governed by federal rules and we cannot have different wage scales in different provinces.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister would answer the other query as to what headway is being made in the question of integration of Indians into the regular public school system?

Mrs. Fairclough: Again, I believe I gave that information in my initial statement. Last year, 1958-59, the number of Indian children attending non-Indian schools was 8,186, and this year, 1959-60, it was 9,479 or 1,300 more.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister in a position to say whether or not there has been an upward revision in teachers' wages since the publication of the blue book? Are these the existing wages?

Mrs. Fairclough: There has been no revision since this book was published.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder if the minister could indicate whether any of the figures under vote 63 include payments to the department of northern affairs for the education of Indians in the Northwest Territories?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not want to hold up the minister's estimates, but after the committee rises I would very much appreciate if she had a personal look at two projects that have had my attention for some time, as well as the attention of the department. We are not making much progress. It is over three years since the department itself said the boilers in the residential school at Fort Frances were in such condition that repairs were not economically justified. No start has as yet been made on that building. During the last two winters we have had heavy unemployment and the work would have been useful to the community. I would hope that in the near future the minister could give some indication that the project is going ahead.

The other problem is the accommodation at Sioux Lookout which, I am told, is not adequate for the children of that area. I understand they are turning down now as many pupils as they have registered. They do not particularly want the continuation of that school. They very fairly state that perhaps the proper place for another school would be midway between that school and Kenora. I am told in my visits there that they are turning down almost as many children at Sioux Lookout as they have registered.

Mrs. Fairclough: With regard to the first problem, that is a public works project. We will be glad to do our best to give them a little prod. In so far as the circumstances at Sioux Lookout are concerned, I must say that I am not aware of this but I will have a look at it.

Mr. Regier: I just want to make one final observation. I notice that the wages of teachers in residential schools are listed at $2,700 as a minimum. At the same time, I notice that a handyman in the residential school receives $3,100; kitchen helpers receive a reasonable wage; a labourer is listed at $2,800; a laundress at $2,800 and a seamstress also at $2,800. Perhaps the minister could look at that. I would hope the minister would agree that these teachers' wages are in need of a revision upward and at a very early date because I can well imagine the quality of teachers the minister is able to obtain in the four provinces I mentioned. I regret that Indian education is going to bear the brunt of it. I feel that a teacher's beginning wage certainly ought to exceed the wages of a seamstress, laundress, labourer or handyman.

Item agreed to.

64. Grant to provide additional services to the Indians of British Columbia, $100,000.

Mr. Herridge: Would the minister mind just giving the details of this vote 64?

Mrs. Fairclough: This, Mr. Chairman, is not a new item. As the hon. member knows, it provides additional services for the Indians of British Columbia in lieu of annuities. During the 1926-27 session of parliament the special committee of the Senate and House of Commons recommended the expenditure of $100,000 annually on technical education, the promotion of agriculture, stock-raising, fruit culture, the development of irrigation projects, hospitals and so on.

Mr. Herridge: Maintained throughout the years?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes.

Item agreed to.

46. Departmental administration, $824,266.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is just one word I want to say on vote 46. It will just take a second. It is something I meant to say on immigration earlier, but which I think I could say quite well here. There was what I thought was a regrettable statement attributed to the leader of the government of the other place, but not in the other place because I would have been out of order if I had mentioned that. This statement was made, according to Der Nordwesten in Winnipeg on the occasion of the 41st annual conference of the law society. Senator W. M. Aseltine, 73, formerly a lawyer in Rosetown, Saskatchewan—I am just reading what it says here—made a statement to the effect that we must not abolish capital punishment in this country so long as we had so many immigrants here. I just wanted to say that I deplore the view that seems to be expressed by one member of the government, or at least the representative of the government in the other place. I hope that view is not shared by other members of the government.

Mrs. Fairclough: A few days after that the hon. senator made a statement in which he said he had not made this particular remark. There was always the chance of error and I am sure the hon. senator never made any such remark.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am glad to hear that because it did not seem like him at all, and if he made a correction, which I must say did not come to my notice, I am very sorry I even alluded to it and I apologize.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, if the committee will grant me an indulgence I did promise to answer one question. I promised an hon. member I would give him the amount of bad debts from assisted passage loans. Over the years they have amounted to $56,885.40 which, out of a total figure of loans of $19 million odd, represents some one quarter of one per cent, which I think is a very good record.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Hardie: Ten o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock shall I rise—

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, I think—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Mackenzie has called it ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the house leader could indicate the business for tomorrow and as much of next week as it is possible? Perhaps before he does it I might explain the undertaking that was given in good faith about the estimates with which we have just been dealing. There are one or two questions which one hon. member wishes to ask, but we have no intention of breaking our undertaking not to resume a general debate.

Mrs. Fairclough: Thank you.

Mr. Churchill: For tomorrow we will carry on with the estimates of this department, followed by mines and technical surveys and fisheries.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could interrupt the minister for a moment to ask him if, when he says the estimates of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, he means all those agencies for which the minister has responsibility, or just the estimates of her department?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, thank you for the correction; it will be the agencies for which the minister has responsibility, which include the art gallery, film board, archives and the national library. Those being finished we will go on with mines and technical surveys and we have fisheries available if required.

With regard to the tentative program for next week the legislative items are in this order. First, Bill No. C-70, which will be back on the order paper, dealing with the international development association, reported back from committee. The second is No. 5 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the Public Service Superannuation Act. The third item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Finance dealing with the Civil Service Act, item No. 7 on today's order paper. The fourth item will be second reading of Bill No. C-68, an act to amend the Income Tax Act. The fifth item—and the arrangement is that this one will be started on Tuesday—is the motion in the name of the Minister of National Revenue to set up a select committee on broadcasting. The sixth item will be the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice, item No. 8 on today's order paper, dealing with an amendment to the Judges Act. The seventh item is item No. 2 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-64, an act to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. The eighth item is No. 1 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. S-32 concerning a bridge over the St. Lawrence river. If we finish those we will have on the order paper by Monday a motion to set up a special committee to deal with the Civil Service Act and the superannuation act.

Those items will be called for Monday and Tuesday, and perhaps Wednesday depending on what progress the house makes. Then tentatively we will be calling any of the estimates not completed tomorrow, and we have health and welfare, northern affairs and justice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Do I understand from the minister that regardless of the order he gave the first item of business on Tuesday will be the broadcasting committee?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: And it would not be called on Monday.

Mr. Churchill: No, it will not be called on Monday.

It being eight minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 17, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF SECRETARY GENERAL OF NATO

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while I realize that there is never anyone in the galleries, I believe the house will allow me to refer to the fact that we have with us today Paul-Henri Spaak, secretary general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The reception accorded those words of mine indicates the feeling that Canadians have for the secretary general of an organization which stands as a bulwark against the spread of Sovietism throughout Europe and indeed throughout the world. I am sure the house would want me to refer to his presence and assure him that Canadians are strongly and unalterably dedicated to the principles of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is with a very special pleasure that I rise to support what the Prime Minister has been good enough to say about our distinguished visitor, both on behalf of my party and on my own behalf. I have had the pleasure of working with Mr. Spaak and I know from first hand, as does the Prime Minister, what he has meant for the development of European and Atlantic unity. Indeed, no man has made a greater contribution to that measure of European unity which has been reached, and no man has done more to extend the concept of European unity across the Atlantic.

Perhaps the best tribute we can pay to the greatness of his Atlantic vision is to work in our respective parliaments toward this realization.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): We in the C.C.F. group wish to associate ourselves with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in welcoming our distinguished guest, Paul-Henri Spaak. In addition to his present important position, in the past he has had a very distinguished political career in his native country. Belgium and Canada have been very closely united in years gone by in a mutual struggle on behalf of democracy and freedom.

We look forward to the development of NATO in the direction of economic co-operation, both among European nations themselves and in the broader north Atlantic community. We think that a greater emphasis on the peaceful purposes and the economic purposes of NATO would be a service to the nations concerned and to mankind in general.

CIVIL DEFENCE

TABLING OF PAMPHLET ON FALL-OUT SHELTERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two copies in English and French of a pamphlet on fall-out shelters, which is the subject of a question on the order paper the answer to which will be given through the usual channels and should appear as an appendix to Hansard of today.

In presenting this pamphlet I can do no better than summarize the reasons for it in the words of the foreword, an excerpt from which reads as follows:

> The shelter described in this booklet, although not affording protection against the blast of a nuclear explosion or the fires that may result, will provide good protection against the more widespread radiation danger. These shelters will be a practical and reasonable means of insuring one's family against this risk that would arise should a war occur.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO VISIT TO JAPAN BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the reports that are circulating, and in view of the invitation the Prime Minister has recently received, can he tell the house whether he contemplates a visit to Japan in the near future?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not heard anything about that, but the experience of the last few days would not constitute a suggestion of the early probability of such an event.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—DISPOSITION OF SURPLUS HELD BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the very large stocks of creamery butter now held by the agricultural prices stabilization board, can the minister say what steps are being contemplated to reduce the surplus? Can the minister assure the dairy producers of this country that the butter will not be dumped on the open market and thus demoralize the butter market?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has never been any intention at any time of dumping butter, as the hon. member has expressed it, on the open market in order to demoralize prices. The price support program for dairy products was announced, of course, in April. I indicated at that time that we would engage in a promotional and advertising campaign in an attempt to sell more butter, and I trust that the consumption of butter during this year will be such that we shall not end up the year with a greater supply of butter than we had at the end of the last dairy year.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister agree that the policy now being followed in regard to butter is much preferable to the policy followed in regard to eggs, which policy has demoralized the egg market?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, the two products are entirely different. It has been indicated by me in the house on many occasions that the type of support program which can profitably and practicably be followed for a particular commodity is not necessarily one which can be followed for another commodity. We are making use of several different methods of supporting various agricultural commodities. I think that is the answer to the question the hon. member has posed.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF JUDGMENTS IN RECENT CASES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, for the convenience of hon. members who are considering certain legislation now before the house, he would endeavour to obtain copies of the reasons for judgment in two recent cases under the Combines Investigation Act and make them available by tabling them in the house, so that members of the house and of the committee could have them.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I assume the hon. member has reference to the pulpwood case which was decided the other day in Montreal and the other case—

Mr. Pickersgill: The one that was decided the following day in Toronto.

Mr. Fulton: That is the electrical contractors association. We will be glad to give immediate consideration to the request.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—REPORTED POLITICAL ACTIVITY OF RURAL MAIL DRIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Would the Postmaster General say whether he has received a telegram dated June 9 from Sherbrooke, Quebec, with regard to political activities on the part of a rural mail driver? If so, what steps have been taken by his department?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I am not aware of having received such a telegram, but I will have an inquiry made.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REPORTED REFUSAL OF CHINESE TO FILL OUT FORMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he heard the report on news broadcasts this morning, or had his attention drawn to it, that members of the Chinese community in Prince Rupert had concerted in a refusal to complete forms that they were asked to fill out by the R.C.M.P. Can the minister also say whether the R.C.M.P. have any authority to require Canadian citizens to fill out such forms?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in replying to this question I should also like to reply at the same time to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Skeena. The information I have does not indicate that that is being done. In fact it indicates the R.C.M.P. have not required the filling out of any form of questionnaire. They are conducting interviews. I think this question is also covered in the fuller reply I should like to give to the question asked yesterday.

Yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked whether the R.C.M.P. are at present conducting a so-called census, or endeavouring to obtain information by questionnaire of people of Chinese origin across Canada. He also asked under what authority such a census is being undertaken, and requested an indication whether the Chinese people are obliged to answer any such questions.

The R.C.M.P. are not conducting a census of people of Chinese origin across Canada, and this same reply also answers the question as to what authority there is for such a census. The R.C.M.P. are interviewing a number of Chinese and will be doing so for some time to come in an effort to obtain information concerning illegal immigration into Canada. The house will, of course, be aware that no person in Canada is obliged to answer questions asked by a police officer except where a specific statute provides such an obligation. No such statute applies in this case. We are, of course, most hopeful that Chinese Canadians will be willing to co-operate with the police in the present inquiry.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question. I wonder whether these questions are stemming from the newly established visa and immigration fraud section of the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Fulton: No. I think the answer I have given covers the point. The interviews in question are being carried out in connection with the inquiry into illegal immigration.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister tell the house whether the information given to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in these interviews could under any circumstances be used against the person giving the information in any subsequent legal proceedings that might be launched?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I think I am being asked to give a legal opinion here. If the hon. member will consult the hon. member who sits just in front of him and who, I believe, is studying law, I am sure he will get his answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the minister a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister say that the question of the hon. member was on a point of law and not of fact?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I agree with the minister that the question was not appropriate and asked for a legal opinion. I therefore do not see how there can be a supplementary question to an improper one.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a new question. Will the minister assure the house and the country that any information given to the R.C.M.P. in these interviews will under no circumstances be used in evidence in any subsequent legal proceeding against the person giving the information?

Mr. Fulton: I think my hon. friend will realize also, on reflection, that he is asking for a quite improper assurance.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: The laws of Canada cover the situation. The attitude of the government has been fully outlined by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It has been stated that the objective of the inquiry is to expose those who have been taking part in an illegal racket, and that in this regard we expect and hope to have the co-operation of the Chinese community who will be benefited by the exposure of the racket and by having their own status regularized as a result.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister have the R.C.M.P. warn any person giving information that the questions they are answering could be used in legal proceedings subsequently launched?

Mr. Fulton: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are a highly trained and skilled police force who carry out their investigations properly in accordance with the law in that regard.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN AMOUNT FOR DIRECT LENDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works, I wonder whether I might direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that housing starts in May were down 38 per cent and in the first five months were down 38½ per cent, plus the fact that not one limited dividend unit for low income groups was approved in the month of May, will the Prime Minister intercede and give consideration to an upward revision in the previously announced amount of money to be made available for direct lending this year—money,

I might add, that was voted by parliament for this purpose earlier this year?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this question to the attention of the Minister of Public Works. I can only say that when any policy is decided upon it will be made known in the house.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO STATUS OF MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It arises out of a very interesting report in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the premier of Ontario will be accompanied by municipal representatives at the coming federal-provincial conference. My question is this. What status will municipal representatives enjoy at this conference? Will they have the right to speak at the conference and to put before the conference the views of their municipal bodies?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The municipalities are the creation of the several provinces. The provincial delegations may, if they so decide, have representatives of municipalities as part of the provincial representations.

Mr. Argue: My question was whether they will have the right to make representations or presentations to the conference. Will they be called silent observers, or will they be taking part in the proceedings?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I presume the question of whether or not they will be "silent observers", to appropriate the words of the hon. gentleman, will depend on the premiers of the several provinces.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister indicate in what way the attitude of the present government on this question differs from that of the previous administration?

Mr. Argue: You are both the same.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member realizes that the question is not one for the orders of the day, nor is it the administrative responsibility of the Prime Minister to answer such questions on the orders of the day.

[Mr. Garland.]

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

BOBCAT VEHICLE—REPORTED PLAN BY ARMY TO PLACE ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence as the result of a story in this morning's Globe and Mail to the effect that the army plans to order 500 Bobcats at an expense of $17 million. Has a firm decision now been made?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. As I am sure hon. members know, we have been developing an armoured fighting vehicle. There is sufficient money in this year's estimates to complete that development, and after the development is completed a decision will be taken as to whether or not we will go into production.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

46. Departmental administration, $824,266.

Mr. Hardie: I understand that item 46 was held over for debate on the different branches of the department such as immigration and Indian affairs. I wish the house leader would try to organize the business of this house in a different fashion, because yesterday the committee on Indian affairs was sitting at the same time the estimates of this department were being considered in the house.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are discussing item 46, not procedure.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Mackenzie River was detained yesterday in the Indian affairs committee which, in my submission, should not have been sitting while this committee of supply was sitting. As a result the hon. member was deprived of an opportunity he ordinarily would have had to put these questions. I think there are also certain other circumstances which, in the minds of all hon. members, will make them feel the hon. member should be permitted to ask these questions. We have given an undertaking that we will not start any general debate and we intend to keep that undertaking, as I assured the hon. lady last night. I should hope the hon. member for Mackenzie River, in view of the peculiar circumstances, would be permitted to ask these questions and that the minister would be kind enough to answer.

Mr. Hardie: I will go along with that and not get into any general debate on Indian affairs in order to expedite the passage of these estimates. I should like to ask the minister if she could tell me what is the policy of the Indian affairs branch with regard to housing for Indians in the Northwest Territories, particularly as that policy covers the building of log or frame houses. I have nothing against the department's program. As a matter of fact, all I have is praise for the department's program on housing in the Northwest Territories.

However, there are some aspects of this program of which I am critical, and of which the people up there are critical. Why is it that in areas in which there is good timber, good logs for housing, the department builds frame houses, while in other areas where the timber is not good for building log houses the department asks the Indians to haul out fourth and fifth grade logs to put into housing? I wish the minister would tell me whether there is any definite policy on this. Why do they build log houses where they have no logs, and why do they build frame houses where they have plenty of logs?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, in general, the type of construction is a matter of agreement with the Indians. I do not know this specific case to which the hon. member refers. If he would be good enough to give me the location and the details I should be happy to get him a complete report. Furthermore, if we find that the proper material has not been used, I can assure him we will look into the matter.

Mr. Hardie: For the residents of Fort Smith, next to Wood Buffalo park where the department of northern affairs claim there is a billion feet of good standing timber, the Indian affairs branch is building frame houses; whereas at Fort Franklin, where there is practically no timber, they are asking the Indians to haul logs to build cabins. At Fort Simpson, where there are plenty of suitable building logs, they build frame dwellings, while in Fort Good Hope, where there are no logs, they are asking the Indians to haul logs for building. There are many other cases about which I will speak to the minister at some other time.

I would also like the minister to tell me what is the general policy with regard to Indian housing. The building of some of these houses is let out on contract. In other places the Indians are asked to provide the labour and the logs to build them. I would also like the hon. lady to give me some information about the new town site at Inuvik where the department of northern affairs erected some 100 buildings. I understand they are turning some of these over for sale to the Indians, but the Indian pays $25 a month rent and the rest goes toward the purchase price of the house. The Indians cannot understand how they can buy and rent at the same time.

Mrs. Fairclough: Does the hon. member mean they are paying $50 a month?

Mr. Hardie: Fifty dollars a month, of which $25 goes against the purchase of the house and $25 is applied as rent. The Indian would like to purchase a house. He does not see why the whole $50 he pays should not be applied against the purchase price.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not have the particulars of the case which the hon. member has brought up, but I think this is a rental purchase scheme. I shall be glad to look into it, but it is probably arranged on the same basis as any other rental purchase agreement.

With regard to the other question the hon. member asked, the policy of the department with respect to housing is that the Indian, if he can, contributes to the erection of his own house either in cash, if he has cash either of his own or from the band fund, or through his own labour. Sometimes a man is fully employed, or employed part time, and would prefer to contribute in cash rather than in labour. In other cases where he is not otherwise engaged he would prefer to be working on the house himself. We think it is very important that the Indian should contribute his share of the cost of the house.

Of course the number of houses built depends on the arrangement made with the band. The band itself decides where the houses are needed most. The band knows approximately how many can be constructed in its own area in a given season, and decides who shall have the houses and what contribution is to be made. There is no hard and fast rule that so much is contributed in all cases either in cash or labour; it is a flexible arrangement between the department and the band council, and the Indian is definitely expected to contribute his share toward the house.

Mr. Hardie: The minister in her reply mentioned co-operation between the agent and the Indians in deciding who is to get a house, and I agree that this does go on. But we have a serious problem raised by the very old people and people who are infirm. For instance, when I last went into Fort Good Hope there were five houses to be built. No one knew when the housing program would start. I went to the tent of a man who was over 70 years of age. He was crippled, and his wife had practically to carry him to the trap line. She did the trapping. I asked this man whether he was getting a house, and he told me he was not. I asked him why and his reply was "I am too old". So I went to see the chief and asked him what was the idea. I told him the man was suffering and that he presumably needed a house, one of the five houses allotted. But the chief said "He is too old. If we build a new house he will not live that long." The young people ask why these houses should go to the very old and to people who are only going to live a very short length of time.

This brings up another problem, the problem of homes for the aged and infirm. In the past four or five years both Roman Catholic and Anglican missions have closed down a number of schools and will be closing down hospitals this year at Aklavik. Hospitals and schools have already been closed at Fort Providence and Resolution. I feel the department should give serious consideration to using these buildings as homes for the aged and infirm, and also as means of relieving another serious problem, that of Indian children who are left to fend for themselves after both parents have been taken from home, possibly to enter a tuberculosis hospital. I really think the minister should give consideration to providing one such home at Fort Providence, one at Resolution and at least one at Aklavik to look after this situation.

Mrs. Fairclough: As the hon. member says, these are very real problems. I hope the opening of the new regional office at Fort Smith, which I discussed in the committee yesterday, will lead to more adequate supervision of the area. This question of housing for aged persons is another problem, of course. I remember that last summer when I was at Winterburn, west of Edmonton, the band there had set up an old people's community. They had about six houses, and an aged couple was living in each. They were nice little houses and everyone was most happy about it. I am sure the old people themselves were happier than they would have been in an institution.

This problem also requires the co-operation of the band. I do not think the department could move in over the head of the band unless action was taken on an institutional basis and you removed the people from the band and put them in an institution. Again the human element arises, and whether they would want to go is another problem. I can assure the hon. member that we are looking into this problem. This is one of the matters that have to be faced, and I hope we can come up with a solution concerning what to do about these aged persons.

[Mr. Hardie.]

Mr. Hardie: The minister announced the establishment of a new regional office in Fort Smith. I am very happy that over the past few years an increasing number of people have been placed in the north by the Indian affairs branch to look after the welfare of the native peoples. However, the progress has been too slow, and we need additional people. In a speech I made in this chamber some years ago I pointed out that there were 23 game wardens in the area I represent and four people working for the Indian affairs branch. In other words there were 23 people looking after the welfare of game and only four looking after the welfare of human beings. The department is still not doing enough, and more men should be put in the field.

Every day I receive letters from places like Snowdrift, where they have not seen an Indian agent for months. It is not the fault of the agent, who has too large an area to cover. Assistant Indian agents should be placed in isolated places such as Snowdrift, Fort Providence and Fort Liard. At Fort Rae we have the largest settlement of Indians in the Northwest Territories, but there is no Indian agent or assistant.

We are told that we have less game, including caribou, than we ever had, but the population of native Indians is increasing. If the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources can sell treasury board on the idea of hiring game wardens and forestry people, a good many of whom are stationed at places where there is no timber, there is no reason why the Indian affairs branch cannot convince treasury board of the genuine need for an increase in staff to look after the human element in our part of the country.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman. I can give the hon. member some information which I think will please him. In the estimates for this year it is indicated that the establishment for Mackenzie district calls for 17 persons.

Mr. Hardie: Would they be additional persons?

Mrs. Fairclough: I think there is an increase of about 13 or 14, which should assist in the situation.

Mr. Fisher: When the minister finds it convenient perhaps she will give us figures on the backlog of applications of potential immigrants from Rome and other places.

Mrs. Fairclough: I will be pleased to provide the hon. member with the figures he requests. I believe the backlog in Rome is in excess of 63,000. If the hon. member would indicate the countries in which he is interested I will see that he gets the figures.

Mr. Fisher: I am especially interested in Italy and Finland, and I obviously have an academic interest in the Hong Kong situation.

Mrs. Fairclough: Would the hon. member be satisfied if I sent the information to him?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us what follow up is maintained with respect to Indian boys and girls who leave vocational training schools and take employment? If they find themselves unemployed does the department attempt to find new employment for them?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is what we hope to do. I do not know whether the hon. member was present last evening when I spoke about our placement officers in the territories. This is part of our over-all program. One such officer will be working out of Fort Smith. These young people will be placed in employment wherever possible. We propose to follow up that employment and assist them where necessary. In any event we propose to keep an eye on them and see how they are getting along.

Mr. Hardie: At some stage could the minister give me an idea of the number of graduates from vocational training schools in Yellowknife who have gone into employment, and a brief report on what these young people are doing at the present time?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes. We will have to get the information from northern affairs, but we will get it for the hon. member. Until now it has been in their hands, but with the establishment of this new office we expect there will be a change in the situation.

Mr. Hardie: The education of Indians is a responsibility of northern affairs, but I know the department does not conduct a follow up to see what happens to the graduates of their schools. It is the responsibility of the Indian affairs branch to see what happens to children who graduate and take employment.

Mrs. Fairclough: I agree, Mr. Chairman. I believe the hon. member misunderstood me. I simply meant that in order to cover the situation in which he is interested we would have to consult with northern affairs, but I assure him that we recognize our responsibilities.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 240 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 241 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: What item is 240?

Mrs. Fairclough: It is the administration item covering the national gallery of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think that vote should be regarded as not having carried. I apologize to the committee, but I was engaged in conversation and was not paying adequate attention to the proceedings. Has the hon. lady a statement to make?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes I agree with the hon. member; we disposed of that vote very rapidly.

National gallery of Canada—

240. Administration, operation and maintenance including grants as detailed in the estimates, $929,145.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, this year the national gallery of Canada entered upon a new era of its history. In November, 1959 the entire national collection and the personnel maintaining it moved from the old premises in the Victoria memorial museum to the new Lorne building on Elgin street in central Ottawa. The move was a highly specialized operation requiring the skilled and careful handling of priceless works of art, a voluminous library, valuable scientific equipment and office furnishing. Thanks to very ably co-ordinated direction I am happy to state that the move was successfully completed without accident, loss or incident of any kind.

The new national gallery of Canada was opened by the Prime Minister, Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker, before a distinguished gathering of some 3,000 persons on Wednesday evening, February 17, 1960.

Mr. Pearson: All in white ties.

Mrs. Fairclough: Congratulatory addresses were presented by representatives of museum associations in Europe, the United States and Canada. The occasion was further celebrated by an inaugural loan exhibition of old master paintings, generously and willingly lent by many of the great national collections of the western world.

I am happy to report, too, that since that gala opening evening the national gallery of Canada has established a record of unprecedented attendance. Beginning on February 17 and ending as of the closing hour on June 16, the checked attendance has been 299,163 persons. Should attendance continue as it has begun it will be seen that it is a reasonable conjecture to assume that by next February a million people may have visited and enjoyed the enviable collections on exhibition in the Lorne building.

This is a most encouraging demonstration of Canadian public interest in the collections, and in the services which the national gallery of Canada provides. It also justifies the confidence this house has shown by its support of careful planning proposed by the board of trustees.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations about this new era. At the beginning I should like to put a few questions to the minister so she can get the necessary information to answer them before the item passes. Can the minister give the date when the new building was started? Can she say who was the minister when the new building was started? Can she say who was the chairman of the board when the new building was started, and who was the director of the national gallery when the new building was started?

Mr. Nesbitt: Don't you know?

Mr. Pickersgill: If modesty did not prevent me from doing so perhaps I could give some of that information to the committee myself, but I prefer to have it come officially from the minister.

I must say that it was a great satisfaction to me personally, and I think it was a great satisfaction to all members of the previous administration who authorized the building of the new national gallery and who made every arrangement for it, to see the completion of this great project which they had planned, organized and started.

I must say that on the occasion of that gala white-tie opening by the Prime Minister I was not altogether surprised to be asked by one of those present a question to which I did not know the answer in the context in which it was asked. That question was, "What do we have a governor general for?" The question was put because when the original national gallery was opened in the 1880's it was opened by the Marquis of Lorne, who at that time was governor general of Canada. It would have appeared to some of us that this was an occasion of sufficient consequence to have warranted the appearance at that time of the representative of the crown; but I do not intend to labour that point at all.

There are certain unfortunate circumstances that did attend that opening. The most unfortunate of all, I think, was that the man who perhaps had done more than any other person, by his hard work and his enthusiasm, to get the kind of support for the gallery which it now enjoys in this country was not present. I refer to Mr. Alan Jarvis, who "retired" from the position of director shortly before the opening of the gallery. In all the speeches that were made on that occasion his name was not even mentioned. It did seem to me that this was not the kind of generosity, and even good sense, that there ought to have been on a non-partisan occasion of this kind on the part of the government of our country.

I do not blame the government for not mentioning the fact that it was the government of Mr. St. Laurent that was responsible for this project. One can understand why they did not mention that. There was the barest mention of the fact that Mr. Percy Fell also had something to do with it but he was at least present. Outside of that it was, it seemed to me, an example of conscious or unconscious partisanship or a sort of private possession on the part of a political party in the government of our country that I think is to be deplored on occasions of that kind. I feel that this ought to be said, not because what was done can be undone but in the hope that this kind of partisan exploitation of the common possessions of all the Canadian people will not happen again.

Now, sir, I do want to say a word or two about some of the unfortunate things that I think have happened in connection with the administration of the national gallery. I think it is very unfortunate that the gallery lost the services of Mr. Jarvis. I do not think that anyone who did not have the experience I had and the experience that some of my colleagues had can calculate the effect of Mr. Jarvis' enthusiasm and drive in creating in this country a support for the national gallery and a public interest in it on the part of all sorts and conditions of people that was really extraordinary. Those very gratifying figures that the minister gave up to the latest date, which I think was last night, of 300,000 people who had already visited the gallery since it opened is, I think, some evidence of the kind of public interest there is in the national gallery and in the arts in this country today.

I do think, too, that it would not be fitting to refer on this occasion to this development without making a reference to the former governor general of Canada, Right Hon. Vincent Massey, who in every capacity that he has had throughout the course of his distinguished adult life has been a great and discerning patron of the arts, and who, in the contribution he made to those things which are more than bread alone, through the report of his commission and through the other interest he has shown in this matter, should not be forgotten on an occasion of this kind. Indeed, if the government had chosen to invite Mr. Massey to open the national gallery I do not think anyone would have felt that it was a misplaced tribute.

I do not intend to make any great issue—because I am sure Mr. Jarvis does not want any great issue made—of the circumstances of his retirement. I do not want to say anything unnecessary about other aspects, other unfortunate incidents, that have occurred in the past year. But there are one or two things that it is necessary, in my opinion, to say. The retirement of so distinguished a citizen as Mr. Cleveland Morgan from the board of the national gallery took place in a fashion which caused the Montreal Gazette—which is, I think, normally pretty friendly to the present government and certainly pretty friendly to the party that the present government represents in this house—to say this in an editorial on October 26. The editorial is headed "Too Much Interference" and goes on to say:

> It may become increasingly difficult for the government to find good and qualified citizens to serve on independent boards and tribunals, if the government insists on interfering with their policies and decisions.
> The latest example of the sort of troubles that are arising is seen in the resignation of Mr. F. Cleveland Morgan of Montreal from the board of trustees of the national gallery of Canada. His resignation follows that of another trustee of the gallery, Mr. C. P. Fell of Toronto.

I am not going to put the rest of the editorial on Hansard. I think it is only characteristic of the difference between their personalities, but not characteristic of the difference in their attitude to the government, that at the time Mr. Morgan resigned Mr. Lawren Harris, who is not only one of the greatest of our artists but a man of extraordinary discernment and capacity in many fields, and who has made a great contribution as a member of the board of the national gallery, also had something to say, and I have here a news clipping from the Vancouver Sun of October 29. It is headed "Harris Adds Voice to Gallery Uproar", and reads as follows:

> Vancouver, Oct. 28 (CP)—Artist Lawren Harris today added his voice to protests against the federal government appointment of a new chairman of the national art gallery without reference to the trustees. Mr. Harris, a trustee of the gallery for several years, also said the government "hasn't taken any interest at all" in the gallery.
> F. Cleveland Morgan of Montreal resigned from the board of trustees in protest against the appointment of Thomas Maher of Quebec city as chairman without consultation with the board. Mr. Harris, however, said he will not resign from the board.
> "I think it would be a mistake to resign," he said. "If you resign, you're out. You can't say anything. I'll stay until they force me out."
>
> Mr. Harris added that art dealers all over the world now are suspicious of deals with the Canadian gallery because of the federal government's reversal of a decision to buy a painting by Lorenzo Monaco.
> "The government told us to go ahead and a London art dealer bought the painting. Then the government turned around and refused to buy it. This would never have happened with a Liberal government," he said.

Of course the root of all this trouble is the repudiation by the government of an undertaking made by one of the ministers of the crown, not the present minister but the gentleman who was locum tenens in that department for nearly a year. This repudiation of an undertaking to purchase was one of the shabbiest performances we have ever seen in this country because, as we found last year on the estimates and as ought to be repeated from time to time, the government were perfectly willing to buy the painting as long as they thought it could be paid for out of an appropriation for which they could blame the Liberal government. But when they found there was no appropriation and that they would have to come to the house to ask for an appropriation and assume their own responsibility for it, they ratted. That is the only possible word to use to describe what happened. It has certainly done nothing to enhance the good name of the government.

I know the Minister of Finance takes great exception to the suggestion that the government had any obligation, and in the case of a sovereign government it was not, of course, a legal obligation. No, it was only an obligation of honour. I admit that at once. It was only an obligation of honour, just like the obligation in term 29 of the terms of union with Newfoundland. If this government can find some legal way of weaseling out of obligations of honour, which honourable governments accustomed to fair dealing under the British tradition never do, they think it is perfectly all right, quite justifiable and the right thing to do. I think that as often as possible voices should be raised in parliament to indicate that there are people and political parties in this country who do not believe in that kind of conduct.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the outline of recent happenings and changes at the national gallery given by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is fairly close to what would be my own criticism. I think the minister is much more vulnerable in respect of the agencies for which she is responsible than she is so far as the activities of her own department are concerned. I know I want to indicate later how disgraceful I think the situation is with regard to the movement toward a national library.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fisher: I am not on the national library.

The Deputy Chairman: I was wondering why the hon. member was referring to the national library.

Mr. Fisher: It is one of the cultural agencies for which the minister is responsible. I also wish to refer later to the sad state of another cultural agency, the national museum. I wanted to argue that it might be a good idea if we could bring together under one minister some of these cultural agencies which are now scattered. Perhaps the minister might be able to find within the Conservative ranks a member who is sympathetic to cultural things and prepared to give them the kind of encouragement that is needed, encouragement that is especially needed among Conservative members as a whole because I am afraid the antagonism toward art, for example, reflected by the attitude toward the estimates of the gallery and also the way Mr. Jarvis was treated, are a fairly true indication of the feelings of Conservative members.

There was one part of the report of Mr. Lawren Harris' remarks that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate did not read.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman, unlike the Minister of Justice, would pronounce the old name of Twillingate correctly.

Mr. Fisher: To my mind, if this statement can be accepted as true—and I know that one cannot always accept newspaper stories as fact—Mr. Harris deserves the congratulations of everybody in the country, whether Liberal, Conservative or socialist. Any man who will take the forthright position that he is damned if he is going to go, that he is going to stay and say his piece, certainly deserves a lusty pat on the back. I hope he stays on the board of the national gallery for a long time.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate failed to quote another sentence that I thought he would probably wish to quote. The report I have is found in a different newspaper, the Toronto Star of October 28, 1959, and the sentence reads as follows:

> "Conservative governments have never shown any interest whatever in art," he asserted from his home in Vancouver.

I think it is delightful that a man with these beliefs is going to remain on the board and try to do something about them within the framework of the board. This is the kind of dissent and spirit that we need more of in Canada.

With respect to the departure of Mr. Jarvis from the national gallery, I think everyone is aware that to say he resigned is to put a peculiar face upon the matter. I think most of us are aware of what actually happened, and that a resignation under such duress is not really a resignation at all. I do not doubt that Mr. Jarvis is not an easy person for a minister to deal with, but with respect to artistic matters I would judge that the hon. lady may not be the easiest person to get along with, either.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is only supposition.

Mr. Fisher: It seemed to me that she moved with a great deal of stubbornness and bitterness that was uncalled for. In saying that I do not wish to reflect in any way upon the man who has been selected to succeed Mr. Jarvis, because we all know that he has a distinguished reputation in the field. But the very thing about Mr. Jarvis that appealed to me and that appeals to many other people is the sort of thing we see reflected in Mr. Harris, a willingness to take an outright and forthright stand, to be unafraid of criticism or of criticizing in return.

It seems to me we have to make a distinction between a civil servant who is completely an administrator within a department and someone who is responsible for a cultural agency; because the very life of art, literature and philosophy is dissent, disagreement and argument based upon different points of view. From the very great pride that the Prime Minister and the minister seem to have taken in the opening of the gallery and the subsequent events there it would appear that Mr. Jarvis' preparations were not a failure. In other words, what the minister has told us indicates that he was a great success as head of the national gallery, because it is almost impossible to believe that in the short time since he left the new broom or simply the difference in location has brought about the tremendous change now apparent in the new building.

In more particular detail I should like to ask the minister questions relating to the reason for the increase in the budget for the purchase of paintings this year after the very skimpy amount provided last year. The general argument has been made that last year was a bigger spending year than the present one, the estimates for which are now before us. We have the story right down the line that this government got tough this year on spending; that it slashed here and slashed there. The Minister of Public Works is very proud of the pruning job that was done there, and this seems to the case right across the board. However, in this tough year this government changes face in so far as the estimates for the purchase of art are concerned and increases them substantially. I think it is in the magnitude of eight times.

I wonder whether the minister would concede that this alteration is perhaps a result of the departure of Mr. Jarvis; that the situation was deliberately aggraved when he was head of the national gallery by cutting the estimates so low that it had an effect on the job he was trying to do.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is utter nonsense.

Mr. Fisher: Well, I am glad to hear it is utter nonsense. Then I expect that we will get an explanation of the reason.

Mrs. Fairclough: I gave an explanation last year, but I shall be glad to repeat it.

Mr. Fisher: We will be glad to hear it. It does seem peculiar to find a jump of $160,000 in the straitened circumstances in which the government seems to be this year. I have one specific criticism of the gallery which is the result of my attempt to arrange an art exhibit up in my own part of the country.

Mr. Chambers: One man?

Mr. Fisher: I was not arranging a one man exhibit. If I could, I probably would have tried to have Mr. Lawren Harris because, as the hon. member may know, he has made some magnificent paintings of the lake Superior country.

Mr. Chambers: Oh, I thought it was you.

Mr. Fisher: I made an attempt to get a collection of paintings that is circulating around the country called "The Group of Seven and After". I was told that collection was being shown elsewhere, which was a legitimate excuse. However, when I pressed to find out what was necessary in order to get an art exhibit at the lakehead, I was given what I thought was the complete run-around. I was told that no place at the lakehead had been established as a proper place in which to show art. I pressed this further and I was told that, after all, a member from the gallery had gone through northern Ontario and had arranged the approval of certain places, I expect in terms of fire hazards and display space, as being proper. When I pressed the matter I discovered where they had been in northern Ontario. This particular person or persons who had gone around, I discovered, had not even touched over half of northern Ontario. According to the national gallery, northern Ontario seems to consist of Sault Ste. Marie, New Liskeard and Haileybury. This indicated to me that the gallery officers who were responsible for these displays had shown a remarkable lack of initiative.

The other thing that bothered me about the way I was put off was that I was told the people who wished to put on the show—it was the Lakehead College of Art, Science and Technology—should really work through provincial authorities. Here again it seemed to me we were going to have the old constitutional jurisdictional question. In art, of all things, if agencies have to work through provincial branches before they can go to the federal branch here, then we have an interpretation of the British North America Act and the various jurisdictions which completely baffles me. The fact that a local organization cannot satisfy the national gallery about its ability to put on a show, without having to go through a provincial art association or society, is something I cannot swallow.

I might say that the particular problem of the lakehead college ended happily. They found the Toronto art gallery quick and alert in providing them with paintings. They had a very good display, and everyone was impressed with both the collection and the demonstration of zeal given by the Toronto gallery in providing them with this collection. What they feel about the national art gallery is another matter.

The last remark I want to make in connection with the gallery follows from this. We are always glad to see Ottawa made a greater and greater attraction. I know a woman with four children who had saved for a number of years to come down here in order to spend a whole week in the gallery. She comes from my constituency. She went through the gallery day after day and spent hours in the various collections and was immensely pleased. Of course, her reaction was the obvious one; if we could only have more things of this kind, even on a smaller scale, circulated around the country. This, it seems to me, is one of the ways in which you will have to judge the performance of the national gallery; not only upon the displays that have been put forward for people who are able to come to Ottawa or who live in Ottawa, but upon what the gallery does about sending its displays around the country. I would appreciate very much having an indication as to whether there are any plans for expansion in this regard.

I understand that the national gallery takes the view that if you do not have a responsible local group to sponsor something, art displays are most unlikely to be successful. I should like to know something about what the standard is for sponsoring groups. I can see a situation where in some areas of northern Ontario a Rotary club, Kiwanis club or teachers' association might be an excellent sponsoring group. It might even be worth while, in places such as that, to see whether a few people could be put in the field to work up interest. I would be interested in hearing from the minister what the gallery's plans are in that particular regard.

I should be interested also if the minister could tell us something about a subject in which my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West is probably interested, something of the artistic question; as to where the gallery stands on modern, abstract, realism, and all those things.

Mrs. Fairclough: I will ask the board of trustees to give the hon. member a report on where they stand with regard to the cultural aspects of the situation, because it is beyond me. In so far as these exhibitions are concerned, taking the last question first, I may say it is true that some of them are handled through art circuits. It is an administrative procedure which works out to the benefit both of the ultimate exhibitors and also the gallery, because these people have developed techniques for handling these exhibitions.

With regard to exhibitions being held in specific places, I may say I do not know what the situation is in my hon. friend's vicinity, but it is necessary to have exhibition space which permits a reasonable degree of security, which is fireproof, where atmospheric fluctuations are not too severe, heat, humidity and so on, because these are valuable paintings and the board does not feel it could risk this type of work in premises which are not suitable. In general that is the explanation for some of these refusals to send to certain places. If the hon. member wishes to pursue that matter further I will arrange with him to consult with the gallery with respect to what is considered to be a suitable place in which to have an exhibition.

I should tell him also that this year there are some 28 exhibitions which will be touring Canada. Two of these exhibitions will cost about $25,000 each, so it is not a small item at all. However, we consider that it is a most important aspect of the work of the gallery, and I hope these exhibitions will be enthusiastically received in the various centres in which they are shown. One of the collections which is being exhibited is the one to which the hon. member referred, namely the group of seven.

Two hon. members who have spoken have made reference to the remarks of Mr. Lawren Harris. I do not propose to pursue that particular remark of his at all. All I will say is this. I suggest that those hon. members confer with Mr. Harris today and find out what his feelings are; because I understand that in so far as the board is concerned and in so far as the gallery in general is concerned, they are most amicable.

The hon. member asked for an explanation of the purchase account. I think I should start by noting the expenditures for the national gallery. I will go back four years. For the year 1956-57 they were $351,000; for 1957-58 they were $465,000; for 1958-59 they were $546,000; for 1959-60 the amount asked for was $914,000. In other words the amount was almost doubled. In the year of the move the officials of the gallery were extremely busy, as members of the committee can well understand, in planning for the move to the new building and in restoring some works that had to be restored in order to permit them to be installed in the new building. A great deal of activity was going on, and after careful consideration and consultation it was considered that there was not going to be too much time in which to make selections for additions to the collection.

Consequently, after considerable discussion it was agreed to leave in the purchase allocation for that year a nominal amount which would permit the acquisition of some small items, largely Canadian items, because a certain amount of acquisition of works of Canadian artists is going on all the time. When that year ended and the appropriations were being drawn for the next year, the purchase account was restored again. It had nothing whatever to do with personalities. It was the simple fact that the appropriation for one year doubled in any event just because of the move, and it was felt that the purchase acount could quite properly be dropped for that particular period. I might say that this was a decision which was accepted and agreed upon by the members. I think there was no particular dislocation of the activities of the gallery as a result of that decision.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate asked me to put a little bit of history on the record, something which I am pleased to do. I can assure him that at no time was there any intention to detract from his glory. The actual building, of course, is a matter of concern to the Department of Public Works. When it was first started I think it was intended to be an office building for the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, no. The minister is wrong about that matter.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then I am misinformed. That just indicates that I can scarcely be expected to give historical data with respect to a period for which I was not responsible. If the hon. member wants to set the record straight and wants to say what happened under his jurisdiction, that is a matter that is entirely up to him. I may say that I understand that the minister who was responsible for the department at the time was a certain Hon. J. W. Pickersgill, who was the member for Bonavista-Twillingate, if approval is given to my pronunciation, and that the chairman of the board was Mr. C. P. Fell.

Again, I know that Mr. Fell would be only too happy to agree with me that his resignation had nothing whatever to do with the altercations which arose. He made that point abundantly clear to me in a personal interview and later in a letter. In fact he regretted that pressure of other business forced him to resign just at that particular time, but he asked me to understand that nothing in the nature of personalities entered at all into his resignation. Hon. members who doubt that statement can have it corroborated by Mr. Fell himself.

The director at that time was Mr. Alan Jarvis. I agree with hon. members that Mr. Jarvis did an excellent job for the national gallery. His enthusiasm was unbounded and his knowledge leaves little to be desired. I think he did a good job for the gallery. There is again no personal feeling whatsoever with regard to the situation which developed.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made an observation with reference to the opening. If he will cast his mind back he will recall that the former governor general, Right Hon. Vincent Massey, laid the cornerstone of the building or officiated at the laying of the cornerstone, something which we thought was significant because, as has been said, he is a noteworthy patron of the arts and a very knowledgeable one. When the opening was planned it was recognized that his term of office would have expired and that there would be a new governor general. However, at that time it was not known who the new governor general would be. It was therefore impossible to invite Mr. Massey in his capacity as governor general; and inasmuch as he had already officiated at the important function of laying the cornerstone it was felt that his mark could be left on the building in any event. It was impossible to invite the new governor general when we did not know who it would be. Again, if my hon. friend will think back, he will realize that the appointment of the new governor general took place very shortly before the opening of the building.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. lady give the date of the opening of the building?

Mrs. Fairclough: February 17. It was originally planned for earlier, but construction of the building was delayed. The opening was accordingly delayed for some three months, I believe. It was originally scheduled for November.

I think I have answered most of the questions that have been asked. I think I shall not comment on some of the other things that have been said. I hope the hon. member feels better for having got them off his chest.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are one or two points to which I want to refer with regard to the hon. lady's explanation. In the first place I want to congratulate the hon. lady on her debating ingenuity. The explanation of why the Governor General could not open the Lorne building is undoubtedly a nice one to have on the record, but the hon. lady will not mind my saying that she has strained our credulity more that she usually does.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is the absolute truth.

Mr. Pickersgill: The absolute truth is something; as a jesting Pilate said, that is very hard to determine.

Mrs. Fairclough: You are supposed to take my word.

Mr. Pickersgill: In the parliamentary sense I accept the hon. lady's word. However, to come to the purchase account, of course the hon. lady's explanation went far beyond the point of straining our credulity. As the hon. lady knows perfectly well, amounts paid into the purchase account do not lapse.

Mrs. Fairclough: I never said they did.

Mr. Pickersgill: No. But the hon. lady said they would be so busy moving that they would not have time to buy any new pictures. If they could not spend it before the fiscal year ended, it would remain in the purchase account, and they could have bought that many more pictures this year. Therefore that explanation is really unworthy of the hon. lady and unworthy of being given to the committee; and of course this attitude is in contrast with what happened in that country which in the past, before the 15 per cent and things of that sort, the hon. lady's party used to admire so greatly. I have in my hand a copy of the New York Times for Wednesday, February 3, and I suppose the hon. lady would admit that even though this is published in the United States it is a reputable newspaper.

Mr. Pallett: What year?

Mr. Pickersgill: 1960. There is a reproduction here of a painting which was bought by the national gallery of the United Kingdom. The heading reads "Britain's National Gallery Buys Rembrandt 'Man on Horseback'" and the text beneath the reproduction says "Price is above $386,000 and may be as high as $840,000—exchequer planning more major purchases."

We know, of course, that in the United Kingdom they have full employment and prosperity, and it may be they are better able to afford to encourage the arts than is the government of Canada, which repudiated an undertaking it had given to buy a painting for a smaller sum of money. I thought the committee and the public would be interested to observe this contrast.

I do not intend to deal further with the unfortunate events of the past year in so far as the national gallery is concerned. The minister has been very fortunate indeed, in my opinion, in getting a very eminent Canadian, very well qualified, to be the director; and speaking not only for myself but, I believe, for my friends in the house, I wish him well. We extend these good wishes to the board also, including the new chairman.

Mr. McGee: First of all, I should like to concur in the good wishes offered by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to the new director and the board. I was wondering, incidentally, whether the new director shares the view of his predecessor that there might be a cocktail lounge established in the cafeteria, and I would be interested in what the minister may have to say about that.

What I should like to suggest to the minister and to the directors of the gallery is something which relates to the presence in Ottawa during May and June of large numbers of school children. Over a thousand have visited this city from my constituency alone, and one only has to examine the attendance in the galleries on Fridays and, indeed, on other days of the week, to appreciate the thousands upon thousands of young Canadians who are visiting the House of Commons.

I was wondering whether consideration had been given to a display which might be on view, particularly during the months of May and June, indicating in one area the development of Canadian art from its earliest stages to its latest developments. If that suggestion has not yet been considered I should like to put it forward. It might be left through the tourist season as well, but I am more particularly interested in the grade school and high school students who are visiting the national capital, who would then have the opportunity of seeing the process illustrated in its original form. I appreciate that this sort of information is given to them in varying degrees in the various school systems, but I think it would be appropriate to have this development of Canadian art on view during these particular months.

Mrs. Fairclough: I can assure the hon. member that we do that now. There are daily lectures addressed to various age groups, and one of them is on the subject of the development of Canadian art.

Mr. Herridge: Lacking the personal heritage of culture and cultural opportunities enjoyed by many members of this house, I hesitate to rise to speak on this item. Therefore I want it clearly understood that I do not speak as an authority, but simply as one representing the views of certain people who have written to me and conversed with me in connection with our national gallery, in which a great number of people in Canada are taking an increasing interest.

We have an excellent catalogue of paintings. We have an excellent building at the present time and, as has been mentioned by three previous speakers, we have a very competent director in charge. So we have all the materials for success, providing we get understanding and co-operation from the various sections of Canada and the Canadian people in general. That is the first point I wish to make. I am not competent to deal with some of these other matters which concern those who have the training and experience and who can give opinions on art. I am one who likes to see pictures which represent things as I see them; I am a simple soul.

I was interested in the opening of the gallery, which ceremony I attended in a black tie; but I think the arrangements showed that someone was a little out of touch with the needs and interests of the people in general, when provision was made for attendance by 5,000 people wearing white ties. A whole brigade of people wearing white ties; imagine that. What a frightening prospect in connection with the national gallery. Anyone would think it was a military parade. While I understand the symbolic nature of the white tie I think it could have been confined to the few, to the inner group of very important people. Therefore I suggest that in future invitations to these functions should be given out in a way which would not prohibit the attendance of a large number of ordinary people who are artists or interested in art.

Let me point out first, that it would be impossible to obtain 5,000 white ties in Ottawa at one time for one function; and second, that the great majority of those who are interested in the art gallery cannot afford an outfit of this style. I do suggest that an opportunity be provided on other occasions for ordinary people like the hon. member for Kootenay West to attend, in ordinary clothes.

In connection with this opening I also wish to say that I listened with interest to the Prime Minister, the director and other persons who were there. I had made up my mind to say this, and I will do so. I thought it was the most shocking example of bad manners on the part of the people in the white tie class that I have ever seen in my life. I can only put it this way; that when the Prime Minister was speaking there were white ties to the right of him, white ties to the left of him and white ties in front of him that whispered and murmured. I was very annoyed and the other people around him were annoyed; and I say, as a member of the working class, that I know the working class would have shown better manners on such an occasion.

I draw some other matters to the attention of the minister because they have been drawn to my attention by constituents of mine who come to Ottawa to spend a week or so in the city, and others who visit the national gallery on various occasions. I suggest we have to make the gallery a friendly place. It is not sufficient for a visitor to go up to an information desk at which a rather superior young lady is sitting reading a book, and wait until she looks up and says, "What do you want?" You ask the question, and she says "Fourth floor" and goes on reading.

I have had that complaint from four people who have visited the gallery. That is not the right attitude. Of course the person at the desk possibly is not a civil servant. Perhaps it is someone from the Girl Guides or an organization such as that volunteering her spare time. If the persons on the information desk are on the staff they should be friendly. That is the place to create a friendly atmosphere. This woman received a crisp answer at the desk. Then she looked at one of the paintings and said she thought she was in the wrong institution. Attendance will increase in the future. The minister said one million people have already attended.

Mrs. Fairclough: The figure was 300,000. We think it will be one million this year.

Mr. Herridge: Interest is increasing. People who are not accustomed to visiting galleries should be treated with courtesy and made to feel at home in their national gallery.

I am told we have done very well in terms of collecting typical paintings representative of various periods and European and other schools but I have to accept other peoples' opinions in this respect. There should now be an opportunity to give greater recognition to Canadian artists. We should not spend large sums of money buying paintings from Europe or the United States if we already have pictures representative of a given school or period. We should also provide representation for schools and groups of Canadian artists from coast to coast. A number of amateur artists recommended that to me.

I am reliably informed that we have many paintings, including war paintings, in storage and that a man, perhaps a commissionaire, is employed to take care of them. Later on I want to know their number, size and subjects. Greater use could be made of them in all sections of Canada. I promised three artistic ladies in Ottawa to mention that and I always try to please the ladies.

Mr. Cooper: Does the hon. member wear lipstick?

Mr. Herridge: We can only have one national gallery at this time. Therefore we should arrange tours of pictures to give all Canadians a chance to view them. I have not had time to read this excellent report but will do so later on, and I suggest that we issue a simple brochure to send to high schools to interest children in the gallery its purposes and paintings.

We have throughout the years given our support to this non-profit agency, which is a projection of C.C.F. policy into the realm of cultural activity, and welcome its development.

Mrs. Fairclough: With regard to the receptionist, the person on the desk has not been a civil servant. The situation has been covered and there will be someone there who will be charged with the responsibility of adequately greeting the public.

The war paintings are—I do not know whether "in storage" properly describes the situation—housed in a separate building and are shown from time to time in the gallery. There is a constant exhibition of paintings of world wars I and II, and these are rotated. The paintings are not in dead storage by any means, and it is intended to make use of them.

The hon. member asked about a brochure of a descriptive nature to send to school children. One is presently in the process of being planned.

Mr. Herridge: There is mental telepathy between the hon. lady and the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, these items in the estimates and the discussion that has developed concerning them make us conscious of the fact that there is more to national development than trade, employment and income statistics. While we may take some satisfaction out of the fact that we are building up a national gallery as an expression of another kind of national development, we have perhaps not too much to boast about in such a field of national expression in this wealthy country of ours as long, for instance, as we do not have a national theatre or even a national library.

I wish to say a few words about a matter to which reference was also made by the hon. member for Kootenay West. We have been successful in building up our national gallery over the years, and I hope there will be room in it for every kind of painting; that we will not concentrate on national or classical paintings or on any particular school of painting. Perhaps there is room even for the kind of painting I do not understand.

I once ventured to make a presentation of a painting to the national gallery, which I think has been in the cellar of the gallery ever since. I am not suggesting that is not a proper place for it. It was a painting presented to me while in Russia, a rather startling painting, I thought. There are other paintings in custody—or if that is not the correct word, in storage—which have been mentioned today. I mention them also because I think from my own experience it is of some importance if it can be done—and I know it has been done within the limits of the possible—to have Canadian paintings in our diplomatic and other missions abroad. They frequently arouse a good deal of astonishment on the part of those who visit there and see good Canadian paintings on the embassy walls. They sometimes express a certain measure of astonishment that we have achieved, as indeed we have achieved, a high position in this particular branch of culture. I hope that practice, although I know something of the difficulties in the way of carrying it out, will be continued.

I share the satisfaction of the hon. members in the fact the new national gallery has been opened, that the facilities for displaying our art are much better than they were, and that people are already beginning to take advantage of those facilities.

I also share the dissatisfaction that has been expressed by my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate with some of the antecedent activities of this development. The hon. member for Kootenay West has said something about the opening ceremonies signalling this important change. It was no doubt in some of its aspects an impressive occasion; in some other aspects it was almost a comedy of white tie confusion. I congratulate my hon. friend from Kootenay West, that simple unsophisticated son of the soil, who could acquire only a black tie for the occasion. I congratulate him on having been able to break the white tie barrier because apparently he was close enough to the distinguished people in white ties to be able to notice their behaviour on this occasion. But my impression was that the black tie or the no tie group had been segregated in a different area of the building on that occasion.

I think some of the events leading up to the change which have been mentioned already speak for themselves. I do not propose to go into them in any detail. I think the resignation of Mr. Morgan and the letter, in which he expressed why he had to resign, were shocking. I am convinced now, as I was convinced last year, that the circumstances surrounding the rejection by the government of certain offers they had made to purchase paintings did in effect constitute a breach of contract by the government and in effect, therefore, by the country.

I have mentioned this on more than one occasion in this house. The Minister of Finance, his voice quivering with indignation, has accused me of besmirching the good name of Canada because I said on one occasion that the word of Canada did not now stand as high as it once did. I repeat that remark. But when I made it in the first instance as I do now, I was referring only to this particular episode, the rejection by the government of the offer which it had made to purchase pictures. When I talked about the word of Canada not standing as high as it once did I was referring to that particular episode and to nothing else; and the Minister of Finance, if he had bothered to look into the matter, would have found that out. But it was a sorry episode which I am sure anyone who examines the facts will realize.

Mr. Robinson: Liberal, right or wrong.

Mr. Pearson: I do not know the meaning of that remark; I do not know what it has to do with the fact that certain proposals were made on behalf of the Canadian government, certain undertakings and negotiations were entered into and later repudiated. That is what I am talking about, and I repeat, it was a sorry episode. But it is behind us. The national gallery is now in its new quarters. It has started out on a new career of great value in the cultural development of our country. The figures of the number of visitors to the gallery that have already been given speak for themselves.

I think, as has already been pointed out, that for this development we owe a great deal of gratitude to the previous director. It seems to me it did represent a kind of pettiness of partisanship that on this great occasion of the opening of the national gallery, the official speech of the Prime Minister opening the gallery could not find room for one reference to the man who had done so much to bring this about. He has now been succeeded by a man who has our respect. We know he will be a fine director. We congratulate the government on this appointment and, as my hon. friend to my left has said, we wish him well in his important work of service to the people of Canada.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will be pleased to know, if he does not know already, that last year external affairs purchased from the biennial exhibition of art a number of Canadian paintings for use in various posts abroad. I understand it is their intention to do so at the next exhibition.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to thresh old straw in the manner of the Leader of the Opposition. Like other hon. members, I should like to congratulate the minister on her wisdom in obtaining the services of the new national director, a person who has been favourably known across Canada, of course, for many years, a person of great distinction in the field of art. From personal experience as a member of the Canadian delegation to the Atlantic congress, where he took part in the cultural activities of that conference, I can say he held the name of Canada high in the international field, and his words and his advice were listened to with a great deal of respect and attention by those from other countries. Indeed, it is a fortunate thing for this country to have such a distinguished man heading the national gallery.

In regard to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay West, like him I find that my duties in the House of Commons do not permit frequent visits to the gallery, but on one occasion when I was able to go there I found quite a different reception. Indeed, the interest and enthusiasm of the staff of the gallery were almost overwhelming; because I recall that on that particular occasion I was looking at a painting of a bridle. While I was discussing it with some of my friends one of the guards became so interested in the discussion that he too joined in and gave his view of this particular painting.

An hon. Member: Did you say "bridle"?

Mr. Jones: A bridle.

Mr. Herridge: I was referring only to the person at the information desk, not to the rest of the staff.

Mr. Jones: I was happy indeed to learn it is expected that nearly a million people will visit the gallery this year. Surely this in itself indicates that it has become indeed a people's gallery, a gallery to which all Canadians can repair with the assurance of getting a warm welcome and of seeing the paintings exhibited under circumstances of utmost friendliness.

I understand that at the present time there is an exhibition at the gallery, which unfortunately I have not had the opportunity to see, from my own province of Saskatchewan. Not having seen it, I am not in a position to offer any comments on the exhibition. I ask this question of the minister. Is it the policy of the gallery to encourage exhibitions of art from the provinces, art painted by Canadian artists in the various provinces?

In regard to the comments made by the minister earlier on the purchase by the department of Canadian art, perhaps she might clarify the position. It is not necessarily that which is considered representative of Canadian art painted by Canadians. The point I make here is that art is truly a universal thing, and what we are trying to do in the national gallery is to encourage Canadians to engage in the arts in this medium.

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Shall vote 240 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before it carries, Mr. Chairman, I feel I should make a somewhat fuller correction than I did of the statement made by the minister about the building where the national gallery is located. I am not surprised that the actual facts are not well known because there has been so much confusion about the matter. Under the national capital plan the national gallery was supposed to go where the barracks now are on the driveway. The Department of National Defence was not willing to release that site unless a new armoury was built somewhere else in Ottawa at a very great cost which the government of that day did not think was justified. Therefore that site was not available. It was then agreed that a temporary site should be chosen and that a building should be erected on that site which could ultimately be used as an office building but which would be used in the first instance as a national gallery. I accepted that compromise with a mental reservation which I must say I uttered at the time to a good many people, that the building would continue to be the national gallery for the rest of the twentieth century.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not doubt it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite sure it will be and I hope it is. It is a very much better site than the one chosen under the national capital plan because it is nearer the centre of the city. Anybody who knows where the national gallery is in London will realize that if one thing is more certain than another it is that if you want visitors to the national gallery, which I think you do, you want it in the centre of the city and not even as far away from the centre as the national defence headquarters now are.

Item agreed to.

Public archives and national library—
National library—
318. General administration, $192,619.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a few words about this item. I know it is not the minister's fault and I am not blaming her but I do wish the minister would try to impress upon her junior colleague, the Minister of Public Works, and upon her senior colleague, the Minister of Finance, that the national library is a matter of some importance and that the collection of antiques down on Wellington street should be torn down and the new building should be proceeded with. No doubt it would be nice to retain part of the building down on Wellington street as a memorial to Mr. C. D. Howe whose office was there all through the war but I do not think Mr. Howe would want it. As a matter of fact, on one occasion I suggested to Mr. Howe that if he would go ahead with tearing down the building we would make him national librarian, and I offer that suggestion to the hon. lady. I think he would be most suitable. I also think that the present Minister of Public Works could do very well with having a library to which he could resort from time to time.

Item agreed to.

National film board—
238. Administration, production and distribution of films and other visual materials, $4,493,504.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. lady going to make a statement on the film board?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am pleased to tell the committee that since the house last considered the estimates of the national film board it has been accorded a signal honour by the Canadian citizenship council. This year, its twenty first anniversary, it was given a Canadian citizenship award. Perhaps I might read the citation which accompanied it.

The national film board was nominated in this competition "for recording, depicting and interpreting on film, Canada, the Canadian people, Canadian regions and geography, Canadian problems and achievements, Canadian institutions and the work of Canadian institutions, Canada's cultural life in its varied and numerous aspects; for its promotion of the use of Canadian films by groups of all kinds, both in urban and rural areas; for its frequently courageous treatment of issues and ideas; for its imaginative efforts in informing and awakening Canadians through film of high quality, particularly documentary film, to the vast complex fabric of our nation."

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Perhaps I might also mention a few of the most recent awards which the board has won. At the United States film festival the national film board headed the list with five blue ribbons for films and three for film strips. A couple of weeks ago in Cannes the jury of the international festival gave a special mention to the board's film "Universe" for the exceptional quality of its animation work, and the board also won the grand prix Eurovision for a documentary entitled "The Backbreaking Leaf" about the tobacco harvest in Ontario.

For the fiscal year 1960-61 the national film board estimates pretty well remain at the same level as for the previous year. The over-all increase is one of $91,732, brought about by an increase of $132,732 with respect to the board's operational vote and by a reduction of $40,000 in its acquisition of equipment vote. An amount of $94,012 will take care of merit increases to the board's personnel and $28,071 will cover an extension of the board's foreign distribution activity. The balance covers various small items.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the hon. lady two questions. Can she say whether the C.B.C. is now paying for the film board films which it uses what they are really worth? Can she also say how many of the films of the film board are used by the C.B.C. and what is the pattern.

Mrs. Fairclough: The films which are used by the C.B.C. remain the property of the film board and accordingly what they pay for them is really a rental. The amount they pay varies between one third and one half of the cost of the film.

Mr. Pickersgill: About how many do they use?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am told it amounts to about 80 half hours per year.

Mr. Brunsden: May I ask the minister whether it is not true that film board productions are available to agencies other than the C.B.C.?

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, yes.

Mr. Brunsden: I am thinking in terms of universities; I am thinking in terms of local film groups. It has been my privilege to enjoy a number of these films in the remote parts of western Canada. I think the film board should be commended for the work it is doing in making available to the distant parts of Canada the films that are made here.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, that is quite true. In so far as the films which are used by the C.B.C. are concerned, after a lapse of 30 days they are made available for other showings.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to pay my respects to the work the board is doing in Canada, especially in the remote areas. I should like also to ask the minister if she could give us some information about the work the board is doing in the projection of Canada abroad. She mentioned it in her statement. Perhaps she would elaborate a little upon it because I know how important that work is.

Mrs. Fairclough: We are rather proud of the work which the board does abroad, Mr. Chairman. In the United States, for instance, the national film board distributes Canadian films in the following ways: First, through the board's own offices in New York and Chicago which are engaged principally in arranging commercial distribution and carrying out Canadian travel film programs. In the commercial field, national film board films distributed to theatres had 5,260 bookings in the United States last year. There were 1,479 telecasts of films other than travel films. The board and its agents sold 2,976 copies of 16-millimetre films and 2,231 copies of film strips to libraries, educational and industrial organizations. In the travel promotion program, direct bookings from the board's own libraries and from 567 local outlets reached an attendance of 4,030,000; in the past year there were 1,780 telecasts of Canadian travel films and 1,639 telecasts of short filler items dealing with Canadian vacation attractions.

The Canadian embassy in Washington and seven Canadian consulate offices have been for years the principal means of carrying out non-commercial distribution. During 1959-60 the attendance they reached was 2,170,000. In a little over a two-year release period "City of Gold" has been booked into 3,600 theatres in the United States. Last summer our film on the St. Lawrence seaway received 334 telecasts. I am told that the film "City of Gold" was booked with a Brigitte Bardot film and we do not know which one was the attraction.

The report on the United States, which I have just given, is the only one I have on an individual country. However, through all of our posts abroad we have had in the year 1959-60, 223,500 showings, non-commercial, with a total attendance of 24,600,000.

Mr. Valade: I wonder if the minister would inform me how many of the French films produced by the national film board are included in the list which she has just submitted to the committee.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is about 50-50. I said 80, and there are approximately 40 in French and 40 in English.

Mr. Valade: Is that for use abroad?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, that was for the films shown on the C.B.C. The films abroad are generally produced, or at least the commentaries are made in the language of the country concerned. In France it would be in French and in the English speaking countries it would be in English. In other countries it is in the language of the country concerned.

Mr. Valade: I should like to comment a little bit on this, Mr. Chairman. I hope the minister will be able to emphasize to the national film board the importance of making more use of French films abroad so that the people of the United States and the people of other countries would know that this country has a bilingual and bi-ethnical aspect. I think the national film board would be well advised to use this sort of information about the country. I hope the minister will see that efforts are made to ensure that this country will be known abroad as a bi-ethnical country.

Mrs. Fairclough: We do distribute the films in French in places where the French language is understood; such as the New England states, for example, and some areas of South America where French is a language which is understood.

Mr. Herridge: Because of the wholehearted support of this group for this socialist style enterprise I want to say a few words on this item. I was not here when the minister made her opening remarks; I was unavoidably detained, but I understand when she made her brief remarks she referred to the awards won by the national film board. This is a matter in which I am very interested because I was reading of that in the report. These awards are clear evidence of Canadian technical ability, Canadian administrative ability and, in other directions, evidence of Canadian talent. We in this group are very pleased to see these awards because they indicate the fact that this government agency can hold its head up among the many free enterprise agencies doing the same type of work in North America. I see the minister looks as if she agrees with that statement at this time.

If I remember correctly, the film board was established in 1939. At the time there was considerable opposition to the idea of establishing a national film board to perform the services which it has performed since that date. As the years went by the opposition grew less and less and more and more people, even Conservatives, came to recognize the importance and value of the work done by the national film board. The results over a period of time have definitely demonstrated the value of the film board in several directions. First, its value in promoting knowledge of Canada within Canada amongst Canadians; second, its value in promoting knowledge and understanding of Canada abroad and also promoting an understanding in other countries of the opportunities for settlement in Canada, for investment and for recreation. Those are only a few of the positive values that have flowed from the activities of the national film board. There are many others, but I just mention those as possibly the most important.

I rise to speak very briefly on this item because the activities of the national film board are very much appreciated in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I say again that when I get up to make a few remarks it is my practice to express the opinions of my constituents or the opinions of persons who have taken the time to write to me about some aspect of government or who have discussed a matter with me. The national film board is the type of organization that has proved to be of particular value to the smaller, and in some cases the isolated places in my constituency. The value of the film board is recognized by the various active film councils that are supported by a cross-section of the community in such areas as the Rossland-Trail area and the Nelson-Kootenay lake area, as well as in numerous small communities, and which is found in local organizations such as women's institutes, the P.T.A., farmers' institutes or, in some cases, church congregations.

These two types of local organizations have benefited over a good period of years from the work of the national film board and its productions. At this point I wish to say that when I have had a problem or a complaint that has been brought to my attention or a suggestion, and I have brought it to the attention of the commissioner, I have always found him to be most helpful in ascertaining the facts in connection with any complaint and in making certain, from his point of view, that the national film board was performing its functions in a certain area properly and efficiently.

I also appreciate the work of the field men of the national film board, especially those who have come to the interior. Nelson is the centre of distribution for the national film board and ever since the commencement of this type of work by the national film board they have all worked in close co-operation with local organizations and people. That work and service has been appreciated and we hope it will be continued.

I am glad to note that the vote is being increased by something over $91,000. It is not a large increase but at least it is an indication that the government is determined to maintain the national film board activities at present standards and levels. We are pleased indeed to see that indication.

Before concluding I want to bring another matter to the minister's attention. As one of the press men said on one occasion, I am at times inclined to be somewhat parochial but I make no excuse for that inclination. The people of the southeastern interior, those living within the Columbia basin, are looking forward with anticipation to the documentary film that the national film board was going to produce on the Columbia river basin.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Herridge: I will tell you why. As all hon. members know, we live in a garden of Eden and we want more and more people to know about it. As the film will have educational and cultural value and will provide information to people in Canada and in the United States as to the opportunities for recreation in the Kootenays, as to the opportunities for investment, for retiring, for settlement and in other ways, when the minister replies I should like to hear from her what progress has been made in connection with the production of this film which is awaited with such great interest by the people whom I have the honour to represent.

Mrs. Fairclough: As I think I said last year on the discussion of these estimates, the script was prepared last year, the shooting will take place this year. Distribution will be next year.

Mr. Pearson: I was interested to get the report on the distribution of Canadian films. I congratulate the board on its courage in the competition it is conducting. Gold will always outdraw dross. I hope so in this case. As to circulation of films abroad, can the minister tell the committee whether we have been successful in getting any of our films behind the iron curtain for showing?

Mrs. Fairclough: We will get that information in just a few minutes. Certainly in Russia. We will get a list of the various places. I am glad to say that we have been successful in having showings behind the iron curtain.

Mr. Benidickson: Both the minister and I have been in this chamber for a few years. I believe that I have been here for a slightly longer period. However we have both been here long enough to know that over a long period members of the Conservative party took a consistent attitude when they were sitting on this side of the house and had little to offer but sneers with respect to the activities of this government organization.

I simply want to observe that this is another of the activities that I think the government has found is not as bad as they had indicated or in any event not of the same colours as those they were painting with respect to it when they were sitting in opposition. I find that they have proposed larger expenditures year by year since they have come into office and a larger staff year by year.

Mrs. Fairclough: I draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that a member of the government was one of the early supporters of the national film board in its activities. I refer in particular to the present Secretary of State for External Affairs who supported this board and had a number of things to say as far back as 1939. I should like to quote briefly from some of his remarks at that time when he said—

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister give the date and place?

Mrs. Fairclough: This was in 1939 at the time the bill was being introduced by Hon. Mr. Euler. He said:

> The minister has suggested that parliament should look to the future and be thinking of national films. As I read the reports of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the films that we are producing at the present time are used largely for promotion of trade and of our tourist business. I suggest to him that provision should be made now for making and distributing national films, designed to help Canadians in all parts of Canada to understand the ways of living and the problems of Canadians in other parts. Perhaps every hon. member must have been impressed by two facts: first, that it is difficult for Canadians in one part of Canada to understand what is going on in other parts of the country, and second, that moving pictures are having a remarkable effect on the Canadian people, particularly on the children and young men and women.
> I see by "Canada 1939", issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce, that the motion picture continues to be the most popular form of amusement in this dominion. Figures for 1937 show 1,047 motion picture theatres, with a total of 134,374,061 paid admissions. We all know how the children flock to the moving picture theatres on Saturdays and other holidays and, in fact, on every occasion; I would ask the minister whether there is not some chance of this national film board, some time within not the distant but the near future, making and distributing films showing Canadian life, and making arrangements with the moving picture theatres across Canada to show these pictures once they are made.

I think it is well to record that a member of the present government was a strong supporter of the national film board at its inception.

Mr. Benidickson: I was not in the house in 1939 but I have been in the house since 1945 and recall the discussions at this stage of our proceedings on the estimates of the national film board in the years from 1945 to 1957. Without exception I recall that the activities of this board were always described by some person in the official opposition as being in the nature of a fifth wheel of government. That was particularly true after the conclusion of hostilities in 1945.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this vote is carried I should like to make one or two observations. The hon. member for Kootenay West described this as a socialist enterprise. It is, of course, nothing of the kind. It is a typical example of the happy combination of public enterprise and private enterprise which was characteristic of the previous Liberal administration and of which we are extremely proud. But I do not intend to get into an ideological debate with the hon. gentleman unless he wants it and the Chair allows it, something which I think might be doubtful.

I rose with three purposes in mind. The first was to suggest that perhaps it might be possible, in view of some recent events in the immigration field, for the hon. lady to substitute Miss Gina Lollobrigida for Brigitte Bardot as a collaborator of the film board in the future.

The second was to inquire whether, now that we have the magnificent new terminal which was opened by the Queen last year at Gander after having been constructed at the instance of the Liberal government, and where there is an excellent place for the showing of films, the film board is making use of these facilities, because Gander remains one of the places where there are as many visitors to Canada as there are anywhere in the whole country from coast to coast.

My third suggestion is that if ever the new terminal should be completed at Dorval the film board might consider, since it is so near the headquarters of the board, showing its pictures at Dorval for the benefit of those passengers who come from the Atlantic provinces or from Ottawa and who are obliged, because of the extraordinary timetables, to spend so many hours of their lives at that airport.

Mr. Herridge: If I may make a brief remark in reply to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I fully recognize the fact that the national film board was established during the time a Liberal government was in office, but I am sure the hon. gentleman will willingly recognize that it was established after repeated speeches made in this house and in the country by members of the C.C.F. group, and that these prepared the climate for the establishment of an agency of this type.

Mrs. Fairclough: I now have some information for which the Leader of the Opposition asked. We have three titles in theatrical distribution in Czechoslovakia. We have several films in theatrical distribution in Poland, though I cannot give the exact number. In the U.S.S.R. we are currently arranging for the distribution of three titles and we have had representation at the Poznan festival and at the Moscow film festival also.

Perhaps I might take this opportunity to reply also to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. We do have facilities for showing films at Gander, but with the lessening of the traffic there the showings have decreased in number. However, the facilities are still there and they are being used. I think the other suggestion is a very good one. Certainly one has a more or less captive audience at airports.

Mr. Fisher: Going back to the remarks of my hon. friend concerning the garden of Kootenay West, we all know from our biblical background that there was a snake in the garden—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Fisher: There may be a snake there now, but this snake's ambition is to introduce the export of power from the lower Arrow, so if this particular snake should have its way the film will become just more than a passing record; it may record something that is disappearing into history before the advance of hydroelectric power. For that reason we should all be interested in this particular move.

The point I want to speak about is something that is strictly speculative and concerned with the future. I have evidence from a number of places, not the least from the Globe and Mail which has published in this particular case an article on March 7, 1960 in the financial column, entitled "Famous Players". This article indicates that as far as this particular private organization, which is largely a distributing organization, is concerned there is to be what amounts to a revolution in operation as a result of the introduction of telemetering operations. In other articles from the same source there is an indication that video tape is carrying out a revolution within the television industry. The point about this article is that Famous Players show a tremendous drop in income and they say television is responsible. It goes on to indicate the extent to which television has affected the prosperity of the film industry and goes on to point out that this new field of operations may be the means of enabling Famous Players to get back into the revenue field, one that combines both film and television.

In the annual report of the film board, the following paragraph appears on page 22:

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

> The advent of T.V. has caused the national film board to revise methods of distribution that had been in use for several years. While the national film board still caters to the public at large, it fosters specialized distribution that answers the specific needs of organized groups, whether they be educational institutions, rural community associations, cine clubs, trade unions or study groups. In point of fact, the national film board must be constantly on the lookout for the most pliable available methods, adapting them to the ever-changing pattern of life.

That is all it really says about the advent of television causing the national film board to revise its methods. It seems to me that more than the method of distribution needs to be revised. I come to the possibility of co-operation with that other international agency which also is in effect a great film producing agency, and that is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We have examples that have been none too happy of attempts by the parliament of Canada to legislate co-operation between corporations. I am thinking of the act which requires the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. to co-operate. However, I should like to know something of how the national film board and the C.B.C. might co-operate. It seems to me they have much in common, not the least because the C.B.C. is both a producing and distributing agency, just as is the national film board.

I do not want to make any comment that I cannot support on the position of the distribution agencies through the local film councils, but my impression is that the local film councils have lost a lot of the influence they had through the spread of television. The distribution to public libraries still constitutes a worth-while service, but the same wide audience is no longer attracted as in the days before television became as popular as it now is. For that reason I should like to know more extensively what the advent of television has meant and what may be the effect of this development of Famous Players—

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order. Are we discussing the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration with respect to the national film board, or are we considering the effects of possible development in television upon the future plans of the board?

The Deputy Chairman: We are discussing the national film board vote No. 238. I have given the hon. member time to make his point. I have been listening to him very carefully and I shall be glad to know how he relates what he has been saying to the item.

Mr. Fisher: The point I was trying to make is that there has been in the last decade quite a revolution taking place on both the technical and the distributive side, and I want to know how the national film board is gearing to this. There is nothing in the report other than the one bland sentence.

Mrs. Fairclough: We do have committees working on co-operation between the two organizations. There is a committee at the top level; an administrative committee of senior officers of both the C.B.C. and the film board who work together at the planning stage, and then there are two committees at a lower level, one concerned with French films and the other with English. In so far as the film board is concerned, television is not a competitor. As a matter of fact, it is just another medium of distribution. In certain parts of the country, if the viewing public change their habits of viewing then the method of distribution alters. I can assure the hon. member that this is a very flexible system. It works in very close contact with the C.B.C. and with television in general in film distribution.

Mr. Fisher: Television is a voracious user of films. It almost destroys them, as it were. If films are put over television it tends to cancel out later distribution. Is the film board gearing to a higher rate of production in this regard?

We are moving to the stage where educational television will become increasingly important. There has been disappointment in many parts of the country at the slow pace at which the C.B.C. has worked. Many films produced by the national film board are educational. We will not get the kind of educational television supported by provincial departments of education and supported by the C.B.C. until some other agency such as the national film board has the added time and the larger studios required to prepare a series for example in the field of science and geography. The film board can play a genuine role here. I am interested in hearing about developments in that field.

Mrs. Fairclough: Far from considering television showings as competitive may I say that after the 30-day interval, as I explained to another hon. member, these films go into general distribution and are very popular. Last year we had 4,210 telecasts. Afterwards these films are in demand. The people who see them on television ask for them for showings in various ways through organizations, church groups and the usual channels of film distribution in this field. I can assure my hon. friend that far from curtailing or diminishing showings in any way it is an incentive and serves to accelerate them.

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister received any complaints in the past year as to the national film board, in supplying films to television, dealing unfairly with private enterprise operations.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have received no such complaints.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. lady received none from any private producers?

Mrs. Fairclough: From time to time we receive complaints from private producers so far as the general activities of the film board are concerned but none directed to television production in particular.

Mr. Fisher: On what scale were these protests received? Can the minister assure us that there will be no restriction affecting private operators contemplated with respect to this agency?

Mrs. Fairclough: The production of film is like any other. Those who are engaged in the field commercially from time to time have objected to the national film board being engaged in the field of film production at all. I cannot give the hon. member specific instances but from time to time someone makes the complaint that the national film board should be closed down and should not produce films at all. They state that only commercial enterprises should produce films in Canada. That is a view with which we do not agree.

Mr. Fisher: You do not agree?

Mrs. Fairclough: I think that is a broad general statement.

Mr. Valade: I am sorry to take the precious time of this committee again but I think it is worth while to underline one point to the committee. I recently received a letter from a young person who wanted to study the technical aspects of film producing. Although she had worked for the C.B.C. and the national film board in some technical capacity she could find no way of studying the entire production of films in Canada. Unfortunately she had to go to Europe in order to study the whole system of production.

I am wondering if it would not be appropriate for the national film board to establish a school for technicians who would like to study the entire range of film production. I appreciate that the board is not a school but I wonder if it would not be feasible to have the board study the approach to the question so that future technicians could be educated in our country and thus perform the work that is required to be done by foreigners in this field.

I have received complaints to the effect that private industry is being discriminated against. I know one firm had to close its doors because it could not meet the competition of the national film board. Would the board consider co-operating with private enterprise so that private firms would have access to the facilities of the board for the production of commercial or other films by private enterprise. Since the board is a government organization I wonder if it would not be in accordance with the democratic point of view to allow the film board to co-operate with private industry in this way?

(Translation):

Mr. Pickersgill: Answer in French.

(Text):

Mrs. Fairclough: I wish I could.

Mr. Chevrier: Just try.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, we do train some of our own people in the board but I am afraid we have not the facilities for the general educational training of a type that would equip people to go out into this industry. I am afraid the board is not set up for that type of thing.

With regard to co-operation, the board does co-operate with private producers. Sometimes on an emergency basis it even assists them temporarily with equipment and so on. I think they have a very good working arrangement. I cannot agree that the board should vacate the field of film production. I might say that the board only produces what it is commissioned to produce. It does co-operate with private producers where the agency which commissions the film indicates that it wishes it to be produced other than by the nation film board.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister is aware of the fact that under the rules of the board of broadcast governors a private television station to retain its licence must have a certain percentage of Canadian produced programs. I was wondering if it is the experience of the film board that the utilization of its films could be a qualified component of that Canadian compulsory requirement for a private television station. Second, I was wondering whether or not the films of the national film board are provided to private television stations on the same financial basis as to the C.B.C.

Mrs. Fairclough: With regard to the latter question the national film board rents films and makes them available to any station, whether a C.B.C. or private station. Any station which wishes to use any film in the catalogue can rent it from the national film board.

I think the first part of the hon. member's question should properly be directed to the Minister of National Revenue when the estimates of the C.B.C. are before the committee.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister a question which relates only incidentally to this item. The minister has four agencies under her jurisdiction. I suggested earlier that perhaps one way that such agencies would get greater attention and perhaps a greater share of government interest would be to have individual ministers for these four agencies, the film board and several others.

In another part of the building we had a great discussion over the way these agencies that are under the departments are looked at or examined or are the responsibility of the particular minister. I refer to the check on the Jacques Cartier bridge. How much time does the minister have to spend out of her daily allotment, in a rough way, on those particular agencies as against her departmental responsibilities? We know her departmental responsibilities are very heavy. Is the minister satisfied with the kind of administrative control she can exercise as a minister in so far as those agencies are concerned and especially over one like the national film board, which is located 100 miles or so away from Ottawa? We have already had experience with one agency located in Montreal which has not been a particularly happy one. I would not at all lay this at the door of any ministerial responsibility, but it is a question of administrative control. I would appreciate the minister's comments.

Mrs. Fairclough: I cannot answer that in a general way because each of these agencies is governed by its own act and the minister's powers and participation in the operations of the various agencies vary.

I would suggest to the hon. member that if he is interested to that extent he might examine the various acts and find out just where the minister enters into the picture, but I can say this: Regardless of where these agencies are situated, whether the head office is right here in Ottawa or in some other place, I have had personally the utmost co-operation from those who are charged with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the respective agencies.

The hon. member asked me whether I could say how much time I spent in a rough way. I assure him I do not spend any time in a rough way.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member is being facetious. I mean a rough calculation. I know how the agencies are set up and in the main all those agencies which are under the minister fall into the same rough classification.

I use the word "rough" again. A study of the statutes would not make much difference. Does the minister feel it would be worth while to have this mooted Hoover type commission or committee that is going to look into administrative procedure study the particular agencies which are under her wing in order to see whether they might be brought under another ministry or better administrative control?

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think I should answer that question; it is one that is more directly a responsibility of the Prime Minister.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kootenay West, who is our spotter, did not realize that the public archives or the national library items had gone through.

The Deputy Chairman: May I point out that neither of the hon. members was in the house when they went through. They went through right after lunch.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Departmental administration—

187. Administration, operation and maintenance, $360,962.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 40 of the blue book and the details on page 260.

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Chairman, when I submitted the estimates of my department last year, I pointed out that the mining industry had just gone through its first recession since the end of world war II. However, the drop in production for 1958 was not a serious one. Yet I indicated that prospects were already better and that in 1959, we could expect a good year.

Before continuing with the estimates of my department, I am happy to tell you that, last year, our mining production exceeded all former records, reaching a value of 2.4 billion dollars, and this trend has been maintained for most significant minerals since the beginning of 1960.

I would now like to say a few words about certain aspects of the situation of our mining industry which are especially significant and stimulating. I shall also list some important steps taken by my department, which are meant to further the development of Canada's huge mineral resources to a still greater extent.

(Text):

In the early part of 1959 the Canadian mineral industry was operating at levels considerably below capacity. A decline in industrial activity, and a condition of surplus mineral stocks in the United States had been important contributing factors to this situation. However, as the year moved on mineral demand improved with the general economic expansion in both North America and Europe. Strikes in the steel and nonferrous metals industries in the United States during the second half of 1959 also resulted in an increased demand for Canadian minerals. As a result of all of these and other factors iron ore shipment rose sharply, nickel output registered marked increases, and such other minerals as copper and asbestos came into greater demand.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, during the latter part of 1959 the over-all improvement in our mineral situation was general, with the exceptions of coal, uranium, lead and zinc. The coal industry has, of course, been experiencing considerable difficulties in recent years, and this matter is currently receiving the careful attention of a royal commission. The adverse decision of the United States atomic energy authority in November with respect to the renewal of Canadian contracts after 1962 has meant a considerable adjustment in the uranium industry. This matter is under continuing study, as you will have noted from statements of my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I am pleased to report that conditions in the lead and zinc industry have improved in recent months following the depressed market situation which existed from 1957 well into 1959. The United Nations lead and zinc study group, in which Canada is well represented, has been carrying on a continuing study of the world situation in lead and zinc and the 25 members of the group have held several important meetings to discuss mutual problems relative to world surpluses. Canadian lead and zinc producers are naturally encouraged by the recent improvement in market conditions because over 80 per cent of their production is sold on the export market. They do, however, still face uncertainties relative to a report of the United States tariff commission to be made in October of this year.

With few exceptions, Canadian mineral commodities have experienced favourable growth situations since the latter part of 1959 as a result of their generally improved position in world markets, particularly in the United States and the United Kingdom. Although the export market remains of paramount importance for the mineral industry in general, there is a progressive increase in demand for iron ore, copper, lead, fuels and industrial minerals in the domestic market. In fact, I believe a related development of considerable significance to the mineral industry and the economy at large is under way with respect to the increasing trend toward greater mineral processing in Canada.

I could illustrate this by referring to several mining developments which have been of first importance during the past year. At Thompson, Manitoba, the International Nickel Company's new mining project is proceeding on schedule and is expected to come into full production next year at an annual rate of 75 million pounds of nickel. This operation will be second only in size to the Sudbury area in terms of world nickel production and all of its ore will be refined to nickel metal at a new refinery now being constructed at Thompson.

The Coronation mine in Saskatchewan and the Chisel lake mine in Manitoba are being brought into production this year and the copper concentrates from these new mines will be smelted and refined to metal in Canadian smelters and refineries. The Montreal east copper refinery, the second largest in the world, is being expanded to a capacity of 270,000 tons per year to handle increased production from the Noranda smelter as well as the output from Murdochville in the Gaspe peninsula and Flin Flon, Manitoba. The Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada Limited stands ready to bring the large Pine Point deposit on Great Slave lake into production, with the lead-zinc concentrate to be treated at Trail, B.C. The company also will commence a pig iron operation this year at Kimberley, B.C., with initial plans for an orderly expansion up to 1,000 tons of pig iron per day.

Other developments which have contributed to continuing growth and diversification of the Canadian mineral economy during the past year include three large iron ore mining projects in the Quebec-Labrador district, the preparation for zinc mining operations in the Mattagami lake area of northern Quebec, and a country-wide reactivation of a number of smaller base metal mining properties. Petroleum resource development has continued to make its major contribution, particularly in the natural gas sector. The potash industry in Saskatchewan is proceeding toward production. This province stands to become one of the major sources of potash in the world. The base metal deposits in New Brunswick seem to be moving toward the production stage.

[Mr. Comtois.]

Non-ferrous metal prices have increased somewhat in the past year and this has further improved the near-term outlook for mining activity. Copper in particular has benefited, as evidenced by the fact that although exports in 1959 did not increase in volume there was an increase in value of 17 per cent. Zinc price increases are illustrated by the rise in the United States prime western zinc price from the average of 11.45 cents in 1959 to 13 cents at present. Inasmuch as our offshore sales of copper and zinc are governed to a considerable degree by London metal exchange quotations, it is of interest to note that copper and zinc were recently quoted at £247.5 and £91.5 respectively, compared with an average of £237.8 and £82.1 in 1959. This is an encouraging price trend.

It is with satisfaction that I report that capital expenditures in the mineral industries are again on the increase, with the forecast for 1960 being 18 per cent above 1959 compared with a 1 per cent increase last year. The oil and gas industry continues to account for almost half of total mineral industry investment and further investment growth can be expected in the natural gas sector as the recently authorized gas export projects are completed and as the necessary gas processing plants go into operation in western Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I think those brief comments on the development of our mineral resources on their processing, on market trends, as well as investments and prices, confirm my conclusion, namely that Canada's mining industry has certainly made excellent progress and that, in 1960, it will provide employment for a greater number of Canadians.

That industry is a vital factor in Canadian economy; it therefore deserves to be closely followed and looked after. Of course it will go through bright periods in the future, and some that will be less so, because it is impossible to foresee the fluctuations of offer and demand on the world market. But a wisely managed Canadian industry will be able to face those difficulties. Forever true to its well established policy, my department tries to make a contribution to the mining development, in the field of pure and applied scientific research, so that the industry may, for a long time, rank first among the world's mineral producers.

(Text):

Now I should like to review the work of my department and our needs for the current fiscal year. In these main estimates we are asking for $43,028,402, a sum that includes $11,700,000 for the administration of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act; $321,524 for the work of our mineral resources division; $1,059,262 for departmental administration; and $95,418 for the administration of the Explosives Act. The major portion of our expenditures is, of course, earmarked for an intensified program of technical surveys and scientific research vital to many aspects of Canadian endeavour.

We have also included in the estimates a sum of $1,550,000 to cover the department's program of aerial photography. I am referring particularly to the $6,300,000 project to photograph the Arctic islands which was begun in 1958. Progress in this undertaking has been excellent.

For the surveys and mapping branch we are asking $16,645,625. This is to carry forward an integrated schedule of operations involving geodetic surveys in nearly every province of Canada and the Northwest Territories; topographic work over wide areas of the country and being undertaken for the first time in the Arctic islands; and hydrographic charting and tidal and current observations in many of our inland and coastal waterways.

One of the major branch projects for the year is the establishment of mapping control over a large portion of Baffin island, a project calling for helicopter support; expansion and renovation of part of the fleet of the Canadian hydrographic service and the purchase of new two-colour offset presses to speed the production of maps and charts. And I am pleased to say that the branch will shortly be moving to its new building on Booth street, probably in the fall.

(Translation):

Incidentally, may I say that last year, one hon. member stressed the fact that our topographical maps were available only in English. I replied at the time that those maps would soon be published in both official languages. I am now pleased to inform the house that we have already published some maps with bilingual legends and marginal notes and that we will be publishing others soon. This should make them much more valuable to French speaking Canadians.

(Text):

I should now like to mention two major projects recently undertaken by our department of utmost importance to our economic and scientific progress and, to some extent, our national sovereignty. These are the polar continental shelf project launched last year and continued on a much larger scale this year, and the all-embracing program of research in the field of oceanography. Particular items referred to in the estimates concern the C.G.S. Hudson which will be a $7 million floating laboratory for all types of marine studies, and the Bedford institute of oceanography now under way at Dartmouth, which will house over 300 oceanographers, hydrographers, submarine scientists and other scientific personnel. Tenders have been called for construction of the ship and we hope to have it in operation by 1962. Plans for the institute are also well advanced with initial construction begun.

I am pleased to say that our recruiting program for oceanographers is going well, thanks largely to the accounts of our efforts that have appeared in scientific periodicals in Canada and throughout the world. I might mention here that the Canadian government recently set up a national committee to direct oceanographic work on an integrated basis, comprising representatives from the interested government departments, various universities and chaired by Dr. W. E. van Steenburgh, our director general of scientific services.

The polar shelf project calls for the exploration, survey and detailed scientific study of the continental shelf area of the Canadian Arctic. It involves many diverse investigations including hydrographic observations, the study of the physical and chemical characteristics of the sea, study of ice conditions and marine biology. This year over 50 men are braving the hazards of Arctic travel and weather in the name of scientific research. I need not stress the need for this type of work. It is important to the assessment of our mineral potential, to the development of Arctic waterways, to national defence and to many other enterprises now or in the future. It is also a valuable contribution to world science.

The estimates for 1960-61 allow $3,987,419 for the geological survey of Canada. Last year the survey had 76 parties in the field. The number this year will be 88. To be of maximum benefit a geological map of an area should be available at an appropriate scale well in advance of the demand; otherwise great amounts of private capital may be wasted on blind-alley prospecting or unguided exploration programs.

It is for this reason that the survey has given top priority to completing its reconnaissance work, and this year several major items in the estimates have been earmarked for this purpose: Operation Back River in northwest Keewatin, Operation Pelly, now nearing completion in southeastern Yukon, both of which involve the use of helicopters. In addition, preparations will be made for Operation Ogilvy in central Yukon and a similar helicopter excursion in northern Quebec.

The survey will also carry forward its commitment in the roads to resources program undertaken in co-operation with the province of Ontario. This involves a survey of bedrock and pleistocene geology, and geochemical and aeromagnetic studies over a large area of the province.

The survey is continuing to expand its ground water work, particularly in the prairie provinces. This is a project of particular importance to areas whose homes, farms and factories are dependent on underground water. The survey also intends to enlarge its geochemical work—the chemical analysis of rocks, soil, stream sediments and even vegetation for traces of metal. These observations plotted on a map indicate where ore deposits are most likely to occur. The survey has had considerable success with these studies in Yukon and the maritimes.

In addition to field work we have asked for a considerable sum for the purchase of laboratory equipment. In its new building which, just the other day, I had the honour of dedicating, the geological survey is carrying on a great variety of research as a supplement to the field work. Some of the investigations are calculated to improve the quality and usefulness of geological maps and reports. Others will lead to the development of new techniques and instruments for use both in the field and the laboratory. Still other projects are designed to advance the science of geology: for geology is becoming a more exact science and there is a heavy demand for chemical or X-ray analysis, sizing of sediments, radio-carbon dating and the many other procedures carried out in survey laboratories.

In addition to its own work the geological survey has, through funds provided by parliament, been aiding research work undertaken in Canadian universities, a program that has done much to further geological studies in this country. These grants in aid amount to $50,000. However, the sum falls far short of the need and it seems that in further years a larger amount should be earmarked for this basic research. I will repeat what I stated last year: that, quite apart from the other benefits, these grants encourage students to remain in Canada and help us make the most of the brain power in Canadian universities.

To finance the activities of the mines branch we have asked for $4,066,063. This is to meet the costs of projects, too numerous to describe here, designed to further the efficient recovery and use of our metallic ores, industrial minerals and fuels. In the face of a weakened market for a number of mineral commodities the branch's work has assumed a new urgency and the demands made on its facilities have grown considerably.

Much of the work is of immediate importance to the mineral industry Thus the branch's work on ground stress, long range program of direct concern to some of our deeper mines, should lead to better mining practices. To speed the development of our iron ore deposits the branch is seeking new and better methods of treating these ores. Its work with industry is well known. Many of the current processes in use in Canadian mining and milling were developed or improved by mines branch research. At a time when some facets of the industry are in difficulty I need not dwell on the importance of this work.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce has stressed the need for increased sales of uranium. I might mention here that our mines branch is currently investigating possible new uses for this commodity, one of our most important projects. I cannot, of course, say how successful our efforts will ultimately be; but it has already been established that uranium can be a useful alloying element, particularly for the production of steels of high fatigue strength.

The branch, of course, delves into many other problems. In the study of non-metallic minerals alone a dozen research projects are under way, many of which are of direct benefit to producers of industrial minerals and construction materials. Its work on fossil fuels points to a broader market for coal and improved refining techniques for crude oil. Its work with Canadian producers and fabricators of zinc is leading to new uses, and hence an improved market, for this commodity; and its research in physical metallurgy is bringing about the development of new alloys in urgent demand for missile development and nuclear research. These and many other items have been allowed for in our estimates for the mines branch.

In our estimates we have included $2,042,708 for the dominion observatories. With space research very much to the fore these days a great deal of interest has been focused on this branch of our department. Its work in the past has contributed greatly to the science of astronomy, to the international geophysical year and to many other related projects. The observatories have recently moved into the field of radio astronomy; and on June 20 I shall be pleased to preside at the opening of its new radio telescope at Penticton, British Columbia. This instrument will be used in a full scale study of distant hydrogen clouds and, to some extent, in an investigation of Mars, Jupiter, Saturn and other members of the solar system.

The observatories will be making airborne magnetometer observations over the Arctic islands, the Arctic ocean, in the neighbourhood of the north magnetic pole and over the north Atlantic. It is also setting up a new network of seismic stations in northern Canada and the Arctic islands.

This year the branch's gravity surveys will be considerably increased to meet the demands of industry and national defence. Observations will be made over the prairies and in many parts of northern Canada.

In Ottawa the mirror transit, a new instrument in astronomic work, will be used to study positions and motions of stars and members of the solar system. In Victoria the 73-inch telescope will be used in the observatories' continuing study of interstellar gases, very hot stars and those of great brightness. The work of the geographical branch will call for the expenditure of $399,833.

(Translation):

The publication of the Atlas of Canada, in French as well as in English, is a recent undertaking of the geographical branch. This is hardly the moment to elaborate on the scope of the task involved in the publication of such a work but, in my opinion, we can rightly state that this has been one of the finest achievements of our department.

(Text):

This fiscal year the geographical branch will be intensifying its land use surveys. These studies, undertaken in co-operation with the provinces, lay the foundation for planned agriculture, forestry and many other endeavours of importance to the efficient development of our natural resources. The branch will also continue its investigation of ice conditions in the gulf of St. Lawrence and undertake various field studies of importance to our knowledge of Canada's geography.

May I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it was not my aim in these remarks to defend the work of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I feel that its record speaks for itself; and I should like to use this occasion to congratulate and thank all the officials and employees of my department for the splendid and efficient work they are doing. The department has over the years been a powerful force in the economic development of this country, and its role in the future will be one of special significance to Canada's continued growth.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) gave us a rather thorough account of his department's administration and some very interesting information. On the other hand it is unfair, as it is the only information we have as a basis for the discussion of that departments' estimates for the coming year.

The annual report which reached us in the last few days deals with activities in 1958. I was therefore extremely surprised to receive it only a few days ago. As a matter of fact, I must say that I approached the distribution branch to see whether they had forgotten to send it to me, but I found out that the only report, three or four weeks ago, was the one for 1957.

Mr. Chevrier: There has, of course, been some delay.

Mr. Dumas: The report we have just received is a repetition of the information which was given to us at the sittings of the standing committee on mines, forests, and waterways last year.

Mr. Chevrier: They always lag behind.

Mr. Dumas: I understand that, though the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is interested in all aspects of mining development, his first responsibilities are those of a vast laboratory of scientific research in all mining fields.

The branches of the department are the following: Mineral resources division, surveys and mapping branch, geological survey of Canada, mines branch, geographical branch, as well as dominion observatories, the polar continental shelf project, and the dominion coal board. All those branches make us realize the significance of the extremely varied research work for which the department is responsible.

Each of the branches I have just listed, has a most experienced staff, and I take this opportunity to commend the officials, the heads and chiefs of the various branches, as well as each of the 4,000 employees who have contributed to the splendid work accomplished by the department.

All those employees, Mr. Chairman, deserve to be encouraged and supported to the best of our ability.

Mr. Chevrier: Not too many orchids.

Mr. Dumas: The rapid development and expansion of our mineral deposits, more particularly during the periods from 1947 to 1957 was such that the various branches were taxed to the utmost and that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys had difficulty in granting the numerous and varied requests that reached it from every quarter.

Consequently, in order to face the situation and to answer growing needs, the department, since its creation, has undertaken tremendous field work programs, research projects and surveys of all kinds.

So that this work might be stepped up, the staff had to be increased, and, in addition, the estimates had to be substantially increased.

I note that the estimates for 1960-61 reach $60 million, which shows the importance of the department.

After noting the estimates for this year and after listening to the minister's comments, I am happy to find that he managed to get action on at least part of the recommendations made last year by the standing committee on mines, forests and waters.

I note that the scientific staff of the surveys and mapping branch has been increased, that the scientific services of the mines branch have been reshuffled, and that a greater number of geologists have been taken on the staff for the coming year.

I am happy to note that someone has been appointed to head the oceanography service.

However, now that we are called upon to vote the necessary sums of money to ensure the proper operation of that department, it is unfortunate that we are not better informed about the practical works now under way or which will be under way soon in the field of geology, geodesy, topography, geophysics, hydrography, etc.

It is true the minister said that this session we will have 88 teams working on geological surveys across the country, as compared to 76 in 1959.

The minister also mentioned, I think, two particular projects, one of which is the polar continental shelf project.

He pointed out to the committee that about 50 employees, most of them scientists, are on their way to the Arctic to undertake certain scientific studies there.

I agree with the minister that those men are no doubt devoted to that particular work and that they deserve our praise, since they are going to spend the finest months of the year in the Arctic, where the temperature is certainly different from the one in our latitude.

I note that this item includes a sum of $1,134,000 for the current year, and I hope it will be substantially increased next year.

The minister also referred to the construction of roads to resources, more particularly in Ontario. This is very interesting. I understand the department is considering a joint study program with the government of that province where, last year I believe airborne geophysical surveys were made.

This year, there is no doubt that those works will continue and I imagine that some of those surveys, carried out by plane, will be checked on the ground, probably during the year, thus making it possible to determine the location of those access roads to resources.

I would have liked the minister to give equal attention to a similar project in my province, a project which deserves our encouragement and which would require the cooperation of the federal government and that of the Quebec government. I would have liked the minister to impress upon the province of Quebec the necessity of carrying out that project.

Now the Quebec government is building a railroad to open up the ore reserves discovered last year in the Mattagami area. The minister referred to that fact, and was indeed quite proud to mention those ore reserves, which, I hope, will be developed as soon as possible. I even hope they will be producing within a few years.

A road is now being built at a cost of $4 million—that is the provincial government's estimate—and mining companies are asked to share in the cost of construction. That does not make sense at a time when the federal government is making available to the provinces a minimum amount of $1,500,000 a year over a 10-year period, or a total of $15 million, provided of course that the provincial government agrees to contribute an equal amount.

Therefore, the highway between Amos and Mattagami should have been built without the help of mining concerns. Not that I object to mining firms contributing to the cost of such a highway, but if the same amount of money were put into research, then there could be more exploration work. More men could be hired for such purposes, and of course, the money spent on exploration work would be a better investment from the point of view of the company.

If the province of Quebec ever decides to build access roads, I hope the minister will bring more pressure to bear. I might add that it will be much easier after June 22, because he will be dealing with a new premier.

Mr. Chairman, I have no choice but to raise this point again and again ask the minister why, when dealing with the estimates of his department, we do not have available a preliminary release on the activities of his department. For instance, the minister mentioned a moment ago that the geological survey has 88 teams in the field across the country. If we had a release indicating the location of those teams, and showing where the teams of the topographical survey are working during the 1960 season, and the same for every other service in the department, it would for one thing, add a great deal of interest to the committee's task. I know the minister wants the committee to take an interest in the estimates he is submitting to the house. Moreover, we in the committee could deal with them much faster.

In addition, why are we not provided, as in the past, with a brief outline of activities carried out in the previous year? All we have to go by is the annual report for the year 1958, and the comments we have just heard from the minister. I have indicated that his comments were quite interesting. I even pointed out that the minister has given us a number of explanations. However, all those explanations are given at the last minute, and it is the same with the reports.

We do have in hand the report on the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. This is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and this report covers the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959. This report was submitted by the minister on April 29, 1959; however, we did not get it until February. I realize it is no fault of the minister's since the report is dated April 29, 1959. It is due to neglect by the printing service for not publishing it earlier. This report is now two years too late and the information it contains covers only part of 1959. It is unfortunate, and I really believe that an effort should be made to make those very important reports available to us sooner.

I do not wish to reopen the debate on the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act but, when we discussed that bill, it was quite important for us to have the necessary information. I realize that the minister will be kind enough to give them to us when we resume debate on the bill, but until then, it is a handicap for hon. members who are concerned with those various measures designed to help an industry in which we are interested.

Now, in another field, Mr. Chairman, there is a point which I would like to draw to the minister's attention. I know that it does not directly concern his department but, on the other hand, I know that the minister is interested and that he may do something in this case.

There is a crown corporation which, since last year, has been doing exploration work in the Northwest Territories. Up to last year it had not done exploration work in new areas. Last year, I do not know why—maybe it was because they were forced to lay off some men—but on the other hand, I see in the report of the Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited that very few employees are engaged in this kind of work, last year, exploration work covered about 8,000 square miles east of the Port Radium mine, at a cost of $358,542.

The 1960 program is divided into two phases. First, work is going ahead on the projects started last year and, second, preliminary surveys are being made in another neighbouring area. Well, if things go on in this way, the first thing we will know, is that exploration work will be undertaken by an agency or a crown corporation, or by crown corporations on a large scale, whereas this field should be left to private enterprise.

I believe that the amounts this crown corporation is spending on exploration work could be much better used, especially in view of the fact that we are complaining of inadequate funds to spend on research.

Last year, for instance, the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, after hearing the officials of the department, learned that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys might encourage university students to do research work in the mining field.

Mr. Chairman, the money this crown corporation spends on exploration work could be put to much better use. Scholarships could be granted to some of those students under the direct supervision of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

I think that the minister should consult his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and look into this matter with him. He could insist that next year the Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited discontinue its exploration work.

Last year, it was alleged that the work was justified because it was carried out near the Port Radium mine. This year, this work is being carried on nearby over a rather wide area. I feel that this work should be discontinued or entrusted to private enterprise.

Mr. Chairman, the minister mentioned the prospects of the mining industry. The prospects of this industry are practically unlimited. We have abundant mineral resources, we have the required men for the development of those natural resources. We also have the necessary miners to extract those various minerals.

The minister mentioned also that in 1959 the mineral production reached the record figure of $2.4 billion.

Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to find that after a rather sharp decline in 1958, mineral production finally reached a peak at the end of 1959. Let us not forget, however, that this amount of $2.4 billion includes $320 million representing the Canadian uranium production during 1959.

This production will not be reduced to such a great extent in 1960; it will probably reach about $275 or $300 million and be maintained between $225 and $250 million until 1966. I suggest that it is in 1966 that we shall probably find it difficult to dispose of those uranium reserves—

Mr. Comtois: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Dumas: Yes.

Mr. Comtois: Would the hon. member rather I did not mention the uranium situation?

Mr. Dumas: Not at all. On the contrary, I am very glad the minister mentioned it.

Mr. Comtois: I had to mention the situation of the uranium industry during my remarks.

Mr. Dumas: Certainly, but this is the point I wish to make. If it were not uranium it would probably be another mineral, but if we could be assured of maintaining our uranium production during the next 10, 15, 20 or 25 years, or even of increasing it, I am sure that the mineral production would keep on rising on a large scale. However, this is my point: I hope that our mining production will keep up at the highest possible level but the marketing of our minerals is becoming increasingly difficult. The United States are more and more difficult and the best example of this is in the case of uranium.

We had contracts with the United States atomic energy authority for the production of uranium until 1962. As a matter of fact, the United States were so worried about being short of this important product that they pleaded with Canada to give them options on our uranium production from 1962 to 1966 and the companies concerned granted those options.

In due course, the United States decided not to take up those options and, as I said, we should have urged them, at the time, to meet their commitments. I think that in this way we would have got them to take up at least part of these options. I notice that the minister seems to disapprove; but industrialists and mine owners believe that, if Canada had insisted with the United States, we would have succeeded in getting the American government to take at least part of those options, and in that case we would now perhaps be assured of an annual production of $300 or $325 million for the next eight or ten years, instead of an annual production of $250 million for the next four or five years. So much for the matter of uranium.

As far as base metals, like copper and zinc, are concerned, it is well known that the United States, not quite two years ago, introduced a tax of 1.7 cents a pound on copper and they do not seem to be considering the removal of that tax. This tax is a handicap to our copper producers, and it is known what a quota system on zinc means for the industry. Production has to be curtailed; several mines had to close down and others will have to control their production in order not to exceed their quotas. These are problems in which the government must take interest, and perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce should go more often to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys for advice as far as the sale of our metals, either to the United States or to Europe, is concerned.

In fact, we should probably be able to sell base metals to European countries if we had an aggressive team who would study European markets. People are well aware of the complications arising out of the trading agreements of the European countries, known as the Six and the Seven. We should try to approach the representatives of those countries or try to negotiate with them in order to dispose of a greater quantity of our base metals.

I know that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is mostly interested not only in the production of Canadian metals, but also in their sale. Our domestic consumption takes up only a very small part of our production. Such are the matters on which I would like to call the attention of the minister. And now, Mr. Chairman, concerning the current studies on the polar continental shelf, it should not be forgotten that, in the same field, there are continental shelves adjacent to the provinces too.

I think that certain works have been undertaken. I understood the minister to say that work had been undertaken in the Magdalen islands and that certain projects had also been launched on the coast of New Brunswick and in the gulf of St. Lawrence.

I do not intend to deal at length with this matter now because I want to discuss it in great detail later on, but since it has been made clear in 1958 that the mineral resources of the continental shelf belong to the neighbouring country, I believe the time has come for the federal government to face the situation and to transfer those resources to the provinces, particularly where they are close to the provinces in James bay, in Hudson bay, in the gulf of St. Lawrence and along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. On the other hand, as far as the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island are concerned, I believe that we should transfer to them those natural resources that we find on the continental shelf in a certain radius from those provinces.

I think we should transfer to the province of Quebec the resources found in the continental shelf along the gulf of St. Lawrence, close to the province of Quebec. Further, we should transfer to Newfoundland the part concerning that province, along the Labrador coast and around the island of Newfoundland. As to the sections located in Hudson bay and James bay, we should also transfer the relevant portions to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. On the Pacific coast, such natural resources should be transferred to British Columbia. This is a very important matter. Moreover, we should transfer to the provinces the small islands located along their coasts. This is a problem of great concern to the Canadian people and particularly to the province of Quebec.

I think the minister should consult with his colleagues, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) and even the Prime Minister, and discuss the possibility of transferring the natural resources that are part of the continental shelf to the various provinces along the coast.

I think such action on his part would be highly appreciated not only by the provinces concerned, but by every Canadian. It is a most important matter. Perhaps he will also have an opportunity to discuss this plan with the next premier of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I was about to conclude my remarks. However, the problems I just listed are most important.

I want to add another thing. Since the minister mentioned university research grants through the geological commission, I must say that I think this is a good idea, which will benefit not only the mining industry but the whole country. The grants were introduced quite a long time ago. They have been raised to $50,000, and I quite agree with the minister when he says that they should be increased. They should, in fact, be substantially increased, not because the government is being asked to employ more geologists or because some of them are out of work, but because we have large geological projects to carry out. Indeed, we could double the staff of the Canadian geological commission. We are making no mistake in encouraging a greater number of young men to take up geological studies.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Especially in the summertime, to encourage students.

Mr. Dumas: Especially in the summertime. Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East says that we should encourage students much more. We must give credit to the minister for what he is doing. Last year, many students were jobless. But, as a result of representations made to the department by the geological commission, as well as by the mining industry, the government did employ a greater number of geologists. In view of the slackening tempo of mining operations in private industry, the department was asked to employ a greater number of geologists, and it did so, taking on several young men. I should think that this year a greater number of students will be employed, due to the fact that 88 teams will be at work.

I should like to get more information from the minister about that. Perhaps he might let me have them when we take up the various items of his estimates. Then we will know how many students can be hired for the summer.

Coming back to the matter of grants to universities and grants in aid to students, I think student aid should be continued on a wider scale. We should help students who wish to specialize in mineral research. Should the minister decide to earmark a certain amount in his estimates to provide help for students, he can be assured of my wholehearted support.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the act respecting the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys sets out in seven general subsections of section 6 the further duties of the minister other than the general one to have jurisdiction over mines, minerals, explosives and technical surveys. The scope of his responsibility is very wide. It has been my feeling and observation that the department has never had the interest on the part of the government that it should have had. I think this general attitude was substantiated very strongly by the report published last year by the committee on mines, forests and waters. This very same committee considered the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources and came up with the suggestion that forestry should have a larger place. The government has given an indication that it is going to move in the direction that the committee wished by creating a department of forestry.

But while the committee's report on the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources was critical to a degree, its report on the minister's department was the most devastating I have encountered of any report made by a parliamentary committee. I was very interested in it since, along with members who in the main are supporters of the government, I helped to prepare it. I will not claim that I played a large role but I was certainly in general agreement with many of the criticisms. These criticisms were published in the report of the committee which appeared in the minutes and proceedings of the standing committee last year for May 25.

I expected from the minister some résumé of how the department has moved to meet the criticisms expressed in that report. I am not going to be critical of the résumé he gave us but with regard to almost every phase of the department's activities there was a critical appraisal in the committee's report. One thing I should like to suggest is that the minister concerned should arrange to have his department reviewed next year not by the committee on mines, forests and waters but by the estimates committee of the House of Commons. In view of the very serious criticisms made last year by a committee that was intimately concerned with the subject matter, it seems to me that we need a further review of the department very soon from the spending point of view and an analysis made on the basis of that approach. I hope the minister will consider doing this because I am going to point out some extremely severe criticism in the recommendations of the committee.

I might add that the year before the very same committee examined the department and made a fourth report which was published on July 31, 1958. The 1958 report was not nearly as critical and the committee, of course, did not go as deeply into the affairs of the department. But recommendation No. 11 in the 1958 report was in these words:

> Your committee recommends that the government give consideration to the necessity for increasing the department's research program and facilities in order to keep pace with the accelerated tempo of northern development.

That is about the strongest suggestion in that report, but when you turn to the 1959 report you find nothing but strong suggestions or recommendations. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee the recommendation found in paragraph seven of the committee's report. It is, of course, a reflection on the previous government much more than on the present minister. It reads as follows:

> In almost all fields of national scientific endeavour, this department should have led and should lead the way. There is little need for this committee to apportion blame for the present state. Both the people and those responsible for policy in Canada have been slow to realize the urgent need for expenditure and leadership in this field. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, your committee insists, must be recognized as a vitally important one, not one of inferior significance. The scientific function of the department cannot any longer be circumscribed by caution, hesitancy and lack of support. It is imperative that all branches of the department embark on an accelerated program of expansion, and planning for expansion; and that the provision of the needed money, staff and facilities be an immediate consideration of the government.

Let me tell the minister how pleased I am to see that the estimates for this year have been increased by $5,700,000, but I would have been much happier if I had not found that so much of this increase, as a matter of fact $3½ million, is going for the construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment. I realize that before you can expand a research program you need these things but I would have liked to see more of the increase this year devoted to the specific areas of research that the committee recommended. I want to go on to point out to the minister where these areas are. I think that perhaps the best place to start is where the committee's criticism was most severe and that is with the mines branch. In that respect the committee had this to say:

The information elicited on the mines branch was depressing. The branch does not have the funds or the staff it needs to carry out the work it should do and wants to do.

When I check the particulars of the estimates I cannot get any great encouragement that the minister is moving in the light of this particular criticism. Another area of the department that was criticized was the dominion coal board. I should like to draw the minister's attention to this statement.

Your committee learned with regret of losses of coal markets in both western and eastern Canada through a lack of liaison between the coal producer and the consumer. Your committee recommends that every possible effort be made to ensure that this situation is corrected.

If we turn to the geological survey of Canada we find the following in paragraph 55:

It is essential that the geological survey must not only keep pace with the mineral industry, but work ahead of it, providing the industry with geological information well in advance. If this objective is not met the function of the survey is not only seriously impaired but, as well, the information which is eventually supplied by the survey will have been obtained at an excessive cost in relation to the effort expended to obtain it. This has proven to be the fact.

That is a very serious criticism of this branch. We were made aware in the committee, and the committee so reported, that the geography division was short of geographers and that so far as geodesy was concerned we had an almost laughable situation compared with the Americans, although the Americans were very weak and puny compared with the Russians. With respect to the surveys and mapping branch the committee made this recommendation:

—the staff increase in this branch should be progressive over the period of the next five years to facilitate training and to increase assimilation.

The report went on to urge that much greater efforts be made in this particular field. It seems to me this was a call by a House of Commons committee to greater effort on the part of the minister to make his department more important. The reasons for urging this have been well put by the previous speaker. The part of the country from which I come, as the minister may know, totals 148,000 square miles, and this is a considerable chunk of the Laurentian shield. The whole hope for the future growth of this area rests on the development of the metal industry, and specifically the iron ore and base metal industries. It is rather disconcerting, in this particular situation, when you have two jurisdictions. We have a provincial jurisdiction and a federal jurisdiction, and there is very little indication of aggressive leadership in this particular field from either one, that is direct encouragement in the base metal or iron ore development.

I have been wanting to tell the minister how very pleased I was to have the opportunity of looking at these particular reports that have been prepared largely by Mr. R. D. Elver of the mineral resources division. This is the kind of survey of the prospects of the iron ore industry of which we should have more and which should be well broadcast so that the people appreciate the opportunity we have.

I might refer to one of these reports by Mr. Elver which came out in March, 1960, entitled "Direct iron ore processes and their prospects in eastern Canada". This is the kind of thing one welcomes from a department such as this. It is an economic survey of a very concrete situation, with an attempt to assess where we may get expansion, and not the least of my interest in this survey comes from the fact that two places are projected as being likely sources of direct iron industries, one being Seven Islands and the other being Port Arthur. I would suggest to the minister that we could stand many more analyses of this type, and the popularization of these analyses should be made on a fairly wide front.

Here again I should like to congratulate the department upon some of the publications it is putting out in an attempt to popularize the department. I am thinking especially of one which was very attractive, the one I have here, which we all received recently. I hope the minister will see that this goes out not only to industry but to regional offices, development associations, chambers of commerce and so on. We are not getting an appreciation of what the department can do.

I must say in this regard that despite my criticism last year I had the opportunity of bringing a sample along certain lines to the minister's officials, and in so far as the assay report was concerned, it was a good economic appreciation. I thought that the reply and service were excellent.

One of the things that concerns me after the mines committee report of last year, and after the statement of the minister, was the fact that the Canadian metal association came out with an argument that they did not want the government to get into any more research. I have not got that particular clipping here, but I know for a fact they particularly did not want the government to get into any more advanced metallurgical research. There was an indication, as I read the comment, which I believe was made by the permanent secretary or secretary manager of that organization, that they felt the industry could take care of its own research in this particular field. The minister is shaking his head, and perhaps I misinterpreted it. I know definitely this was the interpretation I took from the report. I was disappointed in this comment. I hope it will not discourage the department.

Mr. Comtois: I was not aware of that.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question? Was this criticism of the research a reflection on the national research council?

Mr. Fisher: No, I do not think it was. I think it was specifically a reaction to the indication that this particular department was going to expand its research program. In so far as the national research council is concerned, I may say I knew a young scientist who was working for the minister's department not long ago. He has since moved. I checked, personally, as to why he had moved because he was a friend. It happened to be one of the evenings when the house was not sitting, so he said get in your car and I will show you why. We drove out to one of these old buildings of the mines department, and it was all in darkness. He said, now let us go for a drive out the other way. We went to the national research council building on Sussex street and he said, now look. There were lots of lights on. He showed me another national research council building and there were more lights on. He said, I am so fed up with the business of a scientist in the mines and technical surveys branch being looked upon as a kind of nine to five job. He said that in the national research council you are given much greater opportunity to work when you possibly can. It is not looked upon as a nine to five job. It is much more exciting; it is much easier to get equipment and have your specifications for an experiment checked. It was for these reasons, this lack of the kind of atmosphere that Dr. Steacie attempts to create in the national research council, perhaps very successfully, that this particular Ph.D. got out of the department. I just mention that to the minister as an indication of the kind of research spirit that needs to prevail in his kind of organization, and to suggest perhaps it does not exist there whereas it could and does in the national research council.

One of the aspects of the department that has been brought into question in my mind relates to its position to other government departments. I might refer in this connection to the uranium industry difficulties. Here we have a mining development that has come a cropper, and come a cropper for perhaps a decade or more. The department that one would think would properly be most concerned with the research aspect and all the other aspects of the problem has had almost nothing to do with it, so far as I know. I do believe it would have been much better, both for the Elliot Lake situation and the situation as a whole, if the minister of mines had been responsible rather than the Minister of Trade and Commerce, even though it may have been a merchandising or marketing problem that fell under that department. Certainly in terms of alternatives, what to do with these uranium properties, certainly in terms of background so far as the mining industry is concerned, it seems to me the mines department had it over trade and commerce.

I think of coal, for example, which is a marketing problem to a degree according to our house committee report. We do not have coal under the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to know from the minister what his department is doing in so far as the uranium industry and its future is concerned. Is there any possibility at all of any of the research that is supposedly being rushed to find alternative uses for uranium originating in his department? Could his department play any role at all in this matter?

One of the specific questions that I wanted to ask the minister was the relationship of his department to the department of northern affairs in so far as this roads to resources program is concerned. As I understand it, one particular mining group in my constituency has a prospect into which they hope to put a fair amount of money. As a matter of fact, I believe their development program calls for something in excess of $1 million. They applied, and were supported as I understand in their application by nearby communities, to have one of the roads put in partly sponsored by federal funds. I take it from the reply of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the road was turned down and the basis for the turndown was an adverse report on the prospects of this particular property or company or development from the minister's department. I cannot be critical of the turndown because it may have been a proper one, but I should like to know how the information was gathered on this particular matter. In this case, since there so much expectation in our region and so much disappointment over the failure of the road program to go through, I think we would appreciate a full explanation.

The area in economic research which I should especially like to recommend to the minister is the future market for our iron ore in so far as it relates to Europe and the whole prospects of the kind of program that Cyrus Eaton had in contemplation in so far as Greenland, Germany and other parts of Europe are concerned. One of the difficulties for the ordinary member of the public, so far as mining is concerned, is the continual launching or the promotion of gigantic schemes—one might almost call them dreams —of developments here and developments there, assuming parts of Canada are always next year country or next decade country, not a little owing to the promotional imagination of people in the mining field. I think the kind of sober, thorough assessment that we should have here could be done on a wider scale and bring a bit more realism into this particular picture.

Another point I wanted to refer to was touched upon by the hon. member for Villeneuve, namely the question of jurisdiction or actual ownership of the continental shelf. I think the minister is aware of the fact that the regulations promulgated by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in so far as oil exploration is concerned, as I understand them, indicate that the federal government has decided to claim that jurisdiction. I have not any quarrel with this decision. It is regrettable to me and to my associates that a number of our natural resources were allowed to lapse, especially in the thirties, by the provinces; but I would appreciate from the minister a statement in this regard especially from the point of view of what consideration the government is giving. Were the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and the officials who are carrying out continental shelf projects and surveys consulted before the minister of northern affairs came out with these regulations? Is there any indication that the provinces are objecting to this particular approach? If so, generally what are the views of the minister and his officials on the matter? It seems to me this is a most legitimate point to have brought out.

The question of the geological survey and its relationship to students has been covered by the minister to a degree. Several years ago he gave me a reply that indicated there was a limited role the department could play in so far as the undergraduate is concerned. This particular summer is a very hard one on university students, just as was the one two years ago. It was an especially hard one two years ago, as the minister will recall, for students in geology. I wonder what consideration the minister has given to making a more flexible program that may be able to adjust quickly to a developing situation such as that which is upon us this summer when there is a great shortage of opportunities for many students in fields that relate to mining. I am thinking not only of geology but of mining engineering and other fields such as geography and the like, where students can get an exceptionally good part of their training in working on these particular surveys.

We have every reason to be prouder, I think, of the geological survey than of any other branch of the Canadian government. I think a case could be made for the proposition that it has been the most important and the best section of government in almost any real terms in our Canadian history. It is certainly the oldest of the scientific branches and it has made a contribution to the development of Canada that no one can really get into good focus, not the least because of these promotional extravangazas and the tendency to build up our mining picture historically upon the basis of types like Sir Harry Oakes. Long before Sir Harry Oakes, Gilbert LaBine and people like them were abroad in the land they had these geological teams far ahead, sometimes 50 and 60 years ahead.

We were talking a few weeks ago about Red Lake and the coming back of certain mines there. Robert Bell, a very distinguished man from Queen's University, in 1872 and 1873 was up in the Red Lake mining area long before the railroad was put through there and spotted these green stone formations on which the Howey camp developed. He also spotted the greenstone formation in lake Minnitaki that runs down through Atikokan on which many of our other best deposits have come along.

The prospectors throughout Canada and the geologists of private organizations lean very much upon the records of this particular organization. I know that the library for which I work in Port Arthur was successful in obtaining a complete file of the geological surveys from 1848 up to 1935. It obtained it through the good graces of a famous geologist by the name of Dr. Baker. After getting it a private geologist came in and made the acknowledgement that this collection in its complete form and in such good shape was worth thousands of dollars to him. It was very useful for practical exploration even at this stage, even some of the older reports touching back into the 1870's. This underlines so much of the work that has been done. It is unfortunate to me that greater recognition has not been given to the pioneers of this particular branch. I think of Dr. Owen, Dr. Bell—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, in pursuance of section 3 of standing order 15 it is my duty to rise, report certain resolutions and request leave to sit later this day or at the next sitting of this house, as the case may be.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, may I ask leave of the house to request that consideration be given to according precedence to several private bills and to changing the order as listed under the private bills item? The bills about which I am speaking are as follows: item No. 263, Bill No. S-29, to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada; item No. 264, Bill No. S-30, to incorporate Western Surety Company; item No. 265, Bill No. S-33, to incorporate the Wawanesa Mutual Life Insurance Company; and item No. 266, Bill No. S-34, respecting the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house prepared to consider all these bills together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. S-29, to incorporate Allstate Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Mandziuk.

Bill No. S-30, to incorporate Western Surety Company.—Mr. Mandziuk.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Bill No. S-34, respecting the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company.—Mr. Mandziuk.

THE WAWANESA MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. S-33, to incorporate the Wawanesa Mutual Life Insurance Company—Mr. Mandziuk—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Incorporation.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the reason why there are two bills dealing with the same company, one to incorporate and another dealing with another matter? Could they not have been dealt with in the same bill?

Mr. Mandziuk: I am very pleased to answer that question. The parent company is the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company, one of the largest strictly Canadian companies, and the offspring of this fire and casualty company is this new incorporation.

Mr. Brunsden: I should like to ask the sponsor of this bill if he feels from his knowledge of the life insurance business that the interests of the premium holders in this new company are adequately protected.

Mr. Mandziuk: When the incorporation of this life insurance company was considered in the banking and commerce committee the superintendent of insurance, Mr. MacGregor, gave his opinion on practically all these questions. Anyone taking out a policy under the company will become a member of the company. It is connected with the parent company, that is the mutual insurance company which writes fire and casualty insurance, only to the extent of the cash that is going to be advanced according to the provisions in the bill to the life insurance company subject to repayment later. The life insurance company when incorporated according to the provision in the charter will not be able to commence business until this advance of funds has been made by the parent company.

Mr. Brunsden: I am not too sure that the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company has always protected its policyholders. I am speaking in respect of casualty and other lines, and I want to be assured before this bill is passed that there will be some very definite responsibility accepted by the company on behalf of policyholders.

Mr. Mandziuk: As to the dealings carried on by the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company in both fire and casualty departments, that can hardly be questioned. The superintendent of insurance advised the committee that for every large company operating in Canada they have a complaints file, but they have no such file in respect of the Wawanesa Insurance Company which is regarded as one of the best insurance companies in Canada as far as settlements and financial conditions are concerned.

The Wawanesa Mutual has assets of almost $30 million, and a surplus of over $8 million. That surely protects the interests of the policyholders as far as fire and casualty are concerned. Of course, the company to be incorporated to write life insurance starts off with the guaranteed fund that is to be advanced by the fire insurance company from its surplus funds.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I was going to suggest that there are a number of divorce bills standing on the order paper for second reading. I think the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) wishes to speak to Bill No. SD-320 which is order No. 267. Perhaps the other bills could be given second reading and then the hon. member would be given an opportunity to speak to Bill No. SD-320 if it is his wish to do so and then we could go into committee on the other divorce bills.

Mr. Howard: You may proceed in that fashion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house prepared to take out of their order the divorce bills standing for second reading in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ELSA FAIGA MANACE GROSSMAN

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved the second reading of Bill No. SD-320, for the relief of Elsa Faiga Manace Grossman.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise three points in connection with this case to which I think serious consideration should be given. The first is an examination as to whether there was a marriage and if so should that marriage be dissolved. The second point concerns an examination as to whether there is proper domicile within a province which would allow this bill to be presented to parliament. If there is not proper domicile it may be determined that parliament has no jurisdiction. The third point concerns an examination of the basis on which dissolution of the marriage is sought. Adultery is alleged and we must examine whether adultery took place. The committee of the other place and the other chamber itself has dealt with the bill and passed it through its various stages.

Because this is the first occasion on which I have a recollection of your being in the chair, Mr. Speaker, during a discussion on second reading of divorce bills, perhaps I should state that I seek permission to follow my usual practice of refraining from mentioning the names and addresses of the people involved in this case.

The petition reads as follows:

The petition of—

Giving the name of the petitioner.

—teacher, of the city of Toronto, province of Ontario,
Humbly Sheweth:

1. That your petitioner was lawfully married to—

Giving the name of the respondent.

—on or about the 7th day of September, A.D. 1954, at the city of Toronto, province of Ontario, your petitioner's maiden name being—presently residing at—

Giving the address.

—in the city of Toronto, province of Ontario, with her parents—

Giving their names.

—and your petitioner, moreover, was never married before her marriage to the respondent herein.

The petitioner under oath produced documentary evidence as proof of her marriage. The marriage took place in Toronto but the evidence reveals that the respondent has always been domiciled in Montreal. I submit that we have jurisdiction to deal with divorce from any province of Canada on any grounds whatsoever.

Now, with respect to the allegation of adultery—and it is in this respect that I should like to give some pertinent detailed references in the evidence itself if I am permitted to do so—

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member proceeds, I am concerned with the propriety of any detailed discussion of the evidence on second reading. The matter before the house is the principle of the bill, which is to dissolve the marriage of these people. The hon. member is, I think, within his rights in drawing the attention of the house to the fact that the principle should not be endorsed by the house because there are three defects, or three variations from the normal practice of the house in granting divorce by act of parliament. But when it comes to proving or substantiating these matters in detail it would seem to me that the proper place to do that would be in committee. I think the hon. member can make his point if he has any doubt about the proof of adultery but not to discuss the evidence in detail here.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if I gave an indication to you that that was what I was trying to do, it is not the point which I was leading up to. I have no quarrel at this stage —as you have indicated perhaps I should have —with whether adultery had been committed and whether, following the practice of this house and of the other place, there is sufficient ground to dissolve the marriage. I have reference to the evidence produced before the committee in the other place but no reference to the question of whether adultery had or had not taken place.

My reference is to an entirely different matter and I hope to found upon this particular reference which I wish to make, which involves civil and human rights, a motion which would indicate that this house should not at this time consider second reading until another body has had an opportunity to consider this other matter. That is what I was leading toward and that is what I hope to make reference to by referring to the evidence itself. Therefore, if I may I should like to refer to page 14 of the evidence. This is the evidence by Mr. George Roland Foucher, age 43, who resides in Montreal. His occupation is an investigator. He appeared as a witness on behalf of the petitioner. He was sworn and testified as follows. I will paraphrase it. They went to a particular place and there they found certain things. If I can specify it, I should like to read from page 14 as follows: He made reference to the respondent and corespondent and said:

They had been in for over a couple of hours—we moved to the door and after knocking on it, the subject himself came to the door and opened it partly. I pushed on the door and we both rushed in and were met by a loud yell of pain inside, and just as we looked behind the door Mr.—was sitting in a wicker chair holding onto his foot. Our reaction was to ask him what happened—

I submit this is the normal reaction of someone who bursts into your premises. He found this man holding his foot. In any event, he followed the normal procedure and asked what happened. I continue:

—and he said that by pushing the door open I had knocked on his foot and he had a couple of broken toes.

It is not clear to me whether he had a couple of broken toes before and this action had injured them further, or whether he had a couple of broken toes as a result of the door being pushed open.

Mr. Speaker: I am not clear that I follow the point of the evidence in relation to the second reading of the bill. I am not sure what the hon. member's argument is with respect to approving the principle of the granting of this divorce. If he is able to state it I wish he would. If he is not, I suggest he leave the reading of the evidence to when we are in committee.

Mr. Howard: I think perhaps I shall be able to show that without any difficulty, Mr. Speaker. This is what I was leading up to in that slight reference. Let me indicate to you in a general way what I was trying to do. I think perhaps I have proceeded far enough with the reading of the evidence about people pushing the door open and knocking on someone's toes and either breaking them or injuring them additionally where they had been broken. The witness then goes on to say that the man in question was more concerned about his foot than talking to them about the purpose of their visit which, I submit, is a perfectly reasonable thing to expect. The point I am leading to, is that this invasion of the privileges and rights, human rights, civil rights and civil liberties of that person should not be condoned and that a person should not have his premises invaded arbitrarily, such as was done here.

What I am submitting is that before this house proceeds to give second reading to this bill we might properly refer the subject matter thereof to another body established under authority of this parliament, an authority which deals in the field of litigation, deals in the field of human and civil rights, an organization for which all of us have respect and admiration in Canada. I suggest the subject matter of this bill should be referred to that group in order that we may ask that group to pass upon not only what I have read here so far but upon other factors which are substantiated in the evidence and with which I do not intend to deal at this time. I think this matter should be referred to that other body so that they may take cognizance of it and determine whether or not civil rights and human rights, the right of an individual to privacy, have or have not been invaded.

Mr. McCleave: Don't be a hypocrite. You are destroying their rights in this house.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McCleave: Hypocrisy.

Mr. Howard: It is not my intention to be drawn into a side discussion by those to whom I have referred as preferring to talk from their seats rather than from their places in the house. If my hon. friend, whoever it was, down in that corner wishes to make reference to hypocrites I suggest to him with all deference, with all due respect—and I am only assuming that it was the hon. member for Halifax—

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, it was the member for Halifax who has put up with a great deal of nonsense from that particular corner and who is glad he is far removed from it so he cannot smell the odour from it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax is taking liberties which he should not take in this chamber in using offensive language to the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to complain about the reference of the hon. member for Halifax to hypocrisy.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member will not proceed with that subject.

Mr. Howard: No; I do not ask him to withdraw. This is one thing I do not want to do. If the hon. member for Halifax wants to make those allegations and stand by them, that is his privilege, especially if he wants to make them by hiding behind his privileges and remaining in his seat.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is speaking on a question of privilege he may do so. If he is speaking on second reading I wish he would proceed.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Halifax raised a question of privilege. This is what I was dealing with.

Mr. Speaker: I thought that was disposed of.

Mr. Howard: If you have disposed of it, then I appreciate the manner in which you have done so. It was done in such a delicate way that there is no escape from it. The reference I am making to the evidence has to do with whether the rights of individuals to liberty, the rights of individuals to have their domicile, whether it be a home they own or a hotel or motel room they rent for the night, free from invasion, are to be protected. I say that we should refer to another body which has had considerable experience in this field the question of whether or not these human and civil rights have been invaded and ask that body to give an opinion to the house on the basis of their study and consideration of the matter. That is all I was leading up to and that is why I referred to the particular part of the evidence which I recited. On that basis I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for examination and report thereon.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put I wish to argue, and I think I can do so effectively, that the amendment is clearly out of order in that it is not within the competence of the house to pass upon such a question.

Mr. Speaker: I would be very appreciative of any assistance which can be given by the hon. member for Halifax on the question whether or not there is provision for reference of a question of this kind by the House of Commons to the Supreme Court of Canada and for the Supreme Court of Canada to receive such a reference and deal with it. If the amendment would be nugatory in the sense that it could not be carried out, then I would think its regularity might be questioned.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, that was exactly the point I was going to raise. If such a motion were sent to the Supreme Court of Canada their lordships would hardly know how to deal with it. It would not come to them in any regular fashion or through any regular process of law. I can understand that my hon. friend has perhaps got himself into this difficulty because he does not understand what the ordinary process of law means.

With respect to the bruised or broken toes of the respondent's husband, a remedy was clearly available in the courts. If he had wished to do so he could have taken the matter into the police court and charged Foucher and his associate with trespass or with having occasioned him bodily harm. He had these remedies open to him. But I know of no authority whereby a reference can be made to the Supreme Court of Canada when no grounds are stated but merely a general opinion is sought. Surely the highest court in the land should not be burdened with dealing with a matter with respect to which rights already exist under the law if the respondent had wished to pursue them. According to the evidence, he did not choose to do so and I cannot see any point in the hon. member trying to protect somebody who did not try to protect himself.

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt the hon. member, perhaps he will have given consideration to whether there is any authority or precedent for a reference by the House of Commons to the Supreme Court of Canada for advice on any matter and whether there is any power in the Supreme Court of Canada to receive and deal with such a reference.

Mr. McCleave: I think that would require reference to the act which sets up the Supreme Court of Canada. If that were done a definite answer could probably be given to your question. However, I submit that the burden surely must rest on those who propound such an amendment to show that this is a proper course of action, and no attempt has been made to do that.

Mr. Howard: If I may speak on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, raised by the hon. member for Halifax, I should like to point out to him that it is completely irrelevant whether the respondent took any action or chose not to do so. The last point mentioned by the hon. member, whether or not we have the authority to take such a course, is the one to which we should address ourselves. As suggested by the hon. member for Halifax, I should like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, a statute passed by this house, being an act respecting the Supreme Court of Canada, chapter 259 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, which was amended by chapter 48 of the statutes of 1956, although the amendment is not relevant to this matter. I refer Your Honour to section 56 of the Supreme Court Act, this being the short title, which reads as follows:

The court—

The definition section indicates what the court is.

—or any two judges thereof, shall examine and report upon any private bill—

Of which this is one.

—or petition for a private bill—

There is a petition attached in this instance.

—presented to the Senate or House of Commons, and referred to the court under any rules or orders made by the Senate or House of Commons.

I submit that the House of Commons and the Senate together determined by enacting section 56 that under this section any private bill or petition for a private bill presented to the Senate or the House of Commons may be referred to the court under any rules or orders made by the Senate or House of Commons. I think there are perhaps no rules so far as the House of Commons are concerned. To my knowledge this has not occurred before. As there are no rules, we must look to the question of orders. If the house passes an order such as that to which I have alluded the matter would be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for its consideration and report thereon. I submit that the amendment is entirely in order pursuant to section 56 of the Supreme Court Act.

Mr. Baldwin: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the section read by the hon. member for Skeena clearly indicates that the amendment he has placed before the house is quite out of order. As I heard it read, section 56 suggests that there is a right in the Supreme Court of Canada but the Supreme Court of Canada is a statutory court created by the parliament of Canada and only has jurisdiction to deal with such cases and such matters by way of petition or otherwise as come clearly within the four corners of the act itself. There is no right in the court as of right unless the statute itself says that these matters may be brought before the court.

The section to which the hon. member referred only deals with such petitions or private bills as come within our rules. I have looked through the rules and I am sure there is no rule in our standing orders making any such provision. If I am wrong, perhaps the hon. member might refer me to it. I am relying on my memory but so far as I can recall there is no rule in our standing orders which makes provision for the transmitting of any petition or private bill directly from this house to the Supreme Court of Canada. I think the provision in the act says in effect that if we should choose to establish a rule then the Supreme Court of Canada can and would be bound to hear the matter, but in the absence of such a rule the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to speak to the point of order. If the hon. member was a member of the house committee last session—I do not recall whether or not he was—he would remember that this same problem arose at that time with regard to whether a committee had the power to come before the house and ask the house to make a motion to the effect that the attorney general investigate certain matters. We had before us then a precedent—I have not got the citation with me and I cannot remember the precise information—to the effect that the only request the house could make of the attorney general, or in this case the supreme court, would be one which related to something which happened before the committee itself, that is if there were perjury in the evidence or some offence committed before a committee of the house.

Here we have a motion based on an allegation connected with an investigation of some incident that happened outside of the house in one of the provinces of this country. The incident did not occur before a committee of this house, and according to the information given to us last year I would suggest that this motion is entirely out of order.

Mr. Howard: May I be permitted to speak further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker? I would deal with the reference by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. MacLean) first. As I understand what he said, he did not recall what had happened last year and did not have the reference before him, but it had something to do with the fact that a committee, I assume a standing committee of the house such as the miscellaneous private bills committee; that this house had no authority to deal with anything of this nature until the committee had reported. I think, on the face of it—

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): No, that is not what I meant at all.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I misunderstood what the hon. member intended to say. In any event, I think it is irrelevant. The hon. member said he has not the particular reference before him and he is only conjecturing as to the effect of it.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps I could clear that up before we go on.

Mr. Speaker: Order; I will hear the hon. member later.

Mr. Howard: In so far as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is concerned, as I understood his remarks he said that we have the right to refer matters to the Supreme Court of Canada only if there are rules. I would point out that the Supreme Court Act is not specific. It is not a specific reference under the rules, but it says, refer to the court under any rules or orders. I submit that if the house has the motion properly before it, and if it deems it wise to pass the motion, then it becomes an order of reference to the supreme court. We have no rules, there is no specific rule and because the wording of that section is general, we then consider it under the item of orders. I submit that if there were rules they would be the standing orders, I presume.

The section says that matters of this nature may be referred to the supreme court, and if there were rules they would set up this procedure for referring such matters to the supreme court, and the manner in which that could be done. The Supreme Court Act is general and refers to any rules. Since we have no rules I submit we are at liberty to hold that the motion is in order because it falls under the classification of orders. If the motion were passed, it would then be an order of the house for a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has submitted an amendment which raises a point which is rather novel in that it suggests a reference of the subject matter of this bill to the Supreme Court of Canada, an action for which there is no precedent as I am advised, although there are precedents for such action being taken by the Senate which appears to have established a procedure for so doing. The section of the act under which this reference is sought to be made provides that the court or any two of the judges thereof shall examine and report upon any private bill or petition for a private bill presented to the Senate or the House of Commons. The amendment seeks to refer the subject matter of this bill, and not the bill itself. I think in that sense the motion is defective.

The other point which was raised was that the section of the Supreme Court Act to which I referred goes on to say that the matter must be referred to the court under rules or orders made by the Senate or House of Commons. The point is made; "what is meant is rules or standing orders," and that is met by the argument of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) that an order of the house would come within the section, an order referring this matter would be an order within the meaning of that section of the act. I rather think that the other opinion is the better one because rules and orders are referred to in the plural and as synonymous. Our orders are called standing orders, and if the House of Commons chose to use this machinery for a reference to the supreme court, presumably they would have established standing orders by which the reference could be made, which we have not done.

However, I have some doubt on that point and if the matter turned on that point I would prefer to reserve it and give consideration to it. Since the amendment as submitted seems not to come within the section on rather narrow grounds, namely that the reference must be of a private bill or petition, not of the subject matter thereof, I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it is—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has spoken, and he is not entitled to speak again. I have given my ruling and the hon. member has spoken on this motion, so he is not entitled to speak again.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I was presuming to appeal your ruling.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has a right to appeal the ruling. If he is rising for that purpose, he may say so.

Mr. Howard: If I am prevented from speaking again, then I would appeal your ruling to the house.

Mr. Speaker: I have given my ruling. There is no point in debating it after it has been given. The hon. member is at liberty to take such course as he feels is necessary.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): If I may with your leave, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), the motion that has been moved except that I should like to amend it by putting in the words "this bill", where the words "the subject matter of this bill" are now.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member present his motion properly in writing and the Chair will be glad to consider it.

I now have a motion, moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) and seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), in these terms:

That this bill be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada.

By leave of the house, I should like to reserve my view on this amendment, if that would be possible, because it raises a matter of some consequence. I think it is desirable, in establishing a precedent, to be sure it is in accordance with our practice and procedures. Perhaps the hon. member would move or the house would consent to the adjournment of the debate to give consideration to this proposed amendment; is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Debate adjourned by consent.

Mr. McCleave: It is now close to six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. It would be a simple matter for any hon. member to read into the record for ten minutes some of the evidence in one of these cases. Unless there is going to be agreement to get some of these cases out of the way today, I think that perhaps it could be called six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that it it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would like permission to revert to motions at this stage.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

NOTICE OF AMENDMENTS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the house notice of three amendments which will be proposed on Monday to Bill No. C-68, to amend the Income Tax Act. I have endeavoured to give the house notice of all such amendments in advance. If it met with the wish of the house, these amendments could be printed in today's Votes and Proceedings and be available to hon. members when the bill is taken up on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader whether there is any change in the order of business announced last night for next week?

Mr. Churchill: No. There is no change in the legislative program for Monday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOME CIVIL DEFENCE SHELTERS

Question No. 409—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government taken any steps to provide financial assistance to individuals or families for the purpose of building home civil defence shelters?
2. Has the government started distribution of the pamphlet containing home shelter plans?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister):

1. The government has decided to include home shelters in the schedule of items for which home improvement loans may be made under the National Housing Act. Action is now under way to implement this decision.

2. Distribution is commencing this day of a pamphlet describing how to build a relatively inexpensive basement shelter designed to protect a family against radioactive fall-out. Fall-out is considered likely to be the most widespread danger to Canadians if a nuclear war should occur. Other pamphlets will follow, dealing with backyard shelters, shelters to be built into new houses, and shelters giving a degree of blast protection.

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DEPUTY SPEAKER OF INDIAN HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members will permit me, I should like to say on behalf of all members of the House of Commons a word of welcome to a distinguished visitor from India, the deputy speaker of the Lok Sabha, the House of the People of India, Sardar Hukam Singh, who is in the gallery today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—REPORTED RECALL OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE FOR CONSULTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, arising out of a report which I have just seen; therefore I was not able to give him notice of the question. The report is that the British and the United States governments have recalled their representatives on the disarmament commission in Geneva for consultation. In view of developments in Geneva, is the Canadian government asking General Burns to return for that purpose? If so, would it be possible for him to appear before the committee on external affairs to discuss this subject?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is of course, as the Leader of the Opposition realizes, continued communication in the ordinary way with our representative at that conference. I have no knowledge of any request or desire on the part of the Canadian government for the return to Canada at this time of General Burns. Naturally if it becomes apparent that his presence here would be of assistance in determining any of the questions which may require consideration, a decision in this regard can then be made.

TRANSPORT

REPORTED DECISION OF RAILWAYS TO SUSPEND GRAIN SHIPMENTS TO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a telegram from Vancouver expressing serious concern at the decision of the railroads to cease loading any more box cars with grain destined for Vancouver because of fear of a strike, even though the union concerned has not received, and therefore has not discussed, the conciliation board report? Can the minister make any comment on the situation?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received the telegram. I will inquire whether such a telegram has been received by my office, but I have not seen it myself.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RENE LEVESQUE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY QUEBEC PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue and ask him whether he has seen this morning's Le Devoir as well as this morning's Gazette. The headline in Le Devoir reads as follows:

Si René Lévesque Retourne à R.-Canada, Nous Fonderons Notre Radio du Québec!

"If René Lévesque returns to the C.B.C. we shall establish our own radio station in Quebec." Has the minister any comment to make on that statement made by the premier of the province of Quebec?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have not seen either paper, nor have I read the statement to which the hon. member refers. I will do so today and give him an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to ask another question. I will send the statement to the minister. According to present radio and television regulations, would the board of broadcast governors be justified in granting a licence to a provincial government to operate a provincial radio and television network on the sole ground that the provincial government does not like certain individuals appearing on C.B.C. programs?

Mr. Nowlan: This is a legal question which I am not prepared to answer at the moment, but I am certain that the board of broadcast governors would not make any judgment one way or the other based on personal predilections or opinions or prejudices.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a final question which the minister can perhaps answer when he answers the first one. Would he inquire whether the government of the province of Quebec has made an application for permission to set up a radio and television network to replace the C.B.C.?

Mr. Nowlan: Such an application, as the hon. member knows, would have to go to my colleague the Minister of Transport, to be approved by that department before it would come before the board.

Mr. Chevrier: Then may I direct the question to the Minister of Transport?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have no knowledge of any such application.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON RECENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to report to the house following his conference on Friday last with the heads of the Canadian automobile industry regarding conditions in that industry?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I met with representatives of the automobile industry, Mr. Walker, Mr. Sale, Mr. Todgham, Mr. Grundy and Mr. Dykes of the Canadian automobile chamber of commerce, and following their discussions with me they met with the Minister of Finance and possibly one other—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of National Revenue. I am not sure that there was not another minister as well. They raised a number of questions, particularly with reference to values for duty. In that regard I may say that a study is going on with respect to the values for duty placed on automobiles, and discounts on the values of imported cars. These studies, of course, are in accordance with the usual practice of the Department of National Revenue. In addition they made representations regarding the tariff on automobiles in the United Kingdom. They pointed out that while automobiles exported from the United Kingdom to Canada came in free, there was a duty on imports from Canada into the United Kingdom, and they asked that consideration be given to this particular problem as well to the end that equality in this regard be established.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

BILL OF RIGHTS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY QUEBEC PREMIER RESPECTING PRESS STATEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister in view of the statement made by the premier of Quebec as reported in Le Devoir of this morning, which I have sent over to his colleague the Minister of National Revenue and which reads as follows:

> Each time a reporter will make an accusation, he will have to prove it and to give his sources of information. He will have to prove his accusation or to apologize.

The question is this. Can the Prime Minister tell the house whether that statement is compatible with the bill of rights introduced in the house in September of 1958 and designed to ensure—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —freedom of the press.

Mr. Speaker: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me that the question is not an appropriate one for the orders of the day. We have standing on the order paper a bill of rights—

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It has been forecast.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be heard on this point?

Mr. Speaker: I expect there will be a debate, but the subject matter which the hon. member raises seems to be more a matter of the administration of the law than of the administrative responsibility of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to be heard on that point, Mr. Speaker, if I may. My point is this. While the Prime Minister announced some days ago—one day last week, I think it was—that it is the intention to introduce certain legislation with regard to a bill of rights, it has not yet been introduced. Here we have a statement made by the premier of a province, a statement that contravenes the very intent of the bill of rights. It would strike me that the question is quite within the rights of a member of parliament to ask, having regard to the circumstances under which the statement was made.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I do not agree with the hon. member. In substance his question is this: would the bill of rights, if it were passed by this house and by parliament, have a certain effect? To ask even whether the present law would have an effect on the matters raised by the premier of Quebec would be asking for a legal opinion, and in my opinion the question is not a proper one for this period.

FLOODS

TIMMINS, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO DECISION ON REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether any decision has yet been made with regard to the request of the Ontario government for financial assistance for the victims of the flood in Mount Joy township?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The information I have, Mr. Speaker, is that no decision has yet been reached.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF CHINESE COMMUNITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has made any arrangements for a delegation of representatives of the Chinese Canadian community to present a brief to him as head of the government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I think I answered that question a week or so ago, Mr. Speaker, and said that consideration has been given to a meeting in this regard and that I would be available at an appropriate occasion convenient both to the delegation and to me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Was the Prime Minister aware of the fact that over the week end there had been a meeting of representatives of the Canadian Chinese community from all over Canada, and that there was an announcement to this effect on the radio this morning?

Mr. Diefenbaker: An announcement to what effect?

HOUSING

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN AMOUNT FOR DIRECT LENDING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): In reply to the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) who on Friday last in my absence directed to the Prime Minister a question as to whether or not Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would consider making more money available for direct loans, may I reply that as and when any decision in this matter is made by the government, or if the government decides on any change whatever, an announcement will be made to the house.

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO AVOID DISCRIMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he has yet received from the Department of Justice any formula which would avoid discrimination under the housing legislation which he promised some time ago he would see would be looked into?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have that question from the hon. member for Essex East. We are at this time, and as a matter of fact were on Friday last, discussing with the Department of Justice and the deputy minister the question which perplexes us all and to which we would like a solution.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION

APPROVAL OF ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT AND PAYMENT OF SUBSCRIPTION

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider Bill No. C-70, respecting the International Development Association.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the committee which unanimously approved this bill. I might say that this unanimity is not always present in the committee, the members of which include the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Essex East, but in this case there was unanimity.

My purpose in rising is to express my satisfaction at what the government has done and also to try to put on record certain views, including certain statements by witnesses and people whose opinions are of value, so that these may be useful to those who will continue to assist the government in creating a stronger and stronger feeling toward our duties and responsibilities in assisting underdeveloped countries. In this connection I am hardly bold enough to hope I can interest the press. One of these days somebody will come along who will be of interest to the press, but

I shall put the evidence of these witnesses on record in the sincere belief that it will be useful.

First of all I would like to go to our own Prime Minister, one of the world figures of today, and quote a statement I quoted some time ago. The Prime Minister, has said:

> Economic assistance to underdeveloped countries is a major and mandatory need if freedom is to be preserved in the world.

Then I was delighted to observe the other day that while the Prime Minister was attending DePauw University he followed up that statement with this one, and I quote briefly from his words on that occasion. He gives certain statistics, and then he says:

> I do not need, in view of these statistics, to underline the arguments for sacrifice on the part of the industrialized countries in the field of economic assistance—

Then finally he says:

> There is no alternative to continuing with, even increasing, this type of international assistance and co-operation. Until the day comes when the less developed nations expand their capacity to trade and achieve self-sustaining growth, there is an unanswerable argument in favour of assisting them. It was with this argument in mind that, at the recent meeting of commonwealth prime ministers in London, it was decided to begin work on a program of economic aid to the emerging nations of Africa, the largest remaining area where international assistance has yet to be launched on a scale remotely consistent with present and future needs.

It has been made quite clear in the press that our own Prime Minister was a leader in connection with this movement for aid to Africa, and I am glad to think that is so.

I should like to quote briefly from a pamphlet by Paul Hoffman which I commend to all members, which is called "One Hundred Countries, One And One Quarter Billion People". In the first place he draws attention to what I feel is a very important point, namely—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; I think the hon. member who is now speaking ought to be accorded the courtesy which his sense of responsibility and the seriousness of this matter warrant. We ought to have the opportunity of hearing what he has to say.

Mr. Macdonnell: I am grateful to the hon. member, I can assure hon. members that what I am saying is just as dull to me as it is to them. I quote from Paul Hoffman, who has this to say:

> There was a time not long ago when, everywhere in the world, resources were for the most part exploited rather than developed.

Then he goes on to say this:

> These attitudes and practices have changed markedly. Exploitation is widely recognized as shortsighted and self-defeating.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

> Not long ago, it was unquestioned that "the poor are always with us," and poverty of the majority of the people in any country—and certainly in the world—was regarded as inevitable, to be alleviated, as far as possible, through charity. Only in the last 30 or 40 years have even the most advanced countries of the west accepted that a national society, operating through government, has the responsibility for creating conditions which spur economic development within its borders, relieve poverty, and raise the standard of living of all classes in the population.
> Today they are discovering that the same principles and similar methods work on a world scale, and that they yield similar beneficial results.

Then I shall quote a word or two from Mr. Hoffman dealing with his own proposal:

> My proposal is this: That we—all of us together—fix it as our goal to double in the 1960's, as compared with the 1950's, the annual per capita rate of economic growth in 100 countries and territories containing a billion and a quarter of the world's people. If we achieve this goal it will mean increasing the per capita economic growth rate of the less developed countries from an average of 1 per cent a year in the 1950's to an average of 2 per cent in the 1960's.

You will see that this is a rather modest objective he sets. Then I wish to quote what Hoffman has to say about the subject we are discussing now, that is the international development association. He speaks very warmly about it:

> A splendid first virtue of the proposed I.D.A. as an instrument for promoting economic development in the low income countries is that it will be a genuinely co-operative undertaking comprising, as members, both industrialized and underdeveloped countries. All members will make contributions; all will have a voice in the truly international administration that will result.

I should like to accentuate as best I can the fact that Mr. Hoffman and other competent people who have been close to this question stress again and again that this is a matter of investment and not charity; that the nations requiring assistance have to take the initiative themselves, in effect have to become creditworthy. It is not just the question of dishing out money to undeserving people, but a question of assisting people to help themselves. I continue:

> A second great virtue of the proposed I.D.A. is that, inasmuch as the world bank has gained universal renown as an efficient and effective and objective international financial institution, I.D.A., as an affiliate of the world bank, will borrow its accumulated experience, knowledge, and expert direction.
> A third virtue of I.D.A. is that it is not required to confine its loans to support of specific projects, but may extend its support to plans and programs that support economic development.

This outstanding man is known to most hon. members. He is the man who administered the Marshall plan which was such a brilliant success. He goes on to say:

> There is, nevertheless, a major shortcoming in the international development association as currently projected:

The authorization planned for I.D.A. is only $1 billion. One billion dollars over five years! This is obviously too little to come anywhere near meeting the minimum investment gap of $2 billion a year. And yet, there is no other institution either in existence or on the drawing boards that can take up the slack!

For this reason I welcome the fact that in the bill it is proposed that the amount contemplated shall be reviewed and, if necessary, increased. Here we have the statements of Mr. Hoffman, who has worked very hard to find out what is required. He strongly praises the I.D.A. but points out what is required.

I should like now to quote from a statement made by Adlai Stevenson which appeared in the magazine Foreign Affairs of January, 1960. I shall quote two short paragraphs from Mr. Stevenson's most interesting article:

To me the two most dangerous realities we now face are the multiplication of nuclear weapons and the disparity in living standards between the rich nations and the poor.

I will not read further from that section of his remarks but I wanted to bring that sentence to the attention of hon. members. Further along he writes:

The average annual income in the United States is more than $2,000 as against less than $100 for a third of the world's population. And the worst thing about this disparity is that the rich nations are getting richer and the poor poorer.

That is the opinion of a man with a world reputation. I think it is full of practical good sense. I like to remind myself that he is not merely a man of good common sense but was also the good governor of one of the largest states in the United States. He goes on to speak about figures:

Happily, there is, at long last, a growing realization here and among our friends that these are the decisive areas and that we must assist the underdeveloped peoples to advance to self-sustaining growth while preserving their independence and some hope of evolving a political democracy. Without an alternative to communist methods of development, we face grim prospects indeed in poor countries where literacy is low, hunger high and the gap between resources and population widening.

I wish to read just one sentence of a speech made by Mr. Eugene R. Black at Oxford University on March 3 last. He is the banker who has lent some $5 billion on business terms without loss. In one paragraph he outlines the responsibility that must be taken by those who wish to benefit. He says, for example:

How important it is to develop a pride of workmanship so that every ounce of resources available for promoting higher material living standards is used as efficiently as possible.

I hope that will convey to every hon. member an idea of the responsibility that he is laying on the underdeveloped countries. He then goes on to utter a sentence every word of which I commend to hon. members.

And how important it is that the free world community stand ready to pledge whatever measure of its wealth can be usefully absorbed in this endeavour.

He is not asking us to waste our money but to pledge whatever measure of wealth can be usefully absorbed in this endeavour. Mr. Black is a hard-headed banker and I suppose knows more about these world-wide problems than any other man on the planet. I remind hon. gentlemen of the contribution Mr. Black made to the solution of the problems of the Indus waters.

I wish now to quote a sentence or two from a well-known writer in the London Economist; Barbara Ward, one of the most brilliant people living. She made a statement which I think really puts us on the spot. If we agree with it then we must do something about it. If some do not agree with it, that is their privilege. This is what she said:

As the world enters the 1960's, one fact seems sure. The pace of revolutionary change, in every sphere of human affairs will gather momentum.

The breakthrough accomplished in the fifties in weapons, in space research, in every type of scientific advance; the political breakthrough of a score of new nations; the emotional breakthrough of a third of humanity hungering for economic growth —all these forces will expand explosively to make the sixties a period of challenge and change unequalled in human history.

What, in these circumstances will be the response of the western powers? The answer depends not only upon the new political leadership available in the west, it depends profoundly upon the sort of people the free nations have become as they face the mounting crises of their age.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member does not identify his quotation. Is that from her lectures at the University of Ghana?

Mr. Macdonnell: That statement is from the New York Times of December, 1959. I should like now to make a brief reference to a remark made by a man who I believe is familiar to us all, Sir Douglas Copland. He was the Australian representative here for years. In a proposal reported in the Globe and Mail of June 8, 1960, he stated:

Canada and Australia should give leadership in assisting underdeveloped countries.

Thank goodness we in Canada have given some leadership. Then he went on to speak about the question of trade. Hoffman has very strongly made the point that aid makes trade. That is a point which Hoffman underlines. Sir Douglas Copland goes pretty far in referring to the subject. He suggests:

There is no reason—why the western world should not contribute perhaps 1 per cent of its national income to underdeveloped countries.

Some people will think that is a lot. The statement to which I really wish to direct hon. members' attention is this:

> To some people a suggestion that 1 per cent of national income should be set aside as a contribution to underdeveloped countries will be regarded as a cost. This is far from being the case. It should be regarded as an investment from which the return will be very high.

I think it is terribly important for us to understand that. If we believe that statement it will take us a long way.

I will read another short paragraph from Hoffman which I think is full of practical good sense.

> The expression "trade and aid," which is used so often these days, conveys the subtly misleading impression that "trade" and "aid" are separate entities, that they might be mixed in varying proportions in promoting development in the low income countries, and even that one might be substituted for the other. This is, of course, false. Aid is trade. Investment is trade. The dollars or pounds or francs or marks that are expended on foreign aid and investment in the low income countries are only symbols representing food, textiles, metals, machinery, and other manufactures produced in the industrialized countries and exported to the developing countries, and technical services made available to them in support of their development. Aid and investment abroad is therefore more than trade; it is production and employment both in the investing and in the recipient countries; and it is economic growth and increased prosperity all around.
> Once we get this idea fixed in our heads, we can banish the idea that aid to and investment in the underdeveloped countries is charity or that it is a one-way street.

I commend those words to hon. gentlemen. I might say that this pamphlet is available, and I suggest that everyone should read it. It is packed full of practical good sense from a man who without exaggeration has to his credit the fact that he set western Europe on its feet.

I am almost finished now, Mr. Chairman. I wanted to put forward these things which I have read to you. I suggest that people have a choice. Needless to say, those people to whom I have referred know what they are talking about. It is not a lot of hooey but sober practical common sense. If you believe these things then the answer is you have to do something about it.

We have done something about it. I read to you what Mr. Hoffman said in welcoming the I.D.A., suggesting that that is what is implied in the act itself, because he leaves the door open for additional funds. I suggest that these words are weighty words. I suggest that what Barbara Ward said about those explosive questions facing us in 1960 is a simple statement of fact, and if it is a simple statement of fact we cannot run away from it. I suggest that in the past this nation to which we belong, when it has been faced with something that was regarded as a real emergency, has always stood up to it.

I do beg that you who are leaders in your communities, who are here responsible for legislation, who are approving this legislation, which is a fine step in the right direction; having heard the words of our own Prime Minister and of other people; having heard the words of those practical men who have been doing things in this matter; having heard what to me was a very good idea, that exploitation is receding and investment developing may not remain inactive but may do something about it.

I was anxious to bring these things forward. I hope the witnesses I have called and their words may carry much further than mine. If they do, I have not wasted your time.

Mr. Thomas: I should like to lend my wholehearted support to the efforts of the hon. member for Greenwood in creating public interest in this matter of support for underdeveloped countries. I do not wish to take up the time of the commitee except to assure the hon. member for Greenwood and this committee that my support is with him.

Mr. Regier: All I want to say at this time in support of the bill is to place on record the fact that while we are asked by the terms of this bill to authorize Canada's participation to the extent of $37.83 million, under the articles of agreement of the international development association our obligation initially is going to be only 10 per cent of our initial subscription. In other words we are obligated to spend within the next number of months only the sum of $3,783,000. We cannot let the people of Canada believe that we are now investing $37.83 million in this field of international aid. All we are doing is investing $3,783,000. Then we have about an equal amount which is payable one year later, and another similar amount one year after that. I feel that, much as we welcome this move, it should not be misunderstood by the Canadian people that we are immediately about to invest $37.83 million, because the articles of agreement allow us a goodly number of years in which to pay our full original subscription of $37.83 million.

When he replies, I should like the minister to indicate whether there has been any approach made in the evolution of this organization to obtain the co-operation and the participation of nations behind the so-called iron curtain. I feel it most regrettable that in the matter of international aid we are continuing to grant this aid as a western bloc, while the countries behind the iron curtain are granting their forms of aid in their own way. If the word "international" in the bill means anything at all it ought to mean that this is international indeed. I regret that political implications are involved and are being used in so many of our international aid programs. I should like to have a little bit of an accounting on whether any of these countries have been asked to participate—I mean the so-called iron curtain countries—and what their reaction has been.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a word on behalf of our party in support of this bill, which was given very careful and sympathetic consideration in a committee of this house. Although I was not a member of that committee I have had the opportunity of reading the record of its proceedings and, as my hon. friend from Greenwood in his very constructive and thoughtful observations of a few moments ago pointed out, in respect of this matter there seems to be unanimity in the house.

The purposes of the bill are such, of course, that they must, I think, commend it to all of us. The committee report quotes Mr. Rasminsky, who is familiar with these matters, as having stated its purposes by reading article I of the bill, namely that:

> The purposes of the association are to promote economic development, increase productivity and thus raise standards of living in the less-developed areas of the world included within the association's membership.

At one time there were those who had some hesitation about the possibility of realizing these purposes through this association without causing some overlapping or some confusion and, indeed, without having some result of which we in Canada perhaps would not entirely approve. However, I think the justification for the association has been the great difference between the loans that are to be made under this association and those made by the bank itself. As was pointed out by Mr. Rasminsky and, indeed, as has already been pointed out by the minister, the terms would be somewhat easier in connection with loans under the I.D.A., and therefore loans could be made for economic development under the I.D.A. which perhaps should not be made under the bank as it is constituted at present. I think that does indeed justify the establishment of this association.

The hesitation which I know members of the government may have had when the association was first put forward have been removed in a way which Mr. Rasminsky and the minister have already pointed out. Particularly there is the hesitation and doubt once felt—and perhaps we may also have some questions to ask about this when we deal with the clauses of the bill—about the possibility of using this fund for United States surplus disposal programs in a way which we could not support. That is one doubt which was very much in all our minds at the time and which, so far as the government is concerned, has been removed.

The purposes of the bill, as I have said, are such that they commend themselves to all of us. They represent a further effort to meet what the hon. member for Greenwood has just referred to as a major and mandatory need. In the efforts that are being made internationally to meet this need, I think the time has come when we have to be careful that we do not proliferate our international agencies for this purpose. We have a good many now, and perhaps we should be more careful in the future than we have been in the past about relating the work of all these organizations, international in scope under the United Nations and under the Colombo plan arrangement, so as to make sure that they do not get in each other's may.

The need is great and, as the hon. member for Greenwood has pointed out, the need is not decreasing but increasing. I think he quoted that figure that Adlai Stevenson put forward in a speech not long ago of a requirement of $5 billion a year by way of assistance from what we call the developed countries to meet the needs of economic development in what we call the underdeveloped countries. The gap between the developed countries and these underdeveloped countries is not lessening in this respect but is widening. In other words the need is growing, not diminishing, in spite of the acceptance of reponsibility by the developed countries to do what they can to meet that need. That in itself is an encouraging development, because I think this is the first time in history that the more fortunate nations have accepted formally, through international organizations, a responsibility for helping the underdeveloped and less fortunate countries.

But the need is great and is increasing. I read not long ago—I think I am right in my memory of the figures—that the per capita increase in the national income of the United States over a recent period of a few years—I cannot remember the exact period—was greater than the total per capita income of many of the Asian and African countries. We are perhaps falling behind in meeting this necessity rather than gaining in meeting the requirements that are before us. In other words, we are falling behind in the race between resources and existence in so many countries.

The purposes of aid are, of course, just as important as the aid itself. That is why it is of such great importance to have aid of this kind, whenever possible, given under the United Nations where the political fears, suspicions, pressures and influences just referred to need not exist. Surely aid under the United Nations should be above suspicion. When the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam talks about the undesirability of any political strings being attached to western aid he is, of course, quite right; but aid under the United Nations does not and need not have these suspicions associated with it.

While all countries in the west may not be above suspicion in these matters, surely the record of the west and the record of the United States in what has been done to help meet these needs bear comparison not only in quantity but in purpose and in manner of distribution with the aid from the U.S.S.R. and countries behind the iron curtain. I know there have been some instances where aid from the U.S.S.R. has been very carefully proposed and as carefully administered to give the impression that there was no political purpose attached to it in any way, shape or form. That has happened in some cases, but in other cases the connection between politics and aid from the U.S.S.R. has been open and blatant.

I am thinking particularly of the help the U.S.S.R. once gave Yugoslavia. Immediately Yugoslavia refused to buckle down to Soviet foreign policy, that aid was cut off without a trace. So while it is desirable to remove from aid any political purposes of the kind that have been mentioned, I think this kind of proposal does just that. If the Soviet union and its friends criticize the United States, particularly, for tying up aid to political purposes, even under the United Nations, it should not be forgotten that any time the Soviet union so desires it can join in this kind of United Nations activity. So far it has not shown much desire to do so. Perhaps that is the most effective commentary on the criticism which we do get at times from the U.S.S.R.

The question of keeping international aid out of politics has a bearing on whether it should be in the form of grants or in the form of loans. That is why there is a good deal to be said for increasing our aid of this type under the development association and under the world bank in contrast to direct grants, some of which, while no doubt welcomed by the countries receiving them, do carry with them a kind of stigma of charity which no self-respecting people wish to have attached even to the kind of help they are getting from countries like our own. Therefore this kind of assistance under the international development association has that to commend it. It is the kind of assistance that could not be criticized on any of the political grounds mentioned this morning.

[Mr. Pearson.]

I think that is all I need to say now, Mr. Chairman. When we come to detailed discussion of the bill we may have some questions to ask. Meanwhile I want to repeat what the hon. member for Essex East has already said on second reading, that we are wholeheartedly behind the purposes of the bill, that we think it is well designed to carry out these purposes, and that this is a very appropriate contribution for Canada to make.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. members for what they have said concerning the bill and for the unanimous expressions of support for the measure which have been heard at all stages.

There were only three matters raised that I think call for specific comment at this point. With regard to the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition as to the possible use of counterpart funds, I simply refer to article III and particularly section 1 of the articles of association in that regard.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam raised two points. The first related to the terms of payment. Canada's subscription to the international development association is $37,830,000 in United States funds, and that is the amount which the bill will authorize the Minister of Finance to provide out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister referred a moment ago to an observation made by the Leader of the Opposition and directed our attention to article III, section 2.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Article III, especially section 2.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister said section 1.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Especially section 2.

The terms of payment of the subscription are set forth in article II, section 2. Under its provisions 10 per cent of the initial subscription of each original member shall be payable in gold or freely convertible currency in the manner set out. Payment in full, of course, is not required by the association at the beginning. It is not necessary that it have all subscriptions paid in full, and that is the reason that the articles make provision for payment over a five-year period.

Mr. Benidickson: Of the 10 per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No. If the hon. member will let me finish I think it will be clear. The subscription in the first year is 23 per cent and in each of the four subsequent years 19¼ per cent of the aggregate amount.

The other point raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam concerned the possibility of countries behind the iron curtain joining the international development association and becoming members of it. Only members of the international bank are eligible for membership in this new association, and none of the countries behind the iron curtain has chosen to become a member of the international bank. I might point to the list of countries eligible for membership in the international development association, and that list appears in schedule A on page 23 of the bill. It will be observed that Yugoslavia is one of the countries mentioned in part II of the bill, but no country behind the iron curtain is eligible unless it first becomes a member of the international bank.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Articles of agreement approved.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is a point or two I should like to make, not that there is any issue between the minister and those of us sitting on this side on what I have to say, but because it is important and one wants to give further emphasis by way of putting it into the record. When I spoke on second reading of this bill I called to the attention of the minister and those concerned the fact that the international development association might be used by the United States to further its surplus disposal program. The minister observed that that was, of course, not the intention and that the articles of agreement, as now worded, precluded that possibility. I agree with the minister that an interpretation of the revelant articles do not warrant the use by any country of its surplus disposal program in a way that would contravene the intention of this institution.

In the committee, Mr. Rasminsky was questioned by hon. members, including myself, on this point. He stated that when the matter was in the discussion stage, speaking on behalf of the government of Canada he did observe that he would not want to see the international development association operate as a kind of adjunct to the surplus disposal program of the United States. He also pointed out, of course, as is the case, that anything that was said in those meetings by anyone on behalf of any country did not have the effect of law any more than a debate in this house, in connection with legislation, is in itself an expression of the law and so recognized by the courts. Mr. Rasminsky also assured us that the point of view he expressed was a point of view that had been shared by the other directors. Then he called our attention to some commentary made in the special report of the national advisory council, to which I had directed the attention of the house and also the committee when this matter was discussed in the latter place.

My concern was with regard to the letter of transmittal by the President of the United States to the congress in which he used language that, in my judgment, was open to an interpretation not consistent with what I believe the articles of agreement specify, and certainly not open to the interpretation which the minister has given us with respect to the intention of all the parties.

I simply rise at this time to call attention to what Mr. Rasminsky said in that connection, to note especially his comment with regard to the letter of transmittal by the President of the United States, and to place alongside that letter the actual reference to the national advisory council which will be found at page 25 of the evidence before the banking and commerce committee on June 14. If, in the future, the United States or any country should use this agency to further its surplus disposal program in a manner that would be inimical to the interest of this country—I say this because of past situations—that would be a clear violation of this agreement to which Canada is now being asked to extend ratification.

Mr. Benidickson: May I draw to the attention of the hon. member for Essex East the reference he has just made to page 25 of the banking and commerce committee report which deals with this bill. I find that immediately before the reference he made there is a misprint in the evidence of the committee, in that to find the quotation that was given on second reading of the bill by the hon. member for Essex East, one does not go to page 4331 but to page 4631 of Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the hon. member.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As hon. members are aware from the discussion both in the committee and during previous public references to this matter, this question of the possible use of counterpart funds acquired by the United States through its agricultural surplus disposal activities was one that gave the Canadian government some concern. In speaking on behalf of Canada at the annual meeting of the governors of the international bank in Washington last autumn I stated our concern in that respect. Mr. Rasminsky referred to my statement and quoted it in his testimony before the committee on June 14. Steps have been taken in the drafting of the articles, during the meetings which occurred in the autumn and winter, to deal as effectively as was possible with this problem.

The article which contemplates the possible use of such funds is article III, which is divided into two sections. The first section deals with additions to the resources in the form of additional subscriptions. Additional subscriptions may be made under decision of the association only by a two thirds majority of the total voting power.

Section 2 of this article deals with the provision of supplementary resources by a member in the currency of another member. This is the provision under which it might be possible for a country like the United States, holding a substantial amount of currency of other countries, to seek to offer these sums in foreign currency to the association for its use. I point out that such sums could only be accepted in that case by a decision of the association. That decision would not require a two thirds majority, but a simple majority in the ordinary way. No country has a right to make additional subscriptions to the association merely by turning over large sums of foreign currencies which it holds. This can be done, I emphasize, only by a decision of the association itself. The acceptance of such funds by the association does not give any additional voting rights to the country that has subscribed this foreign currency. It gives it a right, in that event, only to receive a special development certificate.

Then there is a further safeguard in subclause (c) of section 2 which reads:

> Nothing in this section shall preclude the association from accepting resources from a member in its own currency on such terms as may be agreed upon.

I stress the fact that the matter is left under the control of the association. The United States subscribes, in round figures, about 32 per cent of the total capital. In so far as what is likely to happen is concerned, I think that is best summarized by Mr. Rasminsky in that passage of his testimony recorded on page 25, which followed the quotation to which the hon. member for Essex East referred concerning the statement by the national advisory council. Mr. Rasminsky followed with this statement:

> I would not say that was an enthusiastic statement of possibilities. I cannot guarantee, of course, that the American hopes and aspirations are the same as ours in this connection, but against the background of the whole record of these discussions I think that the management of the institutions will be quite cautious about bringing proposals forward regarding these supplementary contributions.

I think it is quite clear that if any proposal is made to ask the association to accept counterpart funds in pursuance of section 2 of article III, the Canadian representative would wish to give such proposals very strict scrutiny.

Mr. Benidickson: In addition to the safeguards referred to by the minister just now, my recollection is that in his testimony Mr. Rasminsky placed a great deal of weight and importance in this regard upon article III, section 2, subsection (a), particularly the stipulation that even the association shall not enter into any such arrangement unless the association is satisfied that the member whose currency is involved agrees to the use of such currency. Does the minister not attach considerable weight to that stipulation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I fully agree with that statement. I intended to mention that matter. It is another safeguard that the country whose currency is held in the form of counterpart funds must agree. It might have strong objection to enter against any attempt on the part of the country holding its currency in counterpart funds to turn it over to the international development association for use. It might seriously affect the value of its currency, all its fiscal and trade plans and indeed its monetary plans. As the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has pointed out, this is another important safeguard in this respect.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Payment of subscription out of consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Regier: I should like to ask the minister why the clause allows him to make payment only in line with the articles of agreement. I can easily imagine that a year or two hence the international development association might see adequate use for all its authorized capital. Yet as I read this particular clause the minister would not have any authority to pay out the remaining unpaid portion of the Canadian subscription, because he has legislative authority to pay only in accordance with article II of the memorandum of agreement. Would the minister not be more useful to the aims of the international development association if this particular authority for which he is now asking would grant him permission to pay out the whole of the Canadian subscription at any time the governor in council deemed it advisable to do so? After all, it is not a great deal of money; it is $37 million. Yet the terms of article IV place the minister under a handicap, or they might place him under a handicap.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All hon. members will appreciate the fact that parliament cannot change the articles of the association. We can decide whether or not Canada will become a member of the association. The terms on which Canada has the opportunity of becoming a member are to be found in the articles of the association. All we can do is ask parliament to approve of Canada's adherence to the association on the terms set forth in the articles of association.

What the hon. member has in contemplation would, it seems to me, involve a change in the articles of association, and that matter would have to be dealt with in the light of the amending procedure contained in the articles of association themselves. If the articles were to be changed in any way that involved a change in the terms of payment that parliament has authorized, then it should be brought back to parliament for parliament's decision.

Mr. Regier: I hope I did not misunderstand the minister. Does the minister mean to say that if Canada immediately paid its whole subscription, Canada would be violating the terms of the international agreement?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would rather put it the other way and say that we would be going beyond the terms of the agreement or the terms of the articles of association.

Mr. Benidickson: Both in the debate in the house and in committee the minister made some reference to certain misgivings he originally had when this proposal reached the Canadian government; and at these international meetings he was the senior delegate representing Canada. This matter was not elaborated on too much in our original debate, and I asked Mr. Rasminsky to try to summarize for the committee on banking and commerce what were the principal misgivings of the Minister of Finance. In reply Mr. Rasminsky indicated that one of what he called the preoccupations of the Minister of Finance, when these discussions took place, was the possibility that use would be made of local currencies by the bank and that this might lead to inflation. I take it that this is the article in the agreement upon which the government relies in the belief that this misgiving or this preoccupation to a considerable extent has been eliminated or reduced; and I take it that the reference is to this phrase, that the use of currencies must be "consistent with sound monetary policies", something of course would be determined by the board of the association.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Annual report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to ask a question on this clause. Before doing so, however, I should like to say to the hon. member for Greenwood—and I neglected to do so when I spoke a moment ago—how greatly we were all impressed by his remarks. The hon. gentleman who is one of the senior and most respected members of the House of Commons, has all his life had a great interest in international problems. As a businessman and now as a member of parliament he has displayed an intelligent interest in the means by which we believe it is possible to remove the tensions that exist in the world. The speech he made this morning is the kind of contribution we would have expected from a man who has interested himself in these matters for such a long time.

I should simply like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he can tell us what countries under part I have taken the necessary steps, pursuant to their constitutional requirements, to ratify or adhere to these articles of association; and likewise, what countries under part II have taken the necessary steps in this regard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not full information on that point. Naturally this question is engaging the attention of a good many countries at the present time. When I spoke at the resolution stage on June 7 I referred to the steps that have been taken by several of the principal countries in the light of their normal constitutional procedures in this respect. The hon. member will find that at page 4627 of Hansard, the first column. I said:

> The agreement will not come into force until it has been signed on behalf of the governments whose subscriptions comprise not less than 65 per cent of total subscriptions. Many of the main potential contributors have already initiated the legislative action necessary to allow them to become members of the association. In the United States the Senate has already approved the legislation; the banking and currency committee of the House of Representatives has also approved it and the legislation is expected to go before the house some time this week. In the United Kingdom I understand from our latest information that the second and third readings of the bill have been completed in the House of Commons and the second reading in the House of Lords. In Australia the legislation has received royal assent. In other countries, such as Germany, France and Norway, legislative action has also been taken.

My subsequent information is that in the United Kingdom the bill has now passed both houses and has become law.

Mr. Regier: I know the minister is interested in this part of the bill, but I regret to say I very often notice that within a week or so after the estimates of a minister have been passed in this house we get an official copy of the latest annual report which is a lot more up to date than the one available to members of the house at the time it is considering the estimates of that minister. In this regard I hope that when the minister is asked, as he is here, to prepare a report of operations under this act, he will ensure that whenever his annual estimates appear before this house we will have as recent an annual report as it is possible to have, and that we will not receive a later one just a few weeks after the passage of the estimates.

However, what I rose to say was that I would like to ask the minister exactly how members of this house are able to obtain information as to what happens in regard to a matter of detail when an international organization such as the one of which it is now proposed we become a member has its meetings. I have reference, for instance, to meetings which are being held under the Colombo plan. I am particularly interested in what happened in the case of Canadian participation in the reactor which we helped to build under the Colombo plan. I would like to look at the minutes of a meeting which was held in Bombay on a certain date by officials of the Colombo plan in which Canada's participation was involved.

How are members of this house to obtain information? I think even the minister will admit—and being a Conservative I think he will readily agree—that an international agency can very easily remove itself from real democratic control and efficient supervision. Therefore how are members of the legislatures of participating countries to equip themselves with the necessary information in order that a proper observation can be made of the activities of these international organizations?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): First of all, Mr. Chairman, if I correctly followed the remarks of the hon. member with regard to the annual report, he is confusing two kinds of reports. The report which is contemplated by clause 5 of the bill is a report by the Minister of Finance to be tabled in the house as provided. In this respect the present bill follows the Bretton Woods legislation precisely, and the Minister of Finance annually tables in this house a report on the operations of the various Bretton Woods organizations.

Some time ago in accordance with a similar clause in the Bretton Woods legislation I tabled an annual report which covered the operations of the international bank for reconstruction and development, the international monetary fund and the international finance corporation. If this bill passes it will be the responsibility of the Minister of Finance next year and each succeeding fiscal year to lay his report before parliament within 30 days after the end of that fiscal year or, if parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first 30 days next thereafter that parliament is sitting.

The hon. member asked about reports of these organizations themselves. These organizations do issue annual reports; at least their responsible officers do. Those reports are submitted to the annual meetings of the governors of these institutions; that is to say, the governors of the international bank, the governors of the international monetary fund and the directors of the international finance corporation. Those meetings are normally held in the last week of September or sometimes in early October, depending on where they are held. No minister of finance of this country has any control over the date when those reports are issued; they are not his reports. His report as provided by this legislation is a different document entirely.

The final matter that was raised by the hon. member concerned the details of management of some organizations engaged on an international basis in sending aid, such as the Colombo plan. The administration of the Colombo plan as far as Canada is concerned is a matter of interest principally to three departments of government; the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance. On the administrative side the Department of Trade and Commerce is the one principally involved, because the Colombo plan organization operates under that department. The practice when I was a private member and a member of the standing committee on external affairs of this house was that we always made our inquiries and detailed review of the operations of the Colombo plan and Canada's part in it annually on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs in the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would like to say a brief word on this point which has been raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, because I think it is an important point. We urge that the treasure of this country should be shared with other countries by assisting the less developed countries of the world. Sometimes one runs into considerable opposition in putting forward what I believe most of us in this house recognize as an essential policy on the part of government in the interdependent world in which we live. But if we run into these objections, sometimes responsibly made and sometimes irresponsibly made, we should be prepared to give evidence of careful administration in the dispensation of funds which go from the Canadian taxpayer to assist people in other countries.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam asked how we could get reports on the operation of this particular institution, with special emphasis on the part that Canada has committed herself to play. I should think it must be clear at the outset that the opportunity in the case of the international development association is not as easy as in the case of the Colombo plan. The assistance given by the international development association is institutional assistance. The administration of the fund in the case of the I.D.A. is something that resides outside of Canada. The operation will be through the directors, who have a close affiliation with the international bank. In fairness I think one should say that the administration of the bank under Mr. Black has been so efficient that one may be sure that the moneys appropriated by this parliament are going to be carefully expended by him and his colleagues; but in any event that does not alter the right of the hon. member to question or to ascertain what has been done with the funds voted by parliament.

The minister, of course, will have to account for any funds voted by this parliament and expended by Canada as a member of the international development association. There would be that opportunity, I suspect, not only through interrogation and debate in the house but through participation in the committees of the house and particularly in the committee on external affairs.

With regard to Colombo plan expenditures, I do not know what the hon. member had in mind particularly when referring to the reactor in Bombay. I am not questioning his right to refer to that expenditure, because the contribution of Canada was very considerable. I believe the total expenditure is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $40 million, half of which came from Canada. One would want to make sure that the moneys spent on a project like that or on any other project were wisely spent.

In the case of the Colombo plan it should be remembered that the control on the part of the donor country is much greater, at least in principle, than it would be in the case of the project immediately before us, because the Colombo plan does not operate institutionally. It may be an international association in terms of general policy, but whatever moneys are expended by an individual country are expended by that country as the result of a bilateral arrangement made with the receiving country. In that narrower relationship there is a greater opportunity of checking up on the expenditure than there would be in the case of institutional assistance. I believe the hon. member was justified in putting this question, because we have to be able to satisfy ourselves and the Canadian people that the moneys expended in this way are being wisely spent.

We know of instances with respect to United States assistance to some of the smaller countries in Asia where there has been squandering and in some cases corruption. That situation naturally causes doubt and suspicion. In the case of any assistance given by Canada I am sure there would be no justification for any suspicion of that kind, because the administration of the Colombo plan is carefully scrutinized and I know that the Minister of Finance, as his predecessors did, exercises very great care in that regard.

I rise only to support the question put by the hon. member. I myself from time to time have run into criticisms about the expenditure of these funds. I believe we all want to feel that the greatest care is taken by those responsible for seeing that the moneys are devoted to the purposes which parliament intends.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East has very commendably referred to the desire on the part of the representatives of the taxpayers to assure the likelihood of moneys of this kind being dealt with in a manner that would satisfy the people who make contributions to funds of this kind. In the committee on banking and commerce we were all greatly encouraged to feel that we are very fortunate in having a new fund of this kind completely in the hands of experienced people such as those who have administered the world bank.

It is a remarkable achievement on the part of those connected with the world bank to be able to report that over 13 years they have lent $5 billion without loss. I believe those loans have gone to some 50 countries around the world. The Minister of Finance is a governor of the world bank and the international monetary fund. It is my recollection that the two organizations usually meet at the same time, most often in the autumn, but I was wondering how much more frequently, if at all, the governors of the bank meet.

The morning newspapers of both Montreal and Toronto carried substantial journalistic reports of the activities of the banking and commerce committee last week and of the purposes and functions of this proposed new lending agency. The article concluded by quoting the deputy governor of the bank who regularly has been representing Canada at the meetings of the world bank and presumably will be our senior official in the month to month operations of the new agency. The Canadian Press article quotes Mr. Rasminsky as saying:

> One of the remarkable developments of the last 15 years is the extent to which the richer countries of the world have assumed this obligation—

It has been part of the current thinking of the community—part of the current morality, if you like.

That of course I should hope would be reasonably valid. I certainly was impressed the other day by the remarks made in the committee by the hon. member for Greenwood who quoted such world-renowned witnesses as Adlai Stevenson, Mr. Hoffman, Miss Ward and others. Many of those comments the hon. member repeated here this morning.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to one of the quotations in the testimony as to the disparity between incomes in the developed and the underdeveloped countries. According to Mr. Hoffman the disparity is even greater than was mentioned this morning by the Leader of the Opposition. He indicated that in one country alone in the western world the per capita income showed an increase over the past 100 years that was double the rate of increase shown in respect to the total per capita income of the underdeveloped countries. According to the information provided by the hon. member for Greenwood the position was considerably worse than that. All the nations of the western world in the past few years have shown increases in per capita income which amount to twice the existing per capita income in the underdeveloped nations. In other words the increase in the western nations has been twice the total present annual income in the underdeveloped countries.

It was mentioned this morning that the per capita income increase in the United States is four times what the present income is estimated to be of those living in the underdeveloped countries. We are all very disturbed to find that while there has been some improvement as the result of funds of various kinds, including the United Nations special fund, the Marshall plan and the economic assistance provided through the world bank, the Colombo plan and other agencies, the startling fact remains that notwithstanding the billions of dollars provided over a period of nine years it is estimated that the per capita annual income in the underdeveloped countries has risen only to the extent of between $10 and $15 per year which works out to an increase of between $1.50 and $2 per person.

In the committee a question was raised as to just how far $1 billion through this new agency, however worth while it is, might go in accomplishing the objective of raising living standards in the underdeveloped countries which Mr. Rasminsky has described as part of the thinking and current morality of the community of western nations.

Mr. Brunsden: Have you the figures in terms of percentages?

Mr. Benidickson: No; the figures are quoted by Mr. Hoffman, who directs the United Nations special fund. He simply indicated that the rich are getting richer, and have been in the last nine or ten years, and that the progress in lifting the per capita income of the underdeveloped nations, despite the help that has been extended, has not been very impressive. The figures given indicated that the per capita income in 1950 in the 100 less developed countries and territories was estimated at $110. In 1959 it was estimated that it would reach $125 or perhaps as much as $130, a net gain of some $15 to $20, as I indicated earlier, in 10 years. Then Mr. Paul Hoffman went on to say:

The average increase in per capita income in the western nations between 1950 and 1957, the last year for which figures are available, was approximately $300—

That is in all the nations. I continue:

—in the United States it was $530.

He concluded with this very striking statement:

It is quite all right for the rich to get richer; but disturbing and distressing to have the desperately poor people remain desperately poor.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think it might be mentioned for reference purposes that that is to be found on page 34 of the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with operations, I wish to deal with some of the details of this article in the agreement. I refer to Mr. Rasminsky's summary of some of the misgivings of the Minister of Finance when this proposal was originally advanced by the United States. In addition to the one I mentioned earlier, Mr. Rasminsky said that the minister had, as a second concern, the possibility that there would be trade distortion effects and that loans of this kind might result in uneconomic diversion of trade. Mr. Rasminsky indicated that he thought one of the protective measures to relieve our concern as international traders about a possible dislocation in consequence of this new agency was perhaps to be found in this article, and he referred to section 1, paragraph (g) of article V on page 9 of the bill before us. I take it that the reliance that we should look for here rests almost entirely in the phrase "competitive international trade". The paragraph reads:

The association shall make arrangements to ensure that the proceeds of any financing are used only for the purposes for which the financing was provided——with due attention to considerations of economy, efficiency and competitive international trade and without regard to political or other non-economic influences or considerations.

And this is the point:

Is the minister aware of anything beyond this which, under the articles or under the policies so far announced by those preparing for the set up of this agency, gives greater confidence that we are not likely to expect much distortion of international trade as a result of loans that might be advanced?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think section 1 of article IV also has a bearing on this subject in relation to the use of currency. Section 2 of article IV concerns the maintenance of value of currency holdings. I think they may be read also with article V.

Mr. Benidickson: We passed that section before I realized that we were on article V, and I was going to ask the minister with respect to article IV, section 2, paragraph (a), which reads—

The Chairman: I point out that we are discussing clause 5 of the bill. We are not yet discussing the articles of agreement.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not referring to an article; I am wondering in what currency it is proposed that Canada will be making its contribution?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Under the articles Canada is required to make its contribution in gold or convertible currency expressed in United States dollars. That is the currency that is named as the currency of the association, and all the nations listed in part 1 of schedule A are required to make their contributions expressed in United States currency. The particular form in which the currency is to be made available is set forth in article II, section 2, (b), (c) and (d).

Mr. Benidickson: The only contributions under part II which would be expected to be paid would perhaps be additional amounts if there was a depreciation of substance in their currency.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, but the nations in part II which include the underdeveloped countries, have the opportunity of contributing a portion of their subscription in their own currencies.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to discuss the articles of agreement I suggest we adopt clause 5.

Mr. McMillan: I just want to ask the minister a question, Mr. Chairman. Are the minutes of the discussions and meetings in printed form? Are they available to members of parliament? Are the minutes of the meetings of this international organization and other related organizations available?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My recollection is that the proceedings of the annual meetings of the bank and fund are not always printed in full. However, I think it is possible to obtain copies within any reasonable time of the statements made by the governor representing any particular country. These are normally mimeographed on the day they are made and circulated among all of the governors.

Mr. Regier: On the matter of the minister's annual report, I wish to express my appreciation of the answer the minister gave me, and especially to the hon. member for Essex East for his statement on what exactly is the situation. I realize that the minister is in full agreement with the intent of this international development association, as I think most Canadians will be. I believe it is not only right that we participate in this kind of organization and others like it, but it is also in our own economic interest as a country that is underdeveloped, in that we do not completely utilize as yet to anywhere near full capacity the great resources that our nation has. It is in our interest to aid these other countries.

However, the amount of Canadian participation, as the minister knows, is directly dependent on Canadian opinion. It is a desirable aim that not less than 1 per cent of our gross national product be devoted to economic aid. We have not come even near reaching half that amount, and the great handicap is the lack of demand for such action on the part of the people of Canada.

The minister is very much aware that while Canadians are most openhearted they are also conservatively inclined. At all times Canadians will have to have the utmost of assurances that these international agencies are being operated most efficiently and are really performing the functions they are supposed to perform and utilizing the money most wisely. I know that the minister as one of the governors of the international bank attends the annual meetings, and I assume that in all likelihood he will be one of the governors of the international development association. When the minister prepares his report on the international finance corporation, exactly what is the report based on? Is it simply a question of the annual report of the international finance corporation and possibly an hour's meeting of the board of governors held once a year?

I believe the minister knows what I am getting at. Is his annual report, as called for in this bill, going to be based on the annual report of the officers of the organization, which in turn is more or less an affiliate or branch of a larger international organization? Will he be devoting possibly half a day a year to consideration of the report? How many men will he be taking with him to examine completely the operations of this proposed organization? How many men does he now take with him to examine the operations of the international finance corporation? In how much detail is the minister made aware of all the problems and mistakes, as I am sure there are, in the work of the international finance corporation? To what degree does he expect to be made aware of the difficulties of the proposed new organization?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, so far as the annual report of the Minister of Finance in respect of the international finance corporation is concerned, I think the hon. member can best judge that from the report which was tabled some time ago, during the present session.

As to the extent to which the Minister of Finance endeavours to keep in touch with the activities of these international organizations, I must say that, as is intended by the articles of association of these important international organizations such as the international bank and the international monetary fund, the bulk of the executive work falls on the executive board of directors, and on that board Mr. Rasminsky has been Canada's very competent representative.

In addition, there is in Washington a representative of the Department of Finance who is there all the time and is available to carry on the work that is necessary in respect of Canada's position as a member of these organizations. So far as I personally am concerned, I receive a monthly report from Mr. Rasminsky as to the principal decisions that have been taken month by month by these organizations. In that way I try to keep in as close contact as may be possible with the more important decisions that are being taken in these organizations. Of course when questions arise which call for decision by the governors, such as occurred a year and a half ago in relation to the proposal for an increase in the capital of both the international bank and the international monetary fund, the Minister of Finance is kept in close contact with the discussions and a decision is taken, as was done in that case, by mail vote by the governors. A number of decisions are actually taken by the governors by mail vote.

Clause agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the articles of agreement carry?

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Benidickson: Did you call article VI?

The Chairman: I am calling all of them together, because I do not think it is necessary to call them one by one.

Articles of agreement agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps we could resolve the house into committee so that at 2.30 we could continue in committee without asking the Speaker to return.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO CONTRIBUTIONS, PENSIONABLE SERVICE, BENEFITS, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act with respect to contributions, pensionable service, benefits, the calculation of annuities payable to widows and children, persons re-employed, medical examinations, transferred pensionable employees, contributions to the retirement fund, reciprocal transfer agreements and for certain other changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Public Service Superannuation Act was enacted in 1953 and came into effect on January 1, 1954. This resolution contemplates a number of amendments to the act to which the government has been giving consideration for some time. The most important of the amendments are designed to improve substantially the value of the basic benefits available to most civil servants who contribute to the superannuation account. Corresponding amendments provide for adjustments to rates of contribution. Other amendments make provision for improved benefits to smaller groups of persons, and others are designed to streamline the administration of the act.

Earlier today I tabled three reports submitted to me by the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance on the actuarial valuations of the superannuation account, the public service death benefit account and the regular services death benefit account respectively. It was necessary for the government to receive the actuarial valuations of the various accounts maintained for the purposes of this act before the nature of the amendments thereto and their actuarial implications could be determined. The last of these reports was received subsequent to the last session of parliament.

I have received many requests concerning the pensions of civil servants. A great number related to increases in the pensions of persons already retired. These matters were dealt with at the last two sessions of parliament and embodied in the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act, 1959. Many requests have been made seeking improvements in the basic benefit formula for those who have not yet retired.

The basic benefit formula applicable to most civil servants who contribute to the superannuation account provides for a pension equal to the number of years of pensionable service up to 35 years, multiplied by 2 per cent of the average salary received by the pensioner over the period of 10 consecutive years in which his salary was highest. The representations which I have received have sought a reduction in the 10-year average salary formula, and thus an enhancement of the value of benefits received.

Accordingly it is proposed to introduce amendments which will establish the formula on the basis of the best consecutive six-year average instead of the previous 10-year average. This change will place the formula applicable under the Public Service Superannuation Act on the same basis as that now available to new members of the regular forces and of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under their superannuation statutes. The uniformity in the basis of benefits throughout our superannuation legislation thus achieved, and which has heretofore been lacking, will represent a major advance for civil servants and a major improvement in administration.

I should mention that the amendments to which I have just referred in no way impair the position of a diminishing number of civil servants who fell into special categories on the coming into force of the earlier civil service superannuation act on July 19, 1924 and elected to contribute under that act during the following three years, thus qualifying for a pension calculated on a basis of the average salary over the last five years of service.

The Public Service Superannuation Act provides pension benefits comparing favourably with those of most private plans in Canada. It has been generally recognized in the civil service that under a plan of this nature, where costs are shared by civil servants and by the government as employer, it is only equitable that the cost of major improvements in the benefits should also be shared. Thus the improvement proposed in the benefit formula is coupled with an amendment which provides for an increase in the male contribution rate from 6 per cent to 6½ per cent of salary. No increase in the female contribution rate of 5 per cent is to be made. A corresponding increase will be made in the matching contribution made by the government. Thus the over-all rate of contribution will be 13 per cent for male employees and 10 per cent for female employees.

The additional cost to the government in a full year will be an estimated $2.5 million, based on salary rates in effect as of January 1, 1960. There will be some small upward revision of this figure to take account of salary increases granted or contemplated in 1960. The change from the 10-year average to the six-year average in the basic benefit formula will increase the value of benefits available under the superannuation act by $21 million as of January 1, 1960. Again, there will be a small increase in this amount to take account of salary increases granted or contemplated in 1960.

The other proposed major change in benefits relates to the supplementary death benefit provided under part II of the act. At present this commences to decrease after age 60 and disappears entirely on retirement or at age 70, whichever is the later. An amendment will be proposed providing that every person with five years' continuous employment participating under part II of the act will on his 65th birthday, either as an employee or as a pensioner if he was entitled to an immediate annuity on retirement, be credited with a paid-up $500 death benefit as part of his over-all benefit protection.

The cost of this benefit will be borne entirely by the government. It is estimated that this change will involve an additional expenditure of about $1.5 million in the first full year and $500,000 annually thereafter, increasing with the growth in the number of participants.

Another measure which I am sure will commend itself to the committee is one which will provide for alleviation in the conditions which require a reduction of pension during short periods of re-employment in the civil service. The present formula, which calls for a reduction in the pension after as little as one day of re-employment in many cases, will be replaced by another which calls for a determination based on the salary received in each quarter by a re-employed civil service pensioner. This will eliminate the majority of the pension adjustments which otherwise would have had to be made in the future.

The bill proposes that the amendments relating to increased contributions shall come into force at a time provided for by the governor general in council. It is my intention to recommend that, after second reading, the bill be referred to a special committee where it will be possible to study the amendments and the changes in the basic benefit and contribution formulas in detail.

Mr. McIlraith: I am sure the committee of the whole is very much interested in this resolution and the subject of providing pensions or retirement benefits for employees of the public service. This subject is one that has occupied the House of Commons from time to time for a great many years and on many occasions.

However, I think it fair to say that the present concept of superannuation, as we understand it, had its origin in the work of the committee of 1923 which examined this whole field of civil service legislation and civil service superannuation. As a result of this very splendid piece of work done by this committee headed by Hon. James Malcolm, we had the civil service superannuation act of 1924, which I think was a considerable departure from the legislation in operation up to that time and was the basis of our present legislation.

Then in 1938 and again in 1939 there was a committee of this house set up to examine into this subject. Much excellent work was done by that committee in those years. Unfortunately the legislation which that committee recommended had to be postponed by reason of the intervention of the war in 1939 and its continuance for some years. It was not until 1944 that the amendments were made to the 1924 act, a period of 20 years having elapsed without any basic change in the legislation.

It is interesting that in the 1924 legislation there were two conditions precedent of special significance before an employee was entitled to receive superannuation on retirement. One of those conditions was that he must come under what was then called the status of a permanent employee. The word "permanent" seemed to have been given a secondary meaning in the legislation relating to the civil service at that time, and indeed until very recent times, and the word "temporary" to been given a secondary meaning that was quite different from its ordinary meaning.

In any event, the "temporaries" were excluded from the benefits of the legislation until the 1944 amendment, and all persons who were not paid on the basis of a stated annual salary were excluded from the possibility of benefits under the 1924 legislation. That provision applied to great numbers of persons. For instance, persons with trades training in the printing bureau who were paid on a weekly basis were excluded from the act because they did not meet the requirement of the legislation of being in receipt of a stated annual salary.

In 1944 a new departure was made and large numbers of temporaries or so-called temporaries and persons who were paid other than on the basis of a stated annual salary were included. Then in 1947 amendments were made improving the legislation and adopting more of the recommendations of the committee of 1938 and 1939. Then there were subsequent amendments in 1953. Prior to the 1953 bill the whole principle of the receipt of benefits had been that they were payable as a matter of grace rather than as a matter of right to the civil servant. The 1953 act changed that basis altogether and made the superannuation benefits payable as a matter of right to the employee on retiring rather than as a matter of grace. A great many other changes were made. However, the whole nature of the change was to extend what already, in relation to the times, was a good piece of legislation and a very satisfactory one in relation to the concept on this subject current at that time.

From 1953 onward there have been other consequential amendments, all of which I think were improvements in the act. They tended to meet the changing concepts on this subject and to enlarge the number of civil servants who are entitled to come under the scope of this legislation.

The resolution before us is a rather interesting one. It deals specifically with nine subject matters or nine changes. It is a resolution preceding a measure to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act on nine different points; namely, with respect to contributions, pensionable service, benefits, the calculation of annuities paid to widows and children, persons re-employed, medical examinations, transferred pensionable employees, contributions to the retirement fund, reciprocal transfer agreements and certain other changes.

A great many representations have been put forward to the minister by responsible associations of the civil service. Indeed, I think a great many of them have been circulated among all hon. members. I suppose it would be technically possible to argue the merits or demerits of each of those numerous recommendations, but I do not think that is the effective way in which to approach this legislation today. From what the minister has said I take it that while there may be a great number of subject matters covered and a great number of amendments, there is not any extensive basic new principle involved in the new legislation.

I was interested to hear the minister advise the committee that three actuarial reports have been tabled dealing with the condition of the fund. I shall look forward with interest to seeing those documents and to seeing what the situation is. I have not seen them; I am not familiar with them, so it would be useless to debate them.

I was interested to hear the minister say that the rights of those persons under the old retirement act of 1919 and 1920 are preserved and are not affected. That has been a problem of some real concern. Some of them felt they should have come under that act, particularly so far as it involved retirement benefit based on five years' employment rather than ten years. The matter has been one of some controversy and concern over the years. With the change in the main act reducing the term of service on which superannuation is based from ten years to six, the difficulty, for that reason as well as from the effluxion of time, will, of course, have largely disappeared.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): As the hon. gentleman has obviously made a study of this matter, would he be good enough to tell the committee, if he knows, why the original change was made from the five-year average to the ten-year average?

Mr. McIlraith: I have always understood it was an actuarial matter. It is a matter that has been controversial. There have been arguments about it for as long as I can remember, and very severe ones. I do not think I would want to give a categorical answer to the question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): It was made in 1924.

Mr. McIlraith: In 1924, yes. Then as a result of the study, when the new superannuation act of 1924 was brought in—and in relation to its time it was indeed a revolutionary act, a progressive one—it was based, as I say, on the provision that contributions should be computed on the basis of the best ten years of employment. In the previous legislation, namely the retirement act, it was based on the concept of five years.

The other thing I was interested to hear the minister say had to do with the death benefits under part II of the act. There has been a good deal of discussion about that matter. It would appear that some unfairness was being suffered owing to the fact that those supplementary death benefits were reduced each year after age 60. It was a subject of great controversy and a good deal of discussion. As I understood the minister's remarks, a change is being made in order to rectify that difficulty in the light of the experience since that provision was first put in the act, and to improve the position. There is another factor, of course, namely the longer life expectancy which has made this provision in the act more important than it had been when it was first put in or when it was first advocated in earlier years.

My own attitude about the resolution is this. I should like to see the bill. I want to have it before us and to study it. I understand that the minister proposes having the bill referred to a special committee to be set up and having it studied in that way. In general the legislation has been very good legislation. There are many small technical matters in it which are very important to individual civil servants and which should be examined. I am sure the committee will want to hear the representations of associations on the subject and examine the matter in some detail.

I was interested in noting that the superannuation act was referred to a committee in 1938, but that it took two whole sessions of parliament to deal with the matter. I hope nothing like that will happen this time. I hope we can deal with it in committee quite promptly, have the matter examined and brought back into the house so that it can be dealt with legislatively this session and brought into operation. I presume that is the minister's intention in that regard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. May I just say that I am entirely in accord with the view expressed by the hon. member. We have this resolution procedure applied to a measure like this. It really does not fit measures of this kind, and I entirely share his view that the discussion of this measure can be much more aptly, indeed more intelligently, carried on after members have had an opportunity to peruse the bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Just to conclude my remarks, I look forward with eagerness to seeing the bill.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is ready to be distributed.

Mr. McIlraith: I hope it is a good bill and corrects many of the anomalies which are now in the act. I hope it will improve some of the weak spots which have been found in the course of administration of the act, and I for one look forward to an opportunity of examining it in some detail at the appropriate committee stage.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, the resolution before us reads, in part, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act, and this is the time for us to express our opinions as to what these amendments ought to contain.

It has long been my contention that any act of this kind ought to arrange for pensions to be automatically raised or lowered as the cost of living rises or falls. I remember a former minister of finance announcing in this house that if he were able to accommodate pensioners in this matter he would establish for himself the reputation of being the most famous minister of finance anywhere in the world. However, he was a little in error, in that there are many ministers of finance in the western democratic world who have made arrangements whereby people on fixed incomes have those incomes moved upward or downward in step with the cost of living. For many long years in this house the former member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Stanley Knowles, pleaded the cause of the retired civil servants, and Conservatives when in opposition used to endorse his contentions in this regard.

I notice the minister had this to say in this regard:

> I have received many requests concerning the pensions of civil servants. A great number related to increases in the pensions of persons already retired. These matters were dealt with at the last two sessions and embodied in the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act, 1959.

Apparently that is all the minister has to say on this matter at this particular time. It is our contention that the cause of the retired civil servants has not yet been adequately dealt with. I hope that despite the minister's announcement, when we have the bill before us we will find therein that the government now, as was its opinion when it was on the opposition benches, is going to pay some attention to the needs of the retired civil servants, and that a real move is going to be made in order to bring their incomes into line with the contributions they made in the light of cost of living as it was at the time they made those contributions.

I will be watching the bill very closely when it is brought down, and I hope the Conservative government in office are going to be as good in this regard as when they were not in government but in opposition. I hope that at long last those retired civil servants who have been unduly penalized by the ever rising cost of living are going to receive equity in our society.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-76, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT

AMENDMENT, REVISION AND CONSOLIDATION OF ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the civil service of Canada to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act, chapter 48 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1952.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the measure which the present resolution would authorize to be introduced is of the highest importance. It touches all aspects of the appointment, classification, tenure, rights and responsibilities of the civil service of Canada, and the powers and duties of the independent civil service commission charged with responsibility in relation thereto.

The present Civil Service Act enacted in 1918 is a landmark in Canadian history. It was a major advance over all the legislation which preceded it, including the acts of 1868, 1882, 1885 and 1908. At a stroke it placed the recruitment, promotion, classification and organization of the Civil Service Act of Canada beyond the reach of partisan political interference, and laid the foundation of what has come to be known as "the merit system". For many years the Civil Service Act has been the bulwark of this principle.

This principle, however, has not withstood all the tests to which it has been submitted. During world war II overriding legislation was adopted which permitted both the principles and the provisions of the act to be ignored and practices and procedures to grow up at variance with the letter of the law. During the post-war period it became increasingly clear that strict adherence to the provisions of the act prevented the civil service commission from giving such service to departments of government as it was required and indeed desired to give, particularly in the fields of organization and classification. In these latter fields the expansion of the country and the enlargement of the federal government's commitments posed special problems.

Since 1918 the functions of the civil service have undergone a transformation and proliferation. Its tasks have become infinitely more diverse, more complex, more technical and more specialized in keeping with the vast extension of the public business and the activities of government. More and more it has been recognized as essential to good government that Canada should maintain a public service of the highest competence in many fields and of unchallenged integrity.

At the request first of Mr. St. Laurent in 1957, then of the present government on its accession to office in June of that year, the civil service commission conducted a review of the entire field of personnel administration in the public service with a view to revision of the Civil Service Act. Its report, which has been commonly named after the then chairman of the commission, Mr. Heeney, was in due course presented to the government, and was tabled in parliament early in 1959. It has attracted the widest interest across Canada. The government has acknowledged its deep appreciation to Mr. Heeney and the two commissioners, Miss Addison and Mr. Pelletier, for this very valuable report.

The report does not in any sense purport to be a draft statute, but it contains in appendix A a detailed list of provisions which it suggests should be incorporated either in the act or in the regulations made pursuant thereto. I am informed that it was not the purpose in drawing up this appendix to use language which would be necessarily appropriate to such enactments, nor to do more than suggest the subject matters and the method of treating them as a guide to the draftsman in drawing the bill, subject always to the views of the government on matters of policy. It therefore follows that the language of the bill, taking into account the special requirements of an act of parliament, will rarely conform to that of the recommendations contained in the report. Particularly in that area of decision as to what should properly be contained in the body of the bill and what should be assigned to regulations to be made pursuant to it, it has been necessary to modify the commission's suggestions.

It should be noted also that the report contemplates the eventual establishment of a single civil service which would embrace the employees of a number of agencies which have been established by separate acts of parliament with provisions which are peculiar to the agencies themselves and under which they have been working for many years. The government does not at this time propose to disturb the composition of the civil service by adding to it the personnel of agencies not subject to the existing act. Such a course would involve the submission to parliament of amendments to the numerous statutes which constitute such agencies now and the wholesale incorporation within the civil service of large numbers of men and women without consultation and without sufficient examination of the problems which such a step would entail.

The report proposed that the commission should give up its responsibility for approving the organization of government departments and, while retaining an advisory function in this field, in which it has become expert over the years, permit deputy heads of departments to be masters in their own houses where questions of departmental organization are concerned, subject to the approval and authority of the governor in council. It was further proposed in the report that more flexibility in matters of recruitment and selection of personnel for the civil service be permitted to the commission and, let me say at once, only to the commission, under circumstances which might in its opinion render the usual procedure by way of competition impracticable and unsuitable, and where the commission might deem it desirable to delegate these functions in special circumstances to deputy heads. These two cardinal recommendations of the commissioners have been adopted and incorporated in the bill.

The bill reaffirms and establishes the principles of the merit system as exemplified in provisions for selection and classification of employees in the civil service of Canada by a strong and independent civil service commission and by that commission alone. Anything less would be a renunciation of a tradition of which this country may well be proud, the tradition of the independence of our civil service which has placed it in the front rank of similar organizations throughout the world.

The bill also contains a definition of the public service extending beyond the civil service itself. This definition will extend to employees of agencies outside the civil service but within the greater compass of the public service the privilege of transfer and promotion into the civil service on the same basis as employees who are already in the civil service.

The present act contains no provision for the right of appeal by an employee to the civil service commission, although the regulations made pursuant to it provide for such appeals as are now taken. The bill will contain explicit provision for the composition of appeal boards under the authority of the commission and for the circumstances under which an appeal may be taken, including the right of appeal against a departmental recommendation to dismiss an employee.

In keeping with the spirit of the times, recognition is given to two important principles which have engaged the attention of staff associations within the civil service; first, that the pay of an employee is a matter not of grace but right, and second, that consultation between the staff associations and appropriate officers of the government or the commission on questions of pay and conditions of work as the need arises is desirable. These principles are either expressly recommended or implied in the Heeney report.

The present statute provides for an employee appointed to a local position to be qualified in the knowledge and use of the language of the majority of persons with whom he is required to do business, be it French or English. The proposed bill, however, recognizes additionally the desirability of giving a preference not only to those who can speak the language of the majority but to those who are skilled in the use of both the official languages of this country, not only when appointed to local positions but also to positions at the main offices of departments wherever, in the opinion of the civil service commission, effective service requires them to be placed.

The government does not think it right at this time to give effect to those recommendations in the report which would have the effect of altering the existing law providing for preference in competitions for entry into the service in the case of veterans of the first and second world wars and the campaign in Korea. The law which was established in this respect by the previous administration may not have proved uniformly satisfactory in all its aspects, but it represents a covenant between the nation and its returned servicemen the terms of which cannot be enlarged or abridged at this late date without injury to both parties. If the entitlement were now enlarged to confer the preference upon those who did not possess it heretofore, all those servicemen who were applicants for vacancies in the civil service over these past years and who have not enjoyed its benefits would feel unjustly treated in retrospect. If it were in any way limited or curtailed by restricting, for instance, its application to only one occasion, such action would constitute a breach of faith which the government declines to contemplate.

The house will therefore observe, when the bill is examined, that the veterans preference provisions of the present act are maintained intact subject to a direct reference to the situation of veterans of the Korean campaign as contained in the Veterans Benefit Act.

Generally speaking, therefore, the bill contains the best of the existing legislation, provides for the removal of such anomalies as have arisen in the course of the application of the former during over 40 years, and plainly provides for either the authorization or prohibition of many of the practices which have grown up without sanction during this period.

The bill is somewhat longer than the present act. The government recognizes the need for careful examination of it by parliament. To facilitate such detailed consideration I shall propose that the bill, following second reading, be referred to a special select committee of the house for study and report. I think it is obvious that our resolution procedure is not well adapted—

Mr. McIlraith: On that point, does the minister contemplate that the study and report will take place this session?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman. When hon. members have an opportunity of examining the bill I think they will feel that this is quite feasible. I am expressing that opinion. It is an opinion given after careful consideration of the matter. It will, of course, be a matter for decision by the house.

I think it is obvious, Mr. Chairman, that our resolution procedure is not well adapted to new measures of this comprehensive nature, and that the measure can be debated much more intelligently on the motion for second reading after all hon. members have received copies of the bill and have studied its provisions. The bill is available for distribution immediately on adoption of this resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that the Liberal party does not object to a detailed examination of the Civil Service Act for the purpose of improving it, if possible.

Besides, it was the Liberal party which recalled Mr. Heeney from Washington to make him chairman of the civil service commission and entrusted him with the task of making a thorough study of the service and of submitting a report to parliament to enable us to legislate on this matter.

We are ready to approve any intelligent change that could be made. Th act is out of date, conditions have changed. It is not possible for us, however, following the statement made by the minister, to accept straight off the government's proposals.

Before coming to a definite conclusion, surely we must carefully look into them.

However, we can at present discuss the situation of federal civil servants. An uneasiness is being felt, especially since the present government came into office. At present, civil servants fear any changes to the present act, particularly when those changes are suggested by the Conservative party.

They remember the old precept: I fear the Greeks even when they are bearing gifts, even though, since the Conservative government came into office, they have not received any gifts; instead, they met with rebuffs.

I have on file a great many letters expressing the views of civil service commission employees. Since the Conservative party came into power, those employees have been living in fear because of the stand taken towards them by certain members of that party.

In this house and outside, certain Conservative members have criticized the civil service commission and referred to it in not too pleasant words. Moreover, one of the ministers, during an election campaign, went as far as to say that he had not managed to curb the civil service. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) stated this:

> We have not yet managed to curb the chaps at the civil service commission, but we will do it yet and then we are the ones who will be running all that business.

Following such statements made by a minister of the crown, you can be sure that federal civil servants do not trust the present government too much when it comes up with proposals to revise the Civil Service Act.

Besides, when the matter of salary increases was brought up, the minister replied: "If you want increases, we shall have to raise taxes by 15 per cent."

Yet, some increases have been granted, and taxes have not gone up 15 per cent.

Therefore that statement was only meant as a scare to check those who were clamouring for higher salaries or better working conditions.

Yet those people are servants of the state and render innumerable services, regardless of the party in power.

The minister mentioned—and if I misunderstood him, let him set me right—that more latitude was to be given department heads.

That is taking an extremely dangerous position. Such attitude can only lead to favouritism within the commission itself.

Commissioners are independent from divisional heads. On the other hand, if a department head does not quite agree with his subordinates, a difference of opinion may arise which, in practice, may lead to an incomplete, incorrect report. Thus the civil service commission is not supplied with a true picture of the situation, and this can work to the detriment of the employee, particularly when he is trying to obtain a raise in salary, some improvement in his position, or a promotion.

The minister tells us that he wants to establish a new appeal board, so that appeals may be decided upon outside the commission. I am all for it, as long as that new appeal board has no political character.

Since 1917 Canada's public service has been kept out of politics and I hope that this government intends to maintain that practice. Federal civil servants are meant to serve the state, the people of Canada and not any particular political party.

We have asked for raises in salaries and improved working conditions so that public servants would be in a state of mind conducive to better work. Our request has been rejected. Yet, goodness knows how many complaints have come in from every quarter.

Even the papers have protested against the government's attitude since salary raises were granted. As a matter of fact, I have here in my hand a letter written by the employees' association of the Veterans Affairs Department, which reads in part as follows:

(Text):

> I have been asked to draw your attention to the very considerable dissatisfaction and unrest—

(Translation):

Please note, Mr. Chairman, that this was written rather recently, on May 18, 1960.

(Text):

> —of our members over the government's recently adopted practice of making pay revisions in the civil service effective on different dates.
> Attached is the news release of our president on May 16 and the statement made on CBOT, on the same date, by the undersigned. These speak for themselves.

(Translation):

And it was further said that:

(Text):

By its latest action in making wage increases for cleaning service men, maintenance helpers, firemen labourers, and stationary engineers effective May 1 rather than April 1, the present government has shown itself completely indifferent to good employer-employee relations in the federal government service.

(Translation):

Yes, Mr. Chairman, it seems this government has been doing its best to keep creating difficulties for civil servants. I do not know what has been going on in their minds but I am sure they have not carried on the policy of the previous government. In fact, we note that a salary increase of 8.5 per cent was granted in 1947; one of 8 per cent, in 1948; one of 10 per cent, in 1950; of 8.5 per cent, in 1951; of 7 per cent, in 1953; of 7.5 per cent, in 1956, and of 6 per cent, in 1957, the government having taken all the credit for the latter, which, mind you, had been planned by the previous government, before the Conservative party got in. That series of increases was clear evidence of the attitude of a government which had at heart the welfare and satisfaction of its employees. If we want civil servants to do the work we ask them to do, we must give them satisfaction, make them confident, put them at ease; otherwise, they will be unable to work properly.

Mr. Chairman, we noted that among salary increases granted recently, some were still inadequate. I have here a registered letter sent to me by a civil servant who is getting $237.50 a month and who, after all deductions are made, only gets $104.20 every two weeks, that is, $208.40 a month, instead of $237.50, which is still an inadequate salary for him to live decently.

Mr. Chairman, the civil service fears the government, has always feared it, and will keep on fearing it. I have here several notices issued by civil service associations, and if we consider them one by one—I will not read what the employees themselves have stated, but I am going to give you the titles —we realize what civil servants think of the whole thing. I quote:

(Text):

A look at the record reveals persistent efforts made by the C.S.A.C. to close the gap between salaries paid by the government and those paid by private employers.

(Translation):

They have received nothing yet, despite representations from many sources.

Still in the same magazine, we find a little further down that the committee is always complaining that civil servants are keeping a united front in negotiations.

[Mr. Caron.]

Mr. Chairman, in any one of those magazines, you could find similar comments. There is this one, for instance:

(Text):

Urge Immediate Increases.

A little farther down, we find this:

President Sees Discontent.

Again in the same magazine, we read—

(Text):

Report on civil service. Civil service commissioners make far-reaching recommendations following exhaustive study of Civil Service Act and regulations.

(Translation):

And today, when the session is nearing the end, the Minister of Finance comes forward with this resolution and says: We are going to insist that this bill be passed this year. He will not even allow civil servants and civil service organizations enough time to give it adequate consideration, or give them an opportunity to appear before the committee and make recommendations. I think it is unfair to hon. members, to federal civil servants and to their organizations, to expect them to make such a quick study of the bill.

We ask the government, after the house approves the bill on first reading, to postpone consideration of it so that we may study it seriously and adequately with a copy in hand. Thus we could reach an opinion, raise objections if necessary, and suggest whatever amendments we feel are called for.

The hon. members who will be appointed to the committee to study this bill will have to sit on other committees, and in the house, at a time when the government proposes to bring in its most contentious legislation. This is unfair to an opposition which is not numerous enough to be able to study all those bills at the same time—

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask for your ruling. It had not occurred to me that this resolution asking for leave to introduce a bill to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act would be a proper vehicle under the rules of the house for a debate on civil service salaries. The hon. member is speaking on the subject of civil service salaries. If it is proper for him to do that, presumably it would be proper for other members of the committee to do the same thing. I ask for your ruling on the point, Mr. Chairman, because I had assumed that the estimates would provide a proper occasion for that sort of discussion. As you know, I have brought in supplementary estimates designed to provide an amount to increase civil service salaries, and no doubt any debate on this subject can properly be held on that item.

Although the hon. member has gone on now on this subject for some time, it had not occurred to me, as I say, that it would be proper to discuss this subject on the resolution and on the bill. This is a measure dealing with legislation. It is designed to replace the present legislation with an entirely new act. It does not touch the question of salaries of civil servants as such at all. That is a matter for provision by way of estimates. In view of the fact that the hon. member has made it quite clear that this is the subject of his speech, I think it would be well that the point should be ruled on, because other members will wish to have the benefit of the guidance of the Chair.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, may I say it strikes us on this side of the house that there is no one who attempts to hold up his own legislation more than the Minister of Finance. Speaking to the point of order, sir, I took down some of the minister's words in the course of his discussion of the resolution a few moments ago, and he dealt in effect with what the bill would contain. Among at least half a dozen items that were mentioned, No. 4 was that the pay of the employees was a matter of right and not of grace.

During the course of one paragraph at least he went on to give some indication that this was contained in the legislation. The resolution therefore deals with exactly what the hon. member for Hull was discussing, and how can funds be provided other than by means of a resolution? If our right to discuss the pay and allowances of members of the civil service is going to be affected, what is the use of opening up the whole of the Civil Service Act during the course of second reading and in committee? It cannot be done, I submit with deference, without some discussion of pay and other matters.

Mr. Caron: On the point of order, it is a fact that I have spoken about salaries and salary increases, but I simply wanted to exemplify the uneasiness which exists in the civil service at the present time because of the attitude the government has taken since it has been in power. I was dealing with the difficulties which have been created by the government since 1957, and I have the right—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, as I understand the procedure of the house, legislation which requires the expenditure of money must be preceded by a resolution, and if there is one thing that the resolution stage does permit it is discussion of the money aspect of the legislation. The house is being asked to consider whether or not it should give approval to the government to bring forward this legislation. The reason that approval, before the introduction of the bill, is asked for, is that the legislation involves the expenditure of money. In other words it involves the payment of salaries to civil servants. That is my understanding of the whole basis of the resolution.

The minister started his remarks by a historical reference to civil service matters and to the Heeney commission being set up. Then he went on to deal with more specific matters that would be included in the legislation which the minister is asking permission to bring forward for approval or rejection by the house.

The minister referred to two important principles. As I have noted it, the first important principle is that the pay of an employee is not a matter of grace but of right.

That is the first principle the minister sets out in his own remarks on the resolution. Then he goes on to deal with consultation between the staff associations and the appropriate officers of the government or the commission on the question of pay and so on. Then, if these two principles were not enough, he goes on to say that these two principles are either expressed or implied in the Heeney report, about which he had a great deal to say. So if there is one subject that we are permitted to discuss on this resolution, it is the matter of the provision of pay and the expenditure of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I clarify one point? There is some difference between discussing a principle that pay shall be a matter of right and not of grace, on the one hand, and discussing rates of pay and salary, on the other. This is the point I was raising. Certainly the principle here is clearly within the scope of proper discussion on the resolution, but what the government has been doing in relation to rates surely is not raised by this. There will be a proper opportunity to discuss that later on the estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? I should like to ask why we have a resolution at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In this case the bill has to be preceded by a resolution because it provides for the appointment of a commission; it provides for the remuneration of the employees of the commission, and so on. It is for this reason the bill has to be preceded by a resolution.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister tell me what expenditure is being provided by this bill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no direct expenditure provided by the bill, but the bill provides, as does the present act, for the appointment of a commission, for its retaining its employees, and then there is a provision with relation to the exercise of its functions with respect to the civil service.

It is clear, Mr. Chairman, that for much of the content of the bill no resolution is required, but in the respect I have mentioned a resolution is required. The point I was raising concerns rates of pay. Now any member can discuss the principle that pay should be a matter of right and not of grace. It is a matter of grace under the present act. What is being brought into the discussion now is the question of rates of pay, those rates that have been provided and changed. I think, with respect, Mr. Chairman, that that is a proper matter for discussion when that item in the supplementary estimates is under discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you make a ruling, sir, may I say that I have looked at the resolution and it is a well accepted rule that the only purpose in having a resolution is that the legislation involves some expenditure by the crown, otherwise a resolution is not necessary at all. It was always accepted also when I was secretary of the cabinet and when I was a minister that the precise nature and purpose of the expenditure must be stated in the resolution. I have read this resolution and I have not found anything in it which gives a hint or indication of what the expenditures are to be. All it says is:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the civil service of Canada to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act, chapter 48 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952.

It appears to me either that this resolution is totally unnecessary or that the government has not told us in the resolution in what respect it is necessary. It seems to me that on the basis of this resolution we cannot proceed at all. We are entitled to be told in the message from the crown precisely what is the nature of the charge that is to be imposed before we are asked to embark upon a debate.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, if I took the liberty of dealing with salaries, it is because the civil service commission itself makes recommendations to the government with regard to salary increases. This is obvious; this has been proved and established. Last year, the civil service commission refused to recommend salary increases. The report was made public. This year, the civil service commission recommended such increases and the report remained secret. Since the civil service commission may be called upon to make a recommendation respecting salary increases for civil servants, I feel that when we are considering this resolution we have a right to refer to salaries and to the dissatisfaction of civil servants. Mr. Chairman, at all events—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: I quite agree with what the hon. member for Ottawa West said until he reached almost the end of his remarks. I feel that this resolution is concerned with the machinery of this act and not with rates of pay. I believe most hon. members will agree with that. In my opinion this should be borne in mind because there is nothing that I can see in the resolution about rates of pay. I suggest, therefore, that the hon. member stay away from rates of pay.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I raised a definite point of order. My point is, what is the purpose of this resolution, and whether or not there is a proper resolution before the house.

The Deputy Chairman: That is a legal point, of course, upon which the Chair has no right to rule. I can only rule on the relevancy of speeches to the resolution.

Mr. Caron: If there should not be any resolution upon which to base any remarks, why is it here?

The Deputy Chairman: The house has ordered me to come into the chair on this resolution. There is nothing else I can do at this moment.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, while avoiding to speak of the rates of salary increases, because the Minister of Finance has suddenly become extremely touchy since he has moved to the other side of the house—I must say that it is important that the matter of those increases be discussed.

Recently a report was submitted to the government by the civil service commission. We wanted to get a copy of that report, but the government refused to make it available. I do not know why, but it was refused, and through their organizations, the civil servants —who have vested rights, being government employees, state employees—were not able the civil service commission. And since everybody was interested in the—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order; that has nothing to do with this resolution, that has to do with rates of pay.

Mr. Caron: I think I might be permitted to say that because I have something else to bring forward on the resolution and this has to be said so that it is clearly established. There is a report from the civil service commission. It is not from me, it is not from the government, and the report deals with salary increases but the employees have not had an opportunity to look at that report. I am not speaking about rates. I am not saying that the employees should get 2 per cent or 10 per cent or 8 per cent. I am saying that an increase has been recommended by the civil service commission, and that report should have been placed before the committee so that the employees could look at it and know what it is about. This is not on rates.

The Deputy Chairman: How would the hon. member relate that to this resolution?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, how can the committee determine the question of whether or not this resolution is bad because the minister does not propose to put into the Civil Service Act a provision that the rates of pay shall be determined by the commission or shall not be determined by the commission. How can that question be determined. We are dealing with legislation which affects the whole civil service of Canada. I do not know how we can discuss the adequacy or inadequacy of the legislation if we cannot discuss this matter of whether rates of pay should be determined in one way or another; whether the minister is handling it right or handling it wrongly. For the life of me, I cannot understand how we can discuss this matter concerning public employees without discussing, of necessity, the method of payment and the amount of their pay, whether it is adequate or inadequate, depending on your point of view. I am at a loss to understand the minister's objection to the discussion of rates of pay.

Mr. Pearson: May I just say a word. In this resolution, of course, we are dealing among other things with the report of what is called the Heeney commission on personnel administration in the public service, a report to which the minister himself has made reference in his observations. Surely we can discuss this report if the minister can discuss it. One section of this report deals with "compensation and allowances". In fact, certain recommendations are made by the commission on compensation and allowances. Surely we have the right to deal with that section. Surely we also have the right to criticize the government, if we so desire, for the way in which it has handled these recommendations and, if we can find them, to give illustrations to show that this matter has been badly handled. But how can we do that without dealing with the question of civil service wages and salaries?

The Deputy Chairman: I do not think the hon. member for Hull was referring to the Heeney report at all; I think he was referring to the other report.

Mr. Caron: I was dealing with the report produced by the civil service commission. We are dealing with a change in the Civil Service Act. We have not received the bill. We do not know to what extent the government is going to act in this respect. I know that at the present time the civil service commission recommends the increase of salaries. Hence it is the civil service commission which is to be discussed because they have the power of recommending salary increases. Therefore I do not believe we can be stopped. Otherwise we would not be able to discuss the matter at all.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I was no longer talking about salary increases; I dropped that subject a good while ago and I wanted to deal with something else. But, when the civil service commission made its report on recommendations for salary increases, the government refused to reveal its contents to the civil servants and refused—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Caron: No, Mr. Chairman. I want to bring forward something with respect to the new commission.

The Deputy Chairman: I must be fair with the hon. member. However, I am trying to explain to him that we are not supposed to be discussing rates of pay and salaries. If he can show me that what he is going to say is relevant to this resolution, I shall be happy to hear it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I say something on the point of order, Mr. Chairman? It seems to me, first of all, that the point made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is one that cannot go unchallenged; and it cannot be said that the hon. member should have raised that point at another point in our proceedings. I assume that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate assumed, as have we all, that the resolution before the committee was one that dealt with the expenditure of public money. If that is the case, it is inconceivable that the expenditure of public money, in the particular context, could have reference to anything but salaries paid to those in the public service.

If that is not the case, then the question put by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is certainly not one that must go unanswered. Otherwise the resolution is not one that deals with any money matter whatsoever. But that cannot be the case because the minister himself, as we were reminded by the hon. member for Ottawa West, pointed out that it deals with proposed expenditures. It deals with the particular question of pay to servants in the public service, the very matter being discussed by the hon. member for Hull. The Heeney report to which the Leader of the Opposition directed our attention certainly is one that involves pay to officials. If that report was in order, as Your Honour seems to suggest, then certainly the argument of the hon. member for Hull was likewise in order. Here is what the Minister of Finance said in part. He is talking about what this bill is going to do and he goes on to say this:

> The bill will contain explicit provision for the composition of appeal boards under the authority of the commission and for the circumstances under which an appeal may be taken, including the right of appeal against a departmental recommendation to dismiss an employee.

If that was the only kind of thing that was included in the resolution, certainly the point made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate would be unanswerable. But it does not deal only with that kind of matter. The hon. gentleman goes on to say this:

> In keeping with the spirit of the times, recognition is given to two important principles which have engaged the attention of staff associations within the civil service; first, that the pay of an employee is a matter not of grace but right,—

If it is not a matter of grace but right surely it ought to be open to the hon. member to argue what is a matter of right or what should be regarded as a matter of right, namely because of the insufficiency of the remuneration extended. Then he goes on to say:

> —first, that the pay of an employee is a matter not of grace but right, and second, that consultation between the staff associations and appropriate officers of the government or the commission on questions of pay and conditions of work as the need arises is desirable. These principles are either expressly recommended or implied in the Heeney report.

The Heeney report at page 13 states this:

> The present Civil Service Act imposes upon the commission sole responsibility for making recommendations—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just wanted to point out—

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member is reading from the Heeney report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Which is the basis of this argument. I am just trying to point out that it is in order. I am just trying to point out what the particular paragraph in the Heeney report says in order to show that the argument made is certainly one that is valid. It states as follows:

> The present Civil Service Act imposes upon the commission sole responsibility for making recommendations to government on the remuneration—

I hope Your Honour will do me the honour of listening because this is the crux of the point of issue. Your Honour has acknowledged that the Heeney report should be discussed and of course Your Honour was right in that regard.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. May I just make that point clear. Anything from the Heeney report that is relevant to this resolution may be discussed. I did not say the whole Heeney report could be discussed.

Mr. Chevrier: That includes pay and allowances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If Your Honour will recall what the Minister of Finance said at the outset, Your Honour will be obliged to recognize that his whole speech was based upon all that is implied, in one way or another, in the Heeney report. But I was just pointing out this one paragraph in the Heeney report to show this. To do so may I remind Your Honour, if I may have Your Honour's attention, of the concluding words that I quoted:

> These principles are either expressly recommended or implied in the Heeney report.

That particular paragraph, which I will read again, commences as follows:

> The present Civil Service Act imposes upon the commission sole responsibility for making recommendations to government—

These are the important words.

> —on the remuneration of all employees in the civil service and leaves to government the authority to make final decisions, subject of course to the will of parliament in the appropriation of the necessary funds.

In the light of all this, with respect and confidence I submit to Your Honour that the argument of the hon. member for Hull was in order. If it was not in order, then the Minister of Finance must explain why he precedes the introduction of this bill by this resolution. He is then obliged, it seems to me, to meet the argument put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who questions—if the argument against the petitioner is unsound—the necessity and the form of the resolution before us. We cannot have it both ways. I submit, for these reasons, that the hon. member for Hull was certainly in order.

The Deputy Chairman: The question of whether or not this is a money resolution should have been raised, I believe, when Mr. Speaker was in the chair and before the house was ordered into committee. That would be my thought on that matter. Therefore I am sure the hon. member for Hull will co-operate with the Chair in his remaining remarks.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in our discussion of this resolution we assumed the resolution was preparatory to the introduction of a bill which would require direct expenditures. That being the case those direct expenditures would have been on the public service, and of course it would be impossible to discuss those direct expenditures on the public service without discussing rates of pay, conditions of service and all that sort of thing. If this does not involve direct expenditure and the Minister of Finance has somehow given us the impression that it does not, citation 277 (2) of Beauchesne's fourth edition says:

> A bill, which does not involve a direct expenditure but merely confers upon the government a power for the exercise of which public money will have to be voted by parliament, is not a money bill and no resolution is necessary as a condition precedent to its introduction.

Therefore this bill presumably does involve direct expenditures on the public service, and surely when discussing a resolution preparatory to a bill of this kind we should be permitted to discuss the nature of this direct expenditure, rates of pay, conditions of work and everything which goes with direct expenditure. Otherwise discussion becomes limited to the point where it may be even meagre.

Mr. Caron: I want to say something on this point.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the Chair has heard enough. However, I would be happy to hear the hon. member again if he desires.

Mr. Caron: We read in the Ottawa Citizen of today:

> The government has not yet received a recommendation from the civil service commission on salary increases for postal employees—

According to this the government said today that it had not received—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot understand what that has to do with this resolution.

Mr. Caron: It concerns salaries and the civil service commission.

The Deputy Chairman: Nowhere in this resolution can I see anything to do with rates of pay, and I have no alternative but to give my ruling and hope that the hon. member will co-operate with the Chair. I cannot see anything about rates of pay in this resolution.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, you have not dealt with the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I think it has been made quite clear that it was impossible for us to raise the point until we knew what the position was, and it arose in answer to the two questions which I asked the Minister of Finance as to what the resolution meant and what the expenditure was for. It may well be that Your Honour was right in suggesting you had no power at the time, but now that we know and we are advised of the position, as has been explained by the Leader of the Opposition, I want to make a motion and I hope you will accept it. I move that we rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, so that we can get back into the house and bring the point to the attention of Mr. Speaker as would have occurred in the first instance.

The Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. member give me that in writing.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

The Deputy Chairman: May I ask the hon. member if he has put "later this day"?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I have.

The Deputy Chairman: Just to clear up a point, as the hon. member for Hull has the floor it would take unanimous consent for me to accept this motion. I assume the committee will give unanimous consent?

Mr. Caron: In that case I would be ready to move this motion.

The Deputy Chairman: It is moved by the hon. member for Hull that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day, for the purpose of raising a point of order concerning the resolution.

Motion negatived: Nays, 43; yeas, 13.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in order to clarify matters may I ask exactly what the ruling is now under which we are not allowed to pursue this discussion? Have you ruled that it is out of order to deal with government policy with regard to civil service rates of pay and such matters?

The Deputy Chairman: No. I just said that the hon. member should not discuss rates of pay.

Mr. Pearson: Have you stated that if he tried to discuss rates of pay in connection with government policy he would be out of order?

The Deputy Chairman: I hoped I had made myself clear before.

Mr. McIlraith: With great respect we will have to appeal the ruling. A whole section of the Civil Service Act deals with rates of pay and compensation. It is part II of the act and it is entitled "Organization, classification and compensation of the service". Sections 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16 and 17 have to do with that whole question of rates of pay in the service, and if we are to discuss an amending bill replacing the existing bill but are not allowed to discuss the subject matter under that part of the act, with great deference we shall have to appeal your ruling.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, before you complete this matter let me say at once—and I think what you said earlier is quite in accord with this—that there is nothing to prevent anyone discussing the machinery which the act creates or which the old act contains in regard to how rates are arrived at. Nobody questions that. The machinery is in the present act and there will be machinery provided in the new bill. But what it seems to me is not in order is to discuss particular existing rates or what should have been done with a particular rate. That does not relate to the machinery by which rates are arrived at. That is all this measure does. It deals, among other things, with the machinery by which rates are arrived at. It does not set rates at all. What has been left undone in relation to the establishment of particular rates may be discussed in the committee of supply on the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, on the point raised by the minister—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Ottawa West has moved a motion. I am a little at a loss to understand how I could accept the motion. I have made no ruling since we voted on the amendment. That ruling was made before we voted on the amendment. I do not see how we can go back.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, that is precisely what I was doing; I was discussing the agency through which the civil service establishes and recommends pay rates for government employees. I hope I am quite in order if I keep within those limits.

[Mr. Pearson.]

There is one thing I wanted to point out, namely, that civil servants are in a position of inferiority. A report was prepared, but they were not allowed to see it. They wanted to discuss it with the proper authorities, but were not informed of its contents.

I would suggest that the government include in its proposed amendment something to the effect that, in matters pertaining to salaries or working conditions, a representative of each civil service organization sit in on civil service commission meetings. Thus they would be kept informed of matters under discussion, and could submit their views. There would be no more of those secret reports so familiar to the Minister of Finance.

The main grievance, I think, is against the way the matter is handled. Civil servants are treated as underlings by the Minister of Finance and the government. That is the point of my objection. They should not be placed in a position of inferiority; on the contrary, they should be given an opportunity to defend their own interests. I am not referring to any specific amount, but to working conditions, and particularly to the procedure for preparing recommendations to be submitted to the civil service commission.

The civil service commission has done its duty, and deserves no blame, but I do blame the government for failing to disclose the contents of its report. The minister, in particular, refused to say a word, and I think he is to be blamed for that.

Precisely as a result of the attitude displayed by the Minister of Finance, civil service associations have lost confidence in the government. They want their demands to be more thoroughly considered.

We also protest against the introduction of this resolution at the end of a session, at a time when there is still a considerable amount of important legislation to be passed, and when there are committees requiring our attendance.

The government does not seem concerned about its attitude. They want us to rush through legislation that we cannot accept without thorough consideration. It is a kind of steam roller, or what one might term a form of indirect closure.

We are not afforded the opportunity of giving proper consideration to the resolutions submitted. A rule of closure that we cannot accept is being imposed.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that in the present circumstances there is only one way to deal with this: the minister should move the first reading of his measure and supply us and the civil servants with the information required for consideration.

Thus, we could come back at the next session well prepared, ready, acquainted with the measure and the spirit that prompts it.

I have always dreaded the Conservative spirit in this country. That is why I wish to have the opportunity to study this bill and to understand its essence so as to be able to discuss it properly.

For all those reasons, I urge the minister to give the bill only its first reading, so that we may have time to consider it and to take it up in detail at the next session.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I endorse the validity of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hull concerning the introduction of this bill and its study not only by the select committee but by all those affected. There is one way of meeting the problem of having the bill adequately studied and passed during the present session of parliament. That would be for the government to arrange a summer recess and to return in the fall so this and other matters could be studied in the intervening period.

I will today discuss the method by which salary scales have been arrived at and suggest an alternative method. The government has followed the old process of divide and rule by its action in the past few months in arbitrarily establishing salaries. This has tended to make some branches of the public service a little happier while curtailing the legitimate activities of civil servants to secure bargaining rights. This is the age old employer tactic of preventing people from having a voice in their own affairs and should not be followed by the government. The bill should reflect the right of individuals to bargain collectively with their employer, the government of Canada. If the bill does not reflect this principle it will fall far short of being a full solution.

Public servants have been concerned about this matter for some time. I am sure all hon. members have received many letters on the subject including form letters probably prepared by civil service associations. Although the minister may consider that the letter I hold in my hand expresses the position in violent language I propose to read a portion of it to indicate the feeling of civil service associations in this respect:

> Sir, as a civil servant I feel strongly regarding the morally dishonest manner in which the present government has misled both the civil service and the public. I object to the misleading statements made by the Minister of Finance in this respect. I feel that I have the right to question the honesty of intent of the Minister of Finance in his reference to personal income taxes and in his presentation of other data.
> I now ask you as my member of parliament, and in the interests of the efficient administration of the government of Canada, to take a special interest in the proposed changes to the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): If the hon. gentleman is going to read this letter I ask him whether he would give the name of the author of it and lay it on the table?

Mr. Howard: No, I am not going to give the author of it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You cannot read it.

Mr. Howard: This, Mr. Chairman, is one of many, many letters that I have received. I indicated earlier they were printed.

Mr. Brunsden: Inspired?

Mr. McIlraith: No, not on this subject; they do not have to be inspired.

Mr. Howard: I continue:

> I ask you to consider what the government—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Surely, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman cannot read it unless he is prepared to disclose the author.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): May I say a word on the point of order. Not so very long ago, on a similar matter, the hon. member for Assiniboia challenged—I forget the name of the hon. member—

Mr. Pearson: We remember it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): He was from Saskatchewan.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the hon. member back here from Alberta.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Yes. At that time he was challenged to name the author and he refused. He took it on his own personal responsibility to quote the letter. I believe it was the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, since my name has been mentioned, I took the statements from the letters as my own.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): If the hon. member wants to take the statements in the letters that he is reading and support them, then he can do so.

Mr. Howard: May I say one word. These statements are mild compared with the ones I would use in condemning this government.

An hon. Member: Use your own, then.

The Deputy Chairman: I think it is quite obvious that if the hon. member does not wish to disclose where the quotation comes from then, of course, he must himself assume the responsibility for what he is talking about.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): But he does not.

Mr. Howard: Yes. I continue.

I ask you to consider what the government proposes to substitute for the confidence that it has destroyed,—

I think it has destroyed confidence.

—for it has now become clear that 200,000 citizens, taxpayers, voters, and civil servants need the protection of collective bargaining rights to ensure straightforward dealing.

As I said, I wish to make only a few comments on that to indicate the feeling of the civil servants across this nation who have sent these letters to many, many people. It is a key point of bargaining rights that I am leading up to. I do not think anything else, regardless of whether it is a benevolent attitude at election time or at any other time to establish upward adjustments or otherwise in civil servants' salaries, will meet the point. The main point is that here are many thousands of people in the public service of Canada who do not have the rights that are enjoyed by countless thousands of other people across this nation, namely the human and civil right to make a determination of, or participate in making a determination of their own, in consultation and discussion with their employer, a determination of what their working conditions, wages and other provisions relating to their work will be.

As the committee knows, I introduced a bill earlier this session in this regard. There was some discussion of it. I do not intend to go into it. It was a bill to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. It was designed to make that act, with some exceptions, applicable to the public service of Canada. It met with a number of objections. What I should like to do is to lay the groundwork here to indicate what I think should be included in the bill when it is presented to the house. These objections revolve mainly around the fact that in the final analysis parliament should have the right to determine what the salary structure will be and what wages will be paid to civil servants, since parliament has the right to decide in the final analysis what all other payments out of the public treasury will be. Perhaps there should be a modification of the original thoughts that I had on this matter to meet this point. I think that a conciliation board or an arbitration board, or whatever you wish to call it, should be established, although in the strict sense of the word it would not be an arbitration board that I intend to suggest but a conciliation board of the public service of Canada.

I think the public service should have the right to proceed to such a board if it cannot find satisfaction in its contract negotiations and at other stages. I think that a report of this board should be tabled in parliament and that parliament itself should make the final recommendation so that parliament would then have the final say as to what rates would be applied to the public service rather than have the minister in his ivory tower decide what those rates would be.

As I said earlier, he is now doing that in an arbitrary and discriminatory way. There is some reference also in the initial Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act to the fact that perhaps the definition section there of employee is not strictly applicable to the public service because certainly the structure of the public service is not strictly comparable with any private industry and perhaps there should be some modification there.

With these two modifications that I have suggested and the one that I initially proposed, namely that there should not be the right to strike, we think the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, if the government so desired, could be properly embodied within the Civil Service Act, to set up the machinery whereby the civil servants could reach fair and just settlement and equity in their dealings with the government, not only with respect to wages and salary adjustments, but also with respect to the resolution of disputes and differences of opinion between the time when they are actually bargaining for an alteration in any collective agreement that they may have and other times. This relates to such things as classifications of employees, promotions and allocations within different departments, rates of pay and whether they are receiving a fair rate of pay for the particular type of work they are doing, and all of these other matters which will arise from time to time in any organization. When a person feels he is aggrieved and has a grievance he should have the right to proceed in this instance to the board of arbitration to determine whether or not he is right in his suggestion that he has been aggrieved.

I think, Mr. Chairman, this is the key point to which we should direct ourselves. I refer to the giving of bargaining rights to civil servants, to the people in the public service, to determine, as all other employees in industry have, their own destiny to a degree; the right to form themselves into organizations, to bargain collectively with their employer. This is the basic human right that we think should be embodied in the Prime Minister's bill of rights if and when we get around to seeing it. But this is one of the rights that I think individuals within the public service should have just the same as people in private industry have. Without this right, without providing the machinery by which a member of the public service of Canada may state his objections, without the right to a piece of machinery through which he can express himself, and collaborate with others in a similar class of work, and attempt to deal with his employer; without those rights placed in the Civil Service Act we shall continue to have the recurrence, maybe not year after year but time after time as the years go on of the attitude that is existing at the moment among many of the people in our civil service.

The attitude expressed in the form letter I read earlier also expressed my views, and I say it is not good for our public servants to have this sort of attitude toward the government. It is not good to have a policy toward the public service that continually makes for dissatisfaction and causes some employees to leave the civil service and seek other fields of employment because there is a better opportunity for the expression of themselves as individuals in private industry. We should not allow a situation to continue which creates such hard feeling.

Similar conditions have existed in other provincial and municipal governmental organizations. I do not intend to go into those at the moment because they involve other jurisdictions, but I think we can certainly profit from the attitude of one provincial government and take a cue from the manner in which it has dealt by legislation with the rights of the individual members of its public service. If the minister would do something of that nature I think he would do a great deal to dispel the frustration and anger existing among our civil servants at the present time and help greatly to prevent a recurrence in the future.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting since the beginning of the session to bring up a matter which is of concern to civil servants in my riding. In view of the ruling of the Chair as to rates of pay, it is doubtful whether I can go too deeply into that aspect of what I intended to say this afternoon. The subject to which I wish to draw the attention of the committee and the minister is the matter of isolated post allowances, which may not properly be considered as pay of civil servants. I will not go into the question of rates but rather will deal with the method of arriving at the isolated post allowance paid to civil servants in the north.

In the more remote areas of the north civil servants are paid an allowance over and above the rate of salary they get, and in order to arrive at this allowance four factors are taken into consideration. Among the factors is one concerning the cost of living and another concerning the supplementary cost of living. The method of arriving at the cost of living and the supplementary cost of living allowance is one which in my view is producing certain inequitable results so far as the actual rates are concerned.

The previous government set up a committee known as the interdepartmental committee on isolated post regulations, and the recommendations of that committee are either accepted or rejected by treasury board in arriving at the rate of allowance to be paid to the northern civil servant. In arriving at an assessment of the factors in order that a rate of allowance may be calculated the committee has recourse to information provided on certain forms which are supposed to be completed by civil servants in the north. In the past these forms have been poorly distributed and have not been fully completed. As a result erroneous information has come to the hands of the administration both prior to the time that present government took office and subsequent thereto.

I suggest that a more accurate method of assessing the factors which are properly considered when arriving at the rate of allowance to be paid would be to conduct an on the spot survey of conditions in the post which is being assessed. The cost of living allowance, of course, has to do with the cost of food in these remote areas, and the supplementary cost of living allowance has to do with the cost of other goods and services supplied in the area which may be under examination. Recently there has been a reduction in both these allowances on the recommendation of the interdepartmental committee on isolated post allowances, a committee which incidentally, is composed entirely of civil servants. In effect, therefore, it is a recommendation made by civil servants for a reduction in the isolated post allowance of civil servants.

I think the information the committee had on which it based its recommendation for this reduction was far from complete. As a result, I feel that a more accurate assessment should be made and in the meantime any positive action with relation to a reduction of these allowances should continue to be suspended. For instance, at the moment the method of calculating the cost of living allowance is by determining the relative difference between the cost of food in Vancouver or Edmonton and that in the given location in the north. I feel that the calculation of the allowance by relying on the relative difference is wrong. What should be done is to conduct an on the spot survey of the cost of food in any given location and upon that basis the rate of allowance should be arrived at.

As to the supplementary cost of living allowance, the cost of other goods and services in the remoter northern areas should be assessed and likewise calculated. This is now calculated simply by an arbitrary guess as to what the allowance should be. The method which I suggest should be adopted is an on the spot survey of the actual cost of other goods and services in these various locations. If this method is substituted in each case for the method employed by the previous administration and still carried on by the present administration, perhaps because the matter has not been brought to the minister's attention before, I think a much more accurate assessment of such allowances could be made. With these few remarks, Mr. Chairman, may I say it is my hope that there will be some provision in the new act or the regulations that will be made thereunder which will result in a revision of the method of calculating these allowances so that a much more accurate and equitable allowance may be paid.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the legislation we are now discussing has been described by the Minister of Finance as having its origin in the 1918 act. A technical argument could probably be made that the principle of the merit system was attempted to be introduced in earlier legislation, but in any event the 1918 act certainly was a landmark on this subject and was properly described by the minister as such. I think the people of Canada owe a great debt of gratitude to the Hon. A. K. Maclean who presented the legislation and piloted it through the house and to men like the Hon. Newton Wesley Rowell, afterwards chief justice of Ontario, for the contribution they made in that regard. It seems to me that in their remarks they showed an appreciation of the problem and suggested methods whereby real strength could be achieved in the administrative arm of government which have served as a good base on which to operate.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What about the leader of the administration, Sir Robert Borden?

Mr. McIlraith: I am just coming to that, if the hon. member for Carleton would be just a little patient he would see that all things come in their proper place.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

An hon. Member: Sometimes it is the reverse.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not know what is reversed about it. The minister of finance introduced the legislation in that time because apparently at that time the secretary of state did not have so much to do with the legislation. In the last number of years it has been the responsibility of the secretary of state and I, for one, am thoroughly mystified as to why the Secretary of State is not presenting this legislation today.

Be that as it may, when I started my remarks I was mentioning the importance of principles laid down by former leaders. There is a particularly good reference from the leader of the union government, when he spoke about the civil service being free from the maligning influence of patronage. The whole attempt has been to get away from that patronage and establish a truly merit system of appointment. I, therefore, welcome a review of this legislation at this stage to see what improvement can be made.

It is rather interesting that the last government, when the new chairman of the civil service commission, Mr. Heeney, was appointed, directed him to deal with this subject, to examine the whole subject and to make a report and recommendations. The new government when it came in renewed that direction in very similar terms. Clearly, Mr. Chairman, I take it there was no difference in the reference intended, so we have the Heeney report to which the Minister of Finance, in introducing this measure, made so much reference. There is a particularly good paper dealing with the subject of the Heeney report by one of the commissioners of the civil service commission, Mr. Paul Pelletier, on October 23, 1959. This will be found in the proceedings of the 11th annual conference of the institute of public administration of Canada. There is an abundance of good material on this subject and, quite frankly, in discussing a subject which is so wide there is some difficulty in knowing just which segment should be discussed.

I wanted to raise one more matter, and I think in order to do so I should quote a line or two from the Heeney report. This will be found on page 8 of that report, paragraph No. 17. It reads:

> Law alone cannot guarantee good administration, but it can and does have a real effect on the quality of the personnel who are recruited and it can provide incentives to good performance.

There is more said about the subject, and then the report goes on to say this:

> The effectiveness of the present act in protecting the national service from these traditional abuses—

Referring to the abuse of patronage and other abuses.

—is a convincing argument for the preservation of the essential legal safeguards of the merit principle.

The minister indicated he was attempting to preserve and strengthen that principle in the legislation he is seeking to introduce. I feel that that paragraph makes it clear that there are two principles that are involved in developing a healthy and strong civil service. One is the legislation itself, and that has been relatively good legislation in this country and we hope the new bill will be a good bill when it comes before us, and the other thing is the attitude of the government itself toward its own administrative arm.

I am bound to admit that as I studied the history of Canada I have observed over the years, differing attitudes by different governments to the administrative arm of government. There have been periods when, unfortunately, the treatment of the civil service was not such as most of us in this house would wish. Since the recent change in government I have, at times, been somewhat concerned with the attitude of this government toward the civil service. The Minister of Finance, I am quite sure, as time goes on and his experience continues will come to the conclusion that his method of handling the pay increases over the last year—quite in addition to the question of the pay increases themselves, the amounts and so on—leaves something to be desired. It seems to me that it does not reveal on the part of the government an appreciation of the proper place of the civil service in the functioning of government in Canada. I could labour that subject for some time, but I hope the minister will pay more attention to that subject in the future so that we will not have the same rather peremptory announcements such as were made during the last year. I must say, frankly, that I had regarded the Civil Service Act as doing one outstanding thing and that was setting up a commission that was answerable to parliament.

There are quite adequate safeguards in that, such as the provision that the chairman of the civil service commission can only be removed by a joint address of the two houses of parliament, which is the method of removal that is made applicable to judges of the supreme court. Here we can see the lengths to which our predecessors went in seeking to guarantee the independence of the civil service commission from partisan interference by government. I do not want to reiterate a debate that took place earlier as I am not sure of the extent to which I could do it, although I believe I could bring it under the rules.

I must say I was shocked with an answer given by the Minister of Finance when he was asked to table a report of the commission to the government. Possibly the nature of his answer was dictated by the procedure on motions for the production of papers which would not permit the minister to debate the matter. Perhaps I should be charitable to the minister as certainly the answer was in an abbreviated form, and the form in which it appeared on that occasion was such as to weaken the confidence of the public service of Canada in the government's attitude toward that service.

I could pick out other points, but perhaps I have said enough to indicate that I am very concerned that this legislation being introduced shall in no way weaken that principle of the independence of the commission from the partisan influence of the government of the day. This principle should be preserved and strengthened.

There is another point that concerns me greatly. The last really thorough study of the civil service was in 1938 and 1939. I was interested in noting, when I sent for the evidence of this committee, that the special committee of 1938 held some 48 sittings. The committee was reconvened in 1939 and held nine meetings. In other words, on that occasion some 57 meetings were held on the Civil Service Act. This leads me to say that in my opinion no government of Canada can be really effective in the interests of the public of this country without a strong and competent civil service, a civil service with a high morale and efficiency. I believe we have such a service, and I believe it is important that we always have such a service.

We are told by the minister that the legislation now coming before us is going to be longer than is the present act. The present act has some 65 sections to it. It is divided into five parts, one part which, by the way, seems to deal with the subject of compensation. I will not elaborate too much on that matter. However, to deal with that act and to review it required some 57 meetings of a special committee the last time it was done. We are now going to be asked to review the whole subject matter and to consider a new act that is longer than this one of 65 sections and to do it all, as the minister said, "I hope rather hurriedly" this session without having the opportunity to think about them.

I am going to make a direct appeal to the minister to consider this whole matter in order to ascertain if the interest of the country would not be better served by allowing this bill, once it is introduced and is given first reading, to stand over so that a committee can be set up at the start of a session, one that can look forward with interest and eagerness to holding 57 sittings or more, if necessary, in order to deal with this matter thoroughly and to give it the kind of treatment it deserves.

I have had some opportunity of dealing with civil service associations, civil service bodies and civil servants individually and I think I can assure any committee to be set up that some numbers of civil service associations will wish to be heard. I think it is appropriate and proper that they should be heard. The act, the regulations thereunder and the procedures are quite cumbrous and quite involved. They are not simple things that can be dealt with in a few minutes. I would hope that all these organizations would feel that they are going to have the opportunity of being heard, of making full representations and of submitting to examination by members of the committee so that the bill as it is finally enacted by the house will be one that will meet all the requirements of good government, that will have been examined thoroughly and that the civil service—whose charter it will be, in reality—will feel that it has been competently examined by the house and by the committee.

I therefore repeat with all the strength at my command the request to the minister to reconsider this matter, that he let the bill, after first reading, stand over and have the committee set up immediately after the throne speech so that the months required for full examination of the bill may be available.

There are many subjects, briefs and sections that will require to be examined. Any lesser treatment of the matter is not one that will serve the interests of the country or of the government adequately and well. I perhaps have no need to draw to the attention of hon. members the fact that this is the 106th day of the session. According to my arithmetic, if the committee were to hold the same number of meetings as the former committee held, it would be the 163rd day of the session, if the committee held a sitting every day from now on for the rest of this session, before it could even start to prepare its report. From this calculation hon. members will see just how serious this matter is and I hope they will join me in the request I am making to the minister.

A good deal could be said about governments of the day. It seems to me that the situation is this, as I have been able to study it. If you examine governments since confederation, Mr. Chairman, you will find a rather interesting coincidence, namely that governments which have been incompetent, if I may use that word, or which have been antagonistic in their handling of this subject or which have misunderstood the role of the civil servant in the art of government or in the business of government have tended to be weak governments and have tended to destroy themselves. It is a rather interesting study for anyone to pursue. While I cannot express too many wishes for the present government, I would hope they would not fall into the error of treating this subject in any way less seriously than its inherent merit demands.

There is a great range of subjects requiring discussion. I noted that the minister indicated he is changing the provisions having to do with the pay of an employee of the crown being a matter of right instead of a matter of grace, following a principle that was laid down in the civil service superannuation legislation some years ago. Then he mentions that consultation between the staff associations and the appropriate officers of the government or the commission on questions of pay and conditions of work as the need arises is desirable. There is a whole area of discussion there. I do not propose to spend the rest of the time allotted to me this afternoon in discussing it. But because of its complexity, that subject alone deserves close attention from all hon. members. I am not sure just what the minister meant in that reference or just what he proposes in the legislation. We look forward with interest to seeing what the legislation contains on that subject. With the growth of the service and with the changing ideas of our times it is readily apparent that the present method of consultation is not working efficiently and is not adequate as in regard to the present needs.

I must revert to an earlier point. I place a little bit of blame for that situation on the minister's attitude or, shall I say, his failure to understand the whole subject and his failure to give to the workers in the service the confidence which they deserve and to which they are entitled as long as they are doing their work efficiently and in the interests of the country.

Then there is this other matter mentioned by the minister, namely the changing situation to be covered by legislation, the matter of the veteran preferences in relation to such things as the war in Korea which did not involve the kind of declaration of war envisaged by the earlier legislation and matters of that kind. We could go on then into this whole question of existing legislation, the method of the rates of pay, the rates of compensation for new classes; the method of submitting the reports for the rates of compensation; to whom are they to be submitted; what is the method of handling them after they are submitted; what is the method of having them made public; what is the method of having them made available to parliament and so on. I think that whole sector of the act needs strengthening and needs to be brought up to date. On that point I await with interest the provisions of the bill.

Again I do not want to revert to something already dealt with, but I must say I was rather shocked at what I thought was the limitation the minister was seeking to put on the debate. That is past now, but the whole matter not only of rates of pay but of methods of determining and examining them to see that they are adequate, and so on, requires minute consideration by some appropriate procedure of parliament, which in this case I would say is the special committee. Then there are all the other matters to be considered, such as the development of the Whitley councils as they were first created in the United Kingdom a number of years ago and their adaptation to this country, the modernization of them to meet modern needs, the extent to which they should be adopted, modernized and improved, and the extent to which they should be discontinued because they may not be quite up to date. All that covers a vast area.

It is not my purpose to develop the argument any further at this stage. I for one want to see this bill. I hope it will be possible, when the bill is made available to me, to have a proper opportunity of reading and studying it thoroughly and that I will not be expected to deal with it in a rush at the committee stage when we have such important committees sitting as the committee dealing with the combines legislation, the committee dealing with broadcasting and the committee dealing with the bill of rights.

Therefore I conclude my remarks with the reiteration of my request to the minister to lay before his colleagues consideration of procedure from here on in the handling of this piece of legislation. As I said, when the act was previously before the special committee in 1938 and 1939 it required some 57 sittings to deal with it. We are now in our 106th day of this session, and if we are expected to deal with this legislation in a special committee, bring it back to the house and enact the legislation at this session, I am afraid it will get less competent treatment from us than it deserves, and less competent treatment than any one of us would wish it to get. It will also create a situation in the civil service where there will be further demoralization.

May I point that last factor out as being of some importance, because if the civil service bodies are not given an opportunity of being adequately heard by that special committee there will undoubtedly be the impression created that the government of the day is seeking to force legislation through without adequate consideration. That can be a very important thing when you are dealing with a body of employees running to some 140,000 or 150,000 people. I noticed that the hon. member for Carleton does not like my reference to some demoralization in the civil service—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No, of course not, and the hon. member does not believe that himself.

Mr. McIlraith: I repeat my statement. In my opinion there is no doubt at all that there is. It has been created basically through slowness in granting pay increases, as the hon. member for Carleton, if he has anything to do with postal employees these days, will soon know.

I do not think the government's method of handling the increases has been quite up to what it should have been. As I say, I do not propose to state a case. For instance, discussing the question of the failure to make these increases retroactive to the appropriate date, not following the earlier practice in this regard, would occupy me for some time. I could discuss the whole question of failure to deal with what is probably one of the most underpaid classes in the civil service, namely the postal employees. Any suggestion on the part of hon. members that those problems have not caused concern in the civil service is, in my view, not a conscientious and complete picture of the subject at all, and I say it has not been treated in the way it should have been treated.

However, I have made my plea to the minister. I regret there is only one of his colleagues in the chamber at the moment. I do hope that the request I have made gets to his colleagues in the government and that they do consider the matter in the way in which it is put forward in an effort to make sure that this legislation which is being introduced will be the best possible legislation that the house can produce.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, two or three very definite impressions have arisen from this debate, and may I be permitted a few moments to give my thoughts with respect to them. These impressions arise from the very lengthy and rather tedious remarks of the hon. member for Hull and the hon. member for Skeena to the effect that the gentlemen to my immediate right are the only members of this committee who are interested in the Canadian civil service. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that those of us on this side of the house share with them a deep concern with respect to their futures and that we are determined, as they were some years ago, when they had the opportunity, to do everything possible to safeguard their interests.

There is a factor which has not been mentioned today, and I say this with all due respect to every civil servant in Canada. Much has been said today with respect to the transition of the civil servant to private business, the breaking down, it is alleged, of our civil service organization. The civil servant enjoys something that no other worker in Canada enjoys, and that is a very large measure of security. While there may be times in the course of his active life when he feels he has not been entirely fairly dealt with, he always knows that except for cause he cannot be removed from his office. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that that is an advantage that should be given some consideration in any discussion of this great working force. I can think of many other groups who have no security; I am not too far from one at the moment. Other groups also could claim they are underpaid. Some members of this group close to me make that claim. I am not among them, but I do feel that there are factors involved in employment in the government service which have not been given the credit to which they are entitled.

Mention has been made of patronage. I am very happy to say as a private member of this government it has been impossible for me to indulge in any patronage. First of all it is not my wish to seek it; second, I could not get my brother, if I had one, appointed as a janitor if there was such a job open. The civil service commission in Canada is doing a most excellent job with respect to the filling of positions. There have been some disappointments of course with respect to appointments which have been made, but by and large I am very happy to say that in my opinion the replenishing of the ranks of our civil service is entirely removed from politics.

So I say that when this resolution is adopted and the bill comes before us it will be the concern of all of us regardless of political party to analyse it from the point of view of the greatest advantage for the greatest number. I am sure the Minister of Finance as he pilots the bill through the house will demonstrate to all civil servants his sincere interest in their welfare.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, after listening to the speech of the Minister of Finance and other hon. gentlemen who have spoken this afternoon I am wondering if as a whole the committee takes seriously enough the question which is before it. This is not just another act that will from time to time be amended or overhauled. This is the act which affects the working conditions and status of what is the most important permanent administrative arm of the government of this country. It is often said that we have the finest civil service in the world, a great organization, outstanding people. That is all very well. We must ensure that the act governing how they are appointed, the conditions under which they will work, the basis on which they are remunerated, the method by which they will achieve promotions, the regulations concerning their tenure of office, et cetera, is also the finest act of its kind in the world.

This is not a political matter. This subject should be taken out of politics altogether. Up to a point I do not think there is too much cause for complaining that too strong a political element has been injected into the debate this afternoon. However, I feel that if I were to do justice to the importance of the subject before us I and every other hon. member in this chamber who is interested in this measure would speak for at least 40 minutes because the subject is much larger and of greater importance than one would be led to believe by what has been said in the debate today.

Parliament has had no opportunity since 1938 or 1939 to discuss the whole question of the civil service. Last year we had a small review in a committee of the house. The meetings were very friendly. The hon. member for Carleton was in attendance. We were also honoured to have the acting chief commissioner, Mr. Pelletier, present, as well as others who gave us information on conditions in the civil service and the operations of the commission. But that was not the type of study a committee of this house should have given to so broad a subject. There are many serious matters to be considered including the question of the first examination appointment. That is a great question. Promotions is another. There are also the questions of assignment, transfer, tenure of office, removal, et cetera.

Another big question that must be solved is that of consultation or collective bargaining as it is referred to by some. Hon. members do not even know what is in the bill. Perhaps some hon. members on the government side know what is in the proposed bill but certainly I do not. What is more important, those who are affected do not know what is going to be in the bill.

Surely whatever our views on the matter may be we need the assistance of those who will be affected by this legislation. The civil service associations should have an ample opportunity to appear before the committee. The officers of the commission should also appear. Surely we will not pass a bill without giving ample opportunity to those who want to speak on various aspects of it to present their case before the committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know if the hon. member was in the chamber when I said that after second reading of the bill I proposed to ask that it be referred to a special select committee for the purpose of going into the bill in the utmost detail.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Of course I agree with that. My hon. friend does not understand my point.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I do not.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): The committee in a period of one or two months cannot properly examine the bill and hear all the representations that will be made on it. I congratulate the minister and the government for bringing the bill before us at long last. The act requires revision and it is high time it has come about. I also congratulate the government for having given us an opportunity last year to study the Heeney report. All this is to the good.

My point is that the bill should be introduced now and next year let us go to work early in the session in a special committee and do a thorough job of analysing the measure. The minister should know that he will be the loser if a bill such as this is passed within a month or a month and a half without adequate study having been made. The minister will take all the blame and plenty of blame will be directed at the hon. gentleman because there will not have been an ample opportunity provided for those who wish to make representations to the committee. It will be too late. Afterwards we will find all kinds of holes in this legislation and the blame will be directed to one individual. Hon. members will observe how sympathetic I am to my good friend the Minister of Finance. I am trying to save him that embarrassment.

I will not elaborate at great length because I believe I have made my point. The resolution should be passed, the bill introduced and the minister should agree to delay examination of the measure by the committee until the next session of parliament. The minister pitched one good game this afternoon in the field of superannuation and I do not think the hon. gentleman should expect that his arm is limber enough to enable him to pitch another good game today.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, no resolution of more basic long range significance has been or will be considered at this session of parliament than this proposal to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act. However sound may be the other legislation of this parliament, however competent the ministerial direction, all will be found wanting if the subsequent and consequent administrative responsibilities are not fulfilled by a competent, responsible and loyal public service. Everything this parliament does, everything the ministry seeks to achieve, ultimately must be enforced or carried out by public servants of all levels and grades. And so I submit that this particular legislation is basic, is of vital, fundamental and lasting significance.

I therefore deeply regretted the attitude of the hon. member for Hull. Presumably this afternoon the hon. gentleman was spokesman for the official opposition in this important matter. Did he approach this resolution in an objective way? No, the hon. gentleman engaged in a political harangue. The hon. gentleman endeavoured to drag the civil service into politics, to make the act a partisan and political issue. Nothing could be more harmful to parliament or more harmful to the civil service. I say that the hon. gentleman's remarks this afternoon were both cheap and unfair. They were totally without dignity or an understanding of the fundamental precept that the civil service must be above and beyond politics.

May I remind the hon. member for Hull and indeed also remind the hon. member for Ottawa West that it is to a very great Canadian, Sir Robert Borden, and his colleagues that Canada owes the present structure of its civil service. The monument of a civil service appointed on the merit principle, promoted on the same basis, freed from partisanship, the spoils system, the favouritism and the nepotism which plagued our earlier days, is a monument to Sir Robert Borden more lasting than the bronze and granite we observe on parliament hill.

The Heeney report of December, 1958 had this to say of the Borden bill of 1918, the bill of 40 years earlier:

> It has been said that the Civil Service Act of 1918 gave Canada, in a single step, as advanced a measure of public service reform as existed anywhere in the world.

So for more than 40 years the principles of the Borden bill have stood the test of time. To all governments, to all parties, credit is due and let credit be given. Let us keep this resolution, let us keep our discussion of it above and beyond partisanship in this chamber.

During those 42 years Canada has emerged from colony into nationhood, and the status of its civil service has kept pace with that. Without reservation I submit to the committee that our senior civil servants can hold their own at international meetings, at learned societies and in the performance of their day to day duties with the public servants of any other nation; and this submission, indeed I call it this confident assertion, I would apply to all in less senior roles. That fact itself is a vindication of the Borden Civil Service Act, in principle not amended in 42 years.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: I agree with what the hon. member says about the civil service. Is that not a pretty good indication of how well the previous government administered the act in the previous 22 years?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I would like to say to the hon. gentleman that during 42 years I believe on the part of governments generally there has been adherence to that sound principle and there has been in the last three years an adherence to that principle the like of which has not existed in the 22 years previous thereto.

The fact that there has been that adherence would indicate that the modernization of the act, its streamlining, if you like, its up to dating, ought to be in general conformity with those principles which have stood the test of time in Canada's rush from a frontier colony to a nation capable of foremost leadership in the world.

Though Canadians are proud of the standards of our civil service—and have reason, as I have said, to be—that fact must not lead us to smug self-satisfaction or into complacency with the status quo. By parliament and by the civil service itself there must be a constant striving for improvement in the standards of our administration of public service matters. But what I emphasize is this. Parliament must be certain at all times to preserve the great traditions of our civil service. I submit that the legislation which is introduced must be tested on that basis. For those reasons I believe the house and the country will welcome what the Minister of Finance has said in introducing this legislation this afternoon and the assurances which he has given.

The first and the most significant assurance is that the merit principle will be preserved inviolate in the proposed bill. It is the cornerstone on which we build. The Heeney report had this to say at page 23:

> It can, we believe, be asserted with confidence that the merit system is a permanent feature of the Canadian philosophy and machinery of government.

Last year, after its detailed review of the civil service commission, the standing committee on estimates ended its report with this uncompromising declaration of the faith of the members of this house, and I quote from Votes and Proceedings of Thursday, July 2, 1959, at page 648:

> In reviewing the evidence and the recommendations contained in the foregoing your committee wishes to impress upon parliament the importance and the necessity for reaffirming our belief in the fundamental and underlying principle of the public service of Canada. The principle to which we refer is generally described as the "merit system" which we suggest provides the one assurance that the civil servant will remain free from political or other influences in discharging his responsibility to the Canadian public.

This declaration, drafted by the hon. member for Calgary South, but approved unanimously by all members of the committee representing all parties in this house, is a fulfilment of the pledge which was made to the civil service association of Canada by the Prime Minister on May 1, 1958, in what I may describe as a very sympathetic and certainly a very enlightened speech on the subject of the civil service. I quote:

> Our revised Civil Service Act, I am sure, will preserve the vital principles of the merit system which have been in our legislation for the past half century. Nowadays we take it for granted that civil servants are appointed and promoted on the basis of ability. We must not forget, however, that this depends upon having the right principles in our law and the effective application of them by an impartial tribunal. This we must preserve.
> The public service is so important and its work affects all Canadians so directly, that we need the best men and women in it that we can secure. That is the positive aspect of the merit system—to ensure the selection of those who will do the best job.

So there is embedded in this bill, and for all time it must be a part of Canadian theories of government, the assurance of the practice, the genuine practice of—not just lip service to—the merit system. But let us not believe that just the mere assertion of adherence to the merit system is assurance of its practice. Here, as in so many aspects of life, eternal vigilance is the price of adherence to principle. Safeguards against internal abuses, against tailor-made competitions, against favouritism by senior officials, all these are required for the genuine practice of merit in promotions. The Heeney report, at page 8, put it this way and this is a statement always to be kept before us:

> Forty years ago, and this is all too frequently forgotten, the need was also for a public service free from nepotism, the coddling of incompetent favourites, the granting of promotions for consideration and similar internal abuses. Not much is gained if the "malign influence" of political patronage is replaced by bureaucratic patronage, which may be less apparent but which can be no less insidious and demoralizing.

Most emphatically do I agree that bureaucratic patronage is insidious and demoralizing and the new act and its administration must endeavour to eliminate bureaucratic patronage as fully and completely as political patronage. Had I to choose between them, I would support political patronage ahead of bureaucratic patronage, for the politician at least is accountable for his actions. Fortunately that choice is not necessary.

And so, basically, the merit system means simply that appointments and promotions are made on the basis of an objective determination of the relative merit of qualified candidates, under which all qualified persons have the opportunity for consideration for appointments and promotions and under which duties performed are equitably compensated.

I believe it is a major responsibility of this parliament to make civil service employment an attractive and rewarding career for any young Canadian. We need to recruit the very best of our young Canadians for government, government at all levels, not those whose prime interest is in security. To do that, the rewards additional to security must be genuine. Service of the state must be considered the very highest type of service and those who pursue such a career must be given the confidence that they will not be shot down blind alleys, will not have their potential for advancement restricted by red tape, will not have their initiative blighted by needless frustrating administrative techniques, will not have their leadership qualities lost in the giant mechanism of an inhumane bureaucracy.

For that reason, personally I welcome the assurances of the Minister of Finance that the new legislation will provide greater flexibility, greater simplicity in meeting the administrative functions of the departments of government, all without prejudice to the merit system. As I understand it, the proposed legislation will provide for a clearer division of authority. It will preserve unimpaired the authority and responsibility of the civil service commission in all matters dealing with recruitment and promotion. On the other hand, in all matters of managerial concern, greater authority for decision and action will be vested in deputy heads.

I think that is good. It is in strict conformity with the Heeney report and with what I believe are recognized as the best principles of modern public administration. What I hope this may be able to achieve is what I might describe as a better internal relativity, that is to say, an improvement in the relationship between various classes of work and rates of pay within the civil service. What we must seek to achieve, and what I believe and hope this legislation will achieve, is the establishment of definite principles of class comparability, a reduction in the number of classifications and the removal generally of discriminations and frustrations, of blind alleys for some employees. This I believe can be accomplished and will be promoted by the principles which have been outlined to the committee this afternoon by the Minister of Finance.

I think the house will have welcomed as well the assurance of the Minister of Finance that there will be no alteration in the independent status of the civil service commission as a quasi-judicial tribunal. This is in accord with the positive assurance given by the Prime Minister to the civil service association of Canada in what I have already described as a powerful speech on May 1, 1958, a speech which, as I have said, revealed a deep understanding of and sympathy for civil service traditions. At that time the Prime Minister said:

> The commission is not an arm of the government to which ministers can give direction. It derives its powers and basic instructions from parliament.

That position is fundamental to the preservation of sound principles of recruitment and promotion. Welcome indeed to the whole house, I am sure, was the appointment as chairman of the civil service commission of a man of such distinction as Mr. Justice Hughes. I think he is to be congratulated upon his willingness to leave the security of the supreme court bench, a role which he achieved at a comparatively youthful age, for a term appointment in a difficult and perplexing administrative task. As a friend of his of some 30 years now, may I say I believe the commission is fortunate indeed to have as its chief a man of such civilized mind, such keen perceptions, such articulate capacities and such basic common sense and, as well, one who all his life has been guided by a firm determination to fight for the principles in which he believes.

The minister has indicated that the bill will provide the technique for an ever-increasing participation of employees and their associations in the processes leading to a determination of conditions of employment. That is good. But this I do want to say. Responsibility is a concomitant of authority. Staff associations must display genuine responsibility, moderation in language and statesmanship in conduct to ensure an approach to effective participation in bargaining techniques. Abusive language, extravagance of expression and action have no place in civil service negotiations and only succeed in retarding what genuine friends of the civil service seek to achieve.

On other occasions I have spoken in the house about the accomplishments of the present government in civil service matters. Let it never be forgotten that the change of government in 1957 was accomplished with the least upset to the civil service of any change in history. This government has never had enough credit for that fact, for the fact that there were virtually no dismissals, no parade of dismissed employees of the type invariably experienced after previous changes of government. From the very outset this government has not given lip service but genuine adherence to the true principles of the merit system and it is time that credit was given for that fact.

In all its actions the government has demonstrated a sympathetic, understanding approach to civil service problems. Examples are the establishment of the pay research bureau, a matter frequently proposed to the former government but invariably declined; the institution of increases for superannuated civil servants, again a matter for years, sought by them but invariably refused by the St. Laurent government; the institution of a modern medical-surgical plan; the appointment of a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario as chairman of the civil service commission; the appointment on every practical occasion of deputy ministers from within the service; the institution of a system of class by class increases in salaries with regular and periodic reviews based on the principle of fair comparison. These are but a few of the indications of the genuine understanding of the Prime Minister and his colleagues of civil service administration and problems. This legislation is further evidence of the good faith of the government.

Therefore, pleased am I that the government has decided to send this legislation to a special committee. There in the exchange of opinion, in the clash of what I hope will be non-partisan views, I believe we can bring to relative perfection a bill which for the next 40 years will shine as a beacon of sound, progressive civil service policy as the Borden Civil Service Act has shone for the past four decades.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, in listening to the parliamentary secretary I heard him condemn extravagance but I think there is one other type of extravagance which he omitted and should condemn as well, his extravagance of words. The hon. member also boasted about the fact that the present government has not indulged in the time-honoured practice of mass dismissals since they came to office. If we look back over the last three years I think we will find they have devised a much better method, that of making things so miserable and unpleasant for people that in the end they resign.

When the minister introduced the resolution today he made reference to the Civil Service Act of 1918 as a landmark. From the extent and scope of the amendments now proposed I think the minister will agree that the landmark has become rather moss grown over the period of 40 odd years, and we certainly agree that it is time for a thorough overhauling of the act. The minister also made a great point about how the civil service commission has been free from political control. I wish I could be as sure as the minister that that has been the case. I am sure that many people in the civil service do not agree fully with the minister's remarks.

We must remember that the civil service commission or the Canadian government, whichever way you prefer to put it, employs more people than any other single employer in this country. At least, if there is another who employs more I do not know who it is. As has been pointed out today, by various members, I would say that in the last three years suspicion of the government among civil servants has been growing. Because of the delay and procrastination with respect to raising the salaries of civil servants and bringing them up to what they should be to meet the current cost of living we saw a very strong development among civil servants who started working together to present a united front to the government in support of their requests. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Skeena, I think the method of giving increases to certain groups and taking other groups under consideration was devised for the sole purpose of breaking up that solid front. I do not know whether they are taken under consideration or under active consideration but I saw definitions of these two phrases the other day that I think are quite appropriate. I am sure many civil servants will agree with them. The definition of "under consideration" is "we never heard of it" and the definition of "active consideration" is "we are looking in the files for it".

I was never a civil servant but I spent 11 years of my life as a civic servant and there is really not too much difference between the two. I found from personal experience that it was six years after I started to work for the municipality before I enjoyed the same rights as I had enjoyed before entering the service. It was not until after I had been with the department for six years, five of which I had spent actively in the trade union movement, that we were able to incorporate into our contract a grievance procedure sufficient to protect the members of that local and give them the same rights as everyone else.

Unfortunately these rights have not yet been passed on to the civil servants. They are still in the category of second class citizens. I recall when I first started to take an active part in politics I was warned by well-meaning friends that this was a crazy thing to do; you are going to lose your job. Well, I did, and I sometimes wonder if I improved my lot. The fact still remains that the civil servants of this country have not the same rights as other citizens of this country or as the employees of other employers. It seems that in every country there is a certain class which does not enjoy full citizenship. In India there are the untouchables, in South Africa there is apartheid and in Canada we have the civil servants.

I must confess that I was shocked when I came to Ottawa to realize that for the first time I had the power, without any proof required beyond my say so, to deprive any civil servant of his livelihood. I merely had to state that I knew he had taken an active part in politics. As I say, Mr. Chairman, I was shocked because I do not believe I have any right to that privilege, if you can call it a privilege. Certainly there is no other group of employees in this country whose jobs depend upon the whim of any one of 265 people. It is for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that I should like to support the plea of the hon. member for Skeena that when we are conducting a major overhaul of the Civil Service Act we should realize that the civil servants of this country are entitled to the same rights and privileges as any other citizens of this country. These rights should be guaranteed to them.

I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West, and with other hon. members, who have pointed out that at this late stage in the session, at a time when the annual speed-up has been put into operation, it is no time to start a major overhaul of the act in the hope of getting it passed at this session. I say that during this major overhaul we should give the rights to our civil servants that are granted to every other citizen of Canada and, in addition, we should devote the time necessary to make sure that the job is properly done.

(Translation):

Mr. Lafreniere: Mr. Chairman, I want to take this opportunity to make a few remarks in connection with this resolution. It is obviously important, for the good administration of this country, that employees and employer be on excellent terms.

Everybody will agree that each civil servant, whatever his job, plays an important part in the administration. It is no sin for a man to labour in his vocation, whether it be in the public service or in other fields of human endeavour. Due allowance being made, the humblest of civil servants, is as necessary to an efficient operation of the government machine as the one occupying the highest post, which means that the man in charge of maintenance in public buildings, the elevator operator, the junior clerk doing some obscure and unassuming work, are quite as essential to this country as the highest state official. If people in the humblest of jobs do not play their part with a full sense of responsibility, the whole administrative machine can be impaired.

The civil servant obviously has some rights, but he also has responsibilities.

He has a right to expect some consideration on the part of his employer and to a treatment consistent with human dignity. He has a right to working hours enabling him to fulfil his obligations to the extent demanded by his employer. He is entitled to a salary that will allow him to face his personal and social obligations; in a word, he is entitled to a square deal.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that this government is prepared to entertain the fair and reasonable claims of public employees in the matter of salary increases.

But the government is expected to restore within a few weeks, or a few months, a balance which had been upset during the too many years of Liberal rule. Yet, it would be wrong to believe that living costs in this country increased spontaneously, or all of a sudden. If today, federal civil servants' salaries are out of line with the cost of living, it means that there was a lack of the necessary gradual adjustment. The best proof is found in the speech made by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) on January 25, 1960, when he said:

> Some civil servants, because they receive an inadequate salary, have to take other employment in their spare time.

Mr. Chairman, I would not want to press this point unduly, but if civil service salaries were inadequate a few months ago, why did not the former administration at the time immediately decide to remedy the position; because, as I said before, the cost of living cannot change and rise all of a sudden, in a single month, or even in a single year. It is a gradual process.

Consequently it must be recognized that in respect of salary increases for the civil service, this government has made a commendable effort to date.

Mr. Chairman, I was just now speaking of the civil servant's rights. Obviously, he has not only rights; he also has duties. And, before insisting on the civil servant's duties, I want to call your attention to the fact that our country is endowed with a system of government of which we are proud, that is the democratic system. As you know, some countries waged, and are still waging, a violent struggle to attain a system of government which ensures freedom to each and every citizen of a country, in accordance with human dignity as we understand it, that is in the Christian meaning of the term.

Under that system, the voice of the people has to be heard and understood by the government. The spokesmen for the people are, of course, the citizens who have been chosen and elected by them, and they are called members of parliament. In their respective communities, those members consider the problems and needs of the people, first through their personal studies and observations, as well as through social agencies that study problems of a sociological character, problems therefore of general interest, for the common weal. In reference to those social agencies, I should like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of the house to the fine contribution made in the form of the very substantial reports coming from the various sections of the chambers of commerce throughout Canada.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the point I wish to make here is that the democratic system must allow the people to directly influence the conduct of the country's business, allowing them at the same time to guide their political destiny. That is why everything must be done to protect that system of government, so that there may always be, between the people and the government, easy communications as well as frequent and continuous relationships.

The purpose of my brief remarks is simply to point out to distinguished members of this house, wherever they sit, a danger which might make our democratic system inoperative and inefficient.

[Mr. Lafreniere.]

To put it briefly, Mr. Chairman, among the duties of civil servants towards the government, there is loyalty towards the representatives elected by the people. Otherwise, the civil service would eventually set up an impassable barrier between the government and the people. I am not complaining, Mr. Chairman, of the situation which might have existed in the past or which might now exist; I am making those remarks merely to describe what should be done in my opinion, to safeguard our system of government.

Consequently, civil servants must show great loyalty towards the representatives who have been elected by the people, and give evidence of serious co-operation.

If, after an election is held in Canada, civil servants were to apply laws already enacted by parliament without taking into account the directives or policy of the newly elected representatives of the people, well, as I said a moment ago, democracy would become inoperative, the voice of the people that is, the voice of those who have been vested with the responsibility of administering the country would never be heard.

Mr. Chairman, that is the danger I wanted to point out. I would not like to give examples nor lay any specific charge against anyone, but I say that it is a danger which any government must avoid, regardless of its political creed.

The government is responsible for seeing that the specific mandate entrusted to a member of parliament by his constituents is carried out, and division heads should follow that directive.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that in its amendments to the Civil Service Act, the present government will do something specific and practical about bilingualism and its application throughout Canada, and particularly in the various government departments.

On the matter of bilingualism, the government deserves credit for its practical action in this field. I do not want to take up too much of the house's time to list the government's accomplishments but let me mention the simultaneous interpretation system in the House of Commons—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Proposed by the former government.

Mr. Lafreniere: —which allows hon. members to express themselves—in reply to the interjection of the hon. member for Essex

East (Mr. Martin), it came as a result of a motion introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the suggestion of representatives on this side of the house.

Mr. Lafreniere: After consideration by ministers and members of the present government.

In any event, I think if the former government had really wanted to introduce simultaneous translation in the house, it had ample time to do so during its 22 years in power.

It is obviously too late for the former administration to think of things that might have been practical contributions to national unity. That action was taken by the present Conservative government.

Mr. Chairman, may I also express the hope that the present government will look into the causes or reasons for the small number of bilingual people in the Canadian government civil service. In that way, it could determine why there is such an imbalance in the number of French-speaking, as opposed to English-speaking civil servants at the senior levels of the civil service.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, this subject would warrant a thorough examination.

I am not, of course, trying to raise the cry of discrimination; however, in this field as in many others, the former government showed some laxity. That is why we are now faced with such a heavy imbalance in the number of Canadians of French extraction, in relation to Canadians of English extraction, at the top levels of the various government departments.

Mr. Chairman, I hope and trust that the government will take serious note of these brief remarks, because referring to page 22 of the report itself, I find that section 53 reads as follows:

> The commission recommends that clear provisions be made in the new act and regulations to ensure that both English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians are served by civil servants in their own tongue.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we must not overlook certain practical considerations that may exist in Canada, but I see no reason why civil servants draw up reports in what, to them, is a second language.

It might be reported that the hiring of bilingual personnel in some departments would entail extra expense for the government. In my view, the appropriate word in this case is not "expense" but "investment". Action in this regard would contribute to national unity and to a deeper mutual understanding between both ethnic groups of this country.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this government will correct the weaknesses of the former administration and, in righting the wrongs committed, it will see, in all fairness, that the rights of both the main ethnic groups of this country are properly respected.

Those are, Mr. Chairman, the remarks I wanted to make.

(Text):

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, the matter before us is not controversial and it is one with which everyone here will I am sure agree. I agree with what the hon. member for Ottawa West said this afternoon; he dealt with the subject more extensively than I propose to. We can also agree with a lot of what the hon. member for Carleton said, although he dealt with the subject in a rather general way without pinpointing any real important changes in the act.

I have no doubt whatever that some amendments to the Civil Service Act are due and perhaps the act should have been considered for revision long before this. What appears to me to be wrong in bringing this measure up for discussion at this late date is the time factor involved in order to give these proposed changes the consideration they properly deserve.

Here is an important piece of legislation brought in in a late rush hour fashion as though we were dealing with merchandise instead of the welfare of an important segment of every community in Canada, with the possible exception of the rural areas. Any contemplated changes to the act should have been made known to parliament at the beginning, not when the talk is that the end of the session is a few weeks away.

One of the changes needed to bring this act up to date is that of giving civil servants the right to bargain with their employer. The Prime Minister, speaking at the merger banquet of the civil service association of Canada, made a statement which should foreshadow the application of the principle of bargaining rights. Said the Prime Minister:

> I believe that civil servants, through their organizations, should have a greater voice ... in the process of determining ... and participating more effectively in the application of certain principles of policy ... There should be a more systematic method of bringing your views and information to bear... What is needed is more opportunity and better arrangements for your representatives to sit down at a table with officials representing the government and with officers of the civil service commission... You will have noticed I spoke of your representatives having a greater voice and participating more effectively in the application of certain principles of policy... Your power will be the power of persuasion... Your success will depend, as it should, upon the merits of your arguments and the skill of your representatives in presenting them...

Finally, perhaps the most important victory of them all so far, for you, was acceptance, free and full, by the government of the principle that it must lead the way in mutually rewarding, forward looking staff relations... that is, people must be paid at least on a par with the best in competing fields of business and industry—

From this excerpt of the Prime Minister I wish to underline the passage where he said:

What is needed is more opportunity and better arrangements for your representatives to sit down at a table with officials representing the government and with officers of the civil service commission...

If this sentence means what it is supposed to convey, then the Prime Minister is certainly committed to giving the civil service bargaining rights.

The issue is a simple one. It is whether or not a man or a woman working for the government should be deprived of those rights which are fundamental in our Canadian way of life. They want the right to sit at a bargaining table with their employers, the right to complain through newspapers or other media without fear of being dismissed, and the right to enter a committee room of a candidate for public office or to attend a political meeting without suffering the consequence of being cast in the ranks of the unemployed because of the whim of a member of parliament. Without these rights being clearly defined there would not be much use in rewriting the act.

Last November the hon. member for Winnipeg South, speaking at a meeting of Manitoba federal government workers, made the statement that he would give very serious consideration to the introduction of a bill in parliament to grant collective bargaining rights to civil servants. He later qualified the statement that he would bring the matter up in the caucus of the Conservative party and be guided by the general reaction of his colleagues. I think he was sincere, but evidently his colleagues were not impressed or he was prevented by the government from introducing a bill. If we are not going to make a better job the people will certainly feel that the government has let them down on a principle of which the Prime Minister has so often proclaimed himself its champion.

Arbitrary treatment of civil servants, however unintentional, should have no place in any code of government conduct, and the civil service commission's annual recommendations should be tabled in parliament regardless of the nature of the recommendations.

In the matter of dealing with the question of salaries the Prime Minister made the following statement in May 1958:

For many years it has been generally accepted that two main principles should guide the determination of salaries in the service.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was reading a statement made by the Prime Minister in May of 1958. He said:

For many years it has been generally accepted that two main principles should guide the determination of salaries in the service. First, the salaries must be enough to do the job, that is to attract enough of the right kind of men and women into the service and keep them in it; second, they must be fair as between civil servants and people outside the service, the taxpayers if you will, which means that the salaries we pay for any class of work should be comparable with those paid by private employers for similar classes of work, taking into account the other terms of employment that are necessary to make a fair comparison. I think these principles should continue to guide us.

He then went on to say:

We are fortunate in having in the commission persons of outstanding ability and long standing records of outstanding work as career civil servants with a wide variety of experience.

These are statements with which we all agree but unfortunately these principles have not been made operative at any time since they were enunciated two years ago. Civil service employees give of their best to the government of the day no matter whether a Conservative or a Liberal administration is in power and indeed that is the way it should be because after all the government of the day is elected by the Canadian people, the actual employers of the civil servants. In other words, they do not serve a particular political party but simply perform their duties to the best of their ability by serving and advising those in authority above them what is best for the Canadian people.

It is in the light of these considerations that I believe the civil servants should be treated. The treatment accorded them should be on a par with the treatment accorded those employed in other fields of endeavour by private industry as has already been indicated by previous speakers participating in the debate this afternoon. Without these principles fully spelled out any changes in the act will be relatively meaningless.

These men and women of the civil service fully realize their responsibilities as part of the government's administration. Let us treat them not as machines but as our worthy partners working together each in our own sphere for a better and more prosperous Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there is one matter which was touched on this afternoon by the hon. member for Ottawa West upon which I should like to comment. It had to do with the procedure on the bill with respect to the present session.

What I said this afternoon was said by way of emphasizing the importance the government attaches to this measure and with it the importance that we feel should be attached to the study of this measure both by the house and by the proposed committee. Indeed, in closing my remarks this afternoon I said that the government recognizes the need for careful consideration of the bill by parliament and that to facilitate such detailed consideration I would propose that the bill following second reading be referred to a special select committee of the house for study and report. That is the purpose of the proposed committee, that the bill may be subjected to the most thorough study possible.

The hon. member for Ottawa West seemed to confuse this proposed detailed study with some suggestion of haste. There is nothing in my remarks this afternoon that bears that interpretation. My emphasis was on the necessity for the most careful consideration and study. I realize that that may take some time. That is something that will depend upon the length of time that the committee is prepared to devote day by day to this measure.

The hon. member asked me if in my opinion it was possible for the committee at the present session to give to this measure that detailed study. I expressed my own opinion on the subject and stated that that opinion based on a study of the act was that it could be done. No one knows the duration of this session, but the time required by this bill depends to some extent on the committee itself. I said, and I think rightly, that this is a matter for a decision of the house. I was giving an opinion on the point in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mention has been made of the fact that the various civil service associations will wish to be heard. I am quite sure they will. The cabinet committee that was engaged on this subject heard representatives of the associations, and I am quite sure they will wish to be heard before the committee.

What I should like to appeal for is that hon. members suspend their judgment in this respect until they have seen the bill. They will certainly then be in a much better position to decide whether this bill is going to occupy as much time as some hon. gentlemen seemed to indicate this afternoon they thought it would require.

That is what I am appealing for on this subject now, that when hon. members consider the resolution has been sufficiently debated in the committee they allow the bill to be introduced. It is ready now and could be distributed at once. After hon. gentlemen have had an ample opportunity to study the bill—and they certainly will have an ample opportunity to do so—that will be the time, I think, to decide whether in the light of such estimates as we can make of the probable duration of the session and the willingness of the committee to apply itself industriously to the task that is proposed for it, it is then in the view of the house a measure that can be proceeded with at this session with the hope of its being disposed of at this session having regard to all the tasks of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the minister on whom I do not often heap any compliments is to be commended for an attitude which, I may say, if he adopted it more frequently would undoubtedly facilitate the procedure of the House of Commons a great deal. The minister's suggestion is so reasonable that I do not think any hon. member of the committee could take any real exception to it.

If indeed the amendments that the minister is going to propose in the bill he is going to lay before us are so slight, so unimportant and so lacking in fundamental character that they would really represent no great change there probably will be no need for a lengthy and detailed examination—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I meant to suggest that it would so commend itself I am sure to the judgment of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact there are many hon. members on both sides of the house whose judgment is rather slow to be exercised, and it is part of the essence of parliamentary government, instead of making hasty, snap decisions such as the Minister of Finance is so capable of doing, many of us like to have a good deal of time for reflection, particularly when we are dealing with matters as important as this one.

I think what the minister has said is a quite reasonable position to take, that we can look at this bill after it has been given first reading—and we shall have to look at it from several points of view, one of which I intend to say something about before I take my seat, —and when we have it, as the minister has assured us, we will have ample opportunity to consider it. Then I think there might be that consultation between my hon. friend from Laurier and the leader of the house, which from time to time does facilitate the proceedings, in the hope that we shall do what will be in the genuine interests of the public.

I agree entirely with the sentiments expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Carleton at the opening of his speech. Nothing could have been more admirable than the general sentiment expressed by the hon. gentleman that we should approach this matter in a non-partisan sprit. But I do hope that the house and the committee from now on will follow those precepts and not the example of the hon. member for Carleton who, having enunciated those lofty principles, proceeded to give a very thorough demonstration of how widely one can deviate from principles and still appear to be following them.

The hon. gentleman, of course, in talking about the ancestry of this legislation had something to say which, if I were to make a very poor pun I would say was somewhat a foreshortening of history because, as the hon. member for Carleton must know, with the erudition we all know he is so celebrated for, it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Dr. Adam Shortt who were really responsible for laying the foundations of the Civil Service Act. Mr. A. K. MacLean, when he introduced the motion in 1918, had this to say at page 699 of Hansard of April 12, 1918:

> A few moments ago I stated that I did not think the great advance proposed by the terms of the order in council in the civil service of this country could have been accomplished by the leader of the opposition,—

I have not done a great deal of research, and this is an inference. I take it this was an order in council that had been passed under the War Measures Act by the union government. He went on to say:

> —if he were in power as leader of the Liberal party,—

That would be Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

> —nor by the present prime minister—

That is Sir Robert Borden.

> —if he were in office as head of the Conservative party. I did not intend to detract—

I draw the hon. gentleman's attention particularly to this sentence:

> I did not intend to detract in the slightest from the credit due to the ministry led by my right hon. friend—

That is Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

> —the leader of the opposition for passing the Civil Service Act of 1908. On the contrary, I think that ministry is entitled to every possible credit for passing that act. It was a great reform.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that, just to set the record straight that ought to be on the record. I do not intend to go on and labour the point.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. gentleman familiar with the quotation from Mr. A. D. P. Heeney, his predecessor as clerk of the privy council, which says that the Civil Service Act of 1918 gave Canada the greatest measure of public service reform existing anywhere in the world?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, quite. I am also very familiar with the fact that Mr. A. K. MacLean never called himself a Conservative and that it was Mr. A. K. MacLean who introduced this legislation as a member of the union government. This does bring me to another aspect of this matter, and that is the motion which was introduced by Mr. MacLean. I think perhaps it might be worth while to put the terms of that motion on the record because I want to say something about the point that came up earlier today, Mr. Chairman, when you were not in the chair. The motion read:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to consolidate, revise and amend the Civil Service Act of Canada; and to provide that the salary of the chairman of the civil service commission shall be six thousand dollars per annum; and to make provision for the readjustment of grades and salaries in the various classes of the inside service, and for the preparation by the commission of schedules of the positions, duties and salaries of the outside service or of any portion or branch thereof; and to make appointments to the public service upon competitive examination and otherwise eliminate political patronage in the control and management of the said service.

I read that for this reason: That resolution bears a marked dissimilarity to the resolution which is now before the committee and I want particularly to draw your attention, sir, to the dissimilarity between that resolution and the resolution which is now before us.

Perhaps when I have the attention of the Chair I can continue with this point. The resolution in 1918 spelled out very specifically the charges upon the crown which were involved in this matter. It is a marked contrast, therefore, with the resolution which is now before us which says:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the civil service of Canada to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act, chapter 48 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952.

During the course of this debate, I made a very hasty examination of the act as it was recently consolidated and I could find nothing in the present act which appears to me to lay any charge upon the crown. Before the committee completes its consideration of this resolution the Minister of Finance should tell us what this resolution is really all about because the citation which was read this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition, which I think ought to be put on the record again, namely citation 277 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, is very clear. It reads:

> A bill, which does not involve a direct expenditure but merely confers upon the government a power for the exercise of which public money will have to be voted by parliament, is not a money bill and no resolution is necessary as a condition precedent to its introduction.

It has always been clearly understood that in these resolutions there is no harm in putting in much surplus verbiage, but the one thing that must be in the resolution is a precise statement of the charge which the crown is asking to be imposed. No bill can be introduced imposing a charge unless the preceding resolution which has been accepted by the house states precisely what that charge is. There is absolutely nothing in this resolution which states what is the charge upon the crown.

It is true that at one time up until a very few years ago the salaries of the civil service commissioners were set out in the act but that is no longer the case. They are now fixed by the governor in council. I believe hon. gentlemen who are on the treasury benches took exception to that legislation at the time it was passed and it may be that the minister in his bill is considering going back to the situation that prevailed before that amendment was made. But I would point out that if that is what he is doing he should have spelled it out in his resolution and that the bill cannot be considered by the house if it contains such a provision unless there has been a message from the crown to that effect.

Unless the government is deliberately anxious to prolong the session, one wonders why this resolution is on the order paper at all and being debated if there is no charge, and if there is a charge being imposed by the legislation why the government has not spelled it out in the resolution. It seems to me that mystery should be cleared up by the minister before we complete consideration of this matter.

I should also like to refer to an editorial which I will not attempt to read because I know the minister can read and also because I am afraid I would be provoking the minister into rising on another of his frequent points of order if I did so. But before the minister rises perhaps I may go the length of commending to his attention an editorial in the Ottawa Journal of Monday, June 20 which says: "Sane and balanced study of Civil Service Act is essential". I think that is what is required if we are going to take our duties in the house seriously in a matter which is as serious as anything that is likely to come before us, as the hon. member for Carleton so justly indicated earlier today.

The government of this country under modern conditions cannot possibly function without an effective, reliable, honest and in the main I would go so far as to say a contented civil service. We cannot expect to have that unless we have the kind of legislation which gives to them a status, working conditions and a reasonable security which they have enjoyed in the past and to which I think every hon. member feels they are and should be entitled. I do not think it would be reasonable to consider that we should start on the 106th day of the session to attempt to pass at this session an act of parliament of the importance and of the volume of this legislation. There are things, of course, that are of the utmost importance but also of the utmost brevity but this matter is important without being brief and it cannot be made brief in any respect whatsoever.

Without prejudging the case, because I think we should all accept what the minister has said and look at the bill before we reach a final judgment on the matter, I would feel that the weight of evidence should lead us to reach the judgment that we should not proceed until everyone who is interested, including all civil service organizations and many other persons and organizations who have nothing to do with the civil service but are deeply concerned about good administration and good government of the country, has had adequate time to study the legislation and to make such representations as they may wish to make in order that when we revise and codify the act once again we will have the best possible legislation that we can, by the application of all our talents in a non-partisan way, give to the Canadian people.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I would not pretend to emulate the righteous indignation expressed by the hon. member for Hull or the rolling, rollicking eloquence of the hon. member for Carleton, but I do want to take advantage of the latitude allowed at the resolution stage to deal particularly with one point that I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and the Prime Minister. Before doing so, may I say that we wholeheartedly concur in the criticism of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on two particular points. First of all, this is most important legislation that concerns the people of Canada, the government of Canada and the civil service of Canada upon which efficient government has to depend. We think it is most unfortunate that this important and lengthy legislation has been introduced in the house at this late date in the session. I do not see how it can be properly dealt with unless the house is willing to sit until toward the end of August.

Second, we agree with his criticism—I had already looked up the same reference that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned—that the resolution is very barren indeed of information and of details concerning what the proposed act is going to include. However, we will have to leave our discussion of the details until we see the bill.

Others in this group and other hon. members of the house have dealt with the questions of collective bargaining rights for civil servants, terms of employment, classifications, salaries and so on. However, I want to take this opportunity to deal with a particular problem that I think is of interest to people who are first of all interested in an efficient civil service and also in the rights of the civil servants. When one reads the history of developments in Great Britain, France and other European countries he sees that there is a changing climate and a changing opinion in that direction. In speaking of the civil service this evening there may be a tendency to assume that such organizations are of long duration and have a considerable history. As a matter of fact, in terms of history a civil service is a very recent innovation on the part of parliaments and governments.

I checked up quite hurriedly in the library and found that the first indication of concern for a civil service by the British government was around 1848 to 1850. It is interesting to note that a civil service in all countries began to develop with the advance of industrialism and, shall I say, the fading away of feudalism or the remnants of feudalism because an industrial society requires first of all a better functioning government and therefore a more efficient and better functioning civil service.

Of course, under feudalism and the remnants of feudalism most government appointments were the result of nepotism and, as one might say, by grace.

I found that the first study was around 1848 to 1850. Then there was the Trevelyan Northcote report of 1853 which dealt extensively with the question of establishing a civil service in Great Britain. It was on the basis of that report that in 1870 Gladstone, by order in council, introduced the first civil service legislation in Great Britain. Since that time, of course, there has been tremendous development in the civil service of that country. As a matter of fact, it is so efficient that it has been a model for all other countries.

Coming to Canada I find on checking the records that the first civil service act of a rather primitive nature was passed in 1882. Then there were amendments in 1883, 1884 and 1885 which, according to my rather quick checking of the records, concerned largely what was then known as the inside civil service. You might say it was the birth of the civil service in Canada. But the great step forward was in April of 1918. Without doubt, for the first time in Canadian history the civil service was put on a sound foundation so far as legislation was concerned.

It interested me, in just checking the history of the past, to notice the recurrence of human weakness. I do not blame any party. This conception of to the victor belongs the spoils is a very human one. I can well understand that when a party has been out of power for 22 years it must have a considerable percentage of supporters who think it is their turn. Life is a rather short affair, and when you have not had a dip into the basket in 22 years you get a bit hungry. I am quite sure this government has had to resist a great deal in that respect because this is a very human weakness. The more civilized people become, the more they recognize what democracy really means, the more they are able to resist.

I was very interested in noting that in the debates of 1918, shortly after the union government was elected, there were still members of the Conservative party who, according to their correspondence, supported the idea of patronage. I should like to quote from Hansard for April 12, 1918, page 711, on which page a letter is to be found which reads as follows:

> Dear Sir,
> Yours of the 9th instant duly received. As far as any patronage in connection with the railway department is concerned, there is not the slightest doubt but that both Liberals and Conservatives who supported the Union government will receive every consideration.

In fairness I must say that at the same time and in the same debate there is evidence that members of the same party had taken the very opposite point of view. I mention that to indicate that this is a human weakness which is found in all parties and because it is human, it is natural, we have to resist it.

When I was reading that I was reminded of a story. My father, who was president of the Liberal association of that day in the riding from which I come, actually supported the Union government. This was the only time he ever supported a hybrid thing in his life, and he did so on account of the war effort. I remember running through some correspondence in 1917 when this Conservative government was proposing these amendments to this Civil Service Act, and there was still this spirit of patronage. There was a Conservative association in our riding. This shows how a division can occur even within a party.

The president of the association was a strong patronage man and the secretary treasurer was an anti-patronage man. The secretary was pressing the association to support what the government intended to do, and so there was a clash. The president wrote to the minister of the day who was directly connected with British Columbia and told him about the difficulty he was having with the secretary. In fact, the president mentioned that the secretary thought he was living in England where you could run a government without patronage. The complaint was very bitter. The person to whom he was writing was not in sympathy with his ideas. This is what he wrote back. He said, My dear Mr. So-and-So: I fully appreciate your criticism of Mr. So-and-So, the secretary, but we are going to have an election within a few months and we do not want any trouble in the party.

To give you an idea that this man was very much against the whole idea, I may say he simply wrote, so far as I am concerned, we do not want any trouble within the party, so my advice to you is to continue to scratch his back until the election is over and then after that you have my permission to tell him to go to hell. This patronage condition within parties is something about which we all have to be watchful, no matter to what party you belong.

I want to deal now particularly with a point I raised, and bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. I refer to the question of the rights of civil servants, that is to have the full rights of citizenship. As I said before, this concerns thinking people. It has been mentioned before today. It is a matter of concern to those who desire the maintenance of an efficient civil service and who, at the same time, want to see those civil servants given their full rights as citizens of the country. I want to bring to the Prime Minister's attention a book written by H. J. Laski entitled, "Reflections on the Constitution, the House of Commons, the Cabinet, the Civil Service", published by the Manchester University press. We all know Mr. Harold Laski as a Labour member of parliament and a very brilliant person.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He was never a member of parliament.

Mr. Herridge: Excuse me, a lecturer at the London school of economics and chairman of the Labour party. I do not know why I made that slip. His writings are even read by Conservatives in England because he had a brilliant mind and was an authority on the constitution and parliamentary practices. I want to read a few paragraphs from this book because I believe that every thinking person who has given any thought to this problem—it is not an easy problem—will recognize that he does bring forward some very valid ideas. I think this is something to which consideration should be given. This chapter is headed, "The political rights and social interests of civil servants", and he says:

> I turn to a very different issue—now a matter of acute controversy—on which I think far more clear and frank thought is necessary than it has thus far received—I mean the degree to which we ought to place restrictions on the political rights of civil servants.

Then farther down he says:

> Above all, I believe it is a great mistake to separate the vast majority of officials from work in local government where, very often, their experience of administration would enable them to make an important contribution to the standards of administration. I do not believe that the public would lose confidence in the detachment and loyalty of civil servants if, under agreed conventions, they were given the chance of exercising the rights of a citizen.

Then he goes on to say:

> In the French system, a great many civil servants, of whom, perhaps the best known among those living is that eminent humanist, Mr. Leon Blum, have played their part in politics without any deterioration in their work; and I have known scores of lesser cases in which the official's political affiliation was both active and known without producing the conviction that he would not be loyal to a minister whose convictions were of a different school.

I realize that when you get that type of relationship you have to have very high principles and devoted persons on both sides of the question.

> Let me begin by saying that officials do not need a special party connection in order to make their views obvious.

Then he goes on at some length and says:

Perhaps I may summarize this by saying that when an official had strong political opinions, he could not conceal them from any but the most stupid of ministers for more than the first hour of their relationship; and the real question was, and is, granted those convictions, was he capable of looking at the minister's views with detachment, and of helping him to apply them with the full energy of his mind. The answer is, sometimes yes, and sometimes no. Sir Austen Chamberlain, in his autobiography, tells an admirable story of the permanent secretary of the post office when he was postmaster general.

I am sorry to see that the Postmaster General has just gone out, but I am sure his parliamentary secretary will listen to this.

They quarrelled violently over a decision Sir Austen proposed to make until at last he told his official that he had made up his mind that the decision stood. Thereupon, Sir Austen tells us, his permanent secretary said, "Well, Postmoster General, if you want to make a damn fool of yourself, I cannot prevent you from doing so. But at least I can show you how to do it with the least possible damage to the country."

Now there was a first class civil servant. I hope the minister's civil servants take the same attitude when required.

That is what I mean by loyalty and detachment, and I think they are qualities quite distinct from political convictions and party preference.

Farther down, he says:

First, it is clear that all members of the administrative class should impose upon themselves a self-denying ordinance in the political sphere.

I agree with that.

They ought to resign if they want to be candidates for parliament. They ought not to make political speeches. They ought not to write books or articles on the immediate issues of political controversy. They are too near the centre of power to do any of these things.

Then he goes on to say:

But below the administrative class, I do not think that rule should apply. It is enough if an official in the executive, or clerical class, give an undertaking, whether he becomes a parliamentary candidate or takes an active interest in his party, not to discuss in public the affairs of the department to which he belongs, nor to reveal information which he obtains by virtue of his position in the service; if he were to break his undertaking the permanent secretary would be justified in recommending disciplinary action, though I should hope that, before the permanent secretary made his proposal to the minister, he would discuss it with the departmental Whitley council and proceed, if possible, with its approval. I should give officials who became parliamentary candidates leave, with pay, for the period of their election. If they were defeated, they would return to the department in the ordinary way. If they were elected, I should put them on a special list the officials on which would be free to return to the department if they were defeated in the next election in their old grade, and with any increments of pay which had normally accrued to them; if, however, they were returned for a second parliament, I should assume that this operated as a normal resignation from the service, though I should hope that they would receive a due proportion of the pension rights they would have received on retirement. I frankly see no difficulty in this. I do not really think such a candidature would embarrass the department. And if it is a question of practical activity other than that of a candidate, I feel pretty certain that no Manchester constituency would be seriously concerned about the fairness of civil servants if, let us say, a woman shorthand typist in the area office of the ministry of health made a swinging attack in the exchange division at a Tory meeting on the folly of Mr. Strachey's ground-nuts scheme, or a clerical officer in the office of the local inspector of taxes spoke with some heat about the refusal of the Home Secretary to ban the Fascist party. Assuming that the average civil servant observes the normal decencies of political behaviour, I am unable to believe that the liberation of the grades below the administrative would shock any public opinion or do any harm to the work of these departments.

He goes on at some considerable length, and then towards the end of his remarks he has this to say:

There are two related questions upon which I should like to say a word. I hope we shall rapidly end the system which prohibits the civil servant from writing upon politics and public administration save by the permission of the department. Here again my view is that there should be the right to freedom limited only by some obvious conventions which could easily be agreed through discussions in the Whitley organisation at national and departmental levels. I do not think that an official of the Foreign Office should attack his minister—

And so on. Anyway, he goes on to deal with the argument that, under proper central arrangements and under proper legislation, with a civil service of high standard it should be possible for civil servants below the administrative class to be allowed leave to take an active part in politics without losing their rights in the civil service until after, say, the second election.

I have mentioned these few quotations. I bring this book to the attention of the Prime Minister and the minister because he has given great thought to this matter. There has been discussion in the House of Commons in Great Britain. It has been given serious consideration and considerable attention. Mind you, as I have mentioned previously, the standards with respect to the treatment by ministers of the senior officials is very high indeed and is a model to the world. But in fairness to the civil service I think we should give some consideration to this question. To that end I urge the government of the day to consider this important question.

I frankly admit it is not a simple or an easy one. However, it is important to the people of Canada as a whole who are interested in an efficiently functioning civil service. It is important to the government that needs the continuing support of a first class civil service. It is also extremely important to the civil servants of Canada who are citizens of this country.

I trust the government and the committee will also give consideration to the other suggestions brought to the attention of the committee by various hon. members who have spoken in this debate this afternoon.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the resolution carries, perhaps the minister would say a word about the point I raised in connection with the resolution.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the desire of all hon. members is to see this bill as soon as possible. The hon. member is raising something that he sought to raise on a point of order this afternoon. Frankly, there is no proper foundation. Hon. members know these resolutions are drafted by the most skilled and experienced person in Canada on these matters, namely the law officer of the House of Commons.

Mr. Benidickson: In tonight's edition of the Ottawa Citizen we have all read an article that, I am sure, interests us all. It says that the Prime Minister has replied to certain communications from the postal employees and it says that the letter is in answer to one sent to the Prime Minister on June 11 by the Canadian postal employees association. It indicates that this association had not much prior to this time sent representations to the civil service commission or to the Prime Minister. This is contrary to the type of representations that we have received during the last six months. I wonder whether the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance would indicate whether or not they have steadily received representations from the Canadian postal employees association for increases in salary and why the civil service commission has not, as the Prime Minister has indicated in his reply, reported up to date on this matter. It was my understanding that the Minister of Finance had referred to this trade category as one that desired a very early consideration.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-77, respecting the civil service of Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As Your Honour will observe, the resolution on which the bill is to be founded, contains only the barest citation of the fact that the bill proposes to consolidate or revise the Civil Service Act. As Your Honour well knows, the purpose of a resolution preceding a bill is to indicate clearly to the house the charge laid upon the exchequer by a money bill. As Your Honour is well aware, citation 277 of Beauchesne's fourth edition reads as follows:

> 277. (2) A bill, which does not involve a direct expenditure but merely confers upon the government a power for the exercise of which public money will have to be voted by parliament, is not a money bill and no resolution is necessary as a condition precedent to its introduction.
> (3) A bill designed to furnish machinery for the expenditure of a certain sum of public money to be voted subsequently by parliament may be introduced in the house without the recommendation of the crown and without a resolution being first considered in committee.

Mr. Speaker: What is the number of the citation?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is citation 277, to be found at page 226. It seems to me—and I do not intend to labour this point at all—in view of the fact that the resolution gives no indication of any kind as to what is the charge that is being laid on the exchequer by the proposed bill that before we consent to the introduction of the bill, the bill should be examined to see whether or not it imposes a charge or seeks to impose a charge about which the house has not been apprised by a message from the crown.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is raising a point of order. In my submission to you this point of order is raised much too late. This afternoon the house by decision resolved itself into committee on this self-same resolution. That was a decision of the house. If any hon. member considered at that time that there was anything lacking in the resolution, that was the time to raise it. No such point was raised at the time. Hon. members are aware that such a motion is not debatable but it can be voted on; and if there is anything out of order about it a point can be taken, but it must be taken at the proper time. It is much too late now to be raising a point of this kind after the house has already resolved itself into committee on the resolution and the resolution has been reported back in pursuance of the instructions of the house. So I say in the first place that this point is raised much too late.

In the second place the hon. member is questioning whether this resolution is sufficient. He sought to raise the point this afternoon that the resolution did not go far enough, that it should have spelled out some provisions of the intended bill, or their effect, in greater detail. I do not think he can have it both ways.

It has been ruled, and I think it must be a matter of common knowledge in the house now, that the reason we have these resolutions involving charges or expenditure of money is that the house shall have notice of the purpose of the measure. There have been statements and rulings to that effect. It is not necessary that the proposed charge be spelled out in specific terms. The hon. member before the committee rose sought to go back and raise these subjects again, or at least discuss them, although the point had been disposed of this afternoon.

I say in the first place, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members are aware that these resolutions preceding so-called money bills are drawn by the most experienced authority on this subject in Canada; they are drawn by the law officer of the House of Commons. When the law officer of the House of Commons draws a resolution I think hon. members are entitled to prefer his opinion as to the necessity of such a resolution and as to the sufficiency of the resolution which he draws over the opinion of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). However, I suppose there is no harm in his trying.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the house has had resolutions in comparable form on previous occasions and they have been ruled to be quite sufficient. There is a decision made in this house, for example, on March 24, 1882. On that occasion Mr. McLelan—

Mr. Chevrier: It is out of date.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it is not out of date; it is the hon. member opposite who is out of date if he has not been following this. Mr. Speaker, so that you will realize that the matter was discussed fully from all of the angles, I would like to read the content of Hansard, commencing at page 546 for March 24, 1882, in relation to the argument that was then put forward. I quote:

Mr. McLelan moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the following resolution:—

"That it is expedient further to amend and consolidate as amended, the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 65, and the acts amending it, respecting the inspection of steamboats, and for the greater safety of passengers by them."

Sir Albert J. Smith: The resolution does not indicate at all the change which the hon. gentleman contemplates. It is defective in that respect and I think he ought to explain it.

Does this not remind you of the words of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate? I continue:

Mr. McLelan: The object of the bill is to consolidate the various amendments made by the Inspection Act, and to provide more fully for the inspection of the hulls of ships. The inspectors of steamboats are men mainly qualified to inspect boilers and machinery. It is proposed to appoint men specially qualified to inspect the hulls of vessels, and the certificates of both classes of inspectors will be necessary for a ship to be pronounced seaworthy. Regulations are also made to fix the number of passengers which each boat shall be allowed to carry. These are the two main features of the bill.

Then Mr. Mackenzie, the former prime minister, went on to say:

The rules require that, on any bill relating to trade or to alter the laws concerning trade, being brought into the house, the proposition must first be submitted in committee of the whole. This is a simple notice of the minister's intention to bring in some amendments, and I object to it as being entirely out of order.

Mr. McLelan: The only change proposed to be made is to consolidate the law, and to define clearly the mode of appointment and qualifications of the inspectors.

Mr. Blake.

And here is the great constitutional authority speaking.

Of course it is more than a consolidation, because the resolution tells us that "it is expedient further to amend and consolidate as amended," the various acts. The objection of the hon. member for Lambton is that the whole purpose of the rule, which is to give the house an opportunity to make any suggestions they wish, is entirely thwarted, unless in some sort the substance, the essence, of the proposed legislation is stated in the resolution upon which the house goes into committee. That is the difficulty—how are we to know that it is expedient to alter anything unless we know what the alteration is?

Sir John A. Macdonald: The house can pass a resolution, no matter how vague in its terms, declaring that it is expedient to amend the act. The house can ask for a most specific statement unless it is fully satisfied with that made.

Mr. Mackenzie. I do not think it is open to the house to adopt that course. It laid down very clearly that no bill is to be brought in until the proposition has been first considered in committee of the whole. I ask the right hon. gentleman if he will state from the paper what the statement is.

Sir John A. Macdonald. That it is expedient to amend and consolidate the acts. A clearer or more specific statement could not be made.

Mr. Blake. What is to be considered is the proposition contained in the bill. It is not sufficient that the act shall be amended, but it shall be amended in some particular way, and it is that proposition that shall be submitted to the committee.

Mr. Speaker decided that the rule, as generally understood and interpreted by late English practice, simply required the house to go into committee to consider a general proposition setting forth the expediency of bringing in a measure on a particular question; and that consequently in his opinion the proposed motion came sufficiently within the meaning of the rule.

Motion agreed to; and house resolved itself into committee.

Mr. Speaker, you will observe there that the objection was taken before the house resolved itself into committee on the resolution and the Speaker, having heard a very full argument from some of the leading figures in Canadian parliamentary history, ruled that the resolution had given sufficient notice and was sufficient in its terms and that the resolution was in order.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) undertook to suggest, that this was out of date. Well, May 11, 1925 is a more recent date and here I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to Hansard where there was a discussion on a similar point. As reported on page 3038 of Hansard a point was raised that the resolution did not give sufficient particularity to indicate what were the specific charges that the measure was to lay upon the crown. The significant thing here, as you will see on reference to page 3038, is that the chairman in making his ruling reviewed this very decision and quoted the argument I have just read from Hansard of 1882.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. minister tell us what was the resolution in 1925?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend and consolidate the Canada Grain Act, chapter 27 of the statutes of 1912, and amending acts, and to make further provisions in respect to the handling and marketing of grain, or incident to the buying, selling and transportation of grain; the grading and weighing of grain; the handling of grain in and out by country elevators and at country points and inspection of such elevators; the operation, management and control of terminal, public and private elevators; the storing, cleaning and binning of grain; the mixing of grain and the disposition of screenings.

The very same point was raised and Mr. Lapointe, and I trust the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is not going to challenge the authority of Mr. Lapointe—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, but I will challenge your interpretation of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): After the chairman had quoted at great length from the Hansard of 1882 and had said that he ruled the motion in order having regard to the decision of the speaker in 1882, Mr. Lapointe said further, as reported at page 3038 of Hansard of May 11, 1925:

In support of your ruling, Mr. Chairman, may I quote a precedent? On the 11th March, 1914, a resolution was moved reading as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to consolidate and amend the Canada Shipping Act and the acts in amendment thereof and various laws relating to merchant shipping.

That was under the government of which my right hon. friend was a specially distinguished member.

That one was ruled to be in order. I hope the hon. member for Essex East has not reached the point now of challenging the things said in this house by the late Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am challenging the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here is what William Lyon Mackenzie King had to say in this house on March 24, 1936, as found at page 1385 of Hansard of that year, during the course of a similar discussion:

The resolution is essential as a preliminary notice to the house that public expenditure is involved; it so to speak, gives double notice of what is of significance in that respect. The rules of the house never contemplated that, on the resolution preceding a bill, all particulars of the bill itself should be discussed or should be the subject matter of a general debate. The present administration feels that it will not only facilitate the business of the House of Commons but will effect a greater dispatch of public business if when presenting resolutions the explanation is limited to essentials.

This afternoon I made a statement reviewing the background of the present measure and outlining the leading features of the measure according to the practice of the house. The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the civil service of Canada to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act, chapter 48 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952.

The house was put on ample notice of the proposed measure related to the civil service of Canada and that it was a measure to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act. All hon. members of the house have access to that act and can see the detailed provisions that it contains and realize that there are some of them which have the effect of creating certain charges on the crown. This resolution gives the house notice that the bill to follow this resolution is one to amend, revise and consolidate that act.

I dealt with the various aspects of this resolution and have made the house well acquainted, I think, with the leading features of the bill as far as it is proper to deal with those on the resolution stage and the house is aware of those in which any question of charge on the crown is affected.

This is my concluding observation, Mr. Speaker. In a situation like this if there is any doubt in the mind of the government as to whether a charge is or is not involved then we in obedience to the authority of the House of Commons are bound to err if at all on the side of bringing in a resolution so that there may be no question whatsoever of abridging the rights of the house or its opportunity to have full and ample discussion.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, we have had a long dissertation from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Very informative.

Mr. Chevrier: —on the procedure and on the motion which was raised in the course of the debate this afternoon. Perhaps Your Honour would allow me to say that at one stage after the minister had outlined the resolution and made it quite clear that there was no question of expenditure in this resolution the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) proceeded to discuss the question of pay and other allowances affecting the civil service of Canada and was immediately stopped by the chairman of the committee.

It was then in answer to two questions put by myself that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) made it quite clear that this measure did not involve the expenditure of any money. For the first time, then, at that stage of the resolution we were told that this matter did not involve the expenditure of any money although during the course of the explanation he made of the resolution the Minister of Finance indicated that there would be certainly a discussion of the right to pay and salaries. Knowing for the first time then that it did involve the expenditure of money we raised the point. I moved a motion that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day but that was voted down. This was the only opportunity with Your Honour in the chair when it was possible for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to raise the matter again. I believe the minister this evening has repeated exactly what he said this afternoon. If it is true as the minister has said to me that there is no expenditure involved in this resolution—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I never said any such thing, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, you did.

An hon. Member: He never did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I never made any such statement.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know who said, "He never did," but I have read my Hansard and I know what the minister said. I put two questions to him. One of the answers I received was that there was no expenditure involved in this measure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, that is not complete or correct in any way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a complete and correct statement of what the minister said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I said no such thing.

Mr. Chevrier: If that is so there should be no resolution at all and we should be dealing with second reading of the bill. I repeat, if I may, subparagraph 2 of citation No. 277 of Beauchesne which is up to date and does not deal with a matter that transpired in 1882. The citation reads as follows:

277. (2) A bill, which does not involve a direct expenditure but merely confers upon the government a power for the exercise of which public money will have to be voted by parliament, is not a money bill and no resolution is necessary as a condition precedent to its introduction.

With Your Honour in the chair I submit with deference we have the right at this stage to present the point as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has done.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if you would permit a very brief argument on one point raised—

Mr. Speaker: I will permit the argument. Perhaps I had better hear the hon. member before commenting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, if as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) this afternoon no expenditure is involved I believe there is then no point of order. I do not question the right of the government to introduce an unnecessary resolution at all. I think it is silly but I do not question the government's right to do so. If, on the other hand, as the minister now seems to contend this evening there is a charge imposed by this bill then I say that the resolution was insufficient because the resolution does not tell us what is the charge.

As I say, if there is no charge I do not think there is any merit in my point of order because while I think it is silly to have introduced the resolution the government has a right to do so; but if there is a charge we have a right to know what it is.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Just plain pettifoggery.

Mr. Speaker: May I review the procedure which brings us up to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). Earlier in the day the house accepted a motion to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the resolution in question:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the civil service of Canada to amend, revise and consolidate the Civil Service Act, chapter 48 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952.

That resolution was then considered by the committee of the whole and it has been reported to the house. The report, by vote of the house, has now been received. Then the motion that the resolution be concurred in was accepted. What followed was a motion by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) for leave to present a bill based on the said resolution. At that point the resolution has been accepted by the house in committee and reported. It has been adopted and the matter before the house is whether the minister shall have leave to introduce a bill based on the said resolution.

As I understood the argument of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the bill should be looked at before the house gives leave to its introduction. I personally do not see how that could be done. The house does not accept the bill by allowing it to be introduced. If any exception is to be taken to the contents of the bill as not being in accordance with the resolution, then it seems to me that exception must be taken after the bill has been introduced and when it is under consideration. Therefore, I fail to see how the point of order is properly taken at this time. It seems to me that the motion must be accepted or rejected.

When the bill is introduced, if it appears that the other matters which have been debated are relevant and there has been an insufficiency of resolution to support the bill, that point may be taken, of course, on any particular section of the bill which seems to go beyond the resolution improperly and it could be objected to on that ground.

The other point that was made that if this is not a money bill no resolution was needed may be so, but I do not know of any authority to say that if it is not a money bill the fact that there has been a resolution is irregular. It is unnecessary perhaps, but there is no irregularity. I am afraid I cannot give effect to the point of order which was raised, certainly at this time, and I must proceed with the motion which is before the house.

The Minister of Finance, seconded by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) has moved for leave to present a bill based on the said resolution. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-68, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has rather condemned this bill for perhaps inadequate discussion when on budget night, March 31, in his remarks he indicated that we were more or less, in so far as tax matters were concerned, in a considerable state of status quo, unusually so, sir, I say. The Minister of Finance, as reported at page 2685 of Hansard of March 31, 1960, to indicate this element of status quo, had this to say after a long speech, which the minister is always noted for. He said:

> The net effect of all the amendments I am proposing to our taxing statutes will be to make no measurable change ... for 1960-61.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, if the hon. member is going to quote me I suggest he quote me correctly. He just omitted about seven words. I said:

> —to make no measurable change in the estimate of total revenues for 1960-61, which I presented to the house earlier this evening.

Mr. Benidickson: I will accept that and I will go on, Mr. Speaker. I was just saving time because the minister is so keen always to get up and say that we should save time here, and that was my intent.

Mr. Chevrier: He takes much more time than anyone else.

Mr. Benidickson: He takes much more time, as the hon. member for Laurier said, in introducing petty points of order that delay procedure, than anyone else in the house, which is contrary to the procedure which he followed when he was on this side of the house. However, I go on with the quotation:

> The amount of tax relief—

This will be interesting to all hon. members.

> The amount of tax relief accorded by some amendments will be approximately balanced by the increased revenues from others. The total loss of revenue from the relieving amendments could add up to as much as—

What, is anybody's guess. I quote from the Minister of Finance:

> —$2 million—

This is how important the budget propositions of the Minister of Finance were this year. Then, he went on to say:

> —and the increased revenues from blocked loopholes and clarified definitions are likely to be of about the same amount.

In other words, he was presenting a balance in so far as legislative changes were concerned which would come before this committee and this legislature. Yet, that, of course, is not entirely the picture. He was very quiet this year, but he took an awful bite last year. Last year he increased the taxes on the Canadian people, as estimated by himself, and that should be a favourable estimate, to the extent of $352 million. If we have a quiet time this year, it means that the same people are going to pay the same $352 million this year. This, of course, compares—

Mr. Pallett: What about before June 10, 1957?

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett) refers to the promises that were given. Actually, I was not proposing to refer to those but I have some notes on them. I think the whip of the Conservative party will regret this.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He always interrupts, anyway.

Mr. Benidickson: He has interrupted. Because of that I think I have the right to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this present government when asking for power suggested that when a bill would come before us—and this is not the first time, not the second time, but the third time—at some time we would get some of the promised things in an income tax bill. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was responsible for and was leading the party when he appealed, as the hon. member for Peel says, in the election of 1957, for votes. He got a lot of votes by saying that tax changes to put Canadian companies on a basis of equality with foreign corporations or their subsidiaries operating in Canada should become part of our tax laws. Do we find that in the bill before us today? No.

The member for Peel has prompted me to say also that the same individual, now our Prime Minister, in his opening campaign speech in Massey hall, Toronto, in April, 1957, said that less discriminatory methods of taxing Canadian oil companies should be introduced into our income tax laws.

There was a suggestion that there should be a change in the income tax law to encourage Canadians to acquire a greater equity in Canadian enterprises, but we find nothing of that kind in the bill before us. I have referred several times this session to the possibility that the committee on mines, forests and waters should do something about the well known desire of its chairman to have Canadian research specially recognized for exemption so far as income taxation is concerned. Let me tell the whip of the Conservative party very frankly that I had this here but I had not intended to rub his nose into it particularly.

I intended to say that the effects of this legislation on the balance of ways and means were so slender this year that we were just having a repetition of another impost, a new impost of $350 million the same as imposed in the budget of 1959. I was prepared to say that before taking my seat and examining the particular clauses of the bill before us.

Mr. Pallett: The hon. member does not question that taxes are still lower than they were before June 10, 1957?

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member has again stuck out his nose. I have certain figures here which I had not intended to use.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The whip had better stay quiet. He is only embarrassing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Benidickson: He is embarrassing the Minister of Finance considerably because having regard to the constituents in his riding I think he would be one of the first to recognize that the latest available statistics we as members of parliament have—

Mr. Starr: Whose statistics?

Mr. Benidickson: —are found in the report of the Department of National Revenue, taxation division, for 1959. This report analyses in great detail the various categories of people paying taxes, and I am referring to those in the low tax-paying bracket. According to this green book of the Department of National Revenue, may I tell the hon. member for Peel that the total number of people in this country paying income tax is 4,076,465. I want him to go to his constituents and compare the present tax rates, including the new impost for old age security, with those that prevailed before this government came into office. I want him to relate that to the fact that in the $4,000 to $5,000 income group there are 573,000 taxpayers and in the $3,000 to $4,000 income group there are approximately 1,015,000 taxpayers. I calculate that the latter group represent about 25 per cent of the total number of taxpayers in the country.

If the hon. member for Peel will look at the statistics and take account of the increase in the old age security tax compared with the 1957 old age security tax and the ordinary tax on income, he will find he was very inopportune in introducing that subject at this time.

Mr. Pallett: You had better check Hansard.

Mr. Starr: You had better go back and tell that to your own people.

Mr. Benidickson: The labourers of this country who contribute their share to the unemployment insurance fund had a new tax bite of $75 million imposed on them last year by this new government. I think the whip of the Conservative party is perhaps not too thoughtful when he makes interjections of this kind because I was very considerate of the Minister of Finance at the resolution stage prior to the introduction of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act. I said to him then—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Page?

Mr. Benidickson: —that I thought he had introduced a procedure that I should commend. He introduced his proposed budget changes on March 31 and on May 6 he saw fit to inform the public and ourselves that he had had some second thoughts. I said that his predecessors had had second thoughts after introducing budget proposals but that the minister had decided to put his amendments in the form of an appendix to Votes and Proceedings. The minister rather glowed when I said that this was a novel and nice thing to do but I am afraid the Minister of Finance has reverted to his shell that is so typical of him and is again giving notice at the last possible minute. He took the last available opportunity to inform us of the amendments that he is going to propose to the legislation tonight. On Friday night he gave notice of certain changes affecting the bill now before us.

If there is any substance to the amendments that the minister is proposing why did he delay giving notice of them from March 31? He forgot about them on May 6 when I commended him for taking the house and the country into his confidence. Why did he only give notice last Friday of his change of mind with respect to these matters? I want to remind the minister that this particular bill was called on June 9, I think.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Benidickson: If there is any merit to these amendments, why did he not introduce them long ago? In all my experience in the house I have never known the minister to give such short notice as he gave us today, not on this bill, I admit, but with respect to a report he received last August. This is typical of the minister. Last August he received a report in connection with the deficit in the superannuation fund and he brought it before the house this morning at eleven o'clock when the matter was coming up today.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there must be some limit to the strayings of the hon. member. He is now talking about something that was dealt with earlier in the day and has nothing to do with this matter. Can the hon. member stick to the bill for a little while?

Mr. Benidickson: I think that in this case the Minister of Finance at long last has a valid point of order. I have opposed him for some three years and in all that time he has never advanced a point of order that was not entirely out of line with the leniency that was always extended to him when he sat on this side of the house and was a very superior, capable and active critic of budget resolutions.

I want to say that in examining this bill we must recognize that if we approve the rates and schedules that are involved—forgetting all about what the former government did—as the minister himself said in his budget speech of March 31, the program for 1959-60 it is estimated will take in personal income taxes $1,555 million and corporation income taxes, $1,140 million for a total of $2,695 million. The minister's forecast is that under this bill he will for next year raise in personal income taxes $1,750 million, under corporation income taxes, $1,340 million, for a total of $3,090 million, which represents an increase of $400 million of taxes over what was taken from the Canadian people under the present administration, and not even related to the previous administration, which administration was so severely condemned by the minister who is facing me at the present time and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

This is the type of thing upon which the government of this country got elected. I have a quotation here from the Windsor Daily Star of May 10, 1957.

Mr. Pearkes: Who got elected on that?

Mr. Benidickson: You tried to get elected on that. This is what the Prime Minister said, referring to the previous administration:

> They have refused to reduce the awful load of income taxation which bears down on all. They have refused to take adequate action for the old age pensioners—

And so on.

> They have done this because—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benidickson: Look at all these backbenchers who are applauding, and who got elected on the grounds that they were going to reduce income taxes. This is what the Prime Minister said in Windsor, in 1957:

> They have done this because an all powerful party ruling . . .

Right now, are we going to pass legislation that involves taking from the Canadian people in income tax a greater intake by about a billion dollars than was taken by the previous administration? Are we going to do that solely because there is not sufficient criticism in this house from that large mass of supporters of the Minister of Finance in connection with a proposal such as he has in the bill that is presented to us? We have nothing in this bill, that compares with the propositions that were presented in 1957 or 1958 to the Canadian electorate. I think the Minister of Finance should, in these various instances, indicate to us why he comes before us without introducing into this bill the items which in 1956 and 1957, when he was the financial critic, he said were essential to the economy of this country.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to assure the minister immediately that any efforts contained in the bill to plug what he chose to call "loopholes" are going to receive our endorsement. I regret that the minister has not deemed it advisable to include in the bill now before us the plugging of a lot more loopholes that exist in the present act. I would have liked to have noted that he had taken a long look at existing allowances for depreciation and depletion, and that he had curtailed greatly these allowances. I believe that the restrictions in our existing Income Tax Act are such that even the president of the Canadian stock exchange underlines the great allowances permitted to Canadian corporations for reinvestment purposes by reason of the fact they are able to obtain these funds from the depreciation and depletion allowances permitted them under the existing Income Tax Act. I believe this is a loophole that the minister might well have plugged, since these allowances amount to about $3 billion per year and, in the opinion of many investment people in Canada, the rates are excessive and, in themselves, harmful to the Canadian economy.

I had hoped also that the minister would have plugged the loopholes a little more thoroughly in regard to the very lavish expense allowances being permitted to executives of corporations doing business in Canada. A number of cases are on record where these extraordinary concessions allowed business executives amount to much more than the wages of those executives. There was one famous case before the Exchequer Court of Canada for decision in which the severance pay demanded by a certain oil company executive amounted to no less than a million dollars. He was granted that amount for relinquishing his position with one company and moving over to another company. I was glad to note that the Exchequer Court of Canada decided that here was a loophole that ought to be plugged, and they did plug it in that particular instance.

Another loophole which, in our opinion, is in urgent need of plugging is the obtaining of money when capital gains are made which are not included as income. The minister, in looking for loopholes to be plugged, has not realized that a change in the definition of what is regarded as income for taxation purposes to include capital gains would have yielded him a lot more revenue than even he anticipates at this time.

I would hope also that, if not this year maybe next year, the government will give very earnest consideration, when amendments are again brought before this house in regard to the Income Tax Act, to putting corporations on the same basis as they now put individuals, and that the income tax payable by corporations would be on a graduated basis rather than on a flat basis. If this government is concerned about the growth of big business, if this government is anxious to help the small, independent business survive and prosper, if the proposed graduated income tax is right when it is applied to individuals, then I have yet to hear one argument that the graduated income tax ought not to be applicable to Canadian corporations. I believe many of the evils of our economic society would be overcome if we were to make the same law in regard to graduated income tax applicable to Canadian corporations as is applicable now to individuals. Much other legislation would then be unnecessary because of the evils that would have been overcome by this new imposition of a graduated income tax under the existing Income Tax Act.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to draw the attention of the minister to what I hope he might consider to be an omission which perhaps could be remedied. We have always expressed great concern, as we have done recently, for the education of the youth of our country at the universities and we have taken steps in that direction. However, because of the continued increase in the cost of school fees and in the cost of instruments—and certainly I could quote, for example, at medical schools the question of the purchase of microscopes and extremely costly books—I wonder whether the minister and the government would not consider allowing as an exemption from income tax the payment of school fees to universities and other institutions of higher education. That action would encourage attendance at the universities and would facilitate more opportunities for education. Where a father, an uncle or a relative pays the school fees for a child at a university I think it is a service to the country to encourage that generosity and to make such action possible. It would be an encouragement if these school fees and the cost of instruments and books were to be exempt from income tax.

Let me quote an illustration. Certainly there are wealthy relatives who would be pleased to pay for the education of a nephew or a niece or to pay the school fees, and they would do it gladly if they could be encouraged by having these school fees and these payments or advances made exempt from income tax. The same thing would apply even to corporations. If a corporation knew that any scholarships for which they paid would be exempt from income tax, notwithstanding their munificence and contributions for that purpose, I think there would be more encouragement. I regard it as being a real service to the country for the government to do everything possible to make education at the universities or higher education increasingly possible.

I feel that thought in that direction by the government would be welcome throughout the country and certainly would assist education. I bespeak this aid for these young men and women who find it difficult to pay the increasing cost of school fees, whose parents of modest means cannot afford to pay for their education, but who could easily obtain assistance from corporations or perhaps from relatives of more comfortable means to pay for this education. Provision for that exemption, I suggest to the minister, would be a constructive piece of legislation to incorporate into our Income Tax Act, namely of all school fees of universities or other institutions of higher education. I am speaking of related seminaries or, if there are such things, technical schools that are considered to be on a higher level of education. By doing that I think the government would be enacting a popular piece of legislation. Not only would it be popular with the taxpayers but it would be in conformity with our genuine desire and urge for university education in Canada.

I make that as a suggestion to the minister. I do not see provision for it in this bill. I am wondering whether, between now and the time we reach clause by clause study of the bill, he will consider the introduction of such an amendment so that we might get into this act one section that would be more popular perhaps than are many of the sections that are now in the bill.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) was not any clearer this evening than usual. However, he somehow said that taxes had been increased for the people who constitute the great bulk of the Canadian taxpayers. He was completely wrong. I propose to quote what I had to say on this subject in the budget speech of 1959. This is to be found at page 2417 of Hansard of April 9, 1959, in the second column, where, summarizing the tax changes in the 1959 budget and comparing the income tax position of the great bulk of Canadian taxpayers with their tax position prior to the change of government three years ago tomorrow, I had this to say:

> The best way to illustrate the effect on the individual is to compare the taxes which will be payable in a full year after this year's changes with the taxes payable in 1957 prior to the reductions we introduced in that year. For purposes of comparison, let us consider the position of a typical married man who is the father of two children of family allowance age.
> At an income level of $3,000 a year, under the new rates, this man will pay a total of income tax and social security contribution of $56, an increase of $4 from the 1958 level. He will, however, be paying $34 less than he paid before the reductions we introduced in 1957.
> At an income level of $4,000 a year, under the new rates, he will pay a total of $208, an increase of $14 from the 1958 level but $44 less than before the reductions we introduced in 1957.
> At an income level of $5,000 a year, he will pay a total of $390, an increase of $24 from the 1958 level but $44 less than before the reductions we introduced in 1957.
> At an income level of $7,500 a year, he will pay a total of $898, an increase of $68 from the 1958 level but still $2 less than before the reductions we introduced in 1957.
> It is clear from these examples that even after the increases now being proposed the vast majority of taxpayers will be paying less in income tax and old security contributions than they paid prior to the reductions we introduced in 1957.
> At the same time they are receiving the protection of a social security system which has been greatly improved and extended.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River may find his way back to these facts some time soon. That will be our hope.

As to the matter raised by the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl), may I say that this matter was discussed fully last year. He is aware of the additional burden we are carrying in the federal treasury now by reason of our increase from $1 to $1.50 in the per capita federal grants to the universities; that is per capita of population in each province. These are substantial additions that we have undertaken. I think there is little to be gained now in reviewing this question again. It could have been raised in the budget discussion but I do not believe it was raised there. It was discussed fully a year ago and I think the situation has not changed since that time. The government has done more for the assistance of universities than any other federal government has ever before done in Canadian history.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the Minister of Finance a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When we go into committee, I suggest.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister indicate whether or not—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it the hon. minister who had the floor is not prepared to answer questions now.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Estate tax and succession duties applicable to certain property.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in committee on Bill No. C-68, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and also the proposed amendments which are appended to Votes and Proceedings.

Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, on this clause I would like to refer back to page 4591 of Hansard, the explanation which I think is not now a fully responsible explanation for the Canadian public to be given by the Minister of Finance with respect to the intent of this legislation. Although I am sure the minister has read the debate in the other house on the Estate Tax Act, there was reference in the course of it to certain amendments such as those which are before us in this house. There was reference to the fact that the other place referred the amendments of 1958, certain proposals of the Minister of Finance, back to us. The over-powering majority in this house rejected them.

To what extent have we here a recognition of the non-political judgment that might have been exercised in the other place when they considered the elements involved in a matter of this kind?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, is the minister not going to reply?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, that is a political question. The hon. member has not asked for elucidation of this clause. I am prepared to offer to elucidate the clause if any hon. member asks.

Mr. Benidickson: Then we can go on for some time. Has the minister before him, and I am sure he has because his officials formerly always prepared a very excellent book of words clause by clause, any reference to what the recommendations were from the committee of the other house with respect to this matter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we do not discuss what transpires in the other place; it is quite out of order to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to say we very definitely discussed what happened in the other place.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): When the other house is dealing with a matter and sends it back to us, then this house deals with it. But with great respect we do not discuss the proceedings in the other place and it is quite out of order to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am referring to the fact that last year we discussed the merits of a proposal that came from the other house. The overriding majority of the government defeated it here, but it seems to me it is back here before us. I wonder if the minister with the help of the staff that is in front of him would indicate to us to what extent this complies with the legislation that was presented to us last year which we rejected?

[The Deputy Chairman.]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: Is the minister not going to assist the committee?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, there was no amendment last year to the Income Tax Act in this regard. If the hon. member wishes to talk about another act altogether, or about what happened with that other act last year, or what happened to a bill to amend that act this year in the other place, it is completely out of order.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I would not have risen to say anything further had it not been for the fact that I am quite sure that very competent lawyers whose evidence I have read in committees of the other place have asserted that we are doing here, by means of the Income Tax Act amendment, what the other place suggested we should do when admittedly they had before them the Estate Tax Act. The two are related in the resolution now before us—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I cannot understand how the hon. member can show that what he is talking about is relevant to clause 1 of this bill.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, have you looked at the left hand sidenote, "Estate tax and succession duties—", which relates to this clause, and are you satisfied that I am not in order in asking about the co-relation between this clause and the legislation that was before this house last year?

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister might at this stage supply us with an answer as to why he has not included in the bill adequate amendments so that corporations would also be liable to graduated income tax, as are individuals?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, with respect, that question does not arise on this bill. The proper place to raise questions of this kind is in the budget debate which took place two months ago. There is nothing in this bill which relates to that subject at all.

Mr. Regier: On that point of order, Mr. Chairman, if clause 1 has any significance at all, I should be allowed to ask this. It always has had great significance in committee when we are amending the whole of an act to this great extent. I submit we ought to be entitled to ask this question, and it is the only place where we can ask the minister why the act has not been amended in other respects.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock shall I rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader what we will be doing tomorrow and Wednesday?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, after consultation with representatives on the other side of the house it seems advisable to continue with this bill and, on a reasonable allocation of time, we might complete it by, say, one o'clock. Then we will carry on with the motion in the name of the Minister of National Revenue to set up a select committee on broadcasting; that would be item No. 2. The third would be item No. 10 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice with regard to the Judges Act. Fourth would be item No. 4 on today's order paper, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act which we have had before us on several occasions. Fifth would be second reading of Bill No. S-32 concerning a bridge over the St. Lawrence river. If we make good progress we could complete item No. 1 on today's order paper which would be the last item, Bill No. C-72 with respect to the Canadian National Railways.

On Wednesday we will continue with the estimates. We will take those of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys which have already been started and those of the Department of Fisheries.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

RESTAURANT CONCESSION TENDERS, MONTREAL HARBOUR

Question No. 403—Mr. Denis:

1. Have tenders been recently called by the national harbours board in connection with restaurant concessions in the Montreal harbour?
2. If so, (a) have tenders been received; (b) from whom, and what was the amount of each tender?
3. What are the names and addresses of those awarded such concessions and the respective amounts of their tenders?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The national harbours board advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Yes.

(b) See below:

Name of tenderer and amount of tender:

Restaurant A, Bickerdike Pier: P. Passaretti, $750.

Restaurant B, Alexandra Pier: Marcel Cardinal, $1,225; Gelinas Fortin, $1,140; Louis Huss, $1,060; United Fruit Store, $700; Geralde Lalonde, $700; Cyprien Bousquet, $625.

Restaurant C, King Edward Pier: Laurier Cardinal, $1,225; Louis Huss, $1,060; R. Beaudoin, $900; Angelo Gagliardi, $800; Gelinas Fortin, $800; United Fruit Store, $700; Geralde Lalonde, $700; Cyprien Bousquet, $625; Paul DeSeve, $435.

Restaurant No. 3, Section 18: *A. Martinangeli, $2,000; *Gelinas Fortin, $2,000; Albert Ruffolo, $1,800; G. P. Gleason, $1,000; L. Chevalier, $1,300; Paul DeSeve, $975; Geralde Lalonde, $820.

Restaurant No. 7, Section 35: Roger Soumis, $2,104; Mrs. M. Rossi Martinangeli, $2,000; Nathan Margel, $1,300; G. P. Gleason, $1,000; Geralde Lalonde, $820; Angeline Gagliardi, $770; Frank Bozehorich, $522.80.

3.

Restaurant No.	Concessionnaire	Amount of Tender
A	Phillip Passaretti 8041 St. Andre street, Montreal	$ 750.
B	Marcel Cardinal, 8478 Chateaubriand street, Montreal	1,225.
C	Laurier Cardinal, 4366 Chateaubriand street, Montreal	1,225.
3	Armand Martinangeli, 325 Laflamme street, Montreal	2,000.
7	Roger Soumis, 1584 Lagauchetiere street, Montreal	2,104.

*It will be noted from the tabulation of tenders that there were two tenders of $2,000 for restaurant No. 3—section 18—one from A. Martinangeli and the other from Gelinas Fortin. However, the amount of $2,000 is not arrived at in the same manner, that is

A. Martinangeli tendered: permit, $800; lease, $1,200.

Gelinas Fortin tendered: permit, $500; lease, $1,500.

The "payment" clause in the instructions to tenderers provides that the amount tendered for the permit shall be paid in advance and that the amount of the lease shall be paid in six equal instalments. In view of the fact that Mr. Martinangeli's tender for the permit was $300 higher than that of Mr. Fortin and the board will have the use of this money for a longer period and also because Mr. Martinangeli, in company with his wife, Mrs. Marie Rossi Martinangeli, has satisfactorily operated a restaurant on the harbour for several years, it was decided to grant the concession for restaurant No. 3 to Mr. Martinangeli.

LECTURES TO SMALL BUSINESS BRANCH, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Question No. 413—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Are lectures being given in the small business branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce?
2. If so, who are the persons in charge of such lectures?
3. Of the said persons, how many are French speaking, and what are their names?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 11 a.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR ACTION ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that, according to the figures on unemployment released by the bureau of statistics last night, unemployment both in absolute and relative terms is higher than in the corresponding periods of 1959 and 1958 and, indeed, higher than in any corresponding period since the great depression—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —is the minister now in a position to tell the house how the government intends to deal with this most disturbing national situation?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in response to some of the statements made by the hon. member for Essex East I wish to say that in the opinion of the government the situation, as we have stated in the past, is always serious as long as there are people unemployed, but it is only half as serious as it was in the years 1935 to 1940 when the hon. member was a member of the government. According to this release there are 250,000 more people working than last month and 140,000 more people working than in the same period last year. The government is always looking at the situation and reviewing it. I am sure the hon. member will find that the government, in its efforts to look after the people of this country, will devise ways and means to rectify the situation, and when that is done an announcement will be made as usual.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the minister care to inform the house what the government feels employment prospects are for the near future, and whether in the opinion of the government there is likely to be a reduction in the number of unemployed in the near future compared with a year ago?

Mr. Starr: The hon. member has asked me to foretell the future and I decline to do that, because I would not want to be quoted at this time, not knowing exactly what the situation may be.

Mr. Argue: It is worse and it is going to get worse under this administration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the admittedly serious situation, does the Minister of Labour not think this house ought to be given an opportunity of at least co-operating with an organization being set up in another place to deal with this particular problem? Is it not a disgrace that parliament is denied this opportunity?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I would say this. The sooner I see any evidence of co-operation from the hon. member for Essex East, the better it will be for the economy of this country.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could put a question to the Prime Minister. Notwithstanding the arrangements that have previously been made, would the Prime Minister consider having the estimates of the Department of Labour called this week so that at least there can be a debate in this house on this most important domestic question?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The progress made in calling the various departments depends on the co-operation received from all parts of the house. I am sure that when it is appropriate to have these departments before the house, and when matters already before the house have been cleared away, then an opportunity will be given to the hon. gentleman to discuss these matters.

UNITED NATIONS

FOOD BANK—REPORTED SUGGESTION BY U.S. VICE PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): May I address a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister's attention been drawn to, and does he care to comment upon, a recent statement by Vice President Nixon of the United States with respect to the establishment of a United Nations food pool?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions in recent years I have advocated the paramount importance of making surplus food stocks available for consumption in parts of the world where food shortages occur or might occur. Indeed, in December, 1957 I advocated the establishment of a NATO food bank which, as yet, has not received the complete support of the various nations in NATO.

When I was in Washington on June 3 I discussed with the President of the United States, not this particular matter but the urgency of working out some satisfactory arrangement for the distribution and utilization of surplus foodstuffs.

The house will also recall that as a result of the food for peace conference held in Washington in May of 1959 there is now in existence an international body known as the wheat utilization committee, the establishment of which was designed to find means of utilizing food surpluses for beneficial purposes. This committee, on which Canada is represented, will have its next semi-annual meeting in Ottawa in this coming July.

The Nixon proposal is one that envisages the co-operation of the countries within the United Nations. Certainly the matter has been discussed on occasions in the past, but there has been no evidence of any support for such a plan from the U.S.S.R. or those countries adhering to the views of the U.S.S.R. However, the suggestion is one that deserves the fullest consideration, for all of us are desirous of assuring that surpluses shall be used to the end that poverty will be met and hunger assuaged in the parts of the world where today food is not available.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Has there in fact been any serious discussion at the NATO council of the proposal for a NATO food bank, and if so what has been the result of that consideration?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There have been discussions on various occasions regarding a food bank, but there has not been that unanimity that characterizes the opinion of Canadians as a whole.

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR—ADMISSION OF REFUGEES FROM MIDDLE EAST AND HONG KONG

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Upon representations being made by a number of religious organizations in Canada, is the government giving any consideration to altering our participation in world refugee year so as to include refugees in the Middle East and in Hong Kong?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been no such representations made to the department, certainly within recent weeks. If and when there were any change in government policy with regard to refugees it would be announced in the house in the usual manner.

TRADE

WHEAT—ALLEGED EXCLUSION OF CANADA FROM MARKET IN INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether the Canadian government has under consideration any action for the disposal of surplus Canadian food, particularly wheat, and whether there was consultation before the United States obtained a contract for the sale of 587 million bushels of United States wheat to India over a four-year period, thus almost totally excluding us from that market?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am not sure whether that is a proper question for the orders of the day. The matter of the agreement entered into between the United States and India I think was the subject of discussion on an earlier occasion. In any event, my information is that it will not have the effect which the hon. gentleman has ascribed to it, namely that Canada will be denied any market in India. Indeed, one of the bases for the agreement is the general assurance that Canada's exports to that country will not be diminished.

Mr. Argue: I should like to ask a further supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister not aware that a spokesman for India said that although India would attempt to maintain its commercial purchases of some 400,000 tons of wheat, this amount might also be reduced?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure that the Prime Minister has available to him sources of information that even the hon. gentleman has not available.

Mr. Argue: You cannot sell any more wheat.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

WHOOPING CRANES—EFFECT OF PROPOSED RAILWAY ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Will he be good enough to comment on the editorial appearing in last night's Ottawa Journal entitled "A Rare Bird for the Future". For the purpose of putting the record straight will he advise whether it is not correct that the whooping cranes referred to have their present nesting grounds in Wood Buffalo national park along the proposed eastern route of the railway to Great Slave lake, and that these rare birds would not be disturbed by a railroad constructed along the western route; which would not only make the whooping cranes very happy but would have the incidental effect of bringing much joy and relief to some 12,000 people in the Peace river area who have been waiting for over a quarter of a century for this railway?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have seen the editorial in question, Mr. Speaker, and I immediately confirm the fact that the statement made about the choice of the route, namely that it should be the eastern route to keep away from the nesting ground of the whooping cranes, is not true. The whooping cranes, about 30 of them in number, nest in Wood Buffalo national park.

I should like to point out also that in a letter to me of June 1 the president of the Audubon society pointed out, his understanding, which is correct, namely that no route so far is in any sense "final or even accurate". I have no doubt that whatever route is recommended by the royal commission or finally chosen for the railway, it will be possible to establish it in such a fashion that ample protection will be given to the breeding ground of these rare birds. I want to assure the hon. member that I fully share his concern that these birds will not be imperilled.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Will the minister inform the house whether he has received from the United States wildlife authorities any representations in connection with the preservation of these whooping cranes?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I shall be obliged to take that supplementary question as notice.

TRANSPORT

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—COMMISSION REPORT ON PROPOSED RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he has yet received the report of the commission studying the route of the railroad to Great Slave lake? If so, will he take the house into his confidence?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not received the report, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTED DECISION OF RAILWAYS TO SUSPEND GRAIN SHIPMENTS TO VANCOUVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport whether he is yet in a position to give any information on the reported cancellation of the loading of box cars to Vancouver?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I checked with my office, and I received a telegram dealing with that matter. Since it comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labour I passed it along to my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr).

Mr. Winch: In view of the answer of the Minister of Transport, can he inform the house what the cancellation of the loading of box cars has to do with the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Hees: The telegram I received, to which I thought the hon. member was referring, was a telegram dealing with jurisdictional matters concerning a union agreement, as I remember it; and that being a labour matter—

Mr. Winch: No.

Mr. Hees: Well, then, if that is the case I did not receive the telegram to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Winch: It was sent on the 17th.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO RESEARCH ON LIVE VIRUS POLIO VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare engaged in research on a live virus polio vaccine? Also, is this oral vaccine to be made available in Canada? If so, to what extent?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes to the first part of the hon. member's question, as trials of this vaccine have been in progress in Canada since February of this year. Members of my department are directly associated with this continuing project, which is receiving federal assistance through national health grants.

No live polio virus vaccine is licensed in Canada at the present time. Following a review of recent information, the national technical advisory committee on live poliomyelitis vaccines on June 20 recommended limited and well supervised field trials of live polio virus vaccines which have received the necessary approval of this department. My department will continue its co-operation in the planning of such trials and study of applications for assistance under the national health grants program. Any decision as to use for the public will depend upon the findings.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister could tell the house, if he has the information with him, how many of the considerable number of cases of paralytic polio reported so far this year in Canada are of the people who have previously been vaccinated with the Salk vaccine.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I do not have that information available, but I would be glad to procure it and give it to the hon. member.

ATOMIC ENERGY

U.S. UNDERGROUND TEST—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN OBSERVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the Canadian government has been notified of the intention of the government of the United States to carry out an underground chemical explosion in Nevada on July 12 and, if so, whether Canada has been invited to send an observer.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, we have had no such notification.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question arising out of his reply to my question a moment ago. Is he aware that observers from the U.S.S.R. and the United Kingdom have been invited to this underground explosion on July 12 in the United States?

Mr. Green: No, I have had no such notification.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RENE LEVESQUE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY QUEBEC PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he has had an opportunity of looking at the report in Le Devoir which I sent him yesterday, and whether he can answer the question I put to him at that time.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I was waiting for an opportunity to rise to my feet.

I have read the report in Le Devoir and the officials of the board of broadcast governors are at present conducting hearings in Halifax. However, I have consulted with their counsel as well as counsel for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and I am informed that there is nothing in the statutes or in the regulations which precludes an application on behalf of a government or government agency or crown corporation for a television or broadcasting licence.

Of course, if such application is made, it has to be in exactly the same manner as any other. First it has to be approved by the Department of Transport. Then there has to be a public hearing by the board of broadcast governors, and a decision will then be made as to the appropriateness of granting such licence.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the minister for his answer, but that was not the question I put to him. That was my second question which he has just answered. The question I put was this. A statement was made by the premier of Quebec in which he stated that if Rene Levesque returned to the C.B.C., the Quebec government would establish its own radio station in Quebec. That is the report contained in Le Devoir which I sent to the minister, and I asked the minister if he had any comment to make.

Mr. Nowlan: I have no comment to make on that other than what I have just said. Whatever the government of Quebec or the premier of Quebec decides to do is a matter of responsibility for that organization, not for me. I have simply said what would happen in the ordinary course of events if such an application were made.

PUBLIC WORKS

FORT WILLIAM, ONT.—REQUEST FOR PROTECTIVE BREAKWATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the minister received a letter from the city of Fort William containing a resolution urging the government to give serious consideration to the construction of breakwater facilities for the protection of the McKellar and Mission islands, where large tracts of industrial property face lake Superior within the limits of the city of Fort William? If so, will the minister be good enough to give the house an indication of the government's intentions?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): So far I have received no such letter, but when I do I shall be very happy to give it my earliest consideration. As and when any determination is made of the matter, or if the government feels an announcement should be made, one will be made in due course.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—REPORTED POLITICAL ACTIVITY OF RURAL MAIL DRIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. I want to know whether the hon. gentleman has an answer to the question which was put to him on Friday last by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I have inquired about this, but I have received no such telegram as the one referred to by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to ask a supplemenatry question to that asked by the hon. member for Papineau of the Postmaster General concerning a question which was asked in this house by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont on June 17, in which he inquired whether the Postmaster General had received a telegram dated June 9 from Sherbrooke, Quebec, with regard to political activities on the part of a rural mail driver.

In his answer to the question the Postmaster General said this morning that he had not received the message. Well, I have the message here, and it is dated June 9. My supplementary question is, how is it that since June 9 the Postmaster General has not seen this message?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): My information from my own staff, Mr. Speaker, is that this message was not received in my office. If the hon. member will send it to me I will be delighted to have it.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sending it to the minister now.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Send it.

Mr. Chevrier: I wish the minister would make some comment on it. It is dated two weeks ago.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I now have the document which the hon. member for Laurier sent across to me, and I am more convinced than ever that it is quite possible that this so-called telegram was never received by me or by my office. I notice that what is said to be a telegram appears on a letterhead which reads "Association Liberal du Comte de Compton". It purports to be a copy of a telegram, but in the light of some of the activities of the hon. gentleman's associates over the last few weeks in a certain province in Canada it is quite possible this telegram never reached me, and was merely printed for political purposes.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question. May I ask the Postmaster General, in the light of his answer, if it is the policy of his department to dispense with and fire people without an investigation.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No. Since this government has come into power, Mr. Speaker, we have changed that previous Liberal policy.

Mr. Chevrier: On a question of privilege; the Postmaster General—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: The Postmaster General is quite wrong, because the Minister of Agriculture—I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member state his question of privilege.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. The Postmaster General said that since this government has been in office it has changed the policy of firing people for political reasons, and I say now—

Mr. Hees: Without investigation.

Mr. Chevrier: I am saying now that not only is that not so, sir, but that the Minister of Agriculture fired a constituent of mine without the slightest investigation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I say that the Minister of Agriculture fired a constituent of the hon. member for Laurier without any investigation.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has raised a matter as a question of privilege, but it does not seem to affect the privileges or conduct of any member of the house. Therefore I would think that it is more a matter of controversy and argument.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege which does affect a member of this house, the hon. member for Laurier has just made a statement which is absolutely incorrect. The man to whom he has referred was discharged for due cause after an investigation which showed serious irregularities on his part.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think I am as familiar as the Minister of Agriculture with the facts of this case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I say now—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member if he has a question of privilege.

Mr. Chevrier: The question of privilege is that the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture is totally inaccurate.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will permit me, there seems to be a very sharp difference of opinion between the Minister of Agriculture and the hon. member for Laurier. Each says that the other is inaccurate, and I suggest that the matter be dropped there.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Agriculture—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Just a moment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to raise a question of privilege I must hear what it is, and I hope the house will give the hon. member a chance to state it. So far I have not heard anything which seems to involve privilege, and I hope the hon. member will not abuse the privilege of rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not generally abuse the privileges of the house, but the Minister of Agriculture raised a question of privilege and I think I should be allowed to reply. My reply is that the individual concerned, one Mitchell, was fired without any investigation after the Department of National Revenue found that there was absolutely nothing against him, and he was fired by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making statements of fact, and there is no procedure by which such a matter can be dealt with at this time of the day. It is quite true that there is a difference of opinion, but I see no question of privilege with which the house should occupy itself.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, speaking for a group that is snow white with respect to patronage, I wish to protest that the rules do not provide for a pot calling the kettle black debate at this stage in our proceedings.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FARNHAM, QUE.—REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL SIGNS AT CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. I apologize for not giving him notice of it.

In the June 20, 1960 issue of Le Devoir, a correspondent complained that, at the entrance of the French Canadian cadet camp at Farnham, the Department of National Defence has erected a 20 foot square bill board with a message written in English only.

Would the minister tell us if his department intends to erect a similar bill board carrying a message in French?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, I must say that I shall look into this matter and give him an answer at the next sitting of the house.

It is certainly not the intention of the present government to show anything but the fullest regard for bilingualism, and I can assure the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean and all members of the opposition that the present government will, at all times, see that bilingualism is respected, whenever possible.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SARNIA, ONT.—REPORTED INSTALMENT PAYMENT ON SALE OF LAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I wonder whether the hon. lady has received any information at any time from any source to the effect that before the vote was taken for the surrender or the sale of the Sarnia Indian lands, the Indians were told by a representative of the company that they would receive an immediate instalment payment of $100 at the conclusion of the meeting.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I received some information to the effect that after the sale was completed the Indians asked for a payment because it was so near Christmas. That is about all the information I have without searching the files.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the hon. member would consider dealing with this matter in another way. I suppose the estimates of the department have been concluded, but this is a record of what happened in the past and I believe it would be better if the question were put on the order paper.

GRAIN

ACREAGE PAYMENT PROGRAM—REPORTED STATEMENT BY FARM UNION DIRECTOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister comment on a statement made by Mr. Anderson, director of the farmers' union of Alberta, that western Canadian farmers are stymied and stunned by the Prime Minister's claim in the House of Commons that no request had been received for an acreage payment program?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I have not seen this alleged statement which the hon. member has mentioned; therefore I am in no position to comment on it. I do not think it would be appropriate for me on the orders of the day to be commenting on all the statements made by various people throughout the country, in any event.

INCOME TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Monday, June 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-68, to amend the Income Tax Act—Mr. Fleming (Eglinton)—Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Estate tax and succession duties applicable to certain property.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry, but I am told that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam had the floor when we adjourned last night.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, as I indicated last night, this is a major amending bill. We are asked to pass 33 clauses, which in itself constitutes a major overhaul of the Income Tax Act. I believe it is only right when we are on clause 1 in the committee stage that we should be able to ask the minister to give the reasons why amendments have not been brought forward with respect to other parts of the Income Tax Act.

As I indicated yesterday, I should like him to explain why he has not seen fit to amend the definition of taxable income. We would like to know why capital gains were not considered worthy of being classed as taxable income. We would like to know why the minister did not deem it advisable to amend the act so that corporations, like individuals, would be liable to a graduated income tax rather than to a flat levy as is now the case. Why did the minister not deem it advisable to reduce the allowances permitted for depreciation and depletion? Why did the minister not deem it advisable to amend the act so as to curtail the wide-open expense allowances companies are permitted to pay, especially to their senior executives, which allowances in turn companies are able to claim as expenses, the amounts therefore not being liable to income tax?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing in clause 1 of the bill nor, indeed, anything in the bill at all relating to these subjects. Therefore I think we should address ourselves to the bill. When it becomes the policy to introduce measures dealing with these subjects the house will be acquainted with that fact.

Mr. Regier: On a point of order, I think the committee is well aware that there is hardly ever anything at all in clause 1. Very often it only contains definitions of words. However, clause 1 is the only place where we can ask for a reply on the part of the minister if he has not deemed it advisable to reply on second reading of the bill. It has been a traditional privilege to allow more latitude on clause 1 than on any other clause, and I believe the minister owes the house and the country an explanation as to why other amendments were not introduced.

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River will be back in a moment. He wishes to speak on clause 1, and I would ask the minister to agree to hold it open until he returns. In the meantime we might pass on to other clauses.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We could let clause 1 stand and go on to clause 2.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause stands.

On clause 2—Idem.

Mr. Hellyer: While we are waiting, would the minister explain the operative parts of this clause? I know that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River has underlined some parts of it with respect to which he intended to ask questions. Is there something the minister can say by way of explanation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I thought the request was that clause 1 stand so that we could go on with the other clauses, not that they should all stand. Clause 2, as the note makes clear, proposes an amendment which is designed to ensure that a taxpayer may not receive a benefit under both sections 15 and 37 of the act. It is just to prevent an unintended double benefit being used by a taxpayer.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Transferred property.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On clause 3 there is an amendment of which I gave notice on Friday last. It appears in Votes and Proceedings for June 17. I would ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence to move this amendment.

Mr. Pearkes: I move:

That Bill C-68, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by striking out lines 27 to 33 on page 33 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

(2) Section 20 of the said act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(10) Where property of a corporation that was depreciable property of a prescribed class has, on the making of a receiving order or the filing of an assignment for the benefit of creditors of the corporation, become vested in a trustee in bankruptcy, the property of the corporation of that class shall be deemed, for the purpose of this section and regulations made under paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of section 11, to have been disposed of by the corporation at that time for an amount equal to the undepreciated capital cost thereof to the corporation immediately before that time, and to have been acquired by the trustee at that time at a capital cost equal to that amount.

(11) Where a corporation that has become bankrupt has received an amount in a taxation year from a trustee in bankruptcy as or on account of any surplus remaining to which the corporation has become entitled after payment in full of its creditors with interest and other costs, charges and expenses as provided by law, the lesser of

(a) the amount so received, or

(b) the amount, if any, that would have been included in computing the income of the corporation for that or a previous year by virtue of subsection (1), if the amount or the aggregate of the amounts received by the trustee as proceeds of disposition of property of the corporation that was depreciable property of a prescribed class had been received by the corporation, immediately before becoming bankrupt, as proceeds of disposition thereof, shall be included in computing the income of the corporation for that year."

(3) Subsection (5b) of section 20 of the said act as enacted by this section is applicable in determining the undepreciated capital cost of property at any time after the coming into force of this section, subsection (5c) of section 20 of the said act as enacted by this section is applicable in respect of any direction made after the coming into force of this section, subsection (10) of section 20 of the said act as enacted by this section is applicable in respect of property of a corporation that became bankrupt at any time after 1959, and subsection (11) of section 20 of the said act as enacted by this section is applicable in respect of amounts received by a corporation as or on account of any surplus described therein after the coming into force of this section.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

The Chairman: Shall I dispense with the reading of the amendment? It is in Votes and Proceedings.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I do not have any objection to the amendment but on the other hand, as I mentioned during the debate on second reading of this bill, I am not satisfied with the reasons the minister gave for not having reached a decision such as is presented in this amendment either on March 31, when he introduced his budget resolutions, or on May 6, when he adopted the policy of putting into Votes and Proceedings his suggested amendments to the budget resolutions. If this amendment is consequential, why do we get it on a Friday night when many members are not, perhaps, going to go to their post office boxes on Saturday, and when everybody knows that this particular subject might have been debated yesterday instead of today?

I indicated yesterday that I thought the minister had a good policy in introducing into Votes and Proceedings as an appendix the proposed amendments to his budget resolutions. However, I feel that he has more or less forfeited the compliments that we would normally give to him in this respect by introducing this particular amendment, which comprises two pages, on a Friday night prior to a debate that might very well have taken place on Monday, without advance notice either to his colleagues in the House of Commons, to industry or to those who are concerned with matters such as are involved in this proposed amendment. I wonder if the minister would indicate whether or not this is a decision that was reached just last Thursday?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will be pleased to deal with this point, and to deal with the kind of criticism in which the hon. member indulged last night in regard to notice. The hon. member has been in this house for 15 years, and I doubt very much whether in all that time he has seen the annual bill to amend the Income Tax Act passed without amendments being introduced in the committee of the whole, because these always arise. The only difference between what is being done now and last year and what was done before is that previously, under my predecessors, there was no advance notice given of the proposed amendments. Now, in order to give the house as much notice as possible, I have been following the practice of giving notice of the amendments. I did that with respect to the amendments to the budget resolutions, and they appeared in Votes and Proceedings for May 6.

These three amendments to the present bill, Mr. Chairman, I gave to the house last Friday afternoon as soon as they were available. This bill was introduced on June 6. It was to have been proceeded with on June 13. The hon. member did not want to proceed then and asked that it be put over. We did not proceed with it. It was only called again on June 20. These amendments relate to matters that have come to our attention in that period, and notice has been given to the house as soon as it was possible to do so. As a matter of fact I came into the chamber late last Friday afternoon and asked the house to give leave to revert to motions so these amendments could be made a matter of record on Friday. At the same time I gave copies of the amendments to both parties in opposition so they would have an opportunity of reviewing them over the week end.

If the hon. member has not chosen to do his work on these amendments over the week end, all I can say is that I think the practice is one of which the house approves. The alternative, I suppose, is to revert to the practice that existed during the time the hon. member was a parliamentary assistant, and not to give any notice to the house at all but just throw these amendments, sometimes in technical terms, at the house just at the moment the clause to which they relate is called in committee of the whole.

Mr. Benidickson: The Minister of Finance has chosen to be rather nasty in this respect. I complimented the minister fully when I found that he was introducing a system of indicating his changes of mind from budget night before the time we would have a chance of debating the budget issues. I complimented the minister upon the fact that on May 6 he introduced as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings notice of amendments indicating his change of mind since March 31, when he introduced his budget, and in so doing gave notice to those affected as taxpayers of his intention to move these amendments.

What I complained about and continue to complain about is that the minister did not continue the good job in this respect. Why did he not, between May 6 and now, bring in this two-page amendment; because the public at large has not the same kind of advantage with regard to notice that we have. I praised the minister for introducing the amendments on May 6.

The minister has suggested that I asked on a certain date—was it June 13?—that the debate on second reading not be proceeded with. I want to say to the House of Commons, and to the country at large, that I quoted to the minister over the telephone a letter I received from the people in this land chiefly responsible for examining income tax matters, the Canadian tax foundation, in which they said it would be an affront to them and to the taxpayers at large if the minister and the leader of the house on the government side proposed to go ahead on Monday with the debate on second reading, because the public at large would not have had an opportunity of considering the debate that had taken place the preceding week.

The Canadian tax foundation had an appointment—now, I want the Minister of Finance to deny this if it is not so, since he has brought my name into this discussion by saying that I asked for delay—with the officials of his department in the subsequent week. What the minister and the government were proposing was that, prior to that appointment, we would be asked in this house to give second reading to this bill without the consultation which the Canadian tax foundation had informally every year with the officials of the department.

I do not want the Minister of Finance to say, Mr. Chairman, that I asked for postponement of the debate on second reading. It was on a certain Friday that I communicated with the minister, and the minister never called me back. I found that the leader of the house, on that particular Friday night, did indicate that the subject would not be debated on the following Monday. My request was on behalf of those experts who wanted to analyse the bill which had been presented only a few days before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I wish the hon. member would get his facts straight. The letter which he read to me contained no suggestion about any affront. This is his own, personal interpretation. The purport of the letter was not anything of the kind, and there is no comparison between what the hon. member said this morning and what was in the letter. Let me make it clear, Mr. Chairman. He said I did not call him back a week ago Friday. I called him back but he was not available. I think he ought to distinguish between the two positions. He was told on Monday that I had called him back to discuss this matter with him, as I told him I would. I carried out my undertaking, but he was not there to receive the call.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the hon. member has wasted enough time of the committee last night and today, and that we can proceed with the business.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of Finance has just said, referring to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that we have wasted the time of this committee. The Minister of Finance, of course, is notoriously becoming an expert in the obstruction of his own estimates and his own proposals in this House of Commons. However, that fact does not justify him in saying of any other member that he has wasted the time of the House of Commons. I realize that the Minister of Finance and the members of the government do not like criticism of their policies, and that for that reason they seek at every turn to deny to this opposition the right to criticize important measures like this one. The Minister of Finance is the last man in the world who should accuse another hon. member of wasting the time of the House of Commons. It was a most uncalled for remark.

The Chairman: Order. I do not recognize any question of privilege in what the hon. member for Essex East has said. It is a sure thing that we are not discussing the amendment.

Mr. Argue: We are discussing the statement of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was discussing the statement of the Minister of Finance.

The Chairman: Yes, but the hon. member for Essex East raised a question of privilege. What I was saying was that I did not recognize any question of privilege in his remarks. What I want to point out to the committee is that for about five minutes we have not been discussing the amendment which is before the committee. I would ask all members to come back to this discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That may be so, Mr. Chairman. Nevertheless, and notwithstanding what you say, there are certain rights and privileges which are open to members of this committee. The Minister of Finance said that last night the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River had wasted the time of this committee. I say that is an unparliamentary statement, that it is not worthy of the Minister of Finance, and that it is not calculated to facilitate the passage of this particular bill or of any other legislation introduced by the Minister of Finance, who continually obstructs the proceedings of the House of Commons and takes up more time than any other hon. member.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is the hon. member doing now but putting on a sham?

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I have a brief reply, Mr. Chairman. I am indicating to you that we have before us an important amendment which involves two pages of close printing in our appendix to Hansard. The minister referred to his attempt to reach me on that certain Friday afternoon to which I referred. I am glad to think he made that attempt. However, all hon. members know that we cannot be in two places at the same time. We cannot be here in the House of Commons and do our duty in connection with the governmental departments all at the same time.

On that particular occasion I will admit that I was not in the chamber after five o'clock in the afternoon, though, I was here in the chamber on that Friday for most of the afternoon. However, I want to say that a matter of a serious nature, such as whether we are going to go ahead with an income tax debate on Monday, deserves the courtesy that was usually shown to the hon. member for Greenwood when he was the official critic of the opposition in previous days.

I went to my office on Saturday and Sunday in order to see whether there was any intimation. The only intimation, of course, was the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the leader on the government side, at six o'clock indicated that somehow he had communicated to the Minister of Finance, after my telephone conversation on behalf of some of those people whom I thought were interested, that there was a change in the program and we would not proceed on Monday.

I want to say that it is a simple matter to send a letter to an hon. member's office—and I was looking for that letter—if he did not reach me on the phone on an important matter like the changing of the order of debate on Monday. Perhaps in part I am to blame. However, I want to say to the minister that this procedure was not customary under the previous administration.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 as amended carry?

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 3 as amended—Transferred property.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think clause 3 has reference to any subject that is involved in the resolution. In other words, we have not had prior announcement of the government's intention in this respect. I think it would be proper for the minister to provide to us and to those taxpayers affected an explanation of what is involved in connection with this section.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand we are dealing with clause 3 as amended. The new subsection (5b)—I am speaking now of the original clause 3 of the bill, owing to the fact that the amendment has now been carried and disposed of—is explained in the printed explanatory note. The regulations prescribed under the authority of the Income Tax Act provide for rates of capital cost allowance or depreciation that may be claimed by taxpayers. These regulations divide depreciable assets into about 18 classes, with a different rate for each class. It sometimes happens that a taxpayer regards some asset as falling in a class which enjoys a lower rate of allowance than that for which it properly qualifies and that when he finds his error he will wish to transfer the property to its proper class. It may also happen that the minister will find that a taxpayer has regarded his assets as qualifying for a higher rate of allowance than that to which they are entitled, and the minister will direct that the asset be transferred to its proper class. The amendment made in clause 3 will provide rules to be followed in this event.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Clause 3 as amended agreed to.

On clause 4.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this a necessary amendment every year in consequence of the statute to which there is reference in this subsection, and which was passed in 1956?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This has been an annual provision in this bill for four years now.

Mr. Benidickson: I note that subsection 2 of chapter 39 of the statutes of Canada, 1956, indicates that this must be done every year. Has the government given consideration to the possibility that this procedure could be avoided by some other amendment to our laws? I know it refers to assistance to immigrants and settlers and their rights with regard to family allowances, but are we obliged every year to have an amendment to the Income Tax Act in order to make this provision?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are obliged to do so if we wish to provide this result, unless the Family Allowances Act were to be amended.

Mr. Benidickson: Could that not perhaps be done?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Parliament could do it, but it has not been done.

Mr. Benidickson: With regard to clause 4, we are dealing with family allowances and their relationship to income tax. As to this matter, what is the position of those members of the armed services who have served abroad?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This clause could have no possible bearing on them, Mr. Chairman. This clause applies to the children of immigrants.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not want to repeat what I said at the resolution stage with respect to this matter. From some organizations that do not always agree, such as the chambers of commerce and the brotherhoods of railway workers, the government has received representations that these ceilings are perhaps not realistic. Will the Minister of Finance give some indication of the review he has given to these representations? We all know that in 1957 Mr. Harris, the former minister of finance, introduced certain budgetary changes which involved a $100 standard deduction whether or not it was actually fortified by receipts. That, I think, simplified some of the subsequent accounting necessary in the Department of National Revenue.

We also note that since that time many of the provinces have taken part in the hospital insurance plan offered to them by the federal legislation enacted in 1956 and amended in 1957. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, for instance, thinks the new government attitude toward the deduction of hospital costs under this section of the act is not fair to premium-paying taxpayers in some provinces. In some provinces, as we all know, the support for this hospital insurance scheme is provided by—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, this has nothing to do with the scope of medical expenses, or what are or what are not admissible expenses. This simply has to do with the maximum amount, in other words the ceiling on the total of admissible medical expenses. There is nothing in this section which relates to what are or what are not admissible categories of medical expense.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, as I think you have learned from your experience here, the minister constantly raises petty matters on points of order. We are referring to an amendment to a certain section of the Income Tax Act, and in that section you will find reference to all the items that up to now I have referred to. I say that if there is a proposal by the minister for the amendment of section 27, it is perfectly in order for any member of the House of Commons to discuss the section in the thought that perhaps the amendment does not go far enough, and that further amendments should possibly follow.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed in clause 5 of this bill does not apply to all of section 27 of the act. It does not apply to all of section 27, subsection 1 of the Income Tax Act. It applies only to subparagraphs (viii) and (ix) of paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of section 27. The only changes made in the section of the act are the figures, and these are underlined in the bill before us. That is all that is before the committee, just the change in the figures.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister just indicate what reply he may have given to the representations which I believe were made to him and his officials in 1960 by such organizations as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the railway brotherhoods relating to the amendment that is proposed here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I do not recall that those organizations raised any question with regard to the ceiling on admissible medical expenses.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, the minister is wrong.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I think I asked the minister before about medical expenses, as to the time of application, and he said it was within the calendar year. This has to do with the amount, but as to time I have had two or three representations from people who have incurred high medical expenses during the last three months of one calendar year and for two or three months in the next calendar year. They find it difficult not to be able to deduct the full medical expenses for one sickness at one time, and it is discriminatory against those particular people who might pay some of their expenses in the last three months of the year and not carry them over and pay them all at once in the following year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can only direct the attention of the hon. member to the provisions of section 27, subsection 1, paragraph (c) of the act, which defines the period covered by the medical expenses in question. It is within a period of twelve months ending in the year, and not included in the calculation of the deduction for medical expenses for a previous year.

With regard to any particular cases, or the elucidation of provisions contained in any of these sections which are not included in the bill, the hon. member can obtain what assistance he needs from the Department of National Revenue at any time.

Mr. McMillan: I realize that, and I realized that perhaps it was not appropriate to ask that question at this time. But I think the minister told me before that it had to be within the calendar year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. McMillan: Then I am sorry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No; it is a period ending in the calendar year, as enacted by the language of section 27(1)(c).

Mr. Benidickson: I think the delegates representing the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the national legislative committee of the international railway brotherhoods will be disappointed to think that the minister has such a poor recollection of the representations which were made by them this year with respect to this item. In the brief presented by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in February, 1960 to the government with respect to section 27(1)(c) of the act, medical expenses, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce recommended that all medical expenses in excess of the 3 per cent be deductible.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not involved here.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, it is; we are raising the ceilings.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was asked if I recalled representations made by these particular organizations, and I said I did not recall any particular representations from them dealing with the amount of the ceiling that is established here. I was relating my answer to the terms of this amendment.

Mr. Benidickson: Well, the representations were that the ceilings should be abandoned, as I read them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is a different matter altogether.

Mr. Benidickson: I have the floor, Mr. Chairman. In the case of the brotherhoods, they indicated on page 7 of their brief that all expenditures made by the taxpayer for medical care for himself and dependants be deductible. Now, here we have facing us a proposed limitation, a ceiling, and I think the observations of these organizations are relevant to the discussion which we have before us.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Application of definition of "loss".

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I think in this instance the minister did provide on June 6 an explanation of the purposes of the proposed change in our law. It is to be found on page 4588 of Hansard. Here we have an overriding of a recent supreme court decision. Would the minister just explain why in the public interest it was necessary to alter the law as it would otherwise have stood under the Interprovincial Pipe Lines case, which case went to the supreme court?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the decision to which I think the hon. member refers only incidentally has any bearing on the provisions of clause 6, which were discussed at the resolution stage. As far as clause 6 of the bill is concerned, that decision is only incidental to the subject matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 and 8 agreed to.

On clause 9—Amounts to be subtracted from payment out of pension fund.

Mr. Benidickson: On this clause, would the minister give an explanation of the intent? I think this has no reference to our previous debate or to the resolutions presented on budget night, and I should be grateful for an explanation which would give to the taxpaying public an idea of the minister's intentions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is a very full note on this clause printed in the bill. This is a technical amendment to prevent a taxpayer receiving benefit under two sections of the act. In other words, the purpose is to avoid giving double benefit.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—"Earnings period" defined.

Mr. Benidickson: Is this just something that was overlooked in drafting in 1958, when certain changes were made?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is an amendment to delete certain words from the existing provision—

Mr. Benidickson: I am thinking of subclause 1, of course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is subclause 1 I am dealing with. The amendment deletes the words "in respect of the same business" from this reference to what I might call the carry-forward of losses provision contained in section 27(1)(e) of the act.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—Election.

Mr. Benidickson: I shall not ask the minister to repeat what I thought was a fairly adequate explanation given with respect to the resolution which appeared in the budget papers when we were at the resolution stage on June 6.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12 agreed to.

On clause 13—Foreign tax.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder if we could have an explanation of the purpose of subsection 3 of clause 13?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Subclause 3 is part of the general provisions of clause 13 of the bill designed, as I indicated in discussing this resolution, as reported at page 4588 of Hansard of June 6, to provide a less restrictive method of computing tax credits for foreign taxes paid. This will eliminate one of three restrictions which now apply leaving, two.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14 agreed to.

On clause 15—Incorrect valuation of inventory: election.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is an amendment to this clause of which I gave notice, and which is printed in Votes and Proceedings of June 17. I will ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence if he will be good enough to move this amendment.

Mr. Pearkes: I move:

That Bill C-68, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended by adding thereto, immediately after line 22 on page 12 thereof, the following:

(3) a reference in paragraph (b) of subsection (4) of section 46 of the said act as enacted by this section to a period of four years from the day referred to in subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (a) thereof shall, in its application in any case where an appeal from a reassessment was instituted before the coming into force of this section, be construed as a reference to a period of four years from the day of an original assessment or the day of mailing of a notification described in subsection (4) of section 46 of the said act as enacted by this section.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to the amendment, would the minister, despite our earlier words, not look at this question with the possibility in mind that next year not only will he follow the good procedure he has now introduced of putting proposed amendments in a form which provides public notice, but also, when he reaches a decision of this kind after budget day, try to inform everybody at the earliest opportunity in order to make the best of an innovation upon which I complimented the hon. gentleman earlier?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is precisely what I did on Friday.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the minister say he had reached no decision prior to Friday with regard to this item?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Precisely so. This amendment has a limited effect. It is introduced simply to make it clear that the amendment contained in clause 15 of the bill has no retroactive effect on appeals now pending. The question was raised as to whether the clause might possibly have a bearing on appeals now pending. This amendment was introduced as a precaution to make it clear beyond question that this will not be the case.

Mr. Benidickson: I naturally accept the minister's statement that his decision was not really made until the Friday prior to a debate which could have taken place on the following Monday. However, I would urge the minister and his officials to follow through this commendable practice by giving notice as soon as possible after amendments seem clearly indicated following the introduction of the minister's budget proposals.

You know, Mr. Chairman, that my suspicions are somewhat aroused in a matter of this kind, because yesterday the minister waited until practically the last minute, or the midnight hour, before filing for the benefit of his colleagues information with respect to the actuarial position of the superannuation fund prior to the debate.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

On clause 17—Statements or omissions in return.

Mr. Benidickson: On clause 17, there were some representations, as I recall the circumstances, from bodies which are experienced in practice in relation to the income tax department concerning this particular item. Does this satisfy such representations as were made, for example, by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not received any representations on clause 17 of the bill. So far as representations prior to the budget are concerned, my understanding is that this clause is in line with some of them and that it gives effect to requests which have been made.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 to 21 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 22.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder whether the minister would just provide for our Hansard record and for the benefit of our taxpayers an explanation beyond what is provided in the bill as to intent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 22 is a relieving provision. Section 81(8) of the Income Tax Act provides that where a corporation has increased its paid-up capital in any way other than in accordance with certain stated exceptions the corporation shall be deemed to have capitalized undistributed income. This would give rise to a situation in which a shareholder would be deemed to have received a dividend. This amendment makes it clear that a reduction of liabilities with an accompanying increase in paid-up capital shall not be deemed to be capitalization of undistributed income.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 23.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not want to bother the minister for a further explanation. On June 6 I asked for an idea of the intended scope of the amendment to the law, and the minister provided it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 24 agreed to.

On clause 25—Change in residence.

Mr. Benidickson: In connection with this clause, Mr. Chairman, I raised some questions about this at the earlier stage of debate on June 6. What are our means of collecting from a person who departs from Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I really do not think there is anything I can add to what I said in our discussion of this subject on June 6. The Hansard reference is page 4587. The hon. member asked me the same question there. I gave him as full an answer as I could. The means of collecting are not absolute or infallible. The Department of National Revenue has to do the best it can in those circumstances with such means as the statute gives it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 26.

Mr. Benidickson: Has the minister received any representations protesting the enactment of this clause since the presentation of the bill for first reading on June 6?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am informed that we have not, Mr. Chairman.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 27—Board constituted.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister indicate what vacancies there are on this board, and how long it is since the vacancies occurred?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is no vacancy at present, Mr. Chairman. This clause will provide for an enlargement of the tax appeal board by the addition of one more member, raising the total personnel of the board, inclusive of the chairman, from five to six members.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 28 agreed to.

On clause 29.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the minister envisage that here we would in any way meet the suggestion, long advocated by the minister and the Prime Minister, that we should amend our income tax law in such a way that non-residents would not have a special advantage in connection with operations in Canada?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, this clause, which is not of far-reaching effect, involves merely a change in wording which makes it clear that the agent of the person concerned has a requirement to "deduct or withhold tax".

Mr. Benidickson: This is done because of penalties imposed for failure to deduct or withhold.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 30.

Mr. Benidickson: Will the minister provide all of us with an explanation of the likely results from this enactment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is a relieving provision. Paragraph (a) of section 123, subsection 8 of the act being amended provides a penalty of 10 per cent. Paragraph (b) of section 123, subsection 8, provides as follows:

> In any other case, the whole amount that should have been deducted or withheld.

The amendment contained in clause 30 of the bill, by adding the underlined words to paragraph (a) removes the case of failure to deduct tax from payments to non-residents from the application of paragraph (b) which I have quoted, where the penalty is 100 per cent.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 31—Penalty upon conviction.

Mr. Benidickson: On this clause, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be timely for the minister to indicate to us and to taxpayers generally what is available in the area of ministerial discretion when it is determined that a certain taxpayer has perhaps wilfully withheld a disclosure of his real income. I think we had a previous section which referred to this, but to what extent have we ministerial discretion in the matter of penalties when the officials of the tax-gathering department find that in their view there has been some, it says here, "wilful withholding of information and disclosure of income"? What leeway has the minister under the act in this respect?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the effect of clauses 16 and 31 of the bill is to reduce ministerial discretion.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. The minister says the effect is to reduce it, but since this is an important issue and all of us hear from time to time of taxpayers who are in difficulty either with the department or with the courts, I think we would like just a little indication of what is the present law and what will the law be if this particular clause is passed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The amendment to be found in clause 31 provides for a continuation of the present rule that a person who has been convicted under section 132 of the act may not be required to pay in addition a penalty under section 56 (1) of the act for the same evasion or attempted evasion unless he was assessed for the penalty under section 56 (1) before the information or complaint giving rise to the conviction under section 132 was laid or made.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; but section 56, which is now the law, says:

> Every person who has wilfully, in any manner, evaded or attempted to evade payment of the tax payable by him under this part for a taxation year or any part thereof is liable to a penalty, to be fixed by the minister, of not less than 25 per cent and not more than 50 per cent of the amount of the tax evaded or sought to be evaded.

I take it that under the present law there is little discretion in the hands of the minister. If the facts indicate an evasion of tax in a wilful manner the taxpayer cannot escape a penalty upon discovery, regardless of any representations made to the minister, of less than 25 per cent, and it cannot exceed 50 per cent. There is the wording "is liable". Is there any escape from that phrase. Does it mean that it is mandatory that in all cases he is liable, or does it mean that he could be liable?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am sure the hon. member does not need any comment from me on the meaning of the word "liable" as it appears in our legislation, particularly in penal provisions. Section 56, which the hon. member has read, is a section applying to cases of wilful evasion. In clause 16 of the bill we are seeking to add to section 56 of the act subsection 2, which will deal now with cases not falling under subsection 1, cases where the taxpayer concerned knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence in the carrying out of any duty or obligation imposed by the act, has done or failed to do certain of the things mentioned in the new subsection 2.

The provisions of the old section 56, which now becomes section 56, subsection 1, make an offender liable to a penalty to be fixed by the minister of not less than 25 per cent and not more than 50 per cent of the tax evaded or sought to be evaded, but by clause 16 of the bill subsection 2 is now added, under which an offender is liable to a penalty of 25 per cent of the amount by which the tax that would so have been payable is less than the tax paid by him for the year. There is no ministerial discretion as to the amount of penalty under the new subsection 2 of section 56. So far as clause 31 of the bill is concerned, I pointed out the fact that it has no relation to convictions under section 132 of the act.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister for this explanation of clause 16 of the bill. Could he give some examples of the difference in operation under the new subsection 2 which involve omissions in a statement of income filed by a taxpayer, having in mind the present law which provides a penalty of 25 per cent to 50 per cent? I take it that under the new subsection 2 the maximum is 25 per cent. What relationship is there to situations under section 56 as it now stands that would call for an automatic penalty of not less than 25 per cent and not more than 50 per cent, without any discretion on the part of the minister?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is thought that there are differences between cases of wilful evasion and cases where, in the new language employed in clause 16 of the bill, there has been a failure or an omission that is done knowingly or under such circumstances as amount to gross negligence in the discharge of a duty or obligation imposed by the act. I think the hon. member will agree that there are differences of meaning between the offences created by what now becomes the two subsections of section 56.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Section 56 has been in effect in its present form since 1950, and it applies only in the case of a wilful evasion or attempt. The case must be brought clearly within the word "wilful". Where it is brought within the meaning of the word "wilful", then the offender is liable to this higher penalty, a minimum of 25 per cent and a maximum of 50 per cent. The offence defined in the new subsection 2 of section 56 is one which falls short of being wilful in the sense in which that term is used in subsection 1 but is one where the evasion is done knowingly or, for example, where there has been an omission and the omission is equivalent to gross negligence on the part of the taxpayer in the discharge of the duty or obligation created by the act.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not want to press the minister for legal advice, because in the last three or four years he has been engaged in other duties. However, as a layman, shall I say, I do not see what the distinction is between one who has evaded tax in a wilful manner under section 56 as it now stands and one who omits statements in a return knowingly or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence. Could the minister, with the help of the officials who are before him, give an illustration of the in between land that exists with respect to which it is thought fit to change the penalty from one ranging from a minimum of 25 per cent to a maximum of 50 per cent to a maximum penalty of 25 per cent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In the experience of the Department of National Revenue there have been cases where, in the view of the department, there was not sufficient evidence to establish a clear case of wilful evasion within the meaning of section 56 but where, had there been such a provision in effect as is now proposed by clause 16, there would have been ample evidence to establish a clear case of an offence on the part of a taxpayer who knowingly or as the result of gross negligence on his part has failed to discharge a duty or obligation imposed upon him by the act.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, in the view of the minister some taxpayers may have hitherto escaped the consequences of the penalties involved in section 56 of the act, where it says that every person who has wilfully done certain things shall be subject to a certain penalty. I take it the minister is saying that such persons may have escaped the results of the law and that some people will perhaps be caught, who otherwise might escape, by reason of the new subsection 2 of section 56 which refers to every person who knowingly, or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence, has made statements or omissions in his return that were not proper. I find some difficulty in discovering the difference between wilfully doing this kind of thing and doing it knowingly or under circumstances amounting to gross negligence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The answer to the hon. member's question is yes.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 32—Mailing date.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Clause 32 is the last clause with respect to which an amendment is proposed. I gave notice of it on June 17 and I would ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence to move this amendment.

Mr. Pearkes: I move:

That Bill C-68, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, be amended

(a) by striking out lines 10 to 12 on page 20 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

32. (1) Section 136 of the said act is amended by adding thereto, immediately after subsection (12) thereof, the following subsections:

(b) by adding thereto, immediately after line 19 on page 20 thereof, the following:

(12b) Where any notice of an assessment has been sent by the minister as required by this act, the assessment shall be deemed to have been made on the day of mailing of the notice of the assessment."

(2) Subsection (12b) of section 136 of the said act as enacted by this section is applicable in respect of any assessment whether made before or after the coming into force of this section, except where an appeal from any such assessment was instituted before the coming into force of this section.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister provide an explanation? I think the amendment has reference to a recommendation made by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which the original resolution did not entirely meet.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member came close to dealing with this subject on June 6. The purpose of the amendment is to establish very clearly, beyond any question, the intent that was set forth at that time in relation to the original resolution. This is in keeping with the recommendations put forward in a joint brief submitted by the chartered accountants and lawyers in relation to the amendment of section 46, subsection 4 of the act.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman; I raised this when we were debating the resolution as worded by the minister when he introduced it on March 31, budget night. I indicated on June 6, during the debate, that I felt the resolution was lacking in some clarity and some substance. I think this amendment takes care of the points that were raised in that debate.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On clause 33—Death benefit.

Mr. Benidickson: I believe clause 33 has very widespread interest, because death benefits which arise as the result of employment are becoming of some consequence today. Perhaps the minister has a statement to read to the committee.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not know that I have any statement to read. The explanatory notes in the bill are quite clear and are fairly lengthy. Clause 33 of the bill makes a number of amendments which are related to the definition of death benefits. The present law provides that there shall be an exemption of $10,000 or an amount equal to an employee's yearly remuneration, whichever is the lesser, but it does not state who shall receive this exemption if the employee dies without leaving a widow and the death benefit is payable to several people. The amendment deals with that situation.

Subclause 5 has the same subject matter as paragraph 8 of the income tax resolution which was dealt with on June 6. I refer to Hansard, page 4588. This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is intended to clarify the rules for computing income from a particular place or source. The Income Tax Act permits certain deductions in computing income. It provides also a definition of income from a source or from a particular place, but at present this definition does not make it clear that the deductions generally permitted in computing income also apply when computing income from a source or from a particular place. It is necessary that this be clarified for the purpose of computing income from a foreign country so that the foreign tax credit may be correctly computed. It is necessary also that the meaning of income from a source be clarified for the purpose of computing income of a non-resident person from business or employment in Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Is subclause 4 something new, or is it just something that was perhaps overlooked when there was an amendment in 1959?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This amendment simply adds the reference to part II (c) to the previous language of section 139.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister, with respect to subclause 5, just spell out the definition of income from a source or a particular place, as referred to here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, it was on subclause 5 that I was speaking principally in saying what I did just a moment ago.

Mr. Benidickson: It will be on the record.

BROADCASTING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON RADIO AND TELEVISION

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That a select committee be appointed on broadcasting to consider radio and television broadcasting with power to examine and inquire into the matters herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon and to send for persons, papers and records;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable or necessary;

That the committee shall consist of 35 members;

That standing orders 66 and 67 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. Chevrier: May we call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Nowlan: When the house rose for the luncheon recess order No. 7, dealing with the appointment of a select committee on broadcasting, had been called. It is not my purpose at the moment to make any extended remarks whatsoever on this matter. This motion arises out of the hearings of the committee last year. At the conclusion of those hearings an understanding was arrived at that a similar committee would be set up during this session.

I can anticipate some criticism to the effect that the committee should have been set up earlier, and so on and so forth. I shall be prepared at least to consider those arguments if, as and when they are presented to this house. At the moment all I wish to say is that this committee is being set up now and that the terms of reference are slightly different from those of the committee of last year, but I think only in detail, not in principle.

Last year the committee was set up to deal exclusively with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am advised by the law officers of the department and of the House of Commons that this resolution meets that requirement, and that in addition to the reference to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation there is included the Canadian association of broadcasters, or in other words the private broadcasters of Canada, and also the board of broadcast governors. I think the committee last year expressed the opinion that at the next session they should have an opportunity to consider the work of the board of broadcast governors as well as the opinions of the C.A.B. Other than that, this motion is exactly the same as the motion which has been presented to this house throughout the years.

I do not think any good purpose would be served by my making any extensive remarks at this time, although at the conclusion of the debate, if there is one, I shall be glad to deal with any matters which are raised.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I hope there will not be any extended debate on this motion, for this reason. I am going to suggest to the minister —and I might as well make the suggestion right at the outset—that at the conclusion of such debate as there may be he seek leave of the house to withdraw this motion. To introduce this motion at this stage of this session of parliament, unless it is intended to adjourn parliament next week and come back in September or October—in which case I think it would be more sensible to wait until September or October to introduce the motion—is making a mockery of parliament.

In support of that statement I think perhaps I could read no greater authority than the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), the Minister of National Revenue, speaking in this house on August 25, 1958 at a good deal earlier stage of the session of 1958 than we have now reached in the session of 1960. On August 25, 1958 we had not sat for as many days as we have now been sitting in this session. At that time, speaking about a proposal that had appeared in the speech from the throne at the beginning of that session, the minister said he thought it was too late to appoint a committee which could do anything useful. Here are his exact words, which are to be found at page 4045 of Hansard of August 25, 1958:

As far as the regulations are concerned—

That is to say, the regulations which would be made under the Broadcasting Act which was then under consideration in the house.

—they are to be promulgated by the board itself, and neither I nor anyone else can say, except in very broad outline, what they are going to be. So, frankly, I do not know what purpose would be served by a committee at this time. However, if the house wants a committee it will get one. I might, however, point out that this house will probably close, we hope, this week, next week, or some time in the relatively near future.

I certainly echo that hope.

I suspect there will be a certain amount of breath taking and a little relief from pressure—

I think I could echo that hope also.

—and that the government will then be dealing with the backlog of matters—

I think it is about time they started dealing with the backlog of matters today.

—which hon. gentlemen know always accumulate during a session. Then it will give consideration to the personnel of these two boards.

The minister next went on to say something about their appointment. Then he went on to make this statement, about which I want to say something. It is found at page 4046 of Hansard of that year:

On behalf of the government, Mr. Speaker, I would say—

Mr. Nowlan: Is that 1958?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, the same year; August 25, 1958. The minister said this:

On behalf of the government, Mr. Speaker, I would say that if it is requested at the next session of parliament, we will shortly after the session begins set up a special committee of the house to deal with radio and broadcasting generally. All these matters can be referred to that committee, and perhaps the committee can watch the organization take shape and form and grow during the session rather than speculate, which is all we can do now concerning the operation of the bill.

I took that statement then, as I take it still, to be an undertaking on the part of the government. This matter came up for discussion on a number of other occasions, as the hon. gentleman will recall, when the view taken on this side of the house was that we wanted to have a committee which would not go on fishing expeditions in all sorts of quarters but would have specific terms of reference and would address itself to consideration of the operation of the broadcasting legislation which the hon. gentleman was then piloting through the house.

We in the Liberal opposition took the very strongest exception to certain features of that broadcasting legislation. In forgoing at the request of the hon. gentleman a right which we would have had to have that legislation considered in committee, to have witnesses called, and so on, we always understood that we were to have a committee on the legislation and its operation. But instead of that, when we did get a committee last year we had a committee that turned itself into a kind of super board of governors of the C.B.C. and started to niggle about all kinds of little things about which most members of this house have no real knowledge and no competence to discuss, seeking to supplant the board which parliament had appointed under its legislation—legislation of which we did not entirely approve—for the purpose of regulating broadcasting.

We do not think any useful purpose at all would be served by that kind of committee. What we want is a committee that will consider the principles on which the broadcasting legislation is based and on which broadcasting operates in this country, and we want to consider them in a reasonable and systematic manner.

That there is need for such a committee I do not for one minute deny, and I want to give one or two illustrations of the kind of thing into which I think there is some need for a committee to look. But before I do that I want to say why we do not think this committee should be set up at this stage of the session.

We do not think it should be set up at this stage of the session because it is utterly impossible for those members of the opposition—and I speak only for my own colleagues in the opposition because other members of the opposition will speak for themselves—who are greatly interested in the subject of broadcasting to do their duty in this house and their duty in one or two other committees which are of the utmost importance, particularly in the banking and commerce committee which is sitting at this very moment and where I ought to be if I did not have to be here.

Mr. McGee: You have 48 members.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is going to be quite impossible to give any kind of adequate consideration to this committee. The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) said something about 48 members. It is quite true that there are 48 members of the opposition, and it is also quite true that every one of them has equal rights and equal opportunities. But we do know as a matter of fact that on both sides of the house there are certain people who have certain interests, and we know that there is legislation before this parliament which has to be considered by committees if the legislation is going to be dealt with at all.

There will be nothing before this committee except the general subject of broadcasting, and the general subject of broadcasting has not changed to any appreciable degree since last January. There is no reason why this committee could not have been set up at latest by February 1, and could not have had its meetings at a time when there was no legislation to be considered and when those members who had devoted some study to the matter and are especially interested in it would have had ample opportunity to give the kind of consideration to the committee which ought to be given a subject of this importance.

As I say, at this stage I am not going to do more than appeal to the minister to get the consent of the house at the end of this debate to withdraw this motion and give us an undertaking that as the first item of ordinary business at the next session a similar motion will be made. I think it would be preferable if the government would give consideration to an amendment of the standing orders to make the broadcasting committee a standing committee of the house. I have been in government, and I know what an embarrassment it is to find time for a debate such as we are engaged in now.

Perhaps I should not say anything in extenuation of the government, but I know it is sometimes difficult jockeying for position to get things on. It is often said that a certain debate will take a whole day and that that is a day lost and a motion gets put off from week to week and then from month to month, as this motion did. Of course it was not on the order paper for very long; it was only put on the order paper on May 30, but it might have been put on in January and still have been in much the same position. I feel that at this stage of the session we should not be put in this kind of position at all.

The other thing is that I appeal to the minister to do what in 1958 he certainly gave us in the opposition the impression he was going to do, namely to introduce a motion in express terms so the terms of reference of that committee will deal with the Broadcasting Act and the operations of the act itself, instead of permitting these general investigations into this, that and the other thing connected with the detailed operations of broadcasting. I am not saying that if hon. members do not want to do that they should be denied the opportunity; not at all; but I do think a prior commitment was given to the opposition by the government which I maintain has not been kept and which I think should be kept. That is the argument I am making.

I am not arguing that this committee should not be set up because an investigation is not needed. An investigation is needed, but it does seem to me that, at this stage of the session, the only appropriate way in which we can carry on a discussion on broadcasting at all is in committee of supply, when the estimates come before us. I might say that is one reason why this whole situation is different from what it was in the past. In the past, up until 1956, there were no estimates of the C.B.C. and no broadcasting estimates. The C.B.C. was provided with a budget in another way, and the only opportunity for any discussion of broadcasting was in a committee. But now, owing to a regrettable step taken by the present government, a step which we intend to change when we get into office, there is an annual budget for the C.B.C. which keeps the C.B.C. pretty effectively under the thumb under the Minister of Finance.

That is a principle in which we do not believe. It is a principle which leads in the direction of totalitarianism. We believe that the C.B.C. and the whole broadcasting set-up in Canada should have the same kind of independence the judiciary has. That is the only safe way to have broadcasting by the state.

Mr. Nowlan: Are you saying that the government should not submit appropriations in this respect to be approved by parliament?

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister knows as well as I do that the salaries of judges are fixed in the Judges Act, that they are a statutory charge, and that the government has no control of them whatsoever once a judge is appointed.

Mr. Nowlan: Except that parliament approves them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Parliament approves the act.

Mr. Nowlan: Is the hon. member suggesting that parliament should not pass any vote with respect to the C.B.C.?

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no. The hon. minister has no doubt forgotten, but I am suggesting that one of the schemes, or some variant of it, that the Fowler commission recommended for the financing of broadcasting be adopted.

Mr. Nowlan: Which variant do you suggest?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not prepared, until I have the responsibility, to say precisely which variant I would have, but I am prepared to define precisely what ought to be done. There should be an assured budget for a period of not less than five years which cannot be changed up or down by parliament. As we know, under our constitution the only way money can be spent from the treasury of this country is by recommendation from the crown, which means from the ministry of the day. But if the broadcasting corporation is dependent, as it is now, on the treasury board, I am not saying whether or not this has happened but there is the opportunity for it to happen; as the hon. gentleman well knows, and certainly as the Prime Minister that great authority on parliamentary government and on human liberty knows, the moment you make an appropriation which is dependent upon ministers and is settled secretly behind closed doors in treasury board, you are inviting that agency to curry favour with the government in order to get its appropriation increased, or even to maintain it.

Mr. Nowlan: Was that the hon. gentleman's opinion prior to 1957?

Mr. Pickersgill: That was the hon. gentleman's opinion prior to 1957, and that is why I, as a member of the government, joined in the recommendation that Mr. St. Laurent made for the establishment of the Fowler commission. It is true that for one year the previous government, in order to meet an emergency, did act the other way, and we said it was wrong when we did it. We explained that it was an emergency and proceeded to set up the Fowler commission.

Mr. Nowlan: Then would the hon. member explain to me—and I am not dealing with one year but with every year—why the minister responsible had to approve expenditures of $25,000 or over, whether it was for programming or anything else?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is referring to capital expenditure—

Mr. Nowlan: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is not referring to capital expenditures at all?

Mr. Nowlan: I was referring to operating expenditures.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it is very unlikely that there was any individual item under operating expenditures of over $25,000.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister can make his own speech in his own time. I say, of course, that capital expenditure which involves extending the operations of the corporation should, as the Fowler commission very correctly pointed out, be brought before parliament and approved by parliament. On the other hand the control of operating expenditures should be kept as free as possible in order to avoid any possibility or suspicion that any government can say that heads will roll if certain things are not done.

We believe, and we have always believed, that the state-operated broadcasting system should be subject to parliament and not to the government. This was spelled out carefully in the Massey commission report. It was spelled out in the Fowler report and in all previous documents, and never until the present occupants of the treasury benches had to do with this matter has anyone sought to prostitute broadcasting by legislation, over our strong objections, in the way that is now being done.

I know the minister will beat his breast and say that he and his colleagues respect freedom so much that they lean over backward not to interfere, but it should not be necessary to lean over backward or forward or in any other way. The possibility should not exist, and would not exist—

Mr. Nowlan: What about Corner Brook?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, what about Corner Brook? I do not even know what the hon. gentleman is talking about. If he wants to explain later, he can go ahead and explain. I have no idea what he is referring to in this context.

There is something I do know something about, and it is this. Under this legislation a certain obligation was placed upon the president and the vice president of the C.B.C. and last year, as the hon. gentleman will recall, certain questions were asked in this house about certain regrettable things that happened at a time when the president of the corporation was absent. Then later the vice president, on account of the stress and strain of certain circumstances, also had to be absent.

I asked the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), who was then in the government and was the acting minister, to tell us who was presiding over the board of the C.B.C. The hon. member took my question as notice, and subsequently the present minister gave an answer to the question as will be found on page 5777 of Hansard of July 10, 1959. Perhaps it would be convenient to put both the question and the answer on record:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could put a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Could the minister tell us who at the present time is performing the statutory functions of the president of the C.B.C. as chairman of the board of directors?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Colonel Landry is, as I said, chairman of the management committee, and Mr. Dunsmore is chairman of the executive committee of the board of directors and the absence of the vice president is acting as chairman of the board.

It cannot be said that the question took the minister by surprise, because he had been given notice of it. One would have thought that in circumstances such as these, when a question of this importance was being asked, the minister would have fortified himself with all the available information. Yet after parliament had adjourned, in fact after the session had been prorogued, an announcement was made that Mr. Dunsmore had been appointed chairman of the board. I have here a news item from the Gazette of August 18, 1959 which reads "Dunsmore is named C.B.C. board head." The text is as follows:

Robert L. Dunsmore, retired oil company head and former president of the Montreal board of trade has been named chairman of the C.B.C. board of directors, it was announced yesterday.

On subsequent inquiries being made it turned out—I have all the documents here, but I do not wish to weary the house by going into the details—it turned out that Mr. Dunsmore was elected to be chairman of the board at a meeting on June 23 or 24. This transaction apparently had been kept secret from the minister, or at least the minister said nobody ever told him about it. Then, after parliament had adjourned, this information was ferreted out by the press, who were apparently more successful than I had been by asking a direct question here in parliament. It seems to me that even had there been no question about the legality of this whole performance it was a very shabby way to treat parliament or any member of parliament asking questions about public business in such an important sphere as this. But I have the very greatest doubt about the legality of this whole transaction.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say now that it seems to me the hon. member is widening the debate more than he should, because the motion is concerned with the appointment of a select committee. It seems to me the hon. member is discussing matters which have no relation to this question.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say, on the point of order, that when there is a motion to establish a committee it has been the practice in the past, I believe, to deal not only with matters which are likely to come before the committee but with matters which have already come before the committee. I do not think the hon. member has gone beyond that point in his remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I agree, but I think the hon. member was not discussing anything which was discussed before the committee last year or that is likely to be discussed this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: I assure Your Honour that you are under a grave misapprehension, because if the government persists and does establish a committee of the kind proposed, this matter will certainly be discussed in that committee. I say this notwithstanding the fact that it might be an argument for not discussing it here and now.

What I should like to point out to Your Honour is that I am seeking to persuade the minister not to proceed with this motion at the present time. I am seeking to persuade the minister that when he makes the motion at the next session of parliament he should make the kind of motion which will enable us to come to grips with these things that really matter; that is to say, with the fundamentals of the broadcasting legislation. I am suggesting that the C.B.C. board of governors, under the law as it now stands, had no power to substitute anyone, except in an emergency and for an emergency period, for a temporary period, for the president in his capacity as chairman of the board.

If one examines the debates—and I do not intend to go into details on this; I shall do that on the estimates—if one examines the exchanges that took place on this precise point during the debate on the bill he will find it is perfectly clear that parliament never contemplated—and if the government contemplated it they were misleading parliament—at the time that legislation went through that in this clandestine manner someone would be substituted for the president of the C.B.C. as chairman of the board. Certainly I have nothing to say in a personal way about Mr. Dunsmore one way or another. He may be an altogether more suitable person to be the chairman of the board than the president. That is not the point at issue. What I am saying is that parliament enacted a certain law and something else is being done, and it is certainly something that should not be permitted to continue.

I also wish to say it seems to me that one of the other fundamental matters that ought to be considered by a committee is the whole new question of the criteria for the granting of licences to private television stations in places where the C.B.C. also is, and the duplication as well by the C.B.C. of stations in places now served by private television. Hon. members know, because I have asked questions and expressed views about it, that I regard it as an unnecessary waste of the taxpayers' money to have a public television station established in the city of Edmonton, which is very well served at the present time by a private station, when there are all kinds of outlying points like places in Newfoundland and northern Manitoba,—

Mr. Fisher: And in northern Ontario.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and in northern Ontario which are not served, though I have no doubt the hon. member for Port Arthur will have something to say about that. I feel that this kind of extension, this use of public funds to extend television coverage in areas already adequately covered, when there are a great many parts of Canada that have no coverage, indicates a very mistaken idea of priority.

I also feel that we need some explanation of the care with which the board of broadcast governors appeared to follow what I believe everyone thought was the established principle that, while no place should be denied television coverage because no one except the local newspaper or a corporation largely owned by that newspaper would provide it, in places where there were other applicants equally worthy and equally competent it was undesirable as a matter of public policy, frequently expressed on both sides of this house, that newspapers or organizations closely allied with newspapers should be preferred to other applicants. It is very hard now to understand this extraordinary decision which was made in Toronto in favour of a newspaper whose proprietor, according to all reports, months before the application was heard by the board went about saying that there was no need for them to hold any hearing because he already had it. It does seem to me that is something which needs very careful investigation, as well as the whole policy underlying that situation.

I might say in that context, sir, that the same newspaper apparently has a great deal of worry, because it has spent a lot of time trying to misrepresent what has been said in criticism of the decision in this matter.

I do hope that before the minister approves this Edmonton television station, unless the governor in council has approved it already, the estimates will be brought forward and we shall be given an opportunity to discuss the wisdom of that move.

It does seem to me, sir, that I should go back to my original and fundamental point and not take more of the time of the house on other matters. As I say, we feel that a committee is desirable; we feel that there should be a committee every year; we feel that the most advisable way of dealing with this matter from the point of view of saving the time of the house would be to have a standing committee so that it would be just set up in the same way as the other standing committees and the time of the house saved in those circumstances. But we do not feel that a committee set up on the 107th day of the session can possibly be expected, in view of all the demands upon our time both in the house and in other committees where it is essential for members to be present if they are to do their duty properly, to do the work that requires to be done. We do not think it is the appropriate thing to do at all.

I appeal to the minister to give us an undertaking that the committee will be set up early in the next session, and to withdraw this motion. However, if the minister is not willing to accede to this appeal—and I hope he will indicate what his intentions are one way or the other before he speaks in closing the debate—I think we are entitled to be told so by someone from the government side at an early stage; because if that does happen we intend, in order to test the house, to move that this motion be read this day six months hence. But I do not wish to do that unless the minister cares to say one way or the other right now what his intentions are. I would prefer to leave it to the minister to withdraw the motion.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for me and my colleagues to be belligerent, but it is very hard for us to do other than react rather badly to this particular motion at this particular time. We feel that it is a bad time in the session to be bringing it in. It would be different, we feel, if we could contemplate the session moving rather slowly toward an end some time in September, but we are already under a certain amount of forced draft and we are likely to be forced even further in so far as the extension of hours is concerned.

There are a great number of committees meeting. The previous speaker referred to that fact. I was bothered by the interjection from one of the Conservative members challenging the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that there are 48 other Liberals. We have had this challenge thrown, not only to the Liberals but to our very small group, a number of times by the Prime Minister and by other people that we need to learn to spread the work around and we should not expect any special privileges because we are in the opposition. It is not a case of expecting special privileges, but I think the government members, and especially the senior government members, should realize—I know that the veterans know it—that there is a difference in the roles that opposition members and government members play in much of the work here.

Quite frankly, we cannot give the attention that this committee deserves if it is set up and gets under way. That being the case, we can only feel that it is bad to set up the committee. If the Conservative members feel that with their great strength they can man the committee and do the job, they are entitled to believe that; but I think they have to recognize that the opposition should be playing some role.

I want to make some specific references to the committee of last year. I should like to point out to the minister that the members of that committee from the government side who made the greatest contribution in terms of cross-examination and good attendance, and who were the key people in preparing the report, are all involved in activities that will make it very difficult for them to take part in the work of the committee this year. The chairman is already involved as chairman of another committee this session. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), who played a large role in the committee, is now parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance and is also taking part in other committees. The hon. member who is parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence was very active in the committee last year, and we gather that he has his work cut out for him now in his departmental role. I could go right down the list of members who played an active part in that committee, which might be an invidious thing to do, and point out that all of them, both opposition and government members, are actively involved either in other committees or in extended commitments they did not have last summer.

It seems to me that this supports the logic that the government should withdraw this motion and give us an undertaking that the committee will be set up early in the next session. To argue this way is not to argue that there is not a great deal of work for a committee to do. The aftermaths of last summer still linger. I think the most unfortunate one, and I cannot articulate it in this debate, is that there has been a terrible effect upon the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think the programming situation has gone to the dogs. In my opinion there is a gutlessness in the organization which is amazing and most regrettable.

I think we could very well spend a great deal of time in this committee, if we had the time, trying to encourage and develop a completely new approach on the part of parliament and the government. I do not know how the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate manages to separate them so neatly. It seems to me we need a new approach as to what the role of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is going to be. As commercialism has been extended this year in an effort to make more money, partly as a result of the committee's recommendation, it seems to me we are getting more and more vacuity and a poorer and poorer job in public affairs.

For example, I think that the coverage the C.B.C. has given recent Canadian political affairs involving provincial elections is ridiculous. If you turn on the radio at any time you can hear about Khrushchev or Castro or Nasser, but apparently the C.B.C. feels that where people like Stanfield, Hicks, Douglas and Thatcher are concerned it will get into hot water if it gives them any kind of decent coverage. I sometimes wonder how we are going to get a Canadian nationality through the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation when it seems to concentrate most of its public affairs programs upon foreign affairs, and I say that without any regret at all. Surely there is enough of interest in our own country to give this organization something to do. But its objectives in that field are falling farther and farther away from the mark. I think they are scared stiff to do some decent programming relating to Canadian issues in the public affairs field. They are scared stiff partly because of the incidents of last summer in which the broadcasting committee was involved.

I think the board of broadcast governors has everyone up in the air. I have here the lovely correspondence which the Globe and Mail published as a result of the decision to give the Telegram the television licence in Toronto. I have heard that it was solicited, but whether or not it was solicited it is a magnificent collection of letters, especially starting with the one by Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., whom we all know was an interested party, entitled by the paper "The Curtain Falls". I think we all appreciated the touch of poetry in the last part of the letter, where these words were used:

> 'Ere they hewed the Sphinx's visage
> Favoritism governed kissage,
> Even as it does in this age
> And it will do evermore.

The general reaction to the award of that particular licence to the Telegram and Mr. Aldred and the others associated with him was, I think, the most vivid indication of disappointment in the board of broadcast governors that one could imagine. At one stroke it seemed to undo everything toward which the board of broadcast governors was moving, and it is still unfathomable to me and to many others. Before the award was made there was a great deal of speculation around the House of Commons. A number of us had our No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3 predictions, and invariably for a whole host of reasons the bottom one in the order was the Telegram entry. Yet the Telegram got the licence.

When the board of broadcast governors turned their backs upon the Siftons in Winnipeg we seemed to have an indication that newspapers were not going to be given these licences, but then we got the Telegram. I think it is generally agreed by people who follow newspapers that you have to go a long way and search extensively to find a metropolitan daily as bad in almost every way as the Toronto Telegram. If the standards of the Toronto Telegram are going to be transferred to the television station all I can say is, God help the Toronto listeners and watchers. I have no brief, and I do not think anyone in this party has, for the Toronto Globe and Mail, but better the Globe and Mail a thousand times than the Telegram.

An hon. Member: What about the Star?

Mr. Fisher: Someone says "what about the Star?" The Star did not make a serious application, as I think everyone knows.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, is this a discussion of newspapers in Toronto or a discussion of a motion to set up a committee? I think we should get back to the subject under discussion. I would be very glad to discuss these matters with the hon. member on another occasion.

Mr. Fisher: If this is a point of order I should like to point out that I do not know of any bigger controversy in the broadcasting field than that involving the issuance of this licence and everything related to it.

Mr. Nowlan: Get on with the appointment of the committee, then, and do not seek to have it put off.

Mr. Fisher: The point is that I think the committee cannot investigate the board of broadcast governors at this time in any sound way. I do not think the committee can really move unless it has the time to approach the matter carefully, and we all saw what rush did last summer. Maybe it would be just as well if the opposition withdrew from the committee and let a little conclave of Conservative members get together to work out government policy on broadcasting and where the board of broadcast governors stands. I think we might perhaps get a policy from the backbenchers that we could at least take a swing at, instead of the pious suggestion that of course the government would not use any influence in the granting of a licence.

I suppose direct influence was not necessary when you look at the composition of the board of broadcast governors. The only serpent in that particular Eden is Dr. Eugene Forsey. I have not heard a question around Ottawa that is more pertinent and relevant or that has everyone more puzzled than what in the name of the Lord happened to Forsey?

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been asking that question for years.

Mr. Fisher: After this decision I have reached the stage where I can agree with the hon. member. What did happen to Forsey? In any case, if we look at the others we see that we have a brother in law of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees), undoubtedly a fine man. We have Mr. Sabourin who is known as a Conservative organizer in Montreal. We have Mr. Brown, who I understand is a prominent Vancouver Conservative. We have Dr. Connell, a neighbour and close friend of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for many years. We have Mr. Duhamel, who again is a well known Conservative. We have Mr. Duchemin, who is the publisher of a newspaper. I took the trouble to go and read it a little while ago, and I did discover that it seemed to take the Conservative line.

Mr. Nowlan: How could it help it?

Mr. Fisher: The minister interjects, how could it help it. Another member of the board is a former leader of the Conservative association in Newfoundland, and another was secretary of the Conservative association of Prince Edward Island.

An hon. Member: All smart men.

Mr. Fisher: I would not doubt that they are smart men, but they are also party men.

Mr. Nowlan: No.

Mr. Fisher: If the committee, by its decisions—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member to recall that we are discussing a motion to set up a select committee. It is in order, of course, to discuss generally the problems which may be submitted to the committee, but I think the hon. member is going further than that and I would ask him to desist.

Mr. Fisher: I shall try to narrow it down, Mr. Speaker. I should like to point out to the minister that I hope he is—

Mr. Nowlan: You cannot get much narrower than you have been in the past few minutes.

Mr. Fisher: Then perhaps I should broaden out. I should like to point out that last year a gentleman by the name of Professor Donald Creighton came with another professor to the board of broadcast governors and presented a brief which in essence advocated keeping newspapers out of television. If that particular Conservative voice had been heard or had been on the board I think some of our worries in that direction would not have arisen.

I wanted to reinforce, with one example, the need for some kind of check upon the C.B.C. in connection with these lovely vice presidents it now has. We were told the C.B.C. needed reorganization. Well, it certainly has been reorganized, and it has sprouted vice presidents all over the place.

Mr. Pickersgill: And they got rid of the vice president.

Mr. Fisher: Yes. I should like to know whether the new board of directors of the C.B.C. were really consulted in connection with these creations, because I find it difficult to believe that you streamline an organization by creating a whole bunch of vice presidents.

One of the matters that has bothered me about the C.B.C. is the tendency to weasel ever since the broadcasting committee sat last year. I want to give an example of this, and it relates to an answer that was given to me through the minister reporting for the C.B.C. Last February I had a question on the order paper, and it was this:

> At the meeting of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation board of directors in January at Winnipeg did one of the directors make a statement or a report, verbal or written, on audience reaction to Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programming?

What I had in mind was the well known Mrs. Aitken and her campaign to develop several thousand program critics across the country. The second question was:

> If so, which director and in what form was the report?
> Was this report prepared by the director in person or was it prepared in co-operation with officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?
> If the latter, what officials in which branch of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

I should like to ask you to pay attention to this doozer of an answer I got, Mr. Speaker. The answer was as follows:

> —I am advised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that minutes and proceedings of the board of directors of the corporation have always been regarded as confidential,—

This is a laugh, because that report was spread all over the Winnipeg Free Press and all over the Winnipeg Tribune.

> —and this has been recognized since the inception of the corporation. Names of individuals involved in the business of the corporation have also been regarded as confidential, a practice reaffirmed by the 1959 parliamentary committee on broadcasting.

Yet the minister and others know that in the report that was splattered all over the newspapers Mrs. Aitken said something to the effect that the people of Canada were tired of Foster Hewitt. I have no brief for Foster Hewitt, but what business has she, as the result of her report and her investigation and the subsidized use of C.B.C. personnel, to come out with a report like that? Then we are told by the minister answering for the C.B.C. that this had nothing to do with it at all. Surely when Mrs. Aitken goes to Winnipeg to a meeting of the C.B.C. she is going in a public capacity, and the statements she makes there in regard to her investigations are something relating to the C.B.C. board of directors. The answer the minister gave ended in this way:

> Consequently it is not considered in the best interests of the corporation to depart from that practice at this time.

This is nothing but weaseling in not giving an honest or direct answer. I say we are aware that the corporation, through one of its branches, has spent a great deal of time and a great deal of money trying to co-operate with Mrs. Aitken on her audience research survey, this plan of hers to tap the ladies and other people who follow radio and television closely across the country. The result, as revealed in that answer, would tend to be a complete denial that this great big splurge that Mrs. Aitken made in Winnipeg has any substance at all.

This is not the way I understand it, and in my opinion it is another example of the fact that there was a hot potato issue here. I do not believe that this is important. I was just curious as to who gave Mrs. Aitken the right to stand up and sound off about the results of her survey. This is the kind of weasel answer you get instead of a pungent, direct and clear statement. Certainly there is no question about it; we need a much clearer policy on broadcasting and television than we have at the present time.

Issues have been popping up all the time. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate mentioned one, the question of the Edmonton station. I do not know how the members in the cities are affected, but if the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), and hon. members representing constituencies in northern Saskatchewan do not have people roosting on their tails all the time about the C.B.C. extending its facilities, then I am very much mistaken. This is one of the biggest issues in this part of the country.

What do they find? They find the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation putting up $300,000 to telecast football games. This is fine, and nobody will disagree with it. However, what about the prime responsibility of the corporation to give everyone in Canada service? We check up on the C.B.C. as to its future plans and find one of the most hesitant, backward, mystifying policies one could find in relation to extending their television service in this country. There is no policy at all that I can see. When you do investigate you are given a lot of figures about so many dollars per head, so many dollars per household.

The people in Churchill, in Flin Flon, in the northern part of Port Arthur, in Kenora-Rainy River, in northern New Brunswick and in these places do not want to hear about the cost per head when the C.B.C. is spending $300,000 on football or opening a station in Edmonton for additional coverage. They want to know when they are going to get some television service. If it is not up to those who are on the treasury board, the Minister of Finance or the minister responsible for this organization to do something, then I do not know where we are going to get the answer.

I had some hope when the board of broadcast governors was appointed that they would give a lead. It seems to me they have been stalling. There are no indications that they are taking this whole question of hinterland development into consideration at all.

Another matter that has come to the fore, it seems to me, is connected with the purchase of this North Bay station by the Thomson interests. It has not been ratified as yet by the board, but I suppose it is going to be considered. Surely they are in a position to decide, yes or no, whether we are going to have a continued build-up of these large corporate aggregations in the communications field.

Now, it seems to me that the Winnipeg decision which gave the Siftons a kick in the teeth—I do not believe the Siftons expected to get anything but a kick in the teeth—led us to believe that we were on our way. We were going to have no control by newspapers in the radio and television field; there was going to be a check on what had been a long-standing trend, but the Telegram case just reversed that.

Now we have Thomson spreading his empire in many parts of the empire, if I can put it that way. He is coming back into television in the manner on which we need a ruling and a decision fairly soon. No matter what the individual enterprise of a person who has a television licence or a station, there is no question that if someone offers a big enough price he will sell it. We can see that trend with the truckers who come down here bucking the C.N.R. They go into trucking and then they turn around the next day and sell out to the C.N.R. If Mr. Thomson gathers all the capital that has been offered to him over in Britain and comes back here I am sure he can wind up by buying almost every television station in Canada. It seems to me that we are at the stage where we need some kind of indication from the B.B.G., the government or some kind of public discussion as to how far this aggregating in television and radio should be allowed to go and the whole relationship of the press with the field.

I think we all noticed the sounding off done by Senator Rupert Davies over in England the other day when he came out with remarks that indicated that he had a low opinion of the board of broadcast governors and the harmful effect these decisions are going to have on broadcasting in Canada. I should like to point out to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that the senator is a Liberal, and a prominent one. As a matter of fact, he has a couple of newspapers and is interested in a television station. I wonder whether the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate does not need to do some work in so far as the Liberal party is concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would permit me to say that I understand that in the case of both these stations, those interests were the only applicants and that those places would not have obtained television otherwise.

Mr. Fisher: That may be so, Mr. Speaker. But it certainly would seem to me that if Senator Davies is following the Liberal principles we have had enunciated here by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate he would be considering disposing of his interest in one field or the other.

Mr. Pickersgill: I know the hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent me and I should really like to make this point clear. The view we took when we were in the government was that no place should be deprived of television because there was no other applicant, or no other applicant able to erect a television station, except a local newspaper. Where there was another applicant able to do so or approximately equally able to do so we took the view that the newspaper should not be preferred.

Mr. Fisher: I was interested in the Liberal convention in Ontario last November, Mr. Speaker, when a gentleman from Port Arthur who has been well known as a broadcaster and newspaperman was there and had this to say:

> Kenneth MacGray of Port Arthur said that for any one person to control mass media of communication "is not compatible with the Liberal party thought that broadcast licences must not be held by people already controlling one form of communication."

I just happen to fill that in because this Liberal happened to be working for Mr. Thomson when he said this. He is no longer working for Mr. Thomson.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is still a Liberal, though.

Mr. Fisher: It is a Liberal principle and I offer it not only to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate but to Senator Davies.

The fundamental question underlying the difficulties of television and broadcasting today in terms of policy stem from the reorientation the government gave to the long standing tradition that went back to the 1930's when it decided to encourage the C.B.C. to commercialize and to grant television licences. I am not the kind of socialist who is going to stand howling about the government making this decision. When you are faced with a government decision and a policy that sets us off on another line, while you may be critical of it, you must go along to the extent of trying to see that it works in the best way possible.

However, I now wonder whether we have not reached the stage where we have confusion compounded as a result of the two authorities, namely the B.B.G. and the C.B.C. and as a result of the private interests who are now in the television field. For the life of me I cannot see what we are going to get out of it in terms of what we used to expect from our broadcasting policies, namely some kind of dike or protection from United States cultural influences and some means of bringing national coverage—and I emphasize "national coverage"—to every part of the country. It seems to me that there are holes and pitfalls all over in so far as that policy is concerned as a result of recent developments.

In summing up, may I say that we think there is a great deal for a broadcasting committee to do, but we do not think this is the time or the occasion for it unless we can have the assurance that the government does not plan to extend the hours of the sittings but that it plans to take its time and probably to go on to mid-August or the first of September. In that case, with that length of time available it seems to me that by working slowly, with perhaps one meeting a week, the committee might do some kind of job. In any other circumstances it would be impracticable. I should still like to hear from the minister how he is going to man this committee from the government benches in terms of those people who were so active in the committee last year and who have so many other commitments this year.

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I shall be extremely brief. I wish to express a view altogether different from the argument advanced by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who said it is questionable whether the committee on broadcasting should sit at every session. This year that committee has yet to sit. That committee was formed not because of a whim of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), or of the government, or even of parliament. It is merely the result of a justifiable wish of the general public.

Last year, the committee performed a task that was difficult, I admit, but a useful one, since there has been a noticeable improvement in the C.B.C. Unfortunately, the improvement noted is not proportionate to the amount of work done by the committee.

I realize that we are now pretty late in this session. The pleasant summer months are starting, but the vital importance and urgent necessity of this committee certainly does not justify the objections being made today against its establishment.

In the first place, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate stated earlier that the C.B.C. should be as independent as the judiciary. If I am mistaken, I know he will correct me, but I believe that is what he said.

The C.B.C. is called upon to spend each year from $50 million to $100 million of taxpayers' money. Parliament is therefore justified in calling the C.B.C. to account for its administration. The public asks for it, the public demands it.

Moreover, even if last year, during committee proceedings we were often accused of partisanship, the number of letters received by committee members and other members of the house, together with the many comments reported in the press, not to mention what we were told by people of all political allegiances and of all schools of thought, all show that everybody readily approved of the work performed by the committee and asked, in fact, that it be carried on this year.

I am one of those who believe that the C.B.C. must enjoy a certain degree of independence. On the other hand, I also believe that this independence is no justification for extravagance or unwarranted expenditures that are even frowned upon by taxpayers.

I believe that in the matter of programming and expenditures, the C.B.C. should be given the free hand it needs for the proper management of its business. I believe, however, that a parliament of representatives elected by those who are paying to insure the efficient operation of the C.B.C. should nevertheless retain some control and ask the corporation for some account of its activity and management. As a matter of fact, it has been said over and again: "For an administration, the fear of parliament is the beginning of wisdom." The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) said earlier—in what seemed to me the strongest of his arguments—that since the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) is now parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, the committee could not possibly be efficient. He mentioned the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Chambers) and a few others. Now, I believe that, if the committee were to sit next September or January, those gentlemen would not be able to attend it either because I have a feeling that next year, they will be holding the same, if not higher, responsibilities.

That is why I must say that Conservative members of parliament are inclined to take up their work again this year, and are ready to co-operate to every possible extent in order to continue an inquiry started last year which had already begun to bear fruit and to give the committee a little more latitude than last year. People expect us to go on with this inquiry to obtain any information they are entitled to get.

Mr. Speaker, previous speakers listed a series of radio and television stations that have been granted licences. By a strange coincidence, it seemed that all those licences had been delivered to people whose political affiliation was not their own, which they seem to think extraordinary.

May I recall your attention to that point, Mr. Speaker, and tell you that, before the present administration came into power, licences were delivered, for instance, to station CFCM-TV and to station CKMI-TV owned by Messrs. Picard and Bray, people of known Liberal affiliations.

There is also station CJBR-TV in Rimouski, owned by Mr. Brillant, a Liberal member of the legislative council, Station CKBL, in Matane, is also operated by the same owner. In fact every television station in Quebec is operated under a licence granted by the former government, and is owned by Liberals. Talking of coincidences, the cases I have just mentioned are a rather striking example.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, let me say that if the investigation of the C.B.C. is to be continued, I feel sure that every hon. member will want to take part in the discussions of the committee that is to be set up, and do so in a very objective way. Quite obviously, we are not trying to make political hay. We, in Quebec are just winding up an election campaign, and I think if the committee had been sitting, it would have provided an opportunity for a certain amount of election talk; however, we are pleased that the committee will not be sitting until after the election. Thus, no one will be able to accuse us of trying to make political hay.

We are taking a completely objective attitude. We want to throw some light on the C.B.C. because I must say—and this will be my last word—that in the province of Quebec people are justly alarmed and concerned over the way a group of individuals are spending the taxpayers' money at the rate of over $50 million a year, without having to account for it to any authority.

(Text):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the minister if he is going to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill)?

Mr. Nowlan: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in that case I do not desire to delay the passing of this motion, but I do want to move a motion myself. However, before doing so there are one or two things I should like to say. They have already been said in general but perhaps not in as great a detail as I intend to put them on the record.

One of the things I wish to say is this. I think it is a mockery of parliament for the minister and the government to which he belongs to seek to establish a committee of this importance in the dying days of the session. I think it is also a mockery of parliament for the minister and those associated with him to expect that when other committees are sitting, in some cases eleven of them per day, it is going to be possible to discuss intelligently the matters which normally come before a committee such as this.

Mr. Speaker, I happen to have before me Votes and Proceedings for the last week. I hold in my hand the one dated Monday, June 13, and on it there are notices for the meeting of no less than eleven committees. I cannot begin to pick out those which are more important than others, but there are certainly four, if not five, of these which are of extreme importance where all of us sitting on both sides of the house who want to do our duty feel it is necessary to be present.

The next day, Tuesday, June 14, appears in Votes and Proceedings notices for the sittings of seven committees, several of which are important.

Then on Thursday, June 16, only three committees were required to sit; and on Friday, June 17, five committees were notified of sittings, two of them of extreme importance.

The Votes and Proceedings for Monday of this week, that is yesterday, indicates that notices were sent out of meetings, which ostensibly took place, for nine committees, the vast majority being of importance.

Now the minister seeks to set up a select committee on broadcasting to deal with a matter which when it was last submitted took many weeks, in fact months, to dispose of the matters which came before it.

I do not know what is in the mind of the house leader but I have some idea that if it is the intention of the government to complete the sittings of this session on one of these days in the not too far off future he will move to take away from us the lunch hour. How then, I ask, is it going to be possible to deal with the matters which should be discussed in a committee such as this? It is at that time that committees should be completing their work. It is at that time that committees should be giving consideration to handing in their reports to the house, not giving consideration to organizing committees.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has just referred to Votes and Proceedings for Monday last, which he said gave notice of the sittings of nine committees. Is it not a fact that those committee sittings were spread over three days and that the largest number sitting on any one day will be five on Thursday next, June 23? So it is not correct to leave the impression that nine committees were called for one day.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, the hon. member is correct and I thank him for correcting the impression which I may have left with the house. But none the less, while the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has made a correction so far as Votes and Proceedings for yesterday are concerned, I am sure he will agree that so far as the other Votes and Proceedings I referred to are concerned I was correct. Therefore, that would indicate that on Monday, a week prior to June 20, there were eleven committees that were sitting, or at least for which notices were given.

I refer now to Votes and Proceedings for Monday, June 13, when on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of that week there were eleven committees sitting, seven of them on Tuesday, one on Wednesday and three on Thursday.

But the point I was making, notwithstanding the interjection of the Minister of Justice, is none the less valid, that it is not logical and proper to be discussing matters of this kind at the end of the session.

When I was interrupted, I was saying it would take some time before it would be possible to organize this committee. Whoever will be responsible for the organization will have to give some thought to those who are to appear before the committee; whether the board of broadcast governors are to appear first, whether the independent broadcasting associations are to be called next, and things of that nature, and if, as I said earlier, it is the intention of the government to take away the lunch hour then our position will be an impossible one. Certainly it will be an impossible one in so far as the principles upon which broadcasting is based are concerned, because if we are to give those principles the consideration they deserve then it is in February at the beginning of the session that a committee of this importance should be established.

The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) who is not in his seat at the moment said a word or two this afternoon about matters concerning the province of Quebec. In so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, we remember that there was a very serious strike some years ago between the C.B.C. and the radio and television producers in reference to which the minister claimed the strike was illegal whereas his colleague the Secretary of State (Mr. Balcer) said it was legal. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) was unable to make up his mind one way or the other. The point I am making here is that it seems to be a Tory idea that when there is a Tory government in office the C.B.C. should support the Tory government or be put out of business.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh.

An hon. Member: Bunkum.

Mr. Nowlan: Would you develop that point, because my friends do not believe it?

Mr. Chevrier: The minister says "Oh". I am interrupted, and I am told it is bunk. But I sent the minister yesterday a statement which appeared in Le Devoir and which was also, though not in exactly the same terms, in the Gazette a statement which clearly indicated that the Tory premier of one of the provinces of this country had intimated that if a private individual Mr. Rene Levesque was not removed from the post he held with the C.B.C. he, the premier of the province would set up a radio and broadcasting station. If that is not an indication of interference or indicative of an intention to interfere, I do not know what it is.

I think I could go a step further and say to the minister responsible for the C.B.C. that I have looked carefully at a number of the political broadcasts which have taken place in connection with the provincial election in Quebec and can say without hesitation that there has been in some cases a great unfairness on the part of those who are responsible for allocating the time between the parties involved in an election. I have seen cases, details of which I can give to the minister, where on three different occasions in one broadcast on the eleven o'clock news the premier and two of his ministers appeared. Reference was made to what had been said by the leader of the opposition, Mr. Lesage, but there was no appearance as far as he was concerned. That was repeated on many occasions. Where the fault lies I do not know, but I think this is one of the things that should be corrected. Of course, it is too late to correct it now, but it is not too late to discuss it when this committee is established save that the time which will be available to those who wish to consider some of the principles which will be open to discussion will be far too short unless, of course, as is stated by one hon. member here, it is the intention that we sit right through until the fall.

Then there was some question about the television licence which was granted to the city of Toronto. I know the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) fairly well, and I know he takes his responsibilities seriously. I know, too, that it would be far from his mind to be giving instructions in so far as that licence is concerned. On the other hand, I think he will agree with those of us on this side who state that this is one licence which should not have been granted, because there is no doubt in the world about where that newspaper stands. If the board of broadcast governors are going to be dominated by political considerations, all right, let us be told about it. It certainly appears quite clear from the position which was taken with reference to that application that the intention of the board of broadcast governors was, right from the outset, that the newspaper should be granted a licence. It is not a good thing, in my opinion, that that should have been done and I join with my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate in complaining about it and condemning the decision.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he suggesting that they should be disqualified on this ground alone, because of their apparent partisanship?

Mr. Chevrier: I am suggesting that they should not have boasted in advance that they were going to get a licence and indicated, not only in that field but in another field which I shall have I hope an opportunity to discuss later, that they were going to get the licence, because that was placing the board of broadcast governors in a very unenviable position, certainly in a position which permitted the public to come to no other conclusion but that they were unduly influenced by the application. Certainly that is the conclusion to which I come, and it is the conclusion which many of us on this side of the house have reached.

There are a number of things I should like to say about the French language network in the province of Quebec, but there will be another opportunity of doing so and at this stage and in order to remain faithful to the statement I made at the beginning that I did not intend to take up the time of the house for very long, I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter) the following amendment:

That the words "this day eight months hence" be inserted after the word "appointed" in the second line of the resolution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does some hon. member wish to comment on the proposal?

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Fortin (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) will allow me, I should like to ask him a question before we take up his amendment.

The hon. member for Laurier referred a moment ago to a Quebec provincial broadcasting organization, in the light of a statement allegedly made by the premier of the province. Is the hon. member for Laurier for or against a Quebec broadcasting organization?

Mr. Chevrier: I referred to that matter in connection with a question I asked the minister (Mr. Nowlan). My views on the subject will be placed on the record in due course.

(Text):

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will permit me, I will put the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): If I may, Mr. Speaker, I presume if one speaks to the amendment he is also speaking to the main motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will put the amendment and I assume the hon. member will speak to the amendment.

Mr. Winch: On the amendment—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Speak on the main motion after the amendment is disposed of.

Mr. Winch: I want to be clear on this because I find myself in a bit of a predicament which on occasion an elected member can find himself in. I have a very good reason for the position I am taking. Normally I would be in support of the amendment for all the reasons that have been given by a number of the previous speakers. However, what is causing a doubt in my mind is the fact that I have not received any information from the minister on whether at this session there is to be any amendments brought in to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation Act. Only recently I sent a note over to the minister asking whether there were to be any amendments to the act brought in at this session. If I could be told there are to be amendments brought in I would not need to carry on. If no amendments are to be brought in at this session, then this will be my only opportunity to ask that the committee be set up in order to raise a matter which I think is of the utmost importance to this house. Therefore, may I through you ask whether or not any amendments are to be brought in?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I interrupt the hon. member to say a few words about the amendment. It has been brought to my attention that citation 202, paragraph 11, of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, reads as follows:

> An amendment proposing that a resolution which does not require second reading be considered this day six months is out of order.

It seems that under this citation this kind of amendment is considered a direct negative and, therefore, should be declared out of order. Before I make a final decision, if there is any comment to be made I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. Chevrier: I was quite aware of the citation to which you refer; in fact, I had it in my hand when the motion was drawn, and I wish to direct to your attention the fact that there are two points which I think differentiate it from the paragraph in question. Subparagraph 11 of citation 202 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, at page 170, says that:

> An amendment proposing that a resolution which does not require second reading be considered this day six months is out of order.

You will note, first of all, that this amendment is for a period of eight months, which would bring it to the month of February of next year, when the next session would normally be sitting and which perhaps would be a more appropriate time than now.

The other point is that our amendment asks that the committee be appointed eight months hence and not this day six months, which is the practice in ordinary motions, which I believe is covered by subparagraph 11, so that it seems to me that these two differentials indicate that the motion is in order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, with respect I think that the arguments of the hon. member for Laurier are not applicable. There is, surely, only one type of amendment known as a dilatory amendment. The standard form is, of course, six months. I believe that sometimes they have been drawn in the form of three months. It seems to me I have seen reference to the form "three months or six months hence". Whether or not one varies the figure any number of months between three, six, eight, nine and twelve, that form of the amendment and the effect of the amendment are the same and it falls, therefore, within the same category as that described in paragraph 11 of citation 202 to which you have referred.

The effect of the amendment would be to give the motion an eight months hoist and it is therefore, I submit, exactly in the same category as those described in the citation.

There is another point that I would like to raise, however, because of the argument made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). He said the effect of the amendment would be to require the appointment of the committee in February next when, as he said, with what prescience I do not know, the house would be again in session. I point out to you, sir, that that would surely be another session and it is a well established rule, as I recall it, that orders of the house applicable or made in one session are not applicable to another session unless they be readopted at the other session. Therefore, the effect of the prorogation of this session would be to destroy or cancel the order. Therefore accepting the argument of the hon. member that the desire of his amendment is to postpone the appointment of the committee to February next, that purpose is not achieved because of the fact that he himself has drawn to our attention, and indeed, in whichever category he wants to put his amendment, the effect is simply that of a straight negative thereby defeating the motion. Therefore, I submit to you, sir, that the citation has application and the amendment is out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I say a word, sir. I agree with the Minister of Justice that whether the motion said six months or eight months is not relevant; what is relevant is that this is not such a motion at all. My hon. friend's amendment is not a motion at all to defer the consideration or the decision of the house; it is a motion to amend a resolution before the house by inserting into that resolution the words "that a select committee be appointed this day eight months". It is not a motion to defer a decision. If this amendment were passed it would be a declaration of the house that the resolution was accepted; whereas the six months hoist is a motion that something be not read now, or be not adopted now, but be adopted six months later which is an entirely different thing.

As for the subsidiary matter raised by the Minister of Justice, the factor of the secrets of the future, of course, his judgment is a little better than ours because he has perhaps a little more to say about when the session will end or, at least, when it will begin, but we do not know that. But we do not know whether this same session may not be going on next February. In the memory of some members, including the Prime Minister, who were in the house at the time, it did happen that a session started on November 7, 1940 and, if my recollection is accurate, it was not prorogued until some time in January of 1942. Therefore it could very well happen. It certainly is not for the Chair but rather for the house to decide whether or not a motion which says that something should be done eight months hence would in fact be capable of being carried out. If members of the house do not think it is a sensible thing to adopt, they can of course defeat it, but it would appear to be a very arbitrary thing for the Chair to decide that.

I submit that what my hon. friend has asked the house to decide in this amendment, which provides that a select committee on broadcasting be appointed this day eight months hence and so on and so forth, is an amendment of the proposition itself and not in any sense an attempt to defer a decision on the motion. It is certainly not a negative.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say I agree that the amendment does not fall exactly within the type mentioned in paragraph 11 of citation 202 because, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has intimated, it is not consideration of the resolution which is postponed for six months or eight months. I might say that the difference between six and eight months, which the hon. member for Laurier mentioned, has not impressed me too much. However, whatever the difference between this amendment and the six months hoist may be, it seems to me that because we do not know whether it will be possible to appoint this committee eight months from now the same result would be produced if the original motion were simply negatived. Therefore I think that for this reason I must declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Winch: On a question of privilege, I believe I was speaking at the time of the interruption and if I do not proceed now I may be told I have made my remarks and have no right to speak again. It is only on that ground that I dare interfere with the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I was mentioning that I find myself in a somewhat difficult position in this matter, as a member of parliament very often does. I was impressed with the remarks of previous speakers that, having regard to the importance of the terms of reference, it might be that a very poor job would be done by this committee that would not be in the best interests of the C.B.C. or the people of Canada if the committee were to sit at this stage of the session when so many other committees are meeting. I would be quite prepared to support these contentions if it were not for one thing. I have not been able to get an answer from the minister with respect to whether there is any intention to bring in any changes to the act governing the C.B.C. at this session. If it is the intention of the minister or the government to bring in changes this session, particularly with respect to one matter, I would be quite satisfied to sit down but so far I have not been able to get any assurance either by word of mouth or in writing. Therefore I have to raise a matter which I do not like to raise. However, I feel that I must do so, although it does not concern me personally at all.

It is a matter which in my opinion is of such importance that if the minister is not going to deal with it voluntarily then it should be considered by the committee to be appointed under this motion so that a recommendation can be made to the minister and the government for action to be taken at this session. I am not trying to keep members in suspense. The matter I have in mind concerns all members of the House of Commons generally and a number in particular. I believe it has to be dealt with and should be dealt with by a committee now.

As a result of my study of the situation and according to the best information I can get from top calibre legal counsel outside of the house and also from the Department of Justice it would appear to me that prior to the present parliament some members sat in their places illegally and there may be some who, unconsciously and unintentionally, are sitting in the house illegally at the present time under the wording of two acts affecting the House of Commons.

I drew this matter to the attention of the Department of Justice on January 20 this year so there has been plenty of notice. I did not know about this matter before and I am certain that nobody else knew about it. I refer to the fact that if a member of the House of Commons or the Senate accepts an invitation to take part in a C.B.C. radio or television broadcast for which an honorarium is paid they do not have the right to sit in the House of Commons. The opinion I have received goes even further in that even if the member turns down the honorarium but accepts expenses in connection with attending the radio or television broadcast it is against the law of parliament and he can be challenged on the ground that he is illegally sitting in the house.

To my knowledge hon. members of various parties in previous parliaments have accepted invitations to take part in radio and television broadcasts and have accepted honoraria and expenses. To the best of my information, which comes from a very responsible source, unfortunately there are some members now sitting in the House of Commons who if they have not accepted an honorarium have accepted payment for expenses or have instructed the C.B.C. not to give them the money but to pay it to charity. I do not think the law is evaded in that way. However, that is not the point about which I am so concerned. I almost got into the same situation myself because I accepted an invitation to appear on "Fighting Words" last January. I had to go from Ottawa to Toronto and if I had accepted the honorarium I would have received $100 and also approximately $80 for expenses because I had to fly to Toronto.

For some reason or other something bothered me about the whole matter so I investigated. I inquired not only from high calibre counsel throughout Canada but also in the Department of Justice. I know that the Department of Justice cannot give advice but I received certain information that I think I should give to the house. Anyone who wants it can look it up. This is the information I received:

> The statutory provision that has to be considered is section 15 of the Senate and House of Commons Act, R.S.C. 1952, chapter 249, which reads as follows:
> No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with any other, by himself or by the interposition of any trustee or third party, holding or enjoying, undertaking or executing any contract or agreement, expressed or implied, with or for the government of Canada on behalf of the crown, or with or for any of the officers of the government of Canada, for which any public money of Canada is to be paid, is eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall sit or vote in the said house.

That is the pertinent section from the Senate and House of Commons Act. Then we have subsection 1 of section 4 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, chapter 32, which expressly states:

> The corporation is a body corporate having capacity to contract and to sue and be sued in the name of the corporation.
> (2) The corporation is for all purposes of this act an agent of Her Majesty and its powers under this act may be exercised only as an agent of Her Majesty.

[Mr. Winch.]

I am told, therefore, "that it is clear that any arrangement with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation under which the corporation is to pay money falls within the terms of section 15 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. In view of the wording of that section I have difficulty in perceiving any distinction between the payment of a fee or honorarium and the payment of expenses." That is the opinion of the officers of the Department of Justice, and that is the opinion of others on this subject with whom I have consulted outside of the House of Commons. It seems that any member of the House of Commons who accepts any honorarium or payment for expenses from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for appearance on a radio or television program is breaking the law and cannot sit or vote as a member.

As I have said, I drew this to the attention of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which had never warned a member of parliament previously and, in fact, the corporation had not even recognized this fact. I drew it to the attention of the Department of Justice on January 20 because of my concern. It was my understanding, not in writing but verbally, that notice of this would be taken by the government and that in the view of the Department of Justice itself the thing to do was to have an amendment introduced to the Canadian Broadcasting Act. I believe this is of the utmost importance because no member of this house should be placed in a position in which I know hon. members have been placed quite unintentionally by accepting the payment of expenses for travelling to appear on a panel show or something of that nature under the auspices of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I feel it is absolutely essential that if the minister is not concerned at the moment, then the committee must be. This matter must be considered for the protection of the members of the House of Commons, and an amendment must be made for their protection in the future.

I do not believe in a matter of this nature elected members should be paid an honorarium. However, I do believe it should be possible for a member of parliament to attend a radio or television show and not to have to pay his own expenses. There should be a provision whereby a member could accept expenses for attending something of that nature of public interest or national interest. My understanding is, as I have pointed out several times already and confirmed completely by information I have from the Department of Justice, that that is not the present situation.

So, Mr. Speaker, I point out I have only raised this point publicly because I have been waiting now since January 20 and have received no information that any action was going to be taken. I have received no information that the minister now concerned with the department or the Department of Justice had changed their minds on the information they gave me last January. This kind of amendment, therefore, or some other provision is required in the interests of, and for the protection of the members of the House of Commons.

I say, therefore, that if something is going to be done, then I go along with what has been said previously about it being rather late in the session for an important matter like the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to be referred to a special committee. If nothing is going to be done then I feel that in the interests of the House of Commons this committee should be cognizant of this rather dangerous situation because you can never tell when some crank—you know there are always some cranks—might decide to lay charges against a member of the House of Commons as a result of this situation. I say it is unfair that some member of parliament might be caught because he did something unintentionally. In any event, members of parliament now know what the situation is in the opinion of the Department of Justice and others, and they will be very careful in the future.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In view of the wish of the house to have this resolution go the committee as soon as possible, I shall be very brief. I see there is a rather strained look on the minister's face at the present time. I am rising to bring to the attention of the house and urge upon the committee the study of a particular problem.

First of all, like other members, I am sorry that this resolution was not brought before the house earlier this session so that this very important committee would have had more time to deal with the subjects it has to consider. However, I am rising particularly to say a word or two for the people in the hinterlands because I am a hinterlander and I can speak from experience. Do you know that even today there are thousands of people in Canada who have never had the opportunity of enjoying Canadian Broadcasting Corporation programs? These Canadian programs, except in some areas for certain periods during the day and occasionally under certain atmospheric conditions at night, are not available. These people have never had the opportunity of enjoying the programs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on a reliable basis. The areas of which I speak are naturally in the Kootenay district from which I come, the northern part of Kootenay West, some areas in northern British Columbia. I know there are areas in northern Manitoba and northern Ontario, and there may be others.

I do urge that every consideration be given to supplying these people with the necessary low power relay stations that are required to give them at least adequate radio coverage. I know that considerable has been done in recent years, but there is still more to be done. I feel it is most unfair to the people who are living in isolated places, in some cases in mountainous terrain, that they are not able to receive programs from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I do hope that these circumstances, in view of the very large expenditure by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on television, will be rectified so that the people in the hinterland will be able to enjoy this opportunity.

I should like also to make a few references to the same situation which applies with respect to television. There are areas which are affected in exactly the same way because of their location in the mountains. These people today are being denied television of any kind, that is either Canadian or United States television. There is a provision, I understand, providing the regulations of the telecommunications branch of the Department of Transport are met, for persons to instal, after application and acceptance under proper circumstances, a satellite television station.

I have seen one or two in operation. They were most useful. I think in some cases they were called community satellite stations. They are most useful in providing television to those persons beyond the main stream of communication, whether it is radio or television, in certain areas or in areas similar to the ones affected by being unable to receive Canadian radio programs. I urge that every consideration be given to this problem and that those who can provide these services be given an opportunity to do so, in some cases by the formation of crown companies, in other cases co-operatives and in some cases as a result of free enterprise.

Before concluding I want to bring one other matter to the attention of the house and it is this. I am of the opinion that at times the C.B.C. takes a somewhat Olympian attitude—and I say that from experience—in not understanding how the people in a certain area or in a certain district are interested in what the C.B.C. intends to do in their district, whether it concerns radio facilities or television facilities. I just want to give an illustration. Over a year ago provision was made for the establishment of a television station to serve the Rossland-Trail area in my constituency. Then some unexpected difficulties were encountered in acquiring a site from the provincial government. The provincial government was not able to sell the C.B.C. the site and after a long period the C.B.C. was able to make arrangements for leasing a site to its satisfaction.

My point is this. The people concerned heard the announcement or read the announcement of the minister in the house that this station was going to be established a year ago last October, I think it was; I refer to the announcement. Then they expected something to happen. Nothing happened. Then the area became full of rumours. The defeated Conservative candidate announced that he had had a special message from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) and that so and so were the facts. Then the elected member for the riding said a week or two later that he had another message from some other department of government. Then the defeated candidate said he had a later message and this was what was going to happen, and so on.

All that unnecessary concern and activity could be avoided if the C.B.C., under such circumstances, would simply issue a press release—so that people would know—that the station was going to be established, that certain difficulties had been encountered, and so on. By this means the people themselves who are going to be the patrons of this service, would understand what was happening and all these rumours and so on would be avoided.

The same thing has happened with respect to the establishment of a satellite television station in Nelson. Arrangements were being made for that station and rumours are going around that it will serve the people on this side of the mountain and not the people on the other side of the mountain, that it will serve the people on this side of the valley and not the people on the other side of the valley. Under the circumstances I think the C.B.C., as a result of study of the question by its engineers, could very well make an announcement and say they intend to locate the station at such and such a place, that it will service all the people within such and such an area, and so on.

I say that, Mr. Speaker, because I think that the senior officials of the C.B.C. on occasion take a somewhat Olympian attitude and ignore the interests of local people in the developments in television and in radio. I suggest that some system be adopted of giving accurate information—and the C.B.C. is not under security in that respect—as to the C.B.C.'s intention and so on in any particular district or area.

[Mr. Herridge.]

I had intended to have a bit to say on policy and so on but as I realize the wish of the minister to rise and reply to the many questions that have been raised, I am content at this time merely to deal with matters that are of concern to my own constituency and to others who live in the hinterlands of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to delay the house for very long. I am very sorry if any look on my face disturbed the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I should much prefer to have him go on. He said he had some questions to raise with respect to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It would be interesting to hear one question raised in this house this afternoon with which one could deal instead of the grapeshot and the variety of camouflage and innuendo with which we have had to deal during the afternoon, with nothing specific whatsoever.

This is a motion to set up a committee to consider broadcasting. The motion is made pursuant to an undertaking which was given last year when the committee rose and it also was set forth in the speech from the throne.

When the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) spoke a short time ago I think he dealt with this matter more effectively than did anyone else when he said it was not up to one or two members of the House of Commons to decide whether the committee should be set up or whether it should not be set up but that it should be through the house itself and that, as far as he was concerned, as well as many others, this undertaking had been given and of course the committee should be set up.

I have been rather intrigued by this discussion about the great delay which has taken place in the setting up of this committee and the enormity of the offence which has been committed by this government. I have here in my hand a list of the dates of the opening and closing of parliament in years gone by in the days when a similar committee was set up; and in those days only three or four committees were set up rather than the seven, eight or nine which we have today. For instance, in the session of 1952-53 I find that the house opened on November 20, 1952. This committee or a similar committee was set up on March 21, 1953, which is about four months after the house opened. Parliament prorogued on May 14. Hence there was there a matter of sitting time that this house would equal somewhere about the end of July. There is at least a comparable period there as at this time.

In the session of 1950 parliament opened in February. The motion was passed on April 19, two months after the house opened and parliament prorogued on June 30. One could go on and on in setting forth the facts that there never was, when hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting on the treasury benches, despite the urging of the opposition, any great disposition on their part to accelerate the business of the house despite the fact that, as I said, there were only three or four committees at the most that ever sat in those days. We never had any action such as has been deplored this afternoon because we waited from January to June to set up this committee. Who have been crying, lamenting, weeping and howling about the load that has been placed upon them by the setting up of so many committees, deploring the fact that committees are set up, asking that this cross may pass them by, that they should not have such a burden placed upon them? That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say frankly that we have deliberately delayed the setting up of this committee, important as it is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nowlan: I hear "oh, oh" from the other side. But this is the situation as of today. I have this information from the clerk of the committees. The committee on estimates is concluding its work. The committee on external affairs may have one more meeting. The committee on privileges and elections is concluding its work. The committee on railways, airlines and shipping is concluding its work or has concluded it. The committee on veterans affairs may have one more sitting. I personally feel that the committee on broadcasting is more important than is any one of those committees. However, I am only one member of this House of Commons. I am only one minister who indirectly has some responsibility for this broadcasting corporation and the board of broadcast governors whereas other ministers have a direct responsibility for their departments.

Who am I to say that broadcasting shall come first and veterans affairs shall come last? I do not propose to arrogate to myself that authority. What I propose to do is to co-operate with the House of Commons and particularly with hon. members of the opposition in order to try to arrange the business of this house so that they will not be suffering nervous breakdowns, strokes of apoplexy, and all that sort of thing, which they said would be their fate when the house opened, yet now when we are accommodating we are told we are doing something which violates the rules of the house.

I wish Lewis Carroll were here today to write Alice in Wonderland again. I think he would say something like this:

> You are old, Jack the Sailor,
> the young man said,
> And your hair has become very white;
> Yet you incessantly stand on your head,
> And you think at your age it is right.

I must say that I am highly flattered at being a minister, although I have no responsibility for these organizations whatsoever except in reporting to parliament. I am also highly flattered by the debate this afternoon, which has been relatively brief, a couple of hours, in that there has been no criticism of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation whatsoever. The whole time has been spent on the fact that we are bringing this motion in too late; and there have been some innuendoes about the board of broadcast governors. If the government had been inclined to accept the suggestion—which it was not because, as I said, an undertaking was given—that we should wait until another session before we set up such a committee, does anyone think that any government which adopted that course and which had any respect for the organizations and boards which it had created, in view of the innuendoes and the snide and sneering attacks which have been made on the board of broadcast governors this afternoon because of the decision in Toronto and the decision in Edmonton, would sit down and accept such snide references and agree to defer this matter?

If there is anything to be criticized with regard to decisions of the board of broadcast governors that is all the more reason why a committee should be set up this year and not next year. The fact that hon. members say in one breath that something is wrong, but in another breath say that this is not the time to bring it forward is in my opinion the best argument to suggest that there is no criticism which can be levelled at the board whatsoever.

This board was set up by this government, that is true; but I doubt if anyone in Canada can point a finger at the board of broadcast governors in any respect at all. They may disapprove of its decisions and question its decisions, but so far as suggesting that any member of the board is under the influence of the government, if that is the case we want the board in question brought before a committee of parliament and we want that board to make its defence, if such defence is necessary. In particular we want the people who are prepared to make these charges to stand up and make them and not hide behind the excuses such as we have heard this afternoon, and would we please defer this matter to next year despite the fact that the board has done a terrible thing. We do not accept that position; that is why I could not accept this afternoon the suggestion that the committee should be deferred until next year.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said there is not much to reply to in connection with this debate other than that one matter. The whole argument for the most part has been that the committee should be deferred until next year, and I think I have explained why we cannot do that. I think it is highly desirable that this committee be set up. The committee of course, not the government, will determine its own procedure, but I hope that the first party to be brought before it will be the board of broadcast governors. The board of broadcast governors are today sitting in Halifax and are returning to sit in Ottawa during the latter part of the week. I am hopeful that if a committee is set up immediately or during this week they will have finished their sittings by the end of this week or the very first of next week, and personally I hope that the board of broadcast governors will come before this committee and give an accounting of their operations, the principles and procedures under which they function. If they are subject to criticism, then let us have that criticism aired where it can be aired effectively, definitively and properly rather than by insinuation and innuendo, as was the case this afternoon.

Second, I would hope that the C.A.B., the private broadcasters, will appear before that committee and have their opinions expressed and their judgments laid before the committee with respect to the board of broadcast governors. Mr. Speaker, you will remember that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) referred to something I said a year ago in deferring the setting up of a committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was two years ago.

Mr. Nowlan: That was when we were passing the legislation and hon. members opposite, as was their right, suggested that there should be a committee to determine the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nowlan: Surely.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure he would not want the record to be wrong. Is it not true that the government in the speech from the throne indicated that a committee should be set up?

Mr. Nowlan: Are you speaking of a year ago?

Mr. Pickersgill: Two years ago, in 1958.

Mr. Nowlan: I will accept the hon. member's word for that. I had forgotten the details and I have not got the speech from the throne in front of me. However, what I want to say is that when this matter was raised, and I could not accept this because we had the legislation before the house, we all remember the dire prophecies, the gloom and the doom, with which the C.B.C. was confronted; the suggestion that the system could not work, and all the rest of it.

We listened to all that two years ago and I say without any fear of contradiction that as far as the system is concerned this government developed and evolved, the division between judge and jury, relieving the C.B.C. of the responsibility of having to pass on applications, setting up an independent board and giving the C.B.C. jurisdiction in its own realm, nothing which this government has done or which any other government has done has worked more effectively than that division between the two. Canada can be proud of the fact that we have a board of broadcast governors and a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation who are operating in the public interest the way those ladies and gentlemen are doing, despite the gloom and the doom with which we were confronted two years ago.

As I said, there is no great point in going over these matters. I was very much intrigued by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). I wish he had kept on because it sort of relieved the burden put on my shoulders, of which I am accused of carrying. I understand that apparently the C.B.C. in certain areas of Canada is regarded as a very nefarious political organization and one certainly not unfavourable to this government. I was glad indeed to hear the hon. member enumerate, as he attempted to enumerate, one example where he said he saw a division of time between a provincial government candidate and an opposition candidate. I am not entering into the realm of provincial politics and I know nothing about how time is divided in the province of Quebec. Elsewhere in Canada I understand it is divided by discussions between the relative political parties, and I have no doubt the same principle has been followed in the province of Quebec. I can remember one time not very long ago—

Mr. Chevrier: May I just interrupt the minister here. I think we are at cross purposes. I was talking about the news broadcast at eleven o'clock and I think the minister is talking about the division of time between the political parties, which is a different thing.

Mr. Nowlan: Very well. I would draw to the hon. member's attention a news broadcast a short time ago when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was piloting through this house a bill with respect to university grants. A long, laborious and interesting debate preceded the passing of that bill.

What happened as far as the C.B.C. or Radio Canada was concerned was this. Although I did not see the program I was besieged the next day by hon. members in the same tone of complaint as that of the hon. member for Laurier this afternoon. The Minister of Finance was not mentioned, or he got only passing mention. But two hon. gentlemen sitting behind the hon. member for Laurier had their pictures on the television screen because of the position they took with respect to that.

Anybody can criticize individual programs. The most intriguing thing I know about the C.B.C. is that those who have it, if you listen to some of them, do not want it, while those who have not got it, want it. It is a very interesting problem to try to maintain this balance between those who criticize continually and those who complain because they have not got a service at all.

These are matters which can be determined by the committee when it sits rather than by my discussing them here. I do wish, however, to mention one specific matter to which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate referred when he said the budget of the C.B.C. was controlled too tightly by this government. As usual, there was some innuendo, some snide remarks, about the control which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) exercised. No minister of finance who is worth his salt —and our Minister of Finance is certainly one of the outstanding ministers of finance of Canada—can fail in his task of exercising some control over the expenditures of all the crown corporations. I want to point this out— I have said it before, and I say it again—that when we came to power this government, which was going to wreck the C.B.C., this government about which so many fears were expressed and so many lamentations uttered compared to which those of Job were a paean of thanksgiving, found, when we considered the former act under which hon. gentlemen opposite had operated—and I am not criticizing them for it—these are the facts—that every expenditure over $25,000 laid out by the C.B.C. had to receive government approval. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate corrected me this afternoon—and he was probably right—saying this concerned only capital expenditure. In any event, it had to be approved by the governor in council; in other words, it had to be approved by my predecessor recommending it to the government. We raised that figure from $25,000 to $100,000 so that now the C.B.C. is free to spend any money it sees fit up to $100,000 without referring the matter to the government in any shape or form.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it not true that under the legislation the minister put through the house the C.B.C. had to submit a capital budget and, therefore, would such expenditures not be included in that budget?

Mr. Nowlan: We are not here discussing the details of treasury board. It is perfectly true that the C.B.C. has to submit a capital budget, but the capital budget certainly does not go into details of that kind. The capital budget asks for X millions of dollars for capital development, and that is all there is in it.

This is an important step, as I have tried to indicate, and I think it is a point in which the people of Canada are particularly interested. They are concerned about any government or political party exercising influence over the programming of a great national organization. Not only did we change the act so as to raise the floor from $25,000 to $100,000, but we said at the same time that there should be no control of expenditures whatsoever so far as programming is concerned. I know of programs upon which the C.B.C. is embarked—whether they are good or not is not for me to say, but I am thinking of programs such as the R.C.M. Police series—whose costs are running today into hundreds of thousands of dollars over the whole period. These costs have been approved by the C.B.C. without any reference to the government whatsoever. So when the hon. gentleman attacks us about cost, as he says prostituting broadcasting or too tight budgeting control, I do think, with all due respect to a man whom I respect and like personally, that he was talking sheer nonsense, and no one knows this better than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I dissent.

Mr. Nowlan: I shall not say very much more this afternoon. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) spent some time dealing with the board of broadcast governors. He enumerated the members of the board and suggested that they were appointed by this government. Of course they were. They are intelligent men and women and in Canada, in the delightful condition in which the country finds itself today it is rather hard to find intelligent men and women to appoint to a board who do not, like the majority of intelligent men and women in this country, support the present administration. Surely, with all due respect to the members of the C.C.F., we are at liberty to choose those whom we think best fitted to occupy such positions as these rather than from the somewhat dilapidated remains of the once great party represented opposite.

We have chosen men and women who are, very largely, independent, and it is surely strange for anyone in the C.C.F. party to be questioning the judgment of a board of which Dr. Eugene Forsey is one of the leading members. I never expected to see that day, with respect to the C.C.F. One could go on and list Dr. Emlyn Davies, and many others; people who, because of their intelligence, I hope support the government, though in fact no one has any knowledge of whether they do or not. Indeed, we could not care less because they are men and women of integrity whose judgment the country respects and we are prepared to accept their decisions. That is the situation with respect to this board.

The hon. member for Laurier also made some passing reference to a statement made by the premier of Quebec about proposed interference with the C.B.C. I fail to see where that statement has shown any interference, but I am not going to get involved in the internal politics of Quebec. The premier said: if such and such a thing happens, we are going to establish our own network. If that is interference with the C.B.C. it is certainly not interference which is going to have any effect.

These are words uttered, perhaps in the irritation of the moment, by a leading public figure in this country who is entitled to express his opinions.

Mr. Chevrier: But who is not entitled to threaten anyone.

Mr. Nowlan: There is no threat whatsoever. As I said in the answer I gave to the hon. member's question this morning, if a crown agency in the province of Quebec sees fit to make an application it will be dealt with on its merits the same as an application from Nova Scotia or British Columbia would be dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to consideration of private and public bills—

Mr. Chevrier: I think that the minister has almost completed his statement and, if the house wishes, with the approval of those who sit on your left, we could dispose of this before five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps the minister should speak for himself.

Mr. Chevrier: Provided he ceases attacking me.

Mr. Nowlan: I have no desire to go on further. If I had been watching the clock I would have ended earlier.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent to my putting the motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Winch: Could I ask the minister if, when he used the word "innuendo" as a charge against those who have spoken, he included my statement about the need for some action to be taken to protect members who appear on programs and accept expense costs?

Mr. Nowlan: As and when the government decides to introduce legislation, legislation will be brought down. I cannot go farther than that at the moment.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to subsection 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

GEORGE WILLIAM DOUGLAS EDMONDS

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-54, for the relief of George William Douglas Edmonds—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Howard: In this particular case the circumstances are much different from what we normally find in these cases. I shall proceed to examine the allegations and references made in the petition because they have some point in the particulars of the bill before us. The petition says that on the 4th day of June, 1947, the petitioner was lawfully married to the respondent and that the marriage took place in the town of Metis, district of Rimouski, in the province of Quebec.

Paragraph 4 refers to the domicile of the petitioner at the moment; that is, at the moment of the petition which was the 13th day of July, 1959. Also, with reference to the residence and domicile of the respondent, it says in paragraph 7 that the respondent has been living with the corespondent as man and wife at that particular address, which is given, and that on or about the 10th day of July, 1959 the alleged adultery was committed between the wife and the gentleman whose name is given here, the respondent.

Mr. R. A. Cohen, a Montreal lawyer, is counsel for the petitioner. There are no what are classified as professional investigators or private detectives in this case. There are, however, what are considered to be inconsistencies in the evidence presented to prove the particular point, and I should like to make reference to those inconsistencies.

Before I do that may I say the petitioner appeared, was sworn and gave evidence as to his name, his age, occupation, address, and so on. Then, in order to prove his marriage he is asked this question by the clerk of the committee:

Q. Are you married?
A. Yes.

In answer to subsequent questions he gives the name of his wife which coincides with the name given in the petition, the date of marriage, which also coincides with that given in the petition, and also the place of marriage, their religion, the faith that they belong to and so forth. He is shown a document which he identifies as his marriage record, and says that the statements contained in that marriage record are true. It is then filed as exhibit No. 1.

Mr. Cohen, counsel for the petitioner, then appears and asks several questions. I do not wish to take too long on these questions, but the petitioner gives the place of his birth and where he is living at the moment, his occupation, the date of his marriage. He says he is living in the province of Quebec now, that he was born in the province of Quebec, was married in the province of Quebec and that it is his intention to stay on in the province of Quebec.

He said that a separation took place in 1952. This apparently was not what is known as a legal separation. But there is some conflict here as to who left whom in 1952. I think that is not too material. However, there is a conflict in it. In any event, starting at the top of page 12 he was asked these questions by Mr. Cohen:

Q. Could you tell the committee something about your marriage and when you separated?
A. We separated because my wife committed adultery.

It was in 1952 that the separation took place. Then, Mr. Cohen asks:

Q. Would you say you were different personalities?
A. Yes.

Of course, Senator Croll objected and said:

Let him tell us.

There were subsequent questions by Mr. Cohen about how they got along. It is evident from the evidence that, as he indicated, they never got along. He said:

She wanted her good times and to run around, and I could not afford it.

He reported that they quarrelled and so on, and that there are no children. Then Mr. Cohen asked specifically:

Q. Can you tell us something about the date of July 10, 1959, at—, apartment 7, Montreal?

He gives here the address which coincides with the address given in the petition as being that of the wife, the respondent at the time of the petition, and also that of the corespondent, both being the same. The witness answered as follows:

A. Well, I went up there to see my wife.
Q. On whose recommendation?
A. On my own. I asked her if she would come down here; I told her I wanted to get a divorce and asked her to come down here.

I assume this means come down to Ottawa in as much as that is the place where the evidence was given. I shall come back to this answer in a moment. However, the question has some relevancy because Mr. Cohen asks:

Q. Did you know your wife was living with anybody at that time?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you know—?
A. Yes, I met him.
Q. For how many years have you known him?
A. I would say since 1950, July, 1950.
Q. Could you tell the committee whether since July 10, 1959, you have had marital relations with your wife?
A. No.
Q. Have you ever discussed divorce with your wife?
A. No.

I would point out one point of conflict here. In a previous answer he said that he did go to see her and that he asked her if she would come down here. This is what he said:

I asked her if she would come down here; I told her I wanted to get a divorce and asked her to come down here.

It is obvious from this answer that he did discuss it with her. Whether he discussed it or not, he did mention that he wanted to get a divorce and asked her to come down here. In a subsequent answer he said he had never discussed divorce with his wife. This point of conflict, whether he did or did not discuss divorce with his wife, has some relevancy with respect to the possibility of collusion.

Mr. McCleave: Nonsense.

Mr. Howard: As to that extent, the discussion took place. Then the chairman, Senator Croll, asked this question:

Q. You told us you went to see your wife at the apartment because you wanted a divorce?
A. Yes, that is true.
Q. Was that in July some time?
A. Around there.

I do not know whether the witness went on more than one occasion to see his wife and to tell her he wanted a divorce but in previous evidence he had been quite specific as to the date. He said that on July 10, 1959 he went to see his wife in order to tell her that he wanted to get a divorce. In response to the question by Senator Croll as to whether that was in July he said "around there". Perhaps that refers to the same date, July 10, 1959, but it may refer to other dates when he went to see her. Mr. Cohen proceeded to ask these questions:

Q. When did you visit my office?
A. I visited your office I think in the spring, June.
Q. Did I tell you to go over and see whom your wife was living with and to give me a report?
A. Yes.

He said that Mr. Cohen did tell him to go there and yet in previous examination with respect to his going to see his wife this question was asked by Mr. Cohen:

Q. On whose recommendation?
A. On my own.

Here is yet another point of conflict between the evidence given at one time and the evidence given at another. He said that he was told by Mr. Cohen to go there and he also said that it was on his own recommendation. Then Mr. Cohen continues:

Q. You went over there?
A. Yes; that is when I asked her
Q. You went to give me a report on it?
A. Yes, to give you a report on it and to find out if she would come to Ottawa.
Q. And whether they were living together?
A. Yes.
Q. Before I sent you over there had you ever discussed divorce with your wife?
A. No.
Q. Had you ever visited your wife there previously?
A. No.

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, there is a conflict here with respect to whose recommendation he acted on when he went to see his wife. In one place he says that he went on his own and in another place he said that he went on instructions from Mr. Cohen. There is a conflict, as I said, with respect to whether he ever discussed divorce with his wife because in one instance he said no and in another instance he said yes. He told her he wanted to get a divorce. These are points of conflict that I think should be examined and cleared up.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Mandziuk: Would the hon. member permit a question? By referring to these conflicts in the evidence is he imputing collusion between the two parties or would he agree that it is sensible and probably good law that if evidence exists as in this case that the respondent is living with another man there is absolutely nothing wrong in the husband going to see his wife and discussing the matter? Is it material for the purpose of the hon. member's objection to the bill to question who approached whom or at whose instigation the petitioner interviewed his wife or took divorce proceedings? I think it would shorten proceedings—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Skeena gave permission to the hon. member to ask a question. I hope he will ask it because if he wishes to speak he will have to wait until later.

Mr. Howard: I will be glad to attempt to answer the question. First of all, let me say that unfortunately we are restricted by the rules of the house as they apply to these matters in coming to some conclusion on the point of what is and what is not collusion. There has been general reference to it and in general terms I understand it to be an arrangement between a man and wife to obtain a divorce, that they agree jointly that evidence of certain circumstances will be presented to the committee. Because we have been prevented by the rules, and probably quite properly so, from discussing what constitutes collusion, I do not think I can be accused of imputing collusion here. I did make use of the word because, as I have said, it is my general understanding that it means that two people work together and attempt to present evidence to the body which will be granting the divorce. I do not know whether it is permissible in law for a husband and wife to agree that each will appear and give evidence about one of them having committed adultery. I do not know whether it puts a different light on the matter if they both agree that one of them will be caught in compromising circumstances by investigators in order to provide evidence to support a charge of adultery.

As I say, we have been prevented from going into the question of what is and what is not collusion. I hope that answers my friend's question with respect to whether I am imputing collusion to these two parties. The evidence shows that in this case the petitioner in one instance said yes and in another instance said no, although he may be talking about two different things. He may have been advised by his lawyer to a finer degree as to what is and what is not collusion than we have been able to determine here. The evidence does show that in one instance he said he went to see his wife and told her he wanted to divorce her and asked her to come here, I assume to give evidence whether or not adultery had been committed.

Mr. Mandziuk: If the hon. member will permit a question, I will restrict myself to asking a question. What are the grounds upon which the hon. member is challenging the decision of the divorce committee of the other place? The divorce committee of the other place has granted this petition and that is what we are interested in. Is the hon. member simply going to read the evidence from beginning to end until it is six o'clock? That is my question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to ask a question and that is as far as he can go.

Mr. Howard: He asked two questions. He asked whether I am challenging the decision of the committee of the other place and the answer to that is no. The answer to the second question is yes.

Mr. McCleave: Are you going to keep on reading until six o'clock?

Mr. Howard: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Let us get back to Bill No. SD-54.

Mr. Peters: Why not call it six o'clock?

Mr. Howard: I was going to suggest that if there are any questions I would be glad to yield the floor to the hon. member who wishes to ask a question. If the hon. member for Halifax wants to ask questions in that manner I will be pleased to answer them.

Mr. Mandziuk: On a point of order, does the reading of the evidence from A to Z, with no personal comments and no conclusions drawn, constitute debating the bill?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We have had this point many times before. No doubt the hon. member was away. The Chair has ruled on it several times and I am sure the hon. member knows what the answer is. If not, I will be very happy to tell him. I will allow consideration of the evidence given that is relevant to the bill. I think all members can readily understand that if we did not do so evidence taken in committee on all private bills would be affected. That is why the Chair is allowing reference to evidence that is relevant to the bill.

Mr. McCleave: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Howard: Yes. I should have liked to make some comment on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, but unfortunately I did not catch your eye before you rose. I wonder whether you would allow me to do so now.

The Deputy Chairman: No. The point of order has been settled not only this time but several times.

Mr. McCleave: The question I had to ask of the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, is, is it his intention to defeat this petition in parliament?

Mr. Howard: I do not know what my friend means by "defeat it".

Mr. McCleave: See that the persons concerned do not obtain justice.

Mr. Howard: I am concerned with justice, fairness and equality. I have said that on a number of occasions. There is one way we have of bringing this justice, fairness and equality to the people of these two provinces.

Mr. McCleave: You have said it but—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I must ask the hon. members to come back once more to Bill No. SD-54. We are not going into procedure.

Mr. Howard: I have been trying to do that for the past five minutes, Mr. Chairman, but hon. members opposite would like to ask questions and I would be the last one to deny them that opportunity.

Mr. Mandziuk: I should like to ask a question in connection with this bill. Has adultery been proven?

Mr. Howard: Is the hon. member asking a question?

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. gentleman will contain himself we will get to that part of the evidence which deals with that question and which, in my opinion, is answered in the negative. As I have indicated on other occasions, whether or not under circumstances such as these adultery has been proved to have occurred on the date which is alleged, is another matter. Whether or not we should give weight to that in considering the passage of the bill or whether we should give weight to other factors, is an argument to which I shall direct myself. I submit that adultery has not been proved, as hon. members will see later on, on this particular date.

I was dealing with some points of conflict in the evidence given by the petitioner, not for the purpose of imputing any motives but for the purpose of pointing out that there are these conflicts, at least in my mind, about these particular matters. There is a reference here, following questions by the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator Croll, to the time when the petitioner went to visit his wife and what he discovered there. The petitioner explained the circumstances which existed at that time. Senator Croll asked a question and he says, giving the surname of the petitioner:

—how do you know she was living with Mr.—

And he gives here the name of the corespondent.

—as man and wife?
A. They were living together because she admitted to me they were.
Q. What did she admit to you?
A. That she was living with him.
Q. What do you mean by living with him? Was she living with him as man and wife?
A. As man and wife, yes.
Q. Did she tell you that?
A. Yes.

Apparently it was some time ago that he had been told this and subsequent examination reveals that he forgets the exact date but it was probably the time he went there, about the tenth day of July, upon instructions from Mr. Cohen. The questioning along this line is followed by Senator Croll, who says:

Q. Before that, how do you know she had been living as man and wife with Mr.—

It gives here the name of the corespondent.

A. Because she told me at one time.
Q. But you had never seen her before that day, since she left?
A. No.

Mr. Cohen interjects a question about telephone communications, and Senator Croll said:

Mr. Cohen, when senators are asking questions, please refrain.

Then the witness continues:

You see, sir, a long time ago I knew there was something between this Mr.—

Then he gives the name of the corespondent.

—and my wife. I met Mr.—

He gives the name of the corespondent.

—on the street one day and I asked him would he come down to the house with me.

Then Senator Croll asks:

Q. To your house?
A. When we were living together, my wife and I. He came down, and I asked my wife then, "Who is it going to be, him or me?" She said it was me, that she was going to live with me and everything was going to be all right; but still things were going on between them.

Then subsequent examination indicates that he still suspected things were not the same. He had reason to believe they went to moving pictures together and went to other places together before he and his wife actually separated. Then Mr. Cohen had been consulted and in his questioning he says:

Q. Why do you tell the committee that you believe when you called Mr.—

Giving the name of the corespondent.

—into the house and said to your wife, either I am your husband or he is, why did you have any suspicion? You must have had some reason?
A. It was because my wife had told me that they had relations together.
Q. Your wife had admitted having relations with him?
A. Yes.

Then later it is established that this was some time ago. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is the evidence of the petitioner himself, but apart from the fact that he tesified quite frankly his wife openly admitted to him that she had had extramarital relations with the corespondent, the other evidence is sort of vague.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit another question? He has been very patient. If a woman admits that she is guilty of an adulterous relationship, would that not be a humane reason for dissolving the marriage instead of trying to keep it together?

Mr. Howard: Perhaps the hon. members of the other place did not think so because they insisted upon additional witnesses appearing to prove this particular point. This is the evidence of the petitioner himself, that his wife had admitted to him this had occurred, and subsequently we come to the point where the wife appeared—

Mr. McCleave: And said the same thing.

Mr. Howard: —and made a reference to this. I submit she does not say the same thing; it has a relationship to one particular date. It is not the wife who admits that adultery took place on that particular date, it is the corespondent. The petitioner indicates that he went to see the corespondent—this is on page 14 of the evidence—and then this question is asked:

Q. What did you see? How was she dressed, and where were they living?
A. They were dressed, but I know for a fact they do live together because they both have admitted they were living together.
By Senator Farquhar:
Q. Was it during the day or night you went there?
A. I went in the evening.
By the Chairman (Senator Croll):
Q. They were dressed normally?
A. I think my wife at the time was in a dressing gown.

Then the respondent is called and sworn, gives her name and address and she is advised by the chairman, Senator Croll—perhaps I should read this:

Before you proceed, it is my duty to inform you that you are not liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that you are guilty of adultery, unless you have already given evidence in this proceeding in disproof of your alleged adultery. While you are not liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to the proof of your own adultery, you have the right to do so if you see fit—that is your right and privilege—in which event everything you say will be told voluntarily and not under any compulsion. Do you understand your position in this regard?

A. Yes.

Then Mr. Cohen says:

Q. —are you living as man and wife with one,—

He gives the name of the corespondent.

A. Yes.

Q. And more particularly on the evening of July 10, 1959, at 1631 St. Luke street, apartment 7, Montreal, were you living as man and wife?

A. Yes.

Q. And you had been how long?

A. I do not know—a couple of years, I guess.

Then Senator Croll follows up that particular point. I submit here that so far as the evidence of the respondent is concerned —which evidence she gave of her own volition without any hesitation at all—no question is asked about adultery. The only question asked is whether they were living together as man and wife. I draw a distinction as I have done in other instances. I draw a distinction between adultery having been committed on a particular day and people living together as man and wife on a particular day. I contend there is a distinction between the two.

Further evidence is given by the corespondent on this particular point and this is the thing with which I should like to deal. I submit again that there is no evidence so far that adultery took place as alleged in the petition on this particular day. It may have occurred on other occasions. It may have occurred subsequently to this time.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: This is one of some 450 cases that are before us for determination at this particular session of parliament. As in most cases, this petition is from a person who lives in the province of Quebec and who comes from a somewhat humble rung of society in that particular province. In short, this man comes before us, as have a good many others, because his means are limited and parliament is the only way that he can obtain relief from a marriage which, to all practical intents and purposes, has long since been dissolved.

The petitioner in this particular case is 40 years old. He lives in the city of Montreal and he is a private chauffeur. He was married on June 4, 1947 and 13 years later he is before parliament asking that his marriage be dissolved because his wife is no longer living with him and indeed, as is clearly established by the evidence to the satisfaction of any reasonable person, his wife has been committing adultery, if you want to put it in that way, or living as man and wife, if you want to put it in that way, for four or five years with another man.

There have been suggestions made, and they are the type of suggestions we hear so often—these little legal phrases that make my blood boil when they come from the depths and wells of ignorance—I refer to phrases about collusion and so on, putting a tarnish on a very proper case and then just left there so that we in parliament who have this duty are somehow tarnished ourselves because we are trying to help decide the merits of a petition.

As far as any inference of collusion is concerned in this case, I say that there is not one jot or tittle of evidence to suggest that anything like that took place. Here we have the woman leaving her home for four or five years. She has lived with somebody else as man and wife. Any conversation that her husband has had with her to help him procure evidence to present to the committee of the other place and by the reports being presented before us is clearly not collusion. I repeat again that for reasonable minds and reasonable men this person, 40 years old, a humble person, from the province of Quebec, is coming before us asking for justice and the proper dissolution of the marriage that, to all intents and purposes disappeared four or five years ago. The challenge I put to the two hon. members opposite who have been carrying out this scandalous—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCleave: The challenge I put to the hon. members opposite is that they must decide within a few minutes whether they are going to grant this man his just rights or whether they are going to deny him those rights.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member need not challenge me to anything. From what I have indicated so far, it is quite evident what our position is.

Mr. McCleave: What is your position on the bill before us?

Mr. Howard: If the hon. member had followed the trend of the discussion perhaps he would have discovered that position already. Let me say once more, Mr. Chairman, that my argument here is with respect to the point in the petition, and this is what I think perhaps is being glossed over. The petition states "and more particularly that on or about July 10, 1959" in the city of Montreal and so on adultery was committed. It makes reference to this particular date. There is evidence here as I indicated. The corespondent appeared. He is asked questions by Mr. Cohen. He is asked whether he had been living together with the respondent as man and wife:

—"and more particularly, were you on the 10th day of July" and he says "yes". Then he is asked "Have you committed adultery with—?" and he gives the name of the respondent there, and the answer is yes. However, he does not answer that they committed adultery one with the other or that he committed adultery with her or however it took place on that particular date. That is the point I should like to make. We have mentioned this point on a number of occasions in connection with cases where there is evidence of a common law arrangement between a couple.

Mr. McCleave: It is not common law.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend can squirm around in his seat and say that there is an argument, if he so wishes, as to whether it is or is not common law.

Mr. McCleave: It is not common law.

Mr. Howard: That is the general term that laymen understand or that I understand. It may not be the term that my hon. and learned friend understands and wants to apply to these things, under a strict application. I assume that the proper term or phraseology would just be that they were living together as man and wife. I do not know whether that is the proper term to apply to situations such as this one. However, that is the term used in evidence given before the committee of the other place. I have seen both of them, namely reference to a common law arrangement and reference to a couple living together as man and wife. If it would suit the sensitivities of my friend the hon. member for Halifax I shall be glad to comply and make reference to his living together as man and wife.

I say that, in my opinion, evidence to that effect is sufficient grounds to grant a divorce. But to attempt to ask this committee—and this is what they are doing—to put in a petition that adultery took place on a particular day and then give no evidence at all that it took place on that particular day is stretching the point quite a bit, in my opinion.

I am not prepared to vote in favour of the passing of this particular bill on the ground that adultery was committed on the tenth day of July, 1959, because nowhere in evidence is it stated that adultery was committed on that particular date. I am prepared to vote in favour of this bill on the ground that the respondent and the corespondent have been living together as I put it, common law, or, as my sensitive friend the hon. member for Halifax wants it put, have been living together as man and wife. That is the ground upon which I am prepared to vote in support of this particular bill. The discussion I was leading up to was to point out that, regardless of the conflict in the evidence of the petitioner and further on between the respondent and the corespondent, which may be inconsequential things, on the basis of this couple—

Mr. Mandziuk: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but apparently he insists on this particular date. Did he overlook the third line in paragraph 7 of the petition where it is alleged "that on or about July 10, 1959", not necessarily on that particular date.

Mr. Howard: Quite right.

Mr. Mandziuk: Did the hon. member notice that?

Mr. Howard: Yes. I read that phraseology previously, namely "on or about".

Mr. McCleave: What do you say?

Mr. Howard: I do not know what the word "about" means to start with. There is no evidence that adultery took place on July 10 or about July 10. Does this mean within six months, two months, a week, or what? There is no attempt to specify it. The only reference here is an admission by the petitioner that his wife told him she had committed adultery at some time in the past, and an admission by the respondent that she was living as man and wife with another individual named. The word "adultery" is not even used in the questions submitted to her or the answers she gave. There is only the reference to her living with someone else as man and wife, particularly on the evening of July 10, 1959.

Mr. McCleave: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question, or it is a point of information. Under normal court procedure you could not ask a leading question using the word adultery, such as the question "Did you commit adultery?", giving a particular night, because that is the point in issue. A court would not allow that form of questioning on that ground.

Mr. Howard: I did not know that. If that is the case, apparently the committee in the other place does not follow that practice because Mr. Cohen is allowed to ask such a leading question of the corespondent. It is not only a leading question in the sense of

"Have you committed adultery?", but he puts it quite emphatically almost forcing the witness to say yes. He asks: "And you have committed adultery with the corespondent?", and the answer is yes.

Mr. McCleave: That would not be allowed either.

Mr. Howard: While this form of questioning may not be acceptable in a court of law, apparently it is acceptable in the committee of the other place because even though Mr. Cohen does not pose that question to the respondent, he is allowed to pose it in a very direct way to the corespondent. Therefore, I think perhaps the rules in a court of law are probably not followed in the committee of the other house, and members of the other place consider themselves, as perhaps we do, not as a court of law but as legislators passing a law and in reality the grounds can be as broad or as narrow as we so choose.

Mr. Drysdale: Would the hon. member permit a further question. Is he prepared to vote now in favour of this petition?

Mr. Howard: I am not going to vote for the petition at all, because I do not think the petition is before us. What is before us is a bill, and as you have pointed out on a number of occasions, Mr. Chairman, we are at the moment on clause 1 which says that the marriage is hereby dissolved, et cetera. This is the point I indicated I would vote for and I wish to indicate on what grounds I will vote for it. It is not that adultery has been proven to be committed on July 10 or about, but that adultery at some time has been committed on the evidence of the corespondent. But not on any particular day or at any particular time does he indicate that adultery has been committed.

The basic reason I intend to vote for the passage of this bill, if it comes to a vote, is that which I indicated earlier. Here is a couple living together as man and wife. Apparently they are not too sure for how long because the respondent says that she does not know, she guesses a couple of years, and the corespondent indicates it is about four or five years. Perhaps with an arrangement as loose as this it is easy to lose a year or two. I know when my wife asks me how long I have been married I have to think about it sometimes, and I dare say other husbands and wives do too. It is on that basis I intend to give my vote in favour of the bill, not on the basis of adultery having been proven.

That is why I think perhaps parliament should insist that if these particular cases are to continue to come before us some alteration in the form of the petition and in the rules of the committee of the other place should be made so that in circumstances such as this the petition may properly state that the respondent and corespondent have been living together as man and wife at a particular address for a particular length of time. I submit that is the form in which a petition should be presented, and then this attempt to find evidence of adultery being committed on a particular date would not have to be made.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, before you call the clauses I think it should be pointed out while on this matter of direct questions put to the respondent and corespondent that that would not normally be the practice in the courts, none the less when you have a clear cut case such as this some latitude is allowed.

The other comment of the hon. member was as to how these cases are conducted. It has been the practice in the committee of the other place and in our own committee, as he would discover if he would attend it, that these cases are conducted on a quite proper judicial basis.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to raise an objection to the method by which adultery is charged in an attempt to prove these particular cases. We have here, as we have had recently in a number of other cases, an alliance between two people which technically may not be a common law alliance because one party is already married and no reference is made to bigamy. It is an alliance where a man says he is living with a woman as man and wife or where a woman is living with a man as man and wife, but their alliance is not legal because one is already married. That, in my opinion, is what we would consider to be what adultery normally covers and the possibility of adultery taking place is pretty well a foregone conclusion.

The committee of the other house and of this house is being asked in these cases, not to establish a divorce on the ground of the relationships of the parties. The relationship in this case is admitted by three people. Two people have firsthand knowledge and a third secondhand. But the adultery charged is not proved and no attempt is made to prove it.

I suggest that the phrase "on or about" even in a court of law where it is used to a great extent refers here to either the tenth or the eleventh of the month or the eleventh or the twelfth, and when one says "on the tenth or thereabouts one means a little before that date—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are back on procedure and on what certain terms mean, which has absolutely nothing to do with the bill. Therefore I will have to ask the hon. member to come back to Bill No. SD-54.

Mr. McCleave: Has the hon. member read paragraph 7 of the petition which alleges that these two people "have been living as man and wife"? What more does he want?

Mr. Howard: It should stop there.

Mr. Peters: I agree with what the hon. member for Skeena says, that it should stop there. This is what we should have before us and then we could grant a divorce on that ground. But when it goes on to say "on or about" a certain day adultery took place, a common law alliance would not mean they were necessarily committing adultery on every day of that alliance. In fact, I should be very surprised if any learned hon. member present would suggest that this was the case, and yet we have picked out one particular day and said that adultery occurred on or about that day, simply because we have had to establish an adultery charge, and adultery is a specific incident of sexual relations between the two people in question. They deal specifically with this relationship and then rely on the evidence of a common law alliance. No adultery charge can be proved on this basis. We would be prepared to argue, and argue successfully, that many people could live together as man and wife without adultery taking place even though one of the parties was married to another person.

Mr. McCleave: Only two people in the world could believe that argument and they are sitting in the House of Commons.

Mr. Peters: It may surprise the hon. member to know that on a number of occasions we will be dealing with the cases of people who have been living together over a period of years yet no adultery has taken place; cases where parliament is being asked to grant an annulment and cases where we are being asked to grant a divorce on the grounds that it is physically—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I cannot allow the hon. member to discuss matters which are not strictly relevant, as he has done in the past. We must come back to Bill No. SD-54.

Mr. Peters: I think the remarks we are making are relevant.

Mr. McCleave: They are self-relevant. They reveal depths of ignorance.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Peters: There are a lot of backroom lawyers here, or at least some are lawyers, and they are not in another place for the simple reason that they do not know the answers to some of these questions. It may be that they do not know what adultery means and I think it is important for them to learn.

We are granting divorces on the ground of adultery having been committed on a particularly day and I am suggesting there is no proof here that adultery took place at the time suggested except the admission by these two people that they were living together. Learned counsel have stated that the greatest attention must be paid to evidence given in this way if there is reason to believe that the two people concerned are desiring a divorce. People are warned that they do not have to make such statements, yet they voluntarily make them and indicate that they have committed adultery on a specific date. The warning was read in this particular case by the chairman, as follow:

Q. Mrs. Edmonds, listen to me carefully. Before you proceed, it is my duty to inform you that you are not liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that you are guilty of adultery, unless you have already given evidence in this proceedings in disproof of your alleged adultery. While you are not liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to the proof of your own adultery, you have the right to do so if you see fit—that is your right and privilege—in which event everything you say will be told voluntarily and not under any compulsion. Do you understand your position in this regard?
A. Yes.

The questioning goes on:

Q. Mrs. Edmonds, are you living as man and wife with one Mike Maloney?
A. Yes.

Mr. McCleave: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he think that he and his associate have given us $1,800 worth of debate during the last 60 minutes?

Mr. Peters: If we have accomplished anything in removing this divorce procedure from parliament we have accomplished our $1,800 worth.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, you permitted the hon. member for Halifax to ask a question which was obviously completely irrelevant. Perhaps this was where the stop should have been made.

The Deputy Chairman: I said "order" half way through the hon. member's question.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member disobeyed you, obviously.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this clause carry?

An hon. Member: Carry it. Give the guy a break.

Mr. Peters: I think further consideration should be given to this bill in relation to what we think may be a great miscarriage of justice by those who are sitting in this House of Commons and who sit in the Senate—

The Deputy Chairman: I shall have to ask the hon. member to take his seat.

Clause agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time? Now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Peters: On the grounds of common law.

Bill read the third time and passed.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES IN QUEBEC, FOR GRANTING ANNUITIES, ETC.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (for Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Judges Act to provide salaries for four additional puisne judges of the Superior Court of Quebec; for the grant of annuities to judges upon attaining the age of 75 years; to remove anomalies in the present law relating to the grant of annuities under the act; and to alter the method of payment of travelling allowances to judges.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: House in committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution to amend the Judges Act. Shall the resolution carry?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, I think I should, for the benefit of the committee, make a brief explanation of the main purposes and provisions of the legislation to be based on the resolution now before the committee. This resolution and the bill which will be introduced when it carries are in large measure complementary to the resolution which was recently before the house to provide for an address to Her Majesty asking that she will cause to be laid before the United Kingdom parliament a measure to amend the British North America Act to provide for a retirement age of 75 for all judges of superior courts in Canada. In the view of the government the two measures should be considered as interdependent and the passage of this one is in a very real sense, or should be in a very real sense, dependent upon the passage of the other resolution through this parliament.

The reason why we hold this view is that the occasion of the introduction of this resolution and the main purpose of the legislation are to adjust the pensions of judges who will be now, all of them in Canada, retiring at the age of 75 years. We consider, therefore, that at a time when we are completing the program which will bring about the retirement of all judges at the age of 75 it is especially desirable to put the pensions of judges appointed by parliament on a proper footing. It is my own submission, Mr. Chairman, that for a number of years our judges have not had proper provision with respect to the annuities which they receive on their retirement or which their wives and widows receive on their decease.

Although, as I have said, we regard the main occasion or reason for this measure as being the simultaneous presentation to parliament of the measure regarding retirement age, there are other reasons for its introduction which I suggest may be best understood by a reference to the main provisions of the measure which will follow this resolution.

I should say a word about the desirability of providing adequately for the judiciary of our country. There are, of course, a number of fields in which this problem confronts us, but the main field in which I propose to deal with it tonight is in that of their retirement allowances. Of course this field is closely related to the field of salaries; but the measure, I should like to make clear, does not touch the salaries of judges. It deals with their retirement allowances, the provisions for their retirement, and also with the provision for travelling allowances while they are on circuit or travelling on judicial duty.

I think it is a fact—a principle, if you like—which will not be disputed by hon. members of this house, that not only is it essential that we should make provision for the adequate compensation of our judiciary while they hold office but, as an essential part of the position of the judiciary generally, adequate provision should be made for their situation after they will have retired from office, because it is a fact that in the vast majority of cases those who accepted appointments to the bench have in the past, and I am sure they will in the future, accepted those appointments at a very real sacrifice in terms of the immediate monetary compensation which they receive.

This, of course, is in itself not an improper feature because there is attached to the position of the judiciary the attributes which surround one of the highest, if not the highest, positions in the land. There is an element of public service. There is, of course, also the position and the esteem in which our judges are properly held. All of these things are attributes of judicial office, and they are essential attributes of judicial office; but I think that one must always also take a realistic and practical approach to this matter and not allow one's regard for the attraction which individuals so appointed might properly feel to this high position to outweigh the fact that it is not right that we should ask them to make too great a sacrifice, a completely disproportionate sacrifice, when we call upon them to assume that office.

One of the features with regard to this office and to the position of judges is this question of the retirement allowances which they will receive when they retire. As I said a moment ago, the reasons for the introduction of this particular measure may be understood by reference to its main provisions, the principle one of those being the revision of the rules and regulations regarding retirement allowances for judges.

The main change we are making in this connection is to adjust what I believe to have been an unfortunate provision introduced in the amendment to the Judges Act of 1955. As a result of that amendment judges retirement allowances have been based upon the salaries that they were receiving prior to 1955. By the amendment of 1955 an increase with respect to superior court judges of $2,500 in their salaries was provided for; but it was a part of that amendment that their pensions, their retirement allowances, should have relation not to the new salary but to the salary that had been in effect before that change of 1955. The result has been that up to the present time our judges have been retiring on a pension based on the salaries which were set in 1951.

For the information of hon. members it should be recalled that judges retire on two thirds of the salary which is set as the basis of their pension. So that the situation now is that all judges in Canada retire on two thirds of their 1951 salary and it has been felt by the government that it was and is a mistake to relate the retiring allowances of judges to their former salaries. Most, if not all, of the persons for whom parliament makes provision with respect to pension or superannuation have that pension provision related to the salary of which they were in receipt at the time of their retirement. This, of course, was always the situation with respect to the Judges Act until the amendment of 1955, but the result of that amendment has been to relate the retirement allowances of our judiciary not to the actual salary received at the time of their retirement but to the salary they received some years prior to the last amendment.

One of the other effects of this situation has been not only general in its nature with respect to the question of whether or not it is a sound principle but it has also had the result that again of those for whom parliament provides retirement allowances under federal legislation judges alone have had no revision of their retirement allowances since the year 1951. As I have explained, in the revision of 1955 it was provided that judges would retire on a pension based on their previous salary, which has had the effect that their pension rates have not been changed since the year 1951. So far as I have been able to ascertain they are the only group for whom we are responsible who have waited this long for an adjustment in the level of their retirement allowances.

I think I should also emphasize to the committee that the changes to be proposed in the legislation itself will also affect the wives and widows of those judges who are covered by the provisions we make for their annuities. It is the intention that all those who have retired since 1955 will also have their situations and those of their wives and widows covered by the provisions that will be introduced in the bill to follow the resolution.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since 1955 or 1951?

Mr. Fulton: Since 1955. Another main group of provisions in the legislation will be those affecting the circumstances under which judges may receive retirement allowances on their retirement. It will be provided that in the future for any judge to be entitled to a full retirement allowance when he reaches the retirement age of 75 he must have served 10 years on the bench. When I say "in the future" I mean with respect to any future appointments. The implications of this will be obvious. It is our feeling that when we are asking parliament to provide for a retirement age of 75 we should at the same time suggest and lay before parliament this proposal that a judge will not have earned his full retirement allowance for his judicial functions unless he has served 10 years in that capacity. This, of course, must be read subject to the provisions for retirement on account of sickness or on account of other considerations in the national interest, but in general a judge appointed in the future who is in good health and reaches the retirement age of 75 must have served 10 years before he will be qualified for a full retirement allowance.

We are also proposing to change the provision with regard to the receipt of annuities on voluntary retirement. At the present time a judge may only receive the full annuity to which he is entitled if he retires on account of sickness and it is found that that retirement is in the public interest. We propose to make three changes in this situation. We propose to provide that any judge who has served 15 years in judicial office may retire on full annuity at the age of 70. This retirement will be entirely voluntary but it is our feeling that there are cases, and an appreciable number of them, in which the interests of the judiciary as well as the position of the individual judge may well warrant retirement of that judge at the age of 70. It is our feeling, therefore, that if after having served for 15 years in a judicial capacity any individual judge feels that he should retire he may do so at the age of 70 and receive the full retirement allowance. It will be realized, of course, that the provision of 15 years service is closely related to the present 15-year provision with regard to certain of the existing retirement arrangements.

The second change to be made in this field is that if at any time after having served 15 years a judge wishes to retire and if, in the opinion of the governor in council, his retirement will contribute to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest, that judge may also be permitted to retire voluntarily and receive the full retirement allowance. The third provision to be made in the new legislation with respect to voluntary retirement is that if by reason of sickness or other disability a judge is rendered unable to discharge the full functions of his office then again he may be permitted to retire with a full retirement allowance.

I am quite sure the committee will realize without my going into detail that there have been a number of occasions in the past when the present provision with regard to retirement, related strictly as it is to the question of sickness and the public interest, have created very great difficulties not only for the present government but also, I know, for the former government with respect to whether in fact retirement should be accepted and the pension or retirement allowance should be paid. What we are seeking to do, therefore, is to clarify and bring more into accord with the actual position the provisions with regard to the circumstances under which judges may be allowed to retire on full pension before they reach the age of 75.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the 15 years apply to the third case?

Mr. Fulton: No, the 15 years does not apply to the case of sickness or other incapacity disabling a judge from the due fulfillment of his judicial office.

The third main provision that is being made in the legislation is with respect to living allowances. At the present time there is in my view a rather artificial distinction between the amounts that judges may receive for living allowances or expenses when they proceed on circuit or go on journeys in connection with their judicial functions. There is an artificial distinction between communities with a population of 5,000 or less and those with a population of 5,000 or over. Generally it is provided that if a judge attends as a judge at a centre of 5,000 population or less he is entitled to living expenses of $8 a day. If the centre is over 5,000 the amount is $12 a day. There is provision that in special circumstances these rates may be increased from $8 to $12 and from $12 to $15 a day respectively. It does not, I am sure, take much argument to convince the committee that there are very few, if any, communities in Canada today where a judge can live for $15, let alone $12 or $8, a day. Yet, these are the full amounts that he may be allowed for living expenses while in that community away from his home.

There have been cases where I know judges have economized in ways that I am sure this committee would readily agree no member of the judiciary should be expected to adopt. They have to economize because, contrary to popular belief, judges are not all rich people before they are appointed and they are certainly not all rich people on the basis of the salaries we pay them. Judges do find a very real drain upon their income when they travel, as they do sometimes, on lengthy journeys on circuit. I should like anyone to reflect for a moment and ask himself the question whether a judge coming from Toronto to Ottawa to take the assizes can possibly live and pay his hotel expenses on $15 a day, although that is the maximum that judges are authorized to receive. Some of them, therefore, do economize, to use a polite term, with regard to the places where they stay. This is not a proper position, nor I believe is it a fair position, in which to put members of the judiciary.

We propose to make, not an extravagant change but what I regard as a very practical change in that situation by simply providing that a judge who is absent from his home on judicial duties will be entitled to living allowance in accord with the expenses that he has actually incurred. All a judge will have to do will be to file a statement of his actual living expenses while away from home on judicial duties and he will be entitled to recover that amount. This, it seems to me, is not what can be described as a really generous gesture with respect to our judges. It only means they will be entitled to recover what they have actually paid out while absent from their homes in the service of their country.

There will be one or two other minor changes with respect to travel and living allowances, principally a change that will place the province of Quebec once more on the same footing as all other provinces. This change will have the result that judges in Quebec will no longer have to have their travel and living expenses certified by the chief judge of their court. In no other province is that required, and it seems to us it is anomalous in the extreme that judges in Quebec should be subject to that requirement when no others are.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the main provisions of the legislation which will be based on this resolution. They are, I believe, a first very practical step in the direction of revising the situation of the judiciary. They are a concurrent step with the one which parliament was asked to ratify regarding retirement ages. We will, in the future, when this legislation carries, be in a position where all judges appointed by this parliament retire at 75 years of age and where the conditions and circumstances under which they receive their retirement allowances and the amount of those retirement allowances will have been placed on a rational basis, in my view. The other circumstances with regard to the performance of their functions, that is those relating to their allowances while travelling, also will have been rationalized and placed on the same acceptable basis.

There are I recognize, and I am sure the committee will agree, a number of other features of the Judges Act which call for study and review. Those are still under study and review. I am not able to say when I shall be introducing legislation to deal with them, but I believe that with the measure which I am placing before parliament tonight we are making a useful first step forward in connection with the physical and financial position of our judiciary.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? In his opening remarks he stated that this resolution was complementary to one previously before the house amending the British North America Act, and that this measure and the former measure were interdependent. Then as he was about to sit down he made some further reference to that, but the whole of his remarks dealt with other matters in the resolution. I wonder if he would not explain in greater detail how these two are interdependent?

Mr. Fulton: I thought I did that, Mr. Chairman, but I would be glad to explain again. As I said, the occasion of the introduction of this resolution and the bill to follow it, and the main reason for its introduction, is the fact that we are asking parliament to place a limit on the retirement age of judges of superior courts. This will affect, as I explained to the house previously, some 12 judges immediately who will be 75 years of age when that measure comes into effect. Those judges who are now on the bench will be required to retire at 75 years of age and it has seemed to the government, therefore, appropriate now, if not essential, that we should make these adjustments in the pension provisions. It is in that sense that we regard them, as I say, as complementary measures and we said that, in our view, the passage of this one should be dependent upon the passage of the other.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few comments on this resolution. We will have an opportunity when the bill comes before the house of examining it in greater detail than I now propose to do. The minister has given us a general outline, and I should like to make a few comments.

The resolution before us seeks to do, as the minister indicated, four different things. It would, first of all, provide salaries for four additional puisne judges of the Superior Court of Quebec; grant annuities to judges upon attainment of the age of 75 years and remove anomalies in the present law relating to the grant of annuities under the act as well as alter the method of payment of travel allowances to judges. The minister did not say anything, in so far as I now recall, about the circumstances requiring four additional puisne judges of the Superior Court of Quebec.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry about that; that slipped my mind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I presume that there is justification for that, but as I say the minister has not explained the circumstances. We may now have to wait until he concludes this debate. If he wishes to intervene now, I would have no objection to his doing so. I would be prepared to put a question to him. I would ask him why it is necessary, at this time, to appoint four additional puisne judges to the superior court in Quebec?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had covered all these matters in my notes. However I find I have overlooked this question and I appreciate the hon. member for Essex East raising it now.

The answer is twofold. First, the province of Quebec, in legislation passed at its session this year, provided for six, I think it was, additional superior court judges in the Montreal division and one in the Three Rivers district. We are asking parliament to authorize the provision of four out of these seven. The intention is to appoint one for Three Rivers and three for Montreal.

In so far as the necessity for these appointments is concerned, of course, in large measure I think we should be guided by the views of the province which has the constitutional responsibility for the organization of the courts. The province is of the opinion that this extra number of judges is required. In addition I have asked the province, and I have asked others who are concerned, to let me know the basis upon which this decision was arrived at, and I have been satisfied that the need for extra judges in both of these districts, that is the Three Rivers division and the Montreal division, is well established by virtue of the backlog of work that confronts the courts there. We are therefore asking parliament for the authority to provide the salaries for four additional appointments at this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This explanation by the Minister of Justice naturally raises some curiosity as to why the government of Canada has not acceded to the request of the government of the province of Quebec for the appointment of seven judges which that province has requested. The minister has indicated that in the view of the government of Canada only four judges are required, certainly at the present time.

I think the minister will agree that it is somewhat unusual for this kind of situation to arise. Usually when a province asks for the appointment of judges, having in mind provincial competence in the constitution of the courts, I believe there has generally been recognition on the part of the federal government that the request of the province should be met. In this instance, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it is to be presumed that the request, in the view of the Minister of Justice, is one that should not be granted in its entirety and that seven judges are not needed. One might inquire why the province of Quebec has taken the view that it requires seven judges. In any event, the Minister of Justice has taken the position, judging by what he has just said, that only four judges are required.

Mr. Fulton: Four to be appointed at the moment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At the moment. The minister has not said whether there have been any conferences between the two jurisdictions in the matter. However, if the Attorney General of the province of Quebec had reasons for impressing his colleagues with the desirability of appointing seven judges, it would seem that this evidence would have had at least a persuasive effect on the Minister of Justice. However, it has not had that effect. One of the two jurisdictions not being in agreement, that fact presents us with the obligation of asking on what grounds the Minister of Justice of Canada did not accede to the request of the province of Quebec. If that request was unreasonable, the minister should indicate the incidents of the unreasonableness. Also, when he is doing that, and when he closes the debate he might indicate what the constitutional position, in fact, is in a case where a request is made by the province in this particular context and is not acceded to by the federal government.
