Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are looking forward with interest to the proposed announcement by the provincial government of Ontario. The government at Ottawa will make its announcement in due course, when plans have been completed.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether the announcement being made by the province of Ontario follows discussion between the two governments; and has the minister been made aware of the provisions of the Ontario announcement?

Mr. Churchill: That question was asked yesterday. Again this is repetition. There have been frequent consultations between the government at Ottawa and the provincial government at Toronto with regard to this problem.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the question I asked yesterday, which perhaps I could repeat now, was not had there been consultation between the two governments but had there been meetings between the two governments.

Mr. Churchill: At times there have been meetings between representatives of the two governments.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—THREATENED CONFISCATION OF SUBSIDIARY OF CANADIAN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government made representations to the government of Cuba in connection with the threatened confiscation by that government of the Cuban subsidiary of a Canadian corporation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, but I will look into this situation.

Human Rights

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RECOGNITION AND PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-79, to provide for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Prime Minister speaks I observe that the hon. member for Timiskaming is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order on which I ask your consideration and ruling. The introduction of the second reading of Bill No. C-79 is a breach of the general rules of this house and is therefore out of order. I wish to make it clear that I do not oppose the introduction of this bill, but I know we would not intentionally introduce a bill in this house that would not stand the scrutiny of the law and would contravene the rules of the house. The house at all times is master of its own business, and may agree to consent to change the rules.

The rule which the present motion violates is a rule of this house and of the United Kingdom House of Commons which was ordered to be a rule of the United Kingdom parliament in 1604 and has continued in that house ever since. The subject matter of this bill has already been introduced and discussed by the house in a previous bill this session, and I should like to point out the conflict that will take place between this bill and a bill previously passed this session. The general rule, and I have precedents in considerable number, is that it is generally conceded that where a subject matter has been decided upon in one session, that matter cannot be raised and introduced again though it is in slightly different form.

Mr. Speaker: It is true there is a rule against the house taking a decision twice on the same issue unless the earlier decision has been rescinded. However, the hon. member's proposition strikes me as rather remarkable, and in the interests of shortening the matter perhaps he would indicate what previous matters this house has dealt with which cover the scope of the bill now ordered for second reading.

Mr. Peters: The bill of rights proposes that this house should affirm that in Canada there have always existed certain specified human rights and fundamental freedoms as indicated in clause 2, and that no act of this parliament shall, unless otherwise expressly stated therein, abrogate certain freedoms, rights and remedies—clause 3—and that any other rights not specified shall continue—clause 5. Each of these questions or propositions is affirmatively expressed to permit of no negative exception, except that mentioned in clause 3 and in clause 6.

Earlier this session this house negatived by vote each of these questions in greater or less degree, so that the bill which was passed by this house, passed by the Senate, received royal assent and became an act stands as an exception to the questions propounded in the present bill. This house cannot vote upon the absolute and affirmative propositions in this bill without voting again upon the reverse negative propositions in the former bill.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would refer to the earlier decision of the house. I am familiar with the principle but I see no application in anything he has said yet.

Mr. Peters: The earlier bill containing the negative propositions to those contained in this bill in positive form is the Feeds Act, chapter 14 of the statutes of the present session. This act was Bill No. S-27; it was introduced in the house and passed, and it interferes in these respects. The particular human rights and fundamental freedoms that were negatived by the house earlier this session in the Feeds Act and are now proposed again in the Canadian bill of rights are as follows: first, security of property and search without warrant involving security of the enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Peters: Section 7 (1) (a) of the Feeds Act empowers a government inspector, who may be any person designated by the Minister of Agriculture, to enter private property, search the premises and any private documents and papers therein, and take away samples, all without the due process of a search warrant.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry not to recognize the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Brunsden) but only one point of order can be raised at a time. From what the hon. member for Timiskaming has said I think he has perhaps misconstrued the application of the rule with respect to this bill. If he will permit me to express my opinion, I will be glad to look into the earlier matters to which he referred in order to see how far they have been covered, but in general this is a bill that is quite new in its terms and broad in its scope. The house has ordered it to be read a second time this day, and the duty of the house is to proceed in accordance with its own order.

If, as the hon. member alleges, there is anything in this bill which will be contrary to a decision taken, for example, in the Feeds Act—and I must say that on its face I find difficulty in following the argument—then to my mind the proper time to take exception would be when the clause involving a second decision on the point comes before the house in committee. The whole bill is so broadly different and new that I hope the hon. member will agree that the point he has taken cannot be mentioned; and in any event, to my mind it should have been asserted when the house ordered the bill for second reading.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on this Dominion day once more we think of the genius of the fathers of confederation and the contribution they made in their day and generation to the setting up of a national political organization which, despite the many vicissitudes of national and international events, has proven one of the most forward-looking constitutional accomplishments among the nations of the democratic world. Today we have reason for celebration when we look back over the years and recall that the purpose of the legislation which brought about confederation, in the words of its major architect, Sir John A. Macdonald, along with Sir George Etienne Cartier, was "to make a great people and a great nationality".

We have been able during the intervening years to add steps which more and more have expanded the democratic rights of Canadians as a whole. At the present session we have passed legislation which provides for the first citizens of Canada, the Indians, the full right of the exercise of the franchise, thus removing any suggestion that they or any other Canadians are in the position of being second class citizens.

It is in this context that I rise for the purpose of speaking on a subject on which I have spoken through the years, which has to do with the maintenance and preservation of freedom against governments, however powerful they may be; for in the words of an organization which was set up some years ago by our great neighbour, the United States, "freedom is everybody's job." On this day there should be a realization of the responsibilities of citizenship, with pride in the achievements of the past, and the added assurance that individuals will know that henceforth under law they will at all times have preserved to them the rights and benefits of that institution.

I am dealing particularly with the national field, for the bill of rights is entirely within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. It covers only those matters which under the division of powers are allocated to the federal parliament and thereby in no way will it impinge upon or infringe the absolute powers provided by section 92 and one or two other sections of the British North America Act.

Our federal system causes us to recall something of the development of Canada and something of its history. This day causes us to reflect on one of the outstanding features of Canada and her history, and that is the fact that had it not been for the French speaking people in 1777, when Canada was invaded, Canada would have become a part of the United States. We sometimes forget the fact that only 14 years after the treaty of Paris, it was French courage and French valour that preserved this part of North America for the British crown.

We in Canada inherit the British traditions. Indeed, it is something to recall, when we speak of freedom, that for the first time, among all the colonies of Great Britain, indeed it was in Canada before Great Britain herself that freedom of religion was granted under the Quebec Act passed by the British parliament. Thus freedom of religion was assured to the people of these colonies who were of the Roman Catholic faith more than 50 years before that freedom was granted in the United Kingdom.

In so far as our federal system is concerned, we adopted it from the experience of the United States and adapted it to meet our needs, endeavouring at the same time to resolve some of those difficulties which in the light of 80 years of experience the United States had found required to be repaired or at least to be altered. It is of interest, too, when we speak of the contributions that the various nations have made to us to note the contributions of the French, their culture and their love of freedom and the British contribution of their traditions, parliamentary system and the rule of law. From the United States we received the framework of our constitutional set-up, a federal system; from the French and British we received the spirit and strength of our constitution.

It may be of some interest to note this; that through the action of the states which joined together as the United States, Canada was placed in a preferred position in their articles of confederation and perpetual union in 1781. There are few Canadians who know this; there are fewer Americans who realize it. Under these articles of confederation, No. 11 one reads that "Canada acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the united states, shall be admitted into, and entitled to all the advantages of this union; but no other colony shall be admitted into the same unless such admission be agreed to by nine states." Canada was placed in a preferred position. Canada preferred not to accept that preferred position and through the years Canada has maintained that preference without there being any possibility of any change in the decision that was then made.

I might point out also that had the United Kingdom in 1776, following the battles of Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill, acceded to the request of the American colonists, the course of history would have been very different from what it has been. In that year, and following the shedding of blood, the colonists sent to the United Kingdom a delegation headed by Benjamin Franklin and endeavoured to place before the colonial secretary of that day the viewpoint of the American colonists. This viewpoint was that in all the colonies of the United Kingdom, and in particular the 13 colonies, they have the right to look after their own internal business, to govern themselves and not be subject to taxation without representation.

May I digress in that connection and say this. When we hear the legendary story of John Hancock affixing his signature to the declaration of independence in such large letters that the English king would be able to see, it is sometimes forgotten that Hancock also signed the olive branch petition in the No. 1 position and in the same large handwriting. Amongst the others who signed this petition were John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson.

In other words our commonwealth of today was a germ in the minds of those colonists who in that petition prayed that the English king give them those rights which were finally enacted, almost in their entirety and without any subtraction or addition whatever, by the Statute of Westminster in 1931.

However, when we think of the contributions of various nations to our country, we ask ourselves why it was that when the United States constitution was set up there was no initial bill of rights. The reason was that it was felt that a bill of rights setting forth fundamental freedoms was no longer necessary. But after a few years, two years in fact, Jefferson came to the conclusion that a bill of rights was necessary, and the first 10 amendments to the constitution of the United States were added to that constitution as of December 15, 1791.

For the sake of the record I simply point out this fact. These 10 amendments cover the fundamental freedoms of religion, speech, and security of the individual. In general, they are those which, with the necessary additions that have to be made in the light of present day conditions, are in the bill of rights which I now bring to parliament.

Immediately the question will be asked, why did not the British North America Act include a bill of rights? A reading of the discussions that took place at that time and the conclusions arrived at, indicates that many of those who became the fathers of confederation were of the opinion that these fundamental rights would never be infringed nor invaded by any parliament; that they had become embedded not only in the experience of generations in Britain but had become part and parcel of the thinking of the people in a parliamentary democracy constructed on the basis of parliamentary government.

Their hopes or their expectations did not eventuate. A little later I am going to refer to several general examples, not for the purpose of resurrecting the past but simply to indicate things that were done, legislation that was passed, orders in council that were issued, that had the effect of denying one or more of the fundamental freedoms.

May I say at this moment, Mr. Speaker, that I am not going to endeavour to cover the entire field of liberty. I am going to keep within bounds to the end that the Leader of the Opposition will have, before we adjourn, an opportunity to open today and, if he so chooses, to continue when this matter again comes up for consideration.

I am going to refer first to one or two steps that have been taken internationally in connection with the subject of human rights and civil liberties. The immediate question that will be asked is this. What are civil liberties? I defined them on one previous occasion as constituting the individual a sacred being and making him a sovereign in his dealings with the state. To adopt the words of that philosopher, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes of the United States supreme court, civil liberties give the right to the individual to hold the view that I disagree with so long as that individual keeps within the law and does not endeavour to undermine my beliefs by force.

We have today, in effect, although never adopted by Canada, a universal declaration of human rights which was passed by the United Nations. It contains 30 articles. Its preamble sets forth clearly and unmistakably, as does the preamble of the United Nations charter, the greatness of human rights and the determinant that the preservation of human rights is on the peace of the world. It begins in these words:

> Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people,

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law,

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations,

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and have determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom,

Whereas member states have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now, therefore,

The general assembly

This universal declaration of human rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance—

This measure that I introduce is the first step on the part of Canada to carry out the acceptance either of the international declaration of human rights or of the principles that actuated those who produced that noble document. Going back over the years I simply point out this fact. The first occasion on which I brought this matter before parliament was in the form of an amendment on May 7, 1946, when there was before parliament a bill that all through the years I have advocated, namely a citizenship bill that allowed Canadians to be Canadians. On that subject I have spoken through the years as one of mixed origin, believing that Canada could never be called a united Canada when people were unable, whatever their racial origin and however proud they were of that origin, to become Canadian.

It was in 1944, I think in August, on the first occasion I brought that matter before the house, that the prime minister, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, said that after the war he would join with me and others who had similar beliefs to bring into effect a citizenship bill to provide for a Canadian citizenship in law as well as in fact. At the time when that bill was before the house two years later, I endeavoured to secure an amendment setting forth the freedoms generally set forth today in the bill now before the house.

Then on several later occasions, particularly on March 24, 1952, as reported in volume I of Hansard for that year at pages 714 to 722, and also on an earlier occasion, on May 16, 1947, as reported in volume IV of Hansard at pages 3149 to 3159, I brought before this house my ideas as to a bill of rights for Canadians.

I am now going to review for a moment some of the clauses of this bill. There is nothing unusual in a bill of rights. It is of interest that every country which has adopted the federal system since 1867 has incorporated in its constitutional development a bill of rights. Two other countries, India and Ireland incorporated into their constitutions bills of rights when they became republics. That Canadians as a whole ask for one and have continued to ask for one is shown by the fact that on one occasion in 1947 and on another occasion in 1949, 500,000 Canadians on the one occasion and 600,000 Canadians on the other, signed petitions asking for a bill of rights. There were almost two and a half times as many signatures on those petitions as on any other petition ever presented to the parliament of Canada, even though one such petition was for the increase in old age pensions. In other words there has been widespread interest and demand.

The Canadian Daily Newspapers Association had this to say back in 1952:

In Canada we have been coasting insecurely upon British precedents and sometimes violating them, and in the light of Canada's membership in the United Nations and its responsibilities as a member, the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association urges that the parliamentary committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms give favourable consideration to a constitutional amendment guaranteeing these fundamental freedoms.

I shall refer to the question of the constitution a little later on. The essence, however, of the view of the Canadian Daily Newspapers Association, representing 86 of the 89 English and French daily newspapers in Canada at the time and 99.4 per cent of their combined circulation, indicates the widespread support for action in this direction.

The bill in question can be summed up in a few words. In clause 2 the following fundamental freedoms are provided:

(a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property—

Not the ownership of property, notice, which is a matter within provincial jurisdiction.

—and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

(b) the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex;

Pausing there, Mr. Speaker, may I say that above everything else in the world today there is no element more dangerous to the legions of freedom everywhere and to the nations which espouse freedom than the practice of discrimination. Clause 2 continues:

(c) freedom of religion;
(d) freedom of speech;
(e) freedom of assembly and association; and

Mr. Speaker, this is the first time in Canadian history that freedom of the press is going to be recognized under law. Freedom of the press is a matter of federal responsibility, and I say that on the basis of the Alberta press case in 1938. Here for the first time this bulwark of freedom will be embodied in a declaration by parliament that it is in existence and cannot be violated. Furthermore, if any of these several rights should be violated under legislation now existing the courts in interpreting the particular laws or statutes which have been passed will hereafter, if this bill is passed, be required to interpret those statutes of today in the light of the fact that wherever there is a violation of any of these declarations or freedoms the statute in question is to that extent non-operative and was never intended to be so operative.

That is a major step forward. Whatever the mistakes we have made in the past may be, and I am not going to bring in the act that was mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member who raised the point of order, whatever act has been passed that violates any of these principles of interpretation, the courts from now on will determine the ineffectiveness and inapplicability of the sections concerned in view of this declaration by parliament.

This is provided for in clause 3, which says that:

All the acts of the parliament of Canada enacted before or after the commencement of this part, and all laws enforced in Canada or in any part of Canada—

They are all federal laws.

—at the commencement of this part that are subject to be repealed, abolished or altered by the parliament of Canada, shall, unless it is otherwise expressly stated in any act of the parliament of Canada hereafter enacted, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or fundamental freedoms recognized by this part—

Then, in light of the experience of the past the clause in paragraph (c) provides that no one shall be deprived of the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay.

I happened to be the counsel in a particular case under the Excise Act, which stated that a man was subject to be examined as to what he knew regarding certain commodities found in his possession. The examining officer had the right to deny him counsel. I could go over many statutes which contain abridgements of that kind which, however efficacious they may be to those who are engaged in the prosecution of the law, will hereafter be denied in the event that this legislation is passed. Then again, a person shall not be denied——of the remedy by way of habeas corpus for the determination of the validity of his detention and for his release if the detention is not lawful.

Mr. Speaker, habeas corpus in the United Kingdom has never been denied in the last 100 years except by parliament—and there is provision for that a little later on—for the security of the state. If parliament acts, when security is paramount, freedoms may have to be placed in pawn as security for victory. But habeas corpus was denied here in 1946 by a simple order in council that was later forgotten. It was passed in September, 1945. I asked about it in November, 1945, and the minister of justice said there was no such order in council. Then in February, 1946 the prime minister, Right Hon. Mackenzie King, said well, the minister of justice had forgotten about it.

That order in council denying habeas corpus simply stated that anyone detained would be considered as being lawfully detained, which denied any application for habeas corpus. That is over from now on, if this legislation is passed. I go on to the next provisions; that no one shall be denied the right of a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, and no court, tribunal, commission, board or other authority shall compel a person to give evidence if he is denied counsel, protection against self-crimination, or other constitutional safeguards.

Mr. Speaker, that is very necessary. There will be some statutes in existence which will have to be changed and which will be interpreted accordingly. If we pass this legislation it will put an end to a trial within a trial—a trial outside the trial—which denies to the individual concerned those constitutional rights which are the basis of freedom. To continue further, no one shall——deprive a person of the right to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal for the determination of any criminal charge against him.

I am not going into examples. Examples could, however, be given of cases in which the individual in the past, and in the very recent past, has been charged with an offence and tried before one or other of those who laid the charge. These things will no longer exist in this country.

I am going to set out some of the abuses which have taken place. I am not going to be partisan. I am going to quote from the submission of the committee for a bill of rights, and when I read some of the names here, hon. members will begin to understand that there is no partisanship in this. From Vancouver, Dr. Grauer, Dr. Norman McKenzie; from Alberta, Elmer Roper; from Saskatchewan, Dean Cronkite, Hon. T. C. Douglas; from Manitoba, Grant Dexter, E. J. McMurray, a former solicitor general of Canada and an outstanding counsel, Victor Sifton, Dr. A. W. Trueman; from Ottawa, Mrs. John Bird, Hon. J. M. Macdonnell, M.P., the late A. R. Mosher, Senator Arthur Roebuck; from Toronto, the late Joseph E. Atkinson—I am just picking out a few of these names—Andrew Brewin, Murray Cotterill and so on; from Windsor, I do not want to leave Windsor out, George Burt and Mayor Arthur Reaume; from Montreal, George Ferguson, Roger Ouimet, Dr. Penfield.

So I could go across the country. I mention these names only for the purpose of indicating that no one could ascribe partisanship to these people in this regard. This is what they said, and I am reading from page 9 of the submission:

> Why, then, is it now necessary to state explicitly in the constitutional document what is already implicit? The answer is that experience has shown that what is only implicit is in fact endangered by lack of recognition and of acceptance, and that an explicit statement of rights is not only advisable to create public recognition of the fundamental basis of our society but also to prevent definite infringements of those rights. The exigencies of total war and the inevitable growth in the functions of government both have naturally and inevitably resulted in a tendency to the abrogation of these civil rights.

Then it goes on to point out a few examples, and I know all of us regret those examples today. It says:

> Under the sweeping powers conferred by the War Measures Act, the executive (or cabinet) in December 1945, some months after the cessation of hostilities and without reference to parliament, passed three orders in council, which if they had been enforced, would have exiled to Japan some 11,000 or more persons of Japanese origin, a large proportion of whom were Canadian born citizens.

When we talk about discrimination and its dangers we recall that the only offence committed by these people in 99 per cent of the cases, as it turned out subsequently, was their colour. The submission says:

> It is true that some of those liable to be "expatriated" to Japan had signed a request to be sent to Japan. But it is also true that none of them had committed any offence against the law or had been guilty of any acts of disloyalty.

It goes on to point out that the privy council held that the cabinet, by order in council, could do that. A second example given is the order in council which was passed on October 6, 1945. The submission says:

> This ... was another illustration of disregard of constitutional liberties. Habeas corpus was swept aside. Persons were detained and interrogated by a royal commission and before any court trial was held, their guilt was publicized by findings of a royal commission. The ordinary protection of counsel and habeas corpus was denied to them. No charges were preferred against them but they were held incommunicado.

Other examples are referred to. I do not intend to go into all those at the present time. I will have an opportunity of doing so when I come to reply at the conclusion of this debate. I will deal with other invasions since the war, in connection with the wheat board, where a farmer won his case against the board and then an order in council was passed stating, in effect, that whatever the judgment of the court might be, this was the law. I refer to the Oatway case, lest anyone has forgotten.

I can think of another example, when in tremendous haste the House of Commons passed legislation to deny the right of transportation companies to run air lines. This had to be passed, it was passed, and then it was never made effective.

In the Foreign Exchange Control Act after the war provision was made that you could be searched and examined, that no matter what the wrongdoing was toward the individual, the person against whom that wrong had been done had no right of action. Everything that had been done to him was to be regarded as lawful.

When some people start telling me about the rights of the individual I go back to the years 1945-49 and recall these things. I brought this matter before the house and the answer finally given was, "Well, we will amend the law and give the individual who is wronged the right of action in the courts, but whatever his damages are they shall be restricted to $1."

Mr. Chevrier: Will the Prime Minister allow a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the Prime Minister aware of the Georgian Bay airways case which took place just a few months ago, in which after an appeal had been made to the Minister of Transport the governor in council changed the law in exactly the same manner the Prime Minister has referred to, and contrary to the Aeronautics Act?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is not the viewpoint of the Minister of Transport, and I am not accepting that as being a fact. I am saying, however, that if such a thing happens at any time then I am looking for support from the hon. gentleman, because we are going to put an end to that.

Mr. Chevrier: That is only one of many cases.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This indicates that there is going to be general support of this measure, and I am very glad to see that attitude. I do not care what situation may arise, this sort of thing is not going to happen any more under the proposed federal legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the Prime Minister allow another question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am endeavouring to conclude in five minutes in order that the Leader of the Opposition will have a chance to speak.

Mr. Chevrier: I have just one short question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister stop this kind of action on the part of his own government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not always rely on the complete objectivity of the questions asked by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pearson: Nor do we rely on the complete objectivity of the Prime Minister's statements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I know that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) intends to be objective, but I am sure that if I looked into these matters individually I would find that the statement made by the Minister of Transport was in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has made no statement on it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am trying to get through in five minutes to enable my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition to speak. I will answer the hon. member for Laurier once more. I could go through the record and review it briefly. I believe the hon. member for Laurier was a parliamentary assistant on the occasion when the rates on government annuities were unjustifiably increased by order in council. This is just one instance of a statute being amended or suspended by order in council. The hon. gentleman will recall, too, that he was a member of the cabinet when an order in council was passed which legalized taxation three months before parliament met on it. That is not going to happen any more. I also seem to recall that taxation was once imposed by a radio speech.

I have been forced to refer to these things because of the attitude of the hon. gentleman. I simply wish to underline that these things are not going to happen from now on. Knowing from experience that they have happened, I feel I can rely on the assistance of the hon. gentleman, and I am confident that he will be joining with us in assuring that they will not happen in the future. If what the hon. member says is correct, what I am saying is again underlined.

I shall pass along quickly in order to give the Leader of the Opposition an opportunity to speak. Those who now seek for action to be taken say yes, some action should be taken and a bill of rights is necessary. They used to say it was not but now they say it is. They say it should be by a constitutional amendment rather than a statute. They do not seem to recollect that constitutional amendments within the federal jurisdiction are in the same position today as any statute. They can be simply passed by both houses of parliament and automatically become the law. In other words we amend our constitution within the federal responsibility today in the same way we amend any statute.

They say, if you want to make this effective it has to cover the provinces too. Any one advocating that must realize the fact that there is no chance of securing the consent of all the provinces. I am not thinking of any one province in particular; any amendment to the constitution that will interfere with whatever the meaning of civil rights is within the words, "property and civil rights", will not win the consent of all the provinces. This will be a step forward. It will cover those things within the federal jurisdiction alone.

They say it can be repealed at another session. Certainly it can. Habeas corpus is a statute of the United Kingdom which has remained on the statute books now for approximately 160 or 170 years. The bill of rights was a statute enacted in 1691. They have never been changed, because experience has shown that once these declarations are made subsequent governments and parliaments are most careful not to interfere with the rights and liberties embodied in those statutes.

As far as constitutional amendment is concerned, it is impossible of attainment at this time.

Mr. Winch: Why?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Simply because of the fact that the consent of the provinces to any interference with property and civil rights cannot be secured. That is no criticism of any province. The rights under the constitution which pertain to the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures and affect both have been found in the light of experience to be unamendable, as things are and have been.

They say this will be limited only to dominion jurisdiction. I realize that, but in reply I say it will at least represent the essence of the conscience of the people of Canada. It will be applicable to a large field of civil rights; and in the light of the interpretations given by the Supreme Court of Canada particularly since 1943 and 1944, will assure that where there have been invasions within the jurisdiction of the federal authority, these will not happen again.

Critics of this measure say the bill provides no penalties. Naturally there are no penalties provided; but what it says in effect is that any legislation that is passed which derogates from the constitutional freedoms that are mentioned shall be ineffectual. You cannot impose penalties on parliament and say that if parliament passes a statute which contravenes any of these freedoms, therefore the members of parliament will be liable to a penalty. In effect what you do is this. You declare in a united parliament that every statute which has ever been passed by parliament, or that will hereafter be passed shall not contravene or diminish these freedoms.

Some say that the bill does not cover wartime, and it does not. I have not the quotation here, but I call as my witness in that behalf Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who said on one occasion that in the days of war freedom must often be diminished in order to assure the ultimate triumph of freedom.

This bill does except the days of war, but not by order in council. When parliament in its wisdom states that the time has come that our freedoms, or any of them, should be abrogated or suspended in any way in the interests of the preservation of the state, then in that case the action taken will suspend those freedoms during the days of war.

The situation is the same everywhere. In the United Kingdom during the days of war they did so, but not by order in council. They did it in open parliament. Any change that is made at any time in the future which will depart from the maintenance of these freedoms will only take place when the voice of parliament gives its approval to the need of such legislation being passed.

I will postpone other matters I should like to deal with to a later occasion. I wish to say that the bill of rights, as I see it, will deny the right of any government to interfere with my right to speak within the law, my right to be free from the threats of the activities of a police state, whether consciously or unconsciously administered. It will deny anyone the right to prevent me living my own life within the limits of the law without regard to race or colour or creed. It will remove from any government the right to deny me the right to belong to an unpopular minority anywhere in the country. It will deny any government, however powerful in the future, the right to deny recourse to the courts.

Those are some of the benefits that will come from the passage of this legislation. I was glad to note from a speech made by the Leader of the Opposition, as reported in the Toronto Star of November 18, 1958, that the Liberals will offer amendments. All of us hope that when the bill of rights is passed it will represent a forward step. It will not go as far as I would have liked to go. As a matter of fact the art of politics is the capacity to move forward even without covering the complete field at any one time. In this case it cannot be done.

To wait for a constitutional amendment is to wait for years to come, as I see it. However, one or more provinces have passed bills of rights effective within their own limits and jurisdictions. I hope that other provinces will follow suit, and that as a result of the national parliament taking action, other provinces will follow the same course, so that ultimately, everywhere within this country, all our provinces, having determined the fundamental freedoms and rights that are necessary for the maintenance of democracy itself, will join in their own way and in co-operation.

I also want to add that if at any time the provinces are prepared to give their consent to a constitutional amendment embodying a bill of rights comprising these freedoms, there will be immediate co-operation from this government. We will forthwith introduce a constitutional amendment covering not only the federal, but the provincial jurisdictions when and if there is consent by the provinces everywhere in this country.

I hope the house will support this measure. It is introduced on Dominion day. It is one of those steps which represent the achievement and the assurance of that degree of liberty and freedom under law that was envisaged by the fathers of confederation. I think it embodies a pledge for all Canadians, a pledge which I place before you not as something original but changed to meet the fact that I am speaking in the Canadian parliament.

I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, before the Prime Minister sits down I wonder whether I could ask him a question. He has said that a constitutional amendment on the basis of agreement by the provinces is impossible at this time. He also said that if the provinces would agree to such an amendment the federal government would go forward. Did the federal government canvass the provinces with respect to whether or not they would agree to an appropriate constitutional amendment embodying a bill of rights?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, one has only to review the discussion that have taken place at the several dominion-provincial conferences in recent years, and as a matter of fact throughout the years, to give a completely effective answer to that question.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister emphasized in the house this morning and over the air last night that this bill is being introduced in the House of Commons on our national day, Dominion day. I wish I could express in less eloquent language my own feelings in rising to talk about this bill on this day. But, Mr. Speaker, I have been allowed only 16 minutes to make my speech, or that part of it which I can make this morning, so I will have—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to interrupt, but I was told that 20 minutes would be sufficient. However, we will sit until the hon. gentleman has had time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. Hellyer: Curtailing our freedoms already.

Mr. Pearson: It has been agreed that the house should rise at one o'clock, and while I appreciate the Prime Minister's offer in connection with this matter I understand there are other members in this house who are not willing to sit beyond the agreed hour of one o'clock, and quite properly so. In any event, all I wanted to say was that I wish I had time to repeat, as the Prime Minister did, that I, too, am a Canadian. On a day like this I think we are all conscious of the fact that the things which draw us together as Canadians are far more important, far deeper and more enduring than those things which separate us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, obviously I will have to try to deal with some of the points the Prime Minister has made when we continue this debate. I can say at once that while on our side there is no disagreement about the desirability of this parliament doing everything it possibly can to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms, and while there is no difference of opinion in regard to the principle, if you like, and the purposes embodied in this bill, we do quarrel with its terms in that they are not, in our view, adequate to discharge that purpose.

We also will contend, and I will not have time to argue it this morning, that the procedure that has been followed in regard to this bill, introduced as it has been on July 1 in what perhaps, if we are not too optimistic, we may call the dying days of this session, is wrong. This is a bill which should be submitted to a committee where witnesses could be called and where the bill could be given the same kind of consideration which this subject was given in the past when committees were set up, one of which met on 20 occasions.

There is one matter which I want to mention this morning because, while I would have preferred to deal with it later in my speech, it is directed to this point of whether this particular bill is adequate and whether it cannot be improved. It is our desire on this side of the house not only to criticize the terms of this bill but to put forward some constructive proposals which we think will make it more effective. I am referring to the inclusion in the bill of a section which deals with the War Measures Act, and with the danger from this mentioned by the Prime Minister this morning. A very jealous, sensitive and vigorous guardian of liberty and freedom in this country, Professor Lower of Queen's University, whom the Prime Minister quoted, had this to say in connection with this matter not long ago in Ottawa:

> I submit that if we are going to have a bill of rights in Canada, and there will be a great deal of debate about it, we ought to have one that means something. I believe that in normal peacetime our liberties are not in very serious danger. But in wartime they are in very serious danger, the liberties of all of us. Hence it is the duty of the government to find a method of enacting legislation which will give at least minimum guarantees. Suggestions could be made which would modify the War Measures Act. In the meantime, as long as it is on the books—

It has been on the books since 1914.

> —it is the duty of everybody who loves a free society, who loves liberty, to bend his best efforts to attack this act and try to get rid of this invidious liberty-destroying statute, the War Measures Act.

But, Mr. Speaker, an important and, if I might call it that, a negative feature of this bill is the inclusion in it of the War Measures Act. The only change, and I am not going to deprecate its possible importance, makes possible parliamentary debate on the proclamation which brings the War Measures Act into force, and makes possible parliamentary revocation if, after such debate, parliament decides on that course. This may be an improvement, and I think it is. But, on the other hand, does not this bill give to the War Measures Act greater sanctity, greater prestige than is necessary or desirable by its inclusion in a bill of rights, with all the symbolic and constitutional significance that the Prime Minister envisaged this morning? This specific reservation, then, in a bill of rights of a war measures act may have this undesirable effect.

It also emphasizes what the Prime Minister forgets when he tries to support the need for this kind of bill by referring to events of the past such as the spy trials and the expulsion of Japanese Canadians. It underlines that all these things would still be possible if and when this particular bill of rights becomes law in the same way that they were possible before under the War Measures Act. Historically, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a good deal to say for Professor Lower's contention that there has never been any serious abridgement or any attempt to abridge what are generally understood to be human rights and fundamental freedoms by the parliament of Canada in time of peace or non-emergency. There may be, and the Prime Minister has pointed this out, provisions in specific statutes to which exception could be taken; but surely we all know, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed bill would not in any way affect that situation in the future, because if a future parliament wishes to enact legislation which varies the provisions of the bill now before us, parliament continues to be sovereign and the legislation will be valid notwithstanding anything we may do, or attempt to do, by way of this or any other mere act of parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Provided you refer specifically to this.

Mr. Pearson: Provided we refer to what is being done in this bill, and I will come to that later.

The present War Measures Act, which has been on the statute books since 1914, gives to the governor in council, that is the cabinet, in time of war virtually unlimited powers to restrain the freedom of the person of Canadian citizens. It can be argued, and it has been argued, that things have been done under the War Measures Act which interfered with human rights and fundamental freedoms in a way which was really not necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. Canada, like other countries engaged in the last great war—perhaps not the last, though I hope it will be the last—and with the overwhelming approval of parliament, as well, I believe, as of the public, did detain persons, some of them for a long time, without trial. He would be a bold man, bolder than I am, who would argue that war emergencies may not make it necessary in the future for persons to be so detained, not because of any act they have done but because of the danger that they might do certain acts which would endanger the safety of the state; on the principle, I suppose, of salus populi suprema est lex.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, under the War Measures Act it is possible, and it is still possible today, to deprive citizens of their citizenship, to exile citizens from this country. Indeed, certain action was taken with respect to some residents and citizens of Canada of Japanese origin during the last war which I do not believe any Canadian today looks back upon with pride, and which a lot of Canadians look back upon with discomfort and some with shame. But I would remind the house that this action was taken in complete good faith by a government which believed that it was essential at that time for the safety of our country, and in circumstances and in an atmosphere which it is easy to forget now. I would remind the house that some hon. members opposite now on the treasury benches gave strong and even zealous support to the course taken by the government of that day. However, looking back on the matter in retrospect and, of course, with the wisdom of hindsight which always makes judgment so much easier, I wish to say for myself and for those associated with me in this house that we do not believe that certain of those actions were really necessary, or that they should be repeated in any similar situation in the future.

Moreover, in the interval we have adopted our own citizenship legislation in this parliament, and we have now made it impossible for the government in peacetime to deprive of his citizenship any Canadian citizen resident in Canada. That matter has been cleared up. I suggest we should now go further. I suggest that any bill of rights which this house in its wisdom passes should contain a provision limiting the powers given to the governor in council under the War Measures Act by expressly excluding the power by order in council to deprive any Canadian citizen of his citizenship. We also believe that the governor in council should be expressly forbidden to act under the War Measures Act to banish or exile any citizen of our country in any circumstances.

I wish it were possible also, Mr. Speaker, to say that we feel that the governor in council should be expressly forbidden, even in wartime, to detain any citizen or resident of our country without providing for an early trial on charges specifically laid in accordance with the law of the country. I do not feel—nor does the government, I gather from what the Prime Minister has said—that this would be a responsible thing for parliament to do in the present circumstances, and I am not prepared myself to go that far. Nevertheless—and this is the third proposal I should like to make—I feel that there should be a limitation by law on the absolute and arbitrary power of the government to detain persons, even in wartime.

I therefore believe there should be written into this bill some provision which would limit the power of the governor in council, even under the War Measures Act, to detain any person for more than a stated period—say some few weeks—without a hearing before a superior court judge and without having satisfied that judge that there were serious grounds for believing that the detention of that person was essential for the security of the state.

It is our view on this side of the house that if these three proposals were included in the present measure, it would be a much more effective bill than it is at the present time, in view of the fact that it is merely an act of parliament and is not to become in any way part of the constitution. It might transform an act of parliament which in its present form has not the meaning it should have into something which would have more meaning, something which would provide for protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms at the time—and I think in our form of society it is the only time, namely in the time of war emergency—when historically they have been in any kind of jeopardy so far as action by our national parliament or national government is concerned.

I therefore suggest to the Prime Minister and to the government that they might give favourable consideration to these proposals which would transform something which is now, in our view, not likely to be very effective in achieving the purpose which he has in mind, and which we all support, into a meaningful and significant act. There are other proposals or other improvements, or we think they are improvements, which in due course we shall be privileged to put forward.

That brings me to the other complaint I have with regard to this bill, namely the procedure which has been adopted by the government for the consideration or lack of consideration which is possible by parliament. This bill, Mr. Speaker, could have been introduced at any time this session. A committee could have been set up earlier in the session. Witnesses could have been called. The response of the country to the bill when it was introduced two years ago showed the general interest in the matter. We could then have given this particular draft the kind of examination which it should have and which perhaps, in the circumstances which confront us now, it will not be so easy for it to get. The Prime Minister last Tuesday, as reported at page 5465 of Hansard, said:

> —the legislation is being introduced almost as soon as it would have been possible to introduce it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: The first bill dealing with this matter was introduced in this house on September 5, 1958. This house met again in January, 1960. This bill, which is supposed to embody the ideas that have been submitted from throughout the country to the government and which have been found acceptable to the government, is now introduced into this house on July 1, 1960, in the closing days, we hope, or the closing weeks of this session.

That is a major criticism we have. The Prime Minister emphasized the importance of this matter. If this bill has the significance he attaches to it, if it is going to be the Magna Carta of Canada to guard sacred human rights and freedoms, is this the way in which to deal with it in the parliament of Canada?

Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Pearson the debate was adjourned.

At one o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 4, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SPEAKMAN—REFERENCE TO REPORTED REMARKS BY HON. MEMBER FOR ASSINIBOIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. Speakman (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting many of the members of this honourable house. My question of privilege is based on a statement attributed to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) which appears in the Globe and Mail of Friday, July 1, 1960:

Mr. Argue charged that the Conservative M.P.'s have never represented the farmers in parliament.

The hon. member for Assiniboia and the gentlemen from the fourth estate know that members of the government and government backbenchers are honest and hard-working members of parliament fully conscious of their responsibilities to the people they represent and to Canada.

Mr. Winch: The people will be glad to know that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WARHEADS—STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is now in a position to deal with the question which I asked him on Friday about negotiations with the United States regarding the use of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces, and which he said he would be in a position to answer today.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In reply to that question, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. I have reviewed the various answers given and statements made by myself since February 20, 1959. On February 20, 1959, as reported on page 1221 of Hansard, I set forth the views of the Canadian government with respect to this matter, and they remain unchanged. At that time I set forth, as I say, that the full potential of these defensive weapons is achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads, and that of course was referring to Bomarc and other defensive weapons.

I followed that statement by a complete statement on January 18, 1960, in which I used these words, which are to be found on page 73 of Hansard:

In these circumstances negotiations are proceeding with the United States in order that the necessary weapons can be made available for Canadian defence units if and when they are required. I cannot comment in detail on these negotiations but I wish to state that arrangements for the safeguarding and security of all such weapons in Canada will be subject to Canadian approval and consent.

I want to make it abundantly clear that nuclear weapons will not be used by the Canadian forces except as the Canadian government decides and in the manner approved by the Canadian government. Canada retains its full freedom of choice and decision.

Since that time there have been continuing negotiations. By that I mean discussions between the representatives of the two countries. I am in no position to advise that there has been any determination made as a result of these discussions which would permit as yet of any negotiation taking place as between the Department of External Affairs and the department of state of the United States.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question. I wonder if the Prime Minister could say whether the government has given consideration to abandoning these negotiations and adopting a policy of opposition to nuclear weapons on Canadian soil?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in so far as general policy is concerned we are always in this position. On the one hand we are desirous of attaining disarmament; on the other hand we have to discharge our responsibility of ensuring to the maximum degree the security of the Canadian people. So far as that is concerned, discussions are taking place with respect to the Goose Bay and Harmon air bases, where an endeavour is being made to arrive at a formula which will ensure that Canadians in those bases shall exercise joint control. In other words, so far as these two United States leased bases are concerned, negotiations are continuing with respect thereto.

Beyond that I simply point out that as the hon. gentleman fully realizes, this is a subject which has exercised the minds of people everywhere in the world. Only the other day in the United Kingdom the leader of the Labour party, Right Hon. Hugh Gaitskell, if I might summarize what he stated, accepted the need of nuclear defence and also the fact that the onus for nuclear defence must rest upon the United States.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister a question based on his reply and based also on the statement made by the Minister of National Defence to the effect that at the present time negotiations are proceeding with the United States in connection with the storage by Canadian forces of atomic weapons in Canada for use either by United States or Canadian forces. My question is, in this connection is the Department of External Affairs participating in any way and, if not, what department is conducting these negotiations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The use of the word "negotiations" is, of course, a material part of the question as framed by the hon. gentleman. What is taking place is that discussions are continuing between the Department of National Defence and the United States authorities in regard to this matter. When any basic agreement is arrived at in respect of these discussions then, of course, the Department of External Affairs will enter the picture and make the necessary negotiations to the end that notes may be exchanged.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the statement by the Prime Minister that the Department of External Affairs is not actually a party to the negotiations in the sense that the right hon. gentleman has now paraphrased those arrangements, is it not a fact, however, that there is a representative of the Department of External Affairs who has taken part in some of the discussions between the two defence departments?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There will always be representatives of the various departments concerned, but the specific question asked was on the subject of negotiations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the Prime Minister for that answer. May I ask him which minister is in charge of these negotiations. Is it the Minister of National Defence or the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the discussions are concerned the responsibility must necessarily be that of the Minister of National Defence, whose officers meet with their corresponding numbers in the United States and place before them the stand taken by the Canadian government, which is of the essence of any possible agreement in the future, namely that if and when the Canadian government should decide to equip its forces with nuclear weapons, those weapons would be under Canadian control and would be used in Canada only as the result of a decision by the Canadian government.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the house whether Canada has yet concluded the agreement with the United States with respect to the control and use of atomic weapons?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that subject has already been fairly well dealt with this morning. The negotiations with the United States concerning the United States leased bases have not yet been completed.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of National Defence has reported to the cabinet in respect of these negotiations, and whether any decision has been taken?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have already made it perfectly clear that no decision has been arrived at. This is a subject that requires continuing consideration having regard to all the circumstances, on the one hand the need of assuring security and on the other the maintenance of that spirit toward disarmament which has characterized this government. When a decision is made, as I have said on more than one occasion, it will be brought to the attention of the house immediately.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED OPENING OF PRIVATE MAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to ask a question of the Postmaster General, a question which is most appropriate on the day when we continue our debate concerning human rights and freedoms.

Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a news item in this morning's Globe and Mail entitled "Opening of Mail by Post Offices Under Fire", wherein the Sarnia chamber of commerce expresses deep concern that in recent months several thousand letters mailed by and to Canadians have been intercepted and opened by the Canada post office?

Would the minister inform the house whether this report is correct and, if so, would he tell us the reason for opening this mail?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): My attention has not been drawn to this item, and I doubt whether the house would allow me to confirm or deny newspaper reports in any case. However, letters passing through the Canadian post office are not intercepted and opened unless the address discloses that they are connected with something that is illegal. Second, even in these circumstances they are only opened where there is no address on the outside of the envelope which would permit such letters to be returned to the senders.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—STATEMENT ON CONFISCATION OF SUBSIDIARY OF CANADIAN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question which I asked on Friday in connection with the confiscation of certain Canadian property in Cuba. Can the minister say whether Canada has made any protest against this action? I note by the morning press that the confiscation is now complete.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no protest made. It so happens that the real ownership of this refinery is in the United Kingdom and the Netherlands.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, the information I have is that the particular company referred to in the Friday morning press is a Canadian company with a subsidiary in Cuba.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, evidently this is a holding company registered in Canada which is owned in the United Kingdom and the Netherlands. The hon. member will realize that the Shell interests are essentially British and Dutch.

Mr. Chevrier: If it is incorporated in Canada, it is a Canadian corporation.

DISAPPEARANCE OF U.S. PLANE—PASSAGE OVER CANADIAN TERRITORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the reported disappearance of a United States reconnaissance plane close to the northern coast of the U.S.S.R., can the minister inform the house whether this plane took off from an airfield in Canada or passed over Canadian territory at any point in its mission? If the answer is in the affirmative, why?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of this question just as I was coming into the chamber.

Mr. Herridge: I apologize.

Mr. Green: This plane was lost a great many thousands of miles from Canada, and I am afraid I shall have to make inquiries.

DISARMAMENT—REFERENCE TO REPORTED STATEMENT BY U.N. SECRETARY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that Canada previously indicated its support of the view that disarmament discussions should be referred to the disarmament commission of the United Nations, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether in the light of the statement made by the secretary general of the United Nations with regard to this matter, the government wishes to modify its position.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, as he so often does, has based his question on statements which he may think are facts but which in reality are far removed from the actual facts. In answering the question today I am not admitting that his premises are correct. The Canadian government has taken the stand throughout that the United Nations must be kept connected just as closely as possible with the disarmament negotiations. As the hon. member knows, there was a representative of the United Nations in Geneva during those discussions. Now that the negotiations have been broken up in such an irresponsible manner by the five eastern nations represented on the 10-member committee, it obviously becomes necessary that a report be made to the United Nations disarmament commission which, of course, is made up of all the nations who are members of the United Nations. We hope that such a report will be made at as early a date as possible.

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR INCREASED FIRE BOAT PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the extensive waterfront fire in Vancouver last evening, would the minister expedite his department's decision as to what help Vancouver might expect in the way of increased fire boat protection?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are always very agreeable to carry on discussions with the municipal authorities in Vancouver about this or any other matter they might wish to discuss with us.

FINANCE

REPORTED LOSS THROUGH OPERATIONS OF EXCHANGE STABILIZATION FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister care to comment on an article in Saturday's Globe and Mail to the effect that Canada recently lost $101 million through the operations of the exchange stabilization fund, in keeping the Canadian dollar above par with the U.S. dollar?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I saw that article. It is an article that purports simply to be a paraphrase or to give the substance of an article appearing in a foreign periodical. Of the foreign periodical I have only this to say, and it applies to this article on their part as well as to others they have published. I do not know how a publication could go on publishing articles about Canada which are based on such total ignorance of Canada and Canada's policies. I would think it has got almost past the point now where that publication could offer ignorance as an excuse for writing the type of misleading propaganda of which they have been guilty.

As to this latest misleading statement on their part I have only this to say. The operations with respect to the foreign exchange control fund which have been carried on recently were completely in accord with the method of operation carried on by the Bank of Canada on behalf of the Minister of Finance ever since this government came into office, and prior to that time by the former government. There was no change in policy or in the basis of operation. These were simply normal operations carried out with a view to reducing the fluctuation in the exchange rate from day to day.

DOMINION DAY

INQUIRY AS TO TAKING OF SALUTE BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. Will the Secretary of State explain to the house the protocol followed on Dominion day, or can he give us any reason which required the Prime Minister to take the salute in preference to the representative of Her Majesty the Queen of Canada?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Secretary of State): I am no expert on protocol, but I will make the proper inquiry from the office. Offhand, as far as the circumstances are concerned, I would say that since the Governor General was away from the capital it was proper for the Prime Minister to take the salute.

Mr. Caron: I have a supplementary question. Knowing that the Governor General was in Ottawa that day I would ask the Secretary of State whether it is the intention to make Dominion day Diefenbaker day?

Mr. Grafftey: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Cheap.

Mr. Martineau: You are as small as you look.

INCOME TAX

DEDUCTIBILITY OF EXPENSES OF WIFE OF CONVENTION DELEGATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can he explain why the expenses of the wife of a delegate to a convention are not deductible at present for income tax purposes? Will the minister consider making such expenses deductible—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has misconceived the time that would be appropriate to deal with this matter.

ATOMIC ENERGY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROGRESS TOWARD INTERNATIONAL CONTROL FOR PEACEFUL USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, arising out of the widespread support, common to all Canadians, of any measures that can be adopted to provide international control of the peaceful use of atomic energy. Can the minister report on the progress that is being made in discussions with international atomic energy agencies to establish the first international safeguards on the peaceful use of nuclear energy? Can he say what position will be taken at the coming conference at the end of September?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the best place to discuss this question would be when my estimates are under review. I shall be very glad to try to get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister not take this as notice and make a reply tomorrow? I do not know how soon his estimates may be before the house, but this matter is of current interest.

Mr. Green: I hope the estimates will be up this week.

TRANSPORT

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—COMMISSION REPORT ON PROPOSED RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a report from the commission which was set up 13 months ago to study and report on a favourable route for the railway to Great Slave lake? If not, can he tell us whether the commission or the government is stalling on the report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report in question is now available for distribution, and I hope that copies will be tabled in the house in a day or so.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

LEGISLATION

The Speaker of the Senate—

175. Allowance in lieu of residence, $3,000.

PRIVY COUNCIL

308. Payment, notwithstanding anything in the Financial Administration Act or the Senate and House of Commons Act respecting the independence of parliament, to each member of the Queen's privy council for Canada who is a minister for whom no salary or allowance in addition to the allowances under section 33 and section 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act is provided (the acceptance of which shall not render such member ineligible or disqualify him as a member of the House of Commons) of a salary of $7,500 per annum and pro rata for any period less than a year, $7,500.

SECRETARY OF STATE

383. Departmental administration, $311,264.

Proceedings reported.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RECOGNITION AND PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

The house resumed, from Friday, July 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for second reading of Bill No. C-79, to provide for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the comparatively few minutes I had on Friday to deal with this very important matter I made clear, I hope, that we on this side approve the principle of this bill and will support its second reading so it can be sent to a committee, where we hope changes can be made in it which will make it a more adequate bill to accomplish the purposes that we all have in mind.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I have already made three suggestions concerning the improvement of this bill by amending the War Measures Act, which will give greater protection to Canadian citizens where perhaps they need more protection than in non-emergency circumstances.

We feel that the importance of this bill to accomplish the purposes we all have in mind, in its present form at least, has been very greatly exaggerated by the Prime Minister and that exaggeration of its significance can only mislead and raise perhaps unrealistic hopes, indeed leading to later disillusionment. The test of the government's objectivity in this matter, of its real appreciation of the importance and, indeed, of the complexity of the subject, will be in examining the procedure followed concerning it and judging this against the procedures promised and the assurances given and the performance so far.

Let us look at the record in this regard, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister mentioned the desirability of a bill of rights and his decision to introduce such a bill into the House of Commons during the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958. In accordance with those election statements he did, indeed, introduce such a bill on September 5, 1958, some 19 or 20 months ago. This bill was limited in scope and, in its effect, declaratory only.

It should be made clear that that bill, and indeed the bill before the house today, bear no relationship whatever, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister now says, to the impressive and indeed eloquent proposals which he used to make and which he has brought to our attention already in the discussion of this bill, proposals which he used to make when he was in opposition about an effective and comprehensive measure to protect our rights and freedoms. In those days he thought such a measure should be binding on all Canadian legislatures, thus protecting all Canadians against all acts of all governments which violated those rights. Indeed, in those days the Prime Minister used to get quite impatient with those who pointed out the constitutional difficulties in this field because of the division of authority and jurisdiction as between federal and provincial legislatures, each of which, of course, is sovereign in its own field.

I had something to say in the house on September 5, 1958 on the first reading of the other bill, and I ventured to quote some of the statements made by the Prime Minister in 1947 concerning what should be done in connection with the protection of rights and freedoms through parliamentary action. In those days, and subsequently, the Prime Minister proposed that representatives of the provinces should be called in so that the final result would be, he hoped, a joint federal-provincial bill of rights for Canada.

On May 16, 1947 in this house he said that human freedoms were not circumscribed by territorial considerations and he advocated, in addition to a comprehensive bill of rights, the repeal of the War Measures Act and a revision of the Official Secrets Act which presumes guilt unless an individual can prove innocence. He could not do those things earlier because, as he explained to the house on September 5, 1958 he was on the opposition side with a small membership. At this time, as he put it and it was certainly true, he said he was on the government side with no small membership. There is, therefore, no obstacle of that kind now in the way of a more comprehensive bill than the one we had before us, a more comprehensive approach to parliamentary protection in this field.

Furthermore, the Prime Minister once argued that if there were doubts about federal jurisdiction and what could be covered by a bill or an amendment to the constitution, if that procedure were to be followed, then let the supreme court give an opinion. On March 14, 1958, during the election campaign of that year, he was quoted as saying as follows, and I quote from the press report of his speech:

> The Supreme Court of Canada would be asked to rule whether Ottawa has the power under the constitution to bring in such a measure. We want such a ruling so that we will encounter no constitutional obstacle when we bring such a bill before parliament.

Again on March 18, four days later, in Vancouver he was quoted as saying:

> The Prime Minister explained that the bill of rights would be submitted first to the supreme court in the form of a reference.

[Mr. Pearson.]

We know that this was not done. Indeed, we have before us in this bill no proposal of any kind for a constitutional amendment even in respect of matters under federal jurisdiction alone. What we have is a normal piece of legislation to be passed in the ordinary way with ordinary effect and which, of course, could be abrogated or changed by any future parliament in the ordinary way. Without recourse to any of the procedures that were promised some time ago, this limited and purely declaratory bill was introduced. I am now talking about the first introduction in 1958. The Prime Minister asked for its careful examination by all who were interested, and indicated that suggestions would be welcomed. In his statement at that time in 1958, as reported at page 4644 of Hansard, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> I can only hope that Canadians as a whole will give to parliament the benefit of their suggestions and ideas in the next few months so we shall be able to make such amendments in the bill to be presented to the next parliament—

That was the parliament of 1959.

> —as will still the heart stirrings of those who fear for freedom in our country—

Then he concluded his speech on this occasion by saying:

> I hope we will be enabled next session—

That is the session of 1959.

> —to discuss this question again fully and completely, and that out of the counsel of parliament and the representations of our fellow Canadians, whatever changes should be made in this bill of rights can be made in the bill then to be presented,—

At that time, Mr. Speaker, when I ventured to speak—and by agreement there were only three speeches, one by the leader of each party—I had these suggestions to make. As reported at page 4652 of Hansard of 1958—and I mention this so that we can see whether any of these suggestions have been carried out—I said this:

> ...I have only three suggestions to make, one of which was put forward this morning by the Prime Minister on behalf of the government; first, that there should be the widest possible circulation of the bill to organizations which have shown an interest in this question and to individuals such as deans of law schools with requests for their views and comments—

I do not know whether that has been done, although I know that in the intervening period the government has received suggestions and comments. Then I continued:

> —second, that there should be set up next session—

That is last session.

> —to consider this bill a joint committee of both houses with broad powers, including the power to summon witnesses; third, and this is something even more important that might be done, that we should try to secure the support and co-operation of the provinces for any Canadian action in this field. Indeed, as a result of consultation with the provinces it might be possible to widen the action so as to include both the federal government and provincial governments in a joint declaration on individual rights and freedoms. Then indeed we would have a powerful symbol.

We know now, Mr. Speaker, what has happened or rather what has not happened. The provinces have not been approached and were not consulted. Nothing was done in the last session of parliament. Then there was the Prime Minister's promise made to the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association in Vancouver last September. In a statement at page 94 in the printed record of that convention the Prime Minister said this, and I would point out that we are now into September of 1959:

From the chairman's agenda I note that one subject for discussion this morning is the bill of rights. It is my intention to have the measure to provide for a bill of rights introduced early in the next session of parliament——and to have it submitted to a committee of both houses of parliament.

That is the present session of parliament, nothing having been done in 1959. The Prime Minister continued:

He also had this to say:

No one occupying the position that I do can overstate the benefits that come when the people of the nation give me and those associated with me, and through them to parliament, the benefit of their counsel and advice. Parliament will welcome any suggestions from the Canadian Bar Association in connection with the prospective legislation on the bill of rights. Indeed, the more attention given to an analysis of the bill of rights, the more beneficial will be the net result when the legislation is brought before parliament.

At this convention a resolution was passed on a report by the civil liberties section submitted to the bar convention. It indicated that in view of the assurance of the Prime Minister that this bill would be submitted to a joint committee, perhaps the kind of analysis which they were about to make might be superseded because of the possibility of their appearance before this joint committee. In the report to the conference—and I quote from page 192—the chairman of the civil liberties section, Mr. David W. Mundell, had this to say on behalf of his committee:

As explained to the attending members—

That is the members of the civil liberties section.

—at the beginning of the first session, Mr. Diefenbaker's bill is no longer a practical proposal since it will go before a joint committee of the house and Senate where it will obviously be changed from the ground up.

Therefore in the resolution of the civil liberties section, which was adopted, this committee came to this conclusion in that resolution:

Be it resolved, therefore, that this section on civil liberties recommends to the council and executive that appropriate steps be taken to ensure that the views of the association be presented to the joint committee as the opportunity may arise.

It would be interesting to find out whether any such opportunity is now about to arise in view of the fact that we have reached July and that it is not now possible, I understand—and the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong—to set up a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. Certainly no such joint committee as promised was set up previously in this session, although that procedure would have been possible. The Prime Minister decided not to follow that course but to postpone the introduction of this bill until July 1, 1960, Dominion day, when it could be brought in in the morning prior to the trooping of the colours in the afternoon.

As I have said, this bill has already been examined very carefully outside parliament during these intervening months. In that examination I think it is correct to say that the purposes of the bill have been universally applauded; but the reception given to the text of the bill which was introduced in September, and which is substantially the same as the bill we are considering today except for some changes, some of which are I think helpful and some perhaps can be considered retrogressive, was cool and in large part critical. Many suggestions have been made for improvement, particularly by the bar association, whose views were embodied in the March, 1959 edition of the Canadian Bar Review which devoted itself entirely to this bill, and which views certainly bear very careful examination by anyone who is interested in an objective analysis of the purposes and provisions of the bill.

In addition, a very impressive submission was made to the government on April 29, 1959 by 30 reputable and important Canadian associations, and that submission should be also carefully examined. Yet you will find very little of it in the amended bill. Indeed this is very surprising in view of what the Prime Minister said in his broadcast the other night, that this present bill contains some additions which have resulted from the views expressed in order to strengthen the guarantee of individual rights and freedom.

Anyone who studies the views expressed by the experts and the organizations will not be impressed by the changes made in this bill in order to meet those views. That is all the more surprising when we consider that such a measure as this needs the widest possible basis of public support in order that it might achieve its maximum usefulness and value. It is no great inducement for individuals and organizations to come before a committee of this house, which presumably is about to be set up, and repeat their views when their suggestions have been so completely ignored by this government.

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is the question of consultation with the provinces. So far as we can ascertain, and we have tried to find out, there has been a complete failure to consult with the provinces and to explore the possibility of a jointly agreed declaration which might be inserted in the constitution. As I have just indicated, I urged the government in September of 1958 to conduct such consultations, and numerous groups and organizations and individuals have also urged that this course be followed. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it cannot be denied that this would be the best course to follow.

The Prime Minister as recently as last Friday, repeating what he had said previously, threw up smokescreen of the impossibility of infringing upon provincial jurisdiction in this field. No one is suggesting that there should be any infringement upon provincial jurisdiction in any field. Such a binding and collective declaration would not involve any transfer of jurisdiction from one sphere of government to the other. It would mean that individual rights and freedoms would be as fully protected as they can be in this country by legislative action once the government has decided to proceed by way of such legislative action. Federal action alone will not cover the most important sector of human rights and fundamental freedoms under our constitution.

The Prime Minister also attempts to justify his failure—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman tell me what particular constitutional freedoms come under provincial jurisdiction? The hon. member made the statement that it would not cover that question.

Mr. Pearson: I made the statement that the whole field of rights and liberties falls under two jurisdictions, the provincial and the federal. Surely the Prime Minister, who is a lawyer—I am not—must know that the provinces are very jealous of the authority given to them by the constitution in this field; and if that is true, then federal action alone will not cover all the matters which come under human rights and fundamental freedoms. It does not cover legal rights or all the constitutional rights, and it certainly does not cover economic rights.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is a very unimpressive attempt to justify the failure to make any efforts of any kind to consult the provinces to say that such consultations would not be successful, that the record of the past shows that, and that they would postpone indefinitely any action on this front. That is surely a poor excuse for not making at least an attempt.

Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan, as we know, already has a bill of rights. The new Quebec premier, Mr. Lesage, had already stated more than once during the election campaign that he intended to present such legislation for the province of Quebec. No opposition has been expressed from any other province against such consultation and against at least the possibility of united action in this field. There is going to be a federal-provincial meeting at the end of this month in Ottawa; so why was it not possible, once it was decided to postpone this matter until July, to put this whole question on the agenda of that meeting for at least preliminary discussion? If no progress were made then it would be possible for the government to proceed with its own bill at the next session.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the government has ignored all these suggestions and has done nothing until July 1, 1960. The government even refuses to put in the constitution provisions—and they are in this bill—covering federal matters only, matters over which it is claiming full authority in this field. The excuse given by the Prime Minister, or the reason if you like, was that it would be no more difficult to change a constitutional provision of this kind than to change ordinary legislation.

That is true; technically it is correct. But what an argument to be used, Mr. Speaker, by one who admits that the main value of this bill is its moral and symbolic value; that its main importance is the deterrent and warning effect it would have on future parliaments which might be tempted to pass laws which would affect the rights mentioned in this bill. If that is its main value, surely that value would be greatly increased by putting these federal provisions in our constitution and giving them the prestige, the sanctity and the significance which would go with inclusion in the constitution. The government, however, will have none of this. The Prime Minister prefers to introduce an ordinary legislative measure—that is, ordinary in its procedural and constitutional significance—at the close, or what we still hope to be the close, of this session.

From this, Mr. Speaker, you can assess the purposes of those sponsoring this bill as a great national, non-partisan move in the field of human rights by the flat refusal of the government to adopt any other procedure; by the flat refusal of the government to adopt any other procedure even though that would have been better in every way, except perhaps from the viewpoint of a government determined to push this measure through in the dying days of a long and exhausting session. I ask, therefore, is this carrying out the assurance given in this parliament on September 5, 1958 which I have just read? Is this discharging the Prime Minister's commitment to the Canadian Bar Association to set up a joint committee of both houses, which I have also read?

Let us look for a moment at the bill itself and since this is second reading, the principles embodied in it. As I have said, there is no difference of opinion in the house about the importance of protecting and promoting human rights and fundamental freedoms. We all of us know that the price of freedom is eternal vigilance. We know also that it is the responsibility of freedom to provide among other things security for its citizens, including basic economic and social security, which cannot be said to exist in any country in which large numbers of its citizens cannot find work, as is the case in this country in July, 1960. Freedom from want and from the demoralization and deprivations of unemployment is an important part of the whole concept of freedom in our modern age, but there has been no mention of this by any spokesman for the government so far.

Furthermore, freedoms are not guaranteed by words, even words in a constitution, let alone by words in an ordinary, normal act of parliament. Earlier as well as contemporary history is littered with the wreckage of high-sounding declarations and bills of rights which were to guarantee so very much and last forever. But as Professor McWinney of the Toronto law faculty, writing in the Canadian Bar Review from which I have already read, reminded us, "Words alone are frail packages for human hopes".

Incorruptible and respected courts enforcing laws made by free men in parliament assembled and dealing with specific matters, with specific sanctions to enforce their observance; these are the best guarantee of our rights and liberties. This is the tried and tested British way, and this is a better course to follow than the mere pious affirmation of general principles, to which some political societies are addicted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does he regard the international declaration of human rights, which is in no way enforceable, as one of those wrecks?

Mr. Pearson: No, I do not. The international declaration on human rights adopted by the United Nations is a great landmark in international progress in this field, and can be used as a means of advancement by those countries which do not yet possess human rights. But all those rights are, I think, already realized to as great an extent in this country as in any country in the world. What I refer to as the wreckage of high-sounding declarations are the declarations made by some countries in this world at the present time, and in the nineteenth century, about the inviolability of human rights and freedom, and then the refusal to implement any of those declarations by legislative or policy action.

Surely the Prime Minister, as a student of history, must know that there have been these wreckages throughout history. Indeed, I have myself heard people talking about freedom and human rights in the United Nations and attacking a country such as France, which has been in the forefront of progress in this direction, because it has not gone as far as it should, according to those delegations; and those delegations came from countries at least one of which recognized legal slavery but which had subscribed formally to the international document on human rights. That is what I mean by the wreckage of high-sounding declarations.

Anyway, the problem is not whether we should protect our rights, but how to do it most effectively. This bill, it cannot be denied, cuts across our traditional practices. That does not necessarily make it wrong, because conditions change and circumstances alter; but it does underline the necessity of giving this measure the most careful scrutiny inasmuch as it is such a departure. We all recognize that the preservation of our rights and freedoms, as the very foundation of our culture and our civilization, depends primarily on our community itself, on its manners and morals, on its constant willingness to fight against prejudices and discrimination and arbitrary power. While this is true—and the experience of many other countries shows that a written law alone cannot adequately protect human rights—we agree that such protection may, in present circumstances, require from time to time new legislative and judicial safeguards.

There is, however, a wide range of opinion as to what those legislative safeguards should be. There are those who believe that existing provisions are adequate and that a bill of rights would not only be useless but might conceivably be dangerous. Professor Scott, who is an authority in this field, whether or not we agree with all his views—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A great authority.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, he has devoted many years of study to these questions—Professor Scott sums up that view, without agreeing with it, when he says in his "Civil Liberties and Canadian Federalism", at page 13:

> With Magna Carta in the background and Dicey's rule of law in the foreground, we have not seemed to need any further safeguard for civil liberties. And in truth, when we look at other constitutions with bills of rights in their written texts, not excepting the American constitution, and compare the rights of citizens under them with what has commonly prevailed in Canada, we have not felt that we were under any particular disadvantage.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that his view?

Mr. Pearson: I said that is one view, and it is a very good summary of the viewpoint of those people who accept it. Professor Scott has other views and he would go much further, as I shall point out later, than is gone in this bill. That is one extreme, the view of people who do not think we should proceed with this project at all but should stick to the tried and trusted procedures and not worry about bills of rights. At the other extreme are those people who are so anxious to have a bill of rights that they are ready to accept and support any bill on the ground that a bad bill is better than no bill; that a piece of bread is better than no loaf.

We on this side do not support either of these extreme positions. If we are to have a bill of rights not only to protect our own freedom but to serve as an inspiring symbol of the values we need to protect, it must be a good and effective bill for that purpose. We do not think that just any bill, irrespective of its limitations and inadequacy, will necessarily serve a useful purpose. The Prime Minister described his own bill in September, 1958 as a first step, and he confirmed that description on Friday, advancing the view that a first step, however small and timid, was better than nothing. Professor Scott, in the lectures from which I have already quoted, warned us against the danger of such a view when he said:

> It seems to be assumed that a first step is always a good thing. Presumably a first step is a good thing if it is taking us closer to a desired goal and will be followed by a second step. But if the taking of the first step confuses the issue and discourages people from any further effort then it may not be a good thing. I am frankly afraid that this is the position we may be facing.

It will be our purpose on this side to support the motion to send this bill to a committee even at this late date, and do what we can in that committee to make this bill a more adequate and suitable one than it is now for the purposes for which it is intended. Certainly its present inadequacy has been exposed by many who have examined and commented upon it.

Perhaps particular attention—and I referred to this earlier—should be given to the criticisms contained in the special number of the Canadian Bar Review of March, 1959, criticisms which apply to this present bill as much as to the earlier version. If you read the articles in this review and other articles written by men quite as sensitive as any hon. member of this house to the need to protect our rights and liberties, the Prime Minister's claims for this bill become extravagant and excessive.

Let us look at what some of these objective, non-partisan commentators have to say about some of the principles and provisions of the bill. Let us take only one paragraph from the article in this review by Professor Bora Laskin, of the University of Toronto, an authority in this field. I am sure it will not be suggested that Professor Laskin has any political axe to grind in making this comment:

> Committed though I am to the thesis which is implicit in Bill No. C-60, the document is disappointing in its approach, unnecessarily limited in its application and ineffective in its substance. It is disappointing in its approach because it does not provide a constitutionally-protected charter of liberties. It is merely a timid and tepid affirmation of a political and social tradition which, for all practical purposes, carries us no farther than the prevailing tradition in unitary Great Britain. It is unnecessarily limited in its application because (1) it takes an extremely narrow view of the constitutional values that are involved in the promulgation of a bill of rights and (2) it confines such force as it has to the federal or central level of government, leaving the provinces unaffected by its provisions. It is ineffective in its substance because, taken on its own terms, its grandiloquence of expression is set in so narrow an operating framework as to rob the expression of any substantial value in concrete cases.

I could quote at length from articles in this publication by authorities taking that same stand. Indeed, I think there is only one article in this whole review that supports the bill in the form in which it was presented to them and to us, a form which is substantially the same as that which we have now before us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman allow a question? In view of his reference to this statement that the provinces would be left unaffected by the bill of rights in its present form, will the hon. gentleman tell the house why it was that during the long period in which he was secretary of state for external affairs he did not bring before the house for approval by Canada the United Nations declaration of human rights?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the question the Prime Minister asks me is why did I not bring before the House of Commons the United Nations declaration of human rights when I was a member of the cabinet. That declaration, it is known, caused some hesitation on the part of the government of that day because it included matters which were within provincial jurisdiction. This hesitation made it impossible for us to have accepted an international bill of rights without provincial approval; but it did not prevent the government of Canada at that time accepting the United Nations declaration of human rights.

That was done; that was accepted by the Canadian representatives. It was possible for any hon. member of the house, and particularly for hon. members of the opposition, to have put on the order paper at any time during those years a private member's motion to have this matter discussed. The government did not initiate any such discussion true, but the present Prime Minister and other hon. members of the opposition of that day did not take the action open to them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked the government about it regularly, did I not?

Mr. Pearson: I know that the Prime Minister asked for discussion of this matter inside and outside the house, but were steps taken by the opposition to bring about a discussion? It could have been done if there existed at that time the kind of anxiety to have it done that is being expressed now.

Mr. Grafftey: Have you contacted the provinces?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, indeed we have. My complaint is that this government is not making any effort to contact the provinces. The government has had two and one half years at least in which to get in touch with the provinces on this matter and so far as we know—and the Prime Minister can deny it if it is not correct—there has been no step taken in that direction.

Mr. Grafftey: That has nothing to do with the question I asked.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister said that the really significant importance of this bill is the warning that is contained in it to future parliaments not to pass legislation infringing the freedoms and rights which are declared to exist in this bill. The hon. gentleman knows, of course, as we all know, that it cannot bind any future parliament. It is an ordinary piece of legislation in that sense. When I use the word "ordinary" I refer only to the technical use of the word. But while he says it cannot bind future parliaments, it will make it much more difficult for future parliaments to infringe the provisions of this bill if they feel inclined to do so.

If parliament in this country does in fact need this kind of warning we are in a bad way. Surely the fact is that no Canadian parliament would ever lightly take action of the kind we are now being warned against except perhaps in time of apprehended war or emergency under the War Measures Act, which the Prime Minister and the government are not intending to change along the lines we advocated on Friday but are suggesting that the only change to be made is to have the proclamation bringing it into effect discussable in parliament.

Surely it is obvious that a warning of the kind embodied in this particular bill can be only as effective as the self-restraint, self-control and self-imposed discipline of the representatives of the people make it. In our parliamentary system it is this on which we must rely. As Professor McWhinney states in the Canadian Bar Review article of March, 1959:

> If the new Canadian bill of rights happens to correspond to deeply felt popular sentiments, no legislative majorities in the future are likely to interfere with it.
> If it does not so correspond—then no bill now will be an adequate protection against legislative action.

In short, I doubt whether the wrong kind of parliament would be more hesitant to pass the wrong kind of legislation merely because this proposed bill of rights had become law, especially as it would be ordinary law and not embodied in our constitution. Why should a future parliament be more impressed by and respectful of this bill than it would be of historic charters of our liberties such as the Magna Carta, the petition of right of 1627, the habeas corpus act of 1640 and the bill of rights of 1689, all of which are now part of the fundamental law and heritage of Canada?

It can be argued that a reaffirmation in law of these fundamental principles will do no harm and will, in fact, do some good. Perhaps it will; yet it must be emphasized again that it fill not bind any future parliament, even though it is designed to limit and check wrong tendencies in future parliaments. It must be re-emphasized that if it is to have that deterrent effect the language of the bill must be impressive, effective and beyond doubt or uncertainty.

A distinguished lawyer in this country, Mr. Carter, writing in the Canadian Bar Review, of March, 1959 at page 261, on this idea that parliament must be warned in a bill of this kind, had this to say:

> How much better it would be to trust parliament and the courts as they have been trusted in the past to modify the law relating to such private rights as circumstances and public opinion require, and not put this part of the law in a strait jacket of the model of 1959. It will be a sorry day for Canada when parliament is so distrustful of itself and its successors that it surrenders its power to change the law. Of course, the idea is absurd. If parliament in the future should decide that the law should be changed, it would simply preface its enactment by the formula

"Notwithstanding anything contained in the bill of rights". The prohibition in the bill against abrogation, abridgement and infringement of rights, in other words, is idle and to the layman misleading.

Well, Mr. Speaker, legal arguments aside —and I know there can be legal arguments for and against the value of this bill—this bill, we have been told by the Prime Minister, transcends these legal considerations. It is to serve as a beacon; a red light against parliamentary carelessness or arbitrary conduct; a symbol; a great charter of liberty, or at the very least the first chapter in a charter of liberty. But if it is to be the document that we have been told by the Prime Minister it is meant to be, it should not only be broad and deep in its meaning but should be inspiring in its language; something that will stir the pulse, stimulate our national patriotism, something that could be read and be remembered by school children on July 1—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the bill of rights of the United States, or of India, do that?

Mr. Pearson: —as one of the charters of our growing nation; something reaffirming our dedication to freedom and to great ideals; something, in short, like the declaration of the United Nations on human rights and fundamental freedoms in the international sphere, in the kind of language that should be accepted by the Canadian government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not by parliament, because you would not bring it before parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Parliament could not deal with it.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister must know that this is an international declaration, not a law, not a convention, not anything that could be ratified by parliament. The Prime Minister must know, because at any time he wished during the years he has been in opposition he could have put a resolution on the order paper affirming our acceptance of and our dedication to the ideals in this declaration. He could have done so.

This value of the bill of rights, this symbolic, inspiring value, was, among other things, exactly what the 30 national groups and associations representing a large cross-section of the people of Canada asked for when they saw the Prime Minister, I think it was in April, 1959. In their submission, which I have before me and which I wish I had time to put on the record, they did include this paragraph:

> This act we feel should contain an inspiring statement of the basic rights and liberties which are part of our inheritance and to which every person in Canada is entitled. It should, we believe, be expressed in clear, beautiful and moving language. Language that will be understood and will make a lasting impression on our children in the schools, on new immigrants who come to Canada; on all Canadians when they hear it at meetings, in court, at worship, over the radio, or on television, or read it in the press or in books.

Does this bill do that? Read its ambiguous and uninspiring language. Is it the kind of urgent, moving appeal that will be listened to by school children, or even by adults? Read it. Is it a standard that can be raised high to which men and women of this country could repair when their liberties were threatened? Read it. Does it include any of the ideals, inspiration and noble words that might be used to make a declaration which, even without any binding legal effect, would nevertheless be a landmark in our history? Does it include any of the ideas, the proposals, the words submitted to the government in the last two years, by organizations and citizens, some of which I have just quoted? Yet the Prime Minister tells us that this dry, legal document which begins, "This part may be cited as the Canadian bill of rights" without any preamble; this legal document with these dry, unexciting words, is to be the Canadian Magna Charta.

If the Prime Minister feels that way why did he not put in the preamble something worthy of the high place he gives this bill, as is done in the submission I have just mentioned? In committee we shall try to repair some of these omissions and inadequacies. Detailed criticism of the omissions and inadequacies of this bill will be given by other members on this side; and particularly, as I think will be appropriate, when the committee is set up we certainly hope to examine very, very carefully clause 2 of the bill.

The Prime Minister makes high claims for the significance of this clause. Professor Laskin, however, in his article has this to say:

> Nothing except repetition is gained by setting out in the proposed bill what may be termed common law postulates of our criminal law. The postulates would not survive a deviating amendment of the code.

This clause merely declares; it does not guarantee. It creates no new offence, it imposes no penalty, no sanctions of any kind for a breach of any of its declarations. Any individual who claims his freedoms or rights have been interfered with by anyone else will be in the same position as if this bill never became law, notwithstanding the Prime Minister's eloquent assurances on television.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not a fact.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is a fact.

Mr. Pearson: No enforcement machinery is set up, as I have said, though the Prime Minister has often talked about setting up some enforcement machinery; and in committee we may have something to say about the desirability of setting up at least some supervisory machinery.

It is true the Minister of Justice has to examine bills and regulations to ascertain whether they are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this legislation. In the earlier 1958 edition the Minister of Justice, under clause 4, was told "to examine legislation and regulations in order to ensure that the purpose and provisions of this part in relation thereto are fully carried out." Now, that language was pretty strong, and perhaps you could read some kind of sanction into that language; but as a result of the amendment in the present bill he does not have to examine these matters to ensure that the provisions are being carried out. All he has to do now is examine regulations and legislation to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this bill. That, Mr. Speaker, is a weakening of the earlier bill in regard to machinery to ensure, if it can be done, that it should be carried out.

Is the Minister of Justice accountable to parliament for the discharge of this particular duty? How do we deal with him if he fails?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Take out a writ of mandamus.

Mr. Pearson: There is another clause of the bill into which the Prime Minister has read much, which instructs—and I am paraphrasing the language—judges to interpret the law now along certain lines. That, however, hardly goes beyond the ordinary canons of judicial interpretation. Surely it does not render null and void or qualify any laws, rules or orders incompatible with the declarations of this bill. As Professor Laskin said:

> The injunction to the courts to construe an enactment in conformity with the bill would not enable the courts to ignore terms that ran counter to the bill.

I wonder how the Prime Minister reconciles that statement with what he said last Thursday evening and Friday morning. The other detailed provisions and questions will be dealt with by my colleagues.

There is something more important than these detailed provisions in sections 2 and 3, and that is the general confusion that may arise over the interpretation of these provisions by the courts. Is this bill—perhaps we will get an answer to this during the course of the debate—to be interpreted as legally operative to override provincial legislation that conflicts with the rights specifically enumerated in section 2? The majority of the commentators on the bill whom I have been able to study think not, but some take the other view. If the former view is the right one, then by this bill we merely confirm, underline and emphasize the fact that there are fundamental and human rights in Canada on two different levels, federal and provincial. This has caused a great deal of anxiety in legal circles.

Perhaps on this point I might read from an article by Mr. David Mundell on the Canadian bill of rights included in the bar review at page 256. In this article, he is dealing with this particular point, and he says:

> To some persons the bill is to be interpreted as legally operative to override provincial legislation. To others, since the language is in terms declaratory only and not directly mandatory and since section 3 is restricted to federal legislation, the bill is to be interpreted as intended to be restricted in its effective legal operation to federal legislation. Support has been given to this view by statements that have been made.
> The intended effect of the bill should be made clear, to enact it knowing that a basic question of interpretation which can be avoided will arise at the outset, is undesirable. The adoption of the principle of the declaration appears to make it logical to give it its fullest possible legal effect as overriding inconsistent provincial legislation.

This is a very important point which certainly should be cleared up. It could have been cleared up if this bill or a draft had been submitted to the supreme court for an opinion, as the Prime Minister himself once thought should be done. Arising out of these views expressed by Mr. Mundell and others, the question was asked at the bar association meeting and in the committees which were dealing with this matter, and a recommendation was made to refer this to the supreme court for a decision on this vital question of constitutionality.

Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the new bill. The few changes that have been made from the old bill are, as I have suggested, not of major importance. One or two of them, I think, do extend the bill and are perhaps helpful from that point of view, but one or two of them are retrogressive in character. We ask ourselves, therefore, on July 4, 1960, is this all we have to show; is this all the government has to show for the consideration presumably given from September, 1958 to July, 1960? Is this all the government has to show for all the submissions, all the evidence and all the statements that have been made concerning this matter?

I think it is also true to say, Mr. Speaker, that the few changes that have been introduced—in fact I know it is true to say—are not the result of public hearings, because none have been held, or of examination by a committee of parliament, because none has been set up. What a commentary that is on the government's public statements about the seriousness and importance of this subject for all Canadians.

I repeat that we on this side of the house do not underestimate the seriousness or importance of the subject in any way. We do criticize both the declaration and the bill, and the effectiveness of the government's handling of the whole matter once the Prime Minister and the government decided to proceed by way of legislation.

May I conclude, Mr. Speaker, with one or two very general and very short observations. In recent years the asserted claims of the individual on the state have been matched by his protests against the state's interference in his activities and in his private life, an interference which his own demands have made easier and in some cases inevitable. The state cannot provide services and support for the citizen without acquiring the power and authority which is necessary and desirable for that purpose. Put it another way; more social security, desirable and even necessary though that is, may often be the means to greater state powers, and the latter persistently press against the freedom and rights of citizens who are to benefit from these powers.

Now, that pressure is often embodied in masses of legislation and regulations which are required; often so great and complicated a mass that only with difficulty can it be reconciled to the equal necessity of defining and protecting the rights of an individual against the state from which he demands these services and this protection. This is the great dilemma of a democracy in the changing circumstances of today. Its resolution in the interests of the individual is not going to be easy whatever kind of legislative action we may or may not take. It will require careful and continuous watching and safeguarding by an alert and vigilant public opinion expressed in a very alert and vigilant parliament.

It will require, above all, strict adherence to the principle that the rights of the individual are paramount and cannot be subjected to official interference and limitation unless such official action can be unmistakably justified on the grounds of overriding public interest or national security. In this essential protection of our rights and our freedoms, words, declarations and even laws are not enough. At times they are nothing at all. History shows that. It also shows that in this matter the spirit is greater than the word; that custom and convention can be more powerful even than the law. It is the British tradition and the British instinct to rely on these intangibles, traditions, customs, opinions. That British instinct and that British tradition which we have inherited in these matters is based upon, and I think justified by, experience. If these intangibles go wrong everything goes wrong and no law will save us. It is also this instinct and this tradition which have encouraged us to rely on parliamentary action in specific cases for specific purposes to protect our rights and our freedoms, rather than to rely on any fundamental law above and beyond parliamentary control.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the record over the years is certainly not perfect. However, I think it has in the past justified this approach and adherence to these principles which are grounded in the sovereignty of a free and democratic parliament. In this bill we are departing from this British tradition. New circumstances, new difficulties and new pressures may justify some such departure, but they will not justify the limited, confused and uncertain departure embodied in this bill. Exaggerated language, extravagant claims and window dressing can only add to the confusion; they cannot supply a justification.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the very fact that the Canadian parliament has under consideration a bill to provide for the protection of basic human rights and fundamental freedoms is, in my opinion, in keeping with world feeling on this question. Some of us who watch the affairs of man as they unfold from day to day cannot help but be discouraged at abridgements of human rights and fundamental freedoms when they occur, and cannot help but be concerned and disappointed when there are setbacks. However, at an ever increasing pace I think mankind is going forward to a higher plane of human relations, and that all over the world, with few exceptions, human rights and fundamental freedoms are on the increase and are receiving greater and greater recognition.

Those of us who discuss this bill will have in mind many types of rights and fundamental freedoms. Some are mentioned in the bill; others are not referred to. These rights include the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex; freedom of religion; freedom of speech; freedom of assembly and association; and freedom of the press.

The whole question of human rights and fundamental freedoms has been a matter of long, careful and frequent discussion by the Canadian House of Commons. Participating in this discussion over the years have been many distinguished Canadian parliamentarians.

The Prime Minister introduced his bill of rights last Friday, and it is being discussed again today. He will take satisfaction in the distance he feels that it is moving toward the betterment or greater protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Leader of the Opposition, in a very full and informative statement, has placed his ideas on Hansard in this regard. I have the honour today to follow in the long and consistent tradition of the C.C.F. party in supporting a bill of rights and in supporting guaranteed human rights and fundamental freedoms.

As a matter of fact, looking back through the record of Hansard, I find that the first resolution having to do with the proposition that there should be a bill of rights in Canada was moved in this house in 1945, as reported at page 900 of Hansard of that year, by Mr. Alistair Stewart, who was at that time the member of parliament for Winnipeg North. His resolution, presented some 15 years ago, is extremely interesting in that it points out some of the important questions relating to human rights and fundamental freedoms being debated at this very time. The resolution reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, there should be incorporated in the constitution a bill of rights protecting minority rights, civil and religious liberties, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly; establishing equal treatment before the law of all citizens, irrespective of race, nationality or religious or political beliefs; and providing the necessary democratic powers to eliminate racial discrimination in all its forms.

This motion was presented at that time and debate was postponed because of the assurance of the present hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that a citizenship bill would be introduced that would go at least part way in providing these important human rights and fundamental freedoms. Then in 1947 Mr. Stewart went on to discuss this question and, in a paragraph that I feel points out very adequately the choice of this parliament and for the matter the choice of mankind, he had this to say, at page 3161 of Hansard for that year:

> We realize that there are two paths ahead, either one of which we as free agents may choose to follow as we will. One path leads to heights of splendour yet undreamed of; the other to the darkness of hatred and strife. One leads to a realm where the human spirit will rise, triumphant over the bigotries and persecutions of our age, where racial discrimination and intolerance of another's religious beliefs will be regarded as crimes against all mankind; where freedom of speech will be the inalienable right of every citizen; where men will no longer exploit their fellowmen for private gain; where every man will be master of his soul. That is one path we can choose.
> The other path can lead only to that spiritual desolation to which our enemies would have consigned us.

Canada, I think chooses the first path outlined in this statement. As ideas of what might appropriately be done toward the greater protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms were revealed in this house the national leader of this party, Mr. M. J. Coldwell, the then member of parliament for Rosetown-Biggar, placed on the order paper a resolution which supported the amending of the Canadian constitution as a most appropriate means by which we could protect human rights and fundamental freedoms. His motion was debated in 1955. At that time I believe there were three motions on the order paper, one by the present Prime Minister, one by Senator Croll and one by Mr. Coldwell. By arrangement this motion standing in Mr. Coldwell's name was moved as an amendment. It reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, immediate consideration should be given to the advisability of "the taking of whatever steps are necessary to amend the British North America Act so as to include therein the following heading and sections:
> XII Human Rights
> 148. Notwithstanding anything in this act, it shall not be lawful for the parliament of Canada or the legislatures of any of the provinces to make laws;
> (a) Abridging freedom of speech and expression, or freedom of religion, or of the press or other means, of communication or the right of lawful assembly, association or organization.
> (b) Depriving any person of life or liberty by arbitrary or abusive measures, or denying to any person the equal protection of the laws.
> (c) Requiring or imposing excessive bail or cruel or unusual punishment or exiling Canadian citizens.
> (d) Subjecting any person to unreasonable interference with his or her privacy, family, home or correspondence.
> (e) Subjecting any person to arbitrary arrest or detention or denying to any person the right after arrest to be informed promptly of the charges against such person and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.
> (f) Suspending the right to habeas corpus or depriving any person of a fair trial or the right to be represented by counsel".

The C.C.F., elected as the government of the province of Saskatchewan, lost no time in bringing forth a bill of rights and placing that measure in the laws of the province of Saskatchewan. So the C.C.F. movement has been consistent over the years in doing everything possible to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, we are prepared at this time to give consideration to the bill which is before the house. The Prime Minister has said it is a step toward guaranteeing the more adequate protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, but we believe it is not the most adequate measure which could be adopted. We believe the government has not prepared the ground for the bringing in of a constitutional amendment, which would have provided a much more secure guarantee of human rights and fundamental freedoms. In other words we think this bill is hesitant, inadequate and merely a feeble attempt to do that which is required to be done and which can be done in adequate measure only by an appropriate amendment to the Canadian constitution.

Over the years there have been many occasions in this country when human rights and fundamental freedoms have been abridged. There was the famous Alberta press act which was set aside. There was the interference which took place with the religious freedom of Jehovah's Witnesses. We have had indications in recent years of discrimination in this country against people whose skin is coloured. We had instances in Canada at the time of the last war and following it in which there was great discrimination against Canadians merely because of the colour of their skin. There were great debates in this House of Commons when the Liberal government of the day was taking action to deport Japanese Canadians and to disperse Canadians of Japanese origin all across this country. In taking that action at that time they were supported by members of the Conservative party who were then in opposition. They were supported by certain members of today's cabinet; but in all those debates at all times the members of the C.C.F. group supported the rights of Japanese Canadians to equal treatment with other Canadians, and opposed the discriminatory action which was taking place.

Mr. Speaker, one of the leaders in this battle to protect the rights of Japanese Canadians was Angus MacInnis, who for many years, from 1930 to 1953, was the member for Vancouver East and from 1953 to 1957 was the member for Vancouver-Kingsway. Many members of the house at that time felt that Mr. MacInnis was not only wrong in his attitude but was committing political suicide. His constituents continued to support him over the years, however, and not long ago he was singled out for distinction by being given an honorary doctor of laws degree by the University of British Columbia in recognition of his strong and consistent fight in support of equal rights for Canadians no matter of what racial origin, no matter of what religion and no matter of what colour.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think it is very appropriate that Canada should at this time go forward once again with other nations of the world in providing greater security for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The question before us is, will this measure guarantee those human rights and fundamental freedoms in an adequate manner?

[Mr. Argue.]

One of the criticisms most often advanced about this type of measure is that it is merely an amendment to a statute law, that it can be amended by any parliament at any time and in any way, and that it does not provide for full and adequate protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the days ahead. There is also the argument that a measure of this kind does not protect Canadians from rights which have been interfered with by laws already on the statute books of this country.

I think the Prime Minister is of the opinion that this law will be passed at this session of parliament, and that it will supersede laws passed heretofore which at present interfere with human rights and fundamental freedoms. I trust that is the correct interpretation of this bill and that it is the interpretation which will be placed on this measure by the courts.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand an excerpt from a submission by the Canadian Jewish congress conference on human rights which took place in Ottawa on December 8-10, 1958. In the course of this conference they had this to say:

> To say, as Bill C-60—

That was the predecessor of this bill.

> —says, that all acts of parliament "shall be construed and applied" as not to abridge the rights and freedoms declared therein may mean no more than that they shall be interpreted compatibly with these rights and freedoms if such an interpretation is not inconsistent with the express terms of those acts. Nothing would be changed by Bill C-60 where by express provision an act of parliament spoke in contrary terms.

Here is an opinion which says that with the passage of this bill it will not supersede previous acts of parliament where there is a special and clear conflict in terms. That is a very severe condemnation of the value of the bill now before the house.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Argue: When we rose at the luncheon adjournment I had quoted from the submission of the Canadian Jewish congress in which the congress stated that in its opinion this bill would not protect human rights and fundamental freedoms when these were at odds with the provisions of acts of this parliament which had already been passed.

The second criticism of the strength of this bill is that when it becomes an act it will be possible for parliament, by a simple step, to contravene the guarantees contained in the measure. Professor Bora Laskin of Toronto university has the following to say on this point:

Section 4 of Bill C-60—

That is the present bill's predecessor

—states that the Minister of Justice shall examine every draft bill introduced in the house and every regulation so that they shall not contradict the declarations of part I of Bill C-60. His failure to do so in any particular case will not, I suggest, affect the validity of an act of parliament and beyond this, the legal power of parliament to ignore the terms of Bill C-60 in any future legislation is unquestionable.

An amendment to the constitution would remove the possibility of parliament, by the enactment of a simple statute, contravening the guarantees contained in such a constitutional provision. The weakness of this measure as it stands is that parliament, by a simple act, many remove the benefits that are stated to flow from this legislation when it becomes law.

There is a further criticism I wish to make on the same ground. Not only does this bill, as I see it, not endeavour to protect Canadian citizens against an infringement of their rights by way of provincial legislation, but it does seem to me that it may well exclude provincial acts from the effects of this present measure. In other words this act, if passed, might make it easier for provincial legislatures to interfere with the rights of Canadian citizens in the various provinces. My reason for saying this is the wording which appears in clause 3 of the bill:

All the acts of the parliament of Canada enacted before or after the commencement of this part, all orders, rules and regulations thereunder, and all laws in force in Canada or in any part of Canada at the commencement of this part—

Here are the qualifying words:

—that are subject to be repealed, abolished or altered by the parliament of Canada, shall, unless it is otherwise expressly stated in any act of the parliament of Canada hereafter enacted, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe—

And so on. It seems to me that this provision opens the door wide for provincial governments if they should so desire, to abridge human rights and fundamental freedoms by precisely excluding acts of that kind from the effects of this measure.

It has already been stated in this debate that there is one provision in this bill which seems a good deal weaker in its substance than the corresponding provision in the bill which was presented to us on a former occasion. I refer to clause 4 of Bill No. C-60, the first bill introduced on this subject on September 5, 1958, in which it was stated:

The minister of justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the governor in council, examine every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the clerk of the privy council pursuant to the Regulations Act and every bill introduced in the House of Commons, to ensure that the purpose and provisions of this part in relation thereto are fully carried out.

That would seem to be a clear directive from parliament to the Minister of Justice to make absolutely certain that no future bills introduced in this house should contravene the provisions of the act. However, clause 4 of the present bill has changed the operative words, which now read:

... in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part.

Well, should the minister find that certain provisions in a bill do contravene or are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of the part of the act mentioned, that does not prevent him from recommending that such legislation should nevertheless be presented to this house, and does not ensure, as the former bill said must be ensured, that "the purposes and provisions of this part in relation thereto" are fully carried out.

In the light of this clause of the bill it would appear that after waiting for almost two years, instead of obtaining a more adequate bill stronger in its terms and in its protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, we have a bill that is in fact weaker in its phraseology and its instructions to the Minister of Justice.

We are debating this bill in the concluding days of this session. I do not know how one could do it, but I think there should be some kind of legislation to assure that statements made by the government and its representatives and by the Prime Minister are in fact lived up to and carried out. When saying that the bill of rights would be laid over to the next session the Prime Minister, as reported at page 6293 of Hansard of July 18, 1959, had this to say:

In saying that I want to make clear that from the suggestion I have to offer to postpone the introduction of the bill of rights until the beginning of the next session—

That was the clear understanding. This bill was to be introduced at the beginning of this session, and during this session a committee was to be set up to study the provisions of the bill. Over a long period of time, perhaps over a substantial part of the session, the committee was to have the right to hear witnesses and evidence and decide whether or not the bill in an improved form could be brought into the house. The Prime Minister will not argue that the legislation was not ready, because there have been so few amendments that one might say it was almost ready in this form on September 5, 1958.

Human Rights

I have in my hand a copy of the bill that I take it was in final form, in the view of the appropriate officers of the house. This is an advance copy of the bill to which reference has already been made in the daily press, and it is stamped January 12, 1960. In other words the bill was available and printed on January 12 of this year. Where was it hidden? It was put away in somebody's closet. The Prime Minister denied this bill to the House of Commons for six months, and failed to carry out the terms of his undertaking given to this house.

In the light of the hopes of Canadians and the fight the Prime Minister has waged over many years for a bill to guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms, this is a pale image of the legislation the Canadian people had hoped would be introduced at this time. There seems to be a great difference between the way hon. members of the government act when in government and the way they spoke and acted when in opposition.

On previous occasions I have referred to the way this government has failed to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms under the constitutional power it now holds. One of the darkest events in Canadian history was the passing in the province of Newfoundland of certain labour laws. Although an application was made to the governor in council requesting that this legislation be set aside, the Prime Minister refused to set it aside as we think he should have, and failed to be frank with parliament by telling us the decision was made. The hon. gentleman procrastinated and evaded when asked what the government would do until a year had elapsed. The legislation remains in effect. This is not the attitude of a government that is sincerely endeavouring at all times to protect human rights and fundamental freedoms.

One does not expect that this government can have jurisdiction in any way over the citizens of other countries. We are part of the United Nations organization. We have taken a strong stand on previous occasions with respect to certain questions respecting human rights and fundamental freedoms. When we saw some months ago a shocking revelation of racial prejudice and discrimination in South Africa, some of us raised this question in the house. We asked Canada through the government and the Prime Minister to take a strong stand on the issue. The government did not stand in favour of racial discrimination, but there was hesitancy. The question was evaded. Many months went by before the Prime Minister made a statement. In some ways it was a peculiar statement. It contained a peculiar sentence which I think is a shocking reflection of the attitude of the Prime Minister toward human rights and fundamental freedoms in South Africa. I quote from the Prime Minister's statement as reported at page 3088 of Hansard of Monday, April 11, 1960:

> I would also point out that if I were not sitting where I am, with the responsibilities that are mine, I would express myself somewhat differently from the way I am at the moment.

That may well be a true statement. If it is true it must mean that there is one attitude taken by the Prime Minister in opposition and a weaker attitude taken by him when in government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. First, quotations from previous debates during the same session are not allowed. I do not raise any objection to that. Second, the interpretation placed upon my words by the hon. gentleman is entirely removed from the fact. All I can say is that all the governments of the commonwealth took a similar attitude to that taken by me, with the result that the commonwealth conference adopted the attitude which I had stated was the only official one I could take having regard to the necessity of preserving the commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker: The point the Prime Minister mentioned is, of course, well taken. Quotations from previous concluded debates should not be raised in the course of subsequent debates in the same session. The hon. member should not continue to use such quotations as the basis of his conclusions.

Mr. Argue: In reply to the Prime Minister I can only say that in my view, instead of making commonwealth relations more difficult this government would have helped commonwealth relations if it had at the earliest moment expressed itself more strongly in condemnation of racial discrimination in South Africa.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what the commonwealth prime ministers said.

Mr. Argue: Indeed, the government should express itself strongly on any occasion when racial discrimination arises. To elaborate that question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The only reason for permitting any reference to that question is that it was raised as a question of privilege. I believe that matter has been disposed of, and I urge the hon. member to proceed with the main debate.

Mr. Argue: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, as I always do. I have no further remarks to make on that subject. In a discussion of the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms I feel it is appropriate to refer to the lack of those rights in other parts of the world, so long as there is some connection between that situation and what is happening in Canada or statements that are made in this house from time to time.

We in this party have argued for a long time that what is required by way of protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms is a constitutional amendment. I do not know whether the Prime Minister is opposed to a constitutional amendment; it is very difficult to find out. But if the Prime Minister is opposed to a constitutional amendment then he is acting in a very consistent manner; because at page 5650 of Hansard he said in reply to a question of mine as to whether the government had considered approaching the provinces to obtain agreement on a constitutional amendment that he had not consulted the provinces and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, one has only to review the discussions that have taken place at the several dominion-provincial conferences in recent years, and as a matter of fact throughout the years to give a completely effective answer to that question.

If that is the effective answer, it is that the Prime Minister did not canvass the provinces, that he did not try. At least one province suggested to the government that such a canvass of the views of provincial governments should be undertaken. The premier of Saskatchewan, in a lengthy letter dated January 19, 1959, wrote to the Prime Minister asking that such a course be followed, and in so doing he had this to say:

> For these reasons, I urge you to reconvene the constitutional conference of federal and provincial governments which was held in 1950 and to submit to it your proposals for an amendment to the constitution which will contain a statement of human rights and fundamental freedoms in clear and explicit form.

As far as I can tell from the return that was brought down—and the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong—the Prime Minister himself, over his own signature, has not yet replied to that letter. I make that statement because on June 23, in reply to a motion of mine for the production of papers, this correspondence was produced and the only answer in the correspondence is one dated June 22, 1959, addressed to the premier of Saskatchewan and signed "Respectfully, Gowan T. Guest, executive assistant and private secretary" to the Prime Minister. I know the Prime Minister is a busy man. I know that from time to time, because of public business, he is outside of Ottawa, but I do not think it is an indication of good federal-provincial relations for the Prime Minister himself not to have made an immediate reply, or if out of Ottawa, then in a relatively short period of time, to this important submission to him by the premier of Saskatchewan.

In our view these are the things that the government should have done; it should have explored every possible avenue to the end that an amendment to the constitution of this country, agreed to by the provinces, might be brought in.

Many important submissions have been made on this question, one of them made by Professor Bora Laskin, who argues, and I quote his words:

> Enough has come from the courts to suggest that if there is any dominating authority in the area of civil liberties it is that of the parliament of Canada and not of the legislatures of the provinces.

He goes on to show that in his view parliament should act in a field that is clearly within its jurisdiction. Mr. Justice Thorson of the Exchequer Court of Canada makes a statement along the same lines:

> But it seems to follow, under our federal system which divides the field of self-government in the manner which I have stated, that since the legislative assemblies of the provinces cannot abridge these freedoms, the parliament of Canada can validly do so. There is strong support for the view that these freedoms, at any rate, ought to be embedded in our constitution by an appropriate amendment of the British North America Act so that not even the parliament of Canada can detract from them. And it would seem to follow from what I have said that parliament could properly seek such an amendment without prior approval of the provinces, since the subject matter of the amendment is not within their legislative competence.

Therefore we have the views of many learned authorities who believe that the course taken by the government today is a the very best a second course, and not the more preferable one that is available to the government. This afternoon we have been talking about certain human rights and fundamental freedoms. We have been talking about freedom of speech, of assembly, of the press and of other freedoms that we usually refer to. Professor Frank Scott, in his very interesting series of articles on the Canadian constitution and human rights, after an elaborate inquiry into what can be done to better protect those rights, ends his series of articles and broadcasts with these words:

> If we are going to put anything into the constitution I hope we shall put in economic and cultural rights as well as the basic freedoms. We live in the age of the positive state, not the negative state, and it is important that we keep before us the democratic goals toward which all state power should be aimed.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, in the development of human rights and fundamental freedoms it is the opinion of this authority on our constitution and of other authorities around the world that the time has now come when economic freedoms should be added to the list of what we might call traditional freedoms.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have done this for years, but may I ask for the indulgence of the house. I will be finished in a few moments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Go on.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Argue: As I see it, Mr. Speaker, the present course that is being followed can be criticized for seven basic reasons:

1. Bill No. C-79 is not an amendment to the constitution and therefore does not protect those basic rights to the same extent that would flow from an amendment to the constitution.

2. The action now being taken does not protect basic rights, freedom of speech, religion, assembly, the press and the right of association against all attackers. It protects those rights from action of this parliament, but it does not protect them from action of our legislatures or of our municipal councils.

3. As I see it, the language of the bill is unnecessarily weak and narrow, and even in this kind of amendment the government could have improved the strength and the degree of guarantee contained therein.

4. This bill fails to enumerate in any way basic economic rights that thinkers are now saying should be included in any modern bill of rights.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Who are those thinkers who say that a bill of rights covering political freedom and fundamental rights ought to include economic rights?

Mr. Argue: The United Nations is a good enough authority to put forward as one organization of learned men who say there should be economic rights in such a charter of freedoms, and I have quoted from Professor Frank Scott who I believe, and who I think the Prime Minister will agree, is a very important constitutional authority in Canada, although the Prime Minister may disagree with his views from time to time.

My fifth criticism, Mr. Speaker, is with regard to the record of this government. The record of this government in its approach to human rights and fundamental freedoms is weak and compromising. The Canadian people would be given greater assurance and confidence if the government's record had been consistent, which it has not been.

My sixth criticism concerns the timing of this legislation. I criticize the timing because the bill has been introduced in the dying days of this session. My further criticism on this point is that it has been introduced in the latter part of this session in spite of the clear commitment by the Prime Minister that it would be introduced early in the session and the evidence that this bill has, in fact, been printed since early in January.

My seventh and final criticism is that the Prime Minister has failed to consult the provinces and therefore has failed to show any desire for a strong bill of rights that would flow from an amendment to the constitution.

Over the years in this parliament, Mr. Speaker, many hon. members have spoken out strongly and consistently in support of human rights and fundamental freedoms. No one will endeavour to take away from the Prime Minister his many years of consistent work in this field. I only wish that his work were being crowned by something more substantial than this bill before us this afternoon. Those who have worked in favour of human rights and fundamental freedoms have not been confined to any one political party. Earlier today I said that certain members of the Prime Minister's cabinet had supported the discrimination against Japanese Canadians. This was not true of all the members of his cabinet who were in the house at the time. I am very pleased to be able to say that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) has consistently, throughout his years in parliament, been a strong defender of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I believe that all men of good will in all political parties will look upon the measure now before us as perhaps a small step toward the strengthening of human rights and fundamental freedoms. We have a long way to go. We should consider this measure as the first instalment of a program that ultimately must guarantee to all Canadians, these basic rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, there are, of course, many different approaches that can be taken to a bill of rights. Some people state that civil liberties are a part of the framework of our laws; that they are deeply embedded in our temperament and form a part of the great intangibles; that a formal document would add nothing to those safeguards and guarantees that have been built up through the centuries and that are a part of our British heritage. Some people even say that any codification would be perilous. They feel that by enunciating certain rights, by limiting them in a text, there might be serious dangers of omissions and that therefore far from adding anything new in the way of safeguards, this would be a retrograde step.

Then there are others, and if I understood the Leader of the Opposition correctly this morning I believe he is one of those who approve of the principles of the bill but make some reservations as to its extent, its form, the sanctions or penalties that may or may not be provided. I shall endeavour to answer some of the objections that have been raised to this bill of rights that is now before us.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, it might be useful to get back to fundamental principles and ask ourselves, with what is a parliament such as ours really concerned? If we look at the matter carefully and thoughtfully we might conclude that such a parliament should have as its primary aim the safeguarding of civil liberties. Then we may be brought to ask ourselves, what are civil liberties and what is the origin of such liberties and rights?

In answer to this question I should like to quote from the review Les Relations for April, 1949, in which the director of this publication, Rev. Father Richard Ares, of the Society of Jesus, asks himself precisely the same question: "D'où viennent les droits de l'homme?" The rev. father states:

(Translation):

> To this question, Christian doctrine replies by bringing in, in turn, God, human nature and the state.

That is human rights.

> If their ultimate basis is God, according to the Christian doctrine, human rights have their proximate and immediate source in the very nature of the human being, in the dignity of man. That is why they are, at one and the same time, natural and inviolable.

(Text):

And that, Mr. Speaker, may be going back a very long way indeed. There is certainly no doubt that from the very outset of recorded history man has had within himself that urge for liberty and freedom to do those things which he conceives to be necessary to reach his appointed end. Yet throughout that long period civil rights were for the most part flouted and denied. It was only in the period of Greece and Rome that democratic ideals came near realization. Yet even those times were periods of slavery and periods in which the ordinary citizen did not have rights. Throughout the middle ages man aspired to freedom. Indeed, in many countries progress was made toward those ends in the formation of cities, guilds and trade corporations where the rights of free men were enunciated. However, civil rights such as we know them first came to be respected in the first centuries of British history.

I need not go into the details of the great charters of Anglo-Saxon liberties. The Prime Minister has already referred to them and they are known. We have Magna Carta in 1215 and the petition of right in 1628. In 1670 trial by jury was recognized following Bushell's case. In 1679 we have the habeas corpus act and in 1689 the bill of rights. In the same year we have the toleration act. In 1701-02 we have the acts of settlement providing for the life tenure of judges. In 1792 there was the libel act. In 1695 the British parliament refused to renew the licensing act, and this refusal in effect abolished political censorship.

Besides those great charters we have in our literature many classics on liberty. I think in particular of that great statement prepared by John Milton in 1644 and presented to both houses of parliament. This has been described as the greatest statement for the case of free speech that has ever been written. The Areopagitica contains these words:

> Give me the liberty to know, to utter and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties.

It goes on to say this, and it is quite relevant inasmuch as freedom of the press is part of this bill:

> For who knows not that truth is strong next to the Almighty? She needs no policies, no stratagems, no licensing to make her victorious; those are the shifts and the defences that error used against her power.

We are also all familiar with that great essay of John Stuart Mill on liberty published in 1859, in which he showed how any despotism, however benevolent, must in fact cramp and destroy the development of a people. Political liberty alone is insufficient; social tyranny may be more grinding than legal tyranny.

Mr. Speaker, these and others were great words in the advance of the freedom of the peoples throughout the earth. We are proud that they were spoken in the mother of parliaments, and we are also proud that we are heirs to that tradition. That great wind that blew or that was born in that country spread across the seas. If we examine the position that exists in the great republic to the south of us we find that their liberties —I refer to the United States liberties— are even to this day largely English liberties. We recall that Thomas Jefferson wrote into the declaration of independence of 1776:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Benjamin Franklin wrote:

> Without freedom of thought there can be no such thing as wisdom, and no such thing as public liberty without freedom of speech.

Basic is the conviction that respect for the reason and conscience of the individual man will increase the power of reason in the universe and thus give greater assurance that human affairs will be dominated by reasonable men.

The first congress of the United States incorporated in the United States constitution the first ten amendments which in effect became their bill of rights. Today is Independence day in the United States, and I do not think it would be amiss to refer to it at this time and to salute that country which shares with the United Kingdom that heritage of great and basic freedoms.

Our tradition of freedom and civil liberty in Canada was received, as I stated, from England and also from the United States. These were modified by many other currents. They were modified by the wind that swept from France with the French revolution and its desire for freedom of the individual man. On Friday the Prime Minister referred to many of the constitutional guarantees, the enactments, which make this country what it is. The treaty for Paris in 1763 guaranteed the free exercise of religion to the French Canadians of Quebec. The Quebec act of 1774 retained the French civil law which was based on "La coutume de Paris". The constitutional act of 1791 set up consultative assemblies in Canada. There followed the fight for responsible government which was marked by uprisings in both the upper and lower house which led to the union of the Canadas of 1841. The British North America Act of 1867 contained these words in its preamble; that the provinces are to be united together federally under the British crown with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Certain parliamentary and minority rights are guaranteed, but there is no mention of individual rights.

Since 1867 there has been a great advance in so far as the legal recognition of human rights is concerned. On a national scale we have advanced all the way from a self governing colony to a nation. Our minority rights are protected by constitutional guarantees. Provincial autonomy acts as a powerful guarantee against too great a centralization of power at Ottawa. However, in the case of individual or civil liberties there has not been such great progress, and there are recorded many instances of violations of these rights.

In 1948 Canada voted for a declaration of human rights passed by the general assembly of the United Nations on December 10 of that year. This was described as a goal for all mankind regardless of race, colour, language or creed. Canada has been one of the foremost nations of the world in terms of specific human rights legislation to establish equality of opportunity for its people in terms of specific legislation in the fields of employment and public accommodations, and there are quite a number of statutes which provide these guarantees.

Mr. Speaker, all this is very good as far as it goes, but what of the future? In the words of the Prime Minister, changing conditions have shown that freedom cannot be static. In recent years there have been tremendous upheavals in our way of life. The industrial revolution of the nineteenth century brought in its wake the end of the feudal system, the rise of industrial cities and its accompanying misery of slums, the poor laws and child labour. There has been the rise of the proletariat and the bleak, dismal existence during the nineteenth century of the labouring masses.

Thinkers, appalled by so much misery, endeavoured to devise new systems for the distribution of wealth and also to assure a full measure of social justice to all classes. We have seen socialism and also Marxism. Some of these thinkers and political philosophers who devised these systems were sincere and genuinely advocated improvement in the conditions of society and of the classes as they saw them. However, practical, hard headed realists who applied these theories very often denied these very liberties and exercised power for power's sake; and we have had these extremes of fascism and communism which brought with them the brutal suppression in many countries of all civil liberties and mass extermination of many millions of people.

Today we look at new problems created by the complexity of our modern existence. We look at the problems which are created by the population explosion and by shrinking natural resources. Then we have the east-west struggle. We see the hundreds of millions of red China, laden in toil and satisfied to endure endless servitude in exchange for bread and security. Certainly no one can conceive of red China, for instance, adopting a law providing for the recognition and protection of basic human freedoms.

Some writers have brought up a vision of the future. H. G. Wells in "The Time Machine" envisaged the men of the future. They were all in similar garb and had the same soft, rounded figures, unable to concentrate and tiring quickly. He described them as the sunset of humanity. In this society there was no need for strength. The world was at peace and secure. The strong of body and of mind would only have felt frustrated.

In Aldous Huxley's "Brave New World" individuality is a thing of the past. Society bends every effort to make completely true its motto of community, identity, stability. In a foreword written to a re-edition of his work in 1946, speaking of the real world as he saw it, not the nightmarish vision of his work of fiction, he had this to say:

> In an age of advanced technology inefficiency is the sin against the Holy Ghost.
> A really efficient totalitarian state would be one in which the all-powerful executive of political bosses and their army of managers control a population of slaves who do not have to be coerced because they love their servitude. To make them love it is the task assigned in present day totalitarian states to ministries of propaganda, newspaper editors and school teachers. Already throughout the world in many parts democratic forms of government have gone out of fashion and have been replaced by the rule of a dictator or a tyrannical clique; even in democracies, governments have often been attracted by the illusion of the efficiency of all-out control.

All of this, I believe, points to one thing, and I am now reminded of one of the concluding statements made by the Leader of the Opposition this morning, when he stated: "Encroachments by states on individual rights in recent years have been matched by individuals protesting that infringement." The hon. gentleman went on to say that constant vigilance was necessary, and that the great dilemma of modern times was how to organize a modern state while at the same time preserving individual freedom.

I agree that that is the most important question. I think that by this very bill of rights we have shown in an unmistakable form that we are more attached to individual liberty than to anything else. That is, as I see it, the purpose behind the bill; that is the cause underlying the great struggle which has been carried on by the Prime Minister ever since he came to this house, both within and outside this chamber. He wanted it to be established clearly and beyond a doubt that here in Canada in the twentieth century, in 1960, despite all the great problems that are massing all over the world, we still stand for that basic freedom; that this ideal is not out of date.

This bill of rights, imperfect though it may be according to some of the critics on the other side, serves its purpose because it is a beacon and an inspiration. It is an inspiration to Canadians both old and new, both to those whose forebears came here in the first days of the colony and also to those who have newly migrated to our shores. It is a beacon which will shine very brightly, also, before the eyes of the newly emerging nations who will say, "Canada, a country which is materially wealthy, still puts first things first." That is the great merit of this bill.

I have not time to go into the detailed criticisms which were made of this measure, and I do not wish to do so. But I wish to say that this is indeed a step in the right direction, and a very long step. The Leader of the Opposition referred this morning to the Magna Carta. He said we have Magna Carta. If we look at the terms of Magna Carta we discover that its language was far from perfect. Nevertheless it can still, after 800 years, serve as an inspiration to the living democracies of today.

I was reading a few days ago from the book on Sir John A. Macdonald written by Mr. Donald Creighton, "The Young Politician". In that book, describing the first Dominion day, the author says:

> Everybody noticed the beauty of the day; everybody observed how auspicious was its splendour.

Mr. Speaker, July 1, 1960, was also a clear, bright day, auspicious too in its splendour as the parliament of Canada heard the Prime Minister speak on his cherished bill of rights, the charter of the freedom of Canadians everywhere.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): The big show is on. On Dominion day the Prime Minister brings up his pet legislation. I do not know if it was his intention to have the people of Canada forget about the poor administration or anything else. As a matter of fact, he chose the time in order to try to make the biggest show for himself.

(Translation):

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister places enormous value on his pet project, but does so in a very inconsistent way.

For several sessions, he has talked to us about the bill of rights. In fact, he introduced it at the second session, then withdrew it. He is introducing it again at the end of this session, hoping no doubt that the opposition will not take the trouble to give it proper consideration.

Nothing in the world could take his mind off this fixed idea of his, of appending his name to a Canadian bill of rights.

In its present form, it is ludicrously ponderous, and unadapted to the minds of the people, especially of the younger generation, of school children, who one day will be taking our places.

Besides, an article published in the Ottawa Citizen on February 6, 1959, reflected about the same opinion as the one expressed by the Canadian Bar Association.

(Text):

> The Diefenbaker government's proposed bill of rights was criticized as being dull. It is a declaration rather than a law enforcible throughout the country. For this very reason, the lawyers agreed that it should be so written so as to inspire children and stir the hearts of men.

(Translation):

Further on, the same paper recalls great declarations, like Lincoln's Gettysburg address. This is how they start:

(Text):

We here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain ... and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

(Translation):

Now compare this, Mr. Speaker, with the terms used by the Prime Minister when he introduced his bill. It is a ponderous bill, especially in its legal phraseology. It could never be applied.

Let us now look at the initial paragraph of the constitution of the United States and that of the United Nations:

(Text):

We, the people of the United States of America, we the people of the United Nations.

(Translation):

Those are exalted terms, which speak to the mind and to the imagination.

Now here is the beginning of the American declaration of independence:

(Text):

When in the course of human events—

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal—

(Translation):

Are those not inspiring words, quite out of the ordinary?

The Atlantic charter also, in its turn, proclaims human rights.

(Text):

—to live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

(Translation):

That is a simple and brief statement, but surely a declaration of general principles understandable to the lowliest mortal.

Let us look now at the constitution of UNESCO:

(Text):

Since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed.

(Translation):

The United Nations Declaration of Human Rights reads as follows:

(Text):

To promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom.

(Translation):

Now let us compare this, Mr. Speaker, with what the Prime Minister has to offer:

(Text):

It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms.

(Translation):

Do you notice the ponderous, legal terminology, bound to displease the public at large?

Besides, if those rights have always existed and will continue to exist, why clutter up our statutes?

We still have that famous document, the Magna Carta of 1215, which paved the way to basic human freedoms.

Over the years, Britain quietly proceeded to draft its own general declaration, and was able to increase the freedoms demanded by the people. The result is that no country in the world enjoys more freedom than Great Britain. There are few countries in the world where human freedoms are more respected than in Canada.

Particularly in the past few years, Canadian courts have adequately protected the rights of individuals, especially in the religious field.

However, must we please the Prime Minister, who is seeking to achieve fame through this pointless bill?

Why not simplify his sentences, as suggested by the editor of the Citizen who instead of the cumbersome sentence put forward by the Prime Minister, suggests this:

(Text):

Canadians always have enjoyed and always shall enjoy the following rights and freedoms—

(Translation):

It is shorter, simpler and more easily grasped.

I admit that this may seem somewhat rhetorical, as the Prime Minister, it seems, would rather have it in the form of legislation than a declaration of principles.

Under what circumstances are we called upon to enact legislation? When are such enactments required to maintain peace and order, to promote morality and neighbourly relations among the citizens of a country or a province?

As for the rights specified in this bill, could the Prime Minister single out any that has not already been guaranteed by laws or treaties since 1760? The Magna Carta itself —since we inherit the British traditions— fully safeguards every individual whatever his race, religion or language.

And the Prime Minister made the same statement himself when he said: "Those fundamental freedoms have always existed and shall continue to exist in Canada." Since those freedoms have always existed, the bill is a perfectly useless duplication. Had the Prime Minister been as wise as some people would have him, he would have agreed to our intelligent suggestion that a committee of both houses be appointed to study this legislation, for he is not omniscient. He should have enough humility to recognize that his thinking, good though it may be, might still leave room for improvement. Such a committee could, while preserving the Prime Minister's basic thinking, introduce more poetry into the bill and make it possible for school children to learn it by heart and thus build the new spirit of the future, as stated by UNESCO:

Since wars begin in the minds of man, it is in the minds of man that the defences of peace must be constructed.

It is from the minds of young people that we must remove fanaticism.

There is no doubt about it, our legislation has proved adequate to protect the individual against interference by mobs and by governments. In proof of this, there was the supreme court judgment against the Quebec government respecting Jehovah's Witnesses. We all know that this sect was waging its propaganda by trying to destroy Catholic thinking in the province of Quebec, in an insulting, defamatory and degrading way. The proper way to deal with them would have been to bring them before the courts for insults and disparagement. On the contrary, those people were prevented from holding a meeting in a private house, some of them were placed under arrest, the police confiscated some pamphlets and other printed matter. On account of the arbitrary method used in their arrest, Jehovah's Witnesses won their case.

Not very long ago, the Supreme Court of Canada also gave judgment against the former premier of the province of Quebec, in favour of a restaurant owner who had been deprived of his license because he had supplied bail in favour of the Witnesses of Jehovah.

Those who want to avail themselves of our laws as the they exist in Canada, always succeed in vindicating their just claims, even against those who do not resort to legal methods to reach their aims. If we look one by one at the various judgments rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada in various fields, we will find that anyone who chose to appeal to our courts always obtained fair treatment.

Would the passing of this bill, in its present form, improve or amend anything whatever? Not as far as I know. Anyway, I am not the only one to think so. The Winnipeg Tribune, which always has had great admiration for the present Prime Minister and has long been advocating the proposed bill on human rights, published the following editorial under the title:

(Text):

A Bill of Rights that Means Little—

Mr. Diefenbaker is determined to have the bill passed during the present session.

(Translation):

He was referring to the last session, that of 1959:

(Text):

With the Conservative majority as large as it is, chances are the Prime Minister will have his wish. But this does not alter the fact that in its present form the bill of rights is little more than window dressing.

(Translation):

And farther down, the Winnipeg Tribune continues as follows:

(Text):

It is a pity that Mr. Diefenbaker, after being so vigorous a champion of individual rights for so many years, is settling for such a puny bill.

(Translation):

This from a newspaper usually friendly towards the Prime Minister.

That is exactly what I claim, and it is in those very terms that, a few years ago, I criticized the bill then introduced by the leader of the Canadian socialist party, Mr. Coldwell. Besides, last year the people most interested, i.e. the members of the League for Human Rights, at a meeting held at the Chateau Laurier, strongly criticized the bill of rights now introduced by the Prime Minister in its present form. I am not telling him anything new; he has already been told by that very association.

I said a moment ago that the situation is in no way changed, because it is not our laws that are defective, but the human spirit that is unsound.

The Gazette of December 26, 1958 published the following words on this subject by Mrs. G. Marshall:

(Text):

A decade of international legislating of human rights has not proved peaceful, effectual or satisfactory, so perhaps now what is needed is a new heart and a new mind in those people who are entrusted with the nation's destiny to see that righteousness, justice and honesty are carried out.

(Translation):

Then too, Mr. Speaker, Soviet Russia and all countries behind the iron curtain have adopted similar bills to protect human rights and, in spite of all those laws, thousands of people have been exiled, deported, imprisoned, because they did not see eye to eye with the government, which did not prevent the Russians, in spite of those bills of rights, to invade Hungary and to proceed there with the most awful massacre ever recorded in history.

The hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) said a moment ago that China could not afford to have such a bill of rights.

Well, Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. member that China has indeed adopted a bill of rights. Let me quote a few sections of this act, which is in force in China at this time.

Section 85 reads as follows:

(Text):

Citizens of the people's republic are equal before the law.

(Translation):

Section 87 says:

(Text):

Citizens have freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom of association.

(Translation):

Section 88 provides:

(Text):

Citizens have freedom of religious belief.

(Translation):

Yet, despite all these freedoms which are included in the Chinese acts and constitution, hundreds of priests, clergymen and bishops have been persecuted for years, and are still being persecuted.

Section 89 of this act says:

(Text):

No person may be arrested except by decision of a people's court or with the sanction of a people's procuratate.

(Translation):

Section 90 reads:

(Text):

The homes of citizens are inviolable, and privacy of correspondence is protected by law.

(Translation):

Now, Mr. Speaker, we all know what those people's courts amount to in communist China. A mass meeting or mob is organized. People are whipped into a frenzy of hostile demonstration against an individual whom the government dislikes, and who, without further ado, is led off either to jail or to violent death.

Mr. Speaker, communist China has passed a bill of rights, but what good did it do?

I remember reading and hearing missionaries say that their residence had been broken into, that they had been placed under arrest, thrown into jail, and that after a few months, when they were broken down by ill-treatment, that famous people's court was called to sentence them to an even longer jail term. That is what they do with human rights in communist China, despite existing legislation. This proves that it is always the mind that has to be cured, and that minds cannot be cured by legislation. It is better to train the people to see their duty and to be charitable to their fellowmen.

Despite all those bills of rights, the Chinese as well as other people living behind the iron curtain enjoy those freedoms to the extent where they submit to the often iniquitous legislation enacted by their government. Nothing has changed; everything is as bad as before those laws were passed.

This bill of rights would be really effective only if the Canadian government were fully sovereign, which is not the case. We have provincial governments which, in their own field, that is to say in the field of civil law, enjoy absolute sovereignty; therefore, there is no sovereign government in Canada, and there can be no truly efficient legislation of this type unless it is drafted and accepted by the federal and provincial governments.

Besides, the British North America Act confirms the rights of the minorities, and because of the ill-will of certain people, its application has been extremely difficult. Now a bill such as this, imposed by the Canadian government, is by no means binding on the provincial governments, because they are never subject to the legislation of other governments. They can act as they see fit, with or without justice, with regard to minorities. A bill such as this would have no effect in wartime because no provision is made in that respect.

Therefore, the bill comes almost a hundred years too late, and is too ill-drafted to achieve its real purpose.

On December 16, 1958, the Winnipeg board of trade had this say about this measure:

From our study of this bill, that is the bill of rights, it seems to us that nothing is being added to the liberties now enjoyed by the people of Canada. Our freedoms are founded on British common law, and on tradition, on our constitution and on our statutes. Even if Canada is a young country, it is known as a nation where individual freedom and protection of individual rights have been developed to a degree which is envied in many parts of the world.

We are concerned about this bill to guarantee human rights and which, as it does not add anything to the rights now enjoyed by Canadian citizens, may only, over the years, obstruct the development and evolution of those rights. In fact, we could truly say that generally speaking too much defining is limiting, and we hesitate to support any legislation which might result in limiting the development of individual rights in Canada.

Some of the rights we enjoy today were neither known nor even hoped for 200 years ago, and we think that if a legislation like the one proposed had been introduced two centuries ago, we would probably today, be restricted to those freedoms only, which were legally accepted at that time.

Mr. Speaker, so as to establish clearly that the bill cannot achieve its purpose and that it is unnecessary, let us bear in mind that, in spite of statutes and treaties, the only province which really has respected the rights of minorities and individuals throughout Canadian history, is the province of Quebec.

We know that the Canadian constitution conferred upon minorities the right of having their own schools in so far as that freedom was part of the statutes of the said provinces before the British North America Act was passed. Now, in New Brunswick, right after the British North America Act was enacted and because conditions which had prevailed until then were not based on a statute but merely on tolerance, a persecution was started which prohibited the teaching of French and religion in the schools, and abolished any privilege which we had considered our right.

So, the French speaking minority appealed to Sir George Etienne Cartier, who was at the time the leader of the French speaking minority in Canada, asking him to have that law disallowed. Sir George Etienne Cartier rightly refused, to avoid setting a dangerous precedent. True, in the meantime, the situation in New Brunwick has improved, as in most other Canadian provinces; but, in spite of human rights, persecution has persisted in some provinces.

When, in 1871, Manitoba joined the confederation, Sir George Etienne Cartier, in order to protect minorities, and after what had happened in New Brunswick, took the precaution of having included, on behalf of French speaking minorities, the same principles which prevailed in favour of protestant English speaking minorities in the province of Quebec. But, in spite of that precaution, by 1891 the Manitoba government outlawed the teaching of French and of religion in schools, in spite of the laws which had been passed.

Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that the federal government of the time could have mustered an army and invaded Manitoba to compel the provincial authorities to respect the act which they had signed when joining the confederation? That was impossible. It was only after discussions between Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the leader of the Manitoba government of the time that, quietly, around 1897, legislation was enacted which relieved to some extent the difficult situation of the minorities in that province. It was in the minds of men that everything was wrong.

Do you think the adoption of this Canadian declaration could have prevented, in 1911, the province of Ontario from adopting its famous regulation XVII against the teaching of French and religion in the schools? Even if this bill had then been in force, the Ontario government would have defied it and would have acted as it did. It was the courage and the fighting spirit of the French speaking minority that helped us overcome those difficulties. Today, those things are of the past; they are forgotten, but still I say that a law such as this one would have failed to remedy the situation.

Would the adoption of a law such as this have prevented Mr. Anderson, leader of the Saskatchewan Conservative party in 1928, from fighting the Gardiner government, because it was granting too much protection and latitude to the teaching of religion and French in schools? Would it have prevented Mr. Anderson's government from removing crucifixes, which are not a sign of Catholicity, but a sign of Christianity? No, Mr. Speaker. All those efforts would have been in vain.

The fault lies in people's minds, and it is through the mind of men that it can be remedied.

Thank God, the day has come when the rights of Canadian citizens are respected, and not only because we have laws but because the attitude of Canadians has improved, and people have a better understanding of their duties. Thanks to this better understanding we may enjoy more freedom in all parts of Canada.

In any event, the persecutions which had started in the Atlantic area slowly moved towards the Pacific, and it can be hoped that whatever traces remain of this spirit of persecution will soon fall into the Pacific and completely vanish.

Mr. Speaker, there can be only one way of drafting a piece of legislation in such a way as to prompt our young people to have a little more respect for justice, and that is to go into the matter more thoroughly, and give the bill a more literary, more poetic and less legalistic form. Once their minds have been steeped in justice, we will no longer have to worry about rights being violated. Mr. Speaker, when the house comes to a vote on second reading, I shall support the bill which I regard in its present form as pointless, useless, but not really harmful.

Again I urge the government, or rather the Prime Minister to postpone his bill until the next session, and by that I mean the beginning of the next session. Then we might set up a joint committee of the Senate and the Commons, which could hear the suggestions and objections of individuals and public bodies such as chambers of commerce, boards of trade, the Conseil de la Vie française en Amérique, the Canadian Bar Association, the civil liberties association and a number of others. Indeed, there have been many criticisms so far. In its present form, the bill drew some rather sharp remarks from the Ontario bar, as reported in Le Droit for February 2, 1959, and I quote:

> Ontario barristers agreed Saturday that the bill on Canadian civil liberties should be of higher inspiration, and should be "something that will roll off our tongues and that will echo in our classrooms."

Professor Stuart Ryan, of Queen's University, stated that the bill should be written in language "appealing to the hearts of men, while protecting rights and liberties".

The delegates agreed and recommended in a resolution that the federal government transpose the legislation "into words expressing the full nobility of both the French and the English languages."

As it is, the professor stated, the bill of rights is "prosaic, pedestrian and commonplace".

"We want something that can be used to inspire our children, that can be taught in our schools; something that will roll off our tongues and that will echo in our classrooms".

Let us not forget that there are people who support this bill for such opposite reasons that you wonder how they can meet, just as there are people who oppose it for equally different reasons.

Take the case of Nicholas Saloablancas Schatroph, who takes issue with it because, as he says, it is aimed at maintaining in Canada a respect for the minorities. Here is what Mr. Schatroph and like people have to say:

(Text):

Since the obvious purpose of the bill of rights is to fit Canada to the requirements of minorities, let us analyse a minority group to have a better understanding of the subject.

There is no law in this country prohibiting anyone from becoming a part of the majority. Therefore the desire to remain part of a minority is strictly personal and deliberate.

What are the motives behind this choice?

They are entirely matters of prejudice.

(Translation):

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who wants to be a true, dyed-in-the-wool Canadian, resorts to objectionable exaggeration because he fails to understand that, whenever a new Canadian arrives in this country, wherever he comes from, something is added to Canada's cultural heritage, and that the newcomer only adds to the development of his new country as long as he remains himself.

For instance, anywhere in the world, the Irish remain themselves, keeping their songs, their dances, the fighting spirit which is their hall-mark yet they are loyal and generous with regard to their adopted country.

The same is true of the Jewish race, which becomes acclimatized without ever being absorbed. I could quote many instances of people from other countries who brought new wealth to Canada, and to the United States. If that Mr. Schatroph had thought it over even five minutes, he never would have written those lines.

In conclusion, is it not surprising that the same man who waxes quite sentimental about human rights does not seem to consider them here in this parliament? In proof of this, I shall quote part of an article by Mr. Jean-Marc Poliquin, which was published in Le Droit for June 28, 1960.

By so heavy a timetable members of parliament are treated as beasts of burden. Only in factories thriving on sweat labour can similar working conditions be found.

But our M.P.s are not the only ones to suffer from such unreasonable conditions. Hansard editors, interpreters, translators, stenographers, typists, clerks, etc. are driven like slaves. It is unqualified exploitation of the parliamentary staff. The federal government eagerly legislates to promote more humane labour conditions in private industry. But for two and three months a year, they think nothing of riding roughshod over principles that are held sacred by organized labour. But soon we will hear a pathetic plea in favour of a Canadian bill of human rights.

Such inconsistency in our parliament is quite unspeakable.

And what about Bill C-27 which was introduced during this session? I have no intention of dealing with it, as this would be irregular. But, before passing this bill, the government should have disallowed the former. Bill C-27 deprives our citizens of any right provided in this bill with regard to the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Yet, when the bill is passed, that other legislation will still be in our statute books allowing government inspectors to enter premises without a warrant, by day or by night, to question and even to arrest people, whereas the latter are not entitled to appeal to the courts before the inspectors have finished their investigation. Before this bill is enacted, the Prime Minister himself should have rescinded Bill C-27.

Therefore, the Prime Minister ought to do some hard thinking over his own mistakes before offering to solve the problems of others.

May I be permitted a few suggestions, Mr. Speaker? It seems to me that the bill should contain some such sentence as: "Men being equal before God shall likewise be equal before society"; or this "Christ's message: 'love thy neighbour as thyself . . .' must be outwardly expressed towards one and all"; or this: "Life, liberty, security and the possession of property shall therefore be an inalienable right to be respected by all"; or this: "Freedom of religion, of language, of speech, of association, together with freedom of the press, are sacred, natural rights that the parliament of Canada may not hinder"; or this: "Colour, racial origin, religion or sex do not confer inferiority or imply any disadvantage to the human person".

Mr. Speaker, I could suggest many more possible forms.

Even if the Prime Minister wishes to have this legislation passed, in order that human rights may be respected, may I tell him that he will never achieve his end if he does not succeed in giving rise to that feeling of respect in individuals.

In concluding my remarks, I ask him again to set aside the purely legal aspect of this bill and to submit to us something lighter, so that children in our schools may prepare right now to take over the leadership of the Canadian people, steeped in a spirit of true fraternity and charity towards all. Then, it will no longer be necessary for the Prime Minister to present his bill on the 1st of July, Dominion day, Diefenbaker day.

(Text):

Mr. Arthur Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to take only a few minutes of the time of the house this afternoon on Bill No. C-79. While this proposed legislation has been described by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) as ordinary legislation, I do not consider it as such. I therefore recognize that there are unquestionably a great number of my colleagues on both sides of the house who feel some deep responsibility in speaking on what is, I am sure, in the opinion of the Canadian people, the most important piece of legislation that has yet come before this parliament; and I can speak only for the parliament in which I have had some experience.

I think we can understand the unusual sensitivity of the opposition members who have spoken, in particular the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), who have directed at the bill a number of criticisms, some of which I propose to deal with. Those gentlemen, having sat in their seats for so long and having contributed to a government which to some degree ignored some of these liberties or freedoms, now take offence that any government should decide to take action and see that the individual, the little man, is going to be given protection against any bureaucracy, regardless of who may be in power at any given time.

I subscribe to the principle that this legislation cannot be considered in the light of just today. This bill was introduced for a purpose or a time when we Canadians take for granted our fundamental freedoms. This bill was designed to meet the possible alternatives that were open to a government desiring to see that fundamental freedoms were indeed protected. What were those alternatives? The first was to do nothing, to sit back and to assume that abridgement of and encroachment on civil liberties should continue. The second was to attempt to obtain a constitutional amendment by negotiation or discussion with the provinces. The third was to introduce a statute which would at least clean the doorstep of the federal parliament of the responsibility so as to ensure that future encroachment on civil liberties and fundamental freedoms will not occur henceforth.

The criticisms that we have heard to date fall roughly into two categories. The first to which I subscribe is a legitimate and serious criticism, namely the purpose or hope of obtaining a constitutional amendment which in effect would bind provincial legislatures as well as the federal authority.

The second criticism is one that I find hard to grasp. It was dealt with at some length by the Leader of Opposition who on the one hand described the bill as unexciting and unimaginative, and said that its language would not be remembered and that it would not serve as a beacon to the future generations. That criticism was supported by the hon. member for Hull who again at some length described the language used in this bill as unexciting and without any real meaning. We are obliged to ask these gentlemen, I suggest, whether indeed they want an exhibition of literary prose or whether they want a bill which is in fundamental principle going to mean something to the Canadian people. In its concise terms I suggest that the bill can and will be clearly understood and that it should not be cluttered up with a great number of words which are indeed meaningless.

There are two other criticisms and these are supported by a number of witnesses which the Leader of the Opposition introduced into the debate. They are gentlemen who have unquestionably given a great deal of study and thought to the matter, namely university professors and members of the Canadian bar. It is that particular group to which I refer. I think the government of the day took into consideration the views of these gentlemen and that there can be no suggestion that time has not been given for every Canadian to make representation in a similar way inasmuch as this bill was referred over from the last session. I would remind the house that each of these individuals, regardless of the ivory tower from which he speaks, has not the responsibility of piloting a bill through the House of Commons and of working out an agreement with the provinces and therefore, I suggest, has not the same appreciation of this very real difficulty as has a member of the House of Commons.

Let me say a word about the problem of obtaining a constitutional amendment. We in Canada take some pride—and I think rightly so—in the make-up of our ten Canadian provinces and the formation of the constitution of this land. Each province jealously guards its own rights in a manner which is perhaps unique in the world. Because of this fact certain problems are presented to any federal authority. I think all of us even in the House of Commons accept the principle that the rights which were granted to the provinces are those which they indeed should jealously guard. But recognizing as we do the need for a federal statute to give human rights and fundamental freedoms to individuals in Canada, we say that we also accept the responsibility of encouraging and providing leadership to the provinces to introduce their own complementary legislation so that some day we can eventually have an all-embracing law affecting the provincial governments as well as the federal government.

This then, Mr. Speaker, represents the first step, and an extremely important one it is, in this respect. But let us look at the other criticisms that we have had directed at the bill. It is said by the Leader of the Opposition that by defining those rights we may eventually delay an all-embracing law. As to the ordinary man, that person who today will be reading the report of this debate, I suggest that the introduction of this Bill No. C-70 may not necessarily have a direct bearing on his life. He may be unaware of its existence even today. It is significant perhaps that he may not be called upon to ask for redress in the event that any of his fundamental freedoms have been encroached upon. What is important is that the statute will exist. He will have that right of redress. He will therefore be given that protection by this parliament, and unless this action is taken through this bill, these rights will indeed be denied to him. So I suggest that in defining these principles contained in the bill we are in effect safeguarding these fundamental principles.

Then we have heard it said that these rights are inherent in our customs and in our traditions. I think this is basically true, but again I ask the house to look on this legislation not in the light of today, where as I said at the outset we assume or take these liberties purely for granted, but under a circumstance in which a situation can indeed change. The Leader of the Opposition said—I think I am paraphrasing him correctly—that if parliament does indeed need to be reminded of this need for a bill of this nature then we are not in very good shape. The fact of the matter is that parliament does need to be reminded because parliament itself in the past decade has abused these same privileges and freedoms that we are attempting in this bill to protect.

A criticism which hardly seems justified and to which I have made some reference relates to the question of language. When you find hon. members of the opposition repeating the views of a school boy, and while these views have every right to be described in this parliament, when opposition members take the time of the house to describe the inadequacies of the language, you really wonder if they have any basic criticism of the bill at all. I suggest that it has to be concise so that it is going to be clearly understood.

The last point the Leader of the Opposition made, a rather important one, was that he talked of the need for eliminating the War Measures Act. I would not support this suggestion under any circumstances because the War Measures Act is designed to meet a circumstance which is out of the ordinary to say the least, namely an emergency situation where all Canadians are required to give up certain rights so that in the common interest of survival we can continue to work and live. If the provisions of this act were in any way removed it would mean that our basic fundamental freedoms would have little or no meaning whatsoever for we might not live to enjoy them.

A bill of rights, I suggest, is no ordinary legislation. It is not in itself designed as the only remedy for the situation it seeks to meet. It is a document of compromise rather than of precise definition, yet one or more of its inherent defects has characterized nearly every important document in our history. The arguments both pro and con which we are now hearing have been heard before when breaking some new ground. If we enact our bill of rights it will be the first in our history as a democracy under a federal system.

This poses some special problems. They are far less difficult than the problems which have already been met and will continue to be met under similar circumstances. It may prove to be that we are contemplating here just the first step. To the extent that this is so it will be subject to the criticism of those who view the matter from a purely academic or idealist point of view. Even the United States bill of rights, which is far more detailed and specific than our own was so criticized for many years.

It is not surprising, nor is it I suggest necessarily regrettable, that there are these constitutional problems to which I have made some reference. Surely if by introducing a federal statute or taking this first step we can then encourage those provinces to come with us by introducing complementary legislation, we can thus achieve those same objectives which the Leader of the Opposition spoke of at some length. A statutory bill of rights does no more than keep the spotlight continually on the encroachment process. It would in my opinion more than justify its existence on the statute books.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in our parliamentary system we have the process that on third reading, at the end of the debate, we assess the views of those members of the house in order to determine the outcome of such a measure through the use of the simple vote, and I suggest that when the vote is passed here we will be separating in effect the men from the boys when we decide who is in support of basic rights and fundamental freedoms and who is not.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether any bill has ever been presented to parliament more eloquently than this one was presented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) last Friday. Nor do I think that a better case has ever been made out for the inadequacy of this measure than that which was so effectively portrayed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), notwithstanding the fact that we are all in agreement with the intent of the bill.

The government's desire to enact a bill of rights further to guarantee the liberty of the individual is indeed commendable. There can hardly be too many safeguards against officious persons, guardians of the law and others who may enjoy pushing people around. But the greatest danger does not come from those who enjoy pushing others around; it comes from the well intentioned official who thinks he knows best what people ought to have regardless of what they want and are willing to pay for.

The man or woman who suffers injustice at the hands of government agencies appears to be at once at a disadvantage. An example to which I wish to refer is the case of a restaurant owner in the Toronto area who was refused the renewal of his licence to operate his restaurant because women of easy virtue and others of unsavory reputation were served in his establishment. I suppose that if this eating place was located next to the stock exchange or a bank it would probably draw a different type of customer. The denial of the renewal of this man's licence is rank discrimination.

Will this bill guarantee the operator of a restaurant, some of whose clients may be hoodlums or prostitutes, the right to operate an eating establishment when he has committed no offence except that of having served possible law breakers? I submit that this bill in its present form appears to be merely a prestige piece rather than an all out effort to secure certain safeguards for our people.

A brief presented to the Prime Minister on April 29, 1959 by a number of organizations, after enumerating a number of individual rights, contained this paragraph:

> Finally it is felt if the act is to be truly effective it must provide legal protection for the individual in cases where his rights or freedoms are violated. The very nature of a right or freedom contemplates that to exist it must be respected and therefore enforced. An act which did not provide any remedy to a person whose rights or freedoms were attacked would serve little purpose and be of little practical value.

Will this bill be a real safeguard to former inmates of prisons, who having paid their debt to society at the expense of their freedom are still being discriminated against, their terms in jail being used as a club over their heads? A former inmate is unable to obtain a bond such as it would be necessary for him to have in order to find employment in a warehouse or even as a truck driver. A good bill of rights would contain a clause designed to protect individuals against such discrimination.

The traditions of rights, privileges and responsibilities which we inherit from the framers of our constitution are, by the nature of our own way of life, as essentially our guide and protection as is the British North America Act itself. Those positive elements which ensure the fair treatment of almost everyone are as much a portion of our own heritage as is even Magna Carta. The treaty of Paris, the British North America Act and our own traditions since 1867 ensure the protection of individual rights and privileges. But even these do not give positive and complete assurance. If the government really wants to do something more substantial than make a general declaration it should consider establishing something like the public petition committee which has enjoyed such success in New Zealand.

In the New Zealand parliament there are very interesting administrative procedures for processing petitions of grievance that may arise as a result of administrative decisions or actions. Would this present bill provide guarantees, for example, to the rights enjoyed by any ordinary citizen or to an illegitimate person? I have in mind the case of an illegitimate son in New Zealand. His father had committed an indiscretion in his youth resulting in this boy being born. The son later moved to England where he was a resident when his natural father died without leaving a will and without a legal heir. The son, who had never been legally adopted, tried to claim his father's estate, but New Zealand law prohibited illegitimate children who had not been adopted from receiving benefits not granted in a will.

The son petitioned parliament, and the public petitions committee which investigated the case recommended that the son be allowed to take possession of his father's estate. The government accepted the recommendation, though to do so meant ignoring an indisputable provision of New Zealand estate law. The issue was not subsequently contested in the courts, so the son, as far as I know, is now in possession of the property which had been his father's.

This is an example of a true heir, not legally adopted, being granted his petition to take possession of his bequest despite a legal oversight. In this instance an indisputable legal provision was boldly ignored in order to remedy a genuine injustice.

I suggest the establishment of an effective public petitions committee similar to that which has been set up in New Zealand. Perhaps such a committee could be established in the other place; no more trustworthy agency to discharge the duties of such a committee could be found than that august body, the Canadian Senate.

It is true that for many years the Prime Minister has been advocating some procedure which would make the rights of individuals more secure. For example, in 1945, as recorded on page 2460 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman had this to say, speaking on the national emergency bill.

> If we are going to delegate this absolute power that will make of this parliament for a period of one year a phantom, legislatively speaking, let there be a provision in this bill, as there is in Great Britain:
> "and every order in council... shall be laid before parliament... and if either house... resolves that it be annulled, it shall cease to have effect..."

The present Prime Minister then asked: "Why have we not done that here?" Then he proceeded to say:

> There is another control in the United Kingdom. The house of lords has set up a committee to review all these orders in council. I think the time has come when possibly the other place might well consider—and I say this with great deference—looking over and considering the mass of orders in council, this march of legislative enactments over a period of years. They should be examined so that it could be ascertained which of these orders in council impinge and infringe upon private rights and are unnecessary.
> Can there be any objection to that? That committee would have before it the controllers and other officials who could come marching with their orders in council which they are asking us to perpetuate for a period of another year and possibly more. Great Britain protects the right of parliament by providing that orders in council may be set aside after being submitted to the scrutiny and examination of parliament. Do that, and those who desire to perpetuate themselves in office under order in council legislation will be placed on the defensive.

Then the right hon. gentleman said that when laws that are to be passed will affect every phase of the economic life of the country as well as our national life—laws which also deal with nationality and deportation—there should be safeguards. He added:

> Let us retain in parliament, with the coming of peace, the right to legislate. If that is given up, let us know how it is being exercised. Let us act, if I may use the expression, as the police of the regulations that are enacted.

Again, the Prime Minister speaking on the debate on the address in 1949, as reported on page 147, made the following suggestions:

> I should like to make a suggestion which would give an opportunity for service to the new members who have a feeling of frustration because of their inability to find anything to do. I should like to see a committee of parliament set up, that would examine delegated authority—in other words, a committee on ministerial powers. At the moment I am not criticising the principle of delegated power, but if it is carried too far it is a denial of the democratic system of government.
> Delegated legislative power results from the technical nature of most legislation and the difficulties involved in legislating to meet complex conditions. In the United Kingdom it has been found necessary to set up a committee in this regard, and I should like to see a similar committee appointed by this house.
> Such a committee would report to the house from time to time on all orders in council passed where there is a matter of principle in issue and where the question of delegated power arises. Where legislative power is conferred, the committee would make the necessary criticisms of orders passed by civil servants under the powers granted by legislation enacted by parliament. Members of the house would be given an opportunity to serve. There should be no difficulty about the government having a majority in the committee. Its members would be charged with noting any breaches of parliamentary privileges and democratic rights; in fact, in orders in council it would be a watchdog in the preservation of our democratic rights.

The Prime Minister lauded, and properly so, the usefulness of British parliamentary scrutiny committees. I might add that the Australian senate has a scrutiny committee too, the efforts of which have been crowned by surprising successes in protecting the rights and freedoms of Australians from enlisted airmen to importers. One of the new members of the commonwealth, India, also has an effective scrutiny committee in the lower house which operates under terms of reference similar to those of the British house of commons committee.

Surely it is time that the Canadian parliament caught up with developments in younger parliaments. What would be the position of this government in relation to the bill of rights if confronted by a petition of a citizen against the abuses of some ministerial discretion, such as we have in the Immigration Act, or abuses of some departmental power in connection with an import or export regulation?

In Denmark they have a parliamentary commissioner whose duties are to supervise and investigate any possible abuses of administrative powers. His functions are similar to the New Zealand petitions committee.

Much of our federal legislation containing features of a prejudicial nature such as the detention provisions under the War Measures Act should be amended which would perhaps be more effective than the mere declaration of rights.

The passing of this bill in its present form, which in essence simply highlights certain parts of the legislation, does not ensure that no injustice will be perpetrated. In fact, it does no more than provide one more reference for the establishment of justice and that is not a new or really different one. In clause 2 of the bill it is stated, and I quote:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
> (b) the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex;
> (c) freedom of religion;
> (d) freedom of speech;
> (e) freedom of assembly and association; and

There is also the implication of provincial jurisdiction it is true, but the Prime Minister has made it clear that this bill will not infringe in any area of purely provincial jurisdiction.

I have heard, however, from a source close to the legal profession that it is a fairly widely held opinion in those ranks that such loosely phrased provisions as "freedom of speech" and "freedom of assembly" without qualification may open up possibilities for litigation and that the greatest benefits, financial and others, will accrue in most cases not to the ordinary person but rather to the lawyers themselves. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not a lawyer, so I will leave further analysis of this problem—and I see it from the layman's point of view as a serious one—to hon. members trained in the law. I am sure you will agree with me when I say that this house has an impressive array of these.

The bill is merely declaratory and does not create new rights. That being so, I am disappointed that it does not contain a declaration couched in words such as those of which the Prime Minister is preeminently capable, or in language that would inspire, something that every school child would memorize as the people of the United States memorize passages of the declaration of independence. I should like to quote directly from that declaration:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness:—That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed—

The declaration of independence of the United States concludes with this inspiring pledge:

> And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honour.

It is not too late to include a similar preamble with which to adorn the rights of man. In time such a declaration in memorable English prose, possibly in Churchillian style, could provide the basis of a genuine political guarantee or the basis for an agreement to amend the British North America Act to provide therein a true bill of rights.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of the bill of rights, Bill No. C-79, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) gives rise to a consideration of a number of fundamental problems the effect of which is not easy to codify or state in precise terms. We become suspicious that perhaps those making the request that these should be more precisely defined have not given full consideration to the implications of such a bill. For instance, the bill gives rise to a discussion of the principle of the supremacy of parliament versus the supremacy of the rule of law.

Under some other constitutions, including that of the United States the legislative bodies cannot change certain aspects of the constitution. In approaching the question of the introduction of this bill we must decide in our minds whether we are to follow the historic practice of our parliamentary institution in making it supreme or depart from this practice and include certain matters under the rule of law. I will come to discuss that more fully later.

The introduction of this bill also gives rise to the problem of the method of amendment of the British North America Act. During the course of this debate many have suggested that they agree with the principles of the bill but feel that we are making a mistake in not making this bill a part of our constitution by amendment to the British North America Act. I and many other Canadians are ashamed of the fact that at this date in our history we have not evolved a method of amending the British North America Act as regards the rights of the provinces and of the dominion.

I was very pleased to hear our Prime Minister say at the beginning of the session that he was giving some consideration to this problem. Most of us must reluctantly consider that it is because of our lack of initiative that we have not come to any conclusion on a method up to the present time. Therefore, I suggest that perhaps it might be unwise if we tried to solve two problems at this time even if a method of amending the constitution would serve the purpose better than this bill of rights. We must wait until we have solved the first problem before we consider whether it should be our method of enacting a bill of rights at the present time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely not as far as political freedoms are concerned.

Mr. Morton: The hon. member has raised that question, Mr. Speaker. In the course of my remarks I hope to discuss the question, but among our judiciary there are some differences as to what are civil liberties and what are civil rights. I will discuss that. If we had that clearly defined I would agree with the hon. member.

The other problem which is brought up is the matter of civil rights versus civil liberties. What are civil rights and what are civil liberties? Perhaps I might go into that question now. In the discussion of our constitutional problems our courts have shown a tendency to separate some of the things that might once have been considered matters of civil rights; they may be matters of civil liberties and thus, shall I say, extend the power of the dominion government. In the Canadian Bar Review of March, 1959, Professor Maxwell Cohen, at page 231, said:

> Broadly speaking, I am of the opinion that so far as the constitutional aspect is concerned, many matters considered heretofore to have been within the field of "civil rights", strictly so-called,—

And he is referring to the bill of rights. I continue:

> —and therefore often within jurisdiction of the provinces, may now appear on closer examination to be matters of the broadest public policy and of national concern. That this is so already emerges from the line of decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Saumur, Switzman and Roncarelli cases, among others, where it may be said a re-examination of the nature of Canadian civil liberties has been taking place. Moreover, both federal and provincial legislation already reflect the provisions of the charter dealing with human rights on such questions as "fair employment" and "fair accommodation" practices.

However, when we read the article of Professor Bora Laskin, Q.C., in the same edition at page 116, in referring to the Saumur versus Quebec and the Attorney General of Quebec case we find the following:

> Saumur versus Quebec and Attorney General of Quebec is the only case which may properly be regarded as giving any support to the contention for provincial power over the political freedoms, and it was the judgment of a badly split court.

> Moreover, the course of decision before and after Saumur is quite inconsistent with the views of those members of the nine-judge court who held that the political freedoms were within provincial competence. In truth, the Saumur case presented no clear majority view on exclusive power to legislate in relation to civil liberties. Three members of the court were of the firm opinion that freedom of religion was within section 92 (13) as a "civil right in the province". Four members of the court were of opinion that it was not within provincial competence; and of these four, two concluded that federal power was exclusive. The remaining two justices were unwilling to say that exclusiveness resided in either province or dominion; either might deal with the political freedoms in certain respects.

I give this quotation to show that there is no clear-cut decision on the part of our courts saying what are civil liberties and what are civil rights and, therefore, this is a matter that has to be decided.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about the Boucher case?

Mr. Morton: It adds to the jurisprudence of the country but in all fairness I say we cannot say specifically what the boundaries are, what are civil liberties and what are civil rights.

In passing, I would say that the right of the individuals to develop their individuality is also involved in such a bill as the one before the house. As I interpret it, the bill provides that parliament itself shall have more control and closer supervision, over the acts of the executive part of our government. We cannot avoid nor ignore the important role which our courts are to play in respect of this legislation. If this legislation itself were to be the sole definition of what is to happen, then I think you would have to look into it and get a clear codification of what it sets out to do. But carrying on with our common law tendencies and the practice of jurisprudence we know that this bill will be a declaration which will be interwoven into and added to the common law that already exists on this subject matter.

Mr. Speaker, may I just briefly bring the matter into focus by reviewing the principles involved. Starting with early English history, from which our common law has evolved, there were many struggles for freedom and greater security of the individual. In 1100 Henry I set out a charter of liberties. In 1215 under King John the Magna Carta was signed. Then during the reign of Charles I there were petitions of right. During that time there was a struggle to eliminate the absolute power of the sovereign, a struggle to set up the rule of law, or the supremacy of law, and to bind the ruling monarch to rules and regulations which might apply also to subjects. This struggle having been won, there followed a movement away from the rule of law. From 1688 onward in England parliament itself took unto itself all the absolute powers of the monarch and parliament became supreme.

Of course throughout the development of history we have had these great petitions, these declarations which were part and parcel of the everday law. Parliament itself, during this period which followed, had the power to rescind all these declarations if it so desired. However, as I stated earlier we find that when the people of the United States came to consider their constitution they set out certain things which they felt their legislative bodies should not consider. Now in Canada if we were to add together the powers of the provinces and of the dominion we would still find that although the principle of the supremacy of parliament is retained by the combination of the provincial and federal legislative bodies, there is no supreme parliament in Canada. In effect, through this division of powers we have a form of the bill of rights or a guarantee of rights. It is in this situation that we have brought before us the measure which we are discussing today.

Perhaps, as a reminder, we ought to look at section 89 of Magna Carta, to which reference has been made, the great charter of liberty in our system. Section 89 says:

> No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned or deseised from his free tenant or from his liberties or from his free customs, nor shall he be outlawed nor exiled nor in any way destroyed, nor shall we go on him nor shall we set against him, unless by the legal judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

One might think that this would be all-inclusive, but if we know the history of feudalism we know that there was no guarantee of rights to the serfs who worked for the freemen. The only guarantee of rights was for the landed gentry against the monarch. The charter did not grant right to every individual within the state. However, as a result of that declaration a basic principle of our jurisprudence has been established and has been extended so that today all individuals within England have the same rights. If we were to take that charter in its original form we could have a great discussion on its inadequacy but as a result of that declaration we have the heritage that we have today.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with these things in mind I believe we should consider what would be the best method of making a declaration here in Canada, something which has not yet been done. As has been stated, we could have a constitutional amendment which would cover provincial matters. For reasons which I have stated before, I do not feel that is a practical method at this moment. As a matter of fact, I feel it would be presumptuous and unfair for us to ask the parliament of the United Kingdom to pass a bill of this sort. It would reveal our inadequacy and the fact that we are unable to make the amendment ourselves. We would be asking the United Kingdom parliament to decide something for us. It is true that we can petition for it and it would be a sort of automatic process, but in principle I feel it would be wrong to have such important principles which affect all Canadians declared and passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom.

The other method would be to enact a constitutional amendment that would affect the powers of the Dominion of Canada and urge the provinces to pass complementary legislation. Mr. Justice Locke seems to consider there is some difference between a constitutional amendment by the dominion government and a statutory enactment but, in effect, I think they are both the same. It makes no great difference under the present circumstances whether we proceed by a statutory enactment of the parliament of Canada or by way of an amendment affecting the powers of the Canadian parliament. I feel that this is a first step, and the only step we can take at the present time. I would urge hon. members, therefore, that we follow this procedure.

Certain criticisms have been directed to the fact that the bill has been introduced in the dying moments of the session. I should like to remind the house, just as the hon. member for Calgary-South (Mr. Smith) did, that this matter has been discussed for many years in this house, even before many of us came to this parliament. It has been discussed by the Canadian Bar Association and many articles have been written about it. Hon. members, if they wish, could look at the issue of the Canadian Bar Review for March, 1959, which was devoted almost entirely to a discussion of this bill. The question of a bill of rights has been discussed at two Canadian bar conventions. I had the privilege of being present last year when it was discussed in Vancouver, and the consensus was that the principle of the bill was good. Of course, lawyers do not agree on the wording of any act and there was a discussion as to that. However, I believe the spirit of the act was agreed upon. The bar association felt that the Canadian parliament would be justified in passing such an act.

I know that hon. members of the official opposition have directed criticisms against this bill, and I feel it is proper that they should. We cannot believe that they think any less of freedom and the rights of individuals, which this bill sets out to protect, but possibly they are thinking more of their historical reputation in this country. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) has discussed economic rights and said perhaps they should be included in such a bill. Without discussing whether they should or should not I would say that that is a field that is difficult to define. Economic rights are becoming more and more a part of various statutes of this land.

I, for one, would rather hesitate to say now what should or should not be included in such a bill. Perhaps the hon. member recalls the example of the wording in Saskatchewan when the original act, as I understand it, contained the phrase "the right to work". This phrase sounds very innocent, but it was found that if it were fully implemented it would run counter to certain union policies so the act had to be amended.

Mr. Argue: What they want is the right to a job, an opportunity to work.

Mr. Morton: I can only observe, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot guarantee jobs by statute.

Mr. Argue: Not with the Tory party.

Mr. Morton: Not with any party; this must depend upon the actions of the government and the initiative of the individual. I know the hon. member is of the school of thought that thinks that all things that are done in this country should be done by the government pulling the strings. I think we should develop the idea of self-reliance of the individual.

Mr. Argue: Tell that to the unemployed.

Mr. Morton: We are not in a discussion of the unemployed; we are talking about the bill of rights. If these rights are adhered to, individuals will be given the right to exercise their initiative in developing this country as it should be developed.

Mr. McCleave: Down with Marxism.

Mr. Argue: Don't whisper to Hansard. Let us all in on it.

Mr. Morton: In conclusion I should like to reiterate some of the remarks that have been made by some other hon. gentlemen in this house. Perhaps I can make some comment on the War Measures Act which has been mentioned. Perhaps the War Measures Act does nullify, especially with regard to citizenship, certain things that should be guaranteed in the bill of rights. I would suggest that we review again the War Measures Act in order to eliminate what can be eliminated of those features of it which are objectionable rather than try to spell out in detail such things in the bill of rights.

One of the effects of the passing of this act, in my opinion, should be that it will require parliament to give second thought to its legislative program having regard to its effect on the individuals within the country. I think that is a great step forward. Too often not only the various legislative bodies in their acts but of executives and even senior level civil servants in their declarations have, because of the expediency of the moment and the urgency of the problem forgotten their long reaching implication and effect on the rights of the individual.

We can pass this bill and put it on the statutes, Mr. Speaker, but I think those of us who have witnessed the experiences in Europe know that a statute is not enough if the spirit of freedom and of the consideration of rights does not live in the hearts of our people. No statute in itself is a guarantee of those freedoms. Whether there be a constitutional amendment or a statute nothing will stop the growth of tyranny or of totalitarian states if the people are not willing to fight and to protect their freedom, as witnessed by the advance of nazism in Germany prior to the second world war and of communism today in Europe. If our people are indifferent to the actions of their government and fail to exercise their vote or if they carry on their daily activities without regard for the rights or desires of their neighbours, no statute can alone maintain the vital rights in our democracy. As it was necessary to unite Canada in the early days by rails of steel it is now necessary, because of our expanding population from many origins, to have a common declaration of rights applicable to all and understood by all, in order to unite us from coast to coast in the defence of our democratic system and in the practice of those principles which will give the maximum security and happiness to our people.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we have had the privilege of hearing from the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith). As I recall his words, the hon. member said that in his opinion the people of Canada feel that the bill we are now discussing is the most important one to come before this house at this session. I wish it were possible to agree with that contention but I do not think I can do so. I do not believe the average member of the general public of Canada knows the import or the implication of this bill or how it will or will not have an effect on his daily life, responsibilities, freedoms and liberties.

We also heard from another worthy member on the government side—and I think

I am right in saying that—the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Martineau), who said in his speech that this bill was a beacon, if I remember his words correctly, to the people of Canada in the outlining of liberties and freedoms. That too is a statement that I wish were completely correct, but once again I am obliged to disagree because the bill is not a beacon. It is a fizzling squib. I want to say that I am most disappointed that I must stand in my place and make those two views known on those two statements.

I am bitterly disappointed in this statute. I am disappointed because in the seven years that I have been here I have followed closely the statements made by the hon. member who is now the Prime Minister of Canada on this matter of a bill of rights. Not only have I followed closely all he has had to say in this house but I have read with interest the reports of his speeches outside of this House of Commons and I have read with a great deal of interest his views and opinions before I came here as a member of this august body. May I say quite honestly and most sincerely, Mr. Speaker, that the high principles and the high motives which I heard expressed by the present Prime Minister make this bill completely unworthy of him. I expected something different, something more vital and more concrete, in order to guarantee to the people of Canada their rights and their liberties.

I have always been greatly disappointed over the fact that when the declaration of human rights was being considered the Canadian representative had found it necessary or expedient to abstain from voting on some occasions and that, although endorsing the principle, Canada by statute has never taken any action on it. Some mention was made of that during this debate. It is quite interesting to note that some of the same reasons expressed today are exactly the same as were expressed when the universal declaration of human rights was being considered. I have here the booklet entitled "Human rights: a program guide for group and community action", and on page 12 it says:

> During the framing of the declaration of human rights Canada at times found herself in an awkward position. Our representative considered himself forced to abstain from voting when some of the articles in the draft convention were adopted. This was because the matters under discussion fell within the responsibility of the provinces and not of the government at Ottawa. A large part of the declaration concerns itself with the social securities and with employment—> —areas which are substantially within the jurisdiction of the provincial governments.

I draw that to the attention of the previous speaker.

Mr. Speaker, that was several years ago and I know drew the attention and the interest of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). It was our hope in this group that over the years the Prime Minister in introducing a bill of rights would have found the method or perhaps a policy or plan whereby it would be possible in this country to adopt and to maintain from coast to coast within all jurisdictions a bill of rights. But it is apparent that that is not to be.

As I said, I was disappointed in that this bill in my opinion is unworthy of the high motives and principles which have been expressed by the Prime Minister in the past. On page 16 of this pamphlet on human rights I quote the Prime Minister as follows:

> In 1958 in Winnipeg, Mr. Diefenbaker announced his government's intention to institute a bill of rights for Canadians which recalled his previous statement on the subject in Winnipeg on February 8, 1947.

Then it quotes the statement:

> When the British North America Act was passed, the fundamental freedoms of Magna Carta and the (British) bill of rights were believed to be so firmly embedded in our constitutional development that they would never be infringed. For that reason they were not included in the British North America Act. But changing conditions have shown that freedom cannot be static. To be preserved it must be practised—

On another occasion the Prime Minister said:

> What would a bill of rights do? It would establish the right of the individual to go into the courts of this country, thereby assuring the preservation of his freedom. These great traditional rights are merely pious ejaculations unless the individual has the right to assert them in the courts of law.

I would like to bring this back to the memory of the Prime Minister. He said:

> At present, the individual's rights are maintained only at the caprice of the government of the day.

In trying to be honest and in being most sincere does the Prime Minister remember the statement that "These great traditional rights are merely pious ejaculations unless the individual has the right to assert them", and "the individual's rights are maintained only at the caprice of the government of the day"?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Unless he has recourse to the courts, and that is provided for in clause 3.

Mr. Winch: And I presume that means all of Canada. I also presume that the Prime Minister said that the individual's rights are maintained only at the caprice of the government of the day.

I presume the Prime Minister objected to the individual's rights being at the caprice of the government of the day, and wherein do we differ now with the introduction of the bill now before us which, as I understand it, is something which is strictly at the caprice of the government of the day. I understand that a government cannot do anything which will supersede any act of any other parliament and therefore with a majority of one it is at the caprice of the government of the day. I gather not only from the statement I have quoted but from previous pronouncements of the Prime Minister over the years that he wanted a bill of rights which was not at the caprice of one individual, one government or any particular parliament.

I was most interested in the remarks of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton), because he did bring in some mention of the attitude as he understood it of Canadians on this matter and he also brought in the ancient declarations of liberty. When this bill was originally introduced a year ago I did considerable work in preparation anticipating it might come up at the last session of parliament. I still have in front of me some of my preparatory work and I cannot see any great reason for changing the opinions I formed at that time. Following what the previous speaker said, I also say that I feel that quite often Canadians are much too complacent about their heritage of freedom and they tend to take their civil liberties for granted. I also say that from my own point of view I feel there is no room for complacency in Canada. Freedoms of which we are wont to boast, and therefore to feel proud about, are not as secure as many are led to believe; nor are they as secure as they should be.

I do feel that we have to bear in mind that the freedoms that we think we have have been infringed upon in the past, and when they have been infringed upon the necessary steps to remedy these breaches of freedom have often taken a good many years to come about. As the previous speaker said, there are certain great declarations of liberty. As he mentioned, we had the Magna Carta of 1215; we had the habeas corpus act of 1679; we had the bill of rights of 1689. But they do not bind our parliament, the parliament of Canada, any more than they do the British parliament.

The reason for that is that federal and provincial parliaments are supreme within their own spheres of jurisdiction as outlined in the British North America Act and no citizen and no court can challenge that jurisdiction. Admittedly there are certain spheres of rights which are protected by special clauses, but many to the best of my knowledge have no protection in what we might call a Canadian constitution whatsoever. I refer to two clauses guaranteeing freedom of speech, freedom of association, freedom of the press and freedom of religion. These freedoms sprang from the instincts of the people and their basis was public opinion or tradition or special acts of parliament.

So this does show that they may arise in the absence of constitutional provision. Because this question is of such importance I want to give a résumé of legislative interference with freedom. I have these examples listed here because they were prepared when the bill was first introduced. After the Winnipeg strike in 1919 the parliament of Canada passed an immigration act authorizing the deportation of certain aliens without trial and interfering with the freedom of association. The measure was finally repealed, but not until 1936.

Hon. members will recall that in 1946 there was the spy investigation in the course of which suspected persons were seized, denied counsel, held incommunicado and interrogated by commissioners before a charge was ever laid. This was done by order in council P.C. 644 passed on October 6, 1945 and revoked in April, 1946.

Then again, when Japan entered the war, thousands of Japanese—Canadians born in Canada—were seized from their homes and deported to camps in the interior of British Columbia and elsewhere after their property had been seized. They were not permitted to return to their homes until 1949.

Then, of course, Your Honour, being a lawyer, will know about the Expropriation Act of 1952 under which a person's property can be taken away from him without his leave or without even informing him of what is being done, merely by filing a description of the property in the appropriate registry office. I am told by those who are versed in the law that this is perhaps the most arbitrary procedure for expropriating property for public purposes that exists in the whole of the civilized world. I am told by those who are versed in the law that that is correct.

Then who needs to be reminded that in 1937 the province of Quebec passed the iniquitous padlock act, and it was not until 20 years later that it was declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada. Under that act the attorney general of that province was given power to padlock the premises of any person suspected of promulgating communism or bolshevism. The power was altogether arbitrary, and no definition of the offence needed to be made because in the act there was no definition of what constituted communism or bolshevism. Even today in Alberta there is a statute on the books of that province restricting the right of Hutterite colonies to purchase land. They cannot purchase land within 40 miles of an existing settlement, and the land which they so purchase cannot exceed 6,400 acres, half of which must be cultivated and must have been for sale on the open market at least 90 days before a Hutterite colony can purchase it. I mention these things to show how by legislation, both provincial and federal, it has been possible in the past to abrogate what I am certain the Prime Minister believes should be the rights, freedoms and liberty of all the people of Canada. That is still possible at the present time.

As has already been pointed out by previous speakers, there are two ways in which a bill of rights could be given the force of law. First, it could be written into the British North America Act as an amendment or, second, it could be enacted by the Canadian parliament as a solemn statute. It is the second method which the Prime Minister has chosen inasmuch as he has introduced this session the bill which is now before us. I believe, as do the others in this group, that this second method is not going to bring about the results which we have always felt the Prime Minister has in mind.

There are without doubt a number of high-sounding principles in the bill, but because it is a bill of this parliament alone which is, to use the words of the Prime Minister, subject to the caprice of any succeeding parliament, it is bound to have serious limitations. It is not binding upon any provincial legislatures or any municipality because it is just a bill of this parliament, and it is not binding on any individual in Canada in so far as its expression of principle is concerned because there is no provision for enforcing it in principle even as far as the parliament of Canada itself is concerned. I do not know how you are going to enforce a bill which has no penalties attached to it.

This is, actually, a directive to the people of Canada as to how we feel they should carry on in a social and moral way. A bill of rights, to have any profound significance, can only be one that is embodied in the constitution; one that is agreed to by all the jurisdictional and parliamentary bodies in Canada. If the introduction of the present bill is a move to try to educate the people—an indirect request to the provinces that they should follow in a similar direction with regard to their own jurisdiction—then from that point of view the measure may be of some benefit. But in view of the fight carried on by the Prime Minister in the past, and the statements he has made both while in opposition and as leader of the government both here and outside the house in speeches from the Pacific to the Atlantic, we did expect more than a bill of wishful thinking and window dressing. I know that when I heard the Prime Minister indicate from his place the other day that this bill was to be introduced on Dominion day I hoped that it would be non-political, not an emotional appeal based on expediency but a bill of power and vitality, a bill of understanding and strength so that when it was introduced on Dominion day it might make a real impact with regard to guaranteeing freedom and liberty in Canada.

I can only repeat that my disappointment has been very keen. The bill was not introduced in January but has been brought before us in the concluding days of this session. There have been months of study, analysis and correction since its introduction. This indicates that the Prime Minister must have found himself on a hook and did not know how to get off. I know that the hon. gentleman must feel badly that the content of this bill stacks up so poorly with what he has said in the past about a bill of this nature.

We in this group are constructive, sympathetic and co-operative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Let us not overdo it.

Mr. Lambert: The halo hangs heavy.

Mr. Winch: We want to help the Prime Minister. To the extent we can we wish to contribute to a real bill of rights that will have an impact and be enforceable. As the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) said, it is impossible to pick up a newspaper in Canada from year to year without reading of people being discriminated against in hotels, restaurants and elsewhere.

Mr. McCleave: And in the House of Commons when it is considering divorce bills.

Mr. Winch: Yes, one reads about such events every year in Ontario and unfortunately you read about such events in British Columbia too. Mostly, however, these things occur in Ontario. I will not discriminate in making this reference because this is just one country. This bill gives no power over situations of this kind. Our immigration policies are outmoded and permit discrimination on the basis of colour although we are all members of the British commonwealth. I do not know to what extent this bill can meet the situation. I speak for myself but I think I am right in saying that the Prime Minister must feel dissatisfied with his bill. It is not the guarantee that is required. The hon. gentleman must recognize that such a guarantee can be provided only by amendment to the constitution.

The Prime Minister must have been irritated with me the other day because he went back 17 years to find something I said. If he had been present on that occasion he would have known exactly what was meant. I was talking about the need to bring the British North America Act back to Canada so we would have control of our own constitution in Canada and so it could be brought up to date to meet the changing requirements of the times. I have the record if the hon. gentleman wishes to examine it.

The Prime Minister in introducing this bill has revealed what he has in his heart and mind. The hon. gentleman should now go further and bring in a bill that is more cogent and that is enforceable. Because of the inadequacy of this measure I propose to introduce an amendment designed to help the Prime Minister. Strange as it may seem I am really trying to help the hon. gentleman. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier):

That this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that the provinces should be consulted in order to ascertain whether agreement can be reached on the terms of a constitutional amendment to guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Mr. Speaker: If no hon. member wishes to raise any question about this amendment I will place it before the house.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, in a day and age when many peoples of the world cannot take human rights and fundamental freedoms for granted this bill represents a landmark in what we might refer to as the field of human rights. Hon. members know that although we enact written legislation in this and other fields it is the spirit of this type of legislation which is of more importance. Already in this house reference has been made to the fact that many countries that have very fine documentation outlining the basic tenets of human rights do not in fact enjoy them.

In listening to the hon. member who preceded me I concluded that he outlined the fact that a C.C.F. government would incorporate in written legislation many things with which I personally could not agree. I am sure that a Conservative administration could not agree either with some of the things the hon. gentleman suggested should be included in written legislation. With respect to the economic aspects of this legislation particularly, the hon. gentleman attempted to assert the fact that we should incorporate in written legislation many things which I do not feel lend themselves easily to the written approach.

The hon. member spoke in general terms of building by legislation and other actions toward that degree of human rights which should be enjoyed by all the Canadian people. I merely put this question to the house. Does not the legislation we are considering at the present time, as the Prime Minister has already enunciated, represent a real step toward the attainment of the condition which the hon. gentleman described in general and forceful terms?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member will forgive me for interrupting him but to my mind the main question has been superseded by this amendment and attention should now be given to the principle of the amendment which is a contrary principle to the bill. Perhaps the hon. member would prefer to defer his remarks until disposition of the amendment has been made, if he wishes to discuss the principle of the bill itself. May I read the amendment again:

That this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that the provinces should be consulted in order to ascertain whether agreement can be reached on the terms of a constitutional amendment to guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I would think that in the interests of orderly debate that question should be debated and disposed of before members return to the principles of the bill.

Mr. Argue: On the point that you have raised, it is a well-known practice in this house that a motion and an amendment are considered at the same time. It has not been the practice formerly at any rate to endeavour to restrict the debate to an amendment to a given motion that may be before the house. I think this is unduly restrictive. I have no particular axe to grind. The debate has now been going on in the house for a few hours; but I do feel it is unnecessary and an undue restriction of the debate that after an amendment is moved there should be a narrow or a narrower interpretation of what can be discussed at that time. After all, the motion before the house is that the bill be read a second time. An amendment has been moved, as provided for by the rules of the house. In my memory here it has not been the practice to endeavour to restrict speeches to the particular wording or the particular subject of the amendment.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the same reservation may I refer Your Honour to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, citation 201, at page 168. In referring to amendments to a motion it says:

> In that case the debate that follows is not restricted to the amendment, but includes the motives of the amendment and of the motion, both matters being under the consideration of the house as alternative propositions.

If the amendment that has been moved is an amendment, then I would think it would be in order to discuss it as an alternative. On the other hand, if it goes further and is merely a negative motion then, of course, it may be out of order. If it is merely an amendment, then I would think it is in order to discuss the main motion under this principle.

Mr. Pearson: I take it you have accepted this as an amendment, and not as a motion negativing the main motion, which would make it out of order. Because of the rule which has just been cited I would hope that the hon. member who has the floor could be permitted to speak on the main motion and amendment. The two are so closely related to each other that if the amendment has to be disposed of before the motion can be debated again it seems to me it would be really unrealistic. I would hope that the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi could be permitted to speak on the main motion and on the amendment, if he so desired, at the same time.

Mr. Speaker: What has been said is quite true if the amendment is simply an amendment of the motion varying it in some degree; but this is not an amendment of the motion; this is asserting a contrary principle on the basis of the motion that the bill be not now read a second time. It is not simply a negative; it is a negative associated with a principle contrary to the principle of the bill, and to my mind the two are quite dissociated and distinct propositions. However, I do not propose to thrust my views on the house. Apparently the house is quite content to have the matter debated as one motion, and I therefore withdraw the objection which I took on the basis that the house gives its leave to vary its procedure, notwithstanding that I consider it not strictly in accordance with proper practice.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, up to now it seems to me that perhaps the crux of this debate is certainly that one of the centrifugal arguments revolves around the fact of whether this particular type of legislation should be introduced by way of a constitutional amendment or not. With that thought in mind and arguing for the passage of this bill as it is I hope I can keep my remarks within the realm of your decision.

I should like to relate this part of my remarks to the amendment. The hon. member who just spoke said that he wants something enforceable. I put this question to him and to the house. I repeat; everybody has agreed that this is one step forward. It is not all perfect. As far as it goes this bill is certainly enforceable. We have something enforceable right here now. Is this bill not enforceable? I suggest to the hon. member who made that remark that he take this observation most seriously. He pointed out the fact that in the past the Prime Minister claimed that individual rights were maintained only at the caprice of the government of the day. That is exactly what the Prime Minister said and meant. At that time individual rights and freedoms were maintained only at the caprice of the government of the day. If today or in the future he sees human rights being tampered with by the interpretation of the government, by the courts, by a body or groups of bodies, then the hon. member has a real duty to inform this house and the Canadian people at large of any such breach or caprice.

Time and time again, the hon. member said this legislation was unworthy. I forget how many times he used the word, but I would suggest to him that he offered the house no reasonable alternative to the present legislation except a constitutional amendment. I feel that already the government and many government supporters and spokesmen have dealt very ably with this aspect of the debate.

In days gone by we have often heard the expression "It is written". The ten commandments are written. Each and every one of us can certainly fulfil all the rules perhaps—and I underline "perhaps"—of the ten commandments without necessarily fulfilling all the obligations inherent in being a good Christian. Many things are written, and thus the compelling symbolism of the present legislation before the present Canadian House of Commons. As I said—and I repeat myself—this present legislation does not pretend to cover the whole field; but the Prime Minister has referred to it as a landmark, a mark of progress in the general field of human rights.

In times gone by, and especially during this debate, the opposition have said that this bill might and should do things that the government has never pretended it might or should do; thus the smokescreen; thus the straw men that have been brought up before us time and time again.

When we were young, many of us heard about the other place and this House of Commons, but seeing is believing. Like so many school students do, we have actually to come here and see the physical rooms in the physical buildings here, the House of Commons, which makes our undertaking of governmental and parliamentary processes so much more improved and important. Thus, again I say, herein lies the symbolism of this bill that so many members of the opposition in an intellectual, cynical and sophisticated way attack. They attack a bill that many Canadians are glad to have at the present time. I refer especially to the many new Canadians who not so long ago were not enjoying the fundamental human rights, liberties and freedoms that are outlined in the legislation before us.

I have often said, and I repeat today, that perhaps one of the hardest jobs the Prime Minister has is following the Leader of the Opposition in debate. I can readily imagine the trend toward clipping newspapers, Professor Lamontagne writing that brief of 20 or 30 pages that the Leader of the Opposition appears with in the house. We get the "on the one hand" technique and the "on the other hand"; we get "maybe this or maybe that"; we don't agree with this extreme or we don't agree with that extreme. During this debate we have heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) declare that we should have a bill with more teeth in it, yet the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) said we should have a general declaration. We have had a potpourri of criticisms, of press clippings and of opinions that were against this legislation for goodness knows how many years in the past. But I ask the opposition, where is the principle? Where do they stand? I know they are going to say that I am going to say, "Are you going to vote for it or against it?" That is not what I mean. What I am looking for is not factious opposition, but principle in debate. We have had a potpourri of opinion in connection with this legislation.

This morning the Leader of the Opposition said he rejected this extreme and he rejected that extreme. I wonder if any of us know exactly where the Liberal opposition stands on this legislation at the moment. The only thing for which I appeal, sir, is just a little consistency in debate. If we go back into history, I might say that in the years shortly after confederation they laughed at the western vision of the party of confederation, of Cartier and Macdonald, to open the west; they laughed and they called our northern vision igloo to igloo. Now, sir, while they are not doing it out loud in front of the Canadian people, they are laughing at this piece of legislation in a cynical, sophisticated and overly-intellectual way. I believe that every freedom-loving Canadian is calling for this legislation at the present time. I know that they would like it to be said that they gave this legislation bi-partisan support.

However, it seems to me that I have these notes which I made during the debate. They have called it "puny"; they have called it window dressing. I tell them to make these remarks to many of the new Canadians whom I met in western Canada just a few weeks ago. These people, in the months and years gone by in other lands, knew the real meaning of these freedoms and they will not take these remarks so lightly.

The hon. member for Hull demanded more inspiration in this legislation which he felt should be more in the nature of a declaratory instrument. We are not dealing with declarations this afternoon, we are dealing with a law on the statute books. If he wants inspirational declarations I ask him to look at many of the pronouncements made by the Prime Minister in the years gone by.

I should like at this time to make one remark. I hope the hon. member for Hull realizes that when he makes what I consider on many occasions are overly partisan remarks about the Prime Minister and the office of the Prime Minister in this country, not even the members of his own party smile while he smiles. I think I am speaking for everybody in this house in a bi-partisan way when I as the member for Brome-Missisquoi ask him to stop these overly partisan attacks on the office of the Prime Minister. He did it this morning, and he did it again in debate, and I feel that even the members of his own party do not appreciate these remarks.

I do not believe I am enunciating principles of narrow nationalism when I say that I feel legislation of this type should be dealt with by Canadians in the Canadian House of Commons. Getting more directly to the point, I would say it has been advocated by the Leader of the Opposition that a constitutional amendment is in order. I ask the hon. member for Hull, a man who is often preoccupied with many of the theories of divide and rule in this house, how can he go back to the people of his constituency—I know he would not—and say that he advocated a policy which would require this type of legislation to be passed at Westminster. One of the arguments raised by the Leader of the Opposition in his initial speech in the House of Commons was that future legislation in this Canadian House of Commons could nullify the legislation which is before us. But if a constitutional amendment were in order, possibly the same thing could be said of legislation passed by the British House of Commons at Westminster.

Again, it is just talk; it is ridiculous. I ask for consistency in debate. I believe that the Prime Minister in his speech completely covered this point, but the British House of Commons could just as easily, if it were possible and if it were desirable, nullify legislation of the Canadian House of Commons so I should like to bring this point to the attention of all hon. members. As usual, we have seen hon. members in the opposition bring up the following points during the debate: first, important legislation is being introduced late in the session. Then they made reference to the fact that we have a large majority. I can say this, and I say it with all sincerity and conviction, never in the history of Canadian parliamentary life have the rights of oppositions been more scrupulously observed. I realize that I am only young in my parliamentary work, but I can only say this: I cannot imagine an opposition being more factious.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) brought up the point that at the time the United Nations declaration of human rights was being discussed no member of the opposition proposed that the government of the day have further consultations with the provinces in order that such legislation might be adopted. He forgot the fact that the Prime Minister did speak out loudly and clearly at that time. What more could be asked of an opposition in the house? This is another straw man brought out before the Canadian people in this House of Commons by the hon. member for Essex East. If this statement were true of that day, the same thing could be said today. Why did the opposition today not press for consultation between the federal government and the provinces in order that their proposed constitutional amendment might be effected? The same situation holds true, so again I plead for what I might call consistency in debate.

I repeat that I shall support this legislation and I shall support it with pride. I feel it is legislation which forms an important link in the progress of human rights for all Canadians. I support it with pride, and I say it is legislation that should be, and is being enacted by Canadians for Canadians in this Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. R. D. C. Stewart (Charlotte): In rising to take part in this debate I am going to try to be realistic and deal with the matter as I feel it should be dealt with. In speaking in this house on another occasion I endeavoured to outline some of the safeguards which had been placed upon the statute books and which had become part of the law of Canada. The British North America Act defines certain fields in which the federal parliament is supreme and certain fields in which the provincial legislatures are supreme. In certain fields, there is an overlapping and when we consider Bill No. C-79, which is a bill dealing with human rights and fundamental freedoms, I think we should keep that in mind and not endeavour to try to categorically define all these freedoms.

The proposed bill of rights deals with some of the fundamental freedoms and it distinctly states that it is limited to those fields in which the federal government has exclusive jurisdiction. The fact that in the exercise of those rights there might be some infringement of or some trespassing on the provincial field does not in itself make such legislation invalid.

I listened witn a great deal of interest to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) this morning and I have no serious quarrel with many of the propositions set out by him in his remarks. A great many of them are set out in detail in the Canadian Bar Review, volume XXXVII, which is the report of the committee dealing with the Canadian bill of rights.

The leader of the C.C.F. party set out seven major objections to the proposed bill of rights. Although I do not intend to deal with them in detail, I think I should refer to some of the objections made by him to the introduction of Bill No. C-79 at this time. The first objection was that it was not an amendment to the constitution. We members of parliament who are lawyers know that an amendment to the constitution can only be made in one of two ways, namely by an act of the imperial parliament or by an agreement between the federal government and the provinces. Surely no member of this house would care to revert to colonial days and have the imperial parliament bring in an amendment to the British North America Act.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to an article written by A. N. Carter, Q.C. of the city of Saint John. In that article Mr. Carter does not approve of an amendment to the British North America Act by the imperial parliament. This would take away from the Canadian parliament its jurisdiction over our own act. As to an amendment by an agreement with the provinces, possibly that will come in time. However, I think most members of this House of Commons realize that at the present time an amendment that would be required and would be extensive enough would not meet with the approval of the ten provinces and the federal government.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Can the hon. member tell us which of the ten provinces he feels would object to a bill of rights?

Mr. Stewart: In reply to the question of the hon. member may I say this. I do not think that possibly is a proper question, whether it is an objection to a bill of rights or whether it is a refusal to amend the British North America Act at this time.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): To amend the British North America Act and permit a bill of rights.

Mr. Stewart: That is right. I say that, as I am at present advised, I do not think agreement could be obtained from all ten provinces and it would not necessarily mean that that province would be opposed to a bill of rights.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue), speaking of the proposed bill of rights, referred to the language of the bill. Is that matter so important? We are not dealing with high sounding language; we are dealing with basic concepts. I think we should be realistic enough to realize that any language which expresses basic concepts such as those with which we are dealing should be sufficient.

There has been some criticism of the proposed bill in that it does not deal with basic economic rights. I am suggesting to this House of Commons and to the hon. member that we have come a long way and have done so on the basis of the development of the common law. Our law of Canada was brought to this country by our forefathers as part of their goods and chattels, so to speak. The supreme court of Nova Scotia, in a very old case, decided that the common law of England was brought to this country by our forefathers but none of the statute law except that part which was clearly applicable to the new country at that time. That common law has grown and developed except in so far as it has been modified by statute—I am speaking now of the common law of the provinces—and it is still the common law of Canada and is still in effect except in so far as it has been modified by statute law.

We speak of fundamental freedoms. Freedom is purely relative. We must not confuse freedom with obligations and duties. We must not either confuse freedom with licence and use it in that sense. Freedom is the right to do certain things under the law. As the law develops, so do our obligations and restrictions develop. In order that a full appreciation might be had of Bill No. C-79 we must examine quite closely the freedoms dealt within the bill. The bill states:

> —there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms—

We speak glibly at times of the Canadian way of life but many of us fail to realize many of the elements involved in that way of life or to appreciate the sweat and tears that have gone into the making of that way of life. We fail in that appreciation when we rebel against certain enactments or certain restrictions imposed upon us. In a little book entitled "The Changing Law", written by Sir Alfred Denning, one of the lords justices of England, in dealing with the encroachment on human freedom these observations are made:

> —what are the true remedies that we must follow? First of all, I believe we must have a vigilant, a resolute and strong parliament... Secondly, I believe that we must maintain a strong and independent judiciary... absolutely independent of any control at all. I thank God that I believe we have that today, and I think we shall always have it.

The first freedom dealt with in the proposed bill is the right of the individual to life, liberty, or in other words the right to own, acquire and hold property; the freedom to move from place to place and in all other respects to carry on human activities of a purely personal nature. These rights, although we exercise them today, have not always been exercisable by the Canadian people or by the British people. We obtained these at a price and they were first formulated as part of the Magna Carta.

The second freedom in the proposed bill is that we shall have the right under the law not to be subject to discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex. During the past ten years or a little longer there have been in many parts of the world uprisings as the result of race and religion. Most of us are familiar with the racial struggle now going on in the country to the south and also in the Union of South Africa. I have in mind the statement made by the late Clarence Darrow, that great criminal lawyer in the country to the south, when defending coloured people at a trial, and I think these words and this attitude must have been prevalent and before the Prime Minister when he drafted the bill of rights. These are his words:

> The right to defend your home, the right to defend your person, is as sacred a right as any human being could fight for, and as sacred a cause as any jury could sustain. This issue not only involves the defendants in this case, but it involves every man who wants to live, every man who wants freedom to work and to breathe; it is an issue worth fighting for, and worth dying for. It is an issue worth the attention of this jury who have a chance that is given to few juries to pass upon a real case that will mean something in the history of a race.

The proposed bill of rights also deals with freedom of religion. This is the right to worship when and in what manner the supreme being of our individual choice. Sir Alfred Denning in his book "Freedom under the law" has expressed the same thought in these words, which are more eloquent than any of mine:

> We have attained to as high, if not higher, a degree of religious freedom than any other country. We are free to worship or not to worship, to affirm the existence of God or to deny it, to believe in the Christian religion or in any other religion or in none, just as we choose. It has taken us a long time to attain this freedom. For many centuries the judges held that Christianity was part of the law of the land, so much so that any denial of the existence of God amounted to the offence of blasphemy punishable in the criminal courts of the land. You will find it stated in the law books that it is an offence to use language having a tendency to bring the Christian religion or the Bible into contempt;—

We have also in this proposed bill freedom of speech. This is one of the freedoms that we are more familiar with, because on freedom of speech depends the democracy of our governements and our institutions. This was very well expressed by the last Chief Justice Duff in the Alberta case.

We have heard a great deal today on the constitutional question as to the interrelated duties and obligations arising out of the assignment of certain powers under the British North America Act to the federal parliament and to the assignment of certain powers, duties and obligations to the provincial legislatures. It is true that there is in the British North America Act an assignment and a setting aside of certain powers; but, as I will endeavour later to explain, those topics do not necessarily mean that they are all excluded.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had begun to refer briefly to the headings enumerated under the British North America Act.

I frankly admit that some considerable difficulty arises in this field. The learned law lords of the privy council have themselves run into a good deal of difficulty over the years, and I appreciate the feelings of the Leader of the Opposition when he says that the subject has a great deal of confusion attached to it. But is that sufficient ground for refusing to enact a bill or to question the validity of a statute? The Leader of the Opposition suggested that a reference should be made to the Supreme Court of Canada to test the validity of this bill. Would it not be better, to wait and then have the bill tested in the light of the situation existing at the time?

We are not dealing with something that can be pigeon-holed. We are dealing with fundamental human rights characterized by individual responsibility and individual feelings and sentiment and I suggest that we should go along with this bill and judge it in the light of developments. There is an old saying that we must walk before we can run. By passing this bill, inadequate as we may think it is we shall be making a start in trying to set up a basis for the development of basic and fundamental freedoms, something which will meet the needs of the present time.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on Bill No. C-79, for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, I should like to state at the outset that it is not my intention to discuss the legal aspects of this measure. That will be done by others who have the proper training to deal with legal and constitutional matters. Rather I should like to make some observations and to express an opinion on the proposed enactment from the standpoint of a new Canadian and one who has desired all his life to see enacted the high principles incorporated in the bill which is before the house at the present time.

Dominion day, July 1, 1960, when our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) introduced a bill of rights, was indeed a historic occasion for the people of Canada, one which had been long overdue. This bill when passed will incorporate the following provisions, as stated in clause 2:

(a) The right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

(b) the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex;

(c) freedom of religion;

(d) freedom of speech;

(e) freedom of assembly and association; and

I listened with great interest to the words of our Prime Minister and was deeply moved by what was said and by what is incorporated in this new bill. If one could realize what it means to the millions of new Canadians who have come to this country, the greatest portion of whom left their own country of origin for no other reasons than they had no freedom and liberty, then and only then would one understand the meaning of a bill of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

It is true that Canadians as a whole take their freedom for granted; they have always possessed it and it seemed that no need had ever arisen to have it put into statutory legislation. On the other hand, incidents are recorded showing that some of these rights have been infringed during the past few years, as has been stated here in the House of Commons during the present debate. Would it not then be in order to assure the Canadian people, by passing the present measure, that these high principles of our democratic system shall never be infringed and that no Canadian citizen shall ever fear that his liberties may be taken away. During the long history of Canada millions of people have emigrated to this country. One outstanding reason given by these immigrants for coming to Canada is that in most cases they had to leave their own countries because they underwent persecution or were deprived of freedom of religion, freedom of speech and freedom of assembly or association.

In this connection I might say that it is not the easiest thing in the world to become uprooted from your own country of origin, to leave friends and relatives and to start life anew in another country. But to have these liberties and freedoms people have done this in the past and they will do so in the future. They will come to lands like Canada where freedom and liberties are no idle words but are the principles upon which their existence can rest. This is the reason why I am so pleased and grateful to our Prime Minister for introducing in this Canadian parliament the bill of rights.

The new bill of rights, as I see it, will deny the right of any government to interfere with the right of the individual to speak within the law. It will deny anyone the right to prevent a Canadian living his own life within the limits of the law and without regard to race, colour or creed. It will prevent any parliament denying the right of a Canadian to belong to an unpopular minority anywhere in this country. It will deny parliament at present or in the future, however powerful that parliament might be, the right to deny the individual recourse to the courts.

As for myself I must say that Canada has been good to me and my family ever since we came to this country. To me it is a heaven on earth compared to the place I left behind. It has given me the right to live my own personal life in the manner I desire and allowed my wife and I to bring up our family as we wished. This country has provided us with the means and opportunity to give our children the education of their choice. I hasten to say, that deep down in our hearts we are also aware that we have given our children a foreign nationality which is no fault of the family.

Although this bill in future will protect the minority as much as all other Canadians, nevertheless let me say this: It is a great feeling indeed to know that this provision is incorporated in the new bill of rights to prevent such incidents as happened not so long ago in this country ever happening again under any circumstances. The new bill of rights will assert the individual's right tc life, liberty, security of person, enjoyment of property and to the protection of the law without discrimination as to race, national origin, colour, religion or sex.

This new bill, it is interesting to point out, was introduced on Dominion day, the very day on which the fathers of confederation united the provinces as a nation to be known as the Dominion of Canada. Our Prime Minister in introducing this bill concluded with the hope that the house will support this measure which I shall do wholeheartedly. The hon. gentleman expressed the belief that the bill embodies a pledge for all Canadians, a pledge which he placed before us and which I am greatly honoured to repeat as follows:

> I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind—

—So help me God.

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, it is a genuine honour to follow in this debate the hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat and who made such a very sincere address. I certainly did not plan to speak on this bill but after hearing the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) speak so eloquently and sincerely in introducing this bill I decided that when history was in the making—as in my opinion it was on Friday last—I wanted to make some contribution however small it might be.

I always regret that upon these great occasions—and when the Prime Minister spoke last Friday it was a great occasion—more people cannot see or hear the drama that is unfolding in this chamber. The Prime Minister's speech last Friday was one that could well have been televised and certainly it was one for posterity. Possibly in the days to come keynote addresses such as that given by the Prime Minister and the reply by the spokesman for the opposition parties could be given wider scope through being televised. Although the Prime Minister's mother cannot come to the chamber because of ill health television could reach her. Here in itself would be history in the making for I do not believe that any Canadian prime minister has occupied that office while his mother was still living.

It was an historic occasion for me when Prime Minister Macmillan spoke here and also when President Eisenhower addressed us in this chamber. I will not forget their addresses nor will I forget the address of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister's bill of rights has been distilled from the sweat of years and represents, as he said:

> —the achievement and the assurance of that degree of liberty and freedom under the law that was envisaged by the fathers of confederation.

The previous bill dealing with the same subject was sharply criticized by a segment —and I underline "segment"—of the press as well as by lawyers and others. Certainly the opportunity existed to withdraw it but with greater vigour the government has pursued it.

All hon. members, I suppose, have a subject which becomes with them a specialty, and so it is with the Prime Minister. He is best known for his interest in this bill and the more you study his life the more you come to realize that here is a man who knows what he is talking about as a result of heartaches and experience. Here is a man who is giving leadership to one of the bigger issues of the day. As the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) has said, this is one of the bigger issues of the day.

I was moved by some of the references made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) to cases involving the violation of civil liberties. These instances have long been embarrassing to us in British Columbia. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) has said, the hon. member for Vancouver East knows in his heart of hearts that this bill represents a step in the right direction.

The Prime Minister told the house about the indignities suffered by the Japanese-Canadians—who are as Canadian as any hon. member of this house—under our democratic system. I can well remember the time when they were conveyed to the immigration building in Vancouver in wooden colonial railroad coaches, the type of coach which in later years the Prime Minister referred to in a celebrated case which I believe involved a telegrapher at Blind River. I remember that many of the Japanese Canadians were unable to be housed in the immigration building; they were housed in colonial cars for days on end while R.C.M.P. officers patrolled the cars, mind you, to see that no Canadian wandered away. Many gave as much attention to their rights in those days as some give to the local traffic ordinances.

The record books show that the right hon. gentleman, while able to command the richest of fees, was happiest when he took the cases of immigrant Canadians, including the relocated Japanese in world war II, of whom I have been speaking, whose civil liberties were impaired or threatened. Over the years the name of the right hon. gentleman has been associated with civil liberties. I ask all hon. members to search the record books of the proceedings of the civil liberties section of the Canadian Bar Association and they will see what he has said from time to time over the years. From my own personal experience I can recall when he spoke to very small groups, not with the press around, of a committee of the civil liberties section. He spoke so sincerely that I am sure all the lawyers present were most appreciative of his remarks and knew that he spoke sincerely. His name in actuality also gave him an identification with the immigrant minorities.

You will probably find—certainly our records will show—that the right hon. gentleman received 90 per cent of the votes of the ethnic groups who regard themselves for whatever reason as Canada's outsiders looking in. After reading his address, I am sure they will know that he is fulfilling a promise to them. Is it not those people in particular, as well as all other Canadians, that the right hon. gentleman has in mind when he urges us to pass this bill, a bill which is most assuredly a step in the right direction.

There are many of us who take our liberties for granted, such as freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of the press and other freedoms to which the Prime Minister has referred but, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, our freedoms can be whittled away even under our present laws and over the years they have been curtailed. Today the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) referred to some of the proceedings of the civil liberties section of the Canadian Bar Association. I also ask hon. members to read the addresses given by the presidents of the Canadian Bar Association and see what they have said about liberties and rights and those rights being whittled away unless attention is given to the law. The Prime Minister has put the facts on the record and he simply says "Let's not let it happen again".

The Prime Minister can through personal experience relate the feelings of so many fine western Canadian settlers during the first world war, those who still had direct ties with their British and European homelands. The battlefields to them never seemed remote. The war opened old wounds; traditional antagonisms were renewed. In that atmosphere a neighbour's name mattered. Was it not at this time that the Prime Minister made passionate declarations against hyphenated citizenship, and many years later—yes, when he delivered his first speech here in the House of Commons—he was still fighting against registration of Canadians according to paternal racial origin. Today I took the opportunity of reading his first address. Incidentally, he had asked other questions in the house prior to June 13, 1940; but in his first major address he did in fact deal with the liberties of Canadians. At one point he said, when referring to the census, as reported at page 749 of Hansard:

> My criticism of the census is that, regardless of the number of generations that have elapsed or the admixtures of nationality that have taken place during 40, 50, 75 or 125 years, so long as persons must register under the nationality of their paternal ancestor, there will never be that Canadianism which we wish to establish.

In the field of religion, here is a man who knows what liberties are. I did have some time over the week end to read about some of the cases in which he was engaged over the years, and my attention was drawn to an appeal in the criminal courts handled by the Prime Minister some twenty-odd years ago in the province of Saskatchewan, a case involving religious rights. The right hon. gentleman conducted the appeal; the appeal was successful and the conviction was quashed.

I should like to refer to an editorial in the Vancouver Province of Tuesday, April 8, 1958, dealing with a Canadian bill of rights. The editorial says:

> The need for a Canadian bill of rights has been debated for a long time. But nothing has ever been done about it.
> Now, fortunately, a go-ahead signal to apply new policies has been given to a Prime Minister who, before he achieved this office, was a great champion of a bill to set out and protect the basic freedoms and privileges of Canadian citizens.
> Canadians, therefore, are looking for this long-awaited reform, and expect it without any great delay.
> The reason why a bill of rights has not been incorporated into our constitution is simple, though it is seldom frankly acknowledged.
> It is because it is the nature of government to reach always for more and more power. It is also —and this we should recognize clearly—because in latter times people have been looking more and more to governments to solve a large number of the problems of modern life.
> Yet freedom for the citizen is basically a matter of resisting the enroachment of governmental power over his life. If he does not preserve absolutely certain fundamental rights he is no longer a free citizen.

Some argue, and will continue to argue, that the fundamental rights which the Prime Minister has mentioned are inherent in our constitution and legal system. Yet as the Prime Minister and others, including the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), have pointed out today, there have been any number of cases down the years where citizens of Canada have not been protected in these rights by existing processes of law. The real value of the bill lies in the fact that it does limit the capacity of the government to circumscribe and diminish the rights of private citizens.

I do not know how many statutes of the federal government will be affected when the bill is passed, but it will certainly put an end to many of the unfair practices and procedures under the Immigration Act. Passage of the bill may automatically, and to a degree, give us a new Immigration Act. May I say that so far as the practices and procedures under that act are concerned, if this bill has that effect upon that statute this again is one more reason why I support the bill wholeheartedly.

May I draw hon. members' attention to clause 3(e) of the bill which deals with the right to a fair hearing for the determination of rights. This clause will have a bearing on section 3 of the Immigration Act, for under that act persons who allege Canadian citizenship are still examined outside of Canada to test this important matter. I confess it is a wonderful thing to be able to say "I am a Canadian". Clearly when a person alleges that some tribunal should be set up to allow that person to prove whether he is a Canadian citizen or, for that matter, whether he has Canadian domicile. Section 3 will also affect those who allege Canadian domicile.

Undoubtedly the bill of rights will check the unfettered discretion of the minister. I do not mean to criticize her in any way, but I am sure all of us would like to see some system set up whereby these rights can be brought before boards and tribunals. In this way we might well rid ourselves of many of the cases which appear on the front pages of newspapers and in which one judge after another condemns the system that is in operation.

Section 4 of the Immigration Act deals with loss of Canadian domicile. Under that section the minister is the sole judge of whether or not a Canadian resident has the intention of making his permanent home outside of Canada. Under the present act no provision is made for a hearing. I presume that section 3 of the new bill of rights will provide for a fair hearing.

Once out of the country the returning Canadian resident can be barred for indefinite periods until the immigration officer abroad is convinced there was no intention to give up Canadian domicile. As I mentioned, there is certainly no criticism of the officers, my criticism is directed only to the act and the regulations under which they operate.

Section 9 of the Immigration Act is a section to which I should like to refer because of the effect which this bill of rights will have upon the Immigration Act in particular. This section of the act gives the minister certain powers to land an immigrant, among other things, providing such landing is not contrary to the public interest. The minister again has sole discretion to decide what is and what is not in the public interest. Should the immigrant want to challenge this absolute power as it relates to this section, or any other section of the act, he is met with section 33 which prohibits the courts from interfering. This is the celebrated section of the Immigration Act which pretty well bars courts and judges from interfering.

Section 16 of Canada's Immigration Act provides for an immigration officer, without the issue of a warrant, arresting and detaining those persons referred to in that section. What about these powers in the light of the provisions of this bill of rights?

Section 3 (d) of the bill of rights is going to have a profound effect on section 20 of the Immigration Act, for it has become the practice—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question? He is an experienced lawyer. Will he be good enough to explain how this bill will in any way affect any of the sections of the act to which he has referred, having in mind the fact that the decision in future cases will be made by courts which will have before them a specific section in the bill to which my hon. friend directs the attention of the house and this bill just refers to certain freedoms in very general terms?

Mr. Taylor: I may say that the Immigration Act gives rights mainly to Canadian and to people or residents of Canada who possess Canadian domicile, and it has long been felt that those who do not come within these categories have no rights whatever. The bill of rights does not speak of Canadians or Canadian residents, it simply affirms that any person who is within the boundaries of Canada has now got certain rights. I think that over the years the immigration department has felt that persons seeking admission at ports of entry are not even in Canada, as has so often been stated by the district superintendents. I hope I have answered, to a degree, the question asked by the hon. member.

Section 22 (1) of the Immigration Act will be affected by the bill of rights, and rightly so. Here the immigration officer can order a person out of Canada if that person cannot be immediately examined because of sickness or other cause. I ask hon. members if they would at some early date refer to section 22 (1) to ascertain the powers of an immigration officer under that section. It could happen that a traveller, for example, arriving at Vancouver from Mexico could be returned all the way to Mexico at great expense and humiliation if that person were ill. I do not say this would happen and I do not say it has happened, but the power is there to send that person all the way back to Mexico if he arrives at a port of entry in that state.

Section 23 of the Immigration Act says that where an immigration officer, after examination of a person at a border point, is satisfied that a person does not qualify for admission he can then detain that person and bring about a board of inquiry. It is at this time, and not before, that counsel is permitted. Under the new bill of rights there is a provision to the effect that a person once detained under any law has the right to request counsel. Up until now persons arriving at ports of entry have not been able to retain counsel until after the case has been referred to a board of inquiry. This new bill is certainly going to be a step in the right direction in that regard.

Section 24 of the Immigration Act will be affected by the bill of rights. At the moment a person travelling from Alaska to Vancouver could have a deportation order made against him without that type of hearing afforded to others under the previous sections of the act. This person, for example, could be returned to Alaska. The bill of rights, because it affects any person in Canada—this may answer the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin)—will create new rights for that person.

I am not going to refer to any more of the sections, but may I refer to section 27 (1) of the Immigration Act which says that an inquiry by a special inquiry officer shall be separate and apart from the public but in the presence of the person concerned wherever it is practicable. Another subsection says that the special inquiry officer may at the hearing receive and base his decision upon evidence considered credible or trustworthy by him in the circumstances of each case. My only comment is that under section 27 (1) the inquiry could take place without the presence of the applicant. Under the new bill the applicant, of course, would have to be present. This long established practice of the department would go by the boards.

Section 29 of the Immigration Act allows an officer to hear a case, make a decision and later on reopen it and make a different decision should he deem it necessary. My only comment is that he purports to do this after a decision was made and if the courts could do this there would be sheer chaos. I understand that once this bill comes into force that practice would no longer be applicable.

Section 30 of the Immigration Act—

Mr. Speaker: Order; I thought the hon. member was perhaps nearing the end and I did not wish to interrupt him unnecessarily, but it seems to me he is applying the principle of the bill as it will affect statutes now on the books and, by way of illustration, has referred to the Immigration Act. I should remind the hon. member we are not debating the Immigration Act. His references would be in order by way of illustration, but it seems to me that to go through the whole act would be going beyond the scope of this debate.

Mr. Taylor: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall not refer to any more sections of the act. I might say that I have been interested in amendments to this act for such a long time that when we are now dealing with a bill of rights which will probably contain provisions affecting this act, many of us will be extremely pleased to know that possibly these old procedures will be a thing of the past.

If, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) has said, a new bill is to be introduced, I hope it will be in line with the bill of rights; and I imagine that it will be, although I cannot be sure. For that reason I should like to commend the Prime Minister for continuing to fight for this bill. I think it will bring about tremendous relief throughout the country.

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I had really no intention of entering this debate until I read the editorial in the Montreal Star of June 30 which brought to my attention the fact that this bill had been brought in very late in the session. I am not denying the contention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) that we probably need a change in the constitution, or that we should have a change provided for in the bill of rights. Time is going on. It is a long time since we have had a change in the constitution. But Bill No. C-79, an act for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms is too important a bill to be brought in in the dying days of the session and for us to be asked to study this bill carefully and to pass upon it in the matter of a few days. The editorial in the Montreal Star of June 30, 1960 stated as follows:

> Since Mr. Diefenbaker first mooted his idea most of the threats have been dissipated by judgments of the courts. These judgments have shown that the fundamental rights Mr. Diefenbaker seeks to safeguard are already protected by either law or custom.
> It was altogether laudable that Mr. Diefenbaker, when he first introduced his bill, should delay its passage so that the public might study and discuss it . . . There was nothing to suggest in Monday's presentation that the Prime Minister intends the bill to go to committees of both houses for study. It should. It should not be passed in haste at the end of the session, although its passage, if it does no good, will do little harm.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is now quoting an editorial commenting on the proceedings within this house, a procedure which is out of order. The earlier part referring to the principle of the bill generally would be acceptable but he should not pursue the quotation to the point where it comments on the conduct of members or the proceedings of this house.

Mr. Bourque: I did not intend to enter into that subject, really, Mr. Speaker, but I think that this bill affects the provinces seriously and that, as the editorial mentioned, the Prime Minister should move toward a constitutional amendment by agreement with the provinces. That is the point I wanted to make and that is why I raised this question of the editorial.

Some time ago—I think it was on April 29, 1959—a delegation composed of 30 important Canadian organizations came to Ottawa and presented a brief to the Prime Minister. These organizations were extremely important ones and I think they were willing to give to the bill the study that it required and they were anxious to make suggestions and representations to the Prime Minister. If this bill is adopted at this session those associations will be deprived of the right they sought, namely the right to make representations and to advise the Prime Minister of what they thought this bill should contain. There is no doubt that they would have constructive suggestions to make if they were given time in which to study the purport of Bill No. C-79.

In their brief on April 29, 1959 they suggested a whole list of human rights and fundamental freedoms which they would have liked to have incorporated in this bill of rights. Conditions have changed in the last 15 months and I am sure that if they were given an opportunity to revise the brief they submitted at that time they would have many more valuable suggestions to submit than those they submitted at that time.

It has taken many years to reach the stage of liberty we now enjoy. We had the charter of liberties in the year 1100 and Magna Carta in the year 1215. Both of the above measures were fought for and extracted by Frenchmen from Frenchmen. The foundations for English liberties were laid by French speaking barons and later written in English. The petition of right in the year 1628 made everyone subject to the law, the king included. The revolution of 1688 drove out James II. He refused to recognize that he was subject to the laws of the land and he lost his throne. Parliament became the supreme body and has since remained so. Later came the declaration of rights which was later changed to the bill of rights which became a statute of the parliament of England. All these great documents form part of our Canadian heritage; they are included in our constitution.

All men are born free and equal, and equally entitled to the pursuit of life, liberty and happiness, free speech, freedom of the press and of religion. That is an inherent right of all Canadians. The constitution of Canada guarantees to the provincial governments many rights. Canada is a federal country. Federalism consists in a guarantee of rights, some powers to the provincial governments, other powers to the federal government. We have a limited sovereignty in Canada. It is not a country of parliamenttary sovereignty. We have in Canada no parliamentary body that is sovereign. The British North America Act divides the powers of the governments.

Before enacting legislation making this new bill of rights law let us make sure that it contains no discrimination of any kind against anyone owing to race, colour, sex, language, religion, political opinion, national or social origin, birth or other status. This bill of rights, Bill No. C-79, to my mind would add nothing to the fundamental rights of the Canadian citizen. I believe the most effective means of safeguarding the rights of Canadian citizens would be by means of amendments to the British North America Act. I believe an interprovincial conference should be held to decide in what fields the federal government might set down human rights legislation. If, as and when the conference has reached an understanding or accord as to the legislation required to protect the rights of all Canadians, then the whole question could be brought before this house for discussion and approval.

The constitutional right of all the provinces must be fully safeguarded. This bill strikes at the very root of our civil code. Quebec is the only province in Canada which has a civil code of its own. Other provinces are guided in civil matters by British common law and jurisprudence.

This bill, Bill No. C-79, wil no doubt result in juridical chaos and inextricable tangles. We must guard against any bill that would constitute an infringement upon the autonomy of the province of Quebec or conflict with any of its existing laws.

Due to the complexity of the many problems contained in this bill we must not make haste but bide our time, giving careful attention and study to the many problems involved and making sure that it contains all the elementary principles of justice and equity for all so that it can never become a bill of injustice and inequity and a thorn in the side of Canadians. We must make human rights and fundamental freedoms in Canada effective and secure.

Our basic rights and liberties which are part of our inheritance and to which every person in Canada is entitled must be preserved, and only a close study by a commission composed of members of this house and of the Senate can offer the guarantee that our rights will be enhanced and not diminished, having in mind the inherent dignity and worth of the human person and the inalienable rights which derive therefrom.

It would take too long and I would take up too much time of the house to give a full list of the human rights and fundamental freedoms which I believe Canadian citizens should be granted. I have no doubt that other hon. members feel as I do, that in order to be able thoroughly to discuss this most important legislation it should be handed over to a commission or a committee that would have full power to call witnesses and to give all the items derived therefrom its most careful consideration. Two full days given to the consideration of such a bill is ridiculous; it should take at least ten days and receive long study.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest it be sent to a conference or commission as I proposed previously so that justice and freedom may prevail.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, to be in the House of Commons on an occasion such as this is a rare privilege. It is a privilege to participate in making history. Not only is this so because of the contents of the bill before us and the struggle which has been waged in the past by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to bring this bill about, but surely it is a historic occasion for another reason. This Canadian bill of rights is not forced upon a reluctant government as has been the experience with measures of this kind in other countries in the past. It is brought before the house by the government, the leader of the government, and if anything it is forced upon a reluctant opposition.

I am sure there are many who recall the earlier comments of the Prime Minister over the years on the necessity for this bill. About a decade ago when I was at law school in Saskatoon the students there were addressed by the then member for Lake Centre. On that occasion he dealt with the historic rights and civil liberties which are part of our heritage, and I said then that if there was anything I could do to help that man I would do it. That sentiment in return found its response in the hearts of millions of Canadians, and those today who decry this measure would do well to remember that fact.

The separation of the grass from the brass has been the subject of much comment by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and his party, and it is evident that it still exists today. They are unable to understand the importance and significance of this bill to the ordinary and little people of Canada. May I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the words of the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp), who testified to the real significance of this measure to new Canadians, and indeed to all Canadians. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) dealt with some of the effects of this bill in remedying long standing injustices.

The position taken by the Leader of the Opposition is on all sides of the question. He is for the principle of the bill. He seems to be against the bill itself. He says it is meaningless, and others of his followers said "Oh, it will affect the provinces". In effect the Leader of the Opposition says "They are mere words meaning nothing", and then he spoke for over an hour to prove it. One of his followers said that the words of the bill are not inspiring enough. The Leader of the Opposition said that we should have something like the universal declaration of human rights, that it should be a ringing declaration; yet in the same breath he claimed that the present bill was not prosaic enough to contain the sort of sanctions he seemed to envision were necessary in this type of legislation. He said the bill should have been introduced long ago; in other words, he is against its introduction now. There is not enough time to consider it, he says, and then goes on to request that not only this bill be dealt with but that the War Measures Act should also be dealt with in extenso. He said that we should re-write the War Measures Act now. I think every hon. member of the house would like to consider the provisions of the War Measures Act and review them, but surely it is possible to do one thing at a time.

The Leader of the Opposition said that the bill should be embodied in the constitution; that is to say, he wants it to apply in the field of provincial jurisdiction. The hon. member who has just spoken claims, not that the bill is meaningless but that it infringes provincial jurisdiction. They are all over the shop on this bill. They are most unhappy about it. They were in government for 22 years but did nothing about it.

Mr. Deschatelets: We are very happy about it.

Mr. Jones: We are glad we finished it so that we can get down to dealing with some of the serious problems in this country.

Mr. Speaker, they say that the bill is not necessary, yet at the same time they say it goes too far and then in the next breath say it does not go far enough. Embodying these things in the constitution to affect federal jurisdiction only would allow them to be changed, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has pointed out on other occasions, much more easily than if they were embodied in the bill before us.

I should like to deal with some of the contradictory allegations that have been made. First, I should like to refer to one made by the Leader of the Opposition. With the highest approbation he quoted some of the words of Professor Lower. As reported at page 5650 of Hansard, he described Professor Lower as a very jealous, sensitive and vigorous guardian of liberty and freedom in this country. I am acquainted with Professor Lower, and I know he enjoys the high esteem of many Canadians and has done so for many years, but the Leader of the Opposition did not quote all the professor had to say about this bill. The reference which was made by the Leader of the Opposition was taken from a résumé of a panel discussion on a basis for a charter of human rights held at the University of Ottawa on January 20. On that occasion Professor Lower had this to say:

> Our bill of rights will touch on the question of civil liberties—

Then he went on to make a distinction between liberties and rights.

> —and as such I suspect it will affect the whole country. It will be a great statement of principle. It will be comparable to the American declaration of independence.

Then what did the professor say in connection with the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition about incorporating this into the constitution? He said on that occasion:

> I recognize the weakness of a simple statute instead of the constitutional method, but I recognize also the impossibility of getting this latter at present.

That was the opinion of the authority quoted by the Leader of the Opposition. What is the value of the bill of rights? Professor Lower again says:

> My point is that if you enunciate a great principle which is intrinsically sound, sooner or later your law will be shaped accordingly, and sooner or later you will begin to think accordingly, too.

Then Professor Lower refers to some of the great declarations which have been made in the past. He says:

> It was a very great fortune of the English speaking people to found institutions which would embody freedom. It is those institutions under which we live today; our parliamentary government is only one, our trial by jury is another one, the presumption of any man's innocence until, by a free trial, he is proved guilty, and there are so many others.

What about the contention that this bill should be entrenched? I should like to quote from an address given by the Minister of Justice on February 18 last on the occasion of the first annual dinner of the law society of the University of Western Ontario. On page 11 of the report of the address the hon. gentleman is reported as saying:

> One of the most persistent recommendations which we have received is that the bill of rights should be placed, or "entrenched", in the constitution, thereby to curtail the powers of parliament or of the provincial legislatures, or both, to encroach upon, amend or repeal the rights it enunciates. Let us first dispense with the question of provincial legislatures. As you may know, our draft bill extends only to matters which concern the federal constitution. This is because we believe that the principle of provincial autonomy—which is so very basic to our constitution—does not permit us to force our conclusions, much less our methods, upon other freely elected governments. Indeed, so firmly do we believe in the absolute necessity for respect of provincial integrity that the greatest possible care has been taken in drafting the Canadian bill of rights to avoid infringing the rights of provincial governments.

I shall not deal with the other points which have been made about the inclusion of these provisions within the constitution, since they have already been dealt with. The Leader of the Opposition said something about sanctions. He said the bill should provide sanctions. If we refer to clause 3 of the bill we shall find it clearly sets forth how the rights therein mentioned are to be preserved for the people. The clause reads, in part:

> All the acts of the parliament of Canada enacted before or after the commencement of this part, all orders, rules and regulations thereunder, and all laws in force in Canada or in any part of Canada at the commencement of this part that are subject to be repealed, abolished or altered by the parliament of Canada, shall, unless it is otherwise expressly stated in any act of the parliament of Canada hereafter enacted, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms recognized by this part, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing—

That is where provision is made for the effective enforcement of this bill.

The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) thought that the bill was not inspired; indeed, he thought it was dull. I think the hon. member for Hull would be well advised to read some of the great statements on this theme which have been our heritage, passing down to us through long generations the freedoms which we call ours today. All these were not in language distinguished by ringing terms. The words in the Canadian bill of rights are clear. They are meant to serve a purpose. I should like to refer, by way of example, to the words of Magna Carta which has been the very foundation of our liberty from an early time. Here are some of the words used in that document—not inspiring language, but words which inspire because of the importance we attach to them. Section 17 of the charter says, for example:

> Common pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be held in some fixed place.

Section 23 provides:

> No community or individual shall be compelled to make bridges at river banks, except those who from of old were legally bound to do so.

Section 38 states:

> No bailiff for the future shall put any man to his "law" upon his own mere words of mouth, without credible witnesses brought for this purpose.

Not until we reach section 39 do we come to the great words which are enshrined in our memory.

> No freeman shall be arrested, or detained in prison, or deprived of his freehold, or outlawed, or banished, or in any way molested; and we will not set forth against him nor send against him, unless by the lawful judgment of his peers and by the law of the land.

In other words, you have to read the enactment to see what these phrases really mean and to get the value from them. It is said that our Canadian bill of rights does not claim or make any new rights. We look back to the bill of rights passed in 1689 in the United Kingdom. Were they asking for new rights on that occasion? Here is a portion of the wording of that act:

> An act for declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and settling the succession of the crown—

They called parliament together—

> —to meet and sit at Westminster upon the two and twentieth day of January, in this year one thousand six hundred eighty and eight, in order to such an establishment, as that their religion, laws, and liberties might not again be in danger of being subverted: upon which letters, elections have been accordingly made,
> And thereupon the said lords spiritual and temporal, and commons, pursuant to their respective letters and elections, being now assembled in a full and free representative of this nation, taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the ends aforesaid; do in the first place (as their ancestors in like case have usually done) for the vindicating and asserting their ancient rights and liberties, declare—

Then there follows the specific provisions of the bill of rights proclaiming the ancient rights and liberties of the people as we are proclaiming them here today.

What is the significance of this measure? I was interested in reviewing the United States declaration of independence. This is not mere words as the Leader of the Opposition described the documents. The United States declaration of independence commences with these words:

When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitled them, a decent respect for the opinions of mankind, requires, that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

They thought it was important in the process of the nation-building to declare the causes which had set them forth on that mission. Some have said that at the time of the founding of Canada brought about by the work of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Etienne Cartier there was in effect a declaration of rights for Canadians. There are those who have asserted that view. May I say if that is so this is another great step taken by another great Canadian. A great Canadian has initiated another important step in the building of the Canadian nation. Ours is no declaration of independence but a declaration of unity in freedom. I submit it is a great step forward in the creation of this nation and one upon which those in the years that follow will be able to look back with pride and say, these things were set forth for all to know so that no one may contravene the rights and liberties of the Canadian people.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Does my hon. friend not think that the right to work is also a fundamental right?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, is my hon. friend suggesting that we should start infringing upon provincial legislation in the field of labour? What other specific provisions would the hon. gentleman have us infringe upon?

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot in this debate about whether or not we should have a written bill of rights. A written bill of rights is not new among Anglo-Saxon people. We can go back to the Magna Carta which is perhaps the keystone of all our freedom. This was a written bill which has been re-enacted in the British parliament no less than 30 times. This indicates that we need not only a written bill but what I would call a living statute and we need to start on it now.

There are several reasons why I say we need to start now. Perhaps up to this time we have not been aware of the real need for a bill of this nature. It has been said that we need no written bill because England did not have one. England has had one for many years. Not only has that country had the Magna Carta, it has the statutes of Westminster. The latest statute of Westminster was enacted in 1931 but there were no less than three in the 13th century, the first in 1275, the second in 1285, completed in 1288, and the third in 1290.

At the time James II left the British throne in 1688 William and Mary were called in. It was found necessary at that time to re-affirm British rights and freedoms in the bill of rights of 1689.

Again I pose the question: Why should we enact a bill of rights now? It is because we are a federal nation. When you have a federal nation it is difficult to delineate clearly the rights of the federal power and the rights of the provincial power. It is up to the federal power to show the way. We want to pass this bill to show that the dominion government is out in front, that it is ready to give a lead to the provinces. No one here today has objected to the list of freedoms enumerated except to say that the list is not long enough. This may be so. I personally would like to see, if possible, a bill of rights which would bring in all the freedoms of the United Nations charter and more. I should like to see Canada foremost in the whole world in her list of freedoms but I am making a plea that we make a start now.

I have heard great arguments about the use of words. This is not a flowery bill. We have very few flowery phrases in this bill about "judicial difficulties" and "inextricable complications". But the great charters of the world that have changed global thinking have been couched in very simple language. Moses gave us a charter of morals and freedoms: thou shalt not kill. What would a man say if he came to Canada and was given the freedoms we enjoy? He would say: I am free. What do a man and wife say when they are taking on the most solemn of contracts? I will, or I do. These are not flowery words but think of the implications. Think of the changes they make in human lives. I am suspicious of long and flowery phrases and inextricable complications. When you have a bill containing such words you will certainly have inextricable complications.

I like to see a bill full of words like "I am free; free to use my property; free to speak; free to assemble with my friends; free to go to the church of my choice; free to spend my own money when and where I like; free to go to sleep at night and not wait for that knock at the door." In some countries you are not even taken to court, you are taken out in the back yard and stood up against the wall. I am not talking about ancient history. Think of Cuba today. Where are the oil interests in Cuba? Can a person in that country say, "I am free?" You can say that in Canada and I think it is time we put it on paper if for no other reason than to demonstrate how proud we are to be able to stand up and say, "I am free." When we answer the question, "Are we free Canadians?" the answer is yes. Let us put it on paper.

I am as aware if not more aware than most hon. members that you have full freedom only when you have an incorruptible police force. It is of no use to have a criminal law which is as near perfect as possible, tried and tested in the British tradition and backed up by the common law if you do not have enforcing these laws men whom you can trust and courts in which you can have complete confidence. We are here today mainly to see whether we intend to keep them.

In this day of unrest when other nations are sliding, when they believe in nothing or, if they believe in something they have not the courage to stand up and say they do, this is a day when we can take action and put on paper in simple words as simple, honest men a few of the freedoms we believe in. We are absolutely sure that we can pass a law in our federal capacity, and we should say that we intend to stand behind it.

I do not think it is any accident that this bill was introduced by such a man as our present Prime Minister who has shown by his whole life that he believes in the little man and the big rights of the little man. In his cabinet he has no fewer than 14 veterans, men who at the time they were needed answered the call without compulsion and stood alongside a flag they loved and fought for a country they loved. They acted and they did not rely on high, flowery words.

Therefore, it is a great pleasure for me to stand here tonight and add my small voice to that of those who have already backed this bill. I hope it will be only the first of many steps in giving to Canada a complete bill of rights federally and provincially which will show light to all men.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to take part in this debate for some time and the opportunity has been thrust upon me in a hurry. This bill of rights is the climax, not of the work of a few days, a few months or a few years but of 14 years, particularly on the part of our present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), because the history of this bill goes back to April 2, 1946, when the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), as secretary of state, moved the second reading of the citizenship bill. I was very much taken by certain remarks made at the end of the minister's speech at that time because it appeared that at a previous session this bill had been given first reading. The minister in charge of the bill said that when it had received second reading it would go to a committee. When it received second reading the then member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Green) asked the minister when the committee would be set up. The reply was that the hon. member was quite correct in his assumption that it had been proposed to send the bill to a committee but that conditions had changed and that the bill would no longer go to a committee.

It was during this debate that the present Prime Minister, then the hon. member for Lake Centre—and his transition from hon. member for Lake Centre to hon. member for Prince Albert might tie into the thought behind this bill a little bit—first introduced his concept of a bill of rights. He pointed out that having established the basis of Canadian citizenship and having given a new unity to this country, it might be suggested that if citizenship is to mean what our citizenship should mean it required at that time the adoption by Canada of a bill of rights. He was referring particularly to the passage of various orders in council which had been passed after the war had terminated which denied to certain Canadians those rights which should have been inalienably theirs.

The present Prime Minister pointed out that the British North America Act contains no personal safeguards against unwise or discriminatory legislation which might be passed by federal governments. It contains nothing to prevent government by order in council from doing things which deny Canadians the rights that flow from Canadian citizenship. He pointed out that the various great charters of the English speaking peoples, Magna Carta, which was passed in 1215, was the foundation for the petition of rights of 1628; the habeas corpus act of 1679 and the bill of rights itself of 1689.

I was very interested in what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) had to say this afternoon in regard to the fact that if this bill were approved by this parliament any succeeding parliament might revoke it. I wonder whether it is not possible for any parliament that wished to do so to revoke any of those great charters that I have mentioned, and whether it would not be possible for any parliament to revoke a constitutional amendment incorporated in the British North America Act? What parliament can do, parliament can undo.

This bill is a major step forward, and eventually perhaps it may be written into our constitution, but this is the only means by which we can achieve this very necessary advance at this time. The Leader of the Opposition said that this is a purely declaratory bill and could be changed by any future parliament. I think what I have said is the answer to that.

The history of the struggle to enact a bill of rights went on in 1946, 1947 and 1948, but I was particularly taken by 1947 when there was a debate in this house in regard to setting up a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, and with the words of the minister who introduced the resolution, the Hon. Ian Mackenzie, at page 3140 of Hansard of May 16, 1947. Part of the resolution reads:

> And, in particular, in the light of the provisions contained in the charter of the United Nations, and the establishment by the economic and social council thereof of a commission on human rights, what is the legal and constitutional situation in Canada with respect to such rights, and what steps, if any, it would be advisable to take or to recommend for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

Please note, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution seems to imply that certain action should be taken by Canada and that this committee—we have been talking about setting up committees—that was talked about on May 15, 1947 was set up to bring forward recommendations to this parliament as to what should be done in the way of implementation of a charter of the United Nations in regard to human rights and fundamental freedoms. That committee met in 1947; it met again in 1948. The final committee met in 1950. The 1947 and 1948 committees were joint committees, but the 1950 committee was a committee of the Senate. I should like to refer for a moment to the final report of the 1950 committee, page 306, where it is stated:

> Your committee therefore recommends that, as an interim measure, the Canadian parliament adopt a declaration of human rights to be strictly limited to its own legislative jurisdiction. Such a declaration would not invade the provincial legislative authority, but it would nevertheless cover a very wide field. While such a declaration would not bind the Canadian parliament or future Canadian parliaments, it would serve to guide the Canadian parliament and the federal civil service. It would have application within all the important matters reserved to the Canadian parliament in section 91 and in other sections of the British North America Act. It would apply without limitation within the Northwest Territories.

The reason this recommendation was written in this manner will become very clear as I go along and try to outline the history of the fight to enact a bill of rights in Canada. The next chapter occurs on April 9, 1948, when the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, minister of justice, moved the following motion on behalf of the prime minister, as recorded on page 2842 of Hansard of that date:

> That it is expedient to appoint a joint committee of both houses of parliament to consider the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the manner in which those obligations accepted by all members of the United Nations may best be implemented;
> And, in particular, in the light of the provisions contained in the charter of the United Nations, and the establishment by the economic and social council thereof of a commission on human rights, what is the legal and constitutional—

These are the important words.

> —situation in Canada with respect to such rights, and what steps, if any, it would be advisable to take or to recommend for the purpose of preserving in Canada respect for the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

It is interesting to note the names of the members on that committee, particularly the names of those who sit on the treasury benches today. In the discussion of this resolution, the present Prime Minister had this to say, as recorded at page 2846 of Hansard—again, this is a little bit of history, a summation of what had taken place up to that time:

> We were circumvented last year in the committee by the constitutional issue being raised on every possible occasion; and the minister tonight reiterated the summation of the answers given by the attorneys general of the provinces and by the deans of the law schools, apparently believing that those answers, coupled with the evidence given before the committee, would once and for all end in this country the crusade for a national bill of rights and would determine as well Canada's position as being unable to discharge her international responsibilities.

The reference to the provinces and to the deans of the law schools is a matter of history, and it is in that debate in Mr. Ilsley's statement of April 9. I shall read from page 2846 of Hansard, where he sums up the replies which the government of that day had received from the various provinces. I think this is extremely important in view of the statements which have been made today by various hon. gentlemen speaking from the other side of the house. What did Mr. Ilsley have to say? He said this:

> Before I pass on to deal with the replies of the deans of the law schools, I think I can sum up the result of this correspondence in this way. No attorney general says affirmatively that he is of opinion that the dominion parliament has power to pass a comprehensive bill of rights applicable to all of Canada; certain attorneys general express a negative opinion and deny that power, and several show very little or no interest in the matter.

He goes on and says that the general course and tone of the correspondence with the deans of the law schools makes it clear that if the dominion government does undertake to set limits to the activities of the provinces in dealing with civil rights of this kind it is altogether probable that a considerable provincial rights controversy will be precipitated. He goes on further to say that this is borne out by the replies received from certain deans of law schools and he lists the various universities from which replies have been received. Then he says:

I shall not undertake to summarize the opinions of these deans because they are contained in an exhibit before the committee, but generally speaking they are most unfavourable to an affirmative answer to the question as to whether this parliament has that power.

He goes on to say that it will be the duty of that committee to determine what is right and what is wrong in connection with this question. I believe that this is a fairly clear indication that since 1946 there has been a tremendous amount of work done in this whole field of human rights and fundamental freedoms. The method taken in presenting this bill is the only method which could be taken with any hope of immediate success. We are dealing in this bill only with those matters which are within the jurisdiction of this parliament. There is no possibility of any controversy in regard to provincial rights. It may well be that after this bill becomes law; at some future time there may be agreement with the provinces. At that time the proper changes can be made in the British North America Act.

What has been of concern in the drafting of this bill has been the fact that our fundamental freedoms are not protected by anything; they are not protected by any act of parliament or any other single thing. For instance, on March 24, 1952, the present Prime Minister, when he moved his motion to ensure fundamental freedoms, as recorded on page 714 of Hansard, quoted from Lord Reading when he introduced a measure in the British House of Lords in 1947. I think this is applicable because the history of this country has shown that what Lord Reading was talking about then has happened here. This is what Lord Reading said:

Personal freedom had for so long been the current coin of life in this country that we had been apt perhaps to forget that currency may be slowly and steathily withdrawn from circulation, that coinage may be debased without any very evident outward signs, and that it may even be deliberately counterfeited without immediate detection.

It is no part of my case today to allege any malign conspiracy on the part of anyone deliberately to attempt to overthrow the liberties of the subject. The process has been gradual, stealthy, haphazard, almost inadvertent,—

I should like to emphasize that word "inadvertent" because these things do not happen as a result of some deep, secret plan to take away our freedoms. They usually happen in the name of efficiency, in the name of good government, in the name of progress or in the name of getting the job done. I continue to quote what Lord Reading said.

—but unfortunately both insidious and menacing in its cumulative effect.

On the same page there is a quotation from Viscount Samuel's statement in 1951, which is as follows:

During the last 30 or 40 years, imperceptibly, almost unconsciously, here a little and there a little, there have been encroachments upon that great and precious heritage.

I do not suggest today that we have lost, or are in danger of losing, those liberties, but I do suggest that they have been again and again impaired, that that process is still continuing, and that it needs to be stopped and reversed.

Even now, after the peace, or semi-peace, of the last five years, not all these liberties have been restored, and there is danger that some of these restrictions may be allowed unnecessarily to slip into our permanent system of government.

As the Prime Minister said in speaking to his own motion:

The declaration of human rights is predicated upon a realization by the statesmen of the world that there can be no peace unless there is freedom, and there wherever discrimination exists because of race or colour anywhere in the world there is soil that is productive of potential future wars.

Mr. Speaker, it has also been said that this love of freedom is not the prerogative of this particular party, that it is in all parties and on all sides of this house. In all sincerity I say to the opposition that this step is the best one we can take at this time. I say that this step is a good step. Members of the opposition, who were ministers of previous governments have said that this is a good thing and have agreed with the principle of what we are trying to do here. But, somehow or other, whether there was not present the drive, the force or the conviction, they did not carry through. In fact, time after time, as recorded in Hansard,—and I have gone back through Hansard back to 1946 and beyond—actions of government taken in the past in good faith have resulted in loss of freedom.

This is a good bill, Mr. Speaker. This is a bill that has been 14 years in coming to fruition. This is a bill in response to a petition signed by 600,000 Canadians saying that they wanted a bill of rights. This is a bill of rights asked for by 86 of 89 Canadian English speaking newspapers. This is a bill that is not perfect. What bill is perfect? You may quibble with this word or with that word, but you cannot quibble with the underlying philosophy behind the bill. The Leader of the Opposition said that he agreed in principle with this bill. All things considered, and taking into account all that has happened previously, all of the various problems that we face in this country as a confederation,—our problem of the two races, the problem of provincial rights and the problems that we in the federal sphere are obliged to face—I say that this is the best, in my opinion, that we can have at this present moment.

(Translation):

Mr. Maurice Allard (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at this time, I am deeply convinced of expressing one of the oldest feelings of mankind: a man's privilege of standing for his rights and freedoms. Ever since his emergence from the cave, man has had to wrestle against the forces of nature, and indeed the egotism of his fellowmen, to develop his personality and assert his right to life and freedom of action.

In these few remarks, I intend to trace back the struggles undergone by man to break away from the ties of slavery and despotism. I would like briefly to cover the rights won under British charters, through the American revolution of 1776, the French revolution of 1789, the Russian revolution of 1917 and the action taken by the United Nations under a universal bill of rights since 1945.

I will then recall the unceasing efforts of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to incorporate a bill of rights into our legislative system.

Finally, after an indication of the real basis of our rights and freedoms, I should like to delve into the Canadian constitution aspect of the matter.

When you look at the whole picture of human rights and freedoms, you notice that essential changes in political institutions originated in England. From the eleventh century, in the face of growing intransigency on the part of royalty, the barons succeeded in diminishing royal authority by obtaining the grant of substantial privileges. The discussions and agreements between kings and barons are known as charters. And those English charters were the first written documents in the lengthy process of establishing human freedoms.

First of all, we know the charter of William the Conqueror, which was enacted in 1071 for the preservation of Saxon rights and customs.

Later on, there was the charter of Henry I conceding to Londoners the right to elect their sheriff, their lord justice, to hold assemblies, and exempting them from certain extraordinary taxes.

The two charters of Steven confirmed the freedoms granted by his predecessors and reformed certain abuse of authority and exactions by royal officers.

Both of Steven's charters enabled the barons to build castles and fortify them for their own defence.

In 1154, Henry II, on the occasion of his coronation, confirmed all charters granted before his reign, without however giving any guarantee in this respect. But, as several hon. members who spoke before today recalled, it was on June 19, 1215, that John Lackland and the assembled barons signed the Magna Carta. That document is the basis of English freedoms. However, we must note that it was not yet the people, but the barons, who proved themselves the wardens of public freedoms.

In its provisions, the Magna Carta of 1215 authorized the English barons to free themselves gradually from royal interference and autocracy. Later on, the petition of rights of 1627, the Bill of Rights of 1688, and the establishment act of 1701 continued aiming at a restriction of royal power, protection of individuals against the arbitrariness of the crown and recognition of an omnipotent parliament.

We must therefore conclude that the English charters are, in the last instance, not a triumph of men's natural right to freedom, but rather a pact between two conflicting forces, royalty on the one hand and, on the other, sometimes the barons, as in the case of John Lackland's Magna Carta and sometimes parliament, as in the petition of rights, the Bill of Rights and the establishment act.

The true system of the Bill of Rights was only established by the American declaration of rights of Virginia, in 1776, and by the French declaration of human rights and citizen's rights, in 1789. In the United States, as in France, violent revolutions shook off the yoke of past domination and placed the individual on a true basis of emancipation for the conquest of freedom.

As a matter of fact, we may conclude, from that brief review, that the doctrine in this matter originated in England, later to emigrate to the United States whence it returned to influence the French revolution. In the course of that peregrination, law and freedom, which first had a feudal character, gradually became an individual prerogative based on human nature.

But, when we go on to the Russian revolution of 1917, we discover that this right was subjected to another transformation. Elsewhere it had had a feudal and individual aspect; in Russia it takes on a socialistic turn. Individual freedoms, the freedom of the press, of assembly, of speech, etc., are then considered not as freedoms but as an obligation for the state to provide citizens with official papers and books, entertainment, public meetings, etc.

Those are the principles that come to light in the bill of rights of the Russian people enacted November 15, 1917, and in the new constitution of human rights passed on December 5, 1936.

Thus, it must be noted that the Soviet conception of freedom is entirely different from that of the western democracy. The Soviet freedoms are not looked upon as a right of the individual but as a task for the state, where the individual remains irrevocably subordinate to the state.

After the first world war, several European countries, such as Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Estonia and the free city of Danzig incorporated in their legislation a mixture of various aspects of the human rights now under consideration. They did not confine themselves to recognize the legal independence of the individual, but they set themselves to create a minimum of conditions necessary for his social independence. The same rights that were defined as individual stood out then as steeped in a spirit of social responsibility.

It is in this atmosphere of transformation, tempered with rights and liberties, when the league of nations had failed in the pursuit of its ideal, that the second world war broke out. After this second consecutive war, countries were further impelled to define specifically the fundamental freedoms and rights.

The former president of the United States, Mr. F. Delano Roosevelt, made a masterful speech in January 1941. That historic speech called for the realization, the recognition of the "Four Great Freedoms" for all peoples of the earth. Those four freedoms are:

(1) Freedom of speech,
(2) Freedom of worship,
(3) Freedom from want,
(4) Freedom to work for one's security.

Those freedoms claimed by Mr. Roosevelt were also proclaimed in the House of Commons by the prime minister on March 7, 1947, on April 12, 1948, on April 15, 1948, on October 28, 1949, on March 24, 1952, and on February 7, 1955.

Mr. Roosevelt's wishes gave rise later on to the United Nations Charter signed in San Francisco, on June 26, 1945.

The day the United Nations charter was signed by 50 nations, on June 26, 1945, mankind entered into a new phase. International protection was no longer a dream and the future, for all peoples of the earth, was turning towards new destinies.

The United Nations now look after the protection and respect of our rights and of our fundamental freedoms.

Canadians now wish to achieve the realization of the principles of the United Nations charter, which specified the fundamental rights belonging to each man, in the social and legal field.

That great doctrine of human freedom was clearly set out by Pius XI in his encyclical entitled Divini Redemptoris.

> Human beings must rank first among earthly realities.

And Pius XII went still further, in a letter written to the president of the social weeks of France, on July 14, 1946:

> In the last analysis, everything must tend and converge toward the liberation of human beings. It is those creatures that God placed on top of the visible universe, making of them, both in economics and in politics, the measure of all things.

On April 14, 1945, that is, a month before the signature of the United Nations charter, the executive committee of the Canadian Episcopate stated:

> Always, throughout history, the things that have compromised world peace have been the unfair treatment of minorities, the denial of civil and religious liberties, and other denials of man's innate right.

In 1946, 18 member states of the United Nations set up a commission called upon to prepare recommendations towards the development of a charter of human rights. That commission was composed of a theologian, a jurist, sociologists and moralists. Its work was to be divided in three parts:

(1) To draft a statement establishing the limits of human rights;

(2) To prepare a pact, to be signed by the various states, giving legal effect to such rights;

(3) To prepare means of enforcing and guaranteeing such rights.

In February 1947, the commission held its first meeting in Lake Success and, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Roosevelt, submitted a report of its recommendations. The first to promote the principles of that commission before the United Nations were Brazil, Lebanon and the Netherlands. And the representatives of those countries concluded:

> The responsibility of the state is to regulate human rights in the social exercise.

That universal declaration, which was adopted in the United Nations on December 10, 1948, summarizes human rights and now holds a place of honour in the minds of national leaders.

Mr. Speaker, what good will it do to defend our parliamentary liberties, our economic or intellectual freedoms if we do nothing about the fundamental freedoms of man?

On February 7, 1955, the present Prime Minister had this to say in the House of Commons:

> I think it is in the public interest to write human rights into our constitution, as a means of protecting the security not only of the state but also of its citizens.

Examining this whole question of our freedoms, he made this statement before the house on March 7, 1947:

> Let us consider this matter as members of parliament without regard to party considerations, and build the future of Canada upon the foundation of a declaration of our rights which will assure the maintenance of the priceless rights in which we believe and for the preservation of which ninety thousand Canadians gave their lives in two world wars.

Since the beginning of this discussion, we have been speaking about freedoms and human rights. Is it not proper to try and find the sources of those rights and freedoms?

In short, we can say that the enjoyment of those prerogatives man owes to God, to his own nature and to the state.

Having created man, God gave him rules which, if observed, guarantee his security and the respect of his own aspirations. One of God's commandments states:

> Thou shalt not steal.

The individual who recognizes his neighbour's property can reasonably expect that his own will be respected.

The very nature of man elects him to the free exercise of his actions and his thoughts. The hierarchical values in creation raise man to a higher level. Mineral, vegetable and animal lives have no freedom; but the three of them remain in the service of man who, by his spiritual faculties, enjoys a relative power and the free choice of his activities. Living among his fellow men, he must grow according to his human nature and remember that his neighbour deserves the same authority.

Thus comes into the picture the part played by the state which creates the favourable conditions of social life where the citizen may exercise his personality in a free but orderly atmosphere. The individual must not become an instrument or a victim of the state; it is the state which, while making laws, promotes the numerous freedoms of man.

But how can we define freedoms and rights? I do not pretend to do so adequately, since up to now the social and economic commission of the United Nations has not been able to obtain universal approval of such definitions. All I can do, is to give an acceptable explanation of them.

To recognize the freedoms of man is to admit the exercise of his natural faculties, as freedom of speech, for instance. To recognize the rights of man implies, besides, a corresponding duty on the part of his fellowmen or of the state, as the right to education. If man is free to enlighten his intelligence, his fellowmen or the state have an obligation to encourage the expansion of this freedom. Thus, right is more than freedom, since it forces the other men or the state to respect the natural aspirations of man. The citizen considers his freedoms in relation to himself. He claims his rights from his fellowmen and from the state.

Thus we shall see later on, that a Canadian bill of rights is restrictive by nature because it imposes a limitation on individuals, as well as on governments, federal or provincial.

Were those freedoms and rights written into our own Canadian constitution before this Bill C-79, was introduced?

The British North America Act does not contain any explicit statement guaranteeing individual civil freedoms, nor any definition of social and economic rights. But we may say that we find therein implicitly stated, a good part of those freedoms and rights.

In its preamble, the British North America Act states that the Canadian constitution should be similar in principle to that of Great Britain, based on the Magna Carta of 1215 with regard to the birth of the freedom of speech, conscience, association, meetings, of the right to equal treatment before the law and to presumption of innocence as long as guilt has not been established. Thus, our constitution tacitly contained the petition of rights of 1627 and the declaration of rights of 1688. Besides, several provisions of that petition are incorporated in our Criminal Code.

Also, although not conspicuous, social and economic rights are recognized, not by any general system, but by a series of laws governing, in an incomplete way, the field where those rights are formulated, like the right to unemployment insurance and family allowances.

In the Canadian constitution, we note that several rights of Canadian minorities are very specifically protected. Under the British North America Act, the federal government and the provincial governments are absolute masters in their own respective spheres, and may enact laws, provided they respect the rights of minorities.

Some of those rights concerning language and, indirectly, religion, are pointed out in sections 133 and 93.

In the same field, let us not forget equality of representation in both houses of the federal parliament: in the Senate, 24 senators per area; in the House of Commons, proportionate representation according to the population of each province. Furthermore, section 92 reserves to the provinces all matters relating to property and civil rights in the province.

Since 1867, some provinces such as Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec have passed legislation guaranteeing racial and religious freedoms.

However, all those bits and pieces of legislation and constitutional provisions point up the fact that we have no complete definition, no official proclamation of the rights of Canadian citizens. That is the reason why it is now useful and most appropriate to add such a declaration to our statutes, following the example set by the United Nations.

If you look at the various comments in Canadian newspapers, particularly over the last year, and if you consider the views set forth by leading jurists on the scope and value of such a declaration, you find that, on the whole of course, it is an expression of certain Canadian freedoms which have been in existence for a long time and which we want to proclaim formally through this Bill C-79.

If such views are expressed and are not agreed by all, it is an indication that freedom is exercised in this country, but we note that in all those comments, everybody recognizes there are many advantages in this bill.

One of the aims of the United Nations is to achieve international co-operation by developing the respect of human rights and of basic freedoms without discrimination due to race, sex, language or faith. All the members of the United Nations have pledged themselves to take individual and concerted steps towards this aim. Since the charter is a treaty, Canada has a legal obligation to act in this field. It is a project of high inspiration: the aims are among the highest.

So it is that this bill is a parapet for the government, since it reminds it that it must always keep to the straight and narrow.

Any citizen could appeal to that bill if he thought that his rights have been tampered with. Judges will have the use of an interpretation act and this Bill C-79 at once supplies a basis for the promotion of rights and freedoms.

A few speakers have expressed the fear that provincial rights might be affected by this bill. To this I would reply that a bill has to be read in full and in its proper context. Now the bill as a whole shows that only federal legislation is affected. So much so that any province wishing to pass such a bill, that is a bill of rights and freedoms, will be entitled to do so, whether the province be Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba or any other province. And I distinctly recall that last year Mr. Gerin-Lajoie, one of the recent members-elect in the next Quebec government, had a bill of human rights and freedoms in his program for Quebec. I think that the time has come to define those rights and to embody them in our legislation. The Canadian people, who have already contributed to the common effort in three wars to protect the principles of democracy and freedom, have become more conscious of the importance of defining, first inside our country, the reasons why they accept so many sacrifices. Because of Canada's role as mediator on the international scene its government is bound to provide its citizens with adequate protection before even suggesting to other countries the benefits of democratic principles.

In order to bring to our constitution the wealth of spiritual and Christian values, we should declare that our human rights come from the supreme authority of God. I humbly suggest, if this bill must be studied by a committee, that this point of view be considered.

I sincerely believe that we, Canadians, should recognize, in the very first provision of such an important bill, the reality of the divine authority and the principle that the rights we advocate derive primarily from the Creator.

(Text):

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this bill at this time. It is not my intention to rehash the arguments that have been so ably put forward by hon. members who preceded me. However, having heard some of the things hon. members have said I feel compelled to say something in at least partial reply.

I was most interested in what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) had to say and as a lawyer I was pleased to see that he had reached deeply into the writings of members of the profession and drawn at least some of his inspiration from contributions to the Canadian Bar Review. However, bearing in mind that these contributions appeared in the March, 1959 issue of that publication it is instructive to read the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association held in Vancouver in September of last year. I would direct the attention of hon. members to the publication of those proceedings wherein starting at page 85 there appears the report of the civil liberties section. Frankly one would expect that among lawyers there would be some crystallization of the opinion on the question of the bill of rights.

I recall attending the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association held in Toronto in September of 1958 shortly after the first draft of the bill had been presented to this honourable house for consideration by the representatives of the Canadian people. Perhaps it was because the election of 1958 was so recent, but unfortunately it seemed to me that at that time a certain element of partisanship was injected into the consideration given this bill. Members of the association present at the time did not approach this matter objectively. It was finally concluded that members of the association could go back home and study the bill. We observed with what result. Having let their partisan feelings die down and become more dormant they considered the question more dispassionately and we have the articles that resulted including those, for example, that appeared in the March, 1959 issue of the Canadian Bar Review.

I was amused while doing some research for material for use in these few minutes at my disposal to find traces of book mice in copies of the proceedings of the 1958 convention. I do not know what the habit is that leads people to draw lines down the side of the pages of library books. Strangely enough the book mouse whose traces I discovered must not have been of our persuasion because every passage which aroused the interest of the book mouse were of those who disagreed with the viewpoint expressed by the author of the bill.

Mr. Deschatelets: It must have been the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne).

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Lambert: I do not think I would undertake to embarrass the hon. gentleman by indicating the identity of the person I think was the imitator of mice and who left his tracks behind.

Let us look at the resolution put forward by the civil liberties section of the Canadian Bar Association, which reads:

> Whereas it is apparent that there is a wide divergence of opinions of the members of the section on the subject of a bill of rights.
> And whereas it is imperative that the views of the association should be presented to the joint committee of the houses of parliament appointed to consider a bill of rights.
> And whereas it would appear desirable that the views so presented should be those of the association as a whole and not only those of a section thereof.
> Be it resolved, therefore, that this section on civil liberties recommends to the council and executive that appropriate steps be taken to ensure that the views of the association—

An amendment is inserted—

> "And to include those articles appearing in the March, 1959 issue of the Canadian Bar Review" be presented to the joint committee as the opportunity may arise.

Those were the conclusions of the Canadian Bar Association. I recognize that inevitably there will be honest differences of opinion on a question of such vital importance as that of our civil rights. This question goes to the very root of our being and so we cannot help but differ in opinion to at least some degree.

I believe that the Leader of the Opposition indicated that he was in sympathy with the end purpose of the bill but that he had some differences with respect to the means whereby that end would be achieved. It will always be thus, but no better means within the limitations of our Canadian constitution has yet been suggested.

Again referring to the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association, at page 92 of the report there is an indication of the viewpoint of the legal profession of Canada with respect to the bill of rights:

> Now, in civil liberties, the views that are expressed in this association with regard to a bill of rights roughly categorize themselves into four basic views. Those who contend that we shouldn't tamper with it at all, that no legislation is necessary and we will leave it to the developing jurisprudence. Those that like the former bill. Those who say, "Well, a statute is fine but it should be amended." And those (who)—insist or contend for a basic amendment to the British North America Act.

For those who contend that we should not tamper with the present situation at all but should look with confidence to Great Britain where the civil rights we possess had their origin I suggest we should examine their situation to see whether or not there is need for a bill of rights. If hon. members want some very instructive reading I commend to their attention a book entitled "Laws and Orders" by Sir Carleton Allen which followed the book entitled "The New Despotism" by Lord Hewart. There hon. members will see just what can take place under an unwritten constitution. Those hon. members who were in Great Britain during the war will remember regulation No. 18 (b). Those who are lawyers with an academic bent will also recall the famous case of Liversidge v. Anderson.

Regulation 18(b) gave the secretary of state the power to detain any particular person—and I paraphrase—if satisfied that it was necessary to do so. True enough, this was under conditions of war and terrible war, and conditions may be somewhat different. But I think everyone will agree with me, as I agree with the author of this learned text, that regulation 18(b) disappeared none too soon from the statute books of Great Britain. There were other regulations made under their food control—and here it is elementary—any law or any regulation made under any statute should be published and should come to the knowledge of the people who are governed by such laws. And yet food regulations were passed in Great Britain during the war which had written into them, notwithstanding the fact that this regulation was not even published, "it shall be operative, and there will be an offence committed under these regulations by any breach thereof notwithstanding any nonpublication." I know of cases where people were actually convicted who did not even know, had no possible chance of knowing, that such a regulation existed. These are the things that we must guard against. Again, gentlemen, may I commend to you a reading of this text. It will show you what can happen.

No one here will deny that there have been excesses. After all to err is human and we are human; but because we have erred in the past—and I say this without any sense of partisanship—because there have been errors committed in the past and errors could be committed today and errors will be committed tomorrow, is that any argument for not putting on our statute books, in so far as we are empowered in the federal jurisdiction to do so, a statute which will relieve as much as we can against such a form of tyranny? We cannot say that this is perfect; otherwise, long before now this world would be perfect. This group, this nation, has not a sudden monopoly of superintelligence.

However, in commenting further, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) this afternoon stated that this bill will not create anything—and I am paraphrasing my notes of what he said—people will not realize that this is anything important; that it will not affect their daily lives. What does he want, something that sticks out like the Income Tax Act or the Criminal Code? People are not so conscious of habeas corpus or writs of mandamus, and yet they do know they exist, that they protect. If you asked the average man, what about habeas corpus, I think he would scratch his head and say, what is it? But yet it does exist. The hon. member further said that this should be something more than just a fizzling squib. I suggest to you that this is a beacon; this is something toward which we are pointing.

Human rights and civil rights are not something that you can cram down people's throats. I do not know—the hon. member did not suggest what he had in mind or how he could go about it—whether he wanted something dressed up in fancy language that sounded sonorous. This is a bill in simple language, and those elemental rights which we possess are simple rights.

There are those who complain that this bill has no sanctions; how can it function? But enforceability of a bill does not require a sanction. Surely its enforceability lies in the restoration of an aggrieved right and if subsequently there may lie an action in law. That is something further upon which I do not wish to speculate.

There are others who would object that this is poor timing. Why? Because they say we will not have time to consider it. Most of the arguments that have been put forward on behalf of the opposition against this bill have come forward from the criticisms which appeared in March of 1959, and those self-same gentlemen would be invited to come forward again. Those are not short essays that have been written by those learned gentlemen, but learned discourses. If anyone wishes to go into greater detail to find out what is meant, let him read.

Is there anything to be gained by the reading of those complete essays, by the detailed examination of those self-same authors? Yes, they may be brought forward to explain in part or to elucidate on some particular aspects; but do they have to present the whole case all over again? All it means is that somebody has to go and do a little homework.

There is one final point that I should like to make. This does not exist to such a great extent or it may not exist to such a great extent in the federal jurisdiction, but there has been a tendency in the United Kingdom and here for legislation to be drafted, considered and passed under which authority is delegated by parliament to boards and commissions which fulfil quasi-judicial functions and from whose rulings there is no appeal. While there may be some argument for finality in some of these matters, it is my firm conviction that that is one feature of our administration as government, be it at any level, which must be curbed rather than extended.

I hope that this bill may serve the purpose of restoring to an individual those rights which may have been removed from him by the decision of a board, commission or official, from whom it is stated that there shall be no appeal. How else can rights be restored if transgressed?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have been following him with interest, but can he tell us how this bill will deal with rights that may in any way have been affected by decisions of administrative tribunals? What right of appeal will be given against such decisions under this bill?

Mr. Lambert: It would be my view, that under this bill if any of those rights which are enumerated in the bill, if any of those processes which have been enumerated in the bill have been transgressed the provisions of this bill could be invoked to provide an appeal against the ruling; that is my hope. I should like to hear the views of my learned friend from Essex East (Mr. Martin) on this subject.

Mr. Chevrier: Where in the bill does that appear, if I may ask?

Mr. Lambert: There is no definite statement, but I would say that a careful reading of section 3, combined with section 2, in the appropriate cases—I will not say in all cases —will show that this bill may be invoked to relieve against any transgressions of the rights therein enumerated.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me say that we have been talking a lot about rights. I would say that we must never forget that for every right there is a concomitant duty; wherever there is a right of the individual as against his fellow citizen there is a corresponding duty; wherever there is a right of the individual against the state there is a corresponding duty; wherever there is a right of the state against the individual there is a corresponding duty. As long as we do not forget that, then we will see to the fulfilment of the preservation of the spirit of civil rights.

In termination, may I quote a citation which appears on the title page of this book, "Law and Orders", which I think is appropriate to our consideration this evening:

> Amongst many other points of happiness and freedom, which Your Majesty's subjects of this kingdom have enjoyed under your royal progenitors... there is none which they have accounted more dear and precious than this, to be guided and governed by certain rule of law... Out of this root hath grown the indubitable right of the people of this kingdom not to be made subject to any punishment that shall extend to their lives, lands, bodies or goods, other than such as are ordained by the common laws of this land or the stautes made by their common consent in parliament.
> Petition of the House of Commons, July 7, 1610.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and this government for again taking the lead in following the example of the province of Saskatchewan. I am afraid that this bill in its present form would be no more effective, so far as Canadian citizens are concerned in the various provinces throughout the country, than if when this government followed the lead of the Saskatchewan government in connection with hospital insurance no other province had joined in the plan.

Today we have seen member after member on the government side of the house get up and almost slavishly express his confidence in the Prime Minister. I must confess that prior to the election of 1957 I possibly shared that confidence, perhaps not to the same extent as other hon. members, in the Prime Minister. However, I must say that since that time my faith, if not theirs, has been shattered. It has been shattered for a number of reasons. One of the first reasons that comes to my mind is the year of inaction followed by no action when the rights of Canadian citizens in Newfoundland were affected. Then in spite of all the glowing speeches we heard when the Prime Minister was a member of the opposition, we see four sessions of parliament go by under this government and then in the dying days of the fourth session, amid the rush of extended hours, we finally have this bill before us for discussion. In fact, I believe this is the first time I have had the privilege of speaking in this house after ten o'clock at night.

Then more recently we have seen a violation of human rights that has shaken the world. I will admit that the Prime Minister has told us South Africa knows his opinion. I am sure that most Canadians do not, and certainly those with whom I talked are not sure what the Prime Minister's opinion is of this violation of civil rights that we have seen recently carried out so brutally in South Africa. Furthermore we still see cases in which the very livelihood of civil servants hangs upon the words of hon. members here, without any trial or any recourse. In fact, we see that civil servants are even being denied overtime pay for the extended hours they work while we are sitting here discussing this bill of rights. In addition, they are denied the right to bargain for that, which privilege other citizens of this country enjoy.

But, both the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) admitted past mistakes. I think the words of the Prime Minister were to the effect that whatever the mistakes of the past, here is a step by which we are going on to the future. When this bill was introduced last Friday it seemed to me that the stage was set just a little too pat. It was introduced on the anniversary of Canada's birthday; all the faithful were here in greater number than normal on a Friday and the galleries were filled. I am wondering, if that was not what prompted some person to send this post card which I received this morning. The message reads:

Exercise your jaws on this for a while.

It contains a cutout of the Globe and Mail a little advertisement which reads as follows:

To flee Chauvinism non-citizen needs job and pay.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with hon. members who have spoken so far and who say that this is the first step. I was also pleased to hear the Prime Minister state so clearly that this government is willing to meet half way with any province which desires to extend this bill of rights to their provinces. I hope the example we saw two years ago with regard to hospital insurance catches on just as rapidly with regard to a bill of rights and that the provinces fall in line once the lead is taken by the federal government.

I recall the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) saying before lunch that he greatly feared a C.C.F. bill of rights. For the benefit of the hon. member, if he is not aware of it, may I say this. At the present time we have in our provinces four Tory governments, three Liberal governments, two Social Credit governments and only one C.C.F. government; but that one C.C.F. government is the only one which for years has had on the statute books a bill of rights.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Alberta has one.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I noticed that neither the hon. member nor any others on the government side have stated just in what respect they disagree with the bill of rights that is on the statute books of the province of Saskatchewan. Several of the government members stated that new Canadians are calling for a bill of rights. Not only are new Canadians calling for a bill of rights; old Canadians are calling for a bill of rights and they have been doing so for years.

I wonder whether we might not sell them a false bill of goods by just passing this bill of rights in its present form. Maybe they will think that because the federal government has passed a bill of rights their rights are protected wherever they may live in this country. Unfortunately they may find that is not so.

I note that on Friday the Prime Minister said that it is impossible at the present time to get an amendment to the constitution or to get the consent of all the provinces. I also notice that many of the government members have, like parrots, repeated that statement today. However, I have yet to see any evidence, let alone any proof, that this is so. I should like to know which provinces object to passing a bill of rights. Certainly the province of Saskatchewan does not object because it has one on its statute books right now. Surely all the other three parties represented in provincial governments across the country believe just as much in human rights and fundamental freedoms as do the C.C.F. I maintain that we have no evidence, whatsoever, that it is impossible today to get the provinces to agree to an amendment to the constitution which would incorporate a bill of rights that would be applicable to all Canadians regardless of where they live in this country. Why should we at this time pass what in effect will be not much more than an empty shell?

I notice that just in this session the Prime Minister and the government were able to get the ten provinces to agree to an amendment to the constitution with regard to judges' retirement. Surely if they will agree to that amendment they will also agree to something as basic as the fundamental freedoms and rights of the citizens of this country. If we fail at this time to pass an amendment to the British North America Act that will make this applicable to all Canadian citizens regardless of where they may live I would say that we will find ourselves in a position where we will have a bill of rights but it will not mean anything outside of possibly the province of Saskatchewan; however, we will have a bill of rights.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to have the opportunity this evening to join hon. members, from all sides of the house in general support of this bill. I firmly believe that when most of the other things we have discussed and most of the other bills we have passed this year will have been forgotten this bill of rights will be the memento that will make 1960 a memorable year in the history of Canada. In the concept of this bill and in its idealism we have the foremost expression of our Canadianism that we will show to the whole world.

The timing of the bill was excellent. Year after year across countless generations to come students in school will open up their history books to read that it was on July 1, 1960, our Dominion day, that into the parliament of Canada was introduced one of the most important pieces of legislation ever to come before this House of Commons. And the timing is excellent in the session. Most minor things are almost through, and we now have the time, if we want to take it, in which to deal thoroughly with this vital bill. I hope every member of the house will take advantage of his opportunity to speak during the debate on this bill of rights.

It seems to me that we spend too little time in remembering how this nation was born and of what we stand for. It was only a few years ago that this nation was settled. Why? It was settled chiefly for freedom; and no other reason can compare to that one. People from other countries came here to find freedom of worship, freedom of thought and freedom of speech. It was the people of freedom who founded this nation. No matter what we accomplish in terms of material things; no matter what riches we accumulate; no matter the power we may achieve in this world, we should always remember that our strength and our Canadianism comes from the fact that we are a free people; that we respect each other's rights and that out of freedom we have built the nation we have today.

It is a pity that this bill was not passed years ago. What a wonderful thing it would have been if the fathers of confederation could have incorporated it in the British North America Act. What a wonderful thing it would have been if it had been a part of our history all of these years, in a way in which every school child could see it and could understand it. I think part of the reason why the great immigration came to the United States of America in the first half of this century and the last half of the last century was the fact that the United States of America made clear that above all else it represented the land of the free; that there was a country to which a man could come from any part of the earth and find freedom to do as he liked within the law, and to find equality of opportunity among his fellows. That is what we missed in the first 90 years of our life; we should have spelled out for everyone across this world to hear that we stood for freedom first, and that everything else was really secondary to that consideration.

This bill is in two parts. First of all, it is a declaration of our faith in a free Canada and of what Canada stands for in terms of rights of the individual. It is a declaration that we must show to all the world so that everyone will know how we revere the rights of man.

We talk from time to time in this house about gifts to underdeveloped countries. We discuss how we can assist new nations to develop and find the best mode of living and standards. I think more than anything else the gift that Canada has to give to the world is to be found in the fact that we have built this nation in freedom; and that in freedom is the fundamental concept of our Canadianism and our nation. We should take our declaration wherever the Canadian flag flies; wherever Canadians go they should bring with them that Canada is free; that all who live here are free; that we are bound in trust to cling to this before all else.

The first part of this bill is a declaration of basic human freedoms; it is the declaration of our people of our faith, in freedom and justice. The second part of the bill provides the sanction of our declaration. It has been said that this bill has no sanction. What more positive sanction can there be than that which is spelled out? In the future every act which comes before the courts of Canada is to be tested on this touchstone, that it must not deprive any Canadian citizen of his fundamental human rights. This will be the most important act upon the statute books of Canada. Every magistrate, every judge and every parliamentarian who from now on turns to the law of Canada must look at it through the glass of this bill of rights. Section 3 sets forth for everyone who wants to see that no Canadian may abridge the fundamental human rights of his neighbour, and that above all else in this nation we respect human freedoms and the right of the individual.

Consider the race between the ideologies of the world. The only fight we can really put up to communism and its materialistic philosophy is the fact that we are achieving the same material standards as they, or better, and are still free. We have always stood for the principle that the individual comes before the state and that is the foundation of our national heritage. Communistic nations have spread across the world the idea of economic splendour. They say if you toss the control of your life and your freedom into the pot, great economic reward will flow from your personal sacrifice to the state. Our only answer to that is that freedom comes before all these things; we must have the right to worship the way we want; the right to say what we want, and the right to support what institutions we like and to turn down those we do not like. These are more important than any economic benefits which can be offered to any man.

Mr. Speaker, our pioneers, our first settlers came to this nation to prove just that. They left their homes in England or Scotland or Ireland; and the sunny fields of Europe to carve a new nation. They were ready to leave behind everything they had acquired to travel here where they could be free. We must never forget that.

From the point of view of practical operation the work this bill will do is chiefly as a watchdog over parliament. We will adopt this bill to govern ourselves and to provide that neither by hysteria, nor by carelessness nor by any subtle way will we cut down the rights of the Canadian citizen. We must be careful from now on about delegating powers to others. True, in our common law, in the precedents of English courts and of our own some of the basic freedoms set forth here do exist at law. Most of the safeguards set out in the bill exist somewhere in our case law. But here they provide a safeguard which no one can misunderstand, so that any individual who wants to may turn to this bill for sanctuary, and take it to the courts to seek relief.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All the freedoms are not here.

Mr. MacLellan: All the basic ones are.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The political ones.

Mr. MacLellan: The most important political freedom, and the only one which really counts, is freedom of speech, and that is here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All the political ones are there.

Mr. MacLellan: All the fundamental freedoms are here, where they ought to be.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But not the economic ones.

Mr. MacLellan: We are not dealing with economic freedoms. This is a bill which codifies the rights of man we have been so proud of.

Without quibbling or question we will now have these rights as individuals, as Canadian citizens, and any man can go before the courts with a sword to claim his rights. It will strengthen the hand of every judge, and of every lawyer who pleads the cause of the oppressed or of the man shut out from his rights as a Canadian. It strengthens the arm of freedom before the courts of this land.

Our founding fathers established here a special concept of government. It was based on the philosophy that the less government we have the better. The only purpose of government is to guarantee individual freedoms. The chief purpose we pass laws in this course is to protect each other's rights. There is no such thing as absolute freedom; everyone must sacrifice something to the common cause. We cannot all run loose around the nation, we must have law. And the laws we pass every day restrict individual freedoms to a certain extent. But the chief reason why we are here is to protect our human rights and our Canadian concept that the individual comes before the state.

Any democracy must live by rule of the majority. But majority rule is only a way of deciding issues. Majority rule does not make wrong into right. A man can be injured or persecuted by majority rule. This bill is intended to protect the individual and to guarantee he is not trampled on by the majority acting wrongly. The courts have always to some extent provided this defence to Canadian citizens in one way or another; now they have a better chance to do it than ever before.

May I call it eleven o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask whoever is leading the house what we will do tomorrow and Wednesday?

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with this debate, second reading of the bill of rights. If we should complete that we shall consider item No. 4, second reading of Bill No. C-82, respecting the department of forestry.

On Wednesday, Thursday and Friday we will take estimates as set out by the leader of the house the other day.

Mr. Chevrier: Has the order been decided?

Mr. Brooks: The same order as set out on June 30. First we will complete the Department of Justice. Then we will take the R.C.M.P., national revenue, transport, external affairs, northern affairs, labour and public works.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

KITIMAT INDIAN BAND EXPENDITURES

Question No. 400—Mr. Howard:

1. For each year since January 1, 1956, has any revenue money of the Kitimat Indian band been spent without the consent of the council of that band?

2. If so, upon what dates and for what purposes was each expenditure so made?

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. 1956, No; 1957, Yes; 1958, Yes; 1959, Yes; 1960, Yes.

2. The band revenue funds were expended during the following months for relief to band members under authority of section 66(2) of the Indian Act: 1957, May, September, October, November and December; 1958, January, February and March; 1959, April, May, June, July, August, September, October; 1960, February.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, July 5, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

RESEARCH

Second report of special committee on research—Mr. Murphy.

BROADCASTING

PERSONNEL OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RADIO AND TELEVISION

Mr. John Pallett (Peel) moved:

That the special committee on broadcasting appointed June 21, 1960, be composed of Miss Aitken, Mrs. Casselman, Messrs. Asselin, Bourbonnais, Brassard (Lapointe), Caron, Chown, Creaghan, Danforth, Dorion, Drouin, Fairfield, Fisher, Forgie, Fortin, Halpenny, Keays, Lambert, MacEwan, Macquarrie, McCleave, McGrath, McIntosh, McQuillan, Pickersgill, Pratt, Pugh, Richard (Ottawa East), Robichaud, Rouleau, Simpson, Smith (Calgary South), Smith (Simcoe North), Tremblay and Webb.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION RESPECTING BASES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is going ahead with expenditures on Bomarc bases notwithstanding the fact that the right hon. gentleman said yesterday that the full potential of these weapons cannot be achieved without nuclear warheads, and that no agreement had been reached for the acquisition of these warheads.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): There is no change in government policy in that regard.

REPORTED INVESTIGATION INTO ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he can give the house any information on the story reportedly carried on the Canadian Press wires this morning to the effect that the Department of National Defence has had to call in the R.C.M.P. to investigate certain irregularities in one of the branches of the department.

79951-0—361½

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I was informed some time ago that there were certain alleged irregularities in the interservice equivalents board, and I asked the R.C.M.P. to investigate the correctness of those allegations. I have not received a report from the R.C.M.P. yet.

INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING NUCLEAR WARHEADS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the Minister of National Defence recommended to the government that Bomarc missiles for the R.C.A.F. should be equipped with nuclear warheads?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister made a perfectly clear statement of government policy yesterday regarding the use of nuclear weapons. That statement can be easily understood by anybody of average intelligence. There is, therefore, no need for me to make any further comment.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, there is a certain implication in what the minister has said that I cannot accept at face value, but I wonder whether the minister would accept a supplementary question. Does the minister agree that the authority for the use of nuclear weapons by Canadian forces must come from the President of the United States?

Mr. Pearkes: Again I can only repeat that the Prime Minister covered that point yesterday, and there is no need for me to make any further comment on the matter.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary question. I thought the Leader of the Opposition had one. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether in fact he has changed his opinion since he stated to the special committee on defence expenditures—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

Mr. Hellyer: —that his understanding was that authority had to come from the President of the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wishes to debate the matter I suggest that he leave it until the proper time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And learn to sit down when the Speaker is on his feet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: Don't lose your temper.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence as a man of average intelligence? Will the minister confirm—

An hon. Member: Don't be so modest.

Mr. Fulton: You are one of the three wise men.

Mr. Pearson: —what he is reported to have said outside the chamber, that when the Honest John ground to ground missile is supplied, which will be a year from now, our forces will then have a nuclear capability?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, the Honest John is capable of firing a nuclear warhead. We expect that the Honest John will be supplied to the Canadian forces in Europe in about a year's time.

Mr. Pearson: With a nuclear warhead?

[Later:]

Mr. Hellyer: I have one further supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence which may help to clear up some of the confusion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister believe that within the year the policy of atomic John will have an honest capability?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST U.S. NEGRO TOURISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on a newspaper report that three negro tourists from Akron, Ohio, were refused accommodation by the Windsor hotel at Buckhorn, Ontario.

In view of the urgent need to remove all forms of racial discrimination, and for the sake of Canada's good name in international relations, would the minister consider making inquiries into this report; and is he prepared to use his good offices to the end that future incidents of this nature may be avoided?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): First may I say that in so far as discrimination of this or any other kind is concerned, it can only be deplored and condemned in the strongest terms. However, this type of thing—the denial of public accommodation—is a matter which falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. The province in question has, I recall, a statute which provides penalties in cases such as this. I am also informed, but only through the press, that the department of the attorney general of Ontario is having the matter fully investigated.

I repeat what I said at the beginning, that there is nothing more serious in the interpretation given to the manner in which freedom is exercised in any country than the denial of public accommodation to people on the basis of colour.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister whether this form of discrimination would be prevented by the proposed bill of rights if it became law?

Mr. Speaker: Order. As we are debating that matter, and since the question is a request for an expression of opinion on the bill which the house now has under consideration and with regard to which hon. members are freely expressing their views, perhaps it can be deferred until we are again considering the bill in question.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—FEDERAL DISCUSSIONS WITH B.C. GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Can the minister make any statement in connection with his visit to British Columbia over the week end to discuss problems relating to the Columbia river?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I think my answer should be confined to a resumé of the agreed statement which was made at the conclusion of the meeting and which, after recording the names of those who attended, reported the fact that the representatives of the two governments had reached agreement on the position to be taken at the next meeting with the United States negotiators, which meeting is to be held in Ottawa on the 14th and 15th of this month.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question. Is there now any possibility of an agreement being signed on this matter between the two governments before the end of this session?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to determine when the session will end. We hope to have a report from the two governments as soon as possible. The actual occurrence can only be determined when we know on what date this session will end.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PORTABLE PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. I ask it because many trade unions and many hon. members are confused about the government's position concerning pension vesting.

In view of the fact that when replying to representations made by the hon. member for Welland and the hon. member for Kootenay West for the recognition of the principles of pension vesting the Minister of Finance, as reported at page 4207 of Hansard of May 24, said:

> The fact is that parliament has no jurisdiction to provide for vesting of pension rights. This is obviously a matter falling within the sphere of property and civil rights and is a matter strictly under provincial jurisdiction.

And in view of the fact that according to press reports the Minister of National Revenue assured a union committee that his department intends to carry out a thorough investigation of companies which are claiming federal tax exemptions on pension plans which in the past had not been carefully policed, in order to clarify the situation would the minister inform the house whether the government recognizes the principle of pension vesting and now intends to give favourable consideration to representations made by hon. members of this house and representatives of organized labour.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that was a tremendously long preamble. I do not believe that is a question which should be properly answered on orders of the day. As was pointed out in one paragraph of the preamble, a copy of which I received only a moment ago because I was in another place this morning, the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and myself met with Mr. Don Gillies and other representatives of the mine, mill and smelter workers union and had long consultations with him.

During that time it was suggested that there are certain weaknesses in the administration of the Income Tax Act with respect to pensions. I said that this matter would be investigated. Otherwise, as a matter of course, other than the income tax aspects of it this is a matter requiring further investigation, and I understand one is being conducted by a committee of the Ontario legislature. We will administer the Income Tax Act. I do not think anything further should be said at this time.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO PRESENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made this morning to the united automobile workers that the government would give consideration to the establishment of a royal commission to inquire into conditions that now confront that industry, will the Prime Minister give immediate consideration to the establishment of a committee of this house or to an arrangement for joint participation with the committee already established in the other place, so that the elected representatives of the people might give study to this very serious situation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think we will deal with the questions in the order in which they were dealt with today. The representatives of the united automobile workers made their representations this morning, and asked among other things that a royal commission be appointed or alternatively that the tariff commission make a survey similar to that made in 1934. That is the matter which at the moment will receive immediate consideration.

With respect to the question of setting up any further committees of the house at this point in the session, I am sure that even if I were to suggest it the suggestion would be met with the same objections, in multiplied form, that I have been hearing in recent days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question, in view of the last remark by the Prime Minister. Is he not aware that there are members who regard this problem as so serious that they would prefer to sit here all summer?

Mr. Starr: You want to mess it up.

An hon. Member: Show-off.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Whatever the seriousness of the problem may be, may I say that representatives of the workers asked for a certain course of action, and that is what is being considered.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

RUSSIA—REPORTED NEGOTIATIONS FOR IMPORT OF OIL AND MOTOR CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister inform the house whether negotiations for the import from the Soviet union of the most unlikely commodities Canada needs, namely 2 million bushels of oil—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Badanai: —two million barrels of oil and 3,000 motor cars are still going on?

Mr. Ricard: You did not have time to study the question.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Will the hon. member please repeat the question? I missed part of it.

Mr. Badanai: Can the minister inform the house whether negotiations for the import from the Soviet union of the most unlikely commodities Canada needs, namely 2 million barrels of oil and 3,000 motor cars, are still going on?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge other than from press reports that businessmen are interested in importing those articles. A completely false report has appeared in certain papers and journals in this country to the effect that I made some deal with the Russians with regard to oil. The only specific commodity mentioned in the year-long negotiations with the Russians was wheat.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister when the house is going to have an opportunity to discuss the Russian trade treaty?

Mr. Churchill: Just a soon as it is reported from the other house.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

"CLOSE-UP"—ALLEGED PAYMENT TO PARTICIPANT FOR FABRICATED INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister in a position to comment upon a report carried in the Toronto Telegram that the so-called divorce co-respondent who appeared on "Close-Up" has stated that the information she gave in great detail on her twilight activities was faked for a fee of $150 from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I heard something of this as I came into the house a moment ago. Together with the Prime Minister, I have been meeting a delegation of the U.A.W. this morning; therefore I have not had time to do my reading of that great family journal. But if the report was carried in the Telegram as the result of an interview between a responsible staff member of the Telegram and the person in question—that is, if the person was found—and if the report is correct, then it certainly will be investigated very thoroughly by the C.B.C. I can assure the house that this matter was checked upon by responsible senior officials of the C.B.C. in Ottawa and they were assured that the story was authentic.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received a resolution from the federation of Ontario mayors and reeves asking for a probe into the serious unemployment condition in this country?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier is most persistent in his question, but again I must disappoint him by saying no.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the condition as it exists in Canada, with the extent of which I am sure the minister is familiar, will the minister give consideration to the establishment of a committee composed of representatives of industry, management, labour and business to discuss and determine the causes of unemployment?

Mr. Starr: The government realizes its responsibility in many fields, and when it devises ways and means of coping with these problems announcements will be made accordingly.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the importance of unemployment in our country, does the Minister of Labour not think the time has come when his answers to questions should not be of an evasive kind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member should look back at the answers he used to give.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is not evasive—

An hon. Member: It is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: —but it is provocative and contrary to the rules.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTH AFRICA—REPORTED INDICATION AT CONFERENCE AS TO FUTURE STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the report in the Globe and Mail this morning to the effect that in the parliament of South Africa there has been an indication that at the commonwealth prime ministers' conference in London an interpretation was given by the prime ministers of the United Kingdom, Canada and Australia that in the event of South Africa becoming a republic they would give a lead in retaining it in the British commonwealth?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): If the house will allow me to make a general reference preliminary to answering that question, I will do so. The question came before the prime ministers' conference as to whether assurance would be given that in the event that South Africa by a referendum were to set up a republic, the admission of South Africa to the commonwealth might be accepted. That question was dealt with in the report I gave in the house, in which I stated that the particular paragraph in the communique of the conference was to this effect:

> ... that membership in the commonwealth is not a formality. These words speak for themselves. They make clear that the prime ministers were not prepared to give an advance assurance that South Africa might remain a member of the commonwealth in the event that a decision was made to adopt the status of a republic. Therefore, the important point is that if a change of status does take place as a result of the referendum, the consent of the other commonwealth governments will be required as a pre-condition of continued membership.

Then I added these words:

> Again I emphasize the fact that this was accepted by all.

In so far as the question is concerned, may I say most unequivocably that nothing was said by me which would indicate or justify the conclusion that any advance acceptance was assured in the event that a referendum vote was in favour of the setting up of a republic.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO USE OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In the light of his reply of yesterday to the hon. member for Welland, may I ask whether the foreign exchange control fund has been used within recent months in order to sustain the value of the Canadian dollar at an artificially high level in relationship to the United States dollar?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATURAL GAS

REPORTED U.S. ATTEMPT TO SET PRICES TO ALBERTA PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has his attention been drawn to an Associated Press dispatch from Washington indicating that the United States federal power commission proposes to attempt to regulate natural gas prices to the producers in Alberta? If his attention has been drawn to the article, what position does the Canadian government propose to take in this matter?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the article to which the hon. member refers, but its subject matter was drawn to my attention many weeks ago. It was based on the report to the federal power commission, of an official who was reporting to the commission with regard to certain export licences from Canada that were under consideration. Whether the matter has gone any further than just that report of an official, I do not know. The most recent information I have is that the federal power commission has not made a determination on the application before it. Until that is done it would be impossible to determine whether there would be any effect whatsoever on Canadian sources of supply or on the amount of money charged at the wellhead or things of that nature.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Has the Canadian government any representative following the hearings in Washington in order to see whether any attempt is being made by the United States authority to regulate Canadian producers?

Mr. Churchill: The subject is being followed closely by the national energy board. I have discussed the matter with the chairman. We have stationed at Washington an official of the Department of Trade and Commerce who is an expert on matters of this nature, and he is watching this situation closely.

Mr. McIlraith: If I may, I should like to ask a further supplementary question, Mr.

Speaker. I understand that Premier Manning of Alberta has protested the suggestion by the United States authority, or at least the press report so indicates. Will the minister consider having the Canadian government protest what is attempted to be done if an investigation of the facts warrants it?

Mr. Churchill: Most certainly, Mr. Speaker, if it proceeds further than the stage I mentioned earlier, namely a report of an official to the federal power commission.

SPORTS

OLYMPIC GAMES—INQUIRY AS TO SELECTION OF 1968 SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of press reports in western papers, I should like to know the position of the federal government in deciding the location of the 1968 Olympic games. According to the news item, Fernie has not been mentioned as a possible ideal location for this event. Apparently erroneous reports are being circulated in British Columbia that Garibaldi park has been decided on by the federal government.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has nothing whatsoever to do with selecting the site for the 1968 Olympic games.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, oh.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he will check on a question. I have been waiting for some weeks for an answer to question No. 394. The reason I ask him to do so is that I asked the same question two years ago, on a different date, and obtained the material much more quickly.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RECOGNITION AND PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

The house resumed, from Monday, July 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for second reading of Bill No. C-79, to provide for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Winch.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose last evening I was commenting that it seemed to me the bill of rights was divided into two separate sections. In the first place, clause 2 of the bill contains a declaration of the fundamental rights of Canadians as individuals; clause 3 of the bill sets forth the sanctions or the operative part of the bill.

As to the declaration of the rights of Canadians as individuals, it has been said that all the rights that are listed here already exist in the law of Canada. That is true. Indeed, the clause itself says that these rights have always existed in Canadian law. I submit that is the reason the clause "declares" and does not "enact" these freedoms. I think it would have been folly, when these rights and freedoms are already recognized in our law and have been for many years, to have attempted in this statute to enact them.

As to clause 3 of the bill, that establishes a watchdog over parliament and the judiciary to guarantee that these freedoms are not overrun by statutes of this parliament. From now on any man who wants to find out what his rights are need not be a constitutional lawyer or a political scientist able to turn up the cases and the precedents which have been built up over the years. Instead he can turn to the bill of rights. At the same time, if any judge or parliamentarian wants to test any act which has come or comes before this house to see whether it abridges our fundamental freedoms and basic rights, he has only to turn to clause 3 of this bill.

Clause 3 provides that no enactment by statute in the past or in the future shall be applied or construed so as to submit anyone to arbitrary arrest or imprisonment or to authorize or impose inhuman punishment. It provides the right to counsel. All these things may have hitherto existed somewhere in our law, but now they are spread out in this bill for everyone to see.

As far as we as members of parliament are concerned, I think the most important part of the bill is clause 3. From now on we will watch more closely every bill which comes before us, and every act which has been passed will come under the special scrutiny of the public of Canada and the bench who will see that it does not override the fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians as individuals. It will also ensure that everyone has fair treatment in any contest between the state and himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes I would like to deal with the prime objection to this bill which has been raised on a constitutional argument. As I understand it, there are two ways in which the British North America Act could be amended. First, if this bill were to apply not only in this parliament but in every province of Canada, then the provinces would have to join with the dominion in requesting an amendment to the British North America Act. Then the bill as a part of the British North America Act would apply everywhere throughout the nation and in both federal and provincial fields. Or, the British North America Act could be amended under the 1949 amendment, I think it is section 91 (1)(a), since this bill deals only with matters coming within federal authority, by an address of both houses of this parliament to the British parliament.

With regard to an amendment jointly entered into by the dominion and all the provinces, it does not seem to me that we have any right to ask that of the members of other legislatures. We may show leadership to the provinces, and if they wish to do so there is nothing to prevent them from adopting this bill or similar bills in their provincial legislatures. I do not think it is up to us to interfere in their legislatures or to suggest to the provinces what procedures or practices they should follow. We will have shown them here what we think should be the law of Canada, and by doing so we suggest to them that a similar act might commend itself to them.

Mr. Speaker, I think we would be presumptuous if we asked the provincial legislatures to seek an amendment to the British North America Act which would limit the powers and authority of their legislatures when they are now so jealous, and properly so, of the powers of their governments. After all, why should such a bill be placed beyond the reach of the legislatures of Canada? Why should not members of parliament who have brought forward this bill be empowered to repeal it as regards federal matters? This bill has been sponsored by the public of Canada, and I believe the public of Canada wants to retain the right to amend it, to change it, or to repeal it if they see fit to do so.

As to the second method of amending the British North America Act, this parliament could by a joint address ask the British parliament to amend the British North America Act without the consent of the provinces, inasmuch as this statute refers only to matters within federal concern. But what would be the gain from that? We have spoken so many times during this debate of the constitution of Canada. The British North America Act does not constitute the constitution of Canada; it is only that part of the constitution which delineates the authority of the provinces vis-à-vis the federal authority, limiting the authority of each.

The British North America Act does not contain the whole constitution of Canada. Most of the important parts of our constitution are not written at all; they come to us from the customs and traditions of many years. Much of the most important part of our Canadian constitution is to be found in a hundred statutes spread through the statute books and in many decisions of the courts which define the rights of citizens and of legislative bodies both federal and provincial.

Mr. Speaker, by proposing that we pass Bill No. C-79 we do amend the constitution of Canada. We set forth in writing rights which heretofore did not exist in the same form in any statute. We establish a special statute of interpretation and make it part of our constitution, so that from now on all federal statutes are tested in accordance with this one.

An amendment under section 91 (1)(a) of the British North America Act gives us no more, as far as entrenchment is concerned, than this bill does today. A section 91 (1)(a) enactment can be amended by a joint address on a resolution introduced in this house and passed also in the Senate, with one debate in each chamber. But to repeal this act would require not only a resolution but in addition first, second and third readings in this house, providing for several elaborate debates on the bill. I firmly believe that the only way any federal statute can be entrenched is by the insistence of the public of Canada that it remain the law of Canada. If at any time the Canadian people want to change this bill they are free to do so, and we would not want to have it any other way. But certainly to amend the British North America Act would give this bill no sacrosanct quality which it would not have after passage in this house.

In conclusion I would like to express my compliments to the Prime Minister, inasmuch as the introduction of this bill and this debate are in a way the culmination of a major portion of his life's work. Over many years and during many sessions he has advocated a bill of rights which would set forth for all Canadians everywhere what their rights are. He has always advocated that bills passed by parliament should be subject to special scrutiny to see that the fundamental freedoms of Canadian citizens were not trampled upon. He has always felt that there should be a statute which at least declared what our basic rights as citizens are so that any man who felt aggrieved could go before a court and point to a statute on the books which guaranteed him certain fundamental freedoms, like his freedom of religion, his freedom of speech, his right of freedom from discrimination because of his race, his national origin or his colour, and his right to retain what is his until he is deprived of it by due process of law.

This is the principle of the bill of rights. It is an overriding statute to which any individual can flee for sanctuary regardless of orders in council, administrative regulations or so-called emergency situations that arise in the hysteria of the moment. It is simply a specific, basic recognition of the principle that society exists for the individual and not the individual for society. And if any man ever wishes to show that he has been wronged, he will in the future be able to rely on a concrete statute which places his rights as a human being and as a citizen in this land beyond question or doubt.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree with me that in this debate we have listened to a considerable number of constructive and able speeches. Certainly the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has made a speech that deserves the recognition which I give it as being the careful analysis of a serious-minded member who is dedicated, as we all are in this house, to the principles and the concepts of human freedom.

Whether we agree with this bill in the way suggested by its proposer, or whether we seek to improve it along the lines of the suggestions which have been made, notably by the Leader of the Opposition, there can be no doubt that in all parts of this house every hon. member in every political party is firm in the belief that our society, predicated as it is on the existence and continuation of human freedoms, does present to totalitarian countries a unity of understanding and conviction as to the primacy of the individual in relation to the state.

But we cannot agree with the Prime Minister that the measure before the house will, for the first time in Canadian history, recognize in law the freedom of the press. His actual words were:

> —this is the first time in Canadian history that freedom of the press is going to be recognized under law.

That is not an accurate statement of the situation. That certainly is not a correct characterization of the effect of this bill; for the fact is that every human right and fundamental freedom with which this particular measure is concerned is now protected by law in this country. There are now in existence effective legal remedies to protect these human rights in Canada. That has been the situation, and that will continue to be the situation after this bill becomes law.

What are the facts? We have in this country inherited the British traditions of government and constitutional law. We have thereby inherited the historical safeguards of the subject. What are they? They are, in addition to Magna Carta, the petition of rights, the habeas corpus act, the bill of rights and the act of settlement. Our statute law, more particularly the growing body of judicial decisions, gives security to the individual as no other measure, I believe, can hope to do. This bill will not change that. This bill will not add something to our legal safeguards which does not at present exist. This bill has the value of being a declaration of the convictions of this parliament with regard to human rights and fundamental freedoms, but I submit that in its present form it is no more than that.

I do not deny the value of a declaration by this parliament of something that has long been recognized in our fundamental law and which, particularly in the last decade, has been recognized in this country by our courts and particularly by the Supreme Court of Canada. I am sure the Prime Minister wants this measure to be, in its final form, the most responsible and effective measure possible. In order to achieve that objective, I do hope that an opportunity will be presented in a committee of this house to afford to those who by training and interest are experts in this field an occasion to offer submissions.

Reference has been made by many hon. members in the course of this debate to the work of those who in March, 1959 put in writing in the Canadian Bar Review their views with regard to the bill of rights now before the house. An opportunity should be given to these gentlemen—to Mr. Lederman, to Mr. McWhinney, to Mr. Bowker, to Mr. Louis-Philippe Pigeon, to Professor Bora Laskin, to Professor F. R. Scott, to Mr. Albert S. Abel, to Mr. Donaldson, to Mr. Carter, to Mr. Mundell and others—of appearing before this committee and putting forward their views on this measure. We should have an opportunity of examining the deputy minister of justice. We should afford the opportunity to all the organizations which have made representations to the Prime Minister and the government in this matter to appear before the committee. In other words, nothing short of the most careful examination of this bill ought to be afforded, no matter how long that takes; because in years to come we will have confusion and chaos in judicial interpretation, in judicial law-making, if this bill does not emerge in a form as perfect as it is possible for human beings to contrive by the use of words.

I know the deep interest on the part of the Prime Minister in this bill of rights. He and I have been members of this house for a long time, and I do not deny for a moment that his interest in this subject has been one which reflects his own legal training and his own concept of the role of government in society and the importance of freedom in society without which human personality cannot continue to grow and become truly enriched.

But having said that I say to the Prime Minister that this bill is not the best bill that could be brought forward. The hon. gentleman himself, I am sure, would recognize that if he would recall the words which he uttered at the Canadian Bar Association meeting referred to last evening by the hon. member for Edmonton West, when he said that this bill would be introduced at the beginning of this session and that a joint committee of both houses would be set up to give study to its implications and effect.

This bill is deficient not only for those reasons but because of another weakness. I express a prejudice in this area as a common law lawyer. The bill is deficient in terms of its weakness in reflecting the danger of rigid codification. In saying that I pay my respects at once to the civil law lawyers. There is the danger of restriction in trying to put into the document certain existing rights which will be expanded in the light of new situations, as we now know. The rights we talk about today —certainly economic rights and legal rights too—are not those mainly discussed in the last century. In a quarter of a century from now, in the light of this nuclear age, who is going to deny that there may emerge new situations that will create at least concepts of new rights and new obligations?

This bill deals only with our political liberties and with some of our legal rights. It does not deal with economic liberties. It deals with freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of association, freedom of conscience and freedom of religion. Yes, it deals with all of these things. These freedoms are now guaranteed under the law of this country as a result of the incorporation into our fundamental law of the great charters to which I referred a moment ago, and more particularly the decisions of our courts, notably the Supreme Court of Canada in such instances as the Switzman case, the Saumur case, the Roncarelli case, among others. These cases now have gone far to establish these political freedoms so inherent in our parliamentary system that they cannot be looked upon as the property of the provinces. One judge has given the obiter dictum that it may even be that this parliament itself could not interfere with these freedoms, although the court has not really pronounced on that subject.

Yes, political freedoms are referred to in this bill, but it is not as a result giving to the citizen a greater security of enjoyment than what is now provided for in the law. Our legal liberties are partly mentioned but not our economic liberties, except for section 2 (a) referring to property. There is no mention nor is there any declaration of the conviction that must stand behind even these newly conceived rights. It may be that it is difficult to put into a charter like this what we mean by economic rights; but at a time when society is evolving and when the political philosophy of every party in this house subscribes to the view of full employment, is it unfair or extravagant to suggest in this twentieth century that we have the right to place alongside our political freedoms, with no less effect, those rights that affect the economic well being of the citizen?

We must not forget that the declaration of human rights to which the Prime Minister attaches so much importance deals in large measure with economic and social matters. The declaration of human rights says that all men have the right to the economic and social discoveries of our age, to the economic and social benefits of our time. The declaration of Philadelphia subscribed to by this country along with all the other United Nations in 1943, declared in as solemn a form as the declaration of independence that the nations that could use their powers and resources to wage war could also use the same powers and resources to provide for economic and social welfare.

I say that a bill of rights is not complete that does not take into account these economic rights. What are they? They are, it is true, tied up in some way with the concept of property, but they go far beyond that. They include such things as the freedom of an employer to hire at rates and under conditions which he may determine. They also include the right of a worker to his job—a proprietary right in his job—and the freedom to strike and to picket within the law, and to bargain collectively. Those are the new recognitions of rights and freedoms which in this day and age cannot be given a secondary place. That was possible in the nineteenth century, but that is not possible today.

Because this bill of rights does not deal with such rights as I see them, it is on that account deficient. Nor does this bill deal with liberty in what one might call its human rights or egalitarian sense; such things as fair employment practice laws, fair accommodation laws, equal pay for women laws, all laws which emancipate women, the right to election, the right to medical care, the right to disability pensions, and so on. Are we to say that these are not rights? Are we to say that in the objectives we have placed for ourselves we are not to regard these as legitimate aspirations?

They are not absolutes any more than the declaration of political rights and freedoms in this bill can be regarded as absolute. These must be qualified. Freedom of the press is not referred to in the law as an absolute, although in this bill it is referred to as such. Surely in the consideration of the freedom of the press we must take into account that the law has taken in certain qualified safeguards, including the right to take an action for defamation of character, which would be and is a limitation under our law guaranteeing the freedom of the press. And so, Mr. Speaker, the bill is deficient for these reasons. In my judgment an opportunity undoubtedly ought to be given so that we can consider these matters when we get to the committee.

Is it unfair to suggest to the Prime Minister that the bill is somewhat vague and ambiguous in its present form? Are we satisfied, for instance, that the method to which we have resorted in order to incorporate these freedoms is the most effective one? To paraphrase the language of the Prime Minister, we are going to pass a bill that comes within section 91 of the British North America Act. We are not, the right hon. gentleman said, in any way going to interfere with the jurisdiction of the provinces. To that end we are simply passing an act of this parliament, an act with all the ordinary attributes of a bill that might be presented by a government or a private member.

But surely the Prime Minister and all those interested in civil liberties are concerned about the totality of freedom in our country, and not a measure of civil liberties which might be practised in a Canadian railway station, in a uranium plant, or in those areas that come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the dominion. We want to see these freedoms extended and guaranteed all over our country, any place, in any section of our country, and by anyone and for anyone. That is not what this bill does.

We have suggested, first of all through the Leader of the Opposition, that the proper way to bring forward a bill of rights is by embedding it in our constitution. That presupposes an arrangement with the provinces; that presupposes a conference with the provinces and agreement either as to a constitutional amendment through action on the part of this parliament, or through action by this parliament and by all the legislatures.

The Prime Minister has given no indication that he has endeavoured to try and bring about such an arrangement. It may be that as a result of the study which this committee will give—which I hope it will be able to give—to the bill it will be possible for us even yet to suggest to the government that we ought to deal with this matter comprehensively and with all the legislative jurisdictions which have some responsibility in the preservation of human rights in this country.

There are bills of rights now in Alberta and Saskatchewan. If embodying this idea in the constitution is not acceptable, could we not agree to have a conference with the provinces to discuss these matters; could we not at least make an effort to avoid the divisibility of enjoyment of these rights, so at least there could be parallel declarations by all the provinces affirming their conviction in the general declaration that we make here in this bill? That at least could be attempted.

This bill because of its vague language, such as that contained in clause 2 dealing with the question of property and of due process of law, will, I am sure, provide occasion for much litigation and legal argument. It is regrettable that the bill is limited by being made applicable only at the federal level; for in my opinion these questions of civil liberties should not be treated separately and differently in the various divisions of our country, and I am sure no one, including the Prime Minister, wants to see that kind of impression created or that situation developed.

The bill, of course, has many omissions. For instance, it is not clear in clause 3 what is meant by the phrase "all the acts of the parliament of Canada enacted before or after the commencement of this part". Clause 2 reads:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights.

Then the rights are enumerated. It is not clear that this bill does not in fact in these very words, and particularly those that follow, interfere with provincial matters. Does "Canada" here mean Canada in a geographical sense? I know what the Prime Minister intends. He said in this house it did not; he said this bill was to apply only to matters that came within the competence of the federal government. But the courts, when they come to interpret this bill in relation to other statutes or by itself, will not look at what the Prime Minister said in this house because, under the judicial rules of interpretation, it is not open to any judge, in order to ascertain the meaning of a statutory word, to make reference to what was said in the debates of parliament or of a legislature. Therefore what the Prime Minister intended will not be applicable or will not assist the judges in arriving at the decisions they will have to make.

There may be something in the argument made by Louis-Philippe Pigeon in the Canadian Bar Review, at page 66, in which he refers to Canada as meaning in the geographical sense. If that interpretation is correct, his conclusion is that this is a violation of section 92 of the British North America Act, and particularly of the property and civil rights clause. If that is the situation, if the language is capable of that interpretation, can we not see at once that trouble is going to ensue in the interpretation of this measure unless this imprecision is corrected? It is for that reason that Mr. David Mundell, Q.C. suggests, among three recommendations that he makes, that not only should this bill be sent to the supreme court for interpretation, but that the language ought to be tightened so that nothing is done in this legislation to interfere with the constitutional powers of the provinces.

The same argument applies to the use of the word "property" in clause 2(a). That is a very important consideration. The Prime Minister says, of course, that what he has in mind is property within the control of the federal parliament, property that does not come within the ambit of the property and civil rights clause in section 92 of the British North America Act. That is what the Prime Minister says and that is the view of all of us in this house. But that will not necessarily be the view of the Supreme Court of Canada or of any other judicial body called upon to interpret this measure. Property and civil rights is a cornerstone of provincial authority in our country. They are as sovereign in the exercise of their competencies under section 92 of the British North America Act as we are in the exercise of our powers under section 91. The trouble that will ensue, that is to say the legal controversy that will develop, let alone the political difficulties that will follow, are so apparent that I would hope that when we do reach the committee stage there will be no difficulty in reconciling the situation.

In my judgment this bill does not modify all pre-existing legislation; at least there is doubt about that. The Prime Minister may have positive views. I am sure that when a court comes to consider a particular grievance and is confronted by a statute such as the Immigration Act and this particular legislation it will decide that because of the general character of this legislation it must take into consideration and recognize the primacy of an individual statute. Are we to say that as a result of this legislation, for instance, the Lord's Day Act in Canada is going to be repealed? That must be the conclusion if we are to take the view that this bill as it is drawn at the present time will have an overriding effect on all existing inconsistent legislation, or on all future legislation inconsistent with this legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask a question? In what way is the Lord's Day Act inconsistent with freedom of religion?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, my hon. friend—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am interested in knowing.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —knows that for some people the Lord's Day Act is regarded as a limitation of freedom; for other people it is not. My hon. friend knows that is the case. I am sure his question was not intended as a trap. It has been the case that some people have regarded it as a denial of freedom. There are others who regard it as a proper discipline that must prevail in a society that is free. I am merely asking a legal question based on the Prime Minister's own premise as to the effectiveness of this bill. Does it mean that such a measure has to be repealed as a result of this bill of rights?

Let me go further. Must the Immigration Act now be repealed in its inconsistent provisions? Is it a measure that will be repealed, or is it automatically repealed? Last night we listened to a recital of the restrictive features of the Immigration Act by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who looked upon this measure as a way at long last of extricating the citizen from the restrictive features of that act. I ask the Prime Minister now; once this bill becomes law, assuming it does in its present form, does that mean that the Immigration Act is going to be repealed in so far as inconsistent measures are concerned?

Let us go further. What about the Criminal Code? Will the Criminal Code now be modified with respect, for instance, to its provisions for whipping as a form of declared punishment, having in mind the operative part of this bill? These are points that students of this measure regard as having very practical considerations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What section of the bill would apply to the Criminal Code; degrading treatment or torture?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, most of the operative parts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which ones?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me make my speech and then the Prime Minister can ask questions.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. member will allow me, will he point out which particular portion of the bill of rights would prevent the application of punishment under the Criminal Code?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about section 3 (b), "impose or authorize the imposition of torture, or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment"? If that is not contrary to the Criminal Code then I do not understand the English language. Let us go further. For instance, does the word "person" in section 3 (c) include witnesses as well as an accused or a complainant or plaintiff? Are witnesses going to have the right to counsel? What does the word "person" mean? If witnesses are not to have a right to counsel under certain circumstances, are we giving full effect to the right to counsel in situations where, either formally or informally, as Mr. Justice Rand said, a witness is being accused?

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member not agree that his question is answered by a reading of the applicable words? Section 3 (c) only applies to a person who has been arrested or detained.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend knows perfectly well that can happen to a witness.

Mr. Fulton: Only if he is arrested or detained.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice undoubtedly has read these learned articles. The minister must know that all these points I have mentioned have been discussed, and that concern exists. I am simply raising them now in the hope that the government, either at this stage of our proceedings or in the committee, will deal with these matters effectively.

For instance, let us take section 2. Are we satisfied that we have a clear understanding of what is meant by "due process"? We are all clear as to what "due process" means but, as Mr. Bora Laskin says, it is not sufficient that a man be assured of protection of his person and property under the protection of due process. It is important that we have a clear understanding of what we mean by "due process". Does it mean due process according to law and, if according to law, according to what law; or does it simply mean in this declaratory statement that it is due process according to certain basic standards of justice? That is very important, because if it is the latter then the citizen is not going to receive the kind of protection which, under statutes and under judicial interpretation, normally attends the meaning of the words "due process".

What do we mean, for instance, in section 2 when we talk of freedom? True, under the law as it now exists, and as it is going to be confirmed and further declared in this bill, we will have freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and association; but are these intended as absolutes in this bill, or are we to take into account, or is a judge to take into account the qualifications that now exist as part of the law? When we talk in this bill, for instance, about trials in public, what does that do to the juvenile delinquents act, where a judge may, under certain circumstances, have a hearing in camera? Is that provision to be done away with? These are questions to which we will certainly have to have some answers.

What is meant, for instance, in section 3 (c) by "other constitutional safeguards"? What are they? Where do these other constitutional safeguards now exist in the law? The fact is that they do not exist in the law. Those are words that have a satisfactory implication when first uttered, but they have no legal substance whatsoever.

I could go on and make other observations with respect to what I regard as weaknesses in the bill. The bill does not in any way provide any method by which its provisions can be implemented. A bill of rights will not do away with conflicts between different persons and groups, nor will it remove the need for compromise with respect to many questions in the operation of our law.

There are many things that this bill could do. The Prime Minister was here last night when the hon. member for Edmonton West spoke. The hon. member spoke of the dangerous implications of administrative decisions, and he paid particular attention to the situation in the United Kingdom. He reminded us of the work of Sir Carleton Allen and particularly of Lord Hewart through his book, "The New Despotism". Does this situation not exist in this country? No one has pointed that out more eloquently or effectively in the past than the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ineffectively when you were in power. We are trying to remove those fears now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I always gave the Prime Minister careful attention, and whenever he made a submission that I thought was constructive it was generally acted on. But the Prime Minister did not always make constructive suggestions, and he will be the first to recognize that this is so. If the Prime Minister wishes to egg me on I can go much further in this regard, because I followed with great interest the work of the Prime Minister in connection with the committee that discussed the declaration of human rights and his own particular proposal in 1947 and 1948, under the chairmanship of Mr. Ilsley and Senator Gouin. I know the Prime Minister will have in mind what I am thinking about in that regard, but for the moment perhaps it had better go unnoticed.

The Prime Minister, having spoken of these administrative decisions and their denial of various legal and political freedoms, had an opportunity in this bill to do something about the matter. Why is there no provision in the bill somewhat analogous to the provision adopted two years ago in the United Kingdom and referred to recently by the lord chancellor when he spoke to the bar association of the state of Illinois, and referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Fort William? There could be in Canada as part of this bill a provision such as the United Kingdom now has under the tribunals and inquiries act, whereby a permanent, independent council supervises all government agencies, with special attention being paid to threatened violations. Is that now going to be satisfied by the powers given to the Minister of Justice under section 4 of the bill? The Prime Minister indicates that is so, but surely he is not serious when he nods his head in assent.

Under the bill of last year the Minister of Justice was going to ensure, but under the present bill all he is going to do is ascertain. There is no sanction. All that the Minister of Justice will be required to do will be to examine and see whether any measures have been dealt with that are inconsistent with the general, declared provisions of the proposed bill of rights. There will be no powers given to parliament to cause him to take any steps. In other words there is no sanction and there are no teeth to deal with a situation respecting which certain assignments are given to the Minister of Justice.

In the United Kingdom they go much further. In addition to a public petitions committee, they have recognized the need to supervise administrative or governmental adjudication by means of a tribunal which goes into these matters carefully and is under obligation to take concrete steps. There is need to supervise government regulation and every subordinate lawmaker by means of parliamentary scrutiny or committee. But the suggested powers given to the Minister of Justice will not in any way deal with the situation.

I therefore say this to the Prime Minister by way of summary. I recognize that as a lawyer he has been interested in this problem for a long time. As he will recall, he raised the matter of a bill of rights when I had the responsibility of introducing the citizenship act. At that time I took the view, from which I now do not stray, that under our common law system, based as it is upon the principle of precedent to precedent, we have a safeguard for our rights that is as effective as anything that is provided for in this bill. Our political freedoms are now provided for in the existing law as interpreted by our courts.

The value of this bill, the Prime Minister and others have said, is in its declaratory character. If we want to give a lesson to new citizens, as was suggested, or if we want to bring home to our young and to the citizens of this country at large the value of our heritage of freedom, we could surely have done it in a declaratory way but in a way that would be more memorable than that which is provided for in the dull words of a statute of this house. We could have sought at least to imitate the language of the great prose writers of the nineteenth century, such as Bentham and Mill, who dedicated their lives and writings to the principle of human liberty. We could have had something like the language of Lincoln that would have made an appeal to the new citizens and the other citizens of our country instead of having this drab, weak, dubious and lacking in precision bill of rights which represents an ideal, an honest purpose and a desirable purpose, but which falls short of the mark for the reasons I have mentioned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope this bill will go to a committee so we may be given the opportunity of making it a really respectable and effective document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he would tell the house in what bill of rights anywhere in the world, beginning with the United States bill of rights and including the other 29 countries that have adopted a bill of rights, was the course followed of describing freedom in other than the most simple language, indeed in almost the same language that is adopted here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know the Prime Minister asks this question because he wants a serious reply.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to give him one. The Prime Minister knows as well as I that the bill of rights in the United States had its genesis in the declaration of independence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, it did. Two years after that declaration came into being there were refinements put in article form, but the basic appealing language of the declaration of independence is referred to by every young American as his credo.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the bill of rights?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You mean our own bill of rights?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, the United States bill of rights.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I say, it became a refinement of the original declaration of independence. I would ask the Prime Minister to look at the words of Magna Carta, the words in the preamble of the act of settlement, or the words of the bill of rights. He will find that they are words that make an appeal. I say this to the Prime Minister. Are we really making an appeal by this bill when we say:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms—

That is a statement to which every man in this house fully subscribes. That kind of language, together with that in sections 1, 2 and so on, is familiar to the hon. gentleman, to other lawyers in this house and to all legislators. However, it certainly will not make its appeal to those who are uninitiated in the jargon and the forms of parliament. The Prime Minister has missed a great opportunity by not himself sitting down, as Lincoln did, and writing memorable words for all generations to remember.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, Lincoln wrote the Gettysburg address and did so in language of great simplicity and purity, not in the bombastic, arrogant, pompous manner which the members of the opposition would suggest. As a result the Gettysburg address is memorable. This bill of rights, because of the simplicity of its language and because of the clearness of the principle enunciated, will also be memorable years from now, even in the mind of the hon. member for Essex East.

I used to come down to the House of Commons to hear the debates on the bill of rights. Away back in 1942 the Prime Minister first mentioned it. In 1946 it was first debated. In 1947 he made that historic speech which was referred to in the United Nations and which was studied by the United Nations as they drafted that universal declaration of human rights. In all these things everywhere except in this House of Commons the Prime Minister's ideas, views and principles were recognized; but alas, during all these years, right down to the time when the former arbitrary government was cast from power in 1957, there was always a steadfast refusal by every Liberal member of the house and every cabinet minister even to countenance for a moment the suggestion that there should be a bill of rights.

From the visitors' gallery I used to look down in order to see whether my friend the hon. member for Essex East, with whom I used to debate at Hart house, would not stand up in his place and be counted. I looked at my old professor, now the Leader of the Opposition, in order to see whether he would not say something about a bill of rights.

Mr. Pearson: You will soon be up in the There was nothing but silence, nothing but gallery again.

Mr. Walker: Nothing was said, however. arrogant silence—

Mr. Pearson: Arrogant silence?

Mr. Walker: —nothing but a complete and absolute brush off; and if you look at the speech of the former minister of justice, Hon. Mr. Garson, you will find that there was complete contempt for any suggestion that there should be a bill of rights. However, having tasted defeat, and striving desperately to get back into power, what do the opposition do? Not only do they make a volte-face; not only are they in favour of a bill of rights, but they would go much further. They are doing just as they did before that election in 1958 when, with regard to everything we introduced, they said "Me too" and "We will go further".

So it is with this bill of rights. How ridiculous it is to hear the Leader of the Opposition say that this bill ought to be in grand, eloquent language. I suppose he means the language of diplomacy, but no one yet knows what that language means. If my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition had been a lawyer he would have known that this bill of rights is couched in traditional language for which there are precedents in every court.

It is in language which, when brought to the Supreme Court of Canada for interpretation, will not be that fancy language which the Leader of the Opposition suggests it should be but will be plain, simple language which all lawyers, all judges as well as the plain man in the back concessions can understand. That is why the bill of rights is drafted in the present language.

Mr. Pearson: All except the bar association.

Mr. Walker: The Leader of the Opposition sounded the other day like sounding brass and tinkling cymbals signifying nothing. I do not know who wrote his speech for him, but it did not sound like the old professor who always extolled freedom 35 years ago.

The hon. member for Essex East, for whom I have great respect, made this rhetorical statement: "This is simply a declaratory bill". I infer from that he meant there is nothing substantive in its nature. Nothing could be further from the truth. Can the hon. member show me where in any of our laws and nomenclature there is a clause similar to clause 2(b), which gives the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex? Is that not substantive law? Is not clause 3 substantive law, although he is trying to tear it to tatters?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to interrupt, but is the minister asking me a question?

Mr. Walker: No, I am answering it. I say, is clause 3 declaratory or is it substantive law, setting up an interpretative rule for all our courts to use in simple, unequivocal language which says in terms that all acts of parliament, past, present and future, shall be subject to this bill of rights? This clause says that all the acts of the parliament of Canada shall—> —be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge, or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms recognized by this part—

Is that not substantive law? Is that not putting teeth into all the acts and statutes which have been passed and all the bills which will be passed in the future?

Mr. Speaker, there is our guarantee, right there in clause 3, because this bill of rights is superimposed upon every act and every regulation of the parliament of Canada. There is no law of the parliament of Canada that is not subject to this bill of rights, and here it is for the first time. How blind are they who will not see. It seems ridiculous at this time that we did not have this years ago, when every one of the 29 other countries which have passed a bill of rights saw the necessity long ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to interrupt, but would the minister permit a question at this time?

Mr. Walker: I regret to say no; I have to open the public works picnic in a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the minister does not yield he must be allowed to continue.

Mr. Pearson: Then don't be noisily arrogant.

Mr. Walker: The Leader of the Opposition time after time makes these snide remarks, but let me say that the reason I have not replied to him on other occasions is, first, that I have respect for him as a person; and second, I do not want in any way to dim the lustre which he may hold as leader, because I feel confident that as long as he is leader of the Liberal party we will form the government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: You are not doing very well now.

Mr. Walker: My next point is this. Is this not an act which can be repealed? This is the point: Every act of the house can be repealed by the house and every constitutional amendment to the British North America Act affecting the rights of the Canadian parliament can only be repealed on a joint address of the Senate and House of Commons. But once this bill of rights is passed, is anybody going to suggest that there is any chance of it being repealed? Because it would take a deliberate act of parliament, and would give rise without doubt to a high degree of debate and would gain much publicity. There is not a snowball's chance of the bill of rights being repealed once it is enacted.

Furthermore, the history of parliament indicates beyond peradventure that where the freedom of man has been incorporated into a statute, no parliament would lightly interfere with that particular statute. One of the purposes of this bill has been to ensure that fundamental freedoms and human rights cannot be secretly or clandestinely done away with. It does not make any difference what stupid government might in another 20 years follow this government. No matter what it does there will always be the bill of rights to ensure that even though an act may have been passed clandestinely or surreptitiously, or people may have missed the meaning of it, there is nevertheless superimposed upon that particular piece of legislation the protective terms of the bill of rights.

The next question my hon. friend will ask is this. Why does not this bill apply to the provinces? The Leader of the Opposition suggested that it should. The hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean, for whom I have a high regard and who does not speak too often in this house, rose in great indignation and said that such a bill of rights would infringe the provisions of the civil code of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, take your pick; they are a dime a dozen. The Leader of the Opposition would have a bill of rights affecting not only the dominion parliament but all the provincial legislatures. On the other hand the hon. member—

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Walker: There is no point of order; I am interpreting what you said.

Mr. Pearson: You are not.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Leader of the Opposition rising on a point of order?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the minister's assertion that there is no point of order, he having not heard it. My point of order is that I made no such statement in my speech, that this particular bill should be applicable to the provinces, and the minister of course knows it.

Mr. Walker: The Leader of the Opposition suggested that any bill of rights passed by this parliament should be made applicable to all ten provinces.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, I made no such suggestion and the minister knows it. I did suggest that we should get in touch with the provinces to see if they would agree to the extension of these principles to cover both the provinces and the federal government, which is a very different thing.

Mr. Walker: I am delighted to hear that the Leader of the Opposition is still making that suggestion. Perhaps he was a member of the government which in 1950 convened the federal-provincial constitutional conference here in Ottawa. It was convened by the then prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, in January, 1950—and I have here the proceedings, which no one has mentioned so far—in an attempt to arrive at a satisfactory formula to overcome the necessity of going to the United Kingdom for amendments. That constitutional conference met first at Ottawa, and in a hopeless mess and muddle finally, to save face, adjourned and moved on to Quebec many months later, in September of 1950.

Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. members to read the proceedings of that conference and see the attempt which was made to reach common ground with the provinces. There was much said about the tower of Babel about which the Leader of the Opposition seems to know so much. It was really present at that constitutional conference. This conference called by the Liberal government of the day finally broke up in confusion because there was no possibility of reaching any agreement.

Is my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition now talking with his tongue in his cheek when he suggests that the complete imbroglio of that conference would not be repeated at another conference? Under the circumstances we are doing all we can to pass the best bill we can which will be applicable to the government of Canada and to the laws of the Dominion of Canada. When we have done that we will have gone a long way in bringing about this much sought after bill of rights. We can go on from here; but this is some accomplishment and perhaps some day, if my hon. friend will tell us how we can solve the monstrous difficulties met by this constitutional conference, we may have a bill which will be applicable to all the provinces as well as the Dominion of Canada.

In the meantime we are pointing the way. As some of my hon. friends have said, there is a bill of rights in Saskatchewan, there is a bill of rights in Alberta, and the premier of Ontario has mentioned the possibility of a bill of rights in that province. The new premier of the province of Quebec has suggested that Quebec may have a bill of rights. But to suggest that this ideal which has hung suspended for so long, and that the Prime Minister's pilgrimage, begun back in 1942, should now be dealt with along the lines of the foolish suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition, would only confuse the issue and further delay what we know, at least, we are able to do today.

There have been suggestions that the bill might blot out freedoms and rights which it does not specifically mention. The hon. member for Assiniboia made that point. It was also asked why the economic rights which we now enjoy should not be incorporated in this bill.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Essex East says "hear, hear". He is too good a lawyer to say "hear, hear"; he knows better than that. He knows that all you can do in any bill of rights is to incorporate the fundamental freedoms and human rights. To try to amplify that, to detail it, would only put the Supreme Court of Canada into a straitjacket. In the course of my practice I have appeared before the Supreme Court of Canada many times over the past 30 years. What they want above all other things is simplicity of language, and here you have it; simple, plain language that cannot be misunderstood by layman, lawyer or judge. I submit that if the question of economic rights was laid before the supreme court it would consider the interpretive rule as laid down in clause 3 and say, "Have these economic rights been infringed?" Then it would say, "Let us apply the four fundamental freedoms and other clauses set out in the bill to determine whether that is so". The Leader of the Opposition smiles, but after all the Leader of the Opposition has never been in a court and he does not know what it is all about, and is not expected to.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope you do not carry on in this way in court.

Mr. Walker: As a matter of fact, if the hon. member for Laurier ever got out of the police court it is something I never heard of.

Mr. Chevrier: You are the best expert in police court tactics that I know.

Mr. Walker: In an experience in the supreme court extending over 30 years I never heard of the hon. member for Laurier ever having been in that court, and I think it is fair to say he has never been there.

Mr. Chevrier: When I was there I never used those tactics.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, I believe that what the hon. member has just said—in the heat of debate, I am sure—he will regret having said. He will want to withdraw those remarks; because the hon. member for Laurier was and is a very successful and eminent member of the bar. I am sure the Minister of Public Works will want to correct the implication he has made and withdraw the name-calling, which is not appropriate or suitable to the occasion.

Mr. Walker: The hon. member for Essex East is quite right; as a fellow barrister I withdraw any aspersions on the reputation of the hon. member for Laurier as a member of the bar. At the same time there will not be any aspersions if the hon. gentleman will let me continue my speech without derogatory references to my reputation; if he is unfamilar with my work at the bar, he can look through the law reports of the past 30 years and acquaint himself with it.

Another question raised is whether there are sufficient precedents to establish that the parliament of Canada may pass a bill of rights binding on the legislatures of the provinces. We have only three authoritative cases in the Supreme Court of Canada that deal with this question, and there is complete confusion in the result. I will outline the three cases very briefly. There was the Social Credit legislation of 1938, a record of which is to be found in the Supreme Court Reports at page 100. Then there was Saumur v. City of Quebec in 1953, 2 S.C.R. 299, otherwise the Jehovah's Witnesses' case; and then there was the padlock case, Switzman v. Elbling, 1957, S.C.R. 285. None of these cases establishes that the dominion parliament alone has jurisdiction to legislate for the protection of fundamental freedoms, nor do these cases lay down any particular proposition in relation to fundamental freedoms that would be binding upon the Supreme Court of Canada or any other court.

So much for a question which has been asked in the course of this debate. If I had time I would like to go into each of those three cases in detail to show that there is no clear-cut and well-defined principle which we could follow.

The Leader of the Opposition also suggested that the matter should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: That was the Prime Minister's suggestion.

Mr. Walker: The Prime Minister did suggest that many years ago in his speeches; and that question, I can assure the Leader of the Opposition, has been canvassed with great thoroughness by the Department of Justice. We suggest that it is important to frame any questions in a manner which would enable us to get a clear answer, but no one has suggested even in a vague form what questions could or should be asked of the supreme court, questions upon which any court could express an opinion that would assist in determining the lines of a bill of rights to be enacted by the Canadian parliament. Also, we do not know what clear-cut answer could be given, in view of the conflict even in the Supreme Court of Canada on this very important piece of legislation.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, at the time of the luncheon adjournment I was attempting to explain why it is preferable not to attempt to include in this or in any other bill of rights all the different rights and freedoms to which the citizens of Canada are entitled. It would be particularly difficult to set out in legislation the economic rights of Canadians. This would cause confusion because these rights, whatever they might be, are preserved under clause 5 of the bill, which makes quite certain that no existing human right or fundamental freedom is abrogated or abridged. The Canadian public should understand that it was not the intention to enumerate in this bill all the rights and freedoms. It should be clear that it was not intended to undertake to define them in detail, whatever they might be. Clause 5 reads:

> Nothing in part I shall be construed to abrogate or abridge any human right or fundamental freedom not enumerated therein that may have existed in Canada at the commencement of this act.

As I understood the Leader of the Opposition, his chief criticism of the Prime Minister's bill of rights was that there should be greater strictures on use of the War Measures Act. We are not introducing the War Measures Act today nor seeking to have it amended. The Liberal government lived under the act for years and did not choose to amend it. If the Leader of the Opposition feels that this act should be amended, there is a time and place to do so; but it has no connection with the bill of rights. The reason the bill of rights refers to the War Measures Act in clause 6 is so that in the event of war, parliament will first have the opportunity of discussing that proclamation declaring war. That is as far as it goes. If my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition is as confined in his strictures, as he seemed to have been, to criticizing the War Measures Act and the various clauses in connection with it, I think it is a compliment to the author of the bill of rights that the hon. gentleman had to go so far afield in an effort to find something to criticize.

The bill to amend the Defence Production Act was fought vehemently in the parliament of 1955 and finally passed on the insistance of Mr. Howe, the then minister of defence production. Sections 23 and 24 of that act in particular are for the house an example of the arbitrary measures which will be found to be ultra vires once this bill of rights is passed. The Defence Production Act was amended in 1955, just two years before the previous arbitrary government was thrust from office. The two sections to which I made reference were not renewed. Section 23 made it possible for the minister of defence production to require a person to participate in a defence contract whether or not he wished to do so. Under section 24, where it was deemed necessary for the purposes of the act, the minister by notice in writing could take possession of or requisition any supplies whether or not the owner of those supplies wished to surrender them. I respectfully suggest that due to the present government such arbitrary measures are no longer the law. This is an instance where the bill of rights when enacted will automatically take hold and become effective.

At this time I should give proper recognition to the C.C.F. group. They have always been in favour of a bill of rights. It is not very often that I have the opportunity or the desire, to compliment them. Although the manner in which they would envisage enactment of a bill of rights is impossible of fulfillment, nevertheless their general ambition and desire in this connection is proper and commendable.

What are the effects of the bill as summarized? In the first place, it focuses the attention of the public on civil liberties. In this rapidly changing era, when mobs of students have taken over what appeared to be sound and stable governments in the past few months, it is about time we had some idea in the mind of the public concerning what are our civil liberties. We should know, too, what rights the bill seeks to define. The educational effect of this bill on the public will be tremendous. Where in Canada can there be found in an act a list of the fundamental human rights and freedoms accessible to the ordinary layman? Where else can he look to examine these things and say "These are my rights"?

The fundamental freedoms and human rights cannot be changed either secretly or inadvertently as a result of this bill. In my earlier remarks I discussed in detail the reasons for this. This act when in force will superimpose on every act, past, present and future, and on all regulations under every act passed by the dominion parliament all four freedoms and all human rights. This bill of rights acts as an interpretative rule for the courts in Canada to follow in dominion legislation. I discussed that in detail in my earlier remarks.

Finally, this bill enshrines in a statute for the first time in the history of Canada the rights of the individual. July 1, 1960 was really a momentous day of perhaps greater importance to Canada than we can appreciate at this time. Once passed, every Canadian can pick up the bill of rights and say, "Here are my rights and here are my freedoms." When was there ever before an opportunity for Canadian citizens to do that? What a tremendous thing it is for the youth of our country, for the new Canadians who did not know what fundamental freedoms meant in the countries from which they came?

Mr. Winch: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Walker: Certainly.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand from what the minister has been saying in the past few minutes that with the passage of this bill of rights, any federal legislation which contradicts it will then be declared ultra vires? Do I understand also from what he has said that any federal legislation which may be inconsistent with this bill—

Mr. Walker: Just a minute; will my hon. friend make his speech after I am finished? I will not be long. I shall be glad to answer his questions when I am finished. I am just summing up at the moment. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall be happy to answer that long question or series of questions.

As far as I am concerned, I am going to frame a copy of the bill of rights for every school in my riding, and I am going to distribute 40,000 copies to my constituents. It is about time that Canadians knew what are their rights. I envisage the time when we shall have a Canadian bill of rights approved by and applying to all the provinces. But in view of the imbroglios into which the dominion and the provinces get whenever they start to straighten out such matters as the superimposing of rights, one unto the other, I suggested that until that day is past—and it may still be a long way off—we should pass this bill. We will have pointed the way. We will have a dominion bill of rights. Two of the provinces have already passed bills of rights; others may do so in the future, and the not too distant future.

It is our own earnest hope that as time unfolds, with an appreciation of what a bill of rights can mean when it is fully understood by all the people of Canada, we shall have something which covers not only the dominion but all the provinces. In the meantime, I respectfully submit that this is as far as we can go at the moment, and it is a very long way to go in the circumstances. It has taken 18 years to bring this bill to fruition. In this connection we have one person and one person alone to thank for educating the Canadian public so that they demanded it, and for educating the Liberal party so that they, too, are in favour of it. I refer to none other than the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Winch: I understood the minister to ask me to wait until he sat down before asking my question. In view of what he said, is it his interpretation that with the passage of this bill of rights, any federal legislation which contravenes the principles of this legislation is automatically ultra vires? I followed the minister very closely. Did he also mean that when we have a statute which imposes or authorizes the imposition of torture, the bill of rights will no longer permit it? Does this mean that I no longer have to introduce my bill for the abolition of corporal punishment?

Mr. Walker: I do not know whether that question of the hon. member is a witty one or whether it is supposed to contribute to the seriousness of this debate.

Mr. Winch: It is a very serious question.

Mr. Walker: The answer to the first part of the question is that the bill of rights does superimpose itself on all dominion legislation. It is so clear in its language and understanding that, superimposed on any act, it will be a very simple thing for the courts to determine whether or not any other act infringes on the superclauses of the bill of rights.

Mr. Habel: Super-duper.

Mr. Walker: The superimposed clauses of the bill of rights.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of what the minister has said about superimposition of this bill on the existing law when it becomes law, and also because of what the minister said when he commented on clause 2 (b), which provides for the avoidance of discrimination, will the minister say whether in his judgment once this bill becomes law it will no longer be possible for the situation to be repeated which occurred in the case of a Negro citizen in Windsor, when that deserving citizen was denied, as the minister knows, the right to a loan under the Central Mortgage and Housing Act? There is a practical case.

Mr. Walker: Yes. My hon. friend is referring to something with which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had no concern; it had nothing whatever to do with it. It was a loan made by an approved lender. Therefore let us get that straight in the first place.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But we guarantee those loans.

Mr. Walker: Quite so; we guarantee them. In connection with clause 2(b), in answer to my hon. friend, this particular clause will be of tremendous help to us in drafting a section to be included in our mortgages. We shall now have extra support for what I know the hon. member for Essex East is anxious that we should do, namely to include a clause in our mortgages to prevent the discrimination which is referred to here. As a matter of fact, once this bill is passed—my hon. friend now knows it in advance—I intend to announce in the house that from now on we are including such a clause in our mortgages to prevent the discrimination referred to in clause 2(b).

Mr. Winch: Why didn't you do it before?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Justice said you could not do it.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment moved by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). May I read the amendment into the record once again:

> That this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that the provinces should be consulted in order to ascertain whether agreement can be reached on the terms of a constitutional amendment to guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the contributions made on July 1, yesterday and this morning to this debate. In my opinion the issue now before us is over and above partisanship, and I regret that the Minister of Public Works was the first speaker in the debate to introduce partisanship. Before the lunch hour I heard nothing but a bunch of rubbish, utter unadulterated nonsense and political partisanship in its lowest degree.

Mr. Ricard: Are you describing your speech?

Mr. Regier: Referring and pointing to the bill, the Minister of Public Works intimated—and these were his words—"There is our guarantee". Yesterday, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi said, when referring to the bill, "It is enforceable". I have great reservations on whether there is actually any guarantee in the bill before us, or whether it is enforceable at all. The Minister of Public Works also said about the bill, "Here are my rights; here are my freedoms". I doubt the claim of the minister in this respect, and I also doubt his statement that we have one person alone to thank for the bill. I doubt that the Prime Minister is so vain that he would claim that he alone is the only one we should thank for the emergence in parliament at long last of a bill of rights. I believe he will admit that many other Canadians are equally responsible for the debate that is now taking place, even though he was instrumental in introducing the bill at this time.

I believe that much of the optimism expressed yesterday, this morning and on July 1 may be based on rather weak grounds. In looking over the bill I am disappointed in a number of respects, and I believe my disappointment is shared by a good number of the Canadian people. Before dealing with these disappointments I should like to pay a tribute to the men and the few women who have been responsible for adjudicating upon Canadian law over the years. I believe that our courts have gone a long way and have done much to enhance the liberties of each and every one of us. I should like to pay a compliment to these people, because in the precedents established in Canada and in the United Kingdom over the course of the centuries I believe many more rights are embodied than will ever be conferred upon individuals by this legislation.

I know there is always a dividing line between what constitutes freedom and what constitutes licence, and that it is very hard to determine. I do not think any member of the house would say that we should endorse licence. However, I believe we are all sincere in our desire to enhance the cause of individual liberties and freedoms.

The bill now before us has been delayed for a number of years. It is an important bill, and I do not regret for one moment the delay that has ensued. Rather than introducing a bill of this kind and of this significance in the dying weeks of the session, I believe it might have been advisable to delay it a little longer. I believe that the bill should go before a committee, and I welcome that course of action. However, I express regret that, simply because of the pressure of time, the committee is going to be limited in hearing adequate representations from Canadian organizations and individuals who are interested and would like to make a contribution to the deliberations of the committee.

I express disappointment in the bill of rights now before us because I feel that the mountain has laboured and has produced a mouse. I believe that the bill is uninspiring, and I heartily endorse the views expressed by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday in this regard. If the bill is meant to express our ideals, I believe it fails utterly in that respect. If it is to be taken as an expression of our ideals with regard to individual freedom, then all I can say is that I believe we can do much better. I believe there are thousands of Canadians with the ability to express our ideals more adequately than they are expressed in the wording of the bill. If the bill is to be a law, it is inadequate in that regard. It is neither an expression of an ideal nor will it be an adequate act or law of the House of Commons. It falls far short.

It seems to me a placenta, an afterbirth; and, as I said before, the mountain has laboured and at long last has produced a mouse.

It is my contention that Bill No. C-79, an act for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, is unworthy of the vision that the Canadian people had of the member for Prince Albert in 1957 or 1958. I submit that the bill is unworthy of our heritage. I submit that it is unworthy of the significance of our Dominion day, July 1.

This bill is supposed to protect the fundamental rights of the individual, but I notice that in clause 2 it says that—> —there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,

> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law.

I should like to emphasize the words "except by due process of law". These words make a mockery of any pretence that the individual is now being protected against actions on the part of governments. Anything that is done by a government ought to be by due process of law; and while the bill may protect my rights from invasion by another individual, it does nothing to protect my rights from invasion by government because the government always has at its disposal the due process of law. In my opinion the whole reason for the origin of the bill falls down right here in this clause, which contains the words "except by due process of law". I am being allowed to enjoy my fundamental rights with this exception, "except by due process of law". I have those rights only as long as the government of the day deems it advisable that I have them. I feel that the whole intent of the bill is defeated by that little inclusion "except by due process of law".

We have in this bill no protection whatsoever against the law. The law can violate individual human rights at any time a parliament or a government deems it advisable to do so. In the whole bill—and this is repeated and underlined time after time in the bill—the prerogative of the government and of parliament to violate individual human rights is maintained. Any argument that this bill is going to protect individuals from arrogance or from arbitrary decisions on the part of government falls apart like a house of cards.

Mr. Macdonnell: I find it hard to follow the hon. member. Will he permit a question?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell: Does he not think that, every day we live, we live by due process of law; that every action we take is by due process of law; and that we are protected and governed by laws which are made not by government but by parliament? I find it hard to follow the hon. member.

Mr. Regier: I agree with the hon. member. However, the claim that was made on behalf of this bill was that the bill was going to protect the rights of individuals from arbitrary action at the hands of government or parliament.

Mr. Macdonnell: That is not due process of law. The hon. member is now talking about arbitrary action.

Mr. Regier: Yet the bill retains for parliament and for government the opportunity to violate the right of individuals at any time it deems it advisable to do so.

Mr. Macdonnell: How so?

Mr. Regier: Because, as I indicated previously, the rights are guaranteed "except by due process of law". In other words, the right to own property, the right of life itself, the right of liberty or the right of security of the person can be nullified by due process of law. I do not think that basic contention can be denied.

However, I was going to advance beyond that point. We are even limited in the protection of our rights in so far as individuals can continue to deny us these rights without hindrance. The most I can say is that if my rights are being threatened by another individual, I can appeal to the courts and I may be able to get an injunction or a restraining order. I will say that much on behalf of the bill. However, beyond that I cannot go. Individuals may violate this bill and there is no penalty attached to the violation. They may be found guilty of violating the bill. However, next week they may repeat their offence and they may repeat it the week thereafter. There is no enforcement. There is no recourse except the possibility of withholding an intended action by appealing to the courts and asking for an injunction. The only teeth in the bill, as I see it, are the possibilities of appealing to the courts when one anticipates that the bill may be violated. There is nothing else in it that will enforce the bill.

I therefore find it extremely hard to understand what the Minister of Public Works means when he says that this is our guarantee, and what the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi means when he says that it is enforceable. I do not realize how it is enforceable when individuals can continue to violate the act ad nauseam, and when the government can use the due process of law in order to deny to individuals the fundamental rights that are established in the bill.

I especially support the amendment because of the reply of the Prime Minister on July 1 to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. In reply to the hon. member for Assiniboia the Prime Minister made it abundantly clear that the provinces had not been consulted. I feel that this answer indicates that the bill now before us is less than the best that we might offer to the Canadian electorate at the present time. Apparently no effort was made to obtain the agreement of the provincial governments. Not only do I believe that an effort should have been made in this direction, but I also believe that a bill of rights, in order to be really effective, should be submitted by way of a referendum to the Canadian people at the next general election, especially if there might be hesitancy on the part of one or more of the provinces in reaching agreement on what constitutes or should constitute a bill of rights for the Canadian people as Canadian citizens.

I do not place too much reliance on provincial bills of rights. I do not believe that a Canadian living in one area of Canada ought to have rights that he is not able to enjoy in all other areas of our nation. It is obvious that the government did not even bother to consult with the provinces. They were so intent on making this a bill of their own that they have produced a bill that I consider to be partly a proclamation or a declaration. If it is meant to be that, any master of the English language would say it is a horrible failure in that it does not express our ideals. If it is meant as a law, it is unenforceable and is extremely weak indeed.

The bill in effect does not affect existing legislation. I realize that there is a direction to the courts. However, I believe that any member of the Supreme Court of Canada would say that the direction contained in section 3 of part I of the bill is as wide open as a barn door. There is really no specific order to anyone connected with our judiciary to be found in section 3. It does not affect existing legislation effectively. There is no direction to a court. It does not affect future legislation because under clause 4, as has already been ably pointed out, the minister "shall examine". It does not order the minister to do anything; he shall merely examine, which means nothing. There is no directive there except that he shall examine. It does not say that he shall declare something ultra vires; he shall do nothing except examine. There is not even the order that he shall report to this House of Commons, but merely the order that he shall examine. He can examine until he is blue in the face; if the government has made up its mind it wants to do something it may listen to his advice or it may not, depending on its whim at any particular time.

At this time I would like to ask our Prime Minister where is the committee that he spoke of on January 27 last? At that time our Prime Minister said, as reported on page 390 of Hansard:

> I felt and I still feel that one matter that might well be brought before the house would be the setting up of a committee similar to that in the British House of Commons known as the scrutiny committee. It would examine legislation being passed by parliament and already on the statute books, and would examine orders in council, which are not passed by parliament directly, to the end that anything in the nature of a contravention of fundamental freedoms would be brought to the attention of the house as a whole.

At this time, almost six months later, we have heard nothing more of this committee which was supposed to be established. Where is this committee? I asked a little later, on February 4, whether this proposed committee would also examine or be responsible for examining the regulations of the department of immigration. As recorded on page 715 of Hansard I said:

> Is the Prime Minister in a position to inform us when we may expect the establishment of a scrutiny committee, such as he announced on January 27; and will this committee be permitted to investigate alleged discrimination because of colour in Canadian immigration regulations?

The answer I received at that time is as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, the first question is the only one I can answer at this time.

Actually the Prime Minister answered both questions.

> When we arrive at that point in the proceedings and I am able to bring about agreement with the members of the opposition as to the establishment of this committee, then, if it is agreeable to the house, the committee will be set up.

I would like to interject here a question to the Prime Minister. Has he consulted with the opposition, or how many more months must the opposition wait for him to consult with them as to the establishment of this committee he offered to set up? The Prime Minister continued:

> As to what it will look into and its powers, I think what the hon. gentleman has in mind has not been the usual practice followed by the United Kingdom scrutiny committee.

In other words, as I read that it is obvious that the regulations of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration are to remain exempt not only from the provisions of the bill of rights which is now before us but also from the eyes of the proposed scrutiny committee about which the Prime Minister waxed so enthusiastic only six months ago.

As I see the bill before us, if it is really going to have some teeth it will mean that Canadians of East Indian origin are going to have the same rights as all other Canadians in the matter of bringing in their relatives. Canadians of Chinese or Japanese origin are going to have the same rights as, say, Canadians of Norwegian or Dutch origin when it comes to bringing in their relatives. If the bill has any teeth at all it will mean a radical and automatic revision of existing immigration regulations.

I believe it will also affect our efforts in regard to world refugee year. I am dismayed and angered every time I watch the television appeal on behalf of world refugee year when refugees in the Middle East are shown on the screen in pictures depicting their deplorable state, and similar pictures are shown of the likewise deplorable state of refugees in Hong Kong. While the dollars are lured out of our good-hearted Canadian taxpayers on behalf of world refugee year, the money is devoted exclusively to the admission into Canada of white refugees living in western Europe.

If the bill of rights means anything at all it ought not only to put an end to this misuse of advertising and the wringing of the hearts of Canadians on behalf of Middle East and Hong Kong refugees, but proper use should be made of the money obtained instead of using it only on behalf of the white people of the world. This government stands guilty of utter discrimination in this regard, and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stands guilty of utter misrepresentation of the whole cause of world refugee year and its appeal for funds.

Much has been said on behalf of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin. I would like to say this, and I do not think it has ever been said before since this government has been in office. You cannot grant equal rights to Canadians of Japanese origin until you right a wrong that has never been righted yet. I refer to the confiscation and looting of the assets of Japanese Canadians. I know very well that under the Liberal government an inquiry was held into this matter and many of these wrongs were righted. However, when the offending party could not be located there was no equity restored to the Canadian citizens of Japanese origin who had suffered an undue wrong.

I refer now to the looting of the warehouses in the custody of Her Majesty in Vancouver, when pianos and living room sets were simply stolen; when forest rights were sold for a song to avaricious Canadians; when farms worth tens of thousands of dollars were sold for mere hundreds of dollars, and equity has not yet been restored. Canadians of Japanese origin will never feel that they have been given a square deal until the day, and I hope I live to see it, when the conscience of the Canadian people will move the government of the day to restore to our fellow Canadians that which was so wrongly taken away from them.

I would like to see in a bill of rights a certain measure of protection to the Canadian people from brainwashing. At the present time, because of wealthy advertising interests and monopoly in the field of communication, the Canadian people are being brainwashed indeed. I believe that in a bill of rights there ought to be a decree which would protect our young from being brainwashed. I know people do these things in all innocence, but high school teachers will hand out propaganda to their pupils, and even Sunday school organizations accept the film put out by the B.C. Electric Company in British Columbia, though interwoven throughout the film are the glories of this so-called wonderful organization. Canadians today, especially the younger Canadians, are helpless in the face of the brainwashing that is taking place.

I see no reason why a bill of rights should not also contain economic rights as suggested by other speakers, including the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Essex East. I believe there should also be a guarantee in the bill of rights to every Canadian who is willing to work and to every Canadian who, though willing to work, is unable to work through no fault of his own, providing for a basic minimum standard of living; and that should include income, pension, education and health insurance.

It was many years ago that the leaders of the western world in the now famous Atlantic charter announced that one of the ideals of the democratic world was the establishment of freedom from want. I see no reference in this bill of rights to that announcement which was made in time of war. Many years have now gone by, and I contend that what was expressed as an ideal in wartime ought also to remain an ideal in time of peace. Our people must be free in order to progress.

I should like to close by submitting that all progress throughout the ages has always originated with a minority. It has never been in the interests of those in authority to advance mankind; it has never suited the vested interests to do so. It has always been the aim of vested interests to obtain for themselves control of government in order to block progress and maintain the status quo. Above all, it has never been in their interest to remove ignorance and fear.

I feel that the bill now before us is a move in the right direction. I feel, too, that the amendment is well worth support. However, I regret that after all this effort something more worthy of the expectations of the Canadian people has not been presented at this time.

(Translation):

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in rising in this house to express a few personal views on the bill of rights now being discussed.

I believe it is quite desirable to deal with this matter and to reaffirm our faith in the principles which are at the basis of our very life.

I also believe that it is essential for us, the representatives of the people, whatever our political allegiance, to come here and reaffirm loudly in this national parliament what we repeated and even promised many times to those who wanted to listen—to come here, in this house, and state in a loud voice that we are here to serve the most significant rights of the citizen, to serve freedom and to serve democracy.

A very great American, Thomas Jefferson, once said that a bill of rights such as the one we are now discussing is not necessarily effective in all circumstances but that it would always be useful, and almost always effective.

I, for one, think it is necessary for all of us to unite and to reassert in this house our determination to serve the best interests of democracy and freedom.

It is often said, Mr. Speaker, that a great many crimes have been committed in the name of freedom, and unfortunately, one has to admit it, that struggle for freedom and that fight for human rights have caused many crimes.

But this is due to the fact that this freedom, so dear to all of us, and for which we must fight, is worthy of the greatest efforts, the mightiest struggles and the hardest fights. It is our duty to protect it at all times. The safeguard of that freedom, this is our life's ideal, our prime purpose.

Let us remember those far-away days of 1918 when, after four years of bloodshed, the war that was supposed to end all wars was coming to a close.

Then, the victors and vanquished alike declared that, after so many efforts, sacrifices and bloodshed, the free world should realize that human rights and freedom were finally being protected; and with an utter unconcern, countries plunged into a frenzy of pleasures and enjoyment, without giving a second thought to the impending disaster.

Barely 21 years later, the civilized world again found itself in the midst of a war that is considered today as the greatest conflict of all times.

Again in 1945, after all those sacrifices, we all thought: now it is all over, at last human rights are protected. There is no further need to talk about them. War is a thing of the past; there will never be another.

Yet what do we see today, Mr. Speaker? Again we see the known world hovering on the very brink of a conflict which, if it happens, may well involve the destruction of all mankind as we know it. In view of that very grave danger still hanging above our heads, I feel there is a need to reaffirm our faith in the life principles in which we believe. I feel there is a need to proclaim out loud to the face of the whole world that we, here in Canada, believe in freedom and justice.

We are often inclined to say that all the wrongs are on the enemy's side. And it is a fact that, behind the iron curtain, millions of men are living in latent slavery; that millions of men dream only of the day when perhaps a ray of light will brighten their lives and bring them those spiritual freedoms which they know we enjoy. It must be recognized, however, that our side does not hold a monopoly on virtue. All too often we see cases of monstrous intolerance which could quite easily lead so-called democratic countries, which we regard as brothers, into the abyss of communism. Therefore it is to avoid what is happening in those friendly and allied countries that we, in Canada, must affirm and reaffirm our belief in those principles which are the very basis of justice and peace.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind that the standard of living of the communist countries has been considerably improved during latter years. It is quite possible that some day the eastern nations will know a standard of material comfort almost comparable to what we are accustomed to, and which unfortunately we accept with such insouciance and carelessness. It is obvious that the leaders of communist Russia and China are striving and working to acquire material wealth for the citizens of their country.

That is why it frequently happens that so many economists and so many people who, heaven knows, should know better, seem to find some good in the doctrines under which these countries live. Sometimes we see some industrialists, professional men or others who come forth and declare that the system under which these countries live is perhaps not so bad, and they suggest that maybe we should study it more closely. There are those among us who at times may be influenced by this propaganda, and there are some who dream of the day when this system of life will predominate in the world.

There is no doubt that the arguments of these propagandists may have a certain influence on the minds of our population. Today, I do not hesitate to say that what is too often forgotten is that this race toward material wealth and comfort is never accompanied by a similar race toward the attainment of spiritual values. It should be realized that the enslavement of the minds of men and the complete restriction of their right to think, to speak and to pray God as they wish to pray God have always been the aim of the way of life of the communist countries, and these things are in direct opposition to what we believe. If our population could only appreciate the extraordinary value of these rights which we enjoy, and which we too often accept without giving them a second thought, I am sure the communist ideals would never prevail in our land. I am equally sure that these people would realize that the bringing into effect of a bill such as the one before us is an absolute necessity.

In former years I travelled twice behind the iron curtain. Although I admit that during my travels I was received with the greatest courtesy, I nevertheless realized how strained the atmosphere can be in these totalitarian lands. I saw with my own two eyes what fear means. I never saw two people express controversial views in front of each other. Never did anyone confide anything to me unless he was alone, and unless he made sure that no one was within earshot. I know what it means to be scared when you touch a telephone. I know what it means to look for microphones in hotel rooms. I know what it means to be suspicious of the man next to you in the restaurant. I know, because on the few occasions when I could actually speak to someone alone they told me that every move of their every day life must be careful. They must watch themselves because they never know whether a brother or friend is actually an enemy.

At the slightest suspicion the state police grab these people, shut them up with no further explanation and release them if and when they feel that this can be done. I repeat that although I was treated with courtesy, I saw what fear was. I saw fear in the eyes of men, fear in the hearts of women, fear and jealousy of what we have in our land, in this land blessed by God that is Canada and which, unfortunately, we do not always sufficiently appreciate.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, it may be that, some day, that iron curtain frontier will disappear. We must hope, as said recently, by one of the greatest men of modern times, general de Gaulle, president of fair France, that soon the imaginary and yet very real iron curtain will disappear.

Let us hope that soon leaders of communist countries, as those of western countries, will realize that the salvation of mankind really lies in lasting peace. It may be that the leaders of great nations, realizing that a third world war would bring about an unprecedented cataclysm and, let us admit it, the end of the world, will find some way of working hand in hand to put a stop to that constant and futile provocation.

Mr. Speaker, when that blessed day arrives, do you not think that our having here a bill of rights, one which very clearly defines the freedoms which are at the basis of our life will allow us to tell all those nations which for nearly two generations, have been in a state of total slavery: these are the life principles in which we believe; these are the life principles we invite you to make your own. Then, together, let us join hands, form a unit, and together, let us work for the greater progress of humanity.

Mr. Speaker—

(Text):

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question?

Mr. Sevigny: Would the hon. member mind deferring his question until I have completed my remarks?

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I consider it of capital importance at this time that this bill of rights be adopted and that people in the underdeveloped countries be told: "That generosity which has been shown to you—be it under the Colombo plan, or the UNICEF, or any other similar organization—implies no restriction whatsoever." We should tell those nations: "We are offering you this aid merely because we consider that you are our equals, our brothers, and that you are as entitled as we are to benefit from the fruits of this earth." Let us tell them too: "We believe in an ideal of justice and charity, and that is why we come to help you. Personally, I am convinced that, if we spoke to them in this way, we would make many friends and draw nearer to those people who, if we are unable to help them, are bound to be attracted by the bait held out to them by communist nations.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I support this bill of rights for still another reason, one of no lesser importance. Indeed, I personally believe that every truth deserves to be told, retold, reiterated and repeated. To my mind, even on this American continent, it is necessary to state and repeat frequently that we believe in equal opportunity for all and in an ideal of freedom and justice.

Oh yes, Mr. Speaker, many hold the view that the things that happened in the old countries in Europe cannot happen here in Canada. It is stated by many that the developments taking place in other commonwealth countries are restricted to countries abroad and that we cannot possibly fall victim to similar situations.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, nothing is further from the truth. Nothing is further from the truth because we in Canada, as well as people in the United States or elsewhere in the western world, are faced today with the same danger that threatens those other countries. The first of those dangers is intolerance, racial intolerance, intolerance that prompts some people, for reasons of colour, religion, or origin, to mistreat other human beings who, being born in the same country, are entitled to share equally in the privileges existing in those countries.

Does a week ever go by, Mr. Speaker, without our reading in daily newspapers reports of intolerance either in the United States or Canada? Can we say that our entire population is free from those feelings that lead citizens in various sections of our nation to regrettable excesses.

Mr. Speaker, we in the commonwealth regard ourselves as civilized nations; yet just recently, because of racial intolerance, bloody riots have taken place in another commonwealth country caused by the fact that leaders in that country displayed intolerance towards a majority of the people. We now suspect that if this intolerance should continue, a whole continent might very soon be put to fire and sword.

Mr. Speaker, is it not true that hardly 15 years have elapsed since the end of the greatest conflict in history? Is it not true that, at the end of that conflict, we heard of unbelievable acts of savagery committed by a supposedly civilized nation? I am not going to blame the German people for the things that happened in their country from 1939 to 1945; I will not blame them because it might have happened elsewhere. I simply want to say this: if we often restate to our people the principles of life that are the basis of our existence, if we say to our children: you are as free as your neighbour, you have no more rights than he has, but you have as many privileges; if we ward off the menace of hunger and of fear; if we advocate and reassert the advantages of living in an atmosphere of freedom of speech and of thought, I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that we shall exert a good influence and that we shall prevent some ruler, sooner or later, from taking over the government of our country, from encroaching upon our rights and submitting our democracy to a dictatorship such as those we have witnessed and suffered from.

Germany was one of the most civilized countries of Europe. I must say again that I do not blame the German people for the excesses committed from the time Adolf Hitler came to power until his downfall in 1945. But I submit that once a country disregards the value of the principles of life that must guide it in the choice of its rulers, that country runs the danger of falling under the rule of tyrants and dictators who might easily commit the same crimes of which the nazis were unfortunately guilty.

A very short time ago, in the light of the Eichmann incident, we have had to live over again the atrocious history of concentration camps. Nowadays, as in 1945, it seems frightful that such things could have taken place, but it must be admitted, for it is grim reality. And this happened barely 15 years ago, in a civilized country which unfortunately, by a conjunction of circumstances, fell under the rule of a ruthless dictator.

What occurred elsewhere 15 years ago, is happening today in a commonwealth country. The incidents we read about every day in the papers can easily happen here. It is therefore essential that we have a bill of rights as a solid basis for the principles of justice, freedom and equality in which we believe.

There are some people in this house, Mr. Speaker, and also elsewhere, who say that this bill is unnecessary, that it only duplicates the Bill of Rights of 1689, that it is a copy of the Magna Carta, of the American Declaration of Independence and a mere repetition of old rigmaroles and old stories of which we are surfeited. However, Mr. Chairman, nothing could be further from the truth, because I think if something is really true, it deserves to be told and retold.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, if mankind had more often remembered the great principles that were taught 2,000 years ago from a small mountain in Judaea, perhaps we might have avoided those mass slaughters, those wars to which we unfortunately were eyewitnesses and in which we even fought.

Mr. Speaker, you know as I do that 2,000 years ago, the greatest of all men preached from that mountain the simplest yet most beautiful of truths which, through millions of repetitions, have retained all of their original truth, beauty and purity.

Every day, those simple truths proclaimed by Jesus are repeated, such simple truths as "Love one another", "peace on earth to men of good will", "do not do unto others what you would not have them do unto you". In all their simplicity and beauty, those truths have retained their freshness, and for that reason they deserve to be repeated, just as we should repeat our faith in our way of life, in our freedom, in our right to worship God in our own way, to speak the language we learned at our mother's knee. We should repeat them and repeat them often; otherwise, we will unavoidably be drawn into chaos, disorder and neglect as were those nations who forgot those great truths.

It is often said that such truths are not so very important, not so very serious. Why waste time in platitudes and high-sounding speeches when everyone knows perfectly what it is all about. May I, before closing my remarks, give you an example of the power of words and the power of determination not to surrender to any threat however powerful and tyrannical. We remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1940, one man, alone, perhaps the greatest of the twentieth century, Sir Winston Churchill, rose, uttered simple but powerful words, and repeated to the flagging forces of democracy: "We shall not flag nor fail, we shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight in the streets, we shall fight everywhere the enemy may be. We shall fight on. We shall never surrender, and victory will be ours because the forces of good are with us." Is it not true that those magic words of Sir Winston Churchill succeeded in electrifying a whole world which then set to work; and is it not true that this marked the turning point of a battle which could otherwise have been an absolute defeat?

Mr. Speaker, let us remember that, in 1942, the victory of the enemy seemed assured and imminent. German forces were closing in on Stalingrad; Rommel's forces in Africa were thrusting back British troops as far as the ports of the Mediterranean; the British were holding on in spite of successive and violent bombings; enemy submarines were sinking ships, and our losses were considerable. Once again, Sir Winston Churchill, as well as the president of the United States, Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, got together and drafted that magnificent document, the Atlantic charter which so aptly defines the purposes for which allied soldiers were fighting, the protection of freedom of speech, freedom of thought, freedom of the press, and freedom from fear.

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say emphatically that this bill of rights must be supported by each and every one in this house, that this bill is a necessary repetition of the principles in which we believe, a necessary repetition of our creed, of our beliefs and of our aspirations.

In closing, may I say this:

(Text):

During two great world wars the leaders of the times called upon the youth of this country to join the services and go wherever duty called in order to fight so that democracy would live and freedom would prevail, and during two world wars hundreds of thousands of young Canadians joined the ranks and throughout fought with valour and courage so that those ideals which are contained in this bill of rights could prevail and live forever. They fought for those ideals; they died for those ideals.

(Translation):

I think that by enacting this bill of rights, we are paying homage to those great soldiers; we are saying to them that their sacrifices were not in vain, that they died for a good cause, that they had to die for the things in which they believed, but that we, the living, place great value on their sacrifice and do not hesitate to say in the face of Canada and the world that we are ready to fight again as they did because freedom, great and holy freedom, is the most beautiful thing in the world.

Mr. Winch: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Sevigny: With pleasure.

Mr. Winch: In view of the emotional and I trust sincere statement—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: —the minister has made about freedom for Canadians—will the minister state what position he took as a member of the cabinet of Canada in forestalling the denial of free association to trade unionists in Newfoundland when the cabinet had the power to do so? Will he also state, in view of his interpretation of the bill as enunciated by him, whether there is a guarantee that under this bill when passed never again will workers anywhere in Canada be denied the right of free trade union association?

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I believe that those who know me know that when it came time to defend our freedoms and our liberties I was not the last in line.

Mr. Winch: You were a cabinet minister before time ran out.

Mr. Sevigny: Second, may I tell him that I cannot reply to his question concerning trade unions because I was not associated with this matter when it actually presented itself. Third, I can tell him that we in the Conservative party are just as anxious to serve the Canadian people as are members of the C.C.F.; and instead of obstructing progressive measures, as we see continually happening in this chamber, we try to work for the better interests of the people to whom we are dedicated and whom we promised to serve.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I understood the minister to say in answering my question that he was not a member of the cabinet when time ran out with regard to the matter in Newfoundland. If he said that, it is not so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cartier.

Mr. Winch: He was a cabinet member and he had the power.

An hon. Member: He did not say he was not.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, on the last occasion when a similar bill was before the house, as well as on this occasion we have heard, and no doubt will hear, very eloquent and forceful addresses on this most basic subject. I had the privilege on the last occasion of making some observations on that bill, and I should now like to supplement what I said then. While the addresses that we hear are most eloquent and, as I said, forceful and laudatory, it strikes me as if some of our colleagues seem to think there is a contest as to whether or not the bill deserves support. I should like to submit that there is no contest here as to whether a measure of this kind is a desirable one. I do not think there is anyone in the house who will contradict that statement. However, I am afraid that we have taken our eye off the target.

It is my respectful submission that what we should be concerned with is an examination of this legislation in order to see whether it contains those ingredients or those clauses which a bill of this kind should contain. I should like to suggest that we should address ourselves principally to the question of whether the measure is in the form in which it can attain all of the objectives sought by every member in this house. Of course the bill repeats all the platitudinous hopes, dreams and aspirations since Magna Carta in the year 1215; later the English bill of rights in the year 1689, the French declaration of the rights of man proclaimed in the year 1789; even more recently the preamble to the United States constitution and to some extent the Gettysburg address; and similar pronouncements by nearly all countries in the world.

There is but one basic difference, Mr. Speaker, namely that the others were all unanimously accepted and approved by all the people and all the sections of the countries in which they were proclaimed and became the particular constitutional bases of those countries. The present bill lacks exactly that unanimity and constitutional strength which the others have had, and that is the matter which concerns us. It may be a pretty and pious hope to present a piece of legislation of this kind. However, let us see whether it is effective or whether it can be effective.

I would point out that only the unanimity which accompanied the other legislation in the other countries can give this measure any meaning and effectiveness. Otherwise it is just a repetition, as I said, of pious hopes which have been stated and repeated in this house many times. The bill itself is not fundamental. It is not a part of our constitution, nor is it even suggested that it can become a part of our constitution. To me the measure itself lacks permanence. It can be repealed at any time. It is only an act of parliament. It is quite obvious that it does not retain that permanence that a constitution has.

Moreover, to me the measure also has another shortcoming. As has been said in so many different ways, it lacks soul and it lacks heart. To mean anything it must be a piece of legislation that will be ingrained into the very fabric of Canadian conviction. It should be taught in all schools and should be almost religiously accepted by all Canadians. I do not think it can achieve this permanence by this rather prosaic, unrealistic, unimaginative and unappealing language.

It must be accepted by the parliament of every province without a single exception. Otherwise how can we protect people against invasion of civil liberties by provincial legislatures which enact laws in connection with matters over which they have constitutional jurisdiction such as property and civil rights. In this chamber this very morning we heard of a very poignant and classic example of how it is possible to have a conflict between federal legislation and provincial legislation which basically defeats a bill on human rights. We heard today that three people, with skin of a different colour from ours, were denied admission into a hotel in Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) eloquently and justly took the position that a thing like that should not be permitted in this country. When my leader asked him whether this is in conflict with his bill of rights the Prime Minister did not answer whether there was or was not any conflict with his bill of rights. All he said was that it was a matter that falls under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures.

You have here a classic example indicating that the bill now before the house would not and cannot remedy the situation about which we heard this morning, quite coincidentally. If the federal parliament had the authority to enact legislation which could remedy a situation of that kind I am sure the Prime Minister would have had such a provision in his bill. He did not say so in so many words, but I noted that he was visibly disturbed by the incident. It was an unusual incident to happen in a country that is presenting a bill on human rights and fundamental freedoms. Surely the Prime Minister was disturbed by it. Yet he tells us almost, in language out of his own mouth, that this bill of his that he is presenting to the house cannot remedy such an injustice as this which we should not have in Canada.

As I said, we support the measure in its theory and its principles but we say that, unfortunately, it does not remedy those faults which exist in Canada and which the bill should remedy. It may be able to go that far; it may be able to reach into those avenues in which these unfortunate incidents happen if it were studied and presented in a form which will make it constitutional so that it will become a basic part of our constitution.

It has been suggested by a number of hon. members who have spoken that this might be done, either by a conference with the provinces or by other means. I would point out that there are many examples of such conflicts. It should be the duty of this house —and we are all concerned—to find a correct constitutional measure and we should give study to the matter.

In addition to the other suggestions that have been made as to how it could become constitutional, I would not hesitate to suggest that the government should appoint a royal commission on which would be represented provincial legislatures and constitutional law authorities, and that they should sit together, consult with each other in order to work out a proposal for a bill of human rights and fundamental freedoms. When it is approved by this royal commission, let each one of the members go back to their own legislatures and present that bill which has been unanimously accepted and found to be constitutional. If each legislature without any exception will approve that measure, then we have unanimity in the country or a form of unanimity which can then make it constitutional. Then we have it incorporated into our constitution and there we have something of permanence. What we all seek is a constitutional and political guarantee for a complete and comprehensive bill of rights and not a political, personal or academic exercise in political science.

The measure should supersede narrow and parochial legislation or regulations on immigration, refugees, stateless persons and the like. Legal scholars and constitutional lawyers and recognized authorities have given their carefully studied opinions that the present bill falls far short of being constitutional or one that can be effective in any way.

That is a serious thing for members of the house to consider. I do not think it is a waste of time in going through this exercise. I think there have been some splendid speeches and the more we talk of these things the healthier it is for the country, but let us not close our eyes and say that just because this has been presented it is the best thing. It is not the best thing. Constitutional lawyers have pointed out that legally it will not stand up.

I should like to address myself for a few moments to the point that the bill falls far short of being completely comprehensive. May I point out a typical illustration of what I have in mind. I am not going into the clauses in detail but I will have to refer to them to illustrate. In clause 2 we find this language:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights—

I draw the attention of the house to those words. They are there as if to say that no other rights than those listed in this clause have ever existed in Canada before, that these are the only rights which have existed in Canada. I do not admit that. We do not know what the rights are in precise language. If, for example, instead of saying "the following human rights" you said—

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Could I draw the hon. member's attention to clause 5 of part II?

Mr. Crestohl: I will come to clause 5 of part II, but this is the language we are dealing with. If this clause had read that there has always existed and shall continue to exist in Canada all the known human rights, including the following, that language would be all inclusive. We would have been sure that that would cover every conceivable human right, whether listed in clause 2 or not. The Prime Minister, being an able lawyer, will readily see that there is a difference. He is stating to the world that these rights which are mentioned in clause 2 have existed in Canada only up to the present time.

Mr. Chambers: Read clause 5.

Mr. Crestohl: I have read clause 5 and I will come to it, if the hon. member will be patient for a few moments. I cannot ignore clause 2.

Then a little further down in clause 2 we find:

(b) the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race,—

Et cetera. To me that is faulty because it appears as if the individual has the right to the protection of the law against discrimination by reason of race, colour, and so on. I submit respectfully that the bill of rights should clearly declare that the individual has the right to be free from discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex. He should have the right to be free from all these things and to the protection of the law when his rights are invaded. But to say that he has the right to the protection of the law could imply many things which are not intended. If you were to say that the individual shall be free from discrimination by reason of race, colour or creed and that he shall also have the right to the protection of the law when these rights are invaded, that to me would be a very complete statement.

Then lower down we find:

(c) freedom of religion;

That is all it says. I would prefer to see the words "freedom of religion to profess and practise it according to one's own belief and conviction". A man may have the right to freedom of religion but may be prevented from professing it or practising it, and I think that is another fault. I suggest that when we limit our rights we have to examine them minutely and carefully to make sure nothing is overlooked.

Then we have in (d) freedom of speech. I would prefer to see the words "freedom of speech, but not to incite treason or hatred amongst men". We have heard it said that people who make violent attacks in speeches against others have freedom of speech, a right to their own opinion. But we have no reason to incite hatred amongst men and we can say so by reducing that to writing and putting it in a bill of rights.

Then we have in (e) freedom of assembly and association, and I say that that is faulty also. It would have been complete if it had read "freedom of peaceable assembly and association". I think that would make it constitutional and much more acceptable.

Then we have (f), freedom of the press. Again I would include here "but not to incite or unlawfully malign". Under the heading of freedom of the press many scurrilous pamphlets and magazine articles are written and circulated in Canada. I am sure that every time members of the house see them on their desks they must be stirred and wonder why it is that such horrible literature is permitted to go through our mails. Attempts have been made to stop the circulation of these pamphlets. Literature is a very good thing but the moment it starts to incite race hatred and hatred amongst men, when we circumscribe these rights into a bill of rights the people who are guilty of those activities should be clearly told "You have the freedom of the press but you have not got freedom to malign people, to circulate scandalous and scurrilous literature to preach hate amongst people and between one Canadian and another." That is not freedom of the press. I am the last in this country who would in any way obstruct freedom of the press or freedom of speech, but when these things are reduced to the point where they are taken advantage of and do more harm than good, then while writing a bill of rights we should write it with all the clarity and security we possibly can.

I also say that I believe there have been many freedoms which have been omitted from the bill. There have been some observations made by some hon. members, but not one of them have included the phrase "freedom of work" and "freedom of trade union association". That is sometimes questioned. Either a man is free to do that or he is not. If he is not, let us not be afraid to say so. We should say that an individual should have freedom of work or freedom not to work, because if I have not freedom not to work and I am forced to work, that is slavery. Surely that is not intended. Therefore this measure should contain the provision that there shall be freedom to work or not to work.

Next, I would suggest the addition of a further provision to this clause entitling students to seek enlightenment at institutions of learning regardless of race, colour or creed. That should be clearly stated in the bill. There was an instance, which has already been mentioned in this chamber, where a man of oriental origin applied to three universities, which he named, for permission to study medicine, but he was refused admission to each of them. If a man wishes to study he should have the right to study and should not be refused admission to places of learning because of his race or colour. I do not think we want ever to reach a stage where there will be segregation in any of our educational institutions, and that should be clearly stated in our bill of rights—that there should never be segregation of students in our schools.

There are a number of other matters that need careful attention, although this may not be the time at which to carry out such a process. There are so many flaws which are apparent in this measure that some mention must be made of them and a really dangerous situation arises when a list of specific rights is drawn up and put down in such a measure as this, in which it is said: these are your rights in addition to any others which have existed. I refer hon. members to clause 3, subclause (e) where a person may not be deprived:

> —of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations.

A fair hearing by whom? The wording should continue "by an impartial tribunal, and/or a court of law". If that is what is wanted, then spell it out.

Mr. Speaker: With deference to the hon. member, his line of argument now would seem to be more appropriate for the committee stage. He is dealing with the verbal content of the clause.

Mr. Crestohl: I was a little apprehensive that I might be encroaching on that rule of our chamber. But we have had some latitude extended because this is a matter of proposing amendments, and while I am speaking on the measure I throw these thoughts out and they can be considered. I feel that my argument is a little thin—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crestohl: Yes, and take note that I am the one who knows it. I wish a few more hon. members would know when their arguments are just useless and impotent. With them it is always "my prime minister, right or wrong".

An hon. Member: Correct.

Mr. Crestohl: I have not taken that position. One more point in connection with this clause, and I promise you, Mr. Speaker, I will not belabour it. In the very next paragraph there is a contradiction, because it says that no person shall be deprived of the right:

> —to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal for the determination of any criminal charge.

The previous paragraph makes reference only to a fair hearing. Why should the provision not be the same in each case? If in principle a person is entitled to a fair and public hearing, why should that not be the procedure in both these paragraphs? Why should the hearing be fair in one case, and fair and public in the other?

The last objection I wish to raise is in connection with clause 4 outlining the duties of the minister of justice. According to this clause, the minister of justice has the duty of examining all regulations that are submitted to the clerk of the privy council in order to determine whether or not they are consistent with the provisions and principles of the present bill. I say that is giving the minister the right of veto, and that is a right which no minister should possess. Supposing, for example, that a backbencher wanted to introduce a bill either to amend existing legislation or to introduce new legislation. The minister of justice would have the right to say: no, we will not admit your bill because it is inconsistent with these provisions. I think that is not conferring a right but removing a right which members of parliament already have, and such a power should not be left to a single minister of the crown.

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member not admit that in respect to this question the bill now before the house is far less objectionable than the bill as introduced in 1958, in that it does not now give the minister the arbitrary power to which he has referred.

Mr. Crestohl: I do not think the powers granted then were acceptable. I do not think that all that authority should be vested in one minister.

Mr. Fulton: Would the hon. member point out to me where any absolute power to forbid the introduction of legislation is given to the minister of justice in the bill now before the house?

Mr. Crestohl: In that case, perhaps the minister would interpret for us the purpose of the clause. One hon. member who spoke a short while ago did say that it was meaningless. Suppose the minister does find that a regulation is inconsistent with the principles of this act. Would that be just an academic exercise or would he do something about it?

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to explain that when we come to the committee stage. It was not intended to give the minister of justice dictatorial power, but merely to ensure by an expression of parliament that the minister of justice, whoever he might be, does carry out his duty with regard to the review of legislation and regulations.

Mr. Crestohl: I do not think anyone has ever questioned whether or not the minister is performing his duty in examining the legislation that comes before the house. Here it states clearly that:

> The Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the governor in council, examine every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the clerk of the privy council pursuant to the Regulations Act and every bill introduced in the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part.

My question is this: supposing the minister comes to the conclusion that a regulation or a bill is inconsistent with those provisions—what will the minister do? Or suppose the minister comes to the conclusion that it is not inconsistent, what will the minister do? This clause is really meaningless. I can believe that the minister would examine it and give it a fine, academic, legal examination. To make the provision meaningful it should provide that after examination by the minister, if he concludes it is inconsistent he should say so and make a report and reject it. I see no purpose for this clause being included.

There should exist in Canada a parliamentary committee like the one that exists in other countries. I was discussing this matter today with a member of one of the Australian legislatures who said that they have a committee which supervises and investigates possible abuses of purely administrative powers and the regulations which are established by order in council. We have no such committee in this parliament.

An act of parliament gives a minister the right to set up regulations for the administration of his department or for the discharge of that particular measure. The regulations are set up, passed by order in council and move into the law of the land without being scrutinized or discussed by parliament. It is these regulations that should be examined by a committee of this house. It would be helpful if we had a committee like those which exist in Denmark, Australia and in the mother of parliaments to examine and scrutinize the regulations which become part of the law by order in council whether we like it or not. I do not know whether the regulations should be examined before being submitted to the governor in council for approval or after they have been passed but they should be scrutinized at some stage. It is necessary to assess them because some of them may be abusive. I could cite instances of regulations which almost have the effect of nullifying existing legislation or rights.

Perhaps I should give one illustration. I refer to the law adopted last year concerning humane slaughter. I shall only repeat what I said then. I am speaking just as an individual. I have freedom of religion and the bill before us will affirm this; yet, through the regulations of a department there might occur an invasion of my right to enjoy freedom of religion. That is the kind of regulation that should be examined by a committee of this house composed of members of all parties. The committee could reach a conclusion as to whether or not, whether intentionally or inadvertently, there might come into being an abuse of a human right or an interference with a fundamental freedom which it is intended that Canadians have.

One hon. member who participated in the debate said that the present bill is without any sanctions. This bill when passed will be a law. It does not represent a preamble to the constitution. It is not even a constitutional provision. This is a bill of parliament which it is intended that people should obey. With respect to other bills passed by this parliament there are sanctions if people break the law. What are the sanctions in this measure? Again it is reduced to a pious hope.

I do not object to the bill. I should like to see it enacted as I am sure all hon. members would. However, I do feel that it should be more enforceable, that it should have more teeth in it. It would win my more hearty approval if we could, so to speak, really spread the gospel by making it a bill that all Canadians could fully understand.

One hon. gentleman said that this may be an important beginning. Certainly the Magna Carta and other measures of that nature were the beginning of an important trend and have achieved great significance over the years. I think the Prime Minister would do the country a great service and would make a significant contribution to humanity for all time to come if the hon. gentleman would accept my suggestion of establishing either a royal commission or a special commission composed of the finest brains on the subject we have available in the country as well as representatives of all the provinces to see if they could hammer out a bill of rights and fundamental human freedoms that would be acceptable to all. As long as a measure of this nature is not acceptable to someone it is not a true bill of rights.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps fitting that I should participate in this debate because in the last few months I have had a special preoccupation, not with the theory of human rights and fundamental freedoms but with the actuality and practice of them. In that time I have seen a woman driven to insanity. I have seen babies born illegitimately. I have had a person come before me and cry her heart out for two hours because she could not resume her proper name and thus secure a passport to go behind the iron curtain to her homeland. These things I have seen and these things were affected by fundamental freedoms and human rights.

If I could have had in that harrowing time the privilege of coming here to the House of Commons and knowing that I was among friends and that everybody shared the zeal that I do that people's rights should properly be protected, then I would have been happy and proud to have been a member of the House of Commons. Instead, those things have been denied me, not by the theoretical words of anybody but by the practices they have carried out. I intend to say more about that later as I discuss the Canadian bill of rights which is before us for consideration this afternoon.

First may I turn to the criticisms made of this bill by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). I will quote his criticisms and then, if I may, reply to them. The hon. gentleman is reported at page 5651 of Hansard of Friday, July 1, 1960, as saying:

> Historically, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a good deal to say for Professor Lower's contention that there has never been any serious abridgement or any attempt to abridge what are generally understood to be human rights and fundamental freedoms by the parliament of Canada in time of peace or non-emergency.

Perhaps that is quite correct but the Leader of the Opposition on that occasion spoke immediately following the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who in his remarks set forth nine examples where human rights had been abridged by the actions of the government in recent times. If you say they were not abridged by parliament that is probably so because parliament in those days did not stand up and censure the government when it derogated from human rights; but if you say that all those occurred in wartime, as the Leader of the Opposition would suggest, then that is wrong because six of the nine examples cited by the Prime Minister occurred in the years immediately following world war II. A wartime spirit of autocracy may have been there to promote these things but those were days of peace when those derogations occurred.

Another member of the opposition, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) spoke this morning about economic freedoms, the right of employers, as I gathered his words, to hire as they saw fit on conditions they saw fit and to pay wages they saw fit. If this is an economic right, it is just a reflection of the laissez-faire Liberal doctrine of the nineteenth century which has long ago been rejected in our society when we ensure that the working man does have rights against too powerful employers.

Then, the final Liberal speaker who just preceded me, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl), spoke about the language in the bill of rights. Later on I will say more about the language in the bill of rights and about some of the suggestions made to cure it. He suggested that it should be in more lively language, something that would capture the imagination. He then proceeded to read into the record a series of suggested changes that he himself had thought of which would make this bill of rights, if those changes were adopted, hobble like a centipede with 99 peg legs.

Now, to the C.C.F. The other day the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), described himself, I gathered, as Snow White, in his desire to have things done properly, and the seven dwarfs around him nodded their agreement: Gabby, Doc, Doleful, Sneezy, Grumpy, Dopey and Slaphappy all agreed with him, and I take it they all agree with the remarks that have been made by the C.C.F. speakers in the debate so far. Freedom, rights, liberties; do not let them get away with what they are doing to the natives in South Africa; the rights of people in Hong Kong. These sonorous words flowed from their lips, Mr. Speaker, from the lips of a group which cannot manage the affairs that are right in the hands of this parliament.

Let me turn now to the language of the bill of rights and to the critics who suggest that more memorable words can be captured somewhere else. Let me read you this Mr. Speaker, for simple, short expressiveness:

> Every person and every class of persons shall enjoy the right to acquire by purchase, to own in fee simple or otherwise, to lease, rent and to occupy any lands, messuages, tenements or hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, of every nature and description, and every estate or interest therein, whether legal or equitable, without discrimination because of the race, creed, religion, colour or ethnic or national origin of such person or class of persons.

I believe that the only standard words they left out of this are easements and water courses. Where did this come from? That stirring call to set men's hearts alight? It came from chapter 345 of the revised statutes of Saskatchewan, 1953, and section 10 thereof.

Mr. Fulton: Is that the Saskatchewan bill of rights?

Mr. McCleave: It is the Saskatchewan bill of rights, as the Minister of Justice asks. I presume they would present this phraseology to us as the answer to the language that should be employed in this bill of rights.

The hon. member for Essex East suggests that perhaps we could spruce up this document with some preamble from the Magna Carta. I actually believe what he had in mind was the preamble to the charter itself. If so, I shall read it into the record and we shall see if the language will be of any assistance:

John, by the Grace of God, King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and Acquitaine, and Earl of Anjou, to his Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Earls, Barons, Justiciaries, Foresters, Sheriffs, Governors, Officers, and to all Bailiffs, and his faithful subjects,—Greeting. Know ye, that We, in the presence of God, and for the salvation of our own soul, and of the souls of all our ancestors, and of our heirs, to the honour of God, and the exaltation of the Holy Church and amendment of our Kingdom, by the counsel of our venerable fathers, Stephen, Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England, and Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, Henry, Archbishop of Dublin, William of London, Peter of Winchester, Joceline of Bath and Glastonbury, Hugh of Lincoln, Walter of Worcester, William of Coventry, and Benedict of Rochester, Bishops; Master Pandulph, our Lord the Pope's Subdeacon and familiar, Brother Almeric, Master of the Knights-Templars in England, and of these noble persons, William Mareschal Earl of Pembroke, William Earl of Salisbury, William Earl of Warren, William Earl of Arundel, Alan de Galloway Constable of Scotland, Warin Fitz-Gerald, Hubert de Burgh Seneschal of Poictou, Peter Fitz-Herbert, Hugh de Nevil, Matthew Fitz-Herbert, Thomas Basset, Alan Basset, Philip de Albiniac, Robert de Roppel, John Mareschall, John Fitz-Hugh, and others our liegemen; have in the first place granted to God, and by this our present Charter, have confirmed, for us and our heirs forever;—

This is the preamble which perhaps the hon. member for Essex East would like to smuggle into the bill of rights. If not, and he wants language from elsewhere, perhaps this from the great charter, section 55, would do the trick nicely:

All fines have been made by us unjustly, or contrary to the laws of the land, and all amerciaments that have been imposed unjustly, or contrary to the laws of the land, shall be wholly remitted, or ordered by the verdict of the 25 Barons, of whom mention is made below, for the security of the peace, or by the verdict of the greater part of them, together with the aforesaid Stephen, Archbishop of Canterbury, if he can be present, and others whom he may think fit to bring with him; and if he cannot be present, the business shall proceed, notwithstanding, without him; but so that if any one or more of the aforesaid twenty five Barons have a similar plea, let them be removed from that particular trial, and others elected and sworn by the residue of the same twenty five, be substituted in their room, only for that trial.

That might be the replacement that everybody is after for the Income Tax Act. Even this greatest section, section 12, suffers again the defect of language:

No scutage nor aid shall be imposed in our kingdom, unless by the common council of our kingdom; excepting to redeem our person, to make our eldest son a knight, and once to marry our eldest daughter, and not for these, unless a reasonable aid shall be demanded.

And finally, for his edification, so that he can use some of these phrases when he presents amendments to the Canadian bill of rights, I give to the hon. member for Essex East No. 39 of the great charter:

No free man shall be seized, or imprisoned, or dispossessed, or outlawed, or in any way destroyed; nor will we condemn him, nor will we commit him to prison, excepting by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the laws of the land.

The latter part of this section is now known as due process of law.

This time I turn to the Thinkers' Library for inspiration and I recommend this to my hon. friends of the Liberal and C.C.F. parties, the Thinkers' Library, that is. There were suggestions that we follow some of the language of John Stuart Mill. I have his book "On Liberty". There are words in here that are applicable to the present debate but I do not suggest that the language could carry out the purposes of the hon. member for Essex East. For example, I turn to page 16 of this very fine essay and I throw it out not only for the thought it contains, which is ample, but also to ask the house whether it could usefully contain any phraseology for our bill. Mr. Mill puts it this way:

Apart from the peculiar tenets of individual thinkers, there is also in the world at large an increasing inclination to stretch unduly the powers of society over the individual, both by the force of opinion and even by that of legislation; and as the tendency of all the changes taking place in the world is to strengthen society and diminish the power of the individual, this encroachment is not one of the evils which tend spontaneously to disappear, but, on the contrary, to grow more and more formidable.

Obviously within that sentence, and it is a complete sentence, there exists in Mr. Mill's language the problem we are trying to solve, thanks to the Prime Minister's bill of rights. I also suggest to the house that nowhere in that language is there a ready, quick phrase that could usefully be incorporated in the legislation we are considering today.

For those detractors of the Prime Minister and the draftsmanship that has gone into this particular bill of rights, may I also read from another noble work in the English language on liberty, and this concerns liberty of the press. I suggest that the remarks of Mr. John Milton in Areopagitica have particular application to the critics of the Prime Minister. From the Pitt press series, page 34, I am again going to read one sentence which will take about three minutes to read but which contains very powerful language indeed. These are the words:

> When a man writes to the world, he summons up all his reason and deliberation to assist him; he searches, meditates, is industrious, and likely consults and confers with his judicious friends; after all which done, he takes himself to be informed in what he writes, as well as any that wrote before him; if in this, the most consummate act of his fidelity and ripeness, no years, no industry, no former proof of his abilities, can bring him to that state of maturity, as not to be still mistrusted and suspected, unless he carry all his considerate diligence, all his midnight watchings, and expense of Palladian oil, to the hasty view of an unleisured licenser, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferior in judgment—

I think these words about unleisured licensers certainly apply to the unleisured critics we have had here.

> —perhaps one who never knew the labour of bookwriting; and if he be not repulsed or slighted, must appear in print like a punie with his guardian, and his censor's hand on the back of his title to be his bail and surety, that he is no idiot or seducer, it cannot be but a dishonour and derogation to the author, to the book, to the privilege and dignity of learning.

Mr. Milton's noble words have embraced in one vast sentence a great number of ideas, but again not containing the type of language which people could readily read or understand to be their particular rights.

I come now to one of the problems that I wish the bill of rights could handle and I hope that some time it can be made to deal with this problem. There are areas of responsibility which are given unto men but those areas of responsibility can be carried out properly or can be carried out badly indeed depending on whether men use their frailties or use their strengths to carry them out. Any due process of law should be a dignified process and it should ensure justice. It should be done for the suppliants before it and not for the glorification of those who are charged with the task of performing that judicial function. Theirs not to collect press clippings; theirs to do their duty. A sham judicial process is one where the spirit of the judge is mercurial and wilful and causes or determines not by rules of law but by the toss of a coin or a feeling of prejudice or a feeling of whimsicality, a feeling of caprice.

I have mentioned some of the social mischiefs that derogate from human rights and fundamental freedoms. I hope that by the time 5.30 comes around I will be able to walk out of this chamber, hold my head high again and say that all within this room are fair and just and honourable, not in a platitudinous way but in respect of the practical things that count in Canada.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in relation to the bill of rights now before the house I find myself in the rather unusual position of following an hon. member who has taken a line somewhat similar to mine. Fortunately I have some other examples of draftsmanship which will reveal as unnecessary the additions which the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) would have us make to the bill.

The hon. member for Essex East has said that the courts have formally enshrined in our Canadian law certain freedoms without the aid of parliament and in so stating he quoted among others the Jehovah's Witness cases. I should like to point out to the hon. member that in the two cases involving Jehovah's Witnesses which came before the Supreme Court of Canada there was a split decision. In each case the judges divided five for the decision and four against, which leaves us wondering how clearly the laws, practices and customs of our fundamental rights are enshrined in human knowledge and in our precedents in Canada. I wonder what might happen in the future if the court is differently composed and if other individuals sitting on the bench have to deal not with exactly the same problem but a similar one. I think the examples which the hon. member for Essex East quoted were of no assistance to his case but merely pointed to the fact that it is necessary to have stated in clear words what the intention of parliament is as to fundamental rights and freedoms.

Another example which the hon. member for Essex East used concerned criminal charges as they are dealt with in the bill, by clause 3, subclause (f), relating to the determination of a criminal charge against an individual. The hon. member asked what would happen in the case of a charge against a juvenile under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. I would point out to him that the Juvenile Delinquents Act is very clear on this matter. The act says that a juvenile delinquent is not a criminal and has not committed a crime. Section 3, subsection 2, of the act reads as follows:

> Where a child is adjudged to have committed a delinquency he shall be dealt with, not as an offender, but as one in a condition of delinquency and therefore requiring help and guidance and proper supervision.

Therefore I suggest that any thought that a juvenile charged under the Juvenile Delinquents Act would come under this section as a criminal is very far afield.

A third objection was raised by the hon. member for Essex East and by several other members in the opposition. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) in reply quoted certain matters he wanted to bring to the attention of the house. The main complaint is that the language is too simple and too concise, and that it should be enlarged and made more specific in certain aspects.

Just in order to find out what people in the past have thought about the question of drafting legislation, I turned up one of the most valuable books on legislation, namely "Practical Legislation" by Lord Thring, written many years ago. In his introduction he points out that simplicity and clearness of language is the most important point in drafting legislation. At page 2—and this refers to the Magna Carta—he states the following:

> The prince of all draftsmen, Stephen Langton, the Papal Legate, expressed Magna Charta in short and precise language; for example, no one can complain of ambiguity or verbosity in the most famous of all written enactments which declares, when translated, "To no man will we sell, to no man will we deny or delay, right or justice."

A little further on Lord Thring points to some examples of enactments in which too much verbosity is included and where things go wrong. At page 3 he quotes an amendment proposed in 1865 which reads as follows:

> "Every dog found trespassing on inclosed land unaccompanied by the registered owner of such dog or other person who shall on being asked give his true name and address, may be then and there destroyed by such occupier or by his orders."

Further on in his introduction Lord Thring makes this statement:

> The bill should be clear and should state at the very commencement the important principle of the measure and the greatest pains should be taken to separate the material from the comparatively immaterial provisions.

He concludes this page of notes with a warning to all those would-be draftsmen, and I think it is pertinent to the particular case in point:

> It may be well to warn the draftsman that in his case virtue will, for the most part, be its own reward, and that after all the pains that have been bestowed on the preparation of a bill, every Lycurgus and Solon sitting on the back benches will denounce it as a crude and undigested measure, a monument of ignorance and stupidity. Moreover, when the bill has become law, it will have to run the gauntlet of the judicial bench, whose ermined dignitaries delight in pointing out the shortcomings of the legislature in approving such an imperfect performance.

I think it might be well to add that Lord Thring seemed to feel that such objections to simple language would come from the back benches. However, today we have had them from the front benches as well.

In connection with the amendment which is before the house, it has been suggested that the consent of the provinces ought to be secured before proceeding with this legislation. The hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), in making this suggestion, compared the present piece of legislation with the amendment to the British North America Act with reference to the retirement ages of judges. He said that if it were possible for the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) to secure consent of all the provinces to that amendment, it should be just as simple a matter to secure consent to the present bill of rights.

I submit that there is no comparison whatever. There are two main differences. The Judges Act amendment is a simple alteration in the constitution on which a decision yes or no can be made by the provinces. The bill of rights, on the other hand, has a number of extremely important principles involved, each one of which must be considered by the provinces and answered yes or no. There is also a more fundamental difference, of course, namely that the amendment to the Judges Act is not what one would call a fundamental matter but an individual instance where consent could be obtained. The bill of rights is basic and as such a basic matter it includes many provisions, any one of which could provide an effective snag to negotiation.

I do not want to repeat what was said by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) in connection with previous meetings that had been held in an effort to get the provinces together with the federal government on such basic amendments as the present one. However, I feel—and many other members have expressed this opinion here yesterday and today—that we must have a start on the bill of rights. We must entrench it in our legislation and we must make clear what we intend; then we must hope and expect that in due course the provinces will come along and follow it up.

There is one final approach to this problem that I should like to make and I believe it has not been considered previously. I think we must go on the assumption that this bill is going to pass. I seem to feel that everyone here is in agreement with the basic principles of the bill. Various matters have been raised in connection with minor amendments or changes of wording. Perhaps some of these suggestions have merit. A committee could consider them, whether it be the committee of the whole house or any other committee. However, those are minor matters. We are now considering the general principle of the bill, and I feel that the bill is bound to pass.

Protestations have been made by the opposition but I feel that no real matters of substance have been raised. It has been said that we should try for a constitutional amendment, that the wording of the bill does not go far enough, that the bill goes too far, that the language is too broad and that it is not sufficiently clear. However, in spite of all these objections, I feel that the bill will pass.

I think we must consider what results will flow from the passage of this bill. I think the results that will flow from this bill are much greater in magnitude than has been indicated by any hon. member of the house in discussing the bill other than the Prime Minister who introduced it. I think it may be many years before the effect of the bill gradually catches up with the legislation which is now on the books and the legislation which may come in the future. I think we must ask ourselves into what valleys and hidden corners of 93 years of Canadian legislation this bill may extend.

Passing reference has been made to sections of the Immigration Act and the regulations. Certain hon. members made reference to other acts which may be affected. I believe there may be many more which have been passed, and forgotten—and are at present unused but which may from time to time in the future make themselves noticed and be tested on this bill of rights in the courts. I wonder what present or past acts of parliament, or future acts, may be washed aside under the influence of the bill of rights.

Those who say that the bill does not go far enough may be surprised to find that it goes very far and that its effect may be reaching forward for a good many years. I feel the bill sets a level of morality in legislation in this country, a level which has not been previously set down in words. We have had from time to time expressions in the courts as to what is right and just and what are our basic human rights. These depend in large measure upon what judges can find in past cases and what they personally feel about these measures, but there has been no guide on which they may found their decisions. I see this bill as giving them that guide and that level of morality in considering whether an act does contravene basic human rights.

Mr. Speaker, if the house will forgive me for being poetic. I see the bill of rights as a river flowing into a large valley, filling in many nooks and crannies which have been previously unnoticed, washing away many of the legislative bills which have been based on very sandy and shaky foundations in the past. I feel it may be many years before the full extent of this flowing in of the bill of rights into our legislative procedure will be fully determined and understood. Many years will pass, I believe, before this process is complete; but in the end, we will look back on this bill, as we now look back on the other great landmarks of declaratory legislation, as one of those great additions to the earlier declarations of human rights which have always been ours.

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is with some hesitation that I rise to follow so many learned members of the legal profession who have spoken on this bill. On the other hand it is not too often that we have an opportunity in the House of Commons to talk about and vote upon matters as fundamental as is this bill of rights. Many of the matters which come before us call for a judgment, a comparison. We have, for instance, the estimates of a department which come before us and we must try to judge or decide whether the amounts of money required are appropriate. We must judge whether the business could be done with a little less money or whether it would be better done with a little more.

But today we are dealing with something that is not in the realm of judgment but in the realm of basic belief. We have before us a measure that enunciates principles, the principles upon which our society is, or certainly should be, founded. The bill before us sets out in black and white the things that Canadians believe. It sets out those things upon which we have built this country and it will be the guide post as we continue to build in the future.

There have been some criticisms of the language. To me, the language, and particularly the language in part I, is admirable in its economy. It is clear, concise, and beyond misunderstanding.

The world today is divided between those who believe that the only things of importance to mankind are the material things and those who believe that the spirit of man and his dignity as an individual are of first importance. It is time that the people of this country through their parliament should declare before the world to which of these camps they belong. Here we set down in the clearest of terms a statement of Canadian principles for all to see.

One of the other criticisms which has been made is that this bill may be repealed or that future legislation need not necessarily conform to it. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, which member of this house today should he become a minister would rise in his place and introduce a bill to repeal this bill of rights? Which member of this house on occupying a seat on the treasury benches would rise and introduce a bill containing the clause "Notwithstanding the provisions of the bill of rights"? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, it will be a long, long time before any Canadian minister will rise with any such suggestion, and that if any minister did so the ensuing debate would indeed be a fundamental one.

We have also heard some niggling criticisms to the effect that such a bill is not required. The legalistic mind insists that these rights are already embodied in British common law which we inherit, that we are safe in the hands of our courts and our tradition of freedom.

Mr. Speaker, how can I tell my sons what it means to be a Canadian in terms of court decisions? How can I explain to men of other countries Canada's position on these matters in terms of the supreme court's decision in the Alberta press act? The objections to this bill come from the same source that objections to progressive steps have ever come. They come from the comfortable, from those who have in their own resources the ability to defend their rights. In their own position in life, economic and otherwise, they are unafraid.

This bill is not for the comfortable, except incidentally. This bill is for the protection of those who need protection. It guarantees to the weak and to the poor their freedoms. With part I of this bill I can explain to my sons what it is to be a Canadian; I can explain to men of other lands why I am proud to be a Canadian because, as I said before, in the simplest and most direct language it is set out in a few brief lines that:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely, the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law; the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex; freedom of religion; freedom of speech; freedom of assembly and association; and freedom of the press.

Mr. Speaker, no one in this house has suggested that our rights and liberties stop there, but it is true to say that on these foundations all our rights and liberties are built. I will vote for the bill, not because in its terminology it is better than some other bill, not because through a process of logic I find it acceptable; I will vote for this bill and its principles because I believe in it.

Mr. E. W. Brunsden (Medicine Hat): The very interesting discussion which took place this morning produced an exchange between the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) concerning the debating practices of 35 years ago and this brought to my mind a debate held about that time ago between a team from Oxford and Cambridge and a team from the University of Alberta. The resolution debated on that occasion was:

> That in the opinion of this house there is a growing tendency on the part of government to invade the rights of individuals.

This growing tendency perhaps has been established in years gone by. This legislation seeks in my opinion to arrest that tendency. It cannot be denied that there is in this country a marked lack of knowledge as to the rights of individuals. I listened yesterday with a great deal of interest to the contribution made by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp). He spoke of new Canadians. He told us he was a new Canadian, and he asked us, in effect, to establish for him a statement of his rights and that this bill seeks to do.

May I say that I am a new Canadian. I was not born in this country. My father brought me to this country when I was a very small boy. From my recollections of his struggles, and from my observations over the years, I have come to the conclusion that there was discrimination in the early days of Canada against individuals. In my own part of the country we have a large number of farm operatives, labourers, and workers in various trades, who have come to Canada in recent years, and in the minds of many of these people there is a fear of the law, a fear of the police and, to a degree, a fear of the banks of this country.

Some of us can remember, when the war loans were being raised in the second world war, calling on farmer after farmer, trying to interest them in the purchase of war bonds. I had the experience of being successful in my endeavour to sell some of these bonds, and I recall that when I began to write out a cheque for the value of the bonds someone would say to me: No, I will not pay by cheque. Then he would disappear for a few moments, perhaps carrying a lantern with him, and return later with a tin full of bills, and he would pay for those bonds in cash. That was fear. It does seem to me, as one interested in persons of this type and as one who perhaps has the trust of some persons of this type, that it will be a lot easier for me on my return home to be able to say to them: I can now explain to you very simply and very quickly what are your rights in Canada.

This in my opinion is a magnificent piece of proposed legislation. It clarifies a great number of questionings. It gives us something concise, something easy to explain to those who perhaps have not enjoyed the education which some of the rest of us have enjoyed, and the Prime Minister is to be heartily commended for his contribution.

Mr. W. F. Matthews (Nanaimo): It gives me a great deal of pleasure to take part in this debate. I will just take a few minutes. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) expressed the hope that all members would have time to enter into this debate and I think the subject has been covered very nicely by a number of members who have spoken already. I have enjoyed it very much.

This bill has been well talked over, but there are one or two points I should like to make starting with a statement introduced by the Prime Minister about changing the nation to what it ought to be. That is just what the Prime Minister is attempting to do. Other words we have heard have been from the official opposition complaining about the wording and the preamble of this bill. The flowery words that are wanted by the members of the opposition are hardly in keeping with some of the things they have said during the times they have been on their feet. The leader of the official opposition, in what I understand was one of his first speeches, moved a very flowery amendment which is recorded in Hansard of 1957-58 at page 3520. I am not going to read it all, because it is very flowery, along the lines of what he thought at that time might go over well in the minds of the people of Canada. I will go down to the bottom of this, and read:

> And in view of the desirability at this time of having a government pledged to implement Liberal policies;
> His Excellency's advisers should, in the opinion of this house, submit their resignation forthwith.

After all, the Conservative government had been in office for seven months. They had been elected by the people of Canada and right away, after those seven short months, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) was of the opinion that they should step back and allow him to form a government. In other words, he put all the voters of Canada on the stand. He was criticizing the judgment they had made at that time. He could not sit still long enough to let them enjoy themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Matthews: I know this is out of order, Mr. Speaker, so I will stop on that right now.

Mr. Speaker: I am not interrupting the hon. member on that ground, but it is five o'clock and it is my duty to leave the chair so that the house may proceed with the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of standing order No. 15.

Mr. McCleave: Before the house goes into committee to consider the bills which are down for consideration, I wonder whether hon. members would agree to refer all the others—there are 50 in my hand, and there are nine volumes to accompany this—and it may be more practical to have them all considered at the same time—

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure I understand the hon. member's proposal.

Mr. McCleave: I was going to suggest that the other bills be also referred to the committee at the same time so that they can all be considered together.

Mr. Speaker: To the committee of the whole in one motion?

Mr. McCleave: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard: Does this apply to those bills set down for resumed consideration in committee?

Mr. McCleave: No, just those not yet referred to the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: There would be some convenience in preparing orders of the day if one order covered all of the bills already referred or to be referred which would be all of the divorce bills except those standing for resumed second reading or second reading. If the house would agree to substitute an order for all bills now before the committee or to be referred to the committee to be taken under one order it would simplify the orders of the day. It would be unnecessary to number the bills and one order would cover the bills before the committee.

Mr. Peters: I presume that each second reading would be referred to the committee and not those bills already on the order paper?

Mr. Speaker: The proposal is to consolidate in one order for reference to the committee of the whole house those bills which are already before the committee and those which stand for reference to the committee. That would include all the items down to order No. 375 to be consolidated in one motion, with the exception of order No. 366 which is not a divorce bill. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered then. All the divorce bills before the committee will stand referred in one motion.

PRIVATE BILLS

The Deputy Chairman: Shall these be taken as one item?

Mr. Peters: No.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will then consider Bill No. SD-55.

MARIE ROSE NICOLA LAPENNA MCLAUGHLIN

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-55, for the relief of Marie Rose Nicola Lapenna McLaughlin—Mr. McCleave—Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, considerable interest has been expressed in the procedure with respect to this matter and it was referred to earlier by the—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps I am anticipating what the hon. member is going to say. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to come back to Bill No. SD-55.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this marriage took place between two young people in the province of Quebec in 1954. At the time of marriage the petitioner was 16 years of age and the respondent 19 and the marriage lasted only between 5 and 6 months. In interrogating the petitioner about the reason why the marriage lasted for so short a time the following question was asked by Mr. Cohen, counsel for the petitioner, and the following reply was given by the petitioner:

Q. Will you tell the committee something about your married life, why you couldn't get along together?

A. After I got married I was very young and foolish, and I realized that I couldn't live that way. It was just a big mistake.

I do not understand what is meant by that answer. Also, I question that the committee of the other place should allow that type of answer. Since the committee of this house and the committee of the other place are replacing the function of the family court they should direct their attention to asking if a reconciliation can be achieved.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not like to interrupt the hon. member again but we are not concerned with the procedure of the committee of the other place. We are concerned only with the procedure of this committee. I think the hon. member's remarks are not relevant to Bill No. SD-55.

Mr. Peters: Normally these questions are asked in a stereotyped way. They take into consideration the problems to which I was relating this evidence. We have an obligation even if only an implied one to determine whether or not the petition should be granted not only on the grounds asked for but in the interests of the country and the people concerned. It is not necessary to grant a petition if it is not in the interests of the parties concerned. Despite the brief marriage there was a child. The questioning on this point was as follows:

Q. Who is she living with?

A. She is living with myself and I am living with my parents.

Q. You are working?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever discuss divorce with your husband?

A. No.

Q. Since the date of the alleged adultery on the 22nd of May, 1959 have you ever had sexual relations with your husband?

A. No.

Q. Could you tell us something about the 22nd day of May, 1959 at 647 Woodland, apartment 3?

A. I went there and George and Rita were living as man and wife.

Q. You went to Woodland Avenue for what purpose?

A. I wanted support for my daughter.

Q. Had your husband been contributing towards your daughter?

A. No.

Q. And you went down to speak to him personally?

A. Yes.

Q. Who did you find when you arrived there?

A. He was there with this girl by the name of Rita, and they were dressed in pyjamas and nightgown.

Q. What time of day was this?

A. About 9 p.m.

Q. Did you speak to your husband about support for the child?

A. I did.

Q. Did you ask him if he was living there?

A. Yes, and he said he was living with this woman.

Q. Since the 22nd of May, 1959 have you ever lived as man and wife with Mr. McLaughlin?

A. No.

Q. Is there any hope of reconciliation in this marriage?

A. No.

Q. How about it in the future?

A. No.

Q. Did you place Rita Lauzon in front of your husband? Did you introduce her?

A. I never saw her before.

By the Chairman (Senator Croll):

Q. You had never seen her until that night?

A. I never seen her before that night.

Q. Did you forgive this situation after you had seen it?

A. No.

By Senator Gershaw:

Q. Did you encourage your husband to go with this other woman?

A. No.

Q. Tell me a little more about what you actually saw when you went into that house.

A. They were both there—they were lying down.

Q. What kind of house was it?

A. A little apartment.

Q. How many rooms?

A. It had about three rooms I guess.

Q. You went in there at nine o'clock and what did you see?

A. I saw that this woman and George were sitting down on the bed with pyjamas and nightgown on.

Q. They were sitting on the bed.

A. When I walked in they had been in bed—the bed was messed.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that she is not nearly as good or precise a witness as most of the detectives because she stated several things here which do not correspond with the questions asked by the senator. The answers are not the same as those in reply to the questions by Mr. Cohen. Mr. Cohen is the legal counsel in this case. I have not found anything wrong with his interrogation so far but I would point out I understand it is being said in Montreal that Mr. Cohen is the only lawyer who can get a divorce through this house. I should like to point out that this must be only because he files his divorces early in the session. It has nothing to do with any action in this house. Mr. Cohen is in no privileged position. In my opinion his questioning in a number of cases has not been such as to warrant him being accepted as the only legal counsel. The questioning was continued by Senator Kinley as follows:

Q. When you went to this apartment, who let you in?
A. My husband came and opened the door.
Q. What do you work at?
A. I work at the Bank of Montreal.
Q. You don't have to be away at nights for your work?
A. No.

By the Chairman (Senator Croll):

Q. Why did you go to that house on Woodland avenue on the day in question?
A. I wanted support for my daughter.
Q. But how did you know that he was living there?
A. I did not know. I phoned up where he worked at the railway and they told me that is his home address. So I went there.
Q. Is that the first time you knew where he was living?
A. Yes.
Q. From the time you separated had you seen your husband?
A. No.
Q. From the time you separated you had not seen him until that night?
A. I don't know; I don't think I had.
Q. Had you spoken to him?
A. No.
Q. Had he been supporting the daughter at all?
A. No, never did.
Q. Why didn't you ask him sooner for support?
A. Because I thought I could manage, and it just came the time I couldn't any more. I thought I could get more help this way and it would be easier.
Q. Did he agree to help you?
A. Not particularly.
Q. What does that mean?
A. He just said no, I guess.
Q. The best test is, did he send you any money for your daughter?
A. No, he did not.

Mr. Cohen: Mr. Chairman, I note an amendment is required to paragraph 8 under the rules. May I read paragraph 8 into the record:

"That there has been no separation agreement for any financial agreement in existence between the petitioner and the respondent, George Alfred McLaughlin."

I would suggest that this particular paragraph having been inserted in the record here would indicate to me that Mr. Cohen is not doing right by some of his clients, particularly when he has brought a number of cases before this house, by finding it necessary to insert this type of clause rather than make the arrangements that are made by some of the other counsel in cases that we have handled. The questioning continued by Mr. Cohen:

Q. Have you ever taken any action in the superior court in Montreal?
A. No.
Q. Has there been—

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit a question. Instead of making remarks such as he has just made, has he not noticed that the petition is dated long before the new Senate rules came into effect? I do not think he is justified in making those unjustified slurs.

Mr. Peters: I am not making any unjustified slurs. I am aware of the fact that the Senate has decided that these questions will be asked and these decisions will be made, and that has come about because of action taken by this house in many cases. What I am saying in plain English is that there were no financial arrangements made in the courts of Quebec where they deal with these problems. Because of this action it is very unlikely that action will be taken by the same courts. I do not think this has any relationship to what the Senate does in these particular cases. I continue with the questioning:

Q. Has there been any financial arrangement on behalf of your husband for the support of your child?
A. No.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The financial arrangements are no concern of this committee. I am sure the hon. member knows that.

Mr. Peters: I continue:

By Senator Gershaw:

Q. Mrs. McLaughlin, are you going to be able to look after this child and see that she is—

I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. This matter of assistance is kind of confused and intermingled with many of the other remarks in this particular case. No doubt it is the result of questioning by a number of people on the same subject. I continue:

Q. You are living with your parents?
A. Yes, my mother and father.
Q. You were working previous to your marriage?
A. Yes.
Q. And you continued to work after your marriage?
A. Yes.

Q. Even after your child was born?
A. Yes.
Q. How did you arrange about looking after the home?
A. My mother.
Q. You have always lived with your mother?
A. Yes.

By the Chairman (Senator Croll):

Q. You were married in January, 1954, and the marriage appears to have broken up in April, 1954. You were 16 when you were married, and if I remember correctly, you told us you left?
A. Yes.
Q. Was I wrong on that?
A. That is right.
Q. Just tell us what happened?
A. I just couldn't go on—everything was so silly. We didn't get along. I didn't realize what I had got into. Then I stopped and realized it, and I thought I had better grow up and go home to my mother. We fought all the time.
Q. How long had you known him before you were married?
A. Not quite a year.

This, of course, could lead to generalizing in another field, but I think it would be of some advantage to these people if they had gone to the right welfare agency or family court. It is unfortunate that some of these lawyers like Mr. Cohen, who has had great experience, have not seen fit to send these people to these agencies rather than accept a case at so much a month. I will respect your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and not discuss the little girl.

George Alfred McLaughlin the respondent, appeared as a witness on behalf of the petitioner, and, having been duly sworn, testified as follows:

By the Clerk of the Committee:

Q. What is your full name?
A. George Alfred McLaughlin.
Q. What is your age?
A. 23.
Q. Where do you live?
A. 647 Woodland, apartment 3, Montreal.
Q. What is your occupation?
A. Electrician.

By the Chairman (Senator Croll):

Q. Mr. McLaughlin, listen to me carefully. Before you proceed, it is my duty to inform you that you are not liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that you are guilty of adultery, unless you have already given evidence in this proceeding in disproof of your alleged adultery. While you are not liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to the proof of your own adultery, you have the right to do so if you see fit—that is your right and privilege—in which event everything you say will be told voluntarily and not under any compulsion. Do you understand your position in this regard?
A. Yes, sir.

How much better is the reading of this warning than the system that appears to be in effect in Ontario where it is the practice to take pictures of corespondents without the use—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. McCleave: I submit that the hon. member is clearly out of order. He has referred to Ontario and that may be out of order too.

Mr. Peters: One out of order may cancel the other out of order. I continue:

Q. Mr. McLaughlin, are you living and having sexual relations with one Rita Lauzon?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And in particular on the 22nd day of May, 1959, at 647 Woodland, apartment 3, in the province of Quebec, were you living as man and wife with one Rita Lauzon?
A. Have been for the past year.
Q. Were you married to the petitioner, Rose Nicola Lapenna, and on what date were you married?
A. January 2, 1954.
Q. Are you supporting the child of that union in any way?
A. No.

By the Chairman (Senator Croll):

Q. Mr. McLaughlin, you lived together with your wife for six months?
A. Yes.
Q. Why did the marriage break up at that time?
A. Well, why make my life miserable and my wife's life miserable when we can't get along? The woman I am living with now I love and I would like to marry her.
Q. You did not love your wife?
A. No. Let us say it was a marriage of convenience.
Q. What do you mean by that?
A. We had to have a name for the baby.

Then Rita Mary Lauzon appeared as a witness on behalf of the petitioner and was duly sworn. She gave this testimony:

By the Clerk of the Committee:

Q. What is your name?
A. Rita Mary Lauzon.
Q. What is your age?
A. 35.
Q. Where do you live?
A. 647 Woodland avenue, apartment 3.
Q. In what city?
A. Verdun, Quebec.
Q. What is your occupation?
A. Switchboard operator.

By the Chairman (Senator Croll):

Q. Miss Lauzon, will you listen to what I have to say. Before you proceed it is my duty to inform you that you are not liable to be asked or bound to answer any questions tending to show that you are guilty of adultery—

Then he goes on to give the warning which in my opinion is an indication that some of the rights of these people are being protected. They do not have to give evidence that will tend to incriminate them. In other words, they are given the same right as under the United States fifth amendment and under the Canada Evidence Act.

Mr. McCleave: Will the hon. member permit a question? Will he not agree that these rights go back a long way in history and are not a development of recent times?

Mr. Peters: Certainly. Having listened to the history of these rights, I am quite happy to agree that they go back much farther. I think the Senate very likely used as a precedent the warning of the Canada Evidence Act which has been adapted to these circumstances but I am quite sure the history of the matter goes back a long time. I do not say that this is a bad thing. I agree that this warning is fair and just because these people are testifying to an act which can be interpreted to be contrary to canon law and in some cases is against civil and criminal law also. Mr. Cohen asked these questions:

Q. Miss Lauzon, are you committing adultery, and more particularly on the 26th day of May, 1959, at 647 Woodland avenue, apartment 3, with George Alfred McLaughlin?
A. That is right.

By the chairman (Senator Croll):

Q. How long have you been living with him as man and wife?
A. Since the end of March, 1959.
Q. Is that when you first knew him?
A. No.
Q. How long did you know him before that?
A. In January.
Q. You have been living with him since the end of March. Do you recall the occasion when Mrs. McLaughlin was at your apartment?
A. Around the 22nd of May.

Then the transcript is certified to be a correct transcript of the shorthand notes of the evidence in this case as taken by the reporter.

This is a very interesting case and one to which some consideration should be given. In my memory I believe that this is one of the first cases where both the respondent and the corespondent have testified to the fact that they committed adultery. I think this raises a point in that the inference could be drawn, although the hon. member for Halifax may object, that the divorce was wanted more by the respondent and the co-respondent than by the petitioner.

It has been generally conceded in law that a confession voluntarily given will carry considerable weight except in those cases where the confession would tend to create a situation that the parties themselves wish created. In other words, this confession will give to the man what he says he wants and in that regard I would quote again the following question and answer:

Q. Why did the marriage break up at that time?
A. Well, why make my life miserable and my wife's life miserable when we can't get along? The woman I am living with now I love and I would like to marry her.

In this case we have him stating a motive that may have influenced his confession at this time. I suggest that we should give serious consideration to this type of confession because as a result the respondent is granted the relief that he has said he wishes. We can see how it would be quite easy to accomplish this result by making arrangements to pay for the divorce if there was violent exception by the plaintiff that the divorce should be given to her and the expenses paid and she would act as the injured party in this case. I am not saying that is the situation because I do not know but it has been generally conceded that confessions that have a stated motive should be looked at with some care because of the fact that they tend not to be in the public interest in that they may cause people to perjure themselves in order to get relief that they could not otherwise get.

I am not saying that this is the case in this instance. I think this young man has indicated that he has some responsibility with respect to his relationship to his wife. It was a shotgun marriage, a marriage by arrangement. He married the young girl only to give the child a name. He accomplished that and I presume there may have been some discussion at that time that if he carried his responsibility that far there would be no further problem. Probably the arrangement was carried out equally well by both parties until the young lady reached the time when she again wanted to try her hand in the matrimonial realm, distasteful as it may have been to her in the first place. It is not usual for both the corespondent and respondent to come forward and, taking advantage of the full protection of the law, make such an admission involving testimony that they have committed adultery. If this happens in too many cases I think we will be warranted in taking a very close look at the situation because it could be an indication that divorces were being sought by arrangement and as a result we should not necessarily give too much weight to the evidence of the witnesses and the confession they voluntarily make.

I notice the hon. member for Edmonton West is questioning this statement. His legal mind may not recognize the fact that people would do this. I am quite sure that voluntary confessions are acceptable. In reading some of the studies on divorce laws I note that there is a warning that this type of voluntary confession should be given close scrutiny in order to know that other particulars would tend to establish that this situation of adultery was existing separately from the confessions themselves. I would point out—

Mr. Lambert: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that many courts trying divorce cases in this country insist on the two parties coming in and that they do not take the confession of one person. That is precisely the point about which the hon. gentleman is talking.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The committee cannot allow discussion of procedure in other places.

Mr. Peters: I was pleased to have that answer because my hon. friend is a learned counsel and I am not. The education we get is valuable. We shall try to remember it.

Mr. Lambert: I hope you will profit by it.

Mr. Peters: In the argument we were making I should like to point out that in this particular case the young lady in question did go to the apartment, she did find them living there, she did establish through the hearing an arrangement as to—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, a certain remark was made by the hon. member for Timiskaming and it is my duty to answer inquiries such as that. The remark or suggestion was that one Montreal lawyer was able to get his divorce cases through parliament. This is a most unjust inference against parliament and against the lawyer himself. The fact is that since the start of this session we have followed religiously the numbers from one to the present point of 55. Perhaps I am a little bit out of order but I would raise this point on a question of privilege. The situation has become so bad, because of the lobby created by this filibuster, that I will not under any circumstances—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. McCleave: I will raise the matter as a question of privilege.

The Deputy Chairman: I cannot allow those remarks. They are not relevant to Bill No. SD-55. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: Inasmuch as a question of privilege was raised and, in my opinion, it is an extremely important one, I think perhaps a little bit of laxity in the enforcement of the rules at this stage might be extremely advantageous to all concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair has made its ruling. Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Howard: No, Mr. Chairman. There are one or two points I should like to make here. I should have liked to make a comment or two at this stage or at some other stage about the individual in this case who is the lawyer and some of the statements that he has been making or is reputed to have been making in Montreal. If they are true, this is most unfair procedure on the part of the gentleman himself. If he is making these statements I think he should be severely reprimanded for them inasmuch as he is implying that there is some improper arrangement between himself and members of this house. If these rumours are incorrect and the gentleman in question, namely Mr. Cohen, has not been making these statements, then at once I say that whatever reflections I may have cast upon him by even making slight reference to the matter are immediately withdrawn. But, as I say, if he is making these statements he should be called to task for doing so inasmuch as he is suggesting that there are improprieties in his relationships with members of this house; and those improprieties are not confined to any one member alone but take into account every person here. If, as is the case, these particular cases which have been passed and endorsed have been ones in which the particular gentleman, Mr. Cohen, was the lawyer, it is only because they came up in that particular order.

With respect to this individual case, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two comments in order to point out what I think are some conflicts which may or may not be serious. Nevertheless they are conflicts in the evidence given and they should be looked at. Where there is a conflict in the evidence that is given, while that conflict in itself may be on a relatively minor thing nevertheless it puts one in the position of wondering whether other points in the evidence are absolutely correct. In this regard I must make reference to the petition itself which is dated at Montreal, the 28th day of May, 1959. This petition shows as follows, and I am reading now from paragraph No. 1:

1. That on the 2nd day of January, 1954, your petitioner was lawfully married to the said—

And it gives here the name of the husband.

—at St. Monicas parish church, in the city of Montreal, district of Montreal, in the province of Quebec.

In the petition itself there are additional references to which I should like to make reference later. But this particular one has some interest here. It is as to when the marriage took place and the ages of the individuals at the time of the marriage. The petitioner, as was indicated or as is shown in the evidence at page 9, appeared as a witness, was sworn and gave certain testimony as to her age. I think I must make specific reference here to the question asked by the clerk of the committee. He asks:

Q. What is your age?
A. 23.

Then they go on to her occupation, where she lives where she was married and to whom and she indicates in the affirmative in those cases and identifies the marriage certificate. She is asked some questions by Mr. Cohen with respect to this particular point with which I want to deal. Toward the bottom of page 9 Mr. Cohen asks her the following questions:

Q. I note that you were married in January, 1954, and you separated five or six months later?
A. Yes.
Q. How old were you when you were married?
A. 16.
Q. And your husband?
A. 19.

At the time of the marriage in 1954, some six years ago, the petitioner was 16 and the respondent in this case was 19. There was in fact three years difference in their ages. On January 28, 1960 her age is given as 23; but of course this is seven years later rather than six. This difference is easily understood. However, the respondent appears as a witness. He is sworn. As reported at page 12 he gives this evidence:

Q. What is your full name?

And he gives his name. Then he is asked this question:

Q. What is your age?
A. 23.

This is the conflict I say exists between these references as to how old these individuals were. The young lady, the petitioner, was 16 when she was married. She is now 23. Her husband was 19—that is three years older than she was—at the time of marriage and he is only 23 now. I submit that he should be, in evidence, either 25 or 26—one year does not make much difference—depending on when his birthday is. He should be either 25 or 26 now or he should have been 16 or 17 at the time he was married. But this is not the case. He said that he is 23 now.

It is true that he may not have told his wife at the time of their marriage just exactly what his correct age was at that time. He may have indicated to her that he was older than he actually was. This is something we do not know. I think it is one aspect of the conflict which should have been pursued by those who took this particular testimony and asked the questions, because while it may not be relevant specifically to the point, nevertheless where there is a conflict of evidence steps should be taken to clear it up in order that no impression will be left that there are other points in the evidence that are not absolutely correct.

The respondent in this case is obviously not getting younger as the years go by and perhaps he did not tell his wife his true age when they were married in 1954, because it was her evidence that indicated he was 19 at that time, but that conflict should have been cleared up before the matter was proceeded with.

Now I refer to a matter which concerns the inconsistencies of approach of the gentleman asking the questions, in this instance Mr. Cohen. Mr. Chairman, you remember we had some discussion about this point the other day and I make reference to it now only because it is germane to the question of adultery. It concerns the permissibility of counsel asking questions about a specific instance of adultery. I understand it is not permissible for counsel to do that, yet it is done in some cases and not in others. I would have thought that Mr. Cohen, who has spent some time in dealing with these matters and is well versed in questions of law and matters he might encounter before the committee of the other place, would certainly have been consistent in his questioning.

On page 12 of the report the respondent is advised by the chairman, Senator Croll, that he is not liable to be asked nor bound to answer any questions tending to incriminate himself as far as adultery is concerned. After the witness says he understands that Mr. Cohen asks, "Are you living and having sexual relations with"—giving the name of the corespondent and the witness answers "Yes, sir". That is a direct question which I think, so far as tending to prove or not to prove adultery is concerned, perhaps should be asked in all instances where there is an arrangement, a so-called common law arrangement where a couple are living together as man and wife. This question specifies particularly what he is getting at if they are going to continue to base the granting of divorces on the question of whether or not adultery has been committed.

Then he asks a question which is specifying it to a degree, namely to the particular day indicated in the petition as being the day upon which adultery took place. Here I refer to paragraph No. 7 on page 5 of the petition, which says:

On or about the 22nd day of May, 1959—

At a particular address.

—the said—

Giving the name of the respondent.

—committed adultery with—

Giving the name of the corespondent and the same address for each. Mr. Cohen makes a reference to the day and asks the question:

And in particular, on the 22nd day of May, 1959 at—

Giving the same address as that shown in the petition.

—in the province of Quebec, were you living as man and wife with one—

Giving the name of the corespondent.

A. Have been for the past year.

Then he asks whether he was married to the petitioner, and so on.

So that while Mr. Cohen starts off on the question of adultery or sexual relations, which is pinpointing what he is getting at, he does not follow it through and attempt to specify the particular date, at least not in his questioning of the respondent. I think perhaps Mr. Cohen felt it was in order and desirable to prove a particular point and ask whether or not they were having sexual relations with one another, but he should follow it through and ask the self-same question about sexual relations on that particular day. There is an inconsistency there in Mr. Cohen's approach.

However, he does a little better when the corespondent appears. The corespondent appeared as a witness, and she was sworn and gave certain information about her age, name, occupation, and so on. She is also advised by Senator Croll that she need not be asked any questions nor need she answer them as far as committing adultery is concerned. In any event, she indicates she understands the position in that regard and desires to proceed and answer the questions. Then Mr. Cohen asks her directly whether she is committing adultery, "and more particularly on the 26th day of May, 1959", and she answers "That is right".

I do not know, why Mr. Cohen in one instance makes reference in a general question to having sexual relations, mentioning those words specifically, but when he comes to particularize on the day when the sexual relations were supposed to have been committed he backs away from it and makes reference only to people living together as man and wife. That is what happens as far as the respondent is concerned. But when he questions the corespondent he now particularizes and says, "Are you committing adultery, and more particularly on the 26th day of May, 1959", and the corespondent indicates that that is right, that she is committing adultery, and particularly on the 26th day of May, 1959.

I do not know what the 26th day of May has to do with it because that is not the day on which it is alleged adultery took place, at least not according to the evidence which was given. The petition indicates that adultery took place four days before that, notably on the 22nd day of May, 1959. Yet when Mr. Cohen asks a specific question about it he says "Did you commit adultery on the 26th day of May?", which is four days later. I presume that Mr. Cohen thinks that that falls within the expression "On or about the 22nd of May", but I submit he could have chosen the 22nd, the 20th, the 21st, the 23rd, the 24th or the 25th. As I say, I fail to see a consistency of approach. I do not see why he did not deal with the words "sexual relations" when he asked about that particular day, May 22. I do not see why he did not use that same phrase "sexual relations", because he started to deal with that when he asked the corespondent this particular question; but when he particularizes he talks about another day entirely, which was four days after it was alleged that this particular event took place. The petitioner herself, when she appears as a witness, is asked, as appears on page 10:

> Can you tell us something about May 22, 1959?

Then an address is mentioned, and the answer is given:

> I went there. George and Rita were living there as man and wife.

The names given are the christian names of the respondent and the corespondent. Then the witness says they were in pyjamas and indicates that certain circumstances existed. It was on May 22 that she saw these activities, yet Mr. Cohen saw fit to talk about May 26, some four days after these events were supposed to have occurred. Apart from that, we were advised about a week ago, I think, that it is most improper for counsel, at least in a court of law, to ask specific questions of that nature as to whether or not people commit adultery on a particular date. Yet Mr. Cohen disregarded that rule of the court and asked those specific questions in this instance. He fumbles them, anyway, and gets the dates wrong and backs away from the question of sexual relations and refers to these people living as man and wife on a particular day.

I submit that it should be quite acceptable, at least in this area where we are not a court of law, to admit general evidence of this kind, but if we are going to continue this practice of granting divorces through parliament, as we shall at least for a day or two—though next session, if this is not dealt with, and no one has the courage to make an announcement—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Howard: If we should continue this practice, I think that in cases where there is this so-called common law man and wife relationship we should insist in every instance that specific questions are asked by counsel or by members of the other place with regard to sexual relationship on a specific day. If we do not do that we are making a mockery of the word adultery and of just what it means in fact. We would be holding on to the word adultery because of some nebulous thoughts that we have about not wanting to offend some sections of society. If we are going to deal with adultery, we should deal with adultery, period, and deal with the question of sexual relations as Mr. Cohen started off to do. It is not a question of whether a person is dressed in pyjamas or a housecoat, or circumstances of that nature; another kind of evidence must be given if we are going to hang on to this nebulous ground of adultery as a ground for divorce. We should not delude ourselves. Certainly we are not deluding the general public who know very well that adultery means absolutely nothing—it only means being caught in certain circumstances.

Mr. McCleave: Clearly out of order. The case is a specific one.

Mr. Howard: We are dealing with this specific case, Mr. Chairman.

I should like to deal with another inconsistency if I may, and this has relation to pages 10 and 11. This is concerned with the reasons why the petitioner went to this particular place on this particular day and discovered, as she said in her evidence, circumstances which might lead one to believe that a sexual relationship had been engaged in. On page 10 the following questions are asked by Mr. Cohen and answered by the witness:

Q. Can you tell us something about the 22nd day of May 1959 at—
A. I went there and George and Rita were living there as man and wife.
Q. You went to—for what purpose?
A. I wanted support for my daughter.
Q. Had your husband been contributing towards your daughter?
A. No.
Q. And you went down to speak to him personally?
A. Yes.
Q. Who did you find when you arrived there?
A. He was there with this girl by the name of Rita, and they were dressed in pyjamas and a nightgown.
Q. What time of day was this?
A. About 9 p.m.

Perhaps they believed in the saying "Early to bed, and early to rise". In any event, the examination continues:

Q. Did you speak to your husband about support for the child?
A. Yes, I did.
Q. Did you ask him if he was living there?
A. Yes, and he said he was living with this woman.

Then they go on to speak about reconciliation and so on. The point I wish to make is that she indicated she went there in connection with support for her daughter. She is asked questions later on about this by Senator Farquhar—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock shall I rise and report progress?

Progress reported.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RECOGNITION AND PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Diefenbaker for second reading of Bill No. C-79, to provide for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Winch.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Matthews: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon at five o'clock I started in confusion and astonishment. I was under the impression that the C.C.F. group had given permission to have private bills put aside so we could proceed with this debate. You can imagine my confusion. I rose in haste and began to speak. I then noticed that Your Honour grew a little uneasy and rose in your chair. I had begun talking about what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) had said in 1958 so I began to suspect that I was out of order in speaking on that subject. That concluded my first attempt at speaking on this bill. I am now prepared to start over again and see what happens.

When I was interrupted I was saying that the Leader of the Opposition probably did not oppose this bill and that he like all the others would vote for it. I referred hon. members to page 3520 of Hansard of January 20, 1958. On that occasion the Leader of the Opposition moved an amendment suggesting that the Conservative party stand down and let the famous Liberals come back into office.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what should be done now.

Mr. Matthews: That was a dressed-up speech. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) claims that this bill of rights is not sufficiently dressed up. The simplicity of the language of this bill offends the hon. gentleman and he would like to see it dressed up in fancy language. I imagine that he could do it very nicely, too, because the hon. gentleman is very clever at that sort of thing. I am sure that if he were to draft a bill of rights it would be extremely flowery. However, that is beside the point.

The Liberal party has been quite flowery all along the line. Following the splendid budget address made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in 1958 the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) rose in his place and became very flowery. He observed that the Minister of Finance was dressed in a nice blue suit with an attractive blue flower in his lapel. This apparently confused the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River somewhat so he immediately called it a blue budget. In other words, the hon. gentleman wanted to doll up the budget in the proper way with what he considered to be appropriate words.

In the budget debate in 1960 the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made a similar attempt. There was no blue suit on that occasion to inspire him and I imagine he felt rather badly about it. I suppose he thought back to the cold porridge of his childhood so he characterized the budget with those words. That is what hon. gentlemen opposite do. They always want to doll these things up.

There is one notable exception to this rule. I refer to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). That hon. gentleman was talking about the cancellation of aircraft. He did not start out by being flowery at all. He could have discussed some technical shortcoming in the aircraft and said the fuselage was no good, that the proper cord was not on the upper wing or that the tail gate was not just right. Instead of that, however, the hon. gentleman said it was no ruddy good. That is the type of flowery language in which that hon. gentleman indulges.

I have very little to say about this bill. I am keenly interested in it and am proud of the fact that it was introduced by the Prime Minister on July 1. We on this side enjoy that fact very much and I know that hon. members in the opposition parties enjoy it as well. We went out on the front lawn of the parliament buildings and watched the trooping of the colour. In the evening we witnessed a parade of sea cadets. These things brought home to us the fact that these men are engaged in the defence of our nation, just as many hon. members of this house served this country well in various wars in defence of our freedom. This bill goes to the very root of our freedom.

This bill contains no small print. It is written in language everyone will be able to understand. We do not want the flowery approach at all. This bill of rights needs no special cover, no special container to sell it to thinking Canadians. It is not a piece of merchandise such as a box of candy or a bottle of scotch that needs a label trimmed with gold or a bright red ribbon around it to promote its sale. The special ingredient of value to the people of Canada is laid out very clearly in the wording of the bill itself. Consider these words in Bill No. C-79:

> An act for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

That is plain enough for anyone to understand. I continue:

> 1. This part may be cited as the Canadian bill of rights.
> 2. It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have always existed and shall continue to exist the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,
>
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;
> (b) the right of the individual to protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex;
> (c) freedom of religion;
> (d) freedom of speech;
> (e) freedom of assembly and association; and

Those freedoms mean a great deal to us. I was quite interested in an article in the Ottawa Journal of June 14, 1960 entitled "Refugees Pay Big Price for Freedom". The article goes on to speak about the thousands of people that escape from communist countries whenever they can taking nothing with them. All they look for is freedom. This brings home to us the very important fact that Canada is and has been for many years a land of freedom. Some interesting and important statements have been made about freedoms. Thomas Jefferson said of the three freedoms:

> Freedom of religion, freedom of the press and freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus, these are principles that have guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation.

Franklin D. Roosevelt said of the freedom of religion:

> Where freedom of religion has been attacked, the attack has come from sources opposed to democracy. Where democracy has been overthrown, the spirit of free worship has disappeared. And where religion and democracy have vanished, good faith and reason in international affairs have given way to strident ambition and brute force.

I will not read out the words of this bill because all hon. members know them but I will tell hon. members of the opposition that the bill needs no flowery words and no fancy package to sell it to the people of Canada because it is not for sale. It is free to all the people of Canada.

Mr. Paul Tardif (Russell): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker said that at five o'clock he began his speech in confusion. I am not a bit surprised at that. After listening to the remarks made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) the hon. gentleman should have been confused because the minister made a speech that was extremely confusing.

Actually I know that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Matthews) will be readily forgiven by this house because other hon. members listened to the speech made by the Minister of Public Works and I can assure hon. gentlemen that if I were one to be easily confused I, like the hon. member for Nanaimo, would have been confused as well.

The Minister of Public Works this afternoon referring to the Gettysburg address by Lincoln said it was couched in a language of great simplicity, of great purity and not in the bombastic, arrogant and pompous language which the hon. members of the opposition would suggest. I have listened to most of the speeches delivered in this house today on this bill and I know that if any speech has been made to which those adjectives could be applied it was the speech made by the Minister of Public Works.

It is not the intention of the opposition to have a bill of rights written in a bombastic, arrogant or pompous manner. I would suggest that it would be more in order if the Minister of Public Works had stated that the opposition would like to see a bill of rights written in ordinary prose that could be understood and appreciated by all the citizens of Canada and of which all the citizens could be proud. As an example, it might have gone something like this:

> Her Majesty, with the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, reaffirms the fundamental rights which the dignity of man requires for every individual, not the least of which is the right to life, liberty, security of the person and the enjoyment of property.
> To secure these and our other rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their powers from the consent of the governed and their authority from the crown. It pleases Her Majesty, with her parliament in Canada, to rededicate the principle that no government ought to prejudice these rights by jeopardizing freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of peaceable assembly and association, or freedom of the press.

Actually the Minister of Public Works stated this afternoon, and I quote:

> But no one has suggested even in a vague form what questions could or should be asked of the supreme court—questions upon which any court could express an opinion that would assist in determining the lines of a bill of rights to be enacted by the Canadian parliament.

I think the Minister of Public Works is suffering from a short memory because Professor Bora Laskin, who is recognized as a constitutional authority, made an offer and said that he was willing to draft a question that could be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, and did so publicly at a meeting at which the Minister of Public Works was in attendance.

The Minister of Public Works also stated this afternoon that at the provincial-federal conference in 1950 an attempt had been made to arrive at a satisfactory amending formula to overcome the necessity of going to the United Kingdom for amendments. Actually the 1950 conference was looking for a formula to eliminate the necessity of going to the United Kingdom for all amendments, not necessarily to eliminate the necessity of going to the United Kingdom to get one amendment to the British North America Act. The question submitted to the conference at that time was considerably more complicated than asking for the power to make an amendment in order to introduce a bill of rights.

I was also impressed by the Prime Minister when he introduced this bill. He said with great emphasis that he was a Canadian. It is not difficult, Mr. Speaker, to assure the house that there are 17 million people in Canada who feel exactly the same way as does the Prime Minister. I am just as proud of being a Canadian as is the Prime Minister, and I am just as anxious to have my rights respected as is the Prime Minister to have legislation so that they will be respected.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that for you?

Mr. Tardif: I did myself, and if you can do as well as I am doing I shall tear up my notes and start all over again. I do not know who made the remark, Mr. Speaker, but I would appreciate it if a note were taken of it so that I can remember it in the future.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman admits he is reading his speech.

Mr. Tardif: I am reading quotations and I am doing exactly the same thing as the hon. member did, with the exception that I am reading only the quotations.

Reading Bill No. C-79, with my lack of legal knowledge, it appears that this legislation is going to be a real joy to the legal profession. It is a recognized fact—and I am not reading this—that lawyers are only 50 per cent correct. I can say this without fear of contradiction for several reasons. In the first place, there are very few lawyers in my constituency. In the second place, it is a recognized fact because it is so easy for anybody to find a lawyer who will be willing to assure his client that as the plaintiff he is right and it is so easy to find another lawyer who will assure the defendant that he is right. Lawyers are only 50 per cent right all the time. You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, because of your legal experience, what a field day lawyers will have with Bill No. C-79, which is difficult for men trained in the legal profession to understand.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order.

Mr. Tardif: Mr. Speaker, I think the point of order is well taken. I am speaking of all lawyers with the exception of those in the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I notice there are a great many lawyers here who are willing to help the hon. member to a better understanding of their profession but I hope they will maintain silence while he has the floor.

Mr. Tardif: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Actually, this is not the first time that a bill of rights has been introduced in this house. On January 6, 1958 one was proposed by the opposition party and at that time the then parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Justice, the man who is now the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), gave a great number of reasons why a bill of rights could not be introduced at that time. If I have the permission of the house I shall read part of the speech made by the Minister of Public Works who, as I said before, is suffering from a short memory, because he has entirely changed his views on a bill of rights from those which he had on January 6, 1958. Incidentally, I am about to quote from page 2892 of Hansard of January 6, 1958, in case anybody is interested:

> First, should a bill be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and, if so, how?

In the speech that the Minister of Public Works made this afternoon he was not too concerned about this. I continue:

> Should it be a draft bill, with the question asked as to whether it is within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament, keeping in mind, Mr. Speaker, that in constitutional law Canada is woefully lacking, as the hon. member I am sure will agree, in decisions on questions of this kind? In other words, where do the rights of the dominion cease under section 91 of the British North America Act and where do the rights of the provinces under section 92 begin, particularly when one discusses such abstract but very real values as freedom? Second, should we submit a series of questions to the supreme court? As my hon. friend no doubt is fully aware, to do so is very difficult because we must frame questions of law as distinct from questions of policy which latter, of course, the supreme court will not deal with.

Actually, since that time the Minister of Public Works stated it was impossible, or nobody could frame a question that could be submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada and I tell you that that is not so. I continue:

> Third, should we have a parliamentary committee to explore and agree on a draft that will be suitable to parliament when it finally reaches parliament? Fourth, would it be premature to submit a draft to the supreme court and then, having their approval, come back to the house to find that it is not acceptable to hon. members, or should the government bypass the courts and reach rapport with the provinces by calling them into session, having a dominion-provincial conference on the question of a bill of rights in which the property and civil rights of the provinces would be properly protected? Fifth, should the government itself draft a bill for the approval of and amendment by the provinces, send it to them and have them deal with it? Sixth, should we draft a strictly federal bill? Is this possible under the circumstances, in view of the property and civil rights of the provinces?

Actually this government has been in power more than three years, and during that time not a single letter went to a single province asking whether they would agree to a change or accept a formal bill of rights. The review made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he presented the bill to the house was a great lesson in American history. A bill to assure civil liberties should have been based more on the experience of the commonwealth, using as its base the effectiveness of the protection of human rights in Great Britain, in Australia, in New Zealand and even in India which has had an independent government only since 1947.

In clause 2 of the bill there is mention of the right to the enjoyment of one's property. I am wondering whether that covers a person's property when it is a case of government expropriation as is now taking place in the green belt.

Subclause (d) of clause 2 refers to freedom of speech. Will that give the right to anyone to make a speech any place, any time and on any subject? Subclause (e) of clause 2 deals with freedom of assembly and association. Does this mean that public assemblies will be permitted for any purpose, at any time and in any place?

It is obviously indispensable that to protect people's rights and freedoms more than words are necessary. To this end, there should be a committee to scrutinize every order in council and regulation, as was advocated by the Prime Minister himself on November 23, 1945, and on September 22, 1949, and as quoted at some length by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai).

If the Prime Minister would study the vast experience of the commonwealth parliaments previously mentioned I know he would agree that it would be adequate, practical and desirable for every subordinate law designed to have general effect to stand referred to a scrutiny committee to be reviewed in the following respects: Whether questions of principles and policy are involved; where human rights and fundamental freedoms are affected; will it be in the power of the courts to review the validity of the subordinate laws. In this regard the scrutiny committee should have the power to report whether the order in council or regulation has any retroactive effect. The committee should report any lack of clarity. The committee should check that all subordinate laws have been published and laid before parliament according to the Regulations Act of 1950. Finally, the committee should check whether or not regulations or orders impose a cost on public revenue or commit parliament to expenditures of any sort.

This committee should have the power to sit and to call for papers and witnesses. When I refer to witnesses I do not mean ministers because I think the place for them to give their opinions and views is in the house. The committee should have the power to report at any time. This committee should have as its adviser a highly competent parliamentary official such as the Clerk or one of his assistants or the parliamentary counsel. This type of assistance is necessary if the committee is to be effective in supervising the law-making activities of the expert and competent civil servants. We need more than words, Mr. Speaker, we need effective machinery to protect the rights of men.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity of this bill being introduced to say a few words.

Man can be man only so long as he is free.

This philosophical postulate could not be quoted more aptly than in the context of this discussion. Human rights are inherent to human nature. For instance the right to live and to think.

Even behind the iron curtain, the human brain cannot be prevented from thinking. In the darkest cell, the prisoner undeniably keeps his freedom of thought.

Unfortunately, in some countries, a man may not think aloud. Because he reasoned in a totalitarian state, that is in Russia, Dr. Zhivago led his author into bondage.

There is much suffering in being forgotten, but what satisfaction there is in finding the courage to express the truth after having thought and recognized it.

Mr. Speaker, thought is a divine spark. Because, if the soul is created directly by God, human intelligence is the most obvious proof that God made man in his own image. God wanted man to be free. Thus, the privileges of freedom and the rights he enjoys derive from God.

This theory having been set forth, let us put it in practice.

Canada is a country which believes in God. Its two great races have been cast in this crucible. Vast and beautiful country that it is, it has been given an appropriate motto A mari usque ad mare.

It is true that our country extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific; it is true that its citizens are rightly proud to belong to a young nation with a promising future.

An even greater truth is that it was the bible that inspired that motto, so inseparable are the human and supernatural aspirations of Canadians.

Various colours of the skin, different languages, various religions; those are but accidents. These are varieties in art.

While visiting our parliament, last week, General Bethouart closed his speech by saying something like this: "Let NATO follow the lead of Canada, which is so respectful of its freedoms and those of others, and success will be assured."

That was the statement of a great friend, taking the pulse of allied nations. He stops off here, and pays us that tribute.

Two days later, the right hon. Prime Minister took the floor and, in an historic speech, introduced his bill of rights. That was a noble way of celebrating Dominion day.

In Washington, tourists visiting the library of congress may stop a moment in front of a marble pedestal and read there, with respect, the American constitution.

Shortly, no doubt, visitors flocking to the Canadian parliament will stop to meditate on the declaration of rights, a bill bearing the mark of a great Canadian.

Totalitarian peoples believe in the state alone. The human person is but an individual.

Canada is a democratic country and owed it to itself to set down in this document its ideal of life, one for which men will willingly fight and lay down their lives: their freedom. In a word, I gladly support this bill.

(Text):

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, in the memory of every hon. member there are memorable events that have left an indelible mark on our lives. The present debate is one of those occasions that all of us will treasure. It will be something worth while and inspiring to hand down to the generations that follow. I suppose there are many definitions of freedom. Every individual in every separate circumstance knows, appreciates and believes in some measure of freedom. There is given to some, however, a measure of experience that lends depth, colour and substance to their appreciation of freedom.

I believe that the Prime Minister holds a unique position in that regard in this House of Commons. During the course of this debate I have been thinking back to my boyhood, which was not too much different from that of a great number of Canadians who first had a taste of what freedom involved, through the expression of those things which, coming from others, told that there was a need for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The Canadian people have not yet taken on the full stature of nationhood. Ninety-three years have not constituted sufficient time in which to fulfill the promise that was declared and held within the articles of confederation. Those who advocate a constitutional amendment would find more sympathy for their stand were it not for the fact that there is every indication that this course will remain with the Canadian people for a long period of years as an objective which nevertheless could not serve to achieve the true interests of unity and nationhood at this particular time.

Those who have ventured to criticize the language of the bill would do well to remember that it is not a constitutional amendment but rather a setting of markers within which Canadians can chart their way closer to the constitutional unity that will mark the achievement of mature nationhood. Judging by the speeches of some members of the opposition, that achievement will require a further undetermined period of time. Indeed, in listening to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), one could almost visualize that measure of immaturity, provincial outlook and ignorance in which for many years the leaders of his party were able to shelve and delay the development and achievement of those spiritual and intellectual objectives by means of which people achieve true nationhood.

On this occasion you might ask: What is freedom? My answer might be that it is the development of a personality born to fulfil the ideal of light and reason that shone in the eyes of parents who knew that the realization and fulfilment of the ideals which were the objects of their search could not be found within the land from which they came; a personality that grew with the growth of a people; a personality that grasped their problems; a personality that shared their anxieties.

July 1, 1960 will mark a triumph shared by many Canadians, with the Prime Minister of Canada. The people of Canada know, as does everyone on the government benches, who championed the supremacy of parliament. Those who sit in the opposition today also know who nurtured that right when they were the invincible majority running roughshod and arrogant, mutilating justice and freedom here in Canada. Everyone knows how that personality persevered and almost single-handed licked that proud majority. It is one of the epics of Canadian history and it will not be forgotten by the generations to come. When the history of this parliament is written and when all other measures considered are relegated to their respective pigeonholes, this Bill No. C-79 will, in its simple forthright language, light a torch of liberty and freedom that Canadians will hold close to their bosoms whenever stress and strain test the integrity of our citizenship or the fibre of our nationhood.

In repeating the Prime Minister's closing words "I am a Canadian", the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp) spoke as would countless Canadians were they here tonight to do so. Last night and again this morning the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacLellan) measured our need for an assertion of recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms. His words echo the thoughts of countless Canadians today.

On this occasion when we are discussing freedom and what it means to us I wish to direct a few words to you, sir, as Speaker of this assembly. I think it fair to say that I have had occasion to look to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the chair in which you sit, with more than ordinary search and question. I should like you to know that it has been a comfort to observe how well you perform your duties. During this session I have come to have a growing reverence for the freedom that is symbolized by your position in our democracy.

On this occasion I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister first for his perseverance which kept the subject matter of this bill before the people of Canada throughout the years; second, for his eloquence and devotion which won the admiration and confidence of the Canadian people and brought them together so that this day was possible; third, because of his dedication to the cause of freedom which in Canada will ever bear the imprint of his encouragement and stature; and, finally, because he has been successful in returning to this historic party which commands the loyalty of the government benches the lighted torch that was kindled 93 years ago when the articles of confederation were in the making.

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I consider it a great honour and privilege to be in the House of Commons and to be able to take part in this debate which has produced some of the finest speeches I have heard since I have been here. It is indeed only fitting that a matter as important as is the one we are discussing this evening should produce speeches of that kind.

I may say that the course of this debate has been somewhat disappointing to me because when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made known his intention to introduce this bill I felt it presented a rich opportunity for this parliament to make this declaration of our fundamental freedoms and human rights. Because Canada holds a special position in the world today amongst the middle nations and the emerging new nations I think that spontaneous and unanimous approval of this declaration of human rights would have had a great effect on those nations of the world today.

Almost everyone who has taken part in the debate has indicated that he feels he would like to see all the provinces participate in this bill and that it would be more valuable if this result could be brought about by a constitutional amendment which would make it enforceable in all the provinces. But that is not possible at the present time. I feel that the opposition, knowing that this is not possible at the present time, have been wrong in trying to detract from this bill.

The great value of a bill of this nature is that provision is made to protect the rights which are declared to be ours. It is important that it should have been put out with unanimous approval and brought to the attention of the public in a very forceful way to encourage all the people of this country to join in and rejoice at the passing of this bill and to encourage the provincial governments to join with us and to enact the same sort of bill in their respective legislatures.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the opposition are trying to detract in every way they can from this measure simply by delaying the possibility of accomplishing the end we want to accomplish. I find it particularly disturbing that they should do this, because the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), who was a member of the government which was previously in office, knows very well that some of the things he asked for cannot possibly be accomplished. Therefore he could not have had any reason to suggest them other than to try and detract from the credit which is rightfully due to the Prime Minister for introducing this bill.

I do not know what kind of consideration he wanted to be given to the bill, but in his contribution to this debate he said, as reported on page 5650 of Hansard for July 1:

> This is a bill which should be submitted to a committee where witnesses could be called and where the bill could be given the same kind of consideration which this subject was given in the past when committees were set up, one of which met on 20 occasions.

I do not know whether he wants it to be given the consideration it has been given in the past inasmuch as it would go off to some committee somewhere and never come back again. Perhaps that is his hope, I do not know, but it seems to me to be the kind of consideration that he would like to give it. Again I say that he could only have one reason for wanting any such consideration as that, because he would like to detract from the credit which is so rightfully due the Prime Minister for introducing this bill.

There was a rather interesting editorial in the Ottawa Journal of Monday, July 4, not referring to this debate but stating in their opinion what parliament should do with this bill. It is quite a short article and I think it is of such importance that I should take this opportunity to bring it to the attenion of the house. It is entitled "That bill of rights" and it commences:

> Little in life causes more trouble than a murderous tenacity for the unattainable perfect impeding the attainable good.

That would be one of the steps which the opposition seem to suggest we should be taking, that because we cannot have everything everybody wants at one time, we should do nothing. Of course, one can appreciate that philosophy when one realizes that the Liberal government was in office for 22 years and did nothing; presumably they were operating on that philosophy throughout their tenure of office. The editorial continues:

> Consider what seems to be happening in the case of Mr. Diefenbaker's bill of rights.
> No one can hold sensibly that it is a bad thing for the parliament of Canada to declare at this time in favour of human rights. But simply because our political structure in Canada makes it impossible at present to make that declaration a part of Canada's constitution, some people are saying that the declaration is worthless, that it shouldn't be made at all.
> Why shouldn't it be made? Surely at this time, when freedom in so many areas is under siege, it is not a bad thing for the parliament of Canada to shout its faith in freedom.
> It is true that this declaration, this writ, so to speak, will not run in the provinces. But if it is ever to be made a writ that will run in our provinces, become a part of the constitution that will be enforceable, what better way of making a start towards that end than to have parliament give the lead Mr. Diefenbaker wants it to give?
> This declaration of human rights should be made —be made unanimously and resoundingly.

That bears out what I have already stated to the house, because I believe that had it been given that sort of support it would have had a great deal more effect in this country and I believe every member of the house knows it would have had that effect had it received that kind of support. It would have helped Canada's position in world affairs as well as helped bring about the very ends which the opposition say they would like to bring about.

If there were violent differences of opinion here with matters of principle involved which the opposition could not agree to then of course one would not expect them to give that kind of support. But that is not the case with this bill of rights. I do not think that anyone in this house has indicated in any way that he is opposed to this important bill. It is the age old argument of the opposition, of course, that when the government brings in a good bill they do not dare oppose it so the only thing they can do is to try to detract from it and to say that it does not go far enough or that it should go further, and about every kind of obstacle in its way to detract from it. I suggest that is what has been done in this particular debate.

One of the main objections has been that a constitutional amendment is required. The people of Canada sent us here to legislate. They did not send us down here to re-divide the powers as between the federal and provincial governments. They sent us down here to legislate in a field open to us, namely to legislate within the power of the federal government.

I would remind the house that those same electors who sent us here are also responsible for electing the members of provincial legislatures, and if they want provincial legislatures to enact a bill of rights it will be up to these same people to instruct them to do that. That is exactly the constitutional position in the country. That is what we are sent here for and that is what we are doing at the present time.

The Prime Minister has brought this to the attention of the country many times. Throughout his parliamentary career he has fought for a bill of rights and during the election campaign the people of Canada endorsed his proposal to introduce a bill of rights. Certainly I have had many letters on this subject since I have been a member supporting the Prime Minister's proposal to bring in this bill.

I want to say I am very proud to support a bill which is brought forward in the kind of language which we have in the present bill. We have had discourses on this from very learned counsel, but I am pleased to see that it is in such language that I as a layman and every other person in Canada simply by reading this bill can see clearly set out those rights which are ours. Those rights are set out in unequivocal terms and the bill makes provision for the court to protect those rights. It states quite clearly that parliament shall not be able to infringe upon those rights without repealing the act or stating expressly that it will abridge the freedoms contained in it.

[Mr. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

The Leader of the Opposition made one or two other observations in connection with this matter and at one point asked, "Why should people pay more attention to this bill than to previous bills?" As reported on page 5663 of Hansard for July 4 he said:

> Why should a future parliament be more impressed by and respectful of this bill than it would be of historic charters of our liberties such as the Magna Carta, the petition of right of 1627, the habeas corpus act of 1640 and the bill of rights of 1689—

I suggest there is no more reason why they should be any more bound by them, but I can only say that if they pay as much attention to this bill as they paid to those, then those of us in this house at the present time who have supported this bill will certainly have every reason to be proud of ourselves for having taken part in this historic occasion. At the same time, when the course of history runs along through the coming years we will see this document taking its place in Canadian history, as have so many of these other important declarations played their part in the history of other countries. When that time comes I say that those who have opposed this bill will certainly have no right to be proud of themselves.

Therefore it gives me the greatest pleasure to be able to support the Prime Minister and the government in bringing forward this very valuable document, one which I know in the years I have been a member of parliament I will always consider to be a great privilege to have supported.

(Translation):

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the bill placed before us today on the initiative of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has so far inspired a high calibre debate, in the course of which we have heard a number of interesting suggestions.

While I would not be so presumptuous as to believe that my personal intervention can be of any great help, I should like to leave with the house the results of my modest observations.

The history of civilization shows that for a long time, the pursuit and definition of human rights were mainly matters for philosophical debate and moral dissertation. Leading thinkers did perceive however—generally in a confused way—that while man, due to his nature, had to serve society, it did not follow that he should be subordinated to society in all respects, nor that society should not serve man. Christ was really the first to bring us the first charter of human freedoms, summarizing in these lapidary words which after two thousand years are still amazingly timely:

Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's.

Throughout the centuries, many battles have been waged over this principle of life. Man has never ceased to pursue the freedoms that enable him to express himself, and it may be said that for two centuries the search for and the defining of human rights have become one of the main concerns now of nations and of governments, and of both at the same time.

We learn from history that it is especially after uprisings, revolutions or social upheavals that attempts were made to define those rights in writings that were always proclaimed inalienable and permanent. Successive constitutions, in France, since 1789, have sprung from the rising of the people against the intolerance and abuse which it felt or thought it had suffered at the hands of the state authorities, or its rulers.

The first establishments which were to form New England and hold such a large place in the history of the English colonies in America, were the result of a similar feeling. For did they not originate in the landing at Plymouth Rock, on December 21, 1620? A historian eloquently remarked, and I quote:

The pilgrims who came to the New World seeking the right to pray according to their faith, brought with them neither warrant nor charter. But before they disembarked from the Mayflower, they signed the famous "pact" which contained the principles that were to rule life in their community.

Even today, Mr. Speaker, we cannot face without emotion the memory which is kept alive on the Reformation wall, in Geneva. We see, in that picture those God-fearing pilgrims, kneeling on the deck of their ship as they neared what was to be their land of freedom. Then, before separating, they sign the Mayflower pact which was to be the basis for the various subsequent establishments, that were, in a way, a prelude to the constitution of the great American democracy.

Canada, on its part, also enjoys a great heritage in this respect. Immediately after the defeat of 1760, the vanquished leaders of French Canada tried to regain its basic freedoms. The Ramezays and the De Vaudreuils took great care, at the time of surrender, to demand as a vital need religious freedom and maintenance of our civil laws.

Article 4 of the Treaty of Paris, in 1763, was to be the first answer of the conqueror, and I quote:

(Text):

His Britannick Majesty consents to grant to the inhabitants of Canada the freedom of the Catholic religion. Consequently, His Majesty will give the most effectual and precise orders so that his Roman Catholic subjects may solemnize their religion according to the rites of the Roman church in so far as the laws of Britain will allow.

(Translation):

That was an important amendment to British public law as it then existed, and I might recall incidentally, Mr. Speaker, that Canada was the chosen land where religious freedom was first recognized, even before it was recognized by the mother country for its own people.

Indeed, in 1763, as a result of the test act of 1673, no Catholic of the empire had a right to hold public office without renouncing the fundamental dogmas of his faith. The Canadian people were the first to be relieved by the act of Quebec of 1774.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, when we look at that part of our history, we can say that Canada was the first country where for the first time since Henry VIII recognition was given to the rights and freedoms belonging not only to Catholics but to all religious denominations. Thus, this act of Quebec was followed in England by the Roman Catholic relief act of 1829, following the fights waged by O'Connell. This act of Quebec came some fifty years before the conquest of religious freedom in the United Kingdom. In Canada, this conquest went on when the Jews, then living in England in semi-freedom, were granted here, as early as 1832, a status recognizing their religious freedom. It was the same for Protestants and dissenters, until 1852 when during the period of union act, the first act was passed definitely and absolutely acknowledging freedom for all sects and religions then known in Canada.

That is the heritage we are still enjoying today, a rich and valuable heritage which enables us more than any other nation perhaps to rank among the first countries seeking to have recognized in specific, precise and definite terms, the fundamental freedoms that all men hope for and which allow fulfilment of their personality.

Canada could not show unconcern about this heritage when on December 10, 1948, after three years of discussions, of debates and planning, the general assembly of the United Nations passed a measure of 30 items covering a number of human rights of various nature, the recognition of which, in the opinion of the assembly itself, was the basis of world freedom, justice and peace.

That universal statement on human rights was soon to operate. Thus, all the texts of constitutions set up since, all basic legislation and laws of newly formed states, or of countries rising from their ruins, as well as the various agencies of the United Nations, international treaties and agreements, the judgments and views of international courts of justice and even of some national courts have been impregnated by that statement and are a proof of its deep influence on world opinion today.

Having signed that document, Canada could hardly ignore the moral obligation thus assumed. Therefore, the present Prime Minister submitted that serious issue to the House of Commons as early as in 1948.

During the 1950 session, the Senate set up a committee which was to investigate the facts and submit its conclusions. That report, which was published on June 27 of that year, recommended that human rights—based on equality before the law and public order—

—be confirmed by a solemn statement.

Many times since the problem has been the subject matter of eloquent debate until the 1958 session, when the Prime Minister of Canada took the leadership in this field and gave it the form of a bill, which was then deliberately shelved to give Canadians time to consider it and to express their views. That bill is today before us.

And what, essentially, does it consist of?

In his treaty on constitutional law and political institutions the prominent columnist of Le Monde, Mr. Maurice Duverger, stated that:

The limitation of government action through the recognition of a citizen's political freedoms works on two levels.

On the one hand, freedoms serve to define an area that is closed to government activity, an area for private action, reserved to the individual; on the other hand, within the very area that is open to government activity, freedoms provide means of opposing the government, means of preventing the government from wielding too much power.

The text before us, largely based on the universal declaration of human rights, is clearly directed to this double purpose. Thus, after recalling man's right to life, liberty, security and the enjoyment of property, without discrimination as to race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, it expressly proclaims freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly and association. Then there are protective provisions against arbitrary detention or imprisonment, something which recalls and reemphasizes the great British legal institutions which, since the conquest, have become an integral part of our common heritage.

Since its publication this bill has been taken apart and commented upon by many politicians, lawyers and sociologists. Some have regretted its formal inadequacy and the lack of any criminal penalties; others—and I think that is the purpose of the amendment now before us—feel that, instead of passing a mere federal law, we should proceed to amend the constitution so that each and every province would be subject to its provisions.

Any legislation, however important, must strictly take into account the structure of the legislating government. Canada is a federation. Our constitution provides for a distribution of powers and responsibilities as between the federal government and the provincial governments, both of which are sovereign in their particular field.

The result is that some sections of the declaration drafted by the United Nations cannot be incorporated into a federal legislation without constituting an infringement upon the legislative autonomy of the provinces. I think that, during the debate at United Nations, it was the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) himself who pointed out that danger.

A bill of rights that would begin by violating the constitution which Canadians have accepted, and which ensures the fulfillment of their personality, would appear as a bold stroke of striking inconsistency.

Would it be better to amend the constitution? Perhaps, but then the amending procedure would have to be provided by the constitution itself, or else accepted by all provinces. Now, no such procedure has been provided in the act of 1867, and most amendments to the act since were introduced exclusively by the federal government, without the active support of the provinces, even if, at times, there was prior consultation. In such a delicate matter, the amending procedure would barely disguise the abuse of power of which, in fact, the federal government would become guilty. What respect could we have for a text drafted, if not in formal illegality, at least in illegitimacy?

Others find the Prime Minister's project inadequate and, in some respects, laconic. Of course, clearly discernible is the desire not to impinge upon powers beyond the jurisdiction of the federal state. That, in my opinion, does not in the least detract from its value; on the contrary, it is all to the credit of the Prime Minister, and he deserves our congratulations for it. The draft is couched in simple terms, that everybody can understand, and it avoids anything that could give rise to violent controversy.

As General Lafayette said in the French constituent assembly, the character of such a declaration consists in truth and precision: it must recite what everyone knows, what everyone wants. It must state only indisputable principles, only morally and legally indefeasible rights inherent to all systems, since the rights it purports to proclaim are natural rights that are vital to man and his development at all times and in all countries.

But what about the lack of penal sanction? Much could be said on that score, but my time is running out. Let me point out that this objection does not take into account the nature and true purpose of the document. In his Christmas message of 1940, His Holiness Pope Pius XII precisely urged nations to proclaim a universal declaration of rights and to transpose it into their own legislation; he defined the character of such a declaration and pointed out its ultimate purpose in those terms:

> To calm the agitation and bitterness of all those who feel threatened or injured in their existence or deprived of the free exercise of their activity.

Published not just by philosophers or moralists, but by legislators and public administrators, such statements become in the hands of men, and by the sole power of their verity, instruments of protection and defence before the courts and public opinion. They help fight injustice and arbitrary decisions. Moreover, at the same time, they teach man the moral obligations that also involve the respect of another man's property. In a country such as this, where two races with different origins, cultures and beliefs live side by side, a bill of rights will help bring those races closer together, help shape public opinion, cause the great law of Christian charity to become deeply rooted in the soul of everyone and finally provide for French speaking Canadians and English speaking Canadians equal rights and freedoms in all and every part of our wide and beautiful country.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, we have all listened to the debates with a great deal of interest and I believe we have all learned something from what has been said. It would appear that a bill of rights means many things to many people, and not the same thing to each individual. It seems to me that we are putting a great deal of faith in a bill that is as simply written and as fundamental as this bill of rights appears to be. It will be true, as the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Tardif) said a few moments ago, that the lawyers will interpret it as they see fit, and many applications will come from a very humble beginning.

For many years the Canadian people have been told that they need a bill of rights and that a bill of rights is a good thing. I wonder how much we really needed a written bill of rights? I wonder whether this bill of rights which outlines certain liberties of the Canadian people will actually limit them by enumerating them? Will it not to some extent limit federal jurisdiction, and particularly the jurisdiction of the courts which have served well the English people, Canadians and others who have taken their cases before them, and finally in many instances to the highest courts of the land?

I keep thinking that the Roncarelli case was a very good example. While we may argue that it cost a lot of money to carry it through the courts—it took seven years—I think it is generally agreed that the Canadian people achieved from the courts in the end a sense of fair play and an indication of what justice was.

I am inclined to believe that quite often when we pass a statute, when we introduce a bill that limits by its scope many things by enumerating exactly what it will protect, we put ourselves in this position. Many of the things that are not mentioned, many of the things that are not considered to be rights today will be debated and will become court cases in the future because provincial governments may well decide that they are within their jurisdiction because those matters which come within the jurisdiction of the federal government are enumerated in this legislation.

I listened very carefully to the arguments put forward on behalf of a bill of rights that would be suitable to teach to the growing generation and would give them probably as great a sense of nationalism as does the constitution of the United States, the story of George Washington and the cherry tree and so forth. I believe there is some merit in this suggestion. I would think the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) should give consideration to including a preamble that could be brought to the attention of our children, something which would give them a sense of Canadianism and of ownership of those rights that we are now enumerating. I am sure that many of our children if they were given the bill of rights we have before us would find very little in it that is not in other legal documents.

The constitutional aspects of whether we should have a bill of rights in our constitution or whether it should be an act of parliament which could be changed by subsequent governments is worthy of a great deal of consideration. We should feel in Canada that no matter what province one comes from he has equal rights with the people in other provinces. Obviously this can only be accomplished by putting it in a constitution which cannot be changed at the whim of either a federal government or any particular provincial government. I do not think we need to enumerate the cases that in recent years have shown the need for those rights to be granted in provincial fields. I refer to the right of assembly which is given to the unions, which can be taken away in certain provinces and yet is generally accepted and is on the statute books of the federal government. This right is given to all citizens under federal jurisdiction. In this field we have rights and liberties of the Canadian people that we have come to accept. Therefore, I think there is something to be said for putting this into stronger form than a simple act of the House of Commons.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, there is something to be said for having a bill in this form. It would appear to me that the bill of rights that the Canadian people will get will depend entirely on the attitude of the people themselves and their interpretation of it. I would suggest that as we grow up in this country and throughout the world and as we enlarge our concept of what liberty is we shall before too long want to write into a bill of rights the right of freedom from want. We shall be interested in adding economic implications to it so that no people in this country will be in want of food and the basic necessities of life.

It will not be too long before we shall want to put in a bill of rights certain rights with regard to our health structure so that Canadians at all times any place in Canada will be entitled to reasonable and extensive care as they may need it.

If the bill of rights is in such a form that it can be maintained by subsequent governments we shall be surprised in 25 or 50 years at just how many things the Canadian people have assumed for themselves as fundamental rights, and they will not be as basic as the rights outlined in this particular bill. In my opinion this means that the bill of rights will mean only what the government of the day wants it to mean. If we have governments such as we have had in various provinces of Canada which do not believe in freedom of the press, then there will be no freedom of the press. If we have governments which do not believe in the right of assembly, then there will be no right of assembly, and we have seen this happen in some of the provinces. If we believe in freedom of religion, then we will have freedom of religion with this bill or with the interpretation that we get from our courts. We have seen in provinces where they do not believe in freedom of religion that we did not have that right and this bill of rights will not make any difference to them.

We are going to have a federal-provincial conference on July 25. I would suggest that the Prime Minister hold off his bill of rights until that time and then present it to the premiers of the provinces. I would be surprised if there are not a number of the provinces which, without any preliminary work being done, without any discussions, will agree to accept this bill of rights and recommend that it be strengthened and that other liberties be put into it at the same time. I am also quite sure there are a number of provinces in this country which will not agree to accept the bill of rights and make it a constitutional amendment. We have an obligation to those who will not accept a bill of rights at this time to continually keep bringing this matter to the premiers of those provinces and to the people of those provinces until we have educated them at least into accepting what I would consider to be a very basic set of principles.

I believe that a bill of rights will be only as good as the government that is administering it. I have no doubts about this government and certainly about the Prime Minister of this country administering a bill of rights so that it will mean anything to a great number of people. If a bill of rights is going to mean anything it is going to have to take into consideration two parties. It is going to have to mean something to the individual and it is going to have to mean something to the crown at least. Those two parties are going to be involved every time the question of the bill of rights comes before the people.

The individual is going to be concerned and the crown must be concerned. Yet in this bill we do not have a very simple clause saying that the crown will be bound by this legislation as well as the individual. We do not have such a clause in this bill although it is found in most of our acts. It is a clause that is necessary at all times in order to bind the crown. It is to be found in the Interpretation Act. Such a clause could easily have been added at the end of this bill in order to make the crown also a responsible party with respect to any action taking place under the bill of rights. The bill provides freedom for the individual but does not place any restraint on the other party, the crown. I suggest that at least with respect to federal matters the crown must be a party to the bill.

I rose on a point of order the other day, Mr. Speaker, and tried to indicate that already at this session we have passed at least one bill containing clauses which eliminate the benefits to be gained from the bill of rights. The Feeds Act is very simple legislation, but in 11 instances in that act we have eliminated rights that the Canadian people have come to assume are theirs. We have eliminated security of property through the right to search without a warrant. We have eliminated protection against self-incrimination. We have removed the protection against forced confessions. Excessive fines are provided which involve cruel and inhuman punishment. We have provided in this bill for arbitrary detention affecting the liberty of the person. We have eliminated the right to interference by counsel. We have eliminated the right not to be deprived of the enjoyment of property without due process of law. The right to a fair hearing has been abrogated. The right of the accused to confront crown witnesses and cross-examine has been eliminated. The right of the accused to stand trial where the offence occurs has been eliminated.

This was all done in one simple bill we passed this year. I make no apology for not having risen and saying something about the matter at that time. Frankly I did not know anything about it. This is an argument that can only be developed by lawyers, and as it was pointed out to me I am quite happy to point out the effect of that legislation. I have read the arguments and have studied the bill and out of the eleven instances that legal counsel have put forward I can find seven or eight myself and I am only a common, ordinary person.

Nobody questions the legal ability of the Prime Minister. He controls the government. We do not have control by a 25-man cabinet but rather government by an individual. It is his government and it will rise and fall with him. In my opinion he has the capabilities necessary to decide these matters. I will feel quite secure about his bill of rights and will be happy to say I have been wrong if I find that in the next week or two he withdraws the Feeds Act or eliminates those provisions of that act to which I have referred.

I have used the Feeds Act as an example not because it is the worst one but because it was passed at this session and therefore fits my argument. There are other acts of the same kind. Take, for example, the Fisheries Act. Under that act an inspector can be a political appointee. As a political appointee he can seize a boat because he has reason to believe that something is not cricket with respect to the operation of the boat. He can hold the boat and then turn it back to the fisherman and say, "Thank you, I did not have any grounds; there is your boat and you can do what you like with it." The fisherman has no redress. The inspectors are protected under the act. All I suggest is that if the bill of rights means as much as some of the backbenchers seem to think it means then I am sure the government will immediately withdraw all legislation containing arbitrary powers eliminating the right to counsel and the right to protection against having to make confessions that may incriminate.

When these powers are eliminated I will believe that the Prime Minister is sincere in bringing forward a bill of rights, a bill that does not affect all the Canadian people but only those who are affected by acts passed under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. In my opinion this measure will in no way interfere with the rights of the provincial governments.

I could go on and mention some of the things that I do not like that are happening in the immigration department, the fact that the mounted police have made raids in the middle of the night and assaulted men and women and this on the Indians that we keep on reservations we have set apart for them. I could point out these things but I do not think it would do any good because they are things that have happened in the past and we do not want to say anything about them. But I would suggest that if the members of the government are sincere in their belief, and I think they are, they have an obligation to start immediately to check all legislation we have passed in the last three or four years at least and to see that our legislation will give the people the rights we want them to have and are promising them in the bill of rights.

When that is done then in my opinion we in Canada will be able to write for ourselves a preamble to the bill of rights in concise and flowery language, even as flowery as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) would like it to be, which will mean something to our school children. We can dress up the bill of rights so that every school child can learn about these rights and will feel proud of being a Canadian. They will know they have those rights we now have through British law. As it is now, when we go to court one lawyer will get up and say that we have these rights and another lawyer will get up and say we have not. Then you look in your pocket and if you have enough money you hire the best lawyer. He says you have them and you win the case and you get off.

I am told that the Roncarelli case was before the courts for seven years and in many instances the justice handed out in that case was a disgrace to the Canadian people. We all agree that a fair and just decision was rendered when the case finally went to the Supreme Court of Canada. But such a result can only be achieved by the rich and will not accrue to the poor. The things that were spoken about this afternoon in such a flowery way were not given to the rich in England or the United States. They were given in the main to the poor people, to the people who could not afford to fight for themselves. Most of those rights were granted not after a revolution or an upset in the country but because of decisions by people like our supreme court judges who sat back in their little ivory towers and decided that this was right and that it should be given to the people.

We want to have a bill of rights in Canada. I have wanted a bill of rights for a long time. I agree with those who have said that they want the bill of rights to be simple so that Canadians can understand it. This bill of rights is simple and it can be a good bill of rights. It can be as good a bill of rights as the government that is going to administer it wishes to make it but if the government will not take action to eliminate those things that are provided to the contrary by other legislation of the federal government then I do not think the bill of rights will be worth the paper it is written on.

I think that in the next few months the Canadian people are going to be watching to see what happens with respect to the legislation with which they come in contact. The little fisherman who has some gear in a boat is going to be interested if his boat is seized by an inspector and no charge is laid and there is no right to prosecute the inspector. The feed mill owner will be interested when he calls in his lawyer and finds that the lawyer not only cannot have a privileged communication with his client but becomes a second party who can be questioned and has to give evidence under penalty of a fine himself.

If the little people across the country who are affected by the acts of the federal government find that these acts have been liberalized and find that what the Prime Minister said about the bill of rights was not idle talk but was talk that was going to apply to them, then they will remember John Diefenbaker and his bill of rights for a long time. But if they continually find that those acts are abused and that the bill of rights is being invoked against other federal acts, they are going to question whether he was honest in his interpretation of applying this to all the Canadian people.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the vote on the amendment is taken I think it is desirable that I should explain the position we will take with regard to it. The amendment reads as follows:

> That this bill be not now read a second time, but be it resolved that this house is of the opinion that the provinces should be consulted in order to ascertain whether agreement can be reached on the terms of a constitutional amendment to guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms.

So far as the amendment deals with the desirability of consultation with the provinces, we on this side of the house have advocated that consultation during this debate and indeed on various occasions when we were dealing with this subject. We therefore naturally support the idea of consultation with the provinces so that out of that consultation there may develop in one form or another, with provincial agreement—because that is the only way in which it can be done—a bill of rights which will cover all Canadians and all subjects whether they are under provincial jurisdiction and federal jurisdiction.

This afternoon the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) in his intervention in this debate stated that the previous government during its years of office had done nothing to promote consultation with the provinces in these matters. I would remind him that he himself mentioned the constitutional conference of 1950 which was at least an effort to bring about agreement with the provinces so that when action had to be taken in matters of this kind, which required a constitutional amendment before that action could cover the whole of the country, arrangements could be made for that to be done by some amending procedure in our own country.

The minister talked about the abortive nature of that conference. May I say this, Mr. Speaker. That conference represented at least an effort to make progress in this direction. While it did not accomplish everything the government of that day had in mind, that conference accomplished this result. It made possible the amendment of the Canadian constitution by Canadian action, without reference to any other outside jurisdiction, in respect of all those matters under federal jurisdiction. That achievement represented progress. Because of the action taken at that time in 1950 this government today, if it had so desired, could have introduced this bill in the form of a constitutional amendment. As has been pointed out by the Prime Minister and others, this bill deals only with matters under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. Hence because of the action which was taken in 1950 the government could have made this bill, as far as its contents are concerned, a matter for constitutional amendment by action of this parliament and not action of any other parliament at any time.

The Prime Minister has said that was not done because it was not really important to have it done in that way because a constitutional amendment of that kind can be altered in the same way in which it can be made, namely by action of this parliament. But as I pointed out on Monday, that surely is a strange argument and one which depreciates the importance of having something in our constitution. If the principle of this bill is so important as it has been stated to be by so many hon. members on the other side who have spoken; if it is indeed a landmark in our history; if it is indeed a Canadian Magna Carta, might it not have been wise to have brought this matter before this house in the form of a constitutional amendment covering federal matters alone so that it at least would have the sanctity of enshrinement in our constitution? That was not done but it could have been done because of the action taken in 1950.

This amendment goes beyond that point. This amendment deals with consultation in order to ascertain whether we can have the kind of bill of rights or bills of rights, if we need more than one, which would cover all subjects under all the jurisdictions and therefore cover all Canadians. As I have said, we of course support this idea of consultation. But what has the present government—which will be faced with this amendment as we are faced with it—done with regard to bringing about this kind of consultation?

The Prime Minister and others have pointed out that it is idle to talk about consultation with a view to bringing about a wider bill of rights because it is obvious that such consultation will lead to nothing but delay. Our quarrel with the government on this matter is that no effort of any kind has been made in nearly three years by the government to find out whether this pessimistic prediction is in fact the case. It is quite true that if in the future as little effort is made to bring about this kind of consultation with the provinces as has been made in the last two and a half years this amendment would indeed result in indefinite delay for any bill of rights of any kind. The record of the past shows that we are not likely to have, unless that record is changed, the kind of consultation which is needed and which might, despite the pessimistic predictions made, result in agreement.

It has been pointed out by more than one speaker on this side of the house that there are already two provincial bills of rights. The new premier of the province of Quebec who has just been installed in office has already declared that he is in favour of a provincial bill of rights. Has any province come out against the idea of a bill of rights or a declaration of rights or a federal bill of rights, with the same kind of bill introduced in the provinces? Has any province come out against that in principle in the last two and a half years? Has any province discouraged initiative by the federal government which might have brought that about by now? Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless the government has done nothing about it at all except to say that consultation is idle and delaying, that nothing can be expected from it and therefore they will bring this bill of rights forward as an ordinary bill of rights, not even as a constitutional measure covering federal matters alone. Hence that part of the amendment dealing with the consultation side of the question does not present the opposition with any difficulty.

But, Mr. Speaker, the real significance of this amendment, of course, lies in the first line:

> That this bill be not now read a second time,—

That phraseology, makes the amendment a purely negative one. Not only is it negative in that sense technically but it rejects the principle embodied in this bill. The expression "that this bill be not now read the second time" would be killing the bill on second reading when we are dealing with the principle of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side have already said we would support the principle of this bill, but we wish that principle to be implemented more effectively. Having taken that position, how could we then vote for an amendment the effect of which is to kill the bill and negative the principle of the bill? What we want to see done, now that this bill has been introduced, even in the form in which it has been introduced, inadequate though it may be for the purposes we all hope to achieve, is to see the bill passed in second reading and sent to a committee.

We would have liked to have seen the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr.

Diefenbaker) of this country to the bar association at its annual convention in Vancouver last September carried out, the promise by which a bill of rights "in the early days of next session", that is, the present session, would have been sent to a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate at which evidence could have been heard from those interested in giving such evidence, including the bar association itself.

As I pointed out the other day, that specific commitment given with definite assurance by the Prime Minister resulted in the bar association passing in one of its committees a resolution which said that it would be possible to discuss this matter in this joint parliamentary committee and therefore they would reserve their opinion until they had the chance to appear before it. That cannot be done as proposed. Perhaps we are not yet at the end of the session but we are certainly not in the early days of it. All we can do now is to get this bill as soon as we can to a committee, perhaps even at this stage—I do not know what the intentions of the government are—to a joint committee. But at least we can get a committee set up and can summon to the committee witnesses, organizations, individuals and experts. Some of the witnesses and some of the organizations have been waiting for two years to appear before such a committee.

If because this is the middle of July it is not going to be possible to get all the witnesses before the committee demanded by the seriousness of the subject, that will not be our responsibility. But we will do our best to make this committee work. We will do our best to help secure witnesses before this committee. We have already suggested in this debate certain concrete changes which can be made, we think with advantage, to this bill. We will have an opportunity, I hope, to bring these changes to the attention of the committee.

Incidentally in the course of this discussion some very thoughtful speeches have been made on all sides of the house, but we have not heard very much from the government side about the proposals we on this side have made in the hope that they would improve the bill and make it a better bill when it comes out of committee, back to this house during this session later in the summer; and when the house in committee of the whole will have a chance to go over the work of the committee, examine the changes which have been made, and perhaps pass a bill before the session is over which will really implement in an effective and impressive way the purposes which we all have in mind when we discuss human rights and fundamental freedoms.

We cannot do any of that if this amendment carries, because if it carries it kills the bill. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. Winch: Not at all.

Mr. Pearson: Surely there is no doubt about that, because this is an amendment designed to negative this bill. It says in terms "that this bill be not now read the second time". There can be nothing clearer than that.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, we regret that we will not be able to support the amendment.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak this evening but in light of the interpretation which has been placed on our amendment by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) I am impelled to speak.

The Leader of the Opposition began by making a great point, with which I agree, that there should have been consultation with the provinces. And he was very correct when he said that in the last two and a half years no province has gone on record as opposing a federal bill of rights or refusing to consult with the federal government on this question.

I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has made a great mistake in not canvassing the possibility of agreement with the provinces to place in the Canadian constitution a bill of rights. But I hoped, Mr. Speaker, with this clear amendment before the house tonight that we would have the unanimous and enthusiastic support of the official opposition. The official opposition have said: "We like the amendment; we like the ideas in the amendment; we think the government should be doing what the amendment calls on the government to do, but we will not vote for the amendment."

Mr. Speaker, that is reminiscent of attitudes of the official opposition on other occasions. They say they want to do a certain thing, but when an opportunity is given to them to stand up and be counted in this house they shy away from it. How can they expect to gain the confidence of the Canadian public—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are gaining it.

Mr. Argue: We know there is something of a tradition in this country that many people vote one way in a provincial election and very often vote another way in a federal election. Apparently the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is attempting to claim that the Liberal party is such a monolithic party that what happens in a given province is bound to happen in the federal field.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Look at the Gallup poll.

Mr. Argue: "Look at the Gallup poll" says the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order: The right to vote is not one of the fundamental freedoms involved here.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the official opposition with regard to the amendment of the C.C.F. is exactly the same with regard to the Gallup poll. When it is in favour of the government they say it does not mean a thing, that it is cooked, that you cannot depend on it. They say "Look what happened in the United States". When it is on their side they say "Well, look at the Gallup poll".

The Leader of the Opposition complained that this bill should have been brought in at an early date and that it should have had thorough consideration throughout the length of this session. Now he says that it should be rushed off to the committee. If the passage of this amendment meant that the discussion of this bill was ending for this session, and if the passage of this amendment meant that the government would carry out the expressed wishes of parliament as contained in this motion and would bring in a bill of rights after having consulted the provinces, then I hope it passes this house, because I feel that consultation with the provinces and any possibility of getting an amendment into the constitution is superior to this type of bill.

In that I have the full support of the Liberal party. One would expect that they would welcome this amendment and that they would be supporting the leadership which our party has given to the opposition at this time. The Leader of the Opposition says that if it is passed the amendment will kill the bill. I take issue with him on that score. The amendment does not say anything of the kind. It says that the bill be not now read a second time, and I emphasize the word "now". If the house is prepared to adopt the motion as amended when I sit down around ten o'clock tonight—

An hon. Member: Make it soon.

Mr. Argue: You see that is the democratic attitude of the members opposite. Ten Tory speakers in a row, and they say that is democracy in action. To an opposition speaker, make it short, they say. Let us have the vote quickly. However, if the vote should come soon, and if by some weird fluke this amendment is passed; if the government's majority collapses, and if the whips are hauled off, as I would like them to be, and if we have a free vote, it would merely mean that the house had said that this bill should not now be read a second time. Then we would pass on to the next order of business—

An hon. Member: What is that?

Mr. Argue: —and the second reading of the bill could be moved later tonight, if that were desired, or else the bill could be moved tomorrow on second reading, and we could continue where we left off.

Mr. Pearson: Oh.

Mr. Argue: The Leader of the Opposition can say "Oh", but I still contend that this amendment does not kill the bill. Its passage does not remove the bill from the order paper. It is merely an abstract expression of the views of this house. Perhaps the Liberal party is afraid that the motion as amended might pass. I wonder if that is really a logical assumption to make? According to the latest tally I have, there are 206 supporters of the government in this house, 48 supporters of the Leader of the Opposition and eight members of the C.C.F. group. Does the Leader of the Opposition really think that the government in opposing this amendment, as it has indicated it intends to do, is likely to allow it to pass? Of course they will not allow it to pass. So I think that on any grounds the arguments of the Leader of the Opposition are very much in error. However, if this amendment should pass, and the government were then to consider it as a want of confidence motion and head to the electorate, would the Leader of the Opposition consider that a calamity?

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Argue: We have put forward this amendment in the hope it will receive support and in the hope it will pass and because we feel that parliament should lend its support to the proposition that the provinces should be consulted. I feel it is the duty of members in the opposition parties to put their views forward strongly, and to put their views forward by way of motions or by way of amendments, and then speak and vote in favour of those amendments. In my opinion every single vote cast in favour of this proposition is a vote in favour of a stronger bill of rights and is not, as the Leader of the Opposition has stated it to be, a vote which is negative to the proposition that there should be a bill of rights.

I can only say we are disappointed that we are not receiving the support of the Liberal opposition. We think that all the arguments which have been put forward by the Liberal party point to one conclusion. Those of us who speak from this group would be very greatly strengthened by a consistent approach by the Liberal party, by their voting in the house the way they have been speaking for the last three days.

Human Rights

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not want to spoil this beautiful relationship which has developed between the two opposition parties. On the one hand, the members of the C.C.F. claim that they want a bill of rights and on the other hand by the amendment in question which they have moved they are adopting a means of assuring that there will not be a bill of rights.

Every authority contained in Beauchesne indicates that the manner in which to defeat any resolution or motion is to move, in the words of this particular amendment, that this bill be not now read a second time, with some alternative offered. The interesting situation in which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) finds himself has been revealed in his own transparent words. He says: We have moved this amendment; we realize it will not be carried, and therefore we can take the stand of opposing the motion for a bill of rights at this time. These are his words.

Mr. Argue: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: These are his words.

Mr. Speaker: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Argue: The Prime Minister has said we have moved this amendment so that we can vote against the motion for a bill of rights. I never made any such statement, and I think time will show the way in which the C.C.F. will vote on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not raising a question of privilege. It is a matter of argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have simply placed a proper interpretation on the action taken by the C.C.F. party in this regard.

Mr. Argue: Do not misquote me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They know the rules of parliament; they know that this type of amendment is designed to defeat the motion which is before the house.

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Those are the rules. The hon. gentleman is invariably quoting the rules, and every suggestion of an amendment as a means of defeating a motion provides that the bill be not now read a second time but that some other course be followed. This is the transparent tactic which is being used in this case by the hon. gentleman and those associated with him. He has pointed out that with 206 members supporting the government there is, after all, no danger of this amendment passing, indicating exactly what I mentioned a few moments ago, that this is a transparent tactic designed to afford an opportunity to divide the house while at the same time continuing the pretence that the party in question supports a bill of rights.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: Nonsense.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to discourage this beautiful relationship between the members of the opposition. The Liberal party has throughout the years indicated, by its refusal to act on any suggestion that there should be a bill of rights, that it did not want a bill of rights. Indeed I can give the house quotations in support of that contention, and I intend to do so when I come to close the debate. The attitude shown a moment ago by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is certainly worthy of commendation on our part, since it indicates that the educative process that we carried out during the years while endeavouring to obtain a bill of rights has now enabled us to command the support of the right hon. gentleman and his followers.

Mr. Speaker, this is a day I have looked forward to. I am glad if we are going to receive the support of the official opposition on the bill of rights which through the years I have advocated and others have advocated and I am sorry that the C.C.F. is going to place itself in the position of endeavouring to defeat something to which they have through the years, through their various leaders, given support.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, so that the matter may be clear, may I ask the Prime Minister if there is any doubt that he will propose after second reading that this bill be sent to a committee for thorough study?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I intended to deal with that generally when I concluded the debate. I undertook that the matter would be sent to a committee. If the house agrees it will be sent to a committee as was always the intention and has been made clear over and over again.

Mr. Pearson: Early in the session?

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, when this matter came up last year I had the pleasure of attending a lecture delivered by Professor A. M. Lower at the University of Ottawa. As everyone knows, Professor Lower is the very distinguished author of a history text book which is standard in most universities entitled, "Colony to Nation", and as most people know he is no great or abiding friend of the government or of the party to which I belong. His book "Colony to Nation" is written in a very racy and ingratiating style. However, one should not take it too seriously because it presents the Liberal or authorized version of Canadian history. I think it is very fortunate that we have people like Professor Creighton who can set the record straight. However, I must admit that Mr. Lower could not restrain a sneaking respect for the founder of the Conservative party and original prime minister of Canada, the late Sir John A. Macdonald.

But I was very gratified and pleased at the support that Mr. Lower gave for a bill of rights. I was fortunate enough to have the pleasure of meeting him afterwards and he was kind enough to give me the verbatim notes of his speech. There are several passages I should like to quote directly from his speech because I think they are extremely material to the discussion tonight. I quote from Professor Lower's remarks:

> I agree wholeheartedly that the present administration is sincerely anxious to increase the guarantees of Canadian freedom. The problem is too big to be allowed to become merely a matter of ordinary party bickering. Those who try to make it merely a party matter will do their country no service.

He went on to say:

> I recognize the weaknesses of a simple statute instead of a constitutional amendment, but I recognize the impossibility of getting this latter at the present time. A half loaf is better than no bread. If I were an M.P., I would call for drastic revision and strengthening of that part of the bill dealing with the War Measures Act, and would cheerfully vote for the rest of it.

Professor Lower stated that if he were a member of parliament he would call for a strengthening of the war measures provisions and would cheerfully vote for the rest of the bill. He stated further:

I hope all Canadians will have gumption enough to see in the gesture of the present government concern for their liberties.

He stated something else that is very material and which I should like to put on the record because he expresses it in a most succinct and intelligent manner. He said:

Our bill of rights will touch on the subject of civil liberties, not on civil rights at all, and, as such, I suspect it will affect the whole country. It will be a great statement of principle. It will be comparable to the American declaration of independence.

I quote further:

If you want another parallel for the statement of principles, I can think of a very pertinent one which nobody here will repudiate, that is to say, the innumerable statements of principles which we find stated in the holy writ. I suppose there are very few people who have not consciously or unconsciously, at some time or other, violated the precepts that are laid down for us in the scriptures but somehow, these precepts have a way of bringing us back to them. We take the simple case of the ten commandments. One of them states: "Thou shalt not steal", yet there is a great deal of theft in the world. Nevertheless, we come back to the principle and it has been so strong and so powerful a principle that it is upheld by the secular law of the land. My point is that, if you enunciate a great principle, which is intrinsically sound, sooner or later, your law will be shaped accordingly; and sooner or later he will begin to think accordingly too.

I could not agree more with this direct verbatim quotation from Professor Lower. I am glad to say that there is one instance in which I can thoroughly agree with him.

For many years prior to the last two great wars many people had the idea of the inevitable march of freedom. It used to be taken for granted or it was assumed that by some natural law one nation after another would introduce some form of representative government modelled on the mother of parliaments and that in due course freedom would become universal. To me this is just another of those liberal illusions—that is liberal with a small "l"—that was initiated by the French revolution. It is in the same category as is this faith in the inevitable progress and the ultimate perfectability of man. These two illusions are one thing that Liberals, communists, socialists and so on have in common, namely this naive faith which is founded on a misconception of human nature.

Conservatives, basing their feeling on an older and more orthodox Christian tradition, realize that human egotism must be restrained by good laws and that human altruism will always be bolstered by sound institutions. They also realize that there is no guarantee of any inevitable progress. In human history we go forward and we go backward. There is always in human history the possibility of human creativity and destructivity.

Unfortunately, as I have stated, this optimism that freedom was inevitable has not been justified by events. Our democratic form of government has gone entirely out of fashion and has been replaced in many countries by the rule of a dictator or a tyrannical clique. Even in Canada our rulers seem to have been attracted by the illusion of the efficiency of government wartime controls and to have become impatient with the relatively slower and more pedestrian processes of democracy. It has been the evidence of this which has led thinking men to advocate clear-cut legislation to guarantee personal liberty in place of our vague traditions.

It is evident that this bill should have been introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) because his efforts to secure such legislation go back for a long time. He raised the matter in 1942. In 1947 he made a speech in parliament which aroused great interest in the subject of a bill of rights not only in Canada but in the United Nations. On many occasions between 1947 and the defeat of the previous government the Prime Minister raised his voice to urge on an unsympathetic house the passing of just such a bill as that which is before us. As Prime Minister he has drafted the bill of rights; and in order that it should receive the fullest consideration and study he introduced the bill and had it given first reading last September and then let it stand over until this present session.

In 1945, when the charter of the United Nations was drawn up in San Francisco, proposals were already being made that an international bill of human rights should be drafted. This first international declaration of human rights was adopted without a single dissenting vote. It consisted of 26 articles and covered a very wide range of personal, civic, political, economic and other types of rights.

Those 26 articles did not have the force of binding rules of law either in international relations or in the domestic law of any of the states which approved them but they represent the aspirations of the common men and women of this age. They are a statement of what ought to be. They represent a challenge and a goal, and in most parts of the world that goal is tragically far removed from actual conditions. It is the old story of the tragic disparity between our aims and our achievements. However, the United Nations declaration of human rights is an inspiration to us as well as to others and it forms the background to the fight which the Prime Minister has been waging for a bill of rights in Canada.

Since no one in Canada would ever admit that he was opposed to freedom, it seems surprising that opposition members, or some of them, would have in the past rejected the Prime Minister's arguments. However, a bill of rights meant a curb to the power of the previous government which, incidentally, it was by no means ready to accept. Among the members who opposed this suggestion of a bill of rights on numerous occasions was the late Mr. Garson, the former minister of justice. I quote from his speech in the House of Commons where on one occasion he stated as follows:

> The introduction of this deceptively simple but rather emotional issue into such a complex field creates a problem which is an extremely difficult one. It is the problem of superimposing a bill of rights, after the United States fashion, upon the federal constitution of Canada, whose main feature, inherited from the constitution of Great Britain, is the sovereignty of its legislative bodies... It is this British principle which the hon. member for Prince Albert proposes to abridge by attaching constitutional limitations to it in the manner of the bill of rights in the United States constitution.

Mr. Garson, of course, was obviously referring to the fact that the parliament of Britain is completely unfettered. It has the power to confiscate your home, to imprison you or to do anything. In fact, it is a cliché in law circles that the only thing the British parliament cannot do is to change a man into a woman. In contrast, under the United States system of government we know that the first ten sections of the United States constitution provide a bill of rights to which all legislation must be subject.

It should be remembered, of course, that this absolute and unfettered power possessed by the British parliament is not due to any deliberate planning but is due to the fact that parliament has gradually acquired the power originally possessed by despotic kings who knew no bounds to their power save the limits placed on tyranny by the threat of rebellion. This accident of history has left the British parliament with a constitution resting on usage which knows no restraint on its legislative power. Because the tyrannical government of Charles I and James II provoked rebellions which led to the termination of their kingly jobs and in one instance the termination of life we are prone to think of government tyranny as related only to monarchy. I am sure that those who have the responsibility of directing affairs at Westminster do not make that mistake. They know that stubborn Englishmen who have grown up with traditions of liberty and independence can be pushed only so far and that they will accept despotic regimentation no more readily from some bureaucrat than they will from a monarch and they have learned not to risk such an explosion.

But our population is like that of the United States. It is composed of many elements. Our history in some respects is similar to that of the United States. We have this tradition of violence. We are not a homogeneous people who have lived in isolation for a thousand years so that we should develop our own way of life and our own traditions.

Many people in both the United States and Canada came from countries where the common man was not encouraged to talk back to officials and where there was no traditional liberty. Even those of Anglo-Saxon origin have lost that stubborn, rebellious spirit. Let me say to the English "Be not proud". Let them know that this Magna Carta they boast of was actually promises extracted by French knights and French barons from a French king. Let them realize also that the language of the English courts for 300 years after Magna Carta was the language of France. Let them also realize before they become too proud that the greatest judge who ever adorned the English bench was not an Englishman but a Scotsman, Lord Mansfield.

As for the previous government which was in office, men like Mr. Howe and Mr. Garson, who shared with other members of the cabinet the odium of stifling the discussion of the pipe line contract, also appeared eager to abuse their great powers. Mr. Howe, Mr. Garson and the rest have had their day and will never play the tyrant again. But there are those in power who suffer from illusions of grandeur and there are many who think that some legal restraints should be applied to keep anybody who in future endeavours to emulate them within bounds.

Many well-intentioned people who support the concept of a bill of rights are of the opinion that there should be a constitutional amendment. I am not too sure—and I throw this out because I certainly make no pretensions to being a constitutional lawyer—that this bill of rights as it stands would not apply directly to the provinces. The property and civil rights reserved under section 92 of the British North America Act to the provinces refer to quite a different thing. That is property and civil rights. It is a translation from an old French legal term, "proprietes et droits civils". That was a well known phrase long before the English conquest. It was put in that section by Sir George Etienne Cartier, and of course was designed to safeguard the customary laws of the province of Quebec; for example, the family law, the rights to inheritance and that sort of thing. It had nothing whatever to do with civil liberties, which is a different matter and which could more correctly be called public laws.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has decided not to seek such an amendment because of the question of delay. He obviously arrived at the same conclusion as Professor Lower. That half a loaf of bread is better than none. He stated on one occasion:

> In so far as constitutional amendment would be concerned, the experience of 80 years indicates very clearly that the provinces, jealous of their jurisdiction, would not support a constitutional amendment applicable to themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would agree with me that the vote which has been taken has pretty well disposed of the question of a constitutional amendment and that we might confine ourselves now to the bill before the house.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

In closing, there are others who might say that this is just a simple statute. If it can be passed by a government it can be repealed by a government. This is literally true, but can you imagine the outcry which would be created if any government presumed to do such a thing? What government would dare repeal a statute which guaranteed our civil liberties? Anyone who considers the matter will acknowledge that the Prime Minister is right in saying that if this bill is passed no government will ever dare repeal it.

Finally, nothing would be more appropriate than to refer again to the initiator of the bill and to one of his statements or promises. The Prime Minister said:

> Henceforth, except within the limitations that security demands, Canadians will know that their rights are not to be loosely disregarded, and parliament will have before it at all times the warning which is emphasized in this bill of rights, namely that fundamental rights and freedoms within the federal jurisdiction shall not be made light of by this or future parliaments.

I would extend that also to the provinces, either legally or by precept, that within the federal jurisdiction fundamental rights and freedoms shall not be made light of by this or future parliaments.

Mr. B. C. Thompson (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I feel that history is being made here in this debate on the bill of rights and it is a great privilege to have an opportunity of having a seat in this house on this historic occasion.

[Mr. Campbell (Stormont).]

During the debate many views have been expressed by various members. I think all the views have been expressed which could possibly be expressed and all the avenues of approach have been explored. Therefore I do not intend to speak at any length at all. I merely want to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on having realized the dream of many years when he introduced this bill. I want to congratulate him on the language of the bill, which I consider is very clear and very plain and simple, and thus very eloquent. It is language which can be readily understood by the layman as well as by the professional man.

When one aspires to be the Prime Minister of Canada I believe he must have in mind greater aims and objectives than just the mere holding of the office of Prime Minister. I think our present Prime Minister is justified in holding the great office of Prime Minister because of this one aim alone, although he has many aims and objectives.

This bill has been exposed to much criticism and also approval both inside and outside the house. It is quite obvious it is impossible to please everyone. It is impossible to draw up a bill in a form which will express everybody's ideas as to how a bill should be prepared. The main thing is that we need a bill of rights in Canada and we need one now.

Mr. Speaker, like Her Majesty's loyal opposition I am going to support this bill, but unlike them I am going to be consistent and speak in favour of it too. From the remarks I have heard them make this evening and during this debate I can only infer that they are just trying to justify their own inaction in regard to a bill of rights when they had the opportunity to bring one in while they were in office.

I believe it is very important that we should watch very carefully, especially in these days when government is being asked more and more to intervene in the life of the private individual, the relationship between the state and the individual. We should guard very carefully against arbitrary measures and encroachments on our human rights and fundamental freedom. In that respect, I think it is very desirable that we should reduce these rights and freedoms to writing so that we may have continually before us our objectives in that regard. It gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to be here and support this measure for a Canadian bill of rights.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): A very great deal has been said today in the course of this debate and also on Monday with regard to the bill of rights now before the house, and it is obvious that between now and eleven o'clock I am not going to have sufficient time to make a complete review of what has been said.

I should like to start by attempting to outline for the house and particularly for the members of the opposition what they have obviously completely misconstrued and misinterpreted—the effect and extent of this bill and the concept that the government had in mind by way of a legislative enactment when it introduced this bill of rights. Our intention is to introduce a statute which will define the rights of all Canadians in clear and understandable language, a statute which will clearly authorize and assist the courts to interpret and protect those rights and which will, in addition, set a limit to executive and, in so far as it is possible or desirable, parliamentary authority to interfere with or abridge those rights. This, I submit, we have done. Ours is a draft bill of rights that he who runs may read.

I may have something to say later about this question of the language in which a bill of rights should be drafted, concerning which we heard so much from members of the opposition today and on Monday. At the present time I think it would suffice to say that had we used language as suggested, in particular by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), then certainly no one could understand it, let alone be inspired by the bill of rights which would have resulted.

What we wanted to do, and what I submit we have done, is draft a declaration of the rights applicable to all Canadians which will serve as indication to Canadians whether natural born or naturalized, of whatever origin, of whatever creed or whatever colour, that these rights are theirs by inheritance as Canadians. It has certainly been our intention to produce a bill in a compass which would enable it to be framed, if you will, and hung on the walls of our schools or churches or institutions of every sort so that a person might stand before it and read it and say: this is my inheritance as a Canadian.

Therefore we have, of course, been concerned not to be too long and verbose or too circumspect. We have been concerned to try to produce a declaration of what those rights are, couched in the simplest, the most effective terms, and we have been concerned to try to produce in addition an enforcement section, a section which makes it clear that those rights will be protected by the courts. This, again, is framed in language sufficiently clear that a person concerned about his rights will know what he is entitled to and how he will be able to go about asserting and protecting his rights.

There is at this stage just one point I want to make, and that is with reference to the suggestion by the Leader of the Opposition that perhaps the War Measures Act should be amended so as to make it clear that the governor in council would not have the right to deprive Canadian citizens of their citizenship by order in council even in wartime. It is obvious that this bill of rights and the debate in connection therewith will be of interest to Canadians of all sorts, including those who are naturalized Canadians as well as those who were born in this country, and therefore I think it is probably to be expected that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) will make what appeal he can to the ethnic groups in Canada by making the sort of remark he made.

But I point out that the remarks he made had nothing to do with the bill of rights. He was talking about amendments to the War Measures Act. Why he should drag that in was perfectly obvious, but I will go no further than I have gone because one must not, of course, impute motives. However, I do want to emphasize that the Leader of the Opposition dragged in a reference to an amendment to the War Measures Act that has nothing to do with the bill of rights at all.

I want to point out, too, that he continually overlooked the fact that it was his government, when it introduced the citizenship act, that provided not one way but six ways by which Canadians could be deprived of their citizenship by order in council. The Leader of the Opposition omitted to mention that this government rectified this situation in 1958 by amending the citizenship act so that naturalized Canadians could not lose their citizenship by action of the governor in council except in two circumstances instead of six.

Perhaps I should outline the ways in which the previous act had taken power by order in council to deprive naturalized Canadians of their citizenship. Prior to September 6, 1958, when we amended the act, the citizenship act contained in subsection 1 of section 19 six broad causes which provided for the revocation of Canadian citizenship of persons other than natural-born Canadian citizens. There is no time for me to deal with them in detail tonight, but anyone who wishes may read them, and I have provided the reference. Because it was felt that these provisions discriminated unfairly against persons naturalized in Canada, we introduced a bill to amend the citizenship act providing that five of these six provisions be deleted. Of the original six, our bill retained only that one which provided for the revocation of Canadian citizenship in the case of persons who have obtained certificates of naturalization or citizenship by false representation or fraud or by the concealment of material circumstances.

In this way, discriminations against naturalized Canadian citizens introduced by the former Liberal government were removed from the citizenship act. After deleting five of the six previous provisions, the bill included one new cause for revocation, and one only. This provides specifically—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would find this a convenient place at which to call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Then may I call it eleven o'clock, and move the adjournment of the debate?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what is to be the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will go on with the estimates as outlined on Monday night, beginning with the Department of Justice. There are only one or two items remaining there. Following that we will take the estimates of the R.C.M.P., then those of the Department of National Revenue, and then the completion of the estimates of the Department of Transport. If all these should be finished there are the other departments we have listed—external affairs, northern affairs, labour and so on.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask when this bill will be debated again?

Mr. Churchill: I think we might resume debate on this bill on Thursday and perhaps complete the debate that day, then carry on with the estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: Thursday of this week?

Mr. Churchill: Thursday of this week.

Mr. Chevrier: Does that mean Thursday of this week?

Mr. Churchill: Thursday of this week.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, does the minister not realize that twice now in the last few nights he has said that Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of this week are to be devoted to estimates?

Mr. Churchill: Oh, yes, but I have always suggested when outlining the program for the week that it is a tentative program. We have made changes each week, many of them being made at the suggestion of hon. members on the other side of the house.

It being two minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

EXPLORATORY PERMITS, ARCTIC ISLANDS

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 6, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Indian affairs in English and in French.

STARRED QUESTIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND—INVESTMENT PORTFOLIO CHANGES

Question No. 190—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What changes were made in the investment portfolio of the unemployment insurance fund for the period from June 1, 1959 to March 31, 1960?
2. What were the amounts involved in the buying and selling of bonds and other securities?
3. On the individual transactions, what were the amounts of profits realized or losses sustained?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): As the answer to these three questions contains many figures, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that with the approval of the house it be printed in Hansard without being read.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to the suggestion of the hon. minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer referred to is as follows:]

1. From June 1, 1959 to March 31, 1960 there were net purchases of treasury bills of $6,025,000 (par value) and net sales of bonds of $139,653,000 (par value).

2. Gross purchase of treasury bills amounted to $102,515,000 and gross sales of treasury bills amounted to $96,490,000. Gross sales of bonds amounted to $139,653,000. All these figures are in par values. There were no purchases of bonds.

3. It is not in the public interest to disclose the details of individual transactions. The following table shows the gross purchases and gross sales (par values) of treasury bills and bonds, and the profits or losses realized on these transactions, for each month from November 1959 to March 1960. There were no purchases or sales of either bills or bonds between June 1 and October 31, 1959.

HALIFAX NAVAL PERSONNEL AT SEA

Question No. 192—Mr. Hellyer:

1. How many navy personnel stationed at Halifax were at sea during June 3, June 4, and June 7, last?
2. On what ships and what number of personnel on each?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): The answer to the first part of the question is as follows: June 3, 4109; June 4, 4596; June 7, 4605.

The answer to the second part of the question includes the names of 24 ships and their complements, and I would ask that this information be printed at this place in Hansard.

INDIAN AGENCIES (SERVED THROUGH NORTH BAY)

Question No. 193—Mr. Benidickson:

1. Which Indian agencies in the constituencies of Kenora-Rainy River, Port Arthur or Fort William under present administrative arrangements are required to process their needs through an Indian affairs branch set-up in North Bay?
2. How far in miles is each of the above mentioned agencies from (a) North Bay; (b) Ottawa headquarters?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): The answer to part 1 of the question is as follows: the Indian agencies at Sioux Lookout, Kenora, Fort Frances, Port Arthur and Nakina come under the jurisdiction of the regional office located in North Bay, Ontario.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In answer to the second part of the question, the distance in miles from these agencies to North Bay and Ottawa is as follows:

Agency	(a) North Bay	(b) Ottawa
Sioux Lookout (C.N.R.)	762	988
Kenora (C.P.R.)	923.9	1171
Fort Frances (C.P.R. and C.N.R.)	856.4	1103.5

MOTION FOR PAPERS

SUPERVISOR OF PROOFS, NAVAL ORDNANCE BRANCH, BEDFORD, N.S.

Motion No. 120—Mr. Chevrier (for Mr. Benidickson):

For a copy of all correspondence between January 1, 1960, and June 1, 1960, relating to the vacancy and competition No. 60-H-562 for the position of supervisor of proofs, technician grade I, inspector naval ordnance branch at Bedford naval magazine, Nova Scotia.

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, apart from the routine forms related to a competition of this kind there is no correspondence in connection with this motion. Application forms submitted in competitions under the provisions of the civil service commission have always been considered to be of a confidential nature and thus fall within the definition of privileged documents.

In view of these circumstances may I ask the hon. member whether he would agree to have this motion dropped from the order paper?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), could the matter stand?

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of the mover of this motion I suggest that it stand.

Mr. Sevigny: That would be all right, Mr. Speaker, but may I mention to the house the fact that I gave the fullest explanation of this item, which has been on the order paper for some time, to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and he sent me a note stating that upon the answer I have just given he would be willing to drop this matter from the order paper.

Mr. Chevrier: Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I would withdraw my request.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier for the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, and with his consent, agrees to the withdrawal of this motion.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—CONTROL OF NUCLEAR WARHEADS PROVIDED TO CANADIAN FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether any nuclear warheads which might be provided for Canadian forces under NATO in Europe are to be under sole Canadian control, in the same way that the Prime Minister indicated they would be if they were used for continental defence?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question is, of course, an improper one. At no time did I say "sole control." I said joint control of Canada as to use, and also as to everything connected therewith. That statement still stands.

Mr. Hellyer: The right hon. gentleman said Canadian control.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister doubted that my question to him was quite proper, in that he stated I had misquoted him, may I rephrase it. Does the Prime Minister's statement on page 5654 of Hansard "that if and when the Canadian government should decide to equip its forces with nuclear weapons those weapons would be under Canadian control" apply also to Canadian forces in Europe under NATO?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is an indication of the kind of questions that the hon. gentleman asks. Let me point out this fact, that he either deliberately or intentionally in his question used the words "sole control", and suggested that I had said "sole control". I answered that by saying that at no time had I said "sole control". I would suggest to him that when he asks questions on a matter as important to Canada and Canada's future—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and having regard to his responsibility—

Mr. McIlraith: Answer the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that he not quote or pretend to quote in his question something that he knows is not correct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I know that the Prime Minister has great regard for our practices, and I am sure he would like to reconsider the last phrase he used; because in it he has implied that a member of the house would make a statement which he knew was not correct.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Prime Minister should, of course, withdraw what he said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, he should not.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister now says he should not. I ask him to withdraw what he said. The Prime Minister, of course, as you pointed out, sir, was not in order when he made that statement. After he has withdrawn that statement perhaps the Prime Minister will then answer the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question asked of me suggested that I had said that nuclear weapons would be under sole Canadian control. This question on the part of the hon. gentleman was not correct. In wording his question in that way he was not reading from the statement I made, but if it was not done with knowledge or intention, simply the fact is that he did not read the answer I gave.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the Prime Minister might be asked to withdraw the statement he made previously and which you, sir, indicated he should withdraw. When I asked him the original question I did use the words "sole control". The Prime Minister took exception to that so I read what he said from Hansard. There was no reference then to joint control but to Canadian control. Once again I ask you to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw the statement which he made, and which was out of order; and perhaps even now, if he can calm down a little bit, he will answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: My intervention was not concerned with the preliminaries but only with the final phrase the Prime Minister used. I feel sure he will review that and, on reflection, will see that there was a direct statement that another hon. member stated what he knew was not true. I hope, in view of the fact that the hon. member concerned has not been satisfied, the Prime Minister will reconsider that final phrase in his statement which, as I recall it, was that the hon. member stated something which he knew was not true.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already stated it simply indicated that he had not read the statement I had made, but by the question endeavoured to leave an impression which was not in accordance with the answer given by me the other day. That is a very clear and definite modifying as you suggested.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): The words used in connection with the statement made by the Prime Minister were "deliberately and intentionally". I am sure that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I am on a point of privilege, sir.

Mr. Ricard: He is telling the Chair, now.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure Your Honour will not ask me to read the rule, which is well known in the house—

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I do not intend to sit down until after I have completed my point.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I interrupt the hon. gentleman. If I said "deliberately and intentionally", naturally, in view of the statement made by the hon. gentleman, I will certainly not convey that idea. I have already made clear that it must have been unintentional, that he could not have read the actual answer.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in the excitement of a few moments ago the Prime Minister forgot to answer my question, so perhaps I could repeat it. My question was did the words of the Prime Minister, as reported on page 5654 of Hansard, namely "that if and when the Canadian government should decide to equip its forces with nuclear weapons, those weapons would be under Canadian control" apply to Canadian forces in Europe under NATO?

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman would read the rest of my statement he would see that it states, "those weapons will be under Canadian control and would be used in Canada only as the result of a decision by the Canadian government". In so far as NATO forces are concerned, the hon. gentleman knows that the responsibilities of NATO carry with them the implementation of NATO policy.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY AS TO DEATH OF AIR VICE MARSHAL HODSON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I wonder whether the minister could give the house any additional information with respect to the tragic accident which resulted in the death of Air Vice Marshal Keith Hodson.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Air Vice Marshal Hodson was deputy chief of staff for operations at NORAD headquarters. Part of his duties required him to be cognizant of the problems connected with flying jet interceptors in squadrons under the operational control of NORAD. At the time of the accident he was undertaking a proficiency rating in a T-33 jet trainer, and due to a flame-out of the jet engine both he and the other pilot, a U.S.A.F. colonel, parachuted from the aircraft. Air Vice Marshal Hodson's parachute opened successfully, but for causes which are still unknown he suffered fatal injuries. An investigation is now under way in an effort to establish the cause of his death.

Air Vice Marshal Hodson was a distinguished officer in the R.C.A.F. I would like to express to his family and his fellow officers in the R.C.A.F. my sincere sympathy on the occasion of his death in the line of duty.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to join with the minister in paying tribute to the air vice marshal, who in my opinion was one of the outstanding officers in the R.C.A.F. I know that all hon. members would wish to join in the expression of sympathy with the family.

In view of the series of accidents which has involved senior officers of the R.C.A.F., will the minister consider the possibility of measures which might reduce the likelihood of further accidents of this kind? I think there are some measures which are worthy of consideration.

Mr. Pearkes: I should be very pleased to do that.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ELLIOT LAKE—REPORTED SHORTAGE OF MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that well in excess of 2,000 miners have been laid off in the Elliot Lake area, including 450 at the Pronto mines, 650 at Canmet and 800 at Laknor, all of which closed down this year, can the minister explain to the house reports of senior officials of his department to the effect that there has been a consistent shortage of miners in the Elliot Lake area?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member sent me notice of his intention to ask this question only a few moments ago. I have not had an opportunity to check the hon. member's allegations concerning reports which he said emanated from the senior officials of my department. I should like to advise him, however, that I am informed by officials of the Denison mines that a severe shortage of labour exists at the present moment at Elliot Lake. My officials in the national employment service are now trying to fill an order for 50 miners who will be employed for a period of two or three years in the mines there, and I am also informed that another 50 will be required almost immediately. The type of personnel required is in the skilled rock breaker category. The existing shortage has cut capacity in the mine by 20 per cent.

Miners presently in the Elliot Lake area are being referred to these jobs, and every effort will be made to fill the present requirements.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that miners at Elliot Lake have accepted jobs in other areas at half the pay that is being paid in the Elliot Lake area?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I know that some miners insist on moving into other areas and some are being paid by the government for their removal to these areas, even though there is an opportunity of procuring work in the Elliot Lake area.

ELLIOT LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to submit a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Now that the provincial government of Ontario has made known its plans for assistance to Elliot Lake, may I ask when the federal plans in that regard will be made known?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): A somewhat similar question was asked by the hon. gentleman the other day, and I gave an appropriate answer in the circumstances.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

GIFT OF STRAWBERRIES FROM FRASER VALLEY GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, but in view of the fact that he is not present maybe I had better ask it of every hon. member in the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That would be a dangerous precedent, even though it involves good strawberries. Perhaps the hon. member could select a parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Hicks: I notice that he is absent also.

Mr. Churchill: I will accept the question as notice.

Mr. Hicks: I could ask it of the Acting Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker: The house leader will take the question as notice.

Mr. Hicks: Is the minister aware that through the generosity of the growers of the Fraser Valley, British Columbia, a shipment of Canada's finest strawberries has arrived in the capital today by air, and that these strawberries will be served as a gift to those who dine in the parliamentary restaurant at noon today, also I believe to those dining in room 16?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, it is time that some members took their wives out to lunch. I would particularly like the agricultural critics in the opposition to sample the berries and report to me their opinion as to flavour, colour, shipping quality, and so forth.

TELEVISION

INQUIRY AS TO IDENTITY OF E. L. BUSHNELL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Chambers: A supplementary question?

Mr. Chevrier: No, not after that. Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport or to the Minister of National Revenue, though I think it should be to the Minister of Transport. It is this. Is Mr. E. L. Bushnell, who is to be director of a company headed by Mr. Gordon Archibald which has been recommended by the board of broadcast governors to operate a television station in Pembroke, the same person as Mr. Ernest Leslie Bushnell, the former general manager of the C.B.C. and the president of the company which has been recommended by the same board to operate a private television station in Ottawa?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I really do not know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: I am somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the lack of knowledge of the minister, who generally has the answers to these questions. Will the minister inquire and tell the house whether he is one and the same person?

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to, Mr. Speaker, but I am absolutely positive that the hon. member knows the answer to the question.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: I have a supplementary question for the minister. Will he also inquire, if he does not know at the moment, whether among the five applicants for a private television station in Ottawa Mr. Bushnell's company was the only one to be financially backed by foreign capital?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO PROTESTS RESPECTING REMOVAL OF SPUR LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I, too, should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister please advise the house whether he has received representations from the residents of the Jerseyside, Freshwater and Placentia area of Newfoundland regarding the removal of the spur line from Placentia and the moving of the railroad station?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): It has not come to my attention so far, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Tucker: A supplementary question. Will the minister give favourable consideration to the views and wishes of the people in that area?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I always give careful consideration to the views of any people who are Canadians who bring their problems to my attention.

GREAT SLAVE LAKE—IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMISSION REPORT ON PROPOSED RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Prime Minister has received the report of the commission studying the railway route to Great Slave lake, will he inform the house whether he intends to introduce the bill which he withdrew two years ago, which would provide for the construction of the railway?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The other day I was asked a question with regard to this report, and I am now in a position to table the report, although only in English. If the opposition is prepared to accept the tabling of the report in English only, as it was prepared, I shall have it tabled immediately so that there may be before the end of the session whatever discussion is considered necessary. On the other hand, if a French translation is required then it will take some time before that is ready.

Mr. Speaker: Does any hon. member of the house take exception to the tabling of the report at this time?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Speaker, that is not an answer to my original question. I asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that he has this report, whether it is tabled or not, he would reintroduce into this house before the end of this session the bill he promised in the speech from the throne in 1958, thus bringing about the building of the railway to Great Slave lake.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, after the report has been read and the various opinions have been considered, a determination will then be made. That is the reason I suggested that if there was no objection to it the report could be tabled in English. Then having read the report and the several opinions of the three commissioners, a decision could be reached.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR USE OF LETTER MARKED "PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General; I regret not having had the opportunity to give notice. The question is based on a letter dated June 29 from the minister to myself and relates to certain postal facilities in a community called Kitwanga. I should like to ask the minister whether I can disregard the words "personal and confidential" on the letter, because the subject matter is well known in the community of Kitwanga.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member might communicate questions of that kind privately. After all, it is not public business.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FEDERAL OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, of which I have given him notice. Has the minister received formal notification of a recent decision of Vancouver city council to open negotiations with his department to determine on what terms the federal government will take over the operation of Vancouver municipal airport? Will the minister give his assurance that the compensation to be offered the city will be based on a proper appraisal of city-owned lands and buildings at today's values? Finally, with regard to plans now being prepared for the city for proposed new terminal facilities, will the minister say what action may be proposed by his department?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have not yet received any formal word from the city council, but would certainly give prompt consideration to any request relating to the federal take-over of the Vancouver airport. Any government decision to make an offer to purchase the city's interest in the airport would have to be preceded by a full appraisal by the federal representatives, of all items concerned, and any decision on the nature of new terminal facilities would also be a matter for detailed technical and economic studies by federal representatives, which would include a review of any preliminary studies made by the city.

WATER RESOURCES

BOW LAKE, ONT.—REPORTED POLLUTION BY RADIOACTIVE WASTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of a Toronto Star news report of June 29, indicating serious contamination of Bow lake by radioactive waste deposited in the lake by Faraday Uranium Mines, and a resultant loss in value to tourist and other properties in the area. Would the minister indicate whether his department has made any tests of the lake water for radioactivity, and whether his department has made any representations to the company regarding the disposal of its wastes which resort owners and conservation officials state are causing pollution?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I received notice of the hon. member's intention to ask this question shortly before the house opened. I have not seen the press report, but I will have the matter looked into and will be glad to reply to the question later.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISAPPEARANCE OF U.S. PLANE—PASSAGE OVER CANADIAN TERRITORY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the hon. member for Kootenay West asked whether the lost United States plane reported as having disappeared near the northern coast of the U.S.S.R. had taken off from an airport in Canada or passed over Canadian territory at any point in its mission, and if the answer was in the affirmative, why?

Inquiries of the Ministry

I am informed that this aircraft neither took off from an airfield in Canada nor passed over Canadian territory on its mission.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STATEMENT ON PROGRESS TOWARD INTERNATIONAL CONTROL FOR PEACEFUL USE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I also have a reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia on the same day. His question concerned the present status of the international discussions directed to the establishment of international safeguards on the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

The discussions referred to have been carried on in the board of governors of the international atomic energy agency, which is an international body operating under the auspices of the United Nations.

At the board of governors' meetings held last March and April a document was provisionally approved by a large majority of the 23 members which embodied proposals for a system of safeguards against the diversion to military use of nuclear materials supplied for peaceful purposes. It will be discussed this coming September by the general conference of the agency in which the entire membership of over 70 nations is represented. The force and effectiveness of any multilateral system of safeguards and the extent to which it can replace the bilateral controls now maintained by Canada and the other major suppliers will, of course, depend upon the general acceptance accorded to the proposal.

Up to the present time some members of the agency, and in particular the Soviet union, have not given the proposed system their full support. It is therefore of the greatest importance that the forthcoming debate at the conference of the 70 nations should result in a general and favourable endorsement of the proposals leading to their unanimous acceptance and early implementation by the board of governors.

Canada is a member of the board of governors and has strongly supported its efforts to develop a generally acceptable system of safeguards. In common with their other supporters, who include the world's major suppliers of nuclear materials, we believe that effective international safeguards, if they can be developed, will make an essential contribution toward the controlled disarmament which continues to be our objective.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DIVORCE BILLS—REPORTED STATEMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister; I regret not having sent him notice of it. My question is based on an article which appears on page 5 of today's Globe and Mail which, among other things, contains some scurrilous remarks by the hon. member for Halifax. But in any event it mentions that the hon. member for Halifax has indicated that the house will sit past the normal time—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Howard: —when the business of this house is disposed of in order to deal specifically with private bills relating to divorce. I wonder whether this statement by the hon. member for Halifax reflects the view of the government on this matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the alleged statement. I can simply say that the house will determine what course it will take, because we intend to complete whatever is before the house legislatively before this house concludes this session.

Mr. Howard: May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder whether the remarks of the Prime Minister in reply to my question relate also to those items appearing under "Public bills and orders" on the order paper.

NATIONAL PARKS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED OFFER OF GARIBALDI PARK FOR OLYMPIC GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister of northern affairs whether he has yet received any written offer from the premier of British Columbia respecting Garibaldi park?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, I have received no communication from the premier of British Columbia concerning Garibaldi park. I have read the press announcement by the premier, however, and I assume that if he is serious in that opinion he will be writing to me.

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN ONTARIO-QUEBEC BOUNDARY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister of mines. Has the minister received any communications from the Cornwall board of trade protesting the recommendation of the hon. member for Laurier that the mid line of the St. Lawrence river be adopted as the Ontario-Quebec boundary, which would give Cameron, Chestnut and other Ontario islands to Quebec as the Cornwall canal was given to the United States?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I have not received any communication of that kind as yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): A supplementary question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, before the supplementary question is put I wish to raise a question of privilege. My question of privilege is this, that no suggestion such as that attributed to me by the hon. member for Stormont was ever made. A question was put to the minister of mines who replied to it, and the reply is on Hansard. But no statement as that suggested by the hon. member for Stormont was ever made by me.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): A supplementary question. No doubt the hon. minister would be prepared to hear representations from the interested parties in the city of Cornwall before a decision is made in this matter?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

AUTOMOBILE PARTS—REPORTED U.S. REQUEST FOR TARIFF CONCESSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Romuald Bourque (Outremont-St. Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce; I apologize for not having sent him notice. He recently received a brief from the Canadian auto parts industry association expressing alarm at the expressed intention of the United States government to ask for additional tariff concessions from Canada and asking him to stand firm against any such request. My question is, has he taken any action on this request?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to take any action, but the matter will be considered very carefully.

GRAIN

WHEAT BOARD REGULATIONS RESPECTING DELIVERIES TO FEED MILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the desirability of enforcing delivery quotas, and the suggestion that the wheat board's enforcement rules may be suspended as a result of the evidence given to the agriculture committee. Can the minister assure the house that regulations of the Canadian wheat board as set forth before the agriculture committee on February 25 are still being applied today and are being enforced in relation to feed mills in this country?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I did not receive notice of this question. I will have to look into this subject and see what the situation is. My understanding is that there has been no change in the regulations of the wheat board at the moment, and the agriculture committee has not yet submitted its report to the house.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Penitentiaries—

161. Administration of the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries including $90,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies as may be approved by the treasury board, $641,516.

Mr. Fulton: Just before the end of the discussion on another item, item 151, last Thursday I was asked by the hon. member for Megantic a question about the number of inmates or prisoners who had been freed under the royal prerogative, and I undertook to obtain the information. However, at the close of the exchange I said:

> I take it the hon. member wishes to know how many pardons, conditional or absolute, were granted in the last fiscal year. I will get that figure and supply it.

On rereading the question asked by the hon. member I have concluded that what he was really concerned about was not the granting of pardons but the number of unconditional releases of inmates from prison under the royal prerogative of mercy as opposed to releases on parole.

During 1959 there were 175 inmates serving sentences under the criminal law of Canada who were released, prior to expiration of sentence, by the Governor General under the royal prerogative of mercy on the recommendation of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Howard: On the item before us, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I do not think even the building of new prisons will in itself accomplish very much in the field of rehabilitation or reform. Even when these new institutions at Valleyfield, Springhill and other places are opened and in full operation there will still be a decidedly large number of inmates in Canadian prisons and we will still be faced with the problem of overcrowding unless this expansion of prison facilities, especially in the medium and minimum security field, is still further extended.

I believe we might consider this subject in the light of the remarks made by the minister and the thoughts he has—perhaps I could even say the hopes he has—in so far as the treatment of narcotic addicts is concerned. I do not differentiate between those who have been confined under the provisions of the narcotic act and those who have not, because efforts must still be made to treat them.

The minister referred to institutional treatment which would be provided, and I assume he had in mind treatment of a psychiatric type rather than physiological treatment, because apparently the major problem in connection with addiction is psychological. I think we shall need to rely on doctors experienced in the psychiatric or psychological field to do the major amount of work in this regard. The mere provision of medium and minimum security prisons in this country will not by itself effect the rehabilitation of this type of prisoner unless it is accompanied by an adequate program of treatment, and at the moment we are faced with a shortage of workers in the important field I have mentioned.

I made some inquiries of the minister in this regard, and the answer I received is printed in Hansard of February 23. I have the original typewritten copy of the reply dated February 23. In any event, I inquired of the minister how many psychologists and psychiatrists are employed on a full-time basis at each of the penal institutions under federal jurisdiction. In reply the minister gave information to the effect that there are a total of 11 psychologists stationed at institutions across the country at Dorchester, St. Vincent de Paul, Kingston, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, and that there are no full-time psychiatrists but that these services are provided on a part time basis at all institutions. In addition there are staff members who are classification officers with some training in psychology and social work who contribute something in this field in conjunction with the professional psychologists.

Unless parliament is prepared to spend more money on the employment of full-time psychologists and psychiatrists there will be little decrease in recidivism, and little improvement in rehabilitation. That is not an original thought but one often expressed by penologists.

Under the present system a person convicted in Ottawa would automatically go to the penitentiary at Kingston, and one convicted in British Columbia would be sent to New Westminster. There is an arrangement for the transfer of prisoners from one penitentiary to another, from maximum security prisons to training schools like that at Collin's Bay.

I suggest that when a person is convicted he be confined during a period in which he would be interviewed by a board consisting of penologists, psychiatrists or psychologists, who would decide to which institution the prisoner should be sent to achieve the maximum degree of rehabilitation and corrective training. Prisoner A, perhaps a first offender, might be sent to a training institution where he could learn a trade that would be valuable to him upon his release. Prisoner B, if not susceptible to learning, could be directed to some other institution where another type of training was available. A deeply disturbed person could be sent to an institution where he would receive the maximum amount of intensive psychiatric assistance.

It was the practice in the past to send prisoners to maximum security prisons with little attempt being made to segregate first offenders from recidivists, from the deeply disturbed or from those convicted of offences involving sexual deviation or perversion. This condition has been aggravated by overcrowding and the lack of full time psychiatric treatment. Some strides have been made in improving the situation, but a great deal more has to be done in this area.

I know the minister and his officials appreciate that it is not enough simply to provide more prisons if there is not an intensive expansion of psychiatric treatment and an enlightened approach. We must convince society to adopt a new approach to the problem. Prisons can no longer be viewed merely as places of isolation and punishment. Without a greater emphasis on rehabilitation and psychiatric assistance it will be another 50 years or more before we make any real progress in this important endeavour.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I note that item No. 161 provides for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, and that this year the estimate shows an increase from $75,000 to $90,000. Would the minister be kind enough to tell us how we have arrived at this increase of $15,000 for this year? I would also like to know whether these societies submit a budget of their needs. If so, what was the amount they suggested for this year, and was any cut made in their request?

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Fulton: The agencies do submit financial statements to us, and they also submit reports on the amount of work they have done for us in the year just concluded. It is on the basis of the work they do, the number of cases they handle, that the division of the total amount authorized is made among the agencies.

With respect to the amount of the increase, I would not suggest that it is proportionate to any amount of work. We recognize the importance of the work done by these agencies for the prisoners and for the correctional system generally, and we are auxious to help them to the greatest extent possible. We have made an increase in each of the last three years. In 1955-56 the amount provided was $40,000; in 1956-57 it was $50,000; in 1957-58 and in 1958-59 it was $60,000. For this year we have increased it to $75,000.

As I say, we are anxious to give as much financial help as we can on the basis of the work done, but the limits of the amounts we can give are set by treasury board. I suppose the answer as to why we arrived at the increase of $15,000 might be said to be that this was all that treasury board would authorize.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise two small matters. One relates to something about which I wrote the minister, namely criticism of the annual report in connection with penitentiaries. I received an answer to the effect that the information carried in those reports was in a sense of a traditional character, and useful. I will not push the criticism again, but I should like to say that this is one of the ugliest and worst edited reports that I have encountered in the government service. I think it is loaded with information that does not need annual reiteration.

In his reply to me the minister indicated that there was information in the report which was very valuable. I quite agree. For example, I would not like to see any of the statistical tables dropped; but I suggest to the minister that the annual reiteration about a cook moving or of some change in the kitchen is not necessary. If this kind of petty administration detail was dropped, or if there was a general synopsis instead of this reiteration in each particular area of the country, we might expect a much better presentation of the statistics.

One of the tables that interests me is that indicating the ethnic background of prisoners. Why could we not have in the reports occasionally a recapitulation of this information back over a number of years? I am shocked when I look at the annual report to see the very direct relationship between educational attainment and incarceration in penitentiaries. On occasion I should like to see in this report historical consideration of this relationship in statistical form, with some kind of analysis. Instead, we get in this report year after year, a repetition of what I consider to be supernumerary details.

I suggest to the minister that he look at some of the other departments of government which have smartened up the editorial work on their annual reports in recent years. If he looks at the annual reports in some kind of perspective and checks them back for four or five years, I do not see how he can be pleased with the ones put out. I see that these reports cost $7,000 last year, and it is estimated that they are going to cost $7,300 this year. It is not much money, but I think we could expect better editorial work for our money than we are getting.

I notice that the provision for the publication of reports of the Department of Justice for the coming year has dropped from $22,000 to approximately $2,500. I cannot very well retrace my steps, but I was quite interested in this and wondered whether it indicated that in the central administration of the department there was a complete revision of this attitude toward publications.

The second point I wanted to touch on related to something brought up recently by the hon. member for Laurier, namely the question of the prison farm being so close to or involved with the metropolitan area of Montreal. In one of our parliamentary committees we had a witness who has had a great deal of experience as a policeman with criminal elements across the country. In offering us some opinions as to the relative criminal milieu at Toronto, Montreal and other places, he made the point that he is always surprised that Montreal is not worse than it is because of this very large prison population feeding into and out of the city and in a sense being part of the climate of the city and the city a part of the climate of the prison. I would certainly gather from his judgment, and the hon. member for Laurier tended to argue the same way, that one of the best steps that could be taken with regard to the Montreal situation in terms of, let us say, criminal health, would be to remove the prison farm or the penitentiary farm from this city and put it in some kind of rural section. I do not know what would be involved in this in terms of expense, but certainly it was brought very close to all of us in that committee who heard this evidence of the close tie and relationship between the penitentiary and the city, and it certainly brought to the mind of those of us from Ontario how fortunate Toronto and Hamilton have been in having Kingston penitentiary or Portsmouth in that section of Ontario.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate what has been said by the hon. member and also by the hon. member for Skeena. Perhaps the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena do not call for a detailed reply at this time. They will be kept in mind as we make our attempts to improve the penitentiary program generally. I can assure the committee that we realize that the best facilities are of no use unless we have trained personnel to manage them and to operate the program. We do have a problem in securing the personnel. I think that is all I should say on that point.

With regard to the annual report, I accept the criticism of the hon. member as something which will require investigation and study to see whether we can improve the report from the point of view of the knowledge it imparts and the convenience of the readers in acquiring that knowledge. However, I would point out to the hon. member something which he has perhaps overlooked. At the present time the Penitentiary Act itself requires that the reports from each institution be included in the annual report of the commissioner of penitentiaries. Maybe this is something we should look at when we revise the Penitentiary Act, but it imposes on us the obligation to include a lot of the detail which my hon. friend claims to be superfluous.

Mr. Howard: May I pose a question or two to the minister based on a matter which is in the detailed section of the estimates. I rather think that some of this information might more properly be referred to under item 162 or item 163, but I wonder whether we might not have a general understanding that we would deal with it all under one item.

We appear to be more concerned with the salvation of the souls of inmates than we are with their rehabilitation and the contribution we can make toward getting them to be better citizens once they are released. I notice on page 230 that eight part time psychiatrists are listed as compared with six last year but there are 17 full time chaplains plus two part time chaplains. I think some of the money provided for chaplains might be directed toward obtaining more psychiatrists and psychologists. In any event, I should like the minister to indicate two things to me if he can. With what regularity or upon what basis do psychiatrists visit prisons? Does this vary from one prison to the other? Do they only attend when asked? Second, will the minister indicate where I can find the reference to psychologists under this vote or under some other vote, as the case may be? How are they classified? Are they called something else?

Mr. Fulton: To deal with the points in the order in which they were raised, may I say I do not want to get into a controversy with the hon. member as to the importance of the chaplain service to the penitentiaries, but I certainly would not accept any suggestion that the chaplain service is not an essential part of the organization and one that is essential to the welfare of the inmates. It may be that the hon. member was being a bit humorous. With regard to the comparison of numbers, I will confine myself to saying that there are chaplains available and frequently we find it difficult to obtain the services of psychiatrists.

The organization of the psychiatric service is on the basis of five half days per week. The psychiatrist attends regularly every morning or every afternoon Monday through Friday. A psychiatrist is also available at any time, of course, for consultation or referral should a special need arise. Psychologists are categorized as rehabilitation officers 7.

Mr. Howard: Are there other rehabilitation officers 7 who are not psychologists? I think there must be.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, there are. The number of psychologists is contained in the answer I gave the hon. member earlier in the session, to which he referred this morning.

Mr. Howard: May I suggest that in the future it would be helpful if the number of psychologists could be indicated in brackets.

Mr. Fulton: We will be glad to consider that.

Mr. Howard: I have one other question relating to page 232 and the further details for construction, improvements and equipment. This matter may also be dealt with in the supplementary estimates, but I should like to ask a question with respect to St. Vincent de Paul. One of the series of questions I asked had to do with the number of cells in penitentiaries which did not contain toilet or wash basin facilities. The answer was that there are 107 in Dorchester penitentiary and 420 in St. Vincent de Paul. In other words, these cells are simply cement encased bare rooms with no toilet facilities whatever; yet inmates have to spend a considerable number of hours in such cells.

I imagine that the present toilet facilities perhaps consist of a bucket. That is what I have been told. Unfortunately I have not had a chance to visit St. Vincent de Paul yet, but I hope to do so. I understand that early in the morning there is a bucket parade for the inmates of these 420 cells without toilet or wash basin facilities, and that the buckets are emptied in some central spot during the morning. What steps are being taken to eliminate cells without toilet or wash basin facilities at St. Vincent de Paul and Dorchester penitentiaries? There are a large number at St. Vincent de Paul and a relatively large number in comparison to the inmate population at Dorchester. There are also a few at Kingston, although the number there is relatively small.

Mr. Fulton: With regard to cells without toilet or wash basin facilities, I am glad to say that the 107 at Dorchester are not now occupied. There has been some slight reduction in the population there so that we do not have to use these cells now. When the move to Springhill is made, which should permanently reduce the population at Dorchester and give us some leeway to carry out works and measures of this kind, it is the intention to strip these cells and use the area for recreation and similar purposes.

With regard to St. Vincent de Paul, I regret that the situation there is not so fortunate. I have to report that the majority, if not all, of these cells are occupied. Because of the physical nature of the building, St. Vincent de Paul represents our worst overcrowding problem at the present time. However, as soon as l'Institut Leclerc is available for occupancy, which will be this fall, we will be able to move men over there and clear out this area. It is the intention to remodel that portion of the building then and use the space as a dormitory. Therefore by the end of this year or by next year, or as soon as it can be physically done, I hope we will not have in either of these institutions cells without toilet facilities; and if we have them I certainly hope it will not be necessary to use them.

Mr. Howard: I have one other thought I should like to express with reference to chaplains. It was not my intention to say they had no place in these institutions. However, I think it will be found that the church attendance of the inmate population is in a much higher ratio compared to total inmate population than is the case with any other group in society outside the penitentiaries. I think many prisoners look upon attendance at church service as a form of recreation, in that they can be free from the restrictions of their cells and chat with their friends and so on. To that extent church service is looked upon as more or less a form of recreation, yet we hope that by association they will also get some spiritual guidance.

Mr. Roberge: Can the minister make a progress report as to the discussions held with the provinces on the matter of taking into the penitentiaries all persons sentenced to serve a year or more?

Mr. Fulton: I am very sorry, but I did not get the full question the hon. member asked.

Mr. Roberge: Last year there was a meeting of the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general of the provinces with a view to changing the law so that all prisoners sentenced to over one year would serve their sentences in a penitentiary instead of a county jail.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct; that conference was in the fall of 1958, and there was agreement on that principle. I have reported before on it. It is a part of the over-all correctional reform program on which the correctional planning committee has been working. The committee presented its report, which is before cabinet for approval in detail at the present time.

The intention is that in the future the whole program, both of physical construction, and of training and rehabilitation, will be based on the federal authority assuming responsibility for all prisoners sentenced to a term of more than one year. However, we have to solve our own overcrowding problem and get our own present responsibilities in satisfactory shape. We will not yet be able to undertake the expanded responsibility this would represent, and the attorneys general have been advised that it will be three or four years before we expect to be in a position to assume this responsibility, but our planning is based on that feature.

Mr. McMillan: Is there an effort made to have all inmates seen by a psychiatrist reasonably soon after their admission, or are they examined only after they have become mentally disturbed and are referred by a medical officer?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, the initial interview is carried out by the classification staff with a psychologist. If there is an indication that the inmate needs psychiatric help, then he is referred to a psychiatrist.

Item agreed to.

162. Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries including compensation to discharged inmates permanently disabled while in penitentiaries, $14,878,797.

Mr. McMillan: There is a reference here to compensation to discharged inmates permanently disabled while in penitentiaries. Does this refer to inmates who have become permanently disabled as the result of sickness? What is the amount of the payment under this item?

Mr. Fulton: It would not cover the case of an inmate disabled through sickness. I am informed that it covers the occasional industrial accident or event of that nature.

Item agreed to.

163. Construction, improvements and equipment, $2,353,840.

Mr. Roberge: In the details for this item there is reference to $1,097,400 for a new institution in Quebec. Is this the Valleyfield institution?

Mr. Fulton: That is l'Institut Leclerc which we expect to have completed this year.

Mr. Roberge: I understand Valleyfield has been completed?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. Valleyfield was a military camp to which we had to make modifications, and that was completed last year.

Mr. Coates: I wonder if the minister could give a report on the situation at the present time at Springhill?

Mr. Fulton: The situation is that construction is nearing completion. All the necessary equipment is on order and some of it has been delivered, while the rest of it is in the process of being delivered. Staff training is nearing completion and we expect, if things go according to plan, to be able to have it ready for occupancy and start transfers within the next two months.

Mr. Coates: How many prisoners is it expected there will be?

Mr. Fulton: Approximately 100.

Mr. Coates: What would be the number of employees during that period?

Mr. Fulton: In the neighbourhood of 35. The actual number will depend on the nature of the program, whether it becomes an industrial training type of program or a farm operation type of program or a combination of both. I cannot give an exact figure for the staff until we determine the type of program that will be carried out.

Mr. McFarlane: Ever since being elected to this house in March, 1958 I have been quite interested in the construction of penitentiaries in western Canada. We have placed our views before the department with regard to the need for penitentaries in British Columbia. We have requested also that serious consideration be given to locating a penitentiary in the city of Fernie. I realize that the length of time taken in reaching a decision is excusable because of the investigation being conducted into our whole penal system. The report of the investigating committee was turned over to the department in January of this year, but we are still waiting for some action by the department. In the meantime the community is endeavouring to carry on, hoping for an affirmative decision to build the penitentiary in Fernie.

In August, 1958, as recorded on page 3201 of Hansard, I brought to the attention of the department the tendency to centralize penitentiaries in the province. Hon. members agree that many of the larger industrial concerns in Canada have found that it does not pay to centralize too many departments in a small area, and I suggested that consideration should be given to spreading the penitentiaries around the province of British Columbia. At that time the need for something to stabilize the economy in Fernie was quite urgent. I mentioned that the mines had closed down almost overnight. In several other instances communities have been advised that the mines will close within two or three years, but in the case of Fernie the mines closed down overnight and the employees were advised there was no more work.

I was advised that a three-man committee would investigate various sites across Canada. I was very disturbed to learn that only one man went to the city of Fernie, and it appeared to me this was just a token effort to show that there was a certain amount of interest in Fernie. In 1959 I also brought this matter to the attention of the department, and at that time the need of the city of Fernie was greater than in 1958. I received the following reply from the minister as recorded in Hansard of June 24, 1959 at page 5100:

> When we get the committee's report we shall be able to come to some final conclusion. As I have assured my hon. friend and others who have written me on behalf of Fernie on previous occasions, the suitability of that location will be most carefully investigated.

That I certainly appreciate, but it is over two years now since I first brought this matter to the attention of the department, and it is six months since the report was filed. I feel it is now time that a decision should be made. We have been depending in this area on certain assurances that we were to be given consideration, but I do not think we should go on forever with such assurances. The case of Springhill was much the same, although my sympathies are with all mining areas, but it was not very long before a decision was reached to build a penitentiary there.

The department has been written to giving further considerations for a correctional institution in the Fernie district, and according to a press report I have here we are still given the chance of having a prison built there. It says that a letter from the Minister of Justice to the Fernie chamber of commerce outlined preliminary plans for correctional institutions in British Columbia and said that he would be giving his personal attention to the question of Fernie being a possible site for further development. I also noticed a press report from Elliot Lake greeting the announcement that a $2 million reform institution was going to be established there. All we are asking is that we be given the same consideration as other distressed areas where mines have closed down.

Mr. Herridge: Before the minister replies I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay East for fighting for his constituents in this respect, and I know he has raised the matter on two previous sessions.

I am interested in this matter because it appears to be government policy to consider areas suffering from depressed economic conditions when they have to consider building new penitentiaries. As the hon. member mentioned, one has been built at Springhill and according to the press one is to be built at Elliot Lake. I think he has made out a good case for one in British Columbia in the Fernie area. I know the circumstances he has related, and I rise to give my wholehearted support as a colleague in another portion of the Kootenays.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the feeling of the hon. member for Kootenay East, and I wish I could give him the assurance he wants and for which he has worked so hard. But I would remind the committee that we are designing a national system of correctional institutions. The program we are developing will be nation wide and the new institutions, wherever and whenever built, have to fit in with the national plan. It has been made clear to all communities which have pressed for the construction of new institutions in their localities that we are not prepared to make a decision as to where a new institution forming part of this pattern should be located until we have the pattern itself developed and approved; because to make such a decision in advance of the establishment of the basis of the whole program might well distort the program.

It is true that the report has been in my hands since January, but in a program of this magnitude neither my department nor the minister is free just to approve this and say "Go ahead". It has to have cabinet approval, and it is a very bulky, far-reaching and important document. When I say bulky it is in two large volumes. I press my colleagues as much as I can, but you cannot just drop everything else and deal with the correctional planning report. I expect that it will be dealt with as early and as expeditiously as possible, and then we will be able to make detailed decisions based on the recommendations of the committee.

I know the situation in Fernie and there are at least a dozen, if not more, similar communities in British Columbia all of whom have been pressing me for a penitentiary to be located in their community. I have not yet been able to satisfy any of them, and I know I am in the position that when a decision is finally made I will have one friend and probably upwards of 99 disappointed enemies. But that will be my responsibility ultimately, and I will have to make the decision.

May I mention one impression which might be created by the hon. member's remarks if I left it uncorrected. It is not our policy to establish reform institutions in depressed areas. Where a decision can be made to establish a new institution or to extend an existing one by the establishment of a satellite, and where the proper factors to be taken into account do make it possible to locate in a depressed locality, then we locate there. But we are planning for the future. Penitentiaries and correctional institutions are long term, almost permanent institutions, and I think it would be very unsound to take as the guiding factor the principle that they should be located in a depressed area, which we certainly hope will only be a temporary problem. We would not have a scientifically worked out program if that was the sole basis for it.

It is true that a new institution has been established at Springhill, where it coincided with an area which had first a disaster and then became a depressed area as the result of the closing down of the mines. But this is not a completely new institution such as the one in western Canada will be. This is a satellite to Dorchester, which was established in accordance with that part of the program which establishes minimum security institutions as satellites to existing institutions and as projects which will relieve overcrowding in existing institutions. It is not the sort of new type of institution which will be built in accordance with the total program when that program is developed.

In British Columbia we have established a satellite to the British Columbia penitentiary, just as we have at Springhill a satellite. The needs were assessed and the areas available were assessed, and the decision was made to establish that one at William Head on Vancouver island, in part because the buildings were available exactly of the type we wanted, and in part because, being a satellite of the present institution, we wanted it to be reasonably close for administrative purposes.

Mr. Speakman: Before the item carries, I was pleased to hear the minister say that this program for building additional correctional institutions is being carried out on a long range basis. However, I would remind the committee that every province in Canada has a penitentiary with the exception of Alberta. While I am not making the claim that we have more people requiring correction in the province of Alberta, I think in the interests of economy the location of this proposed new institution should be considered in the central part of Alberta. It would save the government a considerable amount in travelling, because we have people in Alberta who are sent to penitentiaries in Prince Rupert, or to Vancouver, or even as far as Kingston, which all involves considerable expense to the crown.

I make a plea, of course, on behalf of the area in which I am interested. I sympathize entirely with the hon. member for Kootenay East, but I would remind him that trade conditions with Japan have somewhat improved conditions in his area and therefore some of the urgency of his plea has been lost. I did make representations to the minister, and I frankly admit it, on behalf of central Alberta because of its facilities for an institution, its excellent transportation services and the fact that the province of Alberta does not at this time have a correctional institution.

Mr. Howard: I have two or three other thoughts to mention. I know there are some members of the house who have undertaken on their own to visit some of the prisons, although the number of members who have done so is small. Bearing in mind the saying that one look is worth a thousand reports, in order that members may get a better understanding of the function and operation of the penitentiaries, perhaps on lines similar to those developed by the Department of National Defence, I suggest that something might be done to arrange for small groups of members to visit some of our penitentiaries and prisons under the auspices of the department in order that they may get first hand knowledge and a better understanding of the facilities which exist, including some of the facilities which would be better removed from our prisons such as solitary confinement cells, the crosses and arrangements for lashes and other things of that nature. It would also afford an opportunity of understanding the attitude of the prisoners themselves. I commend this suggestion for study by the minister and his department.

As I have said, I do not think the groups should be too large—perhaps they should not consist of more than four or five members—in order that the visitors might have a better understanding of these things. It might be a couple of years before a large body of members of parliament would visit these institutions, but when they had done so they would be in a better position when the estimates were being considered to determine whether or not a correct approach was being made.

Another thought I have is in the form of a question. I believe that last year an officer or guard at Kingston was arrested for possession of narcotics. Presumably it was felt that he was not using those narcotics himself but was smuggling them into the prison. I wonder whether the minister could indicate what experience his officials have had in so far as attempts to smuggle narcotics into federal institutions are concerned, and perhaps we could be told the experience with regard to alcohol and other things of that nature. Is this practice prevalent or not?

Mr. Fulton: The suggestion made by the hon. member for Skeena with regard to visits by members of parliament is one that should perhaps be studied. The question involved is, of course, whether the government should undertake responsibility for making buses available and paying transportation costs in connection with such visits. That is one of the things that will have to be considered. Also, since in many cases the institutions are close to Ottawa, particularly those at Kingston and Montreal, it is not really a great undertaking for members themselves who are interested, as I know the hon. member is, to visit these prisons on their own initiative, as I know the hon. member has done. However, we could give consideration to the question of visits by organized groups of members. We have no buses in the department, but perhaps the Department of National Defence would make its buses available to us. That is something we shall be glad to consider.

With regard to smuggling narcotics or other articles into prisons, this is something against which we have to be on guard at all times. However, our experience is that safeguards can be made effective and that our measures can be reasonably successful. I do not claim for a moment that narcotics or alcohol are never smuggled into prison, but the exceptions are, I think, rare enough that they do not warrant any cause for concern that our precautionary measures are not proving successful.

There was an incident in British Columbia recently where an ex-inmate had attempted to conceal narcotics. He was apprehended, the cache was discovered, and there is a prosecution now under way. We had another case at Kingston where a guard was involved. Suspicion was aroused, an investigation was made, and as a result the guard has been dismissed from service.

I do not say those are the only incidents which have taken place recently, but when the British Columbia incident took place I did become concerned and asked that both the penitentiaries branch and the R.C.M.P. should let me have a report as to whether there was an increase in the incidence of smuggling of narcotics into penitentiaries. After examining their files and records and making an on the spot check, both organizations informed me that the situation in this regard was normal and that there was no indication either that our methods were unsuccessful or that there was any carelessness on the part of the staff of the institutions.

Mr. Howard: I understood the minister to say with respect to the guard at Kingston that he was dismissed.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Howard: Does the minister know whether any charges were laid with respect to the possession of narcotics?

Mr. Fulton: My recollection is that he was charged but acquitted for insufficiency of evidence or some such reason. I can send the hon. member the information as to the reason, but we would have to look it up in the files.

Mr. Howard: It just seems odd that a person should be dismissed because he was in possession of narcotics, presumably on fairly definite proof that this was the case, and then that the charge against him should be dismissed because of insufficient evidence. It seems to me there is a conflict between these two circumstances, and perhaps the guard would have the right to reinstatement if it was not proved that he was in possession of narcotics.

Mr. Fulton: I can assure the hon. member that such was not the case at all. I said the charge failed for lack of evidence or some technicality. I am not sure what the technicality was. It was certainly not proven that the guard was not in possession of narcotics. The criminal charge did not succeed on some ground, some technical objection which was raised, as I recall it, by the defence. I will obtain information about the precise reason why the charge was dismissed and send the hon. member the details so he may be satisfied that we do not go about unjustly dismissing our guards.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, my only reason for rising is that when my constituents read today's Hansard and find that my colleague, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin, is the only Alberta voice that has spoken out in the house with respect to the proposed new penitentiary—my constituents are highly intelligent; they read Hansard—they may feel we are not fulfilling our duty if we do not participate. I think the minister knows that with respect to the proposed penitentiary in the west, as applied to Alberta, there is only one place for it and that is in southern Alberta.

My colleague from Wetaskiwin talks about travel. What that has to do with the inmates of a penitentiary I do not know. We in the south have railways, we have an excellent climate, we have occupations. We have all the conditions necessary for a splendid site for a penitentiary. I am sincerely persuaded that when the new penitentiary site is selected it will be somewhere in the southern part of Alberta.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I did not get the floor before the hon. member for Medicine Hat. Medicine Hat has nothing to offer compared with what I am going to propose in a few moments. I am speaking here on behalf of the town of Wainwright. I wish to draw to the attention of the committee and the minister the fact that this town is on the main line of the C.N.R., a terminal point where the continental train stops twice daily. Furthermore, the dominion government at present owns a large tract of land around Wainwright. It is used for military purposes part of the year, but we could use this land as a site on which to build the penitentiary. We have an abundant supply of water from the river, natural gas and all the prerequisites for a site for a penitentiary. I am sure the minister and his officials will give Wainwright every consideration when they are selecting the site for this penitentiary in Alberta.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the remarks of my colleagues I can see that every hon. member wants this penitentiary to be located in his constituency. I merely want it to be located in Alberta. I know that in addition to these few spokesmen from whom we have heard today the minister has been badgered by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson and the hon. member for Acadia. When the minister has that fearsome combination of the Horner brothers confronting him I know he will have a difficult task. Therefore I feel I should simply say that I will forgive him and understand if he therefore does not put the penitentiary in my constituency.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister whether there is any danger on his part of being unable to choose between these idyllic communities in Alberta and having to move right out of the province?

Mr. Fulton: The choice is going to be a difficult one, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries—

525. Construction, improvements and equipment—further amount required, $632,250.

Mr. Howard: Would the minister explain the change in this item?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it relates to a new building for women at Kingston to accommodate 50 inmates, with facilities for school room and recreation.

Mr. Howard: Did the minister say school room or pool room?

Mr. Fulton: School room. It is for women.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—

Headquarters administration and national police services—

372. Operation and maintenance, $6,753,539.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, would the minister give us information about the work undertaken by the R.C.M.P. laboratories at Regina, which I believe do all research and analysis work for the force in western Canada? I am informed by officers there that large sums of money are spent in travelling expenses by individuals at Regina because of the necessity of their giving evidence in court. I am also told the time has long since passed when a laboratory should be established in the vicinity of Vancouver. At present the work from British Columbia must be sent to Regina, entailing some loss of time. An even greater loss of time is involved in members of the Regina staff travelling to British Columbia to testify in court. I am told that one or two of them spend more time travelling by plane to courts in British Columbia than they spend in the laboratory at Regina. Would the minister tell us what study has been made of the situation, and whether any thought has been given to the establishment of a laboratory in British Columbia?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the matter of a further laboratory for western Canada is now under consideration. There have been correspondence and discussions with the attorney general and his department in British Columbia with respect to the matter of the establishment of a laboratory, probably in Vancouver. That question is under study.

The hon. member is quite right when he refers to the problem created by the necessity of members of the staff flying from and to Regina to give evidence with respect to the exhibits analysed in our laboratory. As against that, the problem that has to be considered is the considerable expense of starting another laboratory because of the expensive equipment it requires. At the moment I can only say that the matter is under study, and it is under study on the basis that we recognize that there are compelling reasons arguing for the establishment of a further laboratory.

Mr. Howard: My remarks will be more restrained than last year because the situation then obtaining in Newfoundland has changed. I should like to make some comments about the activities of the R.C.M. Police in investigating allegations that a number of Chinese people have come to Canada illegally in the past few years, and the manner in which the investigation was conducted. I am given to understand that in the city of Vancouver, somewhere around the end of May, the R.C.M. Police executed 15 search warrants. Whether those search warrants applied to individuals or establishments I do not know. In any event, the homes and business establishments of the individuals concerned were in effect raided on the grounds that a conspiracy existed to bring Chinese to Canada illegally. I am given to understand that the R.C.M. Police seized documents which obviously had nothing whatsoever to do with any such alleged conspiracy, real or imagined.

Commissioner Harvison is supposed to have made reference to 11,000 Chinese coming to Canada illegally. This statement cast doubt upon the legal position of all members of the Chinese communities in Canada, because reference was made to no specific locality. I do not know what the situation is today, but weeks after the raids were carried out by the R.C.M. Police no indication has been given as to whether any charges would be laid or whether any of the documents seized would be returned. There has been refusal on the part of the R.C.M. Police to say what has happened with respect to the documents seized, and a cloud of suspicion has been cast upon the people involved in the search warrants.

I think some fundamental freedoms of the individual are involved here. The R.C.M. Police should have been more judicious in their activities in this field. They should not have been so flamboyant in their attitude toward the public as to what they were doing. This has cast a cloud over the entire Chinese community in Canada. At the end of the raid no indication was given that any charge would be laid.

Furthermore, I am given to understand that some indication has been given—and this is reported to have come from the commissioner's office, though it may have come from the members of the R.C.M. Police—that the police do not intend to charge all the Chinese who have allegedly entered Canada illegally. If they do not intend to charge all, then this smacks of some sort of discrimination, the picking and choosing of people, if there are any who have come here illegally.

Then there is reference—and this I submit is the sort of red herring that is dragged in occasionally to cloud the issue—in the Vancouver Sun of January 8 to the fact that the R.C.M. Police had reported that red agents or communist agents—the story said "red"—have been brought into the country from China as part of the conspiracy. It seems that the R.C.M. Police are prejudiced toward looking for communists operating in Canada.

Another part of this unfortunate situation is the injudicious use of the R.C.M. Police in these raids and the manner in which the raids were conducted. These raids were widely publicized, and they cast doubt and suspicion upon each and every individual of Chinese origin who has come to Canada in recent years. These things should be cleared up immediately. If there are charges to be laid, lay them as quickly as possible and clear the air of the doubt and suspicion that rest in the minds of those people.

This situation was further aggravated in the city of Prince Rupert. I received a telegram from Mr. Bruce Brown, a lawyer in that city, inquiring what right the R.C.M. Police had to question citizens of Chinese origin about this matter. I checked and discovered that they had no right whatsoever, other than the normal right of a policeman to ask questions which individuals are not obliged to answer. I understand the people were advised accordingly and that they refused to answer the questions. It was not a matter of the R.C.M. Police constables or officers conducting the inquiry in Prince Rupert going to an individual Chinese in his home and telling him privately that he would like to ask a number of questions; it was a matter of asking the members of the Chinese community to report to the police station in the city hall to answer a number of questions.

I have a copy of the questionnaire provided for that purpose. I understand this questionnaire was developed somewhere in the regional offices, and its purpose was to ensure that the well-trained police constables did not miss anything in their interrogation. The information they required, without giving any indication what it was for, was the name and other names, addresses, business address, date and place of birth, occupation, distinguishing marks, tattoo, and so forth. There is reference to whether the person speaks English well or poorly, place and date of entry into Canada, name used at that time. He is asked whether he is a Canadian citizen, the number of the certificate when issued, issued in the name of; name of the sponsor and relationship, his address; whether the individual has a passport; what is the number of the passport; details about wife or wives or husband; about names; place and date of birth; number of children; place of birth of parents, brothers and sisters; production of all documents showing number of names, and so forth; previous address in Canada. If this sort of thing does not smack of the same sort of inquisitorial approach connected with the other raid which was conducted previously, I do not know what it is.

Second, I understand that a visa fraud section has been set up by the R.C.M. Police for which this sort of information is required in a sort of general way, indicating that everybody must answer the questions. This immigration visa fraud section has an unlisted telephone number; at least when you telephone them you find that it is not an R.C.M. Police number, it is another number. They do not answer by saying "R.C.M. Police"; they answer by saying "Hello" or something of that nature. If this is some sort of a secret organization that has been established in this regard I think the Chinese people should insist on their rights and refuse to answer any such questions, especially when they are asked to come down to the police station, as they were in the city of Prince Rupert, in order to be asked for information of this nature, namely whether a person has a passport; what other names he has; what information he has about brothers, sisters, parents, children, wives and husbands and all the other relatives that an individual may have. I think this is another of the erroneous steps the R.C.M.P. have taken in dealing with this question.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this item, which concerns the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Along with every other Canadian I am proud of the record of the force; not only their record on the television screen, though I have no particular complaint to make about that, but their record in history and the contribution the force has made to the growth, development and security of our country. The police, as is the case with every other police force, often have unpleasant duties to perform. No doubt our R.C.M.P. have their share of these. They also have the responsibility under the government for certain security duties which are not likely to make them very popular, but as far as my own experience goes I cannot imagine security police, doing the kind of things that have to be done and conducting these operations more fairly and discreetly and with a greater regard for the rights and liberties of the subject than our own security officers of the R.C.M.P.

Therefore, feeling as I do, and I think most Canadians feel the same way, we must all be very sensitive to any kind of unfavourable publicity that may attach to the force. There was unfavourable publicity a year or so ago. I am not going into that now because I think I would be out of order in any event, but it resulted as we know, in the resignation of the commissioner under circumstances which I think were regretted by everybody. This perhaps gives me the opportunity to pay my respects to the new commissioner, who I know will be a worthy successor to a long line of distinguished Canadians who have held that post.

The hon. member who preceded me referred to the unfavourable publicity which the R.C.M.P. has been getting in connection with one matter, that of Chinese immigration. There is no doubt that when announcements are made on a matter like this by the R.C.M.P. or by somebody speaking for the R.C.M.P. there will not only be publicity, but in a situation such as this there will be controversial publicity. I think that is unfortunate and regrettable. In my view the original announcement by the R.C.M.P., as reported by the Canadian Press on May 24, was regrettable in that such an important statement, which was bound to have repercussions and create controversy, should have come from someone authorized to speak for the government. The matter could then have been discussed on the floor of the house, because parliament was sitting. But when the commissioner makes an announcement in terms which suggested that 11,000 Chinese entered Canada illegally during the last ten years, that is bound to lead to misunderstanding and controversy, especially as in this case there has been no subsequent information that I have been able to secure from any governmental source which would confirm that that figure was any more than an estimate.

The announcement also included other things which were bound to create uneasiness in a segment of our population which, by an announcement of this kind, would feel itself to have been put under suspicion. There was another story in the Ottawa Citizen a few days later attributed to the commissioner of the police which dealt with the same matter; in fact it almost seems like the same story. These announcements have created a situation where the police have been brought into public controversy, and that is something which I think is regrettable.

The reaction and feeling in a certain section of our population—I am referring primarily to the Chinese section of our Canadian population—have been increased by statements made by a representative of the police on television. These statements may be perfectly accurate; I am in no position to judge, but having seen one program I feel that it was not the kind of program to keep the R.C.M.P. out of controversy.

The result of all this has been what one could have expected. Chinese Canadians have understandably felt resentful that some of the implications of these statements as having conveyed a reflection on the Chinese community as a whole, although I am sure not by design on anybody's part. As the minister knows, there have been complaints and representations by citizens of the Chinese race in Canada as a result of the statements made and their implications, and the R.C.M.P. have been brought into controversy. I am not going into the details of these submissions, but they have been made to the government. The minister has replied to some of the statements made, denying them, but the statements are on the record and they do include what I think are unfortunate references to the R.C.M.P., references of a kind that underline my own view, which I am sure is shared by others, that the police should be very careful not to become involved in the kind of situation which may result in that type of submission.

One statement I have here is found in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 4. In it the Chinese community centre association say they resent strongly the widespread raids by the R.C.M.P. into their houses and places of business and so on. These have been denied by spokesmen on behalf of the government, but it seems to me that if the R.C.M.P. had refrained from making the original statement about 11,000 illegal entries they might have been in a stronger position in respect of subsequent statements and submissions that were made which reflect on the conduct of the police.

I should like to ask the minister, as I think the hon. member who preceded me also did, to give the committee some information regarding the activities of the R.C.M.P. in checking into illegal entries from Hong Kong. In answer to questions in the house the minister has already dealt with some aspects of this matter. In one of his statements he said that they, meaning the government, were making use of the service of some members of the Hong Kong police force who have been sworn in as special members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He went on to say that they had been very carefully instructed in Canadian police methods and in the law regarding the carrying out of investigations and the questioning of individuals.

Now, all that is quite true, but the actions of the police in this connection, assisted by police officers from Hong Kong, however carefully instructed, are bound to create and have created in some quarters a feeling of resentment and anxiety. Perhaps the minister could take advantage of this opportunity to enlarge upon statements he has already made. This may serve, I would hope, to remove some of this anxiety and also to remove any reflections which may have been cast on a large body of Canadians. He might also deal with the question of the desirability of any representative of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police making a statement of the kind made, no doubt, in good faith and with good intentions, but which in connection with a matter of this importance and of such a controversial nature should come from a spokesman of the government itself.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to deal with this matter and give to the committee information in addition to that which has been given from time to time both by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and myself in the house.

I should like to clear up one matter at the outset. I can only assume it was inadvertent on the part of the Leader of the Opposition, but I think it was an unfortunate and regrettable inadvertence, when he kept using the word "announcement", implying that the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other police officers had made announcements, as it were, of their own volition concerning what had taken place. It has been pointed out before that this is not correct. I think it is most regrettable that the Leader of the Opposition insisted on talking about the police making announcements.

What happened was that the moment the search warrants were executed across Canada, this matter was known to the press. Such a large scale operation could not be kept secret. The intention to carry out this investigation had been announced in this house in the proper manner by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration as long ago as January of this year. There is no question but that the announcement came from the quarter from which it should properly come, the minister responsible, whose department made the request for the investigation of this situation.

As I say, the search warrants were executed and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration informed the house on May 24, 1960, at page 4176 of Hansard, that the operation being carried out was a natural outcome of the investigation which she announced in the house on January 14. The investigation was announced, therefore, by the minister on January 14, and on May 24 the minister advised the house that the search warrants were being executed in connection with that investigation. There is no question about where the announcement came from; it came from the proper place, from the minister responsible for initiating the inquiry.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the press are interested in an operation of this magnitude, and the press immediately communicated with the commissioner and with the commanding officers at the various centres in which the search warrants had been executed. Here is where a somewhat difficult situation arises, it is true. If the police refuse to answer any questions from the press, radio or television commentators, then of course they are accused of carrying on a secret police type of operation, and the government is accused also of attempting to hide the facts concerning what the police are doing. Instructions have been given, not only by this government but I know by my predecessors, that the police are not to take the attitude that they cannot talk with newspapermen and television men. They have to exercise their discretion as to what they may say. If, of course, they refuse to talk they are accused of carrying on a secret police operation, and when they do talk then they are accused of making announcements.

I say again it is most unfortunate that the Leader of the Opposition used the word "announcement" and persisted in using it, in the light of the explanation I have given in this house, when the Leader of the Opposition was here, that the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police did not make an announcement that there were 11,000 Chinese suspected of having entered Canada illegally. I explained, when the Leader of the Opposition was here, that the commissioner was interviewed by the press and asked whether or not the figure of 11,000 was correct. He said, "It is not my figure, but I would not quarrel with it". I think those are the words or very close to the words used. I have told the Leader of the Opposition in this house previously that the commissioner did not announce that there were 11,000 illegal entrants. The commissioner was asked a question when this figure was used, and he said it was not his figure but he would not quarrel with it. At no time have the commissioner or other officers of the police made announcements about this matter. I do hope that the Leader of the Opposition, when he refers to this matter in the future, will be accurate; because it is an unfair accusation to make against the police that their responsible officers make announcements that should come from the government. This has not been the case, and I trust will not be the case.

Now, with regard to this whole operation, Mr. Chairman, it must be borne in mind that we are investigating a racket. As a result of the execution of the search warrants we have evidence that confirms what was a firmly held suspicion, namely that there was an extensive racket in the illegal entry of Chinese into Canada, and that it was an organized racket. Charges most certainly will be laid just as soon as that can be done. But it must be borne in mind that there was a vast quantity of documents seized. The great majority of these documents are in Chinese and require translation. Then they require assessment and analysis and cross-checking to ascertain exactly the extent and ramifications of the racket and the organization.

This is a tremendous job and will take a great deal of time. I am not, therefore, in a position to state categorically how long it will be before charges are laid. But I state now that there is no doubt charges will be laid and that the evidence, in our view, substantiates completely the statement that there was an extensive, organized racket in Chinese immigration.

When you are dealing with this type of investigation and people of this type, it is only to be expected that every means will be used by those who have been operating an illegal racket to prejudice the investigation and to prejudice, in the eyes of the public, the people carrying out the investigation. In saying this I am not asking for any unusual or special sympathy for the police. The police are realists. They know this is one of the features of their work that they do run into from time to time when they are involved in an operation of this kind. They are exposed to criticism, and much of that criticism will not be accurate but will be designed to prejudice the police in the eyes of the public.

I do ask members, therefore, to bear in mind the fact that some of the things that are said are said obviously for this purpose. I do not mean they are said by members here, but some of the things that have been said outside have been said because nothing would better serve the interests of the racketeers than to have the Hong Kong police withdrawn. In order that this might be done we are told the Hong Kong police are brutal; that they have been carrying out their investigations and questioning in an entirely improper manner. We have investigated all allegations and have found them to be completely unfounded.

Therefore it is obvious that the allegations have at least one motive; that is, to try and force us, by creating prejudice against the use of the Hong Kong police, to discontinue their services. We have no intention of discontinuing their services, because their services are essential and are proving extremely valuable in assisting to uncover this racket.

The same thing is true with respect to the charges which have been made against the R.C.M. Police themselves in the course of carrying out these investigations. If the police could be prejudiced in the minds of the public, then the government presumably would tell them to take the pressure off, to ease up on the investigations and let the whole thing die. We have investigated every charge made against the R.C.M. Police and have found there is no allegation which need be taken seriously, except one relating to the use of the questionnaire, and I will deal with that separately. But as to the conduct of the investigations, the allegations that people have been haled out of their beds and homes in the small hours of the morning and practically dragged down to headquarters for questioning are entirely unfounded, and I say that on the basis of the most careful check on the circumstance about which the allegation was made. I am referring to a case in Montreal.

With respect to Prince Rupert and the use of the questionnaires, it is true the questionnaires were prepared, and they were prepared for the guidance primarily of the R.C.M. Police themselves. I am sure the hon. member for Skeena, who raised the matter, will appreciate that where you are dealing with a nation-wide investigation into the operations of an organized racket which itself is nation-wide, then it is essential that all information should be collated. In order to make certain that the operation is successfully and expeditiously carried out it is essential that the same particulars be received in each case, that the same questions be asked of each person being questioned. It was for this purpose that a form of questionnaire was prepared for the use of the police officers in conducting their interviews.

In Prince Rupert, as in other cities, the R.C.M. Police are carrying out investigations concerning this matter, and they have been provided with the form. The form was designed at headquarters as a guide for the use of members of the force during the questioning of persons who are voluntarily prepared to give a statement as to their status in Canada, and in carrying this out obviously some uniformity is a necessity. That is the purpose of the form.

As far as Prince Rupert is concerned, my information is that 11 members of the Chinese community were interviewed. Some of these were merely asked for advice as to the best approach to make to the local Chinese. Of the 11, only six were interrogated and only one supplied the answers and signed the form. The form was also shown by members of the force to the legal adviser of the local Chinese community. It is not a secret document with which they were suddenly confronted and asked to sign. Only one signed it, and only six were interrogated on the basis of the questionnaire.

I have made it clear, in case there was any lack of clarity, that the questionnaire is not to be used for the purpose of getting the Chinese to sign but only as a guide to interrogators in asking their questions.

Some objection seems to be taken to the fact that we are interviewing Chinese at all. As I say, we ask them if they are prepared to give information voluntarily; if they are not, then that is the end of the matter. But how could we conduct an investigation if we did not interrogate people and ask them for information? Of course we have to interrogate them, and interrogate them all across Canada, in some cases on the basis of information arising out of the documents seized and in other cases in the hope that we will get information from them which will enable us further to identify and establish and prove, and bring home the proof, that individuals are involved in this illegal racket. The interrogations must continue, but I again assert that every case of complaint which has been made has been investigated and will continue to be investigated.

I do not take the position that a mistake can never be made, and I am prepared to investigate every complaint that we receive. If there should be improper conduct we will deal with it; but these complaints so far made against the R.C.M. Police and the Hong Kong police, with the exception of the one incident regarding the use of the questionnaire where a Chinese was actually asked to sign it—and that was not the intention for which it was designed—have proved to be completely unfounded.

The suggestion was made that there is concern and doubt in the minds of the Chinese community. I regret profoundly, in the same way as has been expressed by my colleague the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, that this investigation should have proven necessary. I regret profoundly that a substantial number of Chinese Canadians are involved in one way or another, and I can quite understand the reason for their general concern.

But on one point there should be no doubt, and I have done what I can to remove the doubt from the minds of those with whom I have discussed it by way of interview, delegation or in statements I have made in the house, and that is that there will be prosecutions. This racket does exist; we have evidence that it exists, and we have evidence on the basis of which I am assured with confidence that charges can and will be laid. So there should be no doubt in the minds of the community on that point; guilty persons will be charged and prosecuted.

I refer now to persons who are guilty of operating an illegal racket. I am satisfied that when that is established and the Chinese community know that so far as we can we will get these racketeers off their backs, then the feeling of the Chinese community will be one of relief and satisfaction.

In this connection I want to read an extract from a paper entitled "Our Sunday visitor", the issue of June 19, under the heading "Chinese suffer 70 year old tragedy". There appear these two opening paragraphs:

> When mounted police recently began raids on Chinese homes and offices across Canada, it was the latest act in a tragedy that began more than 70 years ago. The police were looking for evidence to convict blackmailers who have played monstrously on the urge of the Chinese to come to an empty land across the Pacific and the recoil of the whites who got here first.
> The crime committed was not merely one of illegal entry—that is little more than a technical fault. The real evil has been the ruthless exploitation of Chinese dreams. The blackmailers have been cruel and greedy and have grown rich over the years.

Our investigations to date establish that point. We have, as I said, gathered a substantial amount of evidence to date as a result of the documents we have seized. We are also receiving confessions from Chinese. We are now receiving the co-operation of the Chinese community in this investigation, and it is our hope that co-operation will be even more forthcoming. It is also my belief that it will be, when charges are laid and when it becomes evident in the clearest manner possible that our intention is to convict racketeers and not to prosecute or harass people who have, in many cases, committed no more than a technical offence many years ago. That has already been made clear by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in her statement, and I think it will become more abundantly clear when the prosecutions commence. Then I believe we shall receive increasingly the co-operation of the best elements of the Chinese community so we can clear up this racket and dispose of it once and for all.

The hon. member for Skeena referred in addition to a couple of other matters. He said it had been reported in the Vancouver Sun that the R.C.M.P. had said that red agents had come into this country under cover of this illegal immigration. I am advised that this is not correct. The R.C.M.P. made no such statement, because they have no information of that nature. I am sorry the story was not picked up and contradicted immediately it appeared in the paper. I am informed also that the police never said they were concerned about red agents coming in during the course of this illegal racket.

The hon. member also expressed concern arising from a statement which he said the R.C.M.P. had made that some people would be prosecuted while others would not. He said this indicated to him that there might be discrimination. May I point out that the decision as to prosecution is not one for the R.C.M.P. to make. There are two things involved here. First there is the operation of an illegal racket. There is no question but that everyone concerned and exposed there will be prosecuted. The other matter is the situation of those who came into this country under false identities. The decision whether to prosecute in these particular cases is not one for the R.C.M.P. It is one for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and the minister has made her stand clear as far as the Chinese are concerned who were what I might call innocent passengers in this vehicle. We are after those who operated the vehicle itself. The decision as to prosecution in individual cases will be made by that department.

I think that covers most of the points raised. While I very definitely want to leave in the mind of the committee no possibility of misunderstanding as to our intention to continue this investigation and press it to the limit of every resource at our disposal, and to prosecute those who are thus exposed—I want to make that very clear so the racketeers will not be able to tell the innocent Chinese, "You had better keep quiet, because nothing is going to come of this"—I want also to assure the Chinese community that something is going to come of this, because to the best of our ability we want to get these racketeers off their backs. I want to assure the Chinese community of our deep sympathy that they should be involved in this situation, and of our desire to clear it up so they can go about their lives without fear or worry.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has taken exception to my using the word "announcement". I used that word not in any sense to mean a formal, voluntary statement by the R.C.M.P. If that is the meaning the minister has given to it, I can understand his feeling and I am very glad to withdraw the word "announcement". But the press is not as skilled in semantics as the minister is, because whatever may have been the circumstances surrounding the statements made by the R.C.M.P. in connection with the matter, they have been referred to in the press as statements; statements at a press conference, if you like, but nevertheless statements from the R.C.M.P., as the first statements which were made following the announcement last January, they led to the kind of publicity which caused so much trouble. This was due mainly to the use of the figure 11,000.

Let me justify what I have just said when I spoke about statements. The Canadian Press story, which is the one that circulates from coast to coast, under a dateline of May 24, reads:

> R.C.M.P. Commissioner C. W. Harvison estimated that the ring made it possible for about 11,000 Chinese to enter Canada illegally during the last 10 years. This figure represents more than half the 21,000 Chinese admitted in that period.

That was the original story. That was the first time numbers were used, as far as I know. If you like, that is not an announcement, but it is a statement made by the commissioner in reply to a question and confirming that 11,000 Chinese had entered Canada illegally.

On June 2 a story appeared in the Ottawa Citizen purporting to be an interview with the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. Asked whether he agreed with the estimate that between 50 per cent and 85 per cent of Chinese immigrants had used fraudulent documents, he said—and this is in quotation marks—

> I think that 85 per cent is probably a little high. Our evidence indicates the majority came in that way.

So the information that came from the R.C.M.P. in the form, if you like, of answers to questions was bound to be made public once it confirmed, if it did not volunteer, the information that 11,000 Chinese had entered this country illegally.

I have a great many other clippings on this matter in which occur such phrases as "the commissioner said" or "the commissioner stated". One from the Montreal Star of June 22 says "The news from R.C.M.P. headquarters that 11,000 Chinese—" and so on. Therefore I think my point is a valid one. If the R.C.M.P. as a force is to remain aloof, as we think it should do, from a controversy of this kind, then it should not make through its spokesmen statements which are bound to be controversial and, indeed, sensational.

The minister said no statement was made by any representative of the R.C.M.P. with regard to the security aspect of illegal entry. It is just as well that the minister is able to deny that, as I think he has done before, because here again in this story in the Ottawa Citizen the commissioner is reported as replying to a question put to him on this subject. This story, dated June 2, contains the following paragraph. The commissioner was asked if it would be fair to assume that any type of security risk could have been included in the illegal flow of immigrants, and his answer is given, in quotation marks, as follows:

> "Yes, because of the high percentage it is obvious any could have been schooled for any design in seeking entry."

The point I am trying to make, and I think it is a valid one, is that if the R.C.M.P. is to be kept out of these controversies, statements of this kind are not the best way to bring about that desirable result. The minister said that the R.C.M.P. as a force has the responsibiilty for deciding whether to give information or not.

Mr. Fulton: Whether to answer questions or not.

Mr. Pearson: As a principle, of course, I do not take exception to that, because there will undoubtedly be times when information should legitimately be given to the press by the R.C.M.P. But this kind of information, which converted what up to that time had been a not very sensational announcement by a representative of the government into something quite sensational because of what amounted to confirmation of the figure given of 11,000 illegal immigrants, is bound to cause controversy. When a statement of that kind is supplemented by television interviews, then it seems to me that the force is being brought unnecessarily into a controversial situation and acquiring a kind of publicity which will not do it any good.

Those of us who are anxious that this should not happen to the R.C.M.P. have, I think a legitimate reason to regret that in this case it did happen. Our quarrel is not with what is being done. The minister has made a good case for the necessity of taking action of the kind he has indicated. Our quarrel is with the way it was done and with the publicity that was attached to it and which brought into the matter the R.C.M.P. itself.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think in his closing remarks the Leader of the Opposition has expressed a proper concern for the position of the R.C.M.P. in connection with publicity of this kind. On that issue I am quite prepared to say there is a concern that it is wise and useful to discuss. What I objected to earlier was the form of appearing to suggest that the R.C.M.P. were volunteering statements and making announcements.

There are just one or two further impressions in this regard that it is still necessary to clear up before we deal with the issue itself of whether or not the police should answer questions of the press. The impression has been given—and I think I can readily understand how it might have been received—by the Leader of the Opposition, that the commissioner held a number of press meetings, held a press conference or gave a series of answers to questions by the press over a considerable period. That is not the case. The commissioner did not hold a press conference at all, as a matter of fact. On the very day the search warrants were executed, quite contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition said, it became a sensational story. It became a sensational event with the executing of search warrants all across Canada. The commissioner's office was deluged with phone calls from the press and so were the local divisional offices, I am told.

The press knew about it. They regarded it as sensational, because an operation of this type had never taken place in Canada before. It was not sensational because of what the commissioner said but it was sensational because of what happened. The press knew there was a big story here, and that knowledge could not be kept from them. The commissioner of the police was then faced with this question. Here is a big sensational story; are we going to keep mum about it and not answer questions and therefore leave the whole thing to speculation, or will we answer questions where it is proper for us to do so on the basis of giving factual information?

The decision taken was that the latter course would be followed. I think, on balance, that was a proper decision. From hindsight one might now say it would have been safer to decide not to say anything. If anyone holds that view in this particular case he certainly could make a strong argument that it would have been safer not to say anything, but I think the wise and proper decision at the time was that in view of the widespread interest in the story and the unusual nature of the circumstances the answers that could properly be given should be given.

When you analyse the answers you will find that they were not widespread or sensational in themselves. There were not a repeated number of interviews. The Leader of the Opposition has referred to a large number of articles. The hon. gentleman himself, if he stops to think about it, I believe will realize that this always happens when the Canadian Press gets a story that is of national interest. The story is repeated all across Canada in the first place and it is frequently picked up by other papers and rerun as much as several days later.

Mr. Speakman: And elaborated upon, too.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, and elaborated upon, as the hon. gentleman just said. Therefore the story of one interview with the commissioner creates the impression that a tremendous number of interviews were held on separate occasions, which is not the case at all.

I also want to say that there was only one television interview about which we have information, only one appearance on television by any officer of the R.C.M.P. It is therefore quite incorrect to leave the impression that there were widespread interviews on television and widespread appearances by R.C.M.P. officers.

The one television interview was held in Vancouver. In view of what has been said about it I feel I should put the interview on the record, because the impression has been created that the officer who appeared on that interview made sensational statements, gave answers and facts which were sensational, and in effect divulged information he should not have divulged.

I think when I read the interview with this officer hon. members can judge for themselves that great discretion and judgment were exercised and that he answered no questions that he should not have answered and gave no information that he should not have given. Perhaps I should not give the name of the officer so it will not appear on the record, although if anyone wants to inquire I have no objection to giving it personally. The interview in question and answer form was as follows:

Q. Can you give us some idea of the extent of the raid carried out here in British Columbia?

A. All of the searches we conducted were done in the greater Vancouver area and amounted to approximately fifteen business establishments and homes.

Q. Have any arrests been made?

A. No arrests.

Q. Are any arrests forthcoming?

A. That would depend upon the outcome of our investigations here.

Q. If no arrests were made what was the purpose of these raids?

A. The purpose was to secure documentary information and evidence.

Q. What type of documents would be seized?

A. All what is called, what are called coaching papers, passports, visas.

Q. Is the investigation completed?

A. No I expect this will go on for some considerable time, until we have covered all facets of the investigation.

Q. Then does this mean that we can expect more of these raids to come in the future?

A. That would depend upon the information and the evaluation of information we are obtaining now.

Q. Do you use undercover men in this operation?

A. Not in the true sense of the word undercover. We have the assistance of the Hong Kong police plain clothes members for the purpose of translation and communication with any of the Chinese people, with whom we would deal.

Q. Are they still working in this role?

A. Yes they are.

Q. Can you give us some idea of the size of this investigation?

A. The investigation is practically Canada-wide embracing the cities of Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal. There have been for example, 20,000 names screened initially and narrowed down to approximately four or five hundred, on which there is intense investigation.

Q. Have you any indication at this time when the entire investigation may be completed?

A. That is hard to say and could depend on the progress and the outcome of the examination of the material obtained through the searches.

Q. Have you found any evidence of slave labour conditions in British Columbia where people have been brought into the country illegally and intimidated to work for substandard wages and in substandard conditions?

A. This again can be more clearly answered when our investigation is complete in so far as it links with British Columbia. It is quite possible that many of these people have been intimidated and have been held under obligation to those who have arranged their entry, their illegal entry in Canada.

Q. Would you say that this is the work of a large syndicate or a large single syndicate? Or is it the work instead of smaller groups working independently?

A. Well, that will be better revealed after the complete investigation but in so far as the present is concerned I would say it is the work of a considerable number of groups some of which may be operating together and others operating on an individual basis.

That was the full extent of the television interview, and that was the only television interview. I think it would be certainly showing a wisdom after the event which is more than normal to say now that it was improper or unwise to have held that interview. If there had been refusal to answer questions speculation would have gone on, and in addition the police would have been in the position of refusing to co-operate and give factual interviews to television correspondents.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Just one other point with which I should like to deal. It is a serious matter and should be dealt with seriously. I refer to the reference to the question of red agents. My statement to the hon. member for Skeena was that I was advised that the police had at no time said, as I understand was reported in the Vancouver Sun, that red agents had come in under cover of the illegal entry scheme.

With regard to the question asked of the commissioner and which he answered, he has assured me that his clear recollection is that he was asked whether it was possible that communist agents might have come in in the large number of entries, many of them illegal, and that his answer was that it was possible, yes, but that we had no information that it had actually taken place. That was the extent of his answer. Of course it is possible, with the large number of Chinese who have come in and with the large number of illegal entries, that communist agents may have been among them; but the police have not said it is so and we are not conducting this investigation by attempting to put it on the basis of a red hunt or anything of that sort at all.

Mr. Pearson: May I just deal with two points raised by the minister in a serious way in replying to what I said. In so far as the reason for and the background of the somewhat sensational publicity that this matter has received are concerned, I still think that was due in large part to the statement made in what was called an interview—I do not know whether it was an interview or not—by the commissioner that "our evidence indicates the majority came in that way". He was there referring to the majority of Chinese immigrants in the last 10 years, which would make the figure of 11,000 a reasonable one. Once that figure was given out, how could publicity of this kind be avoided? Surely the minister would agree that it is unfortunate that this publicity should be attached to a statement, even an answer to a press inquiry, made by the commissioner.

I am not criticizing the commissioner. I know what newspapers can do to statements of this kind. I have some headlines for which the commissioner is not responsible; but once you get into this situation you may be asking for exaggeration and trouble. I think we can preserve the R.C.M.P. from that kind of thing. It would perhaps be better for everybody, including the force, that when statements of this kind are made—the press has the right to information—they should be made by representatives of the government and not by the police.

So far as the broadcast is concerned, I do not want to give the impression that there was a lot on television. I saw one broadcast. It was a national program; therefore it went across the country. I do not take issue with what the officer of the R.C.M.P. said on this occasion. But it seems to me that when an investigation of this seriousness is being made, when we are in the middle of that investigation it might have been desirable to keep an R.C.M.P. officer off the screen and from talking about the investigation which was being conducted. However responsibly he may have discussed it right after he finished speaking there was a spokesman for the Chinese community who took issue with the R.C.M.P. in this matter. That, I think, was undesirable in the circumstances. This is the only point I am trying to make, Mr. Chairman; I think it is a valid one.

Mr. Speakman: The Leader of the Opposition is, of course, making a great to-do about implied statements. I think this is shameful when you consider the fact that in Canada we have one of the finest forces of its kind in the world. Every hon. member has a duty to uphold its reputation.

An hon. Member: He said it to protect it.

Mr. Speakman: He continues to imply that that these statements have been made.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I am implying nothing. I have read quotations from newspapers attributed to the police which have not been denied by the minister. Perhaps the hon. member should not be too excited about it.

Mr. Speakman: Of course the Leader of the Opposition believes everything that appears in the press, but he never inquires into the background.

Mr. Howard: I did not want to get involved in this controversy between the hon. member for Wetaskiwin and the Leader of the Opposition, but it does seem that every time the hon. member speaks in this house he starts out by using the word "shameful".

Mr. Speakman: I have had a lot of lessons from you.

Mr. Howard: A few moments ago the minister said that a substantial number of Chinese Canadians are involved in this thing one way or another. Will the minister tell us what he meant by "substantial"?

Mr. Fulton: I think the words speak for themselves. I am not going to give a figure because we have not got all the evidence gathered and analysed yet. For just that reason the commissioner did not give a figure, though he was asked about a figure. Incidentally, my clear recollection and knowledge is that figures of this order were being talked about openly. The press certainly were using this figure of 11,000 in their conversation before the warrants were executed on May 24; indeed ever since the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration made her announcement in January, very substantial figures of this order were being talked about, and it was in that context that one of the press men asked the commissioner, "Is it as high as 11,000?" And he said, "That is not my figure, but I would not quarrel with it". It was a figure commonly being mentioned.

With respect to the actual question asked, as to what I meant when I said "substantial numbers are involved in this in one way or another", I think these words have a perfectly clear meaning and I am not going to give a figure. We cannot give a figure. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration refused to give a figure. We will not be in a position to give figures until we have all the information before us.

Mr. Howard: I thought what the minister meant by "substantial" was what is meant by the use of the word under the Combines Investigation Act, but that is another matter.

I should like to deal briefly with the questionnaire. My complaint here is not that a questionnaire was necessary as a guide to the R.C.M. Police in eliciting information, so that when they got the information they would use the same questions all across the country and compile the results afterwards and come up with something worth while. I think it is necessary that such a method be used, but the difficulty which resulted in Prince Rupert—and I think the R.C.M. Police prejudiced themselves rather than anybody else prejudicing them—arose from the fact that an individual did in fact sign a piece of paper on which this information was contained.

People of Chinese extraction, especially those who have not been here too long, have certain attitudes. They group themselves together, as other people would do in a strange country, and are reluctant to append their signatures to anything. To their way of thinking a document is an official piece of paper and if they put their name or anybody else's name on it, it means that they are signing something official. In addition, a number of these people were asked to go down to the police station to answer questions. This indicated to them that some kind of full-fledged inquiry was being conducted and that these individual Chinese persons had to give the information requested. They thought they were obliged and forced to answer some of the questions when in fact that was not the case. They are not obliged to answer any questions whatsoever, although if proceedings were taken under section 11 of the Immigration Act there would be some obligation on the part of the individual to answer those questions. The manner in which the questionnaire was used, the attitude or the approach of the R.C.M. Police, in fact almost forcing people to come down to the police station and requiring one person to sign such a document, prejudiced the R.C.M. Police.

In the back of the minds of the people of Prince Rupert still lurks another matter. Those who recall the attitude of a number of people in Prince Rupert toward the R.C.M. Police will recollect that two or three times over the past few years there have been some difficulties between the police and the people of Prince Rupert. The R.C.M. Police have been involved in skirmishes, antagonisms and things of that nature. Knowledge of this background is still there; it has not been overcome. On top of that undercurrent which still exists in the minds of some people there is the use of this questionnaire and the manner in which it stirred up those antagonisms which would be there naturally anyway. In this instance I think the R.C.M.P. did more damage to themselves in attempting to elicit this information than anybody else could possibly do.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, while what the hon. member has said has been expressed calmly I think it could perhaps create misunderstanding and an unfortunate impression if we do not get the matter into perspective again. It is true that there was a misuse of the questionnaire in this one case. That was a mistake. It has been rectified, and it has been made clear that the questionnaire was not for that purpose. That was a mistake which was quite easy to make, but it has been corrected.

With regard to the larger issue of whether the police should invite people to come to headquarters for questioning and interviewing, or whether there is anything here which is in any way suggestive of strong arm tactics, let us just consider the position for a moment. These interviews are necessarily lengthy. All the questions have to be translated through an interpreter and the answers have to be translated and written down. My hon. friend knows the Chinese people and knows that these interviews take a long time.

Are the police to go to a Chinese person and stand in the middle of his restaurant or laundry for two hours interviewing him with an interpreter present? That would be an imposition on the individual concerned. Similarly, should the person concerned have two large police officers in the front room of his home while an interview is conducted? No; the normal, courteous and sensible thing to do is to say, "Will you please come down to headquarters? We would like to interview you and ask you some questions." For this to be represented as something which either strikes fear into the heart of the Chinese or is used to compel him to come to headquarters and thus create a bad impression in connection with the way the police are operating just does not seem to be reasonable when you think of what the alternative would be. The alternative would be for the interview to take place in the man's restaurant or store over a period of two hours with the public hearing all the questions and answers, or else to impose on the man in his home for the same length of time. I am quite sure that when people stop to think about the matter they will see the operation in its proper perspective, and will appreciate that these normal police operations have good reasons behind them and in many cases are based on what is, frankly, consideration for the public when you stop to analyse the matter.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Howard: I should like to reply to the minister's comments, and I express my appreciation to the hon. member for allowing me to do so. I do not think the Minister of Justice succeeded in getting the matter into perspective but rather succeeded in distorting it. Here are the circumstances that existed in the Chinese communities. There had been a statement that 11,000 of them had entered the country illegally, and whether or not that was an official announcement does not matter. The Chinese people had that understanding. In addition, search warrants were executed in a number of places across Canada just prior to the time the matter of the questionnaire was involved. Many people in the Chinese communities, in Prince Rupert for example, thought they were directly or indirectly involved. I do not know actually what they were thinking. However, with this background they are asked to go to R.C.M.P. headquarters and answer questions, and one of their number has to sign a document. As a result they immediately become concerned.

I think that puts the matter in its proper perspective. That is the way the Chinese people look at it, and that is why they have rebelled and held meetings to discuss the matter. That is why they went to a lawyer and were advised that they did not have to answer any of these questions. Looking at the matter from the point of view of the people in the Chinese communities, I think this is what their reaction would be and why they would think they were being subjected to some sort of persecution in being asked to answer questions in the light of the other developments that had taken place just two or three weeks before.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, as an ex-member of the mounted police I think I can speak with some authority on one or two of these questions. First of all, the trouble involving the Chinese is a question of public relations, as everybody can readily understand. I think a great deal of to-do is being made about something which is quite simple. The R.C.M.P. are charged with maintaining security in Canada. It is not an easy job but rather one of the most difficult jobs in the world, because on occasion they must interfere or appear to interfere in people's private affairs. I cannot see how any well-adjusted citizens of Canada, whether they have been here all their lives or have only been here for a few days, can object to the honest attempts of the R.C.M.P. to keep our country secure.

I think it is more than wrong to drag in racial prejudices at a time like this. There are a great many Chinese in Canada who are very proud of their Canadian citizenship and are just as anxious as we are that people do not enter Canada from China or anywhere else against the laws of our country. Looking at the matter from the point of view of a Canadian citizen, it would seem that a few groups have chosen to make a great to-do about it, perhaps because they are guilty, perhaps because they have had some hand in the matter, perhaps because they are related to some of the people who are guilty, or perhaps for purely partisan political purposes, and have exaggerated and expanded one or two minor incidents to make them look like national scandals.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police are the finest police force in the world. They have operated now for a great many years, and I cannot imagine any force which operates with greater impartiality. Again I speak with some authority, because on two occasions I was relieved of my duties in the mounted police as a result of the strict observance of the regulations, once for having married without permission and again for indicating that I took an active interest in public affairs. For this I hold absolutely no rancour. I admire the mounted police for upholding the regulations in my case in the same way as they do with respect to every member of the force.

With respect to the question of public relations I should like to make this plea, and ask that it be given consideration by the commissioner and the department. I suggest that renewed attention should be given to what we used to call the youth and police program. When this program was in operation I think the mounted police made more progress so far as good public relations are concerned, particularly among young people. We were instrumental in instituting safety patrols for school children throughout the length and breadth of this country. Young mounted policemen started baseball, football and swimming activities and judo and boxing classes. Wherever the program was put into effect so-called juvenile delinquency, which is just another way of saying that boys are having a good time, decreased. The boys started to play baseball and get themselves in shape. They began to take an interest in the Boy Scouts and to box, swim, fish, hunt and do all the things a boy would rather do than steal or break windows or get into other trouble.

Wherever you find one of these fine young mounted policemen, a grown up Boy Scout if you like, working among young people you will find that the record speaks for itself. These activities are not confined solely, of course, to the mounted police. Municipal and provincial police forces have also done signal work along the same lines, but the mounties have always taken the lead in these affairs. Again I would plead with the commissioner and the department to provide whatever funds are necessary to make police transport and sports equipment available, and to give full recognition to this work which is often done beyond the call of duty.

Recently the marriage regulations were improved. When I joined the mounted police in 1935 it was necessary for a recruit, no matter what his age, to wait six years before he could marry the girl of his choice. In 1937, without any consultation with those who had signed on the force, this regulation was changed to seven years. Some of us got a little desperate because we thought it might be changed to 12 years, so we went out and got married. At one time I believe half the members of the mounted police force were married without permission, and if it had not been for the war coming along and the fact that I volunteered for the provost corps, I might have got away with it, like many others including officers. However, when it was brought to the attention of my superiors I was treated in the impartial manner in which everybody else was treated, and relieved of my duties. This enabled me to go overseas with the other volunteers with whom I chummed. When I came back to this country I was forgiven and rehired.

I should like to say something about the question of pay. When my father was a mounted policeman he rode across the plains for 50 cents a day. However, at that time

50 cents would almost buy a quart of whisky, so the pay figured that way was not too much out of line with what it has been recently. Today, however, the job of a mounted policeman is very complicated. The standards are just as high, and they were always very high. We demand young men capable of holding down territories which are sometimes as large as some countries in Europe. I have patrolled a territory consisting of 14,000 square miles and supervised six other young men and their many duties. I feel that command pay is out of line these days. When a man has this responsibility I think he should be paid accordingly. I trust that the pay of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is about to be raised, and I hope substantially.

We have the finest police force in the world. I believe the people of Canada appreciate the service they are getting, and that they intend to pay these men according to the service rendered. It is true that in times past the men have been willing to work for next to nothing, but those days are gone forever. The public servant who is doing a good job today is entitled to a realistic rate of pay.

In so far as training is concerned, I think that would bear some looking into. I am quite in agreement with putting the young man on a horse, introducing him to that noble animal and getting him away from his mother. However, I feel that perhaps better training on a typewriter and in office procedure might be in order. Perhaps most people are not aware of the fact that the average mounted policeman spends as much time pounding a typewriter as he does in the field. We have not yet reached the stage where we believe there should be stenographers in every police detachment, so these young men have to type voluminous reports on every conceivable subject. I feel that more attention to business training would be very helpful in this paper age.

We are short of men in the mounted police today because it is a hard job requiring high standards, and the discipline is strict. I feel that if young men leaving school or university knew what a satisfying career it is, what fine training it is for public service and for public life, they would be glad to serve in the mounted police for 20 or 30 years. They would work with the finest young men in the country, and I think the job is second to none for excitement and for personal satisfaction. If I had to do it all over again I would be very pleased to do so.

[Mr. Bigg.]

All I can say is that I hope the pay will be brought up somewhere near the high standard of service which these young men give to this country.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I shall be brief, but first of all I wish, on behalf of my constituents and many people in northern Canada, to express through the minister to the recently retired commanding officer of "G" division, Superintendent Henry Larsen, our thanks for his years of devotion and his many accomplishments. I need not recite to this committee the many accomplishments of this great man. I am sure that his name is in the hearts and minds of many Canadians, and his accomplishments are known not only in Canada but throughout many parts of the world. The sincerity and interest of Superintendent Larsen, not only in the enforcement of law but in the general welfare and social and economic conditions of the people of the north, are things he passed on to the many men who served under him. We in the north wish him many happy years in retirement.

We were happy also that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police appointed in his place a man with northern experience, Superintendent Fraser. I am sure that during the course of his northern service he has had the general welfare and condition of the people in that part of the country very much in mind. We are sure that in the future he will pass on these fine qualities to the men who succeed him.

This brings me to another point. I am wondering what the policy of the force is with regard to men who come out of the north. The other day, on July 1, I walked out of the house to take a look at the proceedings on the hill. I saw a man who had spent, to my knowledge, nine or ten years in northern Canada. I saw him standing there directing people, telling them where to stand. Is this all the force has for a man who has spent the better years of his life in the north? Is he to be brought here to direct traffic? Surely there must be some other position for a man with northern experience. Surely the force must have young recruits who could stand in front of this building as a decoration for the tourists, or walk around putting parking tickets on cars. I ask through you, Mr. Minister, that the commissioner look into this business of the transfer of personnel who return from northern Canada and who are trying to establish themselves in this so-called civilization we enjoy here.

I would also like to bring up another matter. I have heard rumours over the past year and a half that the R.C.M.P. in northern Canada are going to be relegated to office boys. The reason I say this is that I understand the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources are considering putting men into many of the small, isolated communities in the north to take over responsibilities from the R.C.M.P. This all sounds very well, but at the same time in many of these places if the R.C.M.P. did not have to do a dog patrol to visit trappers' cabins or people on the trap lines they would have nothing to do. Their morale, as far as I am concerned, would go down to such an extent that you might as well have them out of the north altogether. Why have men sitting around in these communities doing nothing but pound a typewriter?

I say put the dog patrols back into these isolated places. In many of these isolated communities just the presence of an R.C.M.P. officer provides stability. I can tell you of many cases, in my own riding in particular, where in the past few years I have asked native people and others in these communities, "What do you think of the job which was originally done by the R.C.M.P. in game and forestry matters?" Of course a large part of our country has no forest, but we have forestry men running around the country looking after our forests. However, the inevitable answer I received was that the R.C.M.P. did a better job prior to these encroachments by northern affairs than has ever been done since.

I had occasion last year to ask natives in Fort Good Hope, "Who was the best public servant who ever spent any time in this community? Who did things because of his real interest in the people; interest in your housing and how you made out on the trap lines and your social and economic position?" The answer was a certain R.C.M.P. who had been stationed there some years before; I forget his name now. In any event this was how they felt.

Personally I feel that this co-ordinating committee which deals with northern Canada should be told that we do not need duplication of service in the north. The government should accept that. They are broke now trying to pay for what they have to pay for. Why duplicate the service in places like Fort Good Hope, Snowdrift, Resolution, Fort Providence and all those places? Give the R.C.M.P. man something to do. Give him the responsibility of visiting the trap lines, enforcing the game laws and doing the things he was trained to do.

Any R.C.M. Policeman who comes into that district can go into Fort Smith and, in co-operation with the game and forestry branch of the department of northern affairs, take a course for a week or two and once a year be called back to discuss these matters with the officers of the department. To put a forestry man or a game man into an area where you have someone like the R.C.M.P. to look after that sort of thing costs a great deal of money. There is the salary of the man you send in, and his removal expenses from Ottawa. You have to construct a building for him to live in, which costs at least $25,000 to $30,000. You have to operate this establishment and put fuel oil into the tanks. You have to provide electricity. I say, why do we duplicate effort, particularly in these days when we are not that well off that we can throw money around hiring people to take over duties which would leave others with nothing to do.

I have heard a rumour that this co-ordinating committee is considering suggesting to the R.C.M.P. in my riding that their establishment in Fort Smith be enlarged. They are going to provide Fort Smith with lots of aircraft and take all the R.C.M.P. out of Snowdrift or wherever they are in these isolated communities. Of course the R.C.M.P. will be left at places like Yellowknife and Hay river, where there is a fair population, but the rest will be put into Fort Smith.

Now, let us suppose that someone in Snowdrift shoots somebody else. Someone will say "We will send a wire to Fort Smith for the mounties". Of course weather conditions are never too good, so maybe the mountie will not get there for five days. In the meantime this man, who has probably gone berserk, has shot half the community. This is the way they want to save money; they would put them all into Fort Smith.

I say the only thing to do is to put the R.C.M.P. to work; put them to work which every young man would enjoy, such as following a dog team, visiting the trap lines, taking an interest in the community and in community housing for these native people. Young men who go north heard about those things when they joined the R.C.M.P. Half of them would never join if they thought they would go north to pound a typewriter filling out birth statistics and family allowance forms.

I hope the minister suggests to his colleague the minister of northern affairs that he consider that rather than putting more people into these areas, he put the R.C.M.P. back to work. If there is a case where a community requires an Indian agent or an assistant agent to do something for the natives, for example to fill out statistics and possibly lend a hand in community projects, then that is fine; put in an agent.

It appears that now we want to fill the country with welfare officers. I understand that the civil service commission cannot hire a welfare officer unless he has a Ph.D. I have never heard of anything like it. The man has never seen an Eskimo, but he has to have a Ph.D. I know mounties and public servants who have been in the north and are still there who possibly had no more than a high school education, but they do have in their hearts a desire to do something for these people.

What happens today when they send in a welfare officer? Does he go to the R.C.M.P. and say, "What did you fellows do in these cases, because I want to try something"? Oh, no; to hell with the R.C.M.P. Does he go to the Hudson's Bay man who has spent 40 years in the north? Hell, no; not the Hudson's Bay man; he is stealing from the natives, piling fur and beaver skins up to the top of the barrel in order to buy a rifle. The days of the Hudson's Bay Company exploiting the Indians has gone, and have been gone for some years, but does he go to these men with experience? Heck, no. Does he go to any one of the missionaries, Anglican or Roman Catholic, and say, "What was your experience?" No. So they go ahead and do the same old thing that the missionaries tried, that the R.C.M.P. may have tried, or that the Hudson's Bay company may have tried, and all failed. But they are going to try it again.

I am tired of this same old rigmarole. I say, let us put the R.C.M.P. back to work. If you want to do something for the man who is slugging behind a dog team in those isolated communities, then do something like the department of northern affairs has done, or is still doing, and pay the teacher an extra $1,000 a year to do work other than he would normally do as a teacher; welfare work. At one time the R.C.M.P. were allowed to have trap lines to help them out, but that was taken away from them. Nowadays no one visits the isolated trappers. I hope the minister will consider these suggestions, and that he will not let this high-level interdepartmental committee force anything down his throat that he does no want to accept.

I say again that I deplore this tendency to take away certain duties from the R.C.M.P. in isolated communities and give them to other people who, it is claimed, are more qualified. This all stems from the starvation of Eskimos at Garry Lake a few years ago. We have read reports about this. Farley Mowat in his writings has blamed the R.C.M.P. for these deaths. This same Farley Mowat was given access to files in the department of northern affairs that I am not able to see, nor is any other member of this house able to see them. But the policy of the department of northern affairs was, if we can't lick them let's join them.

That is a fine attitude. About that time in Maclean's magazine—it was January 31 of last year—a short article appeared under a headline "Background": "The Mounties' Rule in the North has been Challenged by the Federal Department of Northern Affairs". Let me say right away that the mounties did not rule in the north, anyhow; the mounties did a job in the north. The article went on to say:

> The main issue: Eskimo policy. The resignation of Doug Wilkinson, best-known white man in the Arctic—

That is a real laugh.

> —he's author of the award-winning "Land of the Long Day"—from northern affairs recently brought the conflict into the open. Wilkinson's gripe: Eskimos in some cases die of starvation.

This refers to Garry Lake, where this northern service officer was stationed as a welfare officer looking after the interests of those Eskimos, or I always thought the duties of a northern service officer were to look after the welfare of the Eskimos. Of course since that time I have not got out of that department an answer that suits me. I do not know what their duties are—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think I should remind the hon. gentleman that these are the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I know he is trying to make a point, and I think the Chair has been lenient in allowing him to make his point of comparison, but I do wish he would come back now to the consideration of the R.C.M.P. and not the department of northern affairs.

Mr. Hardie: Thank you. You have suggested, Mr. Chairman, that I have been trying to make a point. I want to impress this upon the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. or on whoever is going to sit on this interdepartmental committee. I am going to be very brief. Up to now, anyway, I have not been able to find out what are the duties of a northern service officer. In recent years many have been elevated to area administrators. People in the north wonder now whose duty it is to look after the welfare of Eskimos.

This article went on to say:

> Northern affairs hasn't enough authority or facilities to help them, and it isn't the mounties' job. Although an officer of the government, Wilkinson had to buy his own plane to visit Eskimo settlements. Meanwhile, to police the north, mounties have every facility, including planes.

Mr. Wilkinson, or whoever wrote this article, does not know anything about what the R.C.M.P. have done in the north if he thinks that all the R.C.M.P. have to do is police the north.

Mr. Chairman, on your suggestion I am going to end my remarks, but I hope the minister will consider some of the suggestions I have made, particularly as to the duties in the future of R.C.M.P. officers in the north. If there is any prospect of many of their duties being taken away from them, I personally feel that the R.C.M.P. will begin to acquire a very low opinion of the position they hold; because they will be relegated, as I say, to a strictly office type of job. The hon. member for Athabasca wants more typewriters. Well, let us keep the typewriter men down here; we do not want them in the north.

Mr. Fulton: I rise only for one purpose, and that is with regard to the statement made by the hon. member for Mackenzie River that men are brought down from the north and then put on guard duty here on parliament hill with nothing better to do than direct the traffic or be a tourist attraction.

Unfortunately the hon. member did not identify the man he had in mind, as is perhaps right, but in consequence I have not had the opportunity to find out what the circumstances are. Now what will happen is, I suppose, that it will go on record and in the press that this is what the police are doing, but I know it is not what they are doing. Men are not brought down from the north to carry out traffic and guard duty on parliament hill.

July 1 was a special occasion. We have not many reserves, and it might well be that a man who was on some other duty altogether, having come out from the north, was brought up here on July 1 to help with the special problem of controlling the traffic and the crowd on that day; but for the hon. member to suggest that it would be our policy to bring men out of the north after years of service there and put them on parliament hill is absurd, and I am sure he knows it. It may have been done on that special day, but I think it is unfortunate that an impression to the effect that he was posted to parliament hill should be created. I feel bound to point out also that the hon. member could easily have checked on whether there was really cause for complaint before splashing it all over the record here on an inaccurate basis.

I do assure him and the committee that I know the feelings of the men who have served in the north. I went up there myself and spent two weeks in the western half of the Northwest Territories just to get some idea of what goes on. I know that the men up there have a special pride in their status in the force and in their northern service, and many do not want to leave. But of course the opportunities for promotion are limited if they were to stay always in "G" division, which is one of the smaller divisions of the force, so they are posted out again. When they come out they are brought out on promotion and are given a different type of duty to perform so they may become more experienced policemen and have the opportunity of going right up through the force, which they would not have if they stayed in "G" division.

I know there is a problem in this respect. Many men who show great initiative in isolated northern posts are brought down and put perhaps on highway patrol somewhere in what they call the outside. Some people ask why should a man who has shown all this resourcefulness sustain this terrible comedown? Well, the fact is that highway patrol is a large part of a policeman's duty, and a large part of the duty of a police force. If a man is to have an opportunity for promotion he has to have experience in all parts of police work.

I can give the hon. member one example of a constable who came out after two years at Ellesmere island, and who is now in Ottawa. He was brought out for the purpose of being sent to university. Many of these northern men are men of great initiative, and we try to give them opportunities in the postings that are made after they come out from the north. I can assure the committee that no one who comes out from the north is posted to parliament hill.

Mr. Bigg: I should like to clear up a small misapprehension. I certainly did not wish to leave the impression that I think the mounted police should be relegated to a typewriter. What I was pleading for was a little more training on the typewriter. Due to the many technical jobs which a mountie is called upon to perform these days, proficiency on the typewriter is absolutely essential. I did not like the typewriter myself, and I do not think many of our boys do, but I spent many laborious hours searching for the keys with two fingers, and had I learned the touch system I would have been able to provide better reports more rapidly and thus devote more time to the more interesting aspects of police work.

Item agreed to.

375. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $3,804,029.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I had occasion to discuss the new police building in the Sudbury area, of which the citizens of Sudbury and I am sure the police officers as well are proud. There seems to be some difficulty in making arrangements for landscaping the grounds of this building. The choice of the site was proper. The building is located on the outskirts of Sudbury on a large piece of property. The building unfortunately appears rather low, but this is not too serious. However, when you drive past the place you cannot help but think it resembles a hydro substation, a warehouse, a garage for storing telephone trucks or some similar building. There are garage doors facing the street. In the interests of good public relations, and with a view to creating a good impression on those who visit the building, I think some improvement should be made in its appearance.

I am advised that some difficulty has been encountered in attempting to obtain the trees and shrubs required to beautify the building. Perhaps the minister would investigate the situation and assist in bringing about an improvement to this fine building.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, could the minister inform the committee whether the department intends to build adequate quarters for the R.C.M.P. detachment in the town of Shippegan in Gloucester county? This is an important detachment covering a large district, including the islands of Shippegan and Miscou. I believe they deserve better quarters.

Mr. Fulton: I have to advise the hon. member that there is nothing in this year's estimates for Shippegan.

Mr. Robichaud: I urge the minister to have his department take this matter into consideration. I am familiar with the situation there. The accommodation provided is inadequate, and these men deserve better accommodation.

Mr. Fulton: I thank the hon. member for bringing this to our attention. It will be considered. We are faced with a big problem in building quarters. There are many centres where accommodation has been inadequate for some time. We have had to establish a system of priority, but we will have a look at Shippegan.

Item agreed to.

382. To provide, notwithstanding section 45 or other pertinent provisions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, being chapter 241 revised statutes of Canada, 1952, that L. H. Nicholson, former commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, shall be paid, as of the day he ceased to be commissioner, a pension for life of one fiftieth of his pay at the time of his retirement for each completed year of service, $1.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say that we on this side of the house are glad the government accepted the suggestion made last year by my colleague the hon. member for Cartier.

Item agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: I thank the committee for its consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

253. General administration, $4,807,852.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I trust the minister has an opening statement to make. Does he wish to segregate the discussion of the C.B.C. and the Department of National Revenue, or will both be discussable under this first item?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Chairman, the C.B.C. will be entirely separate from the Department of National Revenue. I propose to proceed, subject to the wish of the committee, with the customs and excise divisions, then with the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue, and following that with the C.B.C. and the board of broadcast governors.

I appreciate the fact that there may be some overlapping as between the C.B.C. and the board, and I do not think we should be too strict in attempting to hold the discussion to one element or the other. Of course if specific questions are asked about either the C.B.C. or the board I would ask that they be directed to me when the respective officers are before us.

I do not propose to make a lengthy statement on this question, but with respect to the customs and excise divisions perhaps I should say a word or two, because after all this is one branch of government without which it would be very difficult to carry on the government of Canada. As a matter of courtesy I perhaps should refer to the committee which met last year and interviewed the officers of the Department of National Revenue and particularly of the customs and excise division. They made three recommendations: one dealing with labelling of imported goods; one dealing with the tariff status of engineering drawings; and one dealing with imported articles exempt from sales and excise tax. Without boring or taking up the time of the committee I think I can say in brief that the department has tried to comply, and I believe has complied with the recommendations of the committee in so far as it was possible to do so. If there are any specific questions on that matter I should be glad to deal with them later on when we are dealing with the figures of the department.

I might point out in passing, Mr. Chairman, that the primary function of this division of the department, which is an administrative one, is the collecting of revenue. The total revenue collected by this division in the past fiscal year amounted to $2,152,553,299, which is an increase of 12.4 per cent over the revenue collected in the preceding year.

Our responsibility, of course, also extends to the administration of various acts and the inspection of vehicles coming across the border, and so on. There has been a substantial increase in the business in that direction. Vehicles reporting through customs last year totalled approximately 9 million, which was 190,000 more than the previous year.

This is a matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the committee with humility but also with a little bit of pride, I think. Despite all this increase in activity we have managed to reduce our total estimates by $608,000 as compared with last year. When you consider, that salaries alone amount to over 91 per cent of our total estimates I think you will agree that this is indicative of a very healthy appreciation on the part of the administration of this division of the virtues of efficiency and economy. For this I take no credit to myself at all except for responsibility for the division, but I do want to pay a well-deserved tribute to the officers of the division who have been able to achieve this economy and at the same time do more work than has been done heretofore.

It is within this area of estimated expenditure for salaries that we have been able to make a substantial reduction. We have reduced the number of establishments in the department by 99 and I might say that the dilution has not resulted in people being fired from the department. We have transferred them from one branch to another. It has been accomplished by bringing in more efficient methods, by the introduction to some extent of machines, computing devices and so on. In any event, we have achieved that. When we come to taxation I can point out that the same comparable result has been achieved there, and I think this is the one department of government which two years in succession has reported a decrease in expenditures and an increase in the work load which has been I believe satisfactorily carried out by the department.

Various changes have been made in the administrative branch during the year. I might refer to one or two of them in passing. Beginning with those which we have made to try to make it more convenient for the public as well as for efficiency for ourselves has been the abolition during the year of the customs form E-60, which Canadians, as many of you will recall, had to complete in respect of their motor vehicles when leaving Canada. We have made a change there and, judging from the reaction of the public, this change has been very well received.

Another change of notable effectiveness was the revising of the traveler's vehicle permit which has had the effect of considerably speeding up the clearance through customs of foreign travelers entering our country.

Then there is the new procedure with respect to the reporting of aircraft used for health or pleasure purposes and which are not carrying goods. Under this new system Canadians can proceed directly to a foreign country without first reporting to customs, and on returning to Canada complete at one time the outward and the inward reports.

I could draw the attention of the committee to various matters such as these which the division has brought into effect during the last year and which I think have resulted in not only increased efficiency but also better service in so far as the public is concerned. However, I do not intend to take up the time of the committee in dealing further with these general matters, but I shall be very glad to attempt to answer any specific questions and also reply to any comments which may be made during the course of this discussion.

Mr. Godin: I understand that two separate discussions will take place, one on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the other on the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. Nowlan: That is right.

Mr. Godin: And that the subheadings of the Department of National Revenue will be discussed on item 1. We all appreciate the fact that we are now discussing the department which collects revenue for the government of Canada. On other occasions we have been dealing with departments which spend the money which the Minister of National Revenue collects.

The minister mentioned that there has been a small decrease in the cost of the operations and in the estimates of this department. We have been told that certain devices have been installed in the department and we also realize that possibly some other changes may be made. The minister has indicated to the committee that some changes have been made by shifting operations from one section of the country to another. This shifting of operations may create not necessarily grave embarrassment but certain difficulties. I should like to ask the minister some questions with respect to the northern Ontario office which is located in the new federal building at Sudbury. Apparently in the last year or so directions have gone out that what are known as short forms for taxation purposes should be sent directly to Ottawa and not go through the Sudbury office as was the custom in years gone by.

Mr. Nowlan: May I interrupt the hon. member. I think he is referring to the income tax office and not the customs office. I would prefer to have that matter raised when we are dealing with taxation.

Mr. Godin: I thought we were dealing with the item.

Mr. Nowlan: We can deal with the item if the hon. member wishes, but as far as answering specific questions is concerned, I would not want to take the responsibility for answering questions with respect to taxation without the taxing officers present.

Mr. Godin: My remarks are of a general nature and have to do with the remarks the minister made. We find that directions have been given to the effect that the short forms should be sent directly to Ottawa. Can the minister tell me whether this means that there will be certain changes made in the Sudbury office and that possibly the work that is now done in that office will be done by people or machinery in the Ottawa office? Will the staff in the Sudbury office, which is the main office for northern Ontario, be reduced? As I understand it, the forms for as far away as Sault Ste. Marie were handled in the Sudbury office. People have been made aware of the fact that a request has been made for the short forms to be sent directly to Ottawa. Does this mean that there will be a curtailment of staff in the Sudbury area and an appreciable increase of staff in the Ottawa office? Were the facilities in Sudbury not capable of taking care of the northern Ontario forms?

Mr. Nowlan: I will deal with that, Mr. Chairman, when we come to item 262.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): At the outset of my remarks I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Revenue on the wonderful job he has done in his department. I remember that when the estimates of his department were before the committee on estimates of the House of Commons we were very impressed with the way in which he ran his department. I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West on his appointment as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Revenue.

I come from a riding which is completely industrial and urban. It is a riding that depends upon imports and exports, on manufacturing and on the protection of manufacturing in this country. I have heard it said from time to time that our opponents on the other side of the house are the great free traders. I found it very interesting to sit in the house and hear the hon. member for Essex East talk about protection for the automotive industry. It did my heart good to find that the great Liberal free traders have finally come to the realization that, with an economy such as we have today, with a country of 17 million people compared with 180 million people in the United States and so many millions in Europe awakening from the second world war, the impact of imported manufactured products is being felt by Canadian manufacturers.

I also realize that the import and export position of the country is not a matter that comes primarily within the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Revenue although I know that in the past several months the mayors and reeves of the country, the labour unions, the automotive industry and the chamber of commerce have been knocking on the door of the genial minister. I might also point out that the problem of imports into our country today is basically caused by exports into our country from the nation to the south of us. We hear a great deal about the low cost labour content areas of the world such as Japan and certain parts of Europe but my prime consideration today is the United States of America. I am not speaking as an anti-American because I have many good friends there. I am talking as a pro-Canadian vitally interested in my community and in looking after the interests of the workers in the riding of Hamilton South.

I should like to talk about the cotton textile industry purely as an example. Some people may say that this is a bad industry to take as an example because of its very desperate position in the country today but from reading the newspapers and the briefs of the mayors and reeves, of the textile industry and of the automotive industry apparently there are many interests that are looking for action on the part of the government to help them in their plight. I know that the industrialists and the labour unions have a very definite responsibility in this connection and I know that they cannot make up their minds what to do. However, purely by way of example, I should like to talk about the cotton industry in Canada today as it is affected by the Customs Tariff.

It is my understanding that before 1953 the cotton industry experienced relatively good times in Canada because it had its own markets and the awakening of Europe had not taken place. The United States were recovering from the effects of the war and were looking after their own domestic market. In 1956, for example, the cotton manufacturing industry in Canada had some 22,500 employees. I note with some distress, and again I am not trying to be political about the matter, that at the end of 1959 there were only 16,000 employees in that industry, a drop of 6,000.

It seems to me that with regard to any problem there must be symptoms of the disease, the disease itself and there must be solutions. I have heard it said by many members as well as some members of the other place that the textile industry did not look after its own interests, that it did not increase production and buy new machinery. This may be all very well but the remarks I intend to make today have to do with a matter under the direct responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue.

I understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is concerned with export markets and achieving a good balance of trade but in directing these remarks to the Minister of National Revenue now I have the specific point in mind that governments have a definite responsibility with respect to secondary manufacturing in Canada. I am not one of those who believe in complete government interference because I am a Conservative but I believe that where government interference is needed it should be exerted with all force.

Section 6A of the Customs Tariff was introduced by the former government in 1955 but they did not take any action under it. The section provided that where subsidized goods are imported into Canada directly or indirectly from a foreign country the Minister of National Revenue may take action when Canadian industries are being hurt. Section 6A of the Customs Tariff reads in part as follows:

> 6A. (1) Where in the opinion of the governor in council subsidized goods of a class or kind made or produced in Canada have been or may be directly or indirectly imported into Canada, he may declare such goods to be subject to an additional duty on their importation equal to the amount of the subsidy on those goods as determined by him.

As far as the cotton industry in concerned, in 1956 the United States congress passed an act which provided, with respect to manufactured cotton goods exported from the United States, no matter to which country they went, for the payment of a subsidy on such exports equivalent in some instances to five cents a pound and in some instances as high as 17 cents a pound, representing about seven or eight cents on the dollar. Ironically this legislation came into effect in the spring of 1956 when there were 22,500 people employed in the Canadian cotton industry. In the past the former government used to talk about its vigorous policy with respect to the United States, but I cannot seem to recall Canadian representatives going to the United States at that time and telling these people that they could not do this to Canada, that we on the North American continent are in the same economic climate, that we have the same wage scales and therefore they could not apply a subsidy on exports from their country into Canada because it would hurt the Canadian cotton industry and at the same time other such subsidies would hurt other industries. I do not recall them ever doing this.

The position is that on cotton goods exported from the United States to all countries the United States have paid subsidies amounting to some $54 million since 1956 and on exports to Canada they have paid subsidies amounting to over $13 million. I know the minister may say to me that there must be proof that the United States are violating the section of the Customs Tariff, that they are not playing the game with us, that they are not going along with the general agreement of tariffs and trade under which the countries concerned are supposed to play fair with each other.

Again as a pro-Canadian and not an anti-American I say that businessmen in the cotton textile industries of the United States have used the section in the Customs Tariff to further their own ends with the result that 6,000 people have been put out of work, some 400 to 500 in my own district. I have a letter here written by a United States manufacturer of cotton goods to a Canadian importer in Toronto, Ontario. The letter points out how advantage can be taken of a loophole in section 6A of the Customs Tariff. The first paragraph of the letter indicates the price of the cotton material in question and the second paragraph reads as follows:

> In addition, we will allow, to an associate or affiliate of yours in the United States, a rebate of $.07 per net pound. We will show on the customs invoice that we are allowing such a rebate to the firm you designate—

In the broad sense the Minister of National Revenue has no responsibility to take action by the imposition of a dumping duty because there is no indication on the invoice that this is being done. However, I also understand that investigators from the Department of National Revenue can go to the United States, call upon manufacturers and say that in the interests of good relationships they would like to see how they are running their businesses. This letter states that an amount of seven cents per pound will be paid. A manufacturer in my own riding tried this. He bought so many thousand yards of cotton goods in the United States and there was deposited in a British bank an amount equal to $2,200, which did not appear on the customs invoice.

The cotton industry is an example of one of these producers who is having a tough enough time competing with the Japanese in the world market without some smart businessmen in the United States taking advantage of the situation. Let us not fool anyone. Imports of United States cotton manufactured goods, with the same labour content as our cotton goods, have come into this country in quite substantial amounts during the last three years. It seems to me that these imports are coming into the country because these people are taking advantage of this United States legislation to hurt Canadian manufacturers. If there were free competition both ways across the border I would be all for letting everyone find his own level. However, when a foreign government enacts legislation subsidizing the exports of a specific industry, the products of which are manufactured in Canada, then I think the Minister of National Revenue and his learned officials should look into all the ramifications of the situation.

I believe if they did that they would draw the conclusion that two things would have to be done. Either the officials of the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Finance would have to go down to the United States and request them to discontinue paying a subsidy on these goods coming into Canada or we must take the bull by the horns and invoke this section 6A of the tariff act by order in council. Then the United States manufacturers who are shipping millions of dollars worth of cotton goods into Canada by depositing moneys outside the country for the benefit of the Canadian importers—not the manufacturers but the fellows sitting along St. Lawrence street in Montreal—would be prevented from doing so. In the last two or three years many people in my riding have been put out of work as a result of this practice. It is the responsibility of this government, therefore, to have a close look at section 6A of the Customs Tariff or alternatively to ask the United States to quit paying the subsidy on goods coming into Canada.

As a result of conversations I have had with people in the United States I do not believe it would be possible for the United States to discontinue paying the subsidy because their legislation says they must pay an export subsidy on cotton goods which go out of the United States. The only alternative this government has then is for the Department of National Revenue to invoke section 6A of the Customs Tariff. This would be of benefit to the Canadian textile manufacturers. I have talked to some 50 or 60 people in the past few months and they are convinced that this would help a great deal.

Before I resume my seat, I should like to state again that I am sure each one of us has problems in our constituency and unless we get up and put them forward the minister will not find out about them. I am sure he is aware of this problem, however. I feel so strongly about it that I thought today I might use part of my time by speaking about this industry. However, this is not the only industry in which we have this situation. There is the woodworking industry and other secondary industries in my riding that are feeling the result of the price squeeze from competition from products from Europe and Japan which have this low labour content. I have been told that within the last few months the Steel Company of Canada has not sold a keg of nails west of Winnipeg. This worries me. I suppose the Minister of National Revenue has enough worries at the present time, but I do ask him to take a look at this special problem to which I have referred. I hope he will take this under advisement and give adequate consideration to it.

(Translation):

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, being located along the Canada-United States boundary, the constituency of Brome-Missisquoi has a number of offices coming under the responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). I should therefore like to discuss briefly the estimates of his department.

First of all, may I take this opportunity to commend the officials for the way the offices are operated and kept up. The people of Brome-Missisquoi have noted a number of improvements in those offices.

On behalf of the people of the Abercorn district, I wish to thank the minister and the officials of his department for providing that district with a new building, an exceptionally fine structure.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that most public buildings in Phillipsburg, come under the Department of Public Works. However I should like to refer very briefly to the fact that the department is planning to build a new warehouse in Phillipsburg and that, for various reasons unknown to me, there have been delays in the planning stage. I hope the plans will soon be ready, so that construction of this building in Phillipsburg may be completed as soon as possible.

(Text):

I should like to state briefly, Mr. Chairman, that Brome-Missisquoi is situated along the border of the United States, mostly along the border of Vermont. I have had occasion to visit all the customs and immigration offices in my district over the past year. I should like to mention the fact that the officers at these border points are known to have treated the public, and are still treating the public, in a most courteous manner. I have said this before when these estimates were before the estimates committee, but I should like to repeat it. I feel that the officers of the departments of customs and immigration, perhaps more than any other officers, are the good will ambassadors of the people of Canada. I am very proud of the men who serve the department in my particular district. Every day they are dealing with visitors from the United States. It is very important that this high degree of courtesy exhibited by these officers be underlined. I should like to congratulate the minister for encouraging this situation, and I know it will be emphasized in the future.

In talking with the various officers in my riding whom I visited, the question of pay often came up. I am sure the civil service authorities and the officers in the minister's department will give these demands most serious consideration.

I am going to deal for a moment, very briefly, with a general subject which has been touched upon already by the speaker who preceded me, and that is the question of dumping. I do not want to go into it in detail today, but the hon. member who preceded me said it not only affected the textile industry in his riding but affected many other products. The same is true of my riding, which is an eastern Canadian riding. The textile industry has in the past been seriously affected by dumping. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate teased me in this connection by saying that the question of dumping was a tariff question. Such is not the case. The question of dumping today, and I think this should be underlined and brought to the attention of the public, does not in any way relate to a classical discussion of high or low tariffs. It is an entirely separate question. Those who suggest we should discuss the problem and confuse it with tariff questions are doing a disservice to the country.

The same could be true of a quota system. These questions are perhaps related but they should be discussed separately from the dumping problem per se. I should like to congratulate the minister upon the fact that special officers were appointed and duly trained in the past in order to enforce dumping procedures. I know that the department, certainly at the top echelon, is most seriously aware of the problem of dumping goods produced in the United States on the Canadian market. I should like to feel certain that these procedures are being vigorously and rigorously enforced all down the line.

In a day and age where we must recognize the fact that trade must expand, with the interdependence of nations in an expanding world economy, we must underline the benefits of expanding many aspects of free trade. Yet the dumping question is a serious one. It is brought to my attention almost every week by various people and companies in my constituency. I know the minister has taken vigorous steps in his department to train officers at the local level to enforce our dumping procedures. Like the previous speaker, I would say in my area not only is the textile industry affected but other industries too.

So, in summing up I should like to thank the minister for the great improvements which are being made in my riding in the accommodations sections of buildings. I would also like to congratulate him for the courteous treatment customs officers are affording to the public, be they Canadians or visitors. In any event they are good will ambassadors for our people and for our country. I would also underline the fact that dumping procedures should be rigorously enforced right down the line to the local level and perhaps the minister will report whether an advance is being made in this direction.

Mr. Fisher: There are a couple of minor points I want to ask about and the initial one has to do with the role that his department plays as a sort of censor of obscene literature. The minister will prehaps remember that I was quite frightened and still am by the legislation introduced last year by the Minister of Justice which amended the Criminal Code. As I contended at that time, this legislation put into the hands of magistrates and provincial attorneys general power which would seem to be power to act as censors for the whole country. We have recently had a case where a Montreal judge ruled against the book "Lady Chatterley's Lover" by D. H. Lawrence, and I have not been able to find out whether any instructions have gone forward through the provincial attorney general's office in Quebec across the country as a result of that decision.

I have seen it stated in a number of press reports now that "Lady Chatterley's Lover" has been banned from sale in Canada, and I should like to know whether any instructions have gone forward to the minister's officials to bar the entry of that publication into Canada. I know that most of the copies available for sale in Canada must have come through the customs office.

I should like to know what effect the new legislation has had upon the approach of the minister's officials in examining literature coming into this country. I should like to know how many books the minister himself in the past year has ruled to be unfit after examination, and whether he is in a position to tell me, perhaps not in the committee but privately as a result of a question placed on the order paper, just what these particular books are.

I should also like a statement from him as to how he is facing up to a problem mentioned before with regard to obscene publications and obscenity in the form of records, tapes and that sort of thing.

I would especially like an assurance from the minister that his officials are being as liberal as he gave us to believe in the past they would be in their interpretations. I know from my own examination of material in New York and Paris, there are certain kinds of literature that we do not need in this country. At the same time one cannot help but be a little frightened by the censors. I am especially frightened by the ruling of the Montreal magistrate, because if we have any Canadian literary men of merit it seems to me that the two representatives who have spoken in favour of this particular book were such. Yet their particular views and advice was ignored by the magistrate, and he said in effect that what they said about it was merely their own opinions. What else do you have in censorship matters but opinions and judgments? Quite frankly I tell the minister that I have a little more faith in some of the customs officials than I have in some of the magistrates in this country.

The other matter is more specific and relates to an answer I got to a question concerning ports and revenue stations which are not on or immediately adjacent to the international boundary or are on the Atlantic or Pacific coasts, and the costs of maintaining these particular ports and their revenues. My question was that I wanted an indication of the ports with revenue of less than $60,000 a year and I have been given a list which gives me 13 of these ports. I have just checked through them and I discover there is one in Southampton, Ontario, for which the total operation costs for 1959 and 1960 are set out, amounting to $4,812. By checking the annual report I see that the year before the total revenue for this particular port was in the neighbourhood of $7,800. I checked Drumheller in Alberta and I found that the expenses are about $4,400 and the total revenue last year was around $8,000. For Southampton, Ontario the expenditures are about $5,000 and the total revenue about $18,000.

I am interested in this because I hear the argument that we have a number of ports and outports which are completely unnecessary in terms of the volume of business they do. This has been triggered by the changing situation which has taken place at the Fort William customs office in the past year or so, to which I made no objection; but it seems to me the minister or his deputy minister might well look at these ports which have such low revenue and this rather constant expense. It certainly seems to me we should have more consolidation in this field.

I admit I cannot carry this argument too far from the statistics that have been filed, but if you have a place which costs $5,000 and produces an income of just over $7,000 a year, then I begin to wonder whether the service could not be transferred to another place.

I would not like to sit down without making reference to the few occasions upon which I have had to deal with the department through the deputy minister. I have heard him referred to as the oldest of the old Ottawa warhorses, and of course in the nicest way possible so far as the use of that term is concerned. I have always found him very pleasant to deal with.

The last question I want to ask the minister again requires detail which he may have. I should like to know how many special cases under section 38 of the Customs Act have been determined in the last year by the minister. I should also like to know the nature of the goods involved and the country of their origin.

I hope to have some more remarks tc make later on when we are dealing with the taxation division and also with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

A number of hon. members mentioned that the customs people at the border points have always been fair, and I should like to say that that has also been my experience.

I should also like to ask the minister for some petty detail. We are trying to have an extension of our ski facilities at the lakehead and we would like an assurance that next winter, when we will have a plane bringing up 3,000 skiers from Minneapolis on the week ends, that the unofficial arrangement which was made last winter as a result of our request will continue and that there will be no worries on that score.

Mr. McMillan: I should like to compliment the minister on what he has described as the economy made in his department. I see that expenditure is down this year, as it was last year, and I can only hope that this process continues through other departments of government, because if it does the hon. gentleman will have less to collect in his own department.

The minister referred to the movement of traffic across the international boundary, and I can say that at Niagara Falls and Fort Erie, places with which I am familiar, the movement of traffic over those crossings has been facilitated by action taken by the department. I should like to pay tribute to the officers at the bridges, the customs officers as well as those in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

I heard three hon. members here talking about dumping. I should like to ask the minister how many cases members of his staff have investigated, how many investigations have been made in the United States and what action has been taken as far as the customs tariff in concerned.

One question that I wish to raise has to do with the Canadian duty-free shops, and I think this matter could be discussed now, inasmuch as these shops, or the goods sold by them would be duty free and free of sales tax. I heard some time ago, and I have seen it in the press on several occasions, that one such shop was to be opened in the neighbourhood of the Canadian end of the Ivy Lea bridge, one or two in British Columbia and, one I think, at Niagara Falls. I do not know whether there are to be any others or not. These duty-free shops will probably sell luxury goods which would be admitted into Canada free of duty, free of Canadian sales tax and free of excise tax. They would include such articles as women's purses, perfumes, handbags and other luxury items. I know that the retail merchants association came here to make representations to the Prime Minister and, I think, to other members of the cabinet against the opening of the shops, and I think that in cases where local stores are selling similar articles the establishment of these shops might well interfere with their sales. I should like to hear from the minister on this point.

I can remember being down south, and about the only thing sold in these stores in Jamaica seemed to be large bottles of Scotch whisky, and rum. However, I think the merchants should be given every consideration, and I know that the merchants in Niagara Falls are greatly concerned over this matter, because citizens of the United States coming into Canada who are outside that country for 48 hours can take back $200 worth of goods with them free of duty. They can do that once a month, and if they buy certain of these luxury articles in duty-free shops that is likely to cut down the purchases they might otherwise make elsewhere in legitimate stores. I should like to hear from the minister on that point.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, while we are on these estimates, may I say a few words on behalf of the cigar tobacco producers in the area of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, so that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) and his departmental officials might consider whether customs duties on cigar tobacco leaf might not be raised in this way:

	Present rate	Suggested Rate
Unstemmed	12½ cents	15 cents
Stemmed	15 cents	22½ cents

Mr. Chairman, on June 30, 1956 the government of the day lowered the tariff on unmanufactured cigar tobacco, stemmed and unstemmed, as I just said. I believe the attitude taken in the past has been detrimental to growers of cigar tobacco.

I therefore ask the minister to be so kind as to consider the possibility of an upward adjustment of those tariffs, so that they will not be harmful to cigar tobacco growers in the district of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

May I say, incidentally, that in my area almost 1,400 farmers are interested in that crop, which represents about $1¾ million. So I again ask the minister to adjust those tariffs.

May I add that I entirely agree with the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) and with a previous speaker, who suggested that the textile industry, which is of interest to the province of Quebec, to the maritimes and to part of Ontario, be better protected by the elimination of dumping practices if possible.

It has been a pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to draw the minister's attention to those two points.

(Text):

Mr. Godin: Since the minister wishes that we should discuss customs duty provisions at this time I should like to direct his attention to one or two matters and ask questions with regard to them. The first is the port of entry at Sault Ste. Marie, which is the closest available to the area which I represent. For many years it has been a port of entry through which thousands of American tourists enter Canada to the great benefit, especially, of northern Ontario. I have had occasion to arrive at this port on many occasions and I must say it is not exactly one of the best in terms of its construction and the facilities offered. For instance, there is no provision made for protecting the American travellers when they have to open their luggage, and so on: and when the minister thinks of the rainy weather we have been experiencing he will realize what this lack of facilities means. The fences are rusty and broken to a large extent. I must, however, be honest in admitting that there may be a reason why the port of entry is not in a better condition than it is, namely that a new bridge may soon be constructed in the vicinity. This will bring about increased traffic. I trust that the minister will ensure that the proper customs and excise facilities are available when construction of the bridge is undertaken to avoid inconvenience and delay.

The second matter with which I wish to deal is one touched upon by three hon. members of the government. In 1958 the minister introduced certain amendments to the Customs Act and in his opening statement as reported at page 4468 of Hansard of September 2 that year said:

> The present law is adequate to deal with most cases of dumping or distress selling, but does not provide a safeguard against sales at prices below cost-plus.

It was the minister's opinion at that time that the law was adequate to deal with most cases of dumping but he wanted to take care of cost-plus sales. I should like the minister to tell us something about the effect of the amendments on the Canadian manufacturing industry and give us figures relating to imports under the new amendment.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I wish to deal with two or three points but before doing so I wish to compliment the minister and the department. This is one of the most efficient and competent departments of government with which I have had the pleasure to deal. It has one of the best deputy ministers who is to be congratulated in another sphere altogether.

Mr. Nowlan: What about the poor minister?

Mr. Broome: All in all there is little one can say in criticism of the department. What I intend to say is not by way of criticism at all. I merely wish to remind the department of a few matters they have under consideration and ask the minister if he would comment.

The first problem I wish to raise is one which I believe was raised in the estimates committee two years ago. It concerns the importation of machinery sold by an importer to a tax exempt user. The specific point I wish to place before the department is this. The original purchaser of machinery for use in logging or a forestry operation, let us say, is able to have his machinery enter the country exempt of tax. After a certain use of the equipment he may sell it to someone in the construction industry for road building purposes and it becomes taxable. The department has always gone back to the original importer of the equipment for the amount of sales tax which is due on the reduced value of the machinery. The original importer has no control whatever over this equipment. I believe a suggestion was made that the actual sales tax exemption certificate should be in the form of a contract between the department and the original purchaser and any succeeding purchaser and the liability for the payment of any sales tax should rest on the purchaser who purchased the machine for use in a taxable industry. It is not fair at all in my opinion that the original importer of this equipment could be liable for actions over which he has no control. I understand that from the administrative point of view it is much easier to handle the problem this way but it is not right and I believe it should be changed.

The second item I wish to raise does not really come within the purview of the department but should come within its sphere. It has to do with the sale of United States war surplus equipment on which an arbitrary excise and customs figure of 16 or 17 per cent has been set to offset the fact that the equipment came into the country duty free when used on a United States base. Any ordinary secondhand machinery coming into the country will be assessed by the department at what they consider to be its proper value. Sales tax, if applicable, and duty will be levied on the assessed value. You may buy a machine in the United States for $500 but if the price of that machine in a similar condition here happens to be about $2,000 you will be taxed accordingly. These war surplus sales are disturbing to the economy. The United States economy is greater than ours and the people of the United States will not allow these machines to re-enter their country. An agreement was made some time ago between the governments of Canada and the United States. This equipment is sold by war assets. You may have the most ridiculous sales figure. The 16 and 17 per cent is paid on the actual sales figure and not on the assessed value as the department might assess it. That agreement should be changed. I would like to see us cut out the dumping of war surplus material but if this is not possible the taxation on such equipment should be on the same basis as on any other equipment sold to users in this country.

The third problem with which I wish to deal relates to the importation by manufacturers in Canada of United States components and the application of sales tax to the finished product either as assembled or made up from Canadian manufactured components or those plus United States components to make up a certain article. The deputy minister will be familiar with one article concerning which I have been in touch with him. The application of the sales tax is on the finished price, the factory cost as far as the Canadian manufacturer is concerned.

The importer importing an identical article completely made up in a foreign country will pay sales tax on the value at the border. He does not pay sales tax on his profit as the Canadian manufacturer has to do. He does not pay sales tax on transportation and other incidental costs incurred by the Canadian manufacturer. The importer does not pay sales tax on those costs but only as at the border point.

In effect the application of sales tax in this instance is less on a fully manufactured imported article than it is on a Canadian manufactured article which comprises imported parts and parts of Canadian manufacture. The Canadian manufacturer, as far as that part of his cost involving taxation is concerned, is at a price disadvantage as compared to a straight importer of a similar article.

They are not major points; they are not going to put anybody out of business but each of the three points I have brought forward, I think, is in its own way relatively important and deserves consideration from the department as to how it may reasonably be able to correct what is not exactly discrimination but different treatment of one person as opposed to another.

Mr. Herridge: I shall be very brief in my remarks on the minister's estimates but I do first of all wish to express my appreciation of the courtesies extended to me by the minister and the promptness with which he and officials have dealt with any—and there have been a few—complaints that I have had to bring to their attention. However, on occasion the minister has been rather snappy on the orders of the day when answering my questions.

I also wish to express the same sentiments with respect to the deputy minister who is the most popular man I have ever known whose chief occupation in life is taking money away from people. At the same time, I wish to extend compliments to the other senior officials.

While I am in this mood I might say that I was talking quite recently to a long term employee of the minister's department connected with customs who retired a few years ago and who wished me to extend his kind regards and best wishes to the senior officials of the department. I refer to Mr. Warren Crowe, who has retired under some of the most happy circumstances that I had ever known. He owns a gold mine and spends part of the year mining gold and the rest of the time hunting and fishing and visiting the pioneers of the district. I think this is a very fine way to spend one's retirement.

So far as the local staffs at Nelway and Waneta and Patterson are concerned, I have not had a single complaint. Everyone in the district speaks of the general satisfaction with the way in which the staff services these various ports. However, I do want to bring to the minister's attention the fact that they work long hours to do that. I have had to tell this story before. I have been asked by people in the district to remind the minister again of the local circumstances. People generally are looking forward to the time when the service will be a 24-hour service. I fully appreciate the fact that there is some difficulty in making arrangements with the opposite numbers on the United States side of the line, but people in our district think 24-hour service is justified in view of the income collected at two of the ports, particularly in relation to the income collected at some other ports which have 24-hour service along the international boundary of British Columbia. I should appreciate the minister's informing the house just what the situation is at this time with respect to the possibilities of getting 24-hour service at Nelway and Patterson in fairness to the public and staff.

The other point I wish to bring to his attention is the question of water traffic on the Columbia which is increasing every year. Some years ago arrangements were made for United States citizens using small craft coming up the Columbia from as far south as Portland and going as far north as Revelstoke to report at Trail. This was a very wise move because the small boats had to take a chance with some very swift water and in one case some whirlpools, and the occupants then travel through the woods for half a mile to try to find the customs office at Waneta. I have talked to a number of people on this question and I suggest that we are getting more and more people and strangers coming in from as far south as Portland. Many of the Spokane and Seattle people know the river quite well, but other people do not. I suggest the department would be well advised to have a prominent sign erected at the appropriate place near the international boundary, on the side of the river which the craft use in coming up from the United States, pointing out to them that Trail is the port of call and is so many miles from the border. We have had some cases of people not knowing exactly how far they need to go, and thus attempting to land at Waneta.

These are the only two matters I have to bring to the attention of the minister at this time.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a few words about these estimates, the minister and his most co-operative department. Today we were honoured with a few remarks by the minister, remarks which were short but certainly to the point. When one visits his office one is accorded the same type of businesslike treatment which is so much appreciated by hon. members. The minister possesses a great deal of business acumen which is so necessary in operating a huge department such as he must administer, and particularly when he and his officials must work so closely with other business houses throughout the country. He also possesses the great faculty of being able to get things done. One might say he is an expediter and a trouble shooter.

I am sure that this businesslike approach has removed many of the headaches which have plagued and which possibly will continue to plague departments such as his. Administrators such as the minister can bring about great savings to the country.

I always like to hear the minister speak in the house. As he towers above the desk so he must tower over the workload which is daily before his office. I think it can be fairly said that the minister has the ability to bring about team effort in his department. I know it has been a pleasure for me to do constituency work with his deputy minister and with other officials in his department.

May I say in passing in regard to Mr. Sim that he is on the executive of one of the local community clubs, and this in itself is a good thing because not only can he do a good job for the community but he can be a good will ambassador for his department. May I suggest to the minister that wherever possible he should encourage his division heads and others in his department to belong to local community clubs in order the better to get to know the problems of the particular area.

Maybe at this point I could make one constructive suggestion with respect to the customs end of the minister's department. I have been aware for some time of what has been done in the United States immigration and customs service with respect to opening offices in Canada. For example, when one goes from Montreal to New York city one clears customs at the United States customs and immigration office in Montreal so that when one leaves the plane in New York city there is no further formality at that end at all. Therefore travellers are able to avoid a great deal of unnecessary delay at the other end. If that system could be extended to Seattle, for instance, for the benefit of passengers northbound to Canada, passengers could then descend from their planes at Vancouver having already cleared customs and immigration and there would be a great saving in time.

I also wish to compliment the minister upon the efficiency with which the customs officers go about their duties at the various border points across the country. People entering Canada from the United States meet these men first and they can certainly help to create a fair climate and do a great deal in the way of building up good will for Canada. There is no sense in spending a great deal of money in the United States to encourage more tourists to come to Canada if they are met at the border with a wall of indifference. That is not the case at the present time and, in all fairness, has not been for a long time. I wish to compliment the minister and his staff in that regard.

I hope that in due course the minister will be able to make a trip to Vancouver and call at the various border points in the west. We have not had a visit by him for some time but perhaps in due course he will make such a visit in order to see the western border points. As I have to go to a committee, I should like to crave the indulgence of hon. members in order to touch upon the C.B.C. briefly.

The Chairman: I suggest it would be preferable if the hon. member would wait until the item for the C.B.C. is called. I know that many other hon. members would like to discuss the item and I think it would mean a more orderly discussion.

Mr. Taylor: That is quite all right. I will abide by your ruling. Before I resume my seat, may I also say to the minister's parliamentary secretary that we appreciate the co-operative spirit he has shown toward members of the house and that he in turn is a great asset to the minister's department.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that when next year rolls around and the minister again presides over the piloting of his estimates through the house in his unique and genial manner I will have cause to compliment him and congratulate him on a job well done if he will see to it that the 7½ per cent tax on automobiles is removed once and for all. When the hon. member for Vancouver South rose to speak I hoped I would have another ally in this cause and that he would also support the removal of this tax. The hon. member, whom I know well, is also acquainted with the automobile business, having had considerable experience with one of the major Canadian manufacturers.

In these days when the Canadian automotive industry is facing serious competition from abroad a look at the excise tax policy of the government with respect to automobiles may well be opportune. I have made references to this question in the past on several occasions, unfortunately without much result. It is generally conceded that this industry is one of the major employers of labour in Canada today. Members of the government, including the present Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, waxed warm on behalf of the automobile industry when they were in the opposition. They too thought that the excise tax on automobiles should be removed. For the sake of the record I wish to point out that on June 2, 1955 the house was considering amendments to the Excise Tax Act which among other things provided for a reduction of the excise tax on automobiles from 15 per cent to 10 per cent, and at that time the present Minister of Finance was rather critical of the government of the day for not abolishing the 15 per cent tax entirely. On that occasion he said, as found on page 4373 of Hansard:

> There are several aspects of the resolution and of the excise and sales taxes broadly that I should like to comment upon briefly this evening. I suppose the leading feature of the proposal now under discussion is the proposed reduction in the excise tax on passenger automobiles from 15 to 10 per cent and the repeal of the excise tax on tires and tubes for automotive vehicles. The reduction in the excise tax on automobiles from 15 to 10 per cent is indeed welcome, but I should like to submit to the minister and to the committee that this tax is still too heavy.
> This tax was applied in the first instance and presumably continues today as a luxury tax; it was introduced under that guise. In my submission it can no longer be defended as such.

I say amen to that. I fully agree with the present Minister of Finance in his appraisal of this tax.

Mr. More: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I want to be clear in my own mind. We are dealing with the collection agency of the government, not the tax imposing agency, and I think that the hon. member is making a speech in regard to matters with which this department has nothing to do.

Mr. Badanai: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I submit that when I tried to introduce this very subject on a previous occasion the Speaker of the house said there would be other occasions on which to discuss it, and certainly this is the occasion. I continue:

> To a vast majority of the owners in Canada a motor car can no longer be regarded as a luxury, but in the light of modern conditions must be regarded as a necessity. However, our tax legislation takes no account whatever of that fact. The burden which this tax has placed upon the automotive industry in Canada and indeed the acute way in which it has been making itself felt latterly are well known to every hon. member of the house. We have on every hand evidence of the increasing state of disorganization in motor car sales right across Canada.
> The automotive industry is a major employer of labour in Canada.

That is what I have repeated over and over again, and the Minister of Finance agrees with me. No one disputes the fact that it is an industry which is essential to the well being and development of our country.

The Chairman: Order. I did not rule on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Regina City. I may say that since the hon. member started his speech I have had some concern about the relevancy of his comments. I know that I allowed the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to speak briefly on the question of customs taxes on tobacco. But I do not think it would be relevant at this point in the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Revenue to discuss in such detail as the hon. member is attempting the excise tax on automobiles. It seems to me that this is a matter which would have been more properly discussed during the budget debate.

I do not want the hon. member to feel that I am trying to prevent him from continuing his speech. However, I do believe that he should try to be as brief as possible in his discussion of this question, otherwise we will have a repetition of the budget debate. As hon. members realize, the Minister of National Revenue is only charged with the collection of this tax. There is nothing he can do, personally, in connection with the request the hon. member is making. It is a matter either for the government as a whole or for the Minister of Finance. I think, strictly speaking, the hon. member's remarks would be more relevant to the budget debate.

Mr. Caron: May I ask for clarification of this matter? I recall that the hon. member for Hamilton South made a speech about the cotton industry and I was under the impression that when we were discussing the revenues of the country we could discuss all matters pertaining to those revenues. I may be mistaken about that. I recall as well that when the hon. member for Fort William referred to the matter in the house Mr. Speaker said that there would be other occasions when the matter could be discussed and one of those occasions would be when the estimates of national revenue were being considered. I believe, therefore, that the hon. member should be entitled to go ahead with this speech, just as the hon. member for Hamilton South did a while ago.

The Chairman: I may say that the matter was raised on June 13 and the Speaker did not mention exactly when the opportunity would be given to the hon. member to make these comments. In so far as the speech made by the hon. member for Hamilton South is concerned, I was not in the chair at the time. I make a differentiation between discussing the application of the Customs Act and discussing the removal of a tax because the first is a matter of administration. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi discussed the application of an amendment introduced two or three years ago and made an attempt to ascertain the consequences of this change. A matter of this sort would be properly before this committee, but that is not the same thing as discussing the removal of a certain tax.

In any event, I have given the hon. member the opportunity if he wishes to continue. I thought I should warn the committee that if we allow the hon. member too much leeway we might precipitate a discussion which would be repetitious of the budget debate, which was the proper occasion for this kind of discussion.

Mr. Badanai: I promise you, Mr. Chairman, to be brief and not to deviate from the suggestions you have made. I maintain that what I am saying now is related to the excise tax on automobiles which is not only discriminatory because the automobile is the only major consumer product subject to a special tax but also because the employees in the motor car industry are the losers. Here is where the Minister of National Revenue is affected. If there are fewer people in these automobile plants, there will also be fewer income tax payments. If no growth is taking place in the productive capacity of this industry, then the corporate tax will be subject to reduction or decline and ultimately the government, instead of being the beneficiary of its tax policy will collect less instead of more.

If there ever was an illustration of the law of diminishing returns the retention of the excise tax on automobiles may indeed furnish the most shining example. I am only asking the minister to take this into consideration during consultations with his cabinet colleagues who have the power to bring about desirable changes in this industry as well as in other matters which may be beneficial to the people of the country.

I am just going to make one more reference to this subject, Mr. Chairman, with your permission. Only yesterday a delegation of auto workers from the province of Ontario came here for a meeting with the Prime Minister. The greater Windsor industrial commission, in a brief submitted to the Prime Minister, made a worth-while suggestion in connection with the 7½ per cent excise tax on automobiles. I shall only quote one paragraph from this submission, and it states:

> The federal government could adopt a policy of encouraging the Canadian manufacture of foreign vehicles. (If Studebaker-Packard can manufacture in Canada while producing 5,000 units per year, surely Volkswagen, British Motors Corp., and some of the other foreign companies can do likewise on a volume many times this.) Australia has encouraged domestic manufacturing and Volkswagen produced 16,700 units in 1958 in an Australian plant.

Then the brief refers to exhibits which were attached to the brief, and the concluding sentence in that paragraph reads:

> Foreign automobile companies could be encouraged to manufacture in Canada by offering an incentive, such as reducing the excise tax of 7½ per cent on the manufacturer's sales price by a given percentage if the vehicle is of 50 per cent Canadian content, 75 per cent or higher. (7½ per cent on a $2,000 passenger vehicle is $150.00.

This completes the reference I wish to make to the subject of the automobile industry.

There is, however, another matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. Some time ago I referred to the possible or contemplated amalgamation of the two customs offices at Port Arthur and Fort William. I was told then there was no change with the exception of the elimination of one officer and, therefore, there was no diminution in the number of employees. However, I am concerned and the people of Fort William are concerned—perhaps the people at other points across Canada are concerned, too—as to whether or not this is going to be the policy of the government, to amalgamate these offices and to reduce staff. I must say this because I have been asked to object very strenuously to the fact that Fort William, one of the oldest ports in western Canada, established over 60 years ago, has been reduced to the status of an outport. The name of Fort William as a port of entry has been abolished and Port Arthur has been named as the port. Fort William is even subordinate to the port of Pigeon River, which is just an imaginary line and is mostly used for the accommodation of tourists coming from the United States.

These are questions which I wish to put to the minister. I know he has received many representations from other parts of Canada which he has to study and solve to the best of his ability, to the enjoyment of all concerned and the satisfaction of everyone. On the other hand, I must say that the port of entry of the city of Fort William, one of the largest and oldest cities in northwestern Ontario, should not be eliminated as such and just made an outport. I am not suggesting it is his fault, and perhaps in the study of this question by the minister's department they selected certain points where they could effect some savings in the administration of certain offices. I am not objecting to saving money if it is possible but I do object when these savings are effected at the expense of employment, especially at the present time. Fort William is an important city.

These are the few remarks I wish to make at this time. There are a few other things I shall probably speak about later during the course of the estimates.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I should just like to bring this matter to the attention of the minister and the committee. I should like to ask the minister to give consideration in his submissions next year, if it is not possible at this time, to the matter of the purchases by fraternal organizations, school boards and school divisions of equipment for school activities. I refer in particular to the purchases by two organizations in my area this year of used band uniforms for high school bands, and they asked for a tax refund which apparently is not permissible.

I would ask the minister and his officials to give consideration to this matter because this is money spent by associations, organizations and school boards and they do not have too much. They are trying to help Canada's youth in our educational program and these band activities are of very major assistance in all small rural and urban centres in keeping our youth occupied in their out of school hours. I think they are serving a very good purpose and should be entitled to consideration in the matter of being given a refund on this type of purchase.

Mr. Weichel: It is not my intention to hold up the estimates of this department and of customs and excise but I feel a word of appreciation should be extended to the minister, his deputy, an old army pal of mine, and the department for the service we are receiving in Waterloo county. The city of Waterloo does appreciate the recent change in customs clearance regulations concerning shipments arriving by highway trucks at the warehouse. The resultant savings to the importers in Waterloo total thousands of dollars annually.

Some complaints have been received by Waterloo firms concerning expenses involved in having to take their excise records to Kitchener every business day. The extent to which Waterloo firms contribute to excise taxes far exceeds that of Kitchener with three and a half times the population. I hope the minister will give Waterloo every consideration in this problem, as I feel that the Waterloo customs office can handle the excise records. Perhaps some time in the near future the top officials of the department can visit us and talk over this important matter with members of the chamber of commerce.

Mr. Caron: I want to bring to the attention of the minister something which could be remedied very easily. In January when I came back from the United States by air I was given form E. 24, the customs form. I asked whether they had one in French and they told me they had none, although when I got to Montreal I was told they had both French and English.

I should like to ask if these forms could be printed in both English and French. There is not very much on them but it would eliminate the inconvenience to travellers who cannot read English or who cannot read French if they had forms in both French and English. I think the minister should take that into consideration and if he looks the matter over I think he will consider my observations are very welcome.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak very briefly and add my compliments to the minister and his officials on their respective duties.

I want to refer now to the matter of labelling which was discussed in the estimates a year ago and the regulations made effective last December. With regard to textiles being brought into the country I find now that in practice importers of these materials are using a system of obliterating the label which manufacturers are attaching to garments, and because of the fact that the labels are usually made of a flimsy paper they can easily be removed merely by shaking or scratching them off, or that sort of thing. I find in practice that this sort of action is not fair to Canadian textile manufacturers and that it should be investigated by the department and necessary action should be taken.

I also had some discussions with the minister with regard to indicating in catalogues of mail order houses whether an item is imported or is manufactured domestically. This in my opinion has a great bearing upon the sales of domestic textiles. You will find that in mail order catalogues there is no indication whether the item which is advertised is manufactured in Canada or in some foreign country. At the time I asked the minister about this matter, which was on February 1 of this year, nothing had been done and I am wondering if any further consideration has been or could be given to this particular matter. It is one of great concern to the smaller textile manufacturers of Canada and I have had representations from people all over the province of Ontario. I feel this would be a worth while project for the department and certainly would be of tremendous benefit to domestic manufacturers in this field. You will realize that when a housewife is ordering from one of these catalogues there is no indication whether she is buying a Canadian produced article or an imported article.

I think it would be a very simple matter if these mail order houses were required to indicate under each item whether the item is imported or of domestic manufacture. This in my estimation would answer the problem and be of great benefit to the smaller textile manufacturers.

Mr. McMillan: I want to bring up a matter which might affect communities in British Columbia, in northern Ontario at Fort William, the Niagara district, Cornwall, Quebec and probably New Brunswick. It has to do with the proposal by the cabinet—and I take this from a newspaper—to remove the 20 per cent duty now placed on the finer grades of paper. I know that this comes under the Combines Investigation Act, and that I could have brought the matter up on the estimates of the Minister of Justice, but this matter was not brought to my attention until after that particular item in the estimates of that department had been dealt with.

I understand that in the year 1953, or thereabouts, the manufacturers of the finer grades of paper were fined under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I also understand that not long ago the Minister of Justice sent out a questionnaire—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid the hon. member is not in order in the remarks he is making on this estimate of the Department of National Revenue relating to customs and excise duties.

Mr. Chevrier: Would you allow me to say that this department is responsible in part for the administration of the provision with which the hon. member is about to deal, which concerns customs duty, and surely the customs and excise division of the department has something to do with this matter. Then again, as the minister knows, the hon. member for Welland has been obliged because of illness to be absent for a large part of the session, and he was unable to be here when this matter was discussed. This is, perhaps, the only opportunity he has to bring the matter up, and I am assured he is only going to spend about five minutes on it.

Mr. Nowlan: I have no objection to the hon. member proceeding under those circumstances. This is clearly out of order, as this is an administrative department which has no responsibility for policy, but I have learned from experience that it is far better to allow members who are out of order to proceed than to try to save time by raising objections.

Mr. McMillan: I might say that I came across this in the papers only a week or ten days ago. If it came out before that, I was not aware of it. However, the paper manufacturers received a questionnaire from the Department of Justice asking them to supply proofs or reasons why the duty should not be removed. I was approached by representatives of labour, and not by the industry, and it was claimed that there would be considerable dislocation in the industry if this were done. I know that the hon. member for Lincoln has also been approached in connection with this matter. I am told that in our area a mill which was in the process of enlarging its operations was reported to be about to discontinue until this matter had been settled.

I think we have a right to ask a member of the cabinet who is here this afternoon what action is being taken or, if he cannot tell us that, for some assurance that a decision will soon be reached in order that the project may proceed without interruption.

Mr. McFarlane: I shall not take more than a minute or so. I should like to support the hon. member for Wetaskiwin in his request for the consideration of a reduction in the tax on school supplies. I should also like to ask the minister if he would give consideration to the supplies and equipment used by organizations which care for retarded children. Many of these organizations are supported locally by small groups of interested people. Finances have to be raised locally, and any help which the department could give would be very much appreciated.

So far I have been very pleased with the service I have received from the minister's department and I hope the hon. gentleman will see fit to grant some consideration to items of the kind I have mentioned.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister has been so generous in his intervention as far as the hon. member for Welland is concerned that I am going to be as brief as I possibly can.

There are just two matters that I want to raise. One has to do with the anti-dumping regulations, and I wonder if when the minister rises to deal with a number of matters which have been discussed here he will give the committee some indication of what is happening as far as these regulations are concerned.

I am particularly concerned about areas such as Valleyfield, certain parts of the city of Montreal, the eastern townships and the city of Cornwall where the position has become untenable because of textile importations. I am going to keep away at the moment from any political consideration of the subject and deal exclusively with the instruments which are in the hands of the minister.

I think we are all agreed that high tariffs certainly will not cure the situation in any of those communities. There is no doubt but that it is serious. The textile industry in the city of Cornwall has been completely wiped out. I know that in the city of Valleyfield there has been a substantial and considerable reduction in employment because of competition, and that applies to the eastern townships to some extent although I must say I am not as familiar with that area as I am with my own area of Montreal and as well as that of Valleyfield.

But notwithstanding the decision which was taken some few years ago in the house, what is the position? I know that the Minister of Finance announced an agreement in the house with Japan, but notwithstanding that there have still been substantial importations. There have been importations from China and, of course, there has been a considerable amount of dumping from the United States. That is what the anti-dumping legislation was established to prevent.

Is the government giving consideration to any other method of controlling these imports? I know that the problem is not an easy one. I know that the question of appraisers is one which has been given careful consideration by the department over a number of years and that these officials were sent into certain areas of the United States in order to evaluate goods. While they did good work, the point is this: is that sufficient to meet the position? That really is the point I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister.

The other question is one which I have already discussed with the hon. gentleman, and it concerns the Canadian association of income tax employees, Montreal branch. They have made representations to the government about their salaries. They feel that because of the peculiar position in which they find themselves, their salaries vis-à-vis those paid by private industry in Montreal are not at all commensurate with their work.

They also indicate that the minister, and I believe too the deputy minister, stated before the estimates committee last year that in so far as assessors are concerned they are experiencing great difficulty in keeping them in the department, that at most they remain for two or three years. This association would like me to bring this matter to the attention of the minister. It may be that other hon. members have brought this to his attention and in a more capable fashion.

This job classification merits a higher salary. If the statement I have attributed to the minister is correct and these people go elsewhere after two or three years then there certainly must be an anomaly. Perhaps these people are not earning enough money and that is why they are attracted elsewhere. I presume that the civil service commission has a great deal to do with this matter and it may be true that an improvement has been made as the result of the recommendations made by the Minister of Finance. I have no doubt that this is true but none the less the situation still continues to exist in certain areas.

Also there has been brought to my attention the question of certain clerks in the customs branch as well as other employees who are in the same position. The point made with reference to the assessors as well as with reference to the clerks and other employees is that a trained man in the class of an assessor, for instance, earns a salary ranging between $5,000 and $7,000. If an assessor has been with the branch for a period of time he is of course much more experienced than a man who moves from branch to branch or from department to department or from the outside and because of that he is able to be of greater assistance in the collection of taxes than he otherwise would be.

My only purpose in rising was to bring these salaries in the Montreal district to the attention of the minister. While I know improvements have been made in part as a result of the recommendations of the civil service commission I still feel confident that the Canadian association of income tax employees is not fully satisfied. In the light of what I have said would the minister be good enough to give this matter his usual careful consideration?

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I have recently had brought to my attention a problem which I wish to place before the minister. It has to do with the coal industry in my riding. As most hon. members know, we have an extensive lignite coal development in that area and an increasing development in gas and oil. This matter has arisen as a result of the competition created by these other commodities. The coal industry in that area for the last 30 years or more has been importing duty free machinery that is not manufactured in Canada. Recently due to keen competition they have brought in equipment for experimental purposes in order to make their production and manufacture more economic and competitive. They have been paying duty on this equipment. The point these people make is that the machinery they are using for experimental purposes is not manufactured in Canada. They ask that these regulations be made more flexible to include this type of equipment and have it enter duty free, too.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, usually when I rise to speak in this chamber I am a bit out of order but I believe I am perfectly in order today in congratulating the minister and his department upon their most efficient execution of their regulations.

There is one question which I should like to ask the minister. Would the minister be kind enough to ask his officials why they differentiate between automatic stock waterers and automatic stock feeders for the purposes of imposing duty on an agricultural implement?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, before the vote is carried I wish to say a few words. I apologize to the minister in advance if this matter has already been raised and he may stop me if it has been. I want to ask some questions which I think concern his department arising out of the trade treaty with Russia that will be coming before us for consideration. The minister knows that under that treaty although it is not a matter of the particular responsibility of his department there is a kind of mathematical relationship between the proportion of our imports from Russia and our exports to Russia. The impression is that there will have to be an increase of Russian imports to reach that proportion.

There has been a great deal of talk about how these figures will be increased with particular attention being paid in the discussion to the import of motor cars. Because this does come within his department I should like to ask the minister what are the procedures established? Are they the customary ones or are new procedures being adopted? What are the procedures in effect or to be in effect for the appraisal of values on Russian imports into this country? I am thinking particularly of manufactured imports and even more particularly of motor cars. Have there been any discussions and any negotiations with the Russian government which would lay down a procedure to be followed in regard to Russian imports under this treaty?

[Mr. Southam.]

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know what part the minister played or did not play in the letter sent by the Minister of Justice to the companies involved in the prosecution with respect to fine papers. As I understand it the letter was in effect an invitation to them to state why the tariff protection on their particular products should not be removed. I want to know from the minister something about the consultation that took place.

To my knowledge this penalty has not been invoked before. I want to know what part the minister played in this matter and the general background of it. Like some other hon. members I have received some preliminary protests about the move and I wish to know what part, if any, the minister has played and can play.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with the hon. member for Welland in bringing to the attention of the minister a problem that could develop in connection with the proposed removal of the tariff on fine papers. The Provincial Paper Mill and others in that area have to bring their raw materials a very long way, in some cases from down on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river. They also have to pay the toll on the Welland ship canal. To impose further penalties on them by removing the tariff would put them in the position of perhaps not being able to compete with papers of that kind coming in from the United States.

Another matter I wish to draw to the attention of the minister concerns imports from the United States. I recently saw an advertisement in a newspaper for a fishing reel. I sent for it and when it arrived I found it was made in Japan. Although it was made in Japan it carried the trade name of a prominent manufacturer in the United States. The warranty was to be taken care of by this company in the United States. What I am concerned about is this. The article was shipped to a wholesale house in Los Angeles. There it was packaged and received a United States trade name and a United States warranty. It is sold in Canada practically as a United States apparatus, yet it was made in Japan. I should like to know whether it comes into the country as a Japanese import or a United States import?

(Translation):

Mr. Ratelle: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of making a long speech; I just want a few bits of information.

Could the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) tell me whether some agreement was reached when he and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) met with confectioners and chocolate manufacturers who were asking removal of the sales tax now applicable to their products?

I do not want to take up any more of the house's time, but I feel we should at least be given some information for the benefit of those who have been asking for the removal of that tax and would like to know the government's decision in this matter.

(Text):

Mr. Pearson: I want to deal for a moment with the point raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur. If the tariff provision—I do not know what section—of the Combines Investigation Act is invoked by the government, it is not necessarily because of the application of the normal economic and trade considerations but because a combination in restraint of trade has been found presumably, and in those cases this clause is used as a punitive clause rather than one which would be invoked under normal economic considerations. I am not attempting to make any judgment of the particular case that has been mentioned but when the minister replies will he inform us about the application of that clause in such a case?

Mr. Chevrier: Before the item carries the minister should take the opportunity to reply to the requests that have been made, as is customary. Once the vote is carried, then we are bound by the particular vote under discussion and there can only be discussion of that item. I should like to get answers to the representations I made and I am sure that goes for most other hon. members. I know the minister cannot deal with all of them seriatim because it would take too much time, but surely he can deal in a general way with the requests which have been placed before him.

Mr. Nowlan: I intended to deal with them. Being an optimist, as always, I had hoped that the other items could carry very quickly and I could deal with them all at the one time. I can go over them now but it will take a little time. I think this is what I did on other occasions. There certainly will not be any restriction by the Chair, I am sure, or by the minister, or any attempt to hold the discussion to any particular item. It will be as free as it was on the first item.

Mr. Pearson: As long as there is no restriction later, as the minister has stated, I should think that would be satisfactory, and we will not be prevented from following up the answer—

Mr. Nowlan: Not a bit.

Mr. Pearson: —because the item is passed.

Mr. Nowlan: Not a bit.

Mr. Caron: Now that the minister intends to answer all the questions at one time, may I bring up one point with regard to taxation difficulties.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, we are dealing only with customs and excise at this time; we shall have the taxation item as soon as these items are through.

Mr. Cathers: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw to the minister's attention, a regulation of the customs law which I think is creating a great deal of confusion in the trade. This is the regulation which reads, "A class or kind not manufactured in Canada". I believe this regulation was drafted to encourage new industries in Canada. Because of the particular case which I have drawn to the attention of the minister and his deputy I think they will agree that a great deal of confusion is caused by this regulation. I think it is a costly regulation to enforce. To find out whether any article is being manufactured in Canada at a certain time is a very long drawn out affair. I ask the minister and his department to take a good long look at the regulation and see whether something cannot be done to eliminate this confusion.

I should like to congratulate the minister and his deputy upon the courteous treatment I have received from his department in the past year.

Item agreed to.

261. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $587,500.

Mr. Nowlan: Before this item carries I think I should reply to some of the questions which have been asked and some of the problems which have been raised. As the hon. member for Laurier suggested a moment ago, there have been many of them, and if I do not attempt to deal with them all I am sure hon. members will not think it is a matter of discourtesy. I will try to refer to some of those which I think have been the more important ones and on which perhaps some explanation is necessary.

The hon. member for Hamilton South raised, as did many other members, including the member for Laurier, the question of textiles and the impact of imports on the textile industry. The hon. member for Hamilton South dealt at some length with the United States subsidy which is paid to cotton producers in the United States and suggested, as have many others here today and elsewhere, that this was a form of subsidization of the textiles which are imported here and is one on which we should impose dumping duty, or deal with in some other way. There is no doubt there is a subsidy paid in the United States on raw cotton; it is part of the statute law of that country. Incidentally, although the effects here may sometimes be as have been suggested, we also have to realize that cotton is bought by our manufacturers and, by our producers, at cheaper than it otherwise would be because of the fact the subsidy is paid on the cotton which is grown in the United States.

Now what may be termed dumping, of course, is an exercise in semantics. There is dumping in the popular mind and I think there is a misapprehension in the country and in this house that when goods are sold at a price lower than we produce them here, or at a price which seems to us to be low, that is immediately said to be dumping. Whatever may be the moral justification for that, and I think there is one sometimes, there is no legal justification for it unless the technical terms of the statute and of the law are met.

The term is, of course, as most hon. members know, that we are governed by the current market price in the country of origin. Given a free market and normal trading conditions, if that price is lower than ours it is still the free market price. That is the value which we have to impose on the goods, and it is not dumping. I think there is perhaps some misapprehension in the mind of the hon. member for Laurier and others. We are always hearing about dumping as if everybody dumped into this country. If they are selling goods a little bit cheaper than we are selling them in the open market here, then, unfortunate as that may be to some producers, that is not dumping under the act. We can only impose a dumping duty when the goods are sold here at a lower price than the open market price in the country of origin.

The department has had a number of complaints about the matter of subsidization. It has been suggested to us by textile manufacturers that subsidization is going on. The hon. member for Hamilton South read what I took to be a letter from a producer in the United States indicating that certain moneys were being kept there for the importer. If the money comes into Canada it is then something with which we can deal very easily but if there is money paid and it does not come into Canada it is questionable what is our legal position. All I can say is that the department has investigated this matter time and time again, has dealt with it and is attempting to deal with it in every possible way consistent with the law, and we would welcome any information or any co-operation which would assist us to deal further with this difficult problem.

As has been pointed out by various members, there is no question that the textile industry is experiencing difficulty. I think it was the hon. member for Hamilton South who pointed out that employment in the industry had fallen from 22,500 to 16,000 in the last three years. I think these facts can undoubtedly be established and that there is a serious situation. We have attempted to deal with it in various ways.

The hon. member for Laurier asked what had been the effect of the legislation we passed two years ago, the new section 39 of the Customs Act. You will remember that when that section was brought in we were told we were reverting to the law of the jungle, that this was going to raise a wall as high as Haman's gallows, that this was a reversion to R. B. Bennett and to the Toryism of a century ago, and so on and so forth. Unfortunately or fortunately not one of these dire prophecies has materialized and I think when hon. members read some of the speeches they made on that occasion they may wonder at the vehemence of their speeches at that time.

Mr. Chevrier: We also remember the speeches of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not recall all the statements of the Minister of Finance at this time.

Mr. Chevrier: I do.

Mr. Nowlan: The fact of the matter is that one of the reasons why that amendment was brought in was to deal with the question of goods being sold here at less than fair market price plus a mark-up of some kind and not in accordance with current market practice. We investigated sales which were made and we found at least as far as prime goods were concerned that as a result of that legislation or because we had been misinformed—I think it was a little bit of both but probably largely because of the indirect effect of the legislation—there was reason to be satisfied and we are satisfied today that goods now being brought into the country are complying with the provisions of section 39.

We believe that the indirect result of that section has been very great indeed. When we started our investigations we encountered great difficulties. Theretofore we had received co-operation but when our investigations started we were denied information and we had to threaten to use some of the provisions of the new section in order to get the co-operation which we had received in the past and which we have been receiving since. So far as section 39 is concerned, I cannot point to any specific thing which we have done under that provision except that we believe that the tone of the market has improved. We know that the legislation is being complied with and we think that in part at least this is due to the passing of the section itself.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? Is it a fact that section 39 of the act is not being invoked in connection with dumping or alleged dumping?

Mr. Nowlan: We actually have not used section 39 at all. We have not used that specific section but, as I said, I think the fact it is in the background has had a great deal of effect.

I want to mention casually and very briefly some of the things we have done in connection with the textile industry and without enumerating too much. As the hon. member for Laurier pointed out, we have increased our staff. We have increased the number of appraisers and have sent them around the world. We have strengthened that branch of the staff tremendously and we are reaping great results because of that. Our appraisers have had special warning about vigilance and checking more closely than they had in the past. A whole series of instructions have been issued to our officers with respect to these matters and, although I cannot point specifically to the result of this or that, we believe and are informed that there has been a substantial improvement in the situation because of that.

The values of imported textiles are constantly under review and every complaint which the department receives with respect to valuation is investigated by competent officials. We now have seven stationed in foreign countries. The appraisers on the headquarters staff in Ottawa are travelling all the time to various portions of the United States for the purpose of investigating and checking on values, complaints and so forth.

With respect to the matter of invoicing, we have also tightened up in that regard. To assist in the detection of undervaluation, exporters are now required to show technical information on invoices and to attach samples of the goods to the invoice so that we can check on those samples and make sure they are in keeping with the invoice which purports to cover them. We have issued other instructions to our officers dealing with these matters. We have given a course on textile cost accounting to all our appraisers. They have been instructed in these matters and we believe they are thoroughly efficient and are carrying out the law as it is today to the limit of the extent to which it can be enforced and maintained.

We did bring seconds within the purview of the Customs Act in so far as dumping is concerned. Heretofore seconds were not included. Approximately a year ago we brought seconds under the act by order in council to protect against dumping. Seconds of course, comprise a very substantial portion of our textile imports because seconds from the United States are a very good class of goods. They are a substantial portion of our imports and by bringing them within the purview of the act we have improved the situation materially.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Laurier to importations from Japan and China and the action taken by the Minister of Finance in co-operation with the Japanese government with respect to the acceptance of quotas by that government. There is nothing much I need to say on that matter in addition to what has been said by the Minister of Finance. The department is administering the provision. I have imposed dumping duties on textiles from China. We have imposed very heavy duties against the protests, of course, of various importers who thought their valuations would be accepted but we refused to accept them. We are still continuing that course of action.

There are other matters, of course, such as discounts. We started to check on this matter a year or so ago and we found that discounts being authorized on imports of textiles were very substantial. As I reported to the house some time ago, we revised these discounts. We issued a new bulletin, appraisers' bulletin No. 12, and whereas discounts had run as high as 20, 25 or 30 per cent we reduced them substantially on the great majority of imports. On cotton sheets, cotton pillow cases, twill and clothing sateen we reduced the discount in each case to a maximum of 5 per cent and 10 per cent on denim. This has made a substantial contribution to the textile industry.

Far be it from me to say that the condition of the industry is good. It is not, and it is a matter which is causing us concern at all times. However, I can say this without fear of contradiction, that if it had not been for some of the steps we have taken and the action which this department has carried out as well as the investigations which are constantly carried out, bad as the condition of the industry is today, it would be infinitely worse if those actions had not been taken.

Mr. Chevrier: It could hardly be worse in certain areas.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not trying to justify the situation. This is a matter over which this department has no control. We have administered the law to the extent that it is humanly possible in order to give the industry all the safeguards and protection which it could possibly receive.

The hon. member for Port Arthur raised a perennial question about which we have had many interesting discussions, the question of censorship. He asked if new instructions had been sent out to our port officers recently in connection with this matter. I can tell him no such instructions have gone out. The administration is exactly the same as it was at that time. It is an interesting problem as to what our position will be as decisions come out, become codified and the law becomes clear. We welcome that because it is a nasty situation in which one finds himself as the ultimate, in one sense, censor. It must be remembered that this only applies to periodicals coming across the border. It does not apply to anything printed in this country. It does not apply to anything on sale in the bookstores. It is only when books come through the customs house that we have a responsibility, and we are attempting to carry it out in the best way possible.

Mr. Fisher: If I may summarize, then, there has been no change at all in the work of the minister's officials in this particular field as a result of the legislative change last year?

Mr. Nowlan: No, the legislative change last year was concerned with administration within Canada. Our responsibility is for goods coming into the country. Obviously there has to be a close correlation between the two. We have made no change in the instructions issued to our officials up to the present time.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask another question before the minister proceeds. Am I not correct in my recollection that a couple of sessions ago the minister expressed a rather determined desire to free himself from this responsibility of censorship? Can he tell the committee whether any progress has been made toward that desirable objective?

Mr. Nowlan: I am afraid the progress has not been as great as the minister would like. There have been discussions between my department and the Department of Justice and the respective ministers thereof. I was very hopeful that some section could be worked out which would relieve this department entirely of any responsibility in connection with the matter. I am told that this is a matter of common practice, of common law, and I guess virtually every jurisdiction in the world which has a customs act has to deal with this problem. Every once in a while we do get books coming through customs and if you dropped them on the floor you would have to clean them up with a shovel. These items do not present a great deal of difficulty. Beyond these the activities of the department have been of a very limited nature and I trust they will always continue to be.

Mr. Pearson: The minister will recall the strong criticism levelled at his predecessor because the government of that day was not able to get rid of that responsibility which the minister of national revenue was exercising. Indeed, he was accused of being rather happy in the exercise of it, which was not true. It did add to his library, but I do not know whether it has served to add to the minister's library?

Mr. Nowlan: No, I have been very careful, I must say, as to the ultimate destination of these books. I can assure you that they are all returned to the deputy minister, and no further inquiry is made. Of course, they only come to me when they have the signature of the deputy minister. In the first place they come through the port officials and finally to the deputy minister. If there is any disagreement about the decision then the book comes to me. I sometimes read of very interesting books in the newspapers and wonder why they do not get to my desk, and I sometimes wonder what would happen if they did. However, it is sometimes my unpleasant responsibility to read these books.

Mr. Pearson: Is it not regrettably true that the deputy minister is soon to acquire a lot of time which he could use for this purpose?

Mr. Nowlan: I will not pass any judgment on that, Mr. Chairman.

I think, too, the hon. member for Port Arthur raised a question about the closing of some ports. He could not understand why the revenue in some cases appeared to be very small and yet the ports would be kept open, whereas in other cases the revenue seemed to be larger and the ports were closed. It is very difficult to lay down any hard and fast rule with respect to these matters. The matter of port administration is always under review. It is true that we have closed some ports, and it is true that we will probably close some more. I get recommendations from time to time from our committee on port administration dealing with these matters, and one has to face these facts.

I pointed out earlier the reduction we had made in our expenditures. This has not been accomplished to any great extent by the closing of ports, but it is in keeping with the efficiency with which we have carried out this division of our responsibility and sometimes, unfortunately, we have to do that. One cannot measure it entirely, although it is a big yardstick, by the dollars received. There is the question of proximity to other ports. It may be that people would have to travel great distances if there were not a port at a certain place, and that is a factor. There is also the factor of security arrangements and the deterrent. If there were not a port in a certain place and there were a road leading from one country to another which was not under surveillance at all I suspect the amount of travel on that particular road would increase. It is necessary sometimes, therefore, to have ports in areas which do not, in themselves, bring in a great deal of money. However, if those ports were not there we would perhaps lose a great deal more money.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to remind the minister that the examples I gave were not of ports on boundaries or international waters, so one part of the minister's reply does not apply.

Mr. Nowlan: I realize that some of them were not on international boundaries, but one example he gave was of a port on the great lakes. There is no hard and fast rule which you can lay down in dealing with this matter. We are trying to deal with it in a way which would render the greatest service to the public with as economic an administration as is possible.

Several hon. members raised again this very interesting problem of the so-called free shops about which there appears to be a great deal of misunderstanding. Of course, hon. members who know the Customs Act and practice realize that there has been no change whatever in so far as the statute, the regulations or the practice is concerned. The simple fact is, of course, and always has been, that importers can bring in goods and have them stored in a customs warehouse. Then it is always possible to re-export the goods. This provision has been made for the convenience of importers.

The department has been giving, and is giving careful consideration to this problem. Certainly if we abrogated that privilege, did away with the right of storage in a customs warehouse, I think the damage done to Canada's trade would be infinitely greater than that which it is feared might be done as a result of these alleged duty-free shops. All that has happened, of course, has been that one or two or a group of people have spent a great deal of money—at least in one instance—in building a retail store and putting in that retail store goods which have been properly imported into Canada and on which duties and taxes have been paid. Tourists would be the only people who would benefit from this provision. They can inspect these things in the store, order them, and then the merchant operating that store can have the goods shipped from the customs warehouse to the respective homes of the customers wherever they might be. This has happened throughout the years. There is nothing new there. I could name firms—I am not going to do so—in the city of Ottawa and all over this country who have carried out this practice. They did not try it for long because it involved them in additional expense and perhaps they would not make as much profit as they would off the ordinary retail store. Now you have somebody trying to capitalize on it.

What effect it will have no one can say. Undoubtedly if it is successful it will at least attract tourists in these areas and all the entries will not be on the red side of the ledger, there will be some credits as well. We are watching this carefully and studying the problem and we are prepared to take whatever action is required. We have already taken certain indirect steps which have I think prevented this from becoming the threat to some of our retailers which was at first feared. Other than that I cannot say more.

I was asked by one hon. member how many investigations we carried out on dumping. I cannot give an answer to that. We are carrying out investigations every day. The investigators are working steadily on these matters and no separate statistics are kept about this.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm about an increase in tariff on cigars and cigar tobacco and also with respect to the dumping of textiles. I have already dealt with the dumping of textiles. As far as cigars and cigar tobacco is concerned, I am responsible for many sins in connection with this act and the administration thereof but I am not responsible for the imposition of the tariff structure. That is a matter for the government or the Minister of Finance, my department being purely administrative. I am sure the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm will draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance the problems of that industry and make such representations with respect to an increase in the tariff as he thinks the facts warrant.

The Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Sudbury and one or two others referred to the fine papers case. That of course is not a matter under my responsibility whatever. As a matter of fact I might say I am not sure that action has been taken in this regard yet, but if it is it will come as a result of discussions between the Department of Finance and the Department of Justice, and if an order in council is necessary as a result of government action as a whole it will be made. But it is nothing coming within the administrative jurisdiction of the Department of National Revenue. As a matter of fact, officially we have no knowledge of the matter whatsoever. There have been no discussions with my officials in connection with it and it is not anything which I can deal with today at all.

The hon. member for Vancouver South raised the question of sales tax exemption on machinery. I think that matter was largely rectified by the amendments we made last year as a result of sitting in committee when investigating the Department of National Revenue. Amendments were made to the Excise Tax Act which I think met that question substantially, although I admit not entirely.

Reference was also made to the importation of United States equipment. As the committee knows, this matter flows from a decision taken years ago, I think a proper decision, when as a result of letters exchanged between the then secretary of state for external affairs for Canada and the United States state department it was agreed that our Crown Assets Corporation would sell certain of these assets which had been brought in here by the United States and would take a flat sum for duty and the money would be remitted to the United States. That was as a result of this exchange of notes and the agreement which was brought into effect in 1953 or 1954, perhaps earlier, and which is still in force.

There is this difference, however, to which I would draw the attention of the committee. A year ago under the powers I have by regulation I imposed a dumping duty on these sales, and now a dump can be applied in the question of valuation.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, who always delights me with his questions, raised the question about ports closing and suggested they be open 24 hours a day. That is not of course an original suggestion; it has been raised by many hon. members, I can assure him. He also made what I thought was a very good suggestion about having a sign on the Columbia river where people using that river coming into Canada could be given directions as to where customs offices were to be found. I hope that will be done and if it is we will have it marked at the bottom in the Herridge style so that everyone will know who is responsible for it.

The hon. member for Fort William raised a matter which I pointed out was entirely out of order, but it was easier to allow it rather than argue. It had to do with the 7½ per cent excise tax on cars, a matter also referred to by one or two other hon. members. That again is a matter for the Minister of Finance. I administer the tax; I collect it, but it is not a matter which comes within the purview of this department and any discussion of that matter should be raised on the estimates of the Minister of Finance.

The hon. member for Fort William also complained about a step which this department took in, shall we say, making Fort William, as he termed it, an outport of Port Arthur. It is true we did make a change there. The collector at Fort William had reached retirement age and had retired; there was competent staff there and we all know the proximity of Fort William and Port Arthur. It certainly does not affect the efficiency of the department or the service. It may be a matter I suppose of some local pride that the port is now the port of Port Arthur and that Fort William is not a port but an outport of Port Arthur; I think that would be the technical description. But as I say the efficiency of the service to the public is exactly the same as before.

The hon. member for Waterloo North raised the matter of excise. There has been a great deal of consolidation in excise offices. We are trying to consolidate them and give better service by centralizing them across Canada instead of having excise offices in most of our ports. Outside of one area about which some complaints have been received we are effecting distinct economies and think we are giving a better service, because in this highly technical field it is desirable to have senior and competent officials in charge of administration.

The hon. member for Grey-Bruce raised again the question of marking goods. He has raised it privately with me before and I think I might say that some progress has been made there.

The hon. member for Laurier raised the problem about the Canadian association of income tax employees, Montreal branch. He was not in the committee when we started our discussion and apparently assumed we were covering both branches of the family, but we were only dealing with customs and excise; however, I will refer to this matter when we come to the taxation branch.

The hon. member for Moose Mountain raised the question of coal machinery. That machinery was brought in on a one sixtieth basis and presents this problem but we are going to study it again.

The hon. member for York North raised the question of "Made in Canada". I think the inference was that perhaps we should not have a "Made in Canada" ruling or that it was a difficult one to administer. We do have more and more requests for that. One of my problems every week is to deal with applications for "Made in Canada" rulings and it is one without which we could not administer the features of the dumping act and many others.

The hon. member for Hull raised the question of the E.24 being in French and English and thought that we could combine the two languages on the one form. We are certainly prepared to take a look at that although I think my officials would say rather whimsically that they have enough trouble with the form in just one language and that if we had both languages on the form the confusion would be more confounded and the minister more damned than at the present time for having to enforce that section. But we will look at the matter.

I think that covers the matters raised.

Mr. Pearson: I did ask a question about the Russian treaty and the procedures for valuations under that treaty.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes. The Leader of the Opposition asked about the procedures which would be followed with respect to goods to be imported from Russia pursuant to the Russian trade treaty. The procedure there is one which is the normal procedure of the department, what we call the third country procedure. In the case of Russia we are dealing with a state-controlled nation where free marketing as we know it does not exist. Therefore we cannot estimate the value for duty purposes in the way we would with respect to goods imported from other countries. So the responsibility falls upon the Minister of National Revenue to devise a method whereby value for duty may be determined, and I propose dealing with imports from Russia and similar countries by invoking the third nation principle; to try to fix a valuation based on that of a similar product from a country where conditions are as comparable with those that obtain in Russia as possible.

There has been a great deal of misunderstanding about this. It has been suggested that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a deal about oil. One would think from some of the things that have been said that this country is being flooded with Russian oil and Russian motor cars. As a matter of fact, there is not a gallon of Russian oil in the country, and outside the members of the diplomatic corps who may have one or two Russian cars, there is not a Russian car in the whole country.

There have been discussions between my officials and prospective importers and with officials of the Russian embassy here as to what method would be followed. That situation has been clarified, but at the moment there are no goods of that nature being brought in, either cars or gas, and no value for duty has yet been assessed by officials of my department.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister if the procedures which he says his department is working out will be influenced in any way by the obligation in the new treaty to import —I forget what the actual figures are—about half as much in valuation as we export. Will that have any influence on the procedure? Further, am I right in saying that at the present time there is no change from previous procedures with regard to Russia? May I finally ask the minister whether it is contemplated that an official of the Department of National Revenue should be stationed in Moscow for this purpose?

Mr. Nowlan: There has been no change in the procedure whatsoever. Of course, attention has to be given to all facets of every problem but certainly in fixing this valuation we have to be guided by the facts as we find them and by the values which exist in comparable areas, if comparable areas can be found, as I think they can. Much as we may want to encourage an increase in trade —and we would be very pleased to see such an increase—we cannot allow that to influence us in fixing values on the basis of a proper comparison. On the advice of my officials I will try to find markets where the conditions are as closely comparable as is possible to find with conditions existing in whatever part of Russia these goods may originate.

As far as the sending of an official to Moscow is concerned, that matter has not yet arisen. It may be necessary to do so, but we have no immediate intention of doing so.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, the present plight of the confectionery and pure chocolate industry in Canada has been brought to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), and I thought he would have given us the views of his department on the matter, because I know the minister is aware that that industry is facing serious competition from importers who are putting chocolate products on the market at a price lower than the costs to Canadian manufacturers. Might not the minister, with the co-operation of his officials, investigate the situation with a view to eliminating the 11 per cent tax on Canadian made confectionery and chocolate products, which raises the cost of such products?

I also wonder whether the minister would consider raising the tariff on the entry of such products, so as to enable—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member is talking about raising or lowering tariffs. That does not come under this department, but under the Department of Finance.

Mr. Valade: I thought that since questions of this kind were permitted before I would be allowed to produce them myself.

The Deputy Chairman: The minister has said he cannot answer these questions and I do not see any reason for asking him any more at the moment.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: In that case, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister might consider classifying chocolates and candy as foods rather than luxuries. This would in effect remove the 11 per cent tax that weights upon that Canadian industry.

One confectionery manufacturer, in my constituency, is in serious trouble because of that tariff. He employs a few hundred workers, and I think that Canadian manufacturers of confectionery provide jobs for thousands of people across the country. I wonder, therefore, whether chocolate and sweets could not be regarded as foods rather than luxury products. This would reduce the cost to the manufacturer, and hence the selling price in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: I must apologize to the hon. member for Lafontaine who raised the same question a while ago. I completely forgot to reply when I was speaking and I apologize to him. He asked specifically about any agreement or discussion which took place between the Minister of Finance and the chocolate manufacturers a short time ago. Of course, the discussion was in very general terms. The manufacturers made representations which were not entirely novel or original, to the effect that this was an evil tax and that it should be reduced or done away with. The minister listened very patiently to those representations, and that was the extent of any obligation that was undertaken or of the discussion which took place. I was there, and that is what took place as I recall it.

The hon. member for St. Marie raised roughly the same problem. This, of course, as you pointed out, Mr. Chairman, is a budget matter, a matter which comes within the purview of the Minister of Finance. It concerns the rates of taxation and is something over which I have no direct responsibility, though I have an indirect one as a member of the government and, also, of course, as a member of the House of Commons.

The chocolate manufacturers visited me last week. The biscuit manufacturers turned out what at one time was called a chocolate bar. They now print across the label that it is a biscuit, and they rejoice in the freedom they have found in the change of label and also in having avoided an excise tax, because a decision of the tariff board has been handed down that biscuits are tax free. So I think this has been a good thing for the printing industry, since new labels have been printed very rapidly. There are other cases which are going to the tariff board as far as these items are concerned. As far as taxation is involved, that is a budgetary matter and will be dealt with at the appropriate time.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the minister if he would elaborate on his answer concerning the duty-free shops. There seems to be a good deal of confusion about them, and the minister will recall there was a great deal of concern about them in March of this year with particular reference to a proposed new enterprise at Niagara Falls.

The minister will also recall that a question was asked on the subject as appears in Hansard of March 3 of this year by the late hon. member for Niagara Falls to which an answer was given at that time. I think the answer is good as far as it goes, but I wonder if the minister could tell us exactly how this works out under sections 64 and 79 of the Customs Act, and give us a little more information with respect to the operation as it applies in such places as the Gananoque bridge where there was a great deal of talk about a proposed shop being operated, and Niagara Falls, and other places of that nature as distinguished from the operation carried on by regular merchants in inland cities where they do operate a certain portion of their trade in this way but only as a small factor of their total trade and where the articles that are being sold out of the bonded warehouse on a duty-free basis are shown in their stores in competition with similar Canadian articles. I am thinking of inland shops dealing with such things as woollen products and dishes from the United Kingdom and that sort of thing. If the minister would elaborate on the distinction it would be useful to have it on the record.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know if I am in a position to elaborate. I have now forgotten what I previously said when speaking on the matter only a few moments ago.

As I point out there have always been bonded customs warehouses in this country where importers could bring goods in and store them and take them out at their convenience and pay a duty on them and use them themselves or re-export them—without the payment of duty or tax, of course,—and as long as they are in the warehouse they are not technically in Canada. I think I may say that. It is from this that someone got the bright idea of taking it one step further.

He was storing goods in the customs warehouse without the payment of duty. The goods were there along with millions of dollars worth of other goods such as are found in bonded customs warehouses all over the country. He takes from that warehouse a watch or a clock or a pair of stockings or some such article and pays on it the duty and excise tax if any is applicable. He then puts it in the store window. In the case we are thinking of he has built a retail store. It is not a large one but it is a store where these things are on display. A tourist who goes in there can pick out these expensive goods. Usually, of course, they are in the semi-luxury class such as woollens, china and so on. That night—depending on how good the service is that the man gives—he can have his clerk work or he can go and work all night or have the staff in the warehouse work if he is willing to pay for it because the warehouse does not operate for free, mind you, and he can package these goods and they are then sent out of the country. Technically they have never been in. They were only in the warehouse and then out they go. They do not pay excise tax or duty. A tourist must stay here at least 48 hours before he can make a purchase. He cannot just flip across the line and buy his goods and go right home. He has to stay 48 hours and he may stay longer.

Mr. McIlraith: There is a limitation on the amount set by his own country.

Mr. Nowlan: The Americans are more generous than we are. They may spend $200 or $300—whatever it is—if they are here for 48 hours and it goes up proportionately. If they are here 12 days, which would be a good thing in many ways for the tourist industry of Canada, they can go back home and take with them or have shipped to them there $500 worth of goods. They do not have to take the goods home. The United States act is much more lenient than ours. We insist, as some hon. members know to their cost, that you bring the goods back with you. You carry them back. Under the United States act you can ship the goods back. That makes it possible for people to make purchases of this kind but they must be here at least 48 hours. They must be here a minimum of 12 days to get the maximum benefit of the thing which is viewed as a threat to our industry by Canadian merchants but during this time they would likely spend lots of money in restaurants, motels and so forth. At the worst it is not an unmixed deal.

This department has received many protests, not many but they have been localized. My late lamented friend raised it with me pointedly. We know what we can do but it would involve changes in the regulations and statute and the last stage might be worse than the first. If the situation developed to the extent concerning which fears have been expressed we will undoubtedly have to take some action.

Mr. McIlraith: I have two questions on that point. First, is any licence required from the department for the operation of the so-called duty-free shops?

Mr. Nowlan: Nothing whatever is required for the shop. There is, of course, a licence for the operation of the warehouse.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I have a question on the order paper for the minister's department in connection with Quetico park. I think it would be out of order for me to attempt to bring it up here. I have been bothered by my own inability to understand the scope and nature of the problem raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River by correspondence with the department. I have brought it up since. I would appreciate the minister giving me an assurance that his department will send me a résumé of the whole problem and how it may be approached and if anything can be done to stop the practice that arises from the fact that the people of the United States exploit the park more than Canadians do although it is a joint project.

Can the minister also tell me how many decisions he made last year under section 38 of the act? I know he made a couple in January but I want to know how this section is working out.

Mr. Nowlan: I could not give an answer to that, Mr. Chairman. Some decisions are made by me personally. Others are fairly well laid down in the department. I made a decision on Russian pig iron and Chinese textiles. That was one class with which I dealt personally. I cannot answer that question. Frankly I would have to check the records and files and even then I would not be able to give a definite answer.

Mr. Fisher: I am wondering if the changes in the act are working well. Are they effective? Does the minister make regular use of them?

Mr. Nowlan: As I said when I brought in the section, I made an honest woman out of the department. Many administrative practices had been carried on previously without any definite authorization by statute. We incorporated them all in the act and are now operating under the statute.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, how many appeals from customs rulings are now pending before the tariff board? How does the number compare with the comparable figure a year ago? Approximately how many appeals have to do with appeals on "made in Canada" ruling?

Mr. Nowlan: I shall try to get the information for the hon. member in a moment.

Mr. Pugh: I should like to ask the minister a question with reference to section 40A7(b) of the Customs Act, the section dealing with fair value for duty for fruits and vegetables. Will the minister comment on progress being made on the submission made through the Canadian horticultural council? The point is, what procedure will be followed to give immediate effect to an application as, if and when made for the establishment of a value for duty on any fruit or vegetable?

Before answering the question will the minister permit me to state that the fruit and vegetable market price-wise is a touchy one. Imports, small in quantity but based on quantity of sales at fair sale prices in the country of origin can ruin our price for the remainder of the season. Unless action is taken immediately when justified our total returns in specific cases may well go below the cost of production.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, when I was replying this afternoon there were one or two members who had raised questions which inadvertently I had forgotten to deal with. Perhaps I can mention those at the moment. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard raised the questions of customs pre-clearance and compared our practice with that existing in the United States. This is a very complicated matter; it raises many problems of administration; but it is one which is receiving the attention of the department.

The hon. member for Wetaskiwin and also the hon. member for Kootenay East raised the question of excise tax on uniforms for school bands. I recall very well the individual case to which the hon. member for Wetaskiwin referred. The hon. member for Kootenay East also raised a similar problem with respect to the application of sales tax on such organizations. This, of course, is a matter which one can look upon with a great deal of sympathetic interest, but after all, we are governed by the statute and we have to apply the statute as we find it at the moment. Generally speaking, unless there are very unusual circumstances, we have to administer the statute and parliament will have to decide what changes should be made in it.

The hon. member for Lethbridge raised the question of why it was that automatic stock waterers were classified as farm implements and therefore free of duty and stock feeders were not. There is a very simple answer to that question which perhaps does not satisfy anyone, but this is the situation. We administer the act. Under the Tariff Act one of those implements is described and named specifically in a section which provides for duty free entry. The other article to which the hon. member referred is not mentioned and therefore it must be classified under a different tariff section. That is how the difference arises between these two implements which perhaps to a layman, might be looked upon as both being agricultural implements and entitled to the same treatment.

The hon. member for Ottawa West raised the question of how many appeals there were to the tariff board. Frankly I am not in a position to answer that question. The tariff board, although it deals with problems affecting this department, comes under the aegis of the Minister of Finance and reports to the Minister of Finance, who has to deal with it. I would suggest to the hon. member that he should get the information there. I would be very glad to get the information and send it to him, but we do not have it here before us; we have not it available in the department at the moment. I am sure if he raises it on the estimates of the Minister of Finance he can get the answer then.

Mr. McIlraith: I would never get the answer from him.

Mr. Nowlan: If this is satisfactory to the hon. member I will undertake to see that he gets an answer within a day or so; I will send it to him personally.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps I did not make myself clear. What I am concerned with is the part of the matter that is the responsibility of the minister namely the number of appeals pending from the rulings made by the customs division. My concern is whether or not the machinery of the tariff board is working with sufficient dispatch to prevent any unreasonable delay in the hearing of appeals from customs rulings. That is the point I am really concerned with.

Mr. Nowlan: I can only answer that in very general terms. My impression is—and it is confirmed by information which I receive from official sources—that probably there is a slightly increased load on the tariff board. I am not sure whether you spell "slightly" with a capital "S" or a small "s" but nevertheless the tariff board is carrying on and is administering its functions. I do not think it is markedly different from what it has been during the last few years.

The hon. member for—I have forgotten his constituency; I know he would say he represents all of the apple growers in Canada, however, since I come from the Annapolis valley I question the fact—raised a question with respect—

Mr. Pugh: If I may interrupt the minister just for a moment my constituency is Okanagan Boundary, but my colleague sitting across the way, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, feels exactly the same way as I do on this question; certainly we work together on it.

Mr. Nowlan: I know very well the interest that the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary and other members from British Columbia, including the minister who comes from Kamloops, have taken in this problem. We have had many discussions of it. As hon. members well know, there was a time lag between the time the legislation was passed by the house and the time when this particular section was proclaimed. The hon. member has asked me where the situation stands at the moment. It is not a simple problem as there are various facets involved in it. All I can say at the moment is that discussions are taking place. As a matter of fact, there were discussions today between representatives of various departments of the government and also with some reference to our United States friends who should be kept in touch with our plans so that in the end machinery will be evolved which, when required will bring this section into operative effect with respect to specific problems which may be brought before me.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish to pursue the question of appeals to the tariff board a little further in order to make myself perfectly clear. The work load of the tariff board has been increasing over the years, as is inevitable in a growing country and as industrial development progresses. There are two main facets to the work load. One has to do with appeals to the tariff board against rulings of the customs department in which instance the board performs a quasi-judicial function in hearing appeals and interpreting the law. The other facet of the board's work load has to do with investigations it conducts by reason of references on the part of the government to the board of matters the government wishes investigated. That is a wholly different function. My concern is to be sure that the work load arising from references by the government through the Minister of Finance is not so extensive as to preclude the board from performing expeditiously its work as a quasi-judicial tribunal in hearing appeals against rulings of the customs department.

I leave this subject with the request that the minister watch the situation closely. If we come to the point where it is desirable that the functions of the tariff board be rearranged in such a way that one tribunal will hear regular appeals and another tribunal will conduct investigations, I trust the minister will press forward to the end that the work of his own department will not be jeopardized or hampered in any way.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the interest of the hon. member. I will get the information I promised him and send it to him forthwith. A little bird somewhere—I am not sure where—whispered to me a moment ago that with the efficiency of this department there are very few questions that need to be appealed to the tariff board so that the tariff board is not being overworked at all in that regard.

Mr. McIlraith: I should like to ask the minister about the accommodation provided for the head office of the customs and excise division. There has been a bad problem for a number of years in this regard and it was sharply aggravated during the last war by reason of the shortage of space in Ottawa. It is my feeling that the accommodation allocated to this part of the government service has not been adequate enough to permit it to carry on its functions in the way that they should be carried on. It is also true that the situation has not been wholly satisfactory in the case of individual taxpayers wishing to discuss highly confidential problems with officials of the branch. They have to meet the officials with whom they are concerned at a desk in a very large room containing a great many other people hard at work. This is disturbing both to the employees and to the person who is dealing with officials of the branch.

With the completion of the large number of buildings that have been under construction for some years now I hope the department will be able to secure such accommodation as it feels is necessary and adequate for the purposes of the work it has to carry on.

Mr. Nowlan: I appreciate the interest that the hon. member has taken in this matter. He raised it last year on my estimates and I concur entirely in what he says. A terrible situation existed in that appraisers were working in one room and a businessman coming in to discuss his affairs with an appraiser could very easily be talking to a competitor at the same time as he was talking to the appraiser. To a reasonably satisfactory degree that situation has been ameliorated, although I will not say it has been corrected. We have made quite a substantial improvement in that regard so that at least people can feel free to talk to our officials without broadcasting information to all and sundry.

I quite agree with the hon. member that there is still room for improvement and I hope that the hope he has expressed about more space being available is not entirely a pious one because I share exactly the same hope. I am looking forward to the time when the officials of this department, as well as others who I hope will be mentioned in a very few minutes in connection with another branch of this family and whose need is equally as great as those in the customs branch, will be able to have entirely satisfactory accommodation.

Mr. McIlraith: I suggest to the minister that he is a very durable person. His colleagues, the present Minister of Public Works and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who formerly held the public works portfolio, have devoted their attention ever since the change of government to finishing buildings that were started by the predecessor government and have not been noted for their capacity to originate new buildings. In saying this I am suggesting arguments that the minister may use on them. The present government has merely contented itself with finishing buildings started by the former government and has not originated any new buildings.

I hope the minister will have sufficient influence and be able to exert sufficient pressure on his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, so that the department will be provided with the kind of accommodation it requires because unfortunately taxation in Canada is very real and severe and it is a gigantic business. The department is not accommodated in the way it should be to perform its functions efficiently. I hope the minister will be able to make a real impression on his colleagues and have appropriate accommodation provided.

I also want to ask him a purely local question about accommodation having to do with the provision of the new building at Prescott in connection with the construction of the new bridge across the St. Lawrence. What is the state of construction of that building, when will it be available and precisely what is happening with respect to it.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member referred to a local question which was raised this afternoon. This matter depends, of course, upon the construction of the bridge. As the hon. member knows, the bridge authorities are responsible for providing quarters for the department and we are conducting conversations about this matter. As a matter of fact, by coincidence, discussions were held today on a similar question relative to the proposed international bridge at Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. Conversations are going on with the bridge authorities with respect to their plans so that we can make sure that we will have satisfactory quarters when the bridge is completed.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it expected that the quarters will be available when the bridge is completed?

Mr. Nowlan: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Taxation division—

262. General administration, $3,414,200.

Mr. Godin: Is it the intention of the minister to make a statement at this time on this item of his estimates?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a brief statement on the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue. I am not going to elaborate at this time on the operations and functions of this division. I am certain everyone will agree with me that present day circumstances have not in any way decreased the work load involved in administering the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act. I am, therefore, only going to comment very briefly on the costs of operation and give you some up to date figures with respect to our work load.

According to our estimates, this year this division will require $32,990,000 to carry on operations for 1960-61. This represents again, as I pointed out this afternoon in connection with customs and excise, a reduction of $217,000 when compared with the amounts which were appropriated for this division last year. As I mentioned this afternoon, and perhaps I will be forgiven for stressing it here, these two divisions are showing relatively substantial savings and at the same time, as I will show in a moment, are carrying a heavier work load than has ever been carried before.

There has been a decrease in the staff, and the estimated requirement to pay the working force for the new year has been reduced by $260,000. This reduction is, of course, offset to the extent of $43,000 because of anticipated increases in the costs of supplies, office stationery, and so on and so forth, and I might say legal expenses and travelling expenses. These minor increases are unavoidable as it is only reasonable that such items of expenditure will increase in relation to the increase in the work load.

The question which is probably foremost in the minds of many hon. members is, how is this increasing work load being efficiently handled when the number of employees has actually decreased? The answer to this question is that the division is continually seeking improved methods and techniques in the processing of its work. The achievements in this regard have been, I would suggest to the committee, without indulging in superlatives, remarkable. One has only to look at the statistics of the past three years to realize that the division has attained maximum results with minimum costs.

Taking the statistics as at March 31, 1959, it is computed that the cost to collect each $100 of tax was $1.05, and that there were 796 returns filed for each person employed in the division. The corresponding figures as at the end of March, 1960 show that the cost to collect each $100 of tax was $1. It is estimated that the total returns to be filed for the taxation year 1959 will be 5,860,000. This will mean that there will be approximately 1,002 returns for each employee in the department. I might say, in parenthesis, that last week I had the pleasure of having luncheon at a certain place at which there was an ambassador of one of the largest industrial nations in the world who discussed with me the costs of collecting taxes. He informed me that in his country it was estimated it cost $5 for every $100 of income tax they received. When I told him our figures he found them rather difficult to believe. Afterwards we gave him a breakdown of the costs and he certainly was very congratulatory to us in his references to the efficiency of this department.

This, I would say, confirms the fact that the division has achieved at least commendable results in handling an increased work load of the more routine work at decreased cost. However, the handling of the more complex types of income tax returns continues to be a serious problem. There is still a shortage, as the hon. member for Laurier mentioned this afternoon, of qualified assessors capable of carrying out these difficult investigations and assessments which have to be made. Every effort is being made to attract this type of staff to the division.

I must say, in view of the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member for Laurier this afternoon—the competition of private industry—our success in that field has not been anything about which I would want to boast. I would stress here again, as was intimated by the hon. member, that this is not entirely the responsibility of this department. We have a civil service commission which fixes generally the over-all rates. We have the treasury board which, as they think, rather controls the relationship between departments with even-handed justice, but the results are not always satisfactory to a particular department which is facing one of these headaches.

The processing of the less complicated returns for the province of Ontario—I think this is something new this year—with the use of modern punch-card and electronic equipment put into effect this year has proved most satisfactory. It is anticipated that this centralized operation will be geared to handle more and more of these returns and consequently will enable the division to reduce the seasonal workers who each year have been processing these returns on a manual method basis.

Re-assessing, which reflects the work of field investigations and desk audits, has resulted in tax increases during 1959-60 for T-1 and T-2 returns, excluding accounting adjustments, of $69.8 million and $49.1 million respectively. This may be compared with $51.2 million and $52.4 million for the previous fiscal year.

The appropriation requested for the operation of the tax appeal board is approximately the same as last year. There is a small increase in the administration expenses almost all of which is needed for the increased cost for court reporters who are used to transcribe the evidence given in the hearing of appeals. As you know, the tax appeal board carries out a very important function in allowing a taxpayer to appeal his tax assessment at very little cost. With the continuing increase in the number of taxpayers in Canada the volume of appeals being filed with the board has continued to increase. During the first three months of 1960 there was a total of 124 appeals filed with the board; during the same period in 1959, the total number of appeals filed was 104; that is an increase of 20 per cent. Similarly, the inventory of appeals outstanding and awaiting hearing has also increased. There were 531 appeals outstanding on March 30, 1960, compared with 446 at the same time in 1959.

There are many other matters to which I could refer but I think I have given a brief outline of some of the salient points connected with the activities of this division. Of course, I would be very glad to answer any questions with which I can deal or comment generally upon any matters to which reference is made during the course of this debate.

Mr. Godin: The committee undoubtedly appreciates any indication of a decrease in the cost of operation of a department, especially this one from which most of the revenue is derived. However, there may be a fear that possibly in reducing costs the department is lessening the services which it renders.

Earlier today I had occasion to mention the fact that the tax returns of individuals in northern Ontario, that is the short form return, were directed to the Ottawa office this year instead of the Sudbury office. I should like to know if this has meant a decrease in the staff of the Sudbury office, and if the minister feels that the same service can be rendered to the public by having them correspond with Ottawa to find a solution to their problems instead of going to the Sudbury office. Perhaps the minister would like to wait and give his answer later or perhaps he might like to give it now.

Mr. Nowlan: No, I will wait.

Mr. Godin: There is another problem which pertains to the estate tax assessment branch. The act, of course, simply states that joint property is considered to be the property of the deceased person, except of course if proper proof of the segregation of ownership is properly given to the department. It has been found in many assessments that the department takes the absolute view that joint property is the property of the deceased in total. I realize that the estate can appeal and attempt to prove that the joint property was not fully the property of the deceased.

I would like to place before the minister a sample case and perhaps the minister will realize how some estates are very much embarrassed by the way the assessment is made by his department. Say a couple in 1920 purchased two lots of land and placed their property as a joint tenancy. Supposing they were worth about $500. In 1930, as they have been able to save, they are prepared to borrow perhaps $30,000 or $35,000 and build an apartment building on those two lots for $50,000 after getting the loan. From the proceeds of this apartment building, which is in the name of both of them, they pay back the $35,000. I argue it is joint property because they went into the venture and they paid this sum back from the profits of the property.

Then in 1960 the husband dies and the building is then worth $125,000 or $150,000 and the estate is taxed accordingly. I know they are told they can appeal and show certain evidence, but I find this rule works unfairly against them. If the husband had died in 1925 when the lots were worth about $500 they would have been considered his property if the wife could not show she had paid half. You are bound to get an increase in the value of a building, and if a building costs in 1925, say, $50,000, in 1960 it would definitely be worth around $125,000.

My argument is that this widow on appeal might possibly be able to substantiate her case, but perhaps the minister could review the matter and the rules and the regulations with regard to assessment relating to properties built with loans. If that loan is repaid from the revenue of the building the person who survives, say a widow, should be credited with the capital which accrues to her and it should not be considered part of the estate of the deceased.

A further problem which troubles many legal firms and estates is this. In the sale of a property after the death of a person there is a refusal to consider as an expense against the sale of that property the sales commission paid to the real estate broker. Many people have failed to realize why that state of affairs exists but apparently it does, and I suggest that the regulations of the revenue department and its method of assessment and so on undoubtedly brings about in many instances burdens to an estate, especially in the case of a widow who is possibly faced with the prospect of retaining what she and her husband managed to save during their lifetime.

Mr. Hanbidge: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Revenue deserves a certain amount of credit for the efficiency of his department and in the manner in which the staff co-operates with the general public in the matter of customs and excise. I should like to corroborate his statement with regard both to himself and his officials of this particular branch, the taxation division.

I have had occasion to contact him once in a while on behalf of the odd individual who felt he had not been fairly dealt with by the income tax department, and when the minister and his officials got through with that individual in practically every case he felt he was not being charged sufficient penalties, interest and so forth and the department should really charge more.

Having dealt with that point I should like to lay in the minister's lap one of the troubles which has come my way. Some weeks ago I had a letter from a prominent lawyer in Saskatchewan with regard to the estate tax branch. In the eastern part of the province, as the minister probably knows, some of the old homesteads carry with them mineral rights. In other cases mineral lands are acquired or purchased from the C.P.R. or some other company and in the southeast corner of the province where those mineral rights exist, particularly oil rights in the part of the province where oil has been found, the estate tax branch is charging rather phenomenal values for lands carrying those mineral and oil rights. Whether or not oil has been discovered, in certain cases the department is charging such fantastic sums that it is a burden on the estate. Unfortunately my file has not been kept too well for some little time and the correspondence I have had in this connection has been mislaid, but in substance that is the fact.

It is a different proposition where oil has been discovered. In that case naturally where wells are producing those oil rights can very well be taxed; but where the mineral rights exist and the owner has ownership of the mineral rights but oil has not been discovered, they do not know whether there is any value to be placed upon it or not. This particular solicitor I am speaking about felt that the department was charging him too much.

I just bring that to the minister's attention and if I can locate the correspondence I would be glad to turn it over to him.

Mr. Robichaud: In introducing the taxation division of his department a few moments ago the minister referred to the staff decrease which has involved savings of $270,000. In New Brunswick the population is served by the Saint John office and we all know that the citizens of New Brunswick are called upon to pay income tax whether they are farmers, fishermen, wage earners or others. In New Brunswick 42 per cent of the population are French speaking.

I would like to know from the minister what is the total number of employees in the Saint John office, and what percentage of those employees are classified as bilingual. I know that in the past we have had several complaints from French speaking taxpayers in New Brunswick to the effect that they could not be served in their own language by the Saint John office and I do not think there is any need for such complaints.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, it is hardly necessary for me to compliment the minister because he knows the high regard held of him on this side of the house. However, I should like to join with my colleagues in congratulating his staff in particular, and I am sure the members of the committee will agree that no member of the civil service of Canada has a more difficult job and probably has more epithets directed at him. No one has done his work more conscientiously and I think for the benefit of all taxpayers he should be congratulated.

I want to remind the minister and his staff of two recommendations which were made a year ago by the estimates committee and to which he made some reference. I am referring specifically to our suggestion on the interpretation of taxation statutes.

We said at that time that the line separating taxable income from capital gain has in our view produced an area of uncertainty, particularly with regard to venture undertakings. We also argued that this lack of a clarity could act as a deterrent to resource development where high risk is involved. We went on to suggest a number of remedies and we came to the conclusion that one possible remedy would be to examine the advantages or disadvantages of providing advance taxation rulings in corporate or individual financial undertakings.

Otherwise, two problems arise. The first concerns a fair definition of what a business profit is, and what can be taxed as compared with a capital gain which is tax free, and the second point concerns the age old problem of knowing as a taxpayer exactly what your position is in the absence of competent advice as to whether or not your income is taxable. We have heard it said by taxpayers that the department is inclined to take the attitude: you go ahead and play the game, and we will make the rules afterwards. This I think exaggerates the situation but nevertheless that is an impression widely held. I would ask the minister to comment on this.

I would ask him also to make some further reference to the tax appeal board which he mentioned in his opening remarks. We noted a year ago that the board does indeed have a great deal of work. In fact, we said that while we appreciated that in some cases appeals were delayed at the request of an applicant, only 94 were postponed, 91 were listed for hearing and 188 were not dealt with at all, and we ended by recommending that the personnel should be increased so as to expedite the hearings, and we felt this was an important consideration.

Finally, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a matter concerning assessment procedure and the assessment of individuals. We questioned whether there should not be greater uniformity in levying assessments from one area of Canada to another, and asked if greater liaison could not be brought about between one branch of his department and the others. The minister himself referred to the assessors and talked about the necessity of maintaining an informed and well-trained body of assessors in Canada. Certainly there could be no more important group of people in the department because, in the final analysis, they take our money.

In our examination of the department we were concerned about the training that some of the assessors had received and we were also concerned because in many instances after they had been trained they were lost to private industry. In effect the department was carrying on a training school for industry. The minister referred to this and pointed out that it was one of the problems. Our conclusion was that he should twist the arm of his colleague the Minister of Finance, in the hope that a more attractive scale of salaries could be applied so that these people might be encouraged to remain in the department. I leave these three thoughts with the minister and close by saying that through his supervision this is another department of the government which is doing an exceedingly fine job.

Mr. Herridge: I rise to bring to the attention of the minister a matter which has been drawn to my attention by important leaders in various C.C.F. groups and trade unions across Canada and by a good number of individuals who are showing increasing concern about the the tax exemptions granted by the department to corporations and persons who subscribe to Moral Re-Armament.

The increased interest in this question has arisen because of the spate of full page advertisements which have appeared in practically every daily newspaper in Canada. A person who went to the trouble of calculating the cost of these advertisements estimated it was around $350,000. I want to make it clear that the objections are on two grounds. First of all, the persons who write to me and ask me to bring this matter to the attention of the committee, which I promised to do, say that this is not a religious organization and that it is therefore not qualified for exemption by law as bona fide religious organizations are and, second, the persons who write to me question the objectives and purposes of this organization which they view with considerable suspicion since they are in great doubt as to the real purposes of this organization.

I wish to emphasize before going further that I am going to read some strong resolutions. I recognize the integrity and sincerity of many individuals who subscribe to and support this organization, people who are attracted by its public appeals and the philosophy which it advances. I recognize that, and I do not for a moment question their sincerity or the objectives and purposes which they believe in. However, since this matter has been brought to my attention I have made a careful study of the whole situation and I want to bring to the attention of the minister a few of the representations which have been directed to me.

The first item I wish to read into the record is a resolution passed by the provincial convention of the C.C.F. in Alberta at the last provincial conference as follows—

Mr. Jones: Where was this convention held?

Mr. Herridge: We are not like the Progressive Conservative party, we hold annual conventions.

Mr. Ricard: Being such a small party it is easy to do.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Herridge: I wish the hon. member opposite would refrain from depositing his verbal offal in this chamber. The resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas this convention is wholeheartedly in favour of the application of moral principles to our standards of national and international behaviour, and recognizes that there is a great need for moral improvement in the world today, and
> Whereas the C.C.F. is a party which, by putting humanity first strives to bring about a more moral social and political order,
>
> Nevertheless this convention believes that we must not allow ourselves to be deceived into supporting the enemies of peace, tolerance and a just social order, merely because they use the language of religion and morality.
>
> This convention believes that M.R.A. is such a movement, and that we must look beneath its high sounding claims to absolute honesty, purity and love, to the sordid reality beneath.
> If M.R.A. used its influence to free the black peoples of Africa, to end segregation in the U.S., to seek equality and justice for minorities everywhere, if it were in the forefront of the movement for disarmament and the abolition of nuclear weapons, if it really did strive for world peace and brotherhood, then it would be worthy of our support.
> But it does none of these things, for it is chiefly occupied in spreading propaganda which aims at the intensification of the cold war and in building up in our minds the rigid ideology more appropriate to a militaristic dictatorship than to a free democracy.
> Therefore be it resolved that this convention condemns M.R.A. as a movement which is opposed to the standards of honesty, tolerance and concern for humanity, which we believe characterize the C.C.F.
>
> The convention further protests against the fact that contributions to M.R.A. are deductible for income tax purposes so that the public treasury is depleted by the amount of taxes which otherwise would be paid to the exchequer on the amount of the gifts. Therefore the result is that as taxpayers we are forced to contribute to a movement whose aims and purposes we deplore.
>
> Be it further resolved that this convention contends that M.R.A. is a political and not a religious organization and urges the national executive to seek a legal test on M.R.A.'s status at an early date.

Mr. Ricard: Where are the others?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Herridge: I cannot hear the hon. gentleman at this distance. This expresses the opinion of many people in various walks of life. That is why I read it.

Mr. Grafftey: Your's or the old party's?

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question? A little while ago I asked him what party it was that had moved the resolution of which he has spoken and he replied in general terms. Again I ask the hon. member this question. This is something we would like to know. What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. Herridge: I misheard what the hon. member said the first time. This is a resolution passed at the annual provincial convention of the C.C.F. held in Edmonton recently.

Mr. Benidickson: By telephone?

Mr. Jones: The C.C.F. of Alberta?

Mr. Herridge: Yes. I will give a few illustrations to show how widespread the opposition is.

Mr. Grafftey: Oh yes, please do.

Mr. Herridge: The following letter was written to me by the president of the Trail and district smelter workers' union:

At this time I am writing on a matter of great concern to our membership.

The membership consists of between 3,000 and 4,000 people. I continue:

The last few days has shown another surge in Moral Re-Armament propaganda in our local public press. We have no reason to oppose legitimate paid ads in any paper, however, we find that at the bottom corner of the page all donations to Moral Re-Armament are deductible for income tax purposes.

It is our position that since Dr. Frank Buchman has taken it upon himself to organize such a thing and no legitimate trade union has backed such a move and that all these donations are from big business, who are forced to deal with the workers, that tax evasion through such an organization is the ultimate end. Therefore, whether or not we like it we are paying for something that is against trade unions and all working people in particular.

A motion passed last night at our regular membership meeting—where there was a good cross-representation, political-wise—has directed me to urge you to question this in the house at the first opportunity that may arise.

I replied that I would bring it to the attention of the minister and the committee. I have another letter from the united automobile workers political action department in Toronto which states in part:

Don Houston in an issue of UAW ammunition a few years ago described M.R.A. as designed to "relieve the individual of all responsibility for solving economic and political problems and that God alone could solve such problems—M.R.A. not only relieves the conscience of political and business leaders, but it provides security for them at the same time. By diverting support from programs which would try to solve such man-made problems as unemployment, M.R.A. gains support from industrialists."

An hon. Member: What a tiresome old bore.

Mr. Herridge: It goes on to state:

Buchman's association with German nazi leaders in the thirties is commonly known. The World-Telegram of New York carried stories of Buchman's activities with such headlines as "Fascist World Rule by God, Buchman Idea" and quotes Buchman as saying, "I thank heaven for a man like Adolph Hitler—through such a man God could control a nation overnight and solve every last bewildering problem—they (social problems) could be solved through a God-controlled fascist dictatorship."

A. P. Herbert, a British M.P., is quoted in the House of Commons debates, September 7, 1941 as saying the technique and language of Buchman's group is strikingly similar to that of the nazis; that everything done against them is persecution but "they can ride roughshod over the feelings of everybody in the name of God."

Church spokesmen condemning M.R.A. include representatives of both Catholic and Protestant churches. Buchman has never divulged the source of his income which is estimated to be at least $2 million a year. Labour people have every reason to be more than suspicious of M.R.A.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, surely the hon. gentleman has read enough.

Mr. Herridge: I have another one from the oil, chemical and atomic workers international union. The concluding paragraph states:

What I would like to know is, how in the world a contribution to this scabby outfit entitles a person to deduct same from income tax. In no way can we call upon them to provide us with a financial statement; the labour movement has tried. In no way are they a charitable organization: it would appear to me that they are a capitalist front for a war mongering crew.

If you have any information on this, would you please let me know.

I have a number of others but I will not take time to read them. However, I want to give a cross-section of opinion. There is a strong feeling about this in our group and in the trade union movement in Canada.

You find many articles in the paper on this subject. One written by Jack Scott, columnist for the Vancouver Sun is of interest and is very critical of M.R.A.

Mr. Grafftey: We have had enough letters.

Mr. Herridge: However, I will not read it. I have another article entitled "Moral Re-Armament—friend or foe" which was sent to me a few days ago which is very critical of M.R.A. Recently the Toronto Star carried an article by Pierre Burton which states in part:

No Cultural Changes—Peaceful co-existence is part of the party line. Anybody who advocates neutrality or pacifism is a partyliner (i.e. a communist). If you believe red China ought to be recognized or traded with or admitted to the United Nations, then you are a communist in Buchman's book.

To discredit Chiang Kai-shek is to follow the party line. To advocate total world disarmament is to follow the party line. To urge cultural exchanges—or indeed any contact—between east and west is to follow the party line.

"When a Montgomery, a Billy Graham, a group of governors, senators or industrialists visit Moscow they are entertained there by those who are planning their funeral", says Buchman's pamphleteer. Then he goes on to quote with approval a Swedish bishop who said: "Inviting Khrushchev to our country is the same as letting the enemy through the front line in a shooting war. It is wrong, unwise and stupid."

Thus we know what Moral Re-Armament is against. It is against any meeting of minds in the communist and non-communist world. It is for war—not necessarily a shooting war, but certainly a name-calling, rooftop shouting, hosannah-singing war. It is no accident that M.R.A. pamphlets stating that "World War III has begun" were distributed around the world on the eve of the summit fiasco.

It is more difficult to discover what else M.R.A. stands for (outside of those ever-present absolutes). As one Roman Catholic observer has commented about Buchmanism, it is "quite unaware of any social mission" and has "instituted no works of charity for the poverty-stricken or unemployed". It is much more concerned with what it calls "a superior ideology with a superior strategy" and "the incorruptible and inspired leadership that alone can create a full and free life for the nation."

Superiority and leadership are twin concepts that run like a twisted thread through Dr. Buchman's checkered career as a fashionable evangelist among the well-to-do. He has, we learn, "enjoyed personal friendship with four generations of Japanese leadership." When one realizes the dark alleyways into which that leadership took us all, one marvels at the temerity of such a boast.

He goes on at greater length. I have read quotations from these letters—and I have others—and from these articles that have been sent to me to indicate concern over Moral Re-Armament and over the fact that individuals and corporations are allowed exemption from taxation on contributions to this organization. The concern about this question is much stronger than the minister realizes. This applies to some members of all parties in this house who have given consideration to what this movement represents. If you read the literature of the last 20 years and the so-called moral philosophy preached by this movement you will realize why suspicions and doubts are aroused. Therefore, I promised to bring this matter to the attention of the committee and the minister. I read some extracts from these letters to indicate the feeling on the part of the people who wrote to me and sent me these articles.

Before I conclude I wish to bring one other illustration to the attention of the minister. This is a personal experience I had a month or so ago which convinced me that a great deal of thought should be given to this organization. Along with some other members of this house I was invited to a dinner at the Rideau club given by the Presbytery of the United church to Dr. Donald Soper, one of England's most famous preachers, one time head of the Methodist conference in Great Britain, who at the present time is posted to the, I am not sure whether it is the City Temple or Westminster mission, London, a non-conformist church. He is a man of unquestioned integrity; and a brilliant preacher. At that dinner he addressed us for about an hour. He gave us a most interesting talk; he was listened to by members of parliament and prominent people in Ottawa. At the conclusion of his speech he received a very hearty round of applause.

On sitting down he said he was ready to answer a few questions from anyone at the dinner table who wished to ask him questions. Various persons asked questions; I asked one. My question was, "Dr. Soper, what is your opinion of Moral Re-Armament?" You should have seen his reaction. In the most vivid language he told us what he thought of this organization and of the ideas it presented to the western democratic world. He strongly advised us to do all we could to expose the machinations of this organization, I was very much convinced on hearing such a well-known gentleman express his opinion so freely, so exactly and with such vigour. I bring that to the attention of the committee, as evidence on this question, in my opinion, from an unquestioned source.

I have read these extracts about this organization on behalf of the people who have written to me and on behalf of the members of this group. I do suggest that this matter warrants thorough investigation. We want to know why persons and corporations contributing to this organization are allowed exemptions from income tax on their contributions? We want to know on what grounds they are exempt? We urge a thorough investigation and reconsideration of this departmental decision, and we wish to express in the most vigorous terms possible on behalf of the people for whom I am speaking this evening our objection to this exemption and procedure.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, at this stage I want to inject a pleasant note in the consideration of the minister's estimates and to tell him that I heard with interest the statement which he made on the item which is now under discussion. I think all of us, not only on this side of the house but in the house generally, will be pleased to see that this division of the Department of National Revenue has shown progress and efficiency to the extent that not only has it reduced expenditures but also it has increased efficiency. As the minister has stated, this is due in no small measure to those who surround him from I suppose the most junior official right up to the deputy minister. On behalf of the opposition I wish to congratulate those who are responsible for this efficiency in his department.

Mr. Benidickson: Great integrity.

Mr. Chevrier: I had occasion to bring before some of the officers of the minister's department in Montreal a case which was of particular interest to certain constituents of mine. I am pleased to tell the minister that the courtesy and the efficiency with which the problems were dealt were certainly a matter which pleased those of us who had to discuss it. I am not saying that the matter has been ironed out to the satisfaction of all. I hope it will be possible to do that in due course, but I did not want to let the occasion pass without telling the minister that his officers, without naming them, with whom my constituents came in contact gave them a courteous reception.

But my purpose in rising is to bring to the attention of the minister a matter concerning a statement which he made. He said that these new operations brought about by automatic equipment will be responsible for a reduction of the number of employees. That is really the problem that worries me at the moment and I am sure it worries all hon. members. This is a matter concerning technological improvements. The point that arises is, what methods are being taken and what is being done by the department to look after those employees who because of the introduction of this new automatic equipment are without work? The problem is not one which concerns the minister alone; it concerns many other departments and the whole of Canada.

There is unemployment due not only to seasonal conditions, not only to business and cyclical conditions but also to technological improvements. On a number of occasions I have brought this up when the estimates of the Department of Transport and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration were under consideration. In each of those instances I believe means were taken to make sure that those who found themselves out of work because of the introduction of new methods received work elsewhere. I hope that is the position in the Department of National Revenue. When the minister replies to all these queries perhaps he will tell the committee what plan is being adopted to look after those people who find themselves out of work because of the new automatic equipment.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two brief remarks. I must say I was rather astonished at the vitriolic attack by the hon. member for Kootenay West on those who belong to the group known as Moral Re-Armament. I do not belong to the group myself, but I must confess that those I have met who do belong to the group would hardly fit the description given by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I must say I was indeed surprised but I suppose that those in this world who do not agree with the precepts of communism and socialism might well come under such attacks.

I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the report of the estimates committee which was set up a year ago and of which I was a member. While some comments have already been made on this report by the hon. member for Calgary South, there is one point which the hon. member did not deal with and on which I should like the minister to comment when he replies. I refer to paragraph 2 of the committee's report which deals with the evaluation of assets for succession duty purposes. The committee had this to say in its report:

> The committee was advised of a difference of opinion between the provincial governments and the Department of National Revenue in evaluation of assets for succession duty purposes. While some progress has been made toward standardization, the department as yet has been unable to entirely resolve these differences.

When the minister replies perhaps he could tell us whether any progress has been made yet in this respect. I should also like to refer to the recommendation which reads as follows:

> The committee also considered the inequality in the evaluation of certain assets in their relationship to the realizable value and therefore recommends the following:
> That, for the purposes of income and succession duty taxation, the Department of National Revenue be authorized to value assets such as certain mortgages, securities, company assets and shares at their realizable values and not at unrealistic and arbitrary face values, market quotation values or book values.

I hope the minister will make some comment with respect to whether any progress has been made in making appropriate changes in the act in this regard.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the minister whether there have been any improvements in the financial position of the tax assessors. From the details of the estimates it does not appear that any particular increase in remuneration has been granted to this group. I think the minister will remember that in the proceedings of the estimates committee, to which reference has been made, it became quite apparent that there was a high rate of turnover. This is one of the occupations in the government service where there seems to be difficulty in holding people, and for two reasons. One is that the training these people get in the income tax division makes them extremely valuable to private business. Second, it is not the most pleasant job in the world because in a sense it has to be approached with the idea that everyone is guilty or should at least be viewed with a certain amount of suspicion. That is obviously the case because these men are in a sense the custodians and protectors of the revenues of the crown.

The recommendation of the committee with regard to this matter was fairly strong. I have the wording here but there is no point in reading it. I would have thought that by now we would have had some indication of progress in this regard. A tax assessor is never going to be a popular man anyway but it certainly seems to me it is the kind of job that deserves a high level of remuneration for the very reason that it is an objectionable or difficult or hard job.

The work of the assessor is the nexus or link in many cases so far as the amount of money we have to spend is concerned. Most members want money to be spent. Very rarely have I ever heard a member of the house rise on estimates and advocate not spending money. At any rate, no instance springs to my mind. If the very people who are bringing in the revenue are dissatisfied with their lot it seems to me we should go out of our way to provide more satisfactory conditions. In particular, I think that the trend toward private business using these people must indicate their general value. If private business finds someone who has several years of experience in the department extremely useful, one cannot help but conjure up pictures of tax avoidance. There is nothing illegal about tax avoidance but we would like to think that the balance, in terms of sharpness, acuity and experience, remains with the department.

The second point I wish to ask the minister about relates to an objection I heard from a legal official who has left the minister's department to the effect that very often in the early stages of cases in the taxation division involving legal proceedings the men of the division prepare the case but when the case comes before a higher court as the result of an appeal the old patronage aspect enters the picture in that a lawyer outside the service is hired to handle the case for the department. The contention was put forward by this particular person that in many cases the talent hired was inferior to that of those who had handled the case up to that point and quite often these people did not have the time to brief themselves nearly as well as the legal staff of the department. It was said that in many cases the people hired were nothing more than party hacks. I have very little knowledge of how these legal appointments are made but I should like the minister's views on the matter and some idea of the practice followed in bringing in outside lawyers when a taxation case is to come before an appeal court.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, would the minister care to comment at this time on what progress has been made in the inquiry with respect to the payment of income tax by the farming corporations of western Canada known as the Hutterian brethren?

Mr. Benidickson: Would the hon. member repeat the name of the taxpayer?

Mr. Nowlan: Hutterites, he said.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in reply to the statements made by the hon. member for Kootenay West concerning Moral Re-Armament. The attack just made by the hon. member is in line with the attacks that have been appearing in the Canadian Tribune for several weeks.

Mr. Herridge: I had not seen it but that is the old line of Moral Re-Armament.

Mr. Carter: I will send it right over to the hon. member. I just want to tell him that I am very much surprised to find him in such company. This is not the first attack that has appeared in the "Commie" Tribune. It is the latest of about seven or eight attacks. When the communists find it necessary to attack something, I think it behooves the rest of the people of Canada to sit up and take notice. I was not in the house when the hon. member made the statement but I understand that he quoted as his authority the Rev. Dr. Donald Soper.

Mr. Herridge: Quite right.

Mr. Carter: Hon. members who watch the television program "Tabloid" will recall that this is the same Dr. Donald Soper who appeared on that program and told Canadians that Khrushchev is our man. I do not think anything more need be said on that score. With regard to the specific charge as to eligibility for income tax reductions, the charge was answered by the Minister of National Revenue on March 31 as found on page 2643 of Hansard.

Moral Re-Armament is an incorporated body and was incorporated by letters patent in December, 1944. One of the purposes for which Moral Re-Armament is incorporated is set forth in the letters patent as, among other things, the advancement of the Christian religion in particular, by means of and in accordance with the principles of the Oxford group movement founded in or about 1921 by Dr. F. N. D. Buchman.

My hon. friend must know that you do not have to be a religious body or a political body or any other body to engage in the advancement of the Christian religion, and that is what Moral Re-Armament purports to do. It does not compete with any religion; it has no body of doctrine. It is not a church and does not profess to be a religion, but it does heal mistrust, hates and resentments amongst the peoples of the world. It holds out to mankind the challenge of living by absolute moral standards, and that is something to which I want to give my support.

Mr. Bigg: I wish to say a word or two about income tax exemptions. This is something which I think is of universal interest. I am not asking for a reduction in income taxes across the board. I merely rise to suggest to the minister and his department that some consideration be given to students who are taking university courses or technical training, and who are trying to put themselves through these courses by taking seasonal employment during the summer. In many instances this has an effect on the income tax position of their families or themselves. They need this money immediately to go to university and the income tax levied on them at this particular time often delays them a year or two or sometimes prevents them from getting this higher training. I would suggest to the minister that this might be a field in which through some small reduction in our national income we could relieve these very worthy young people of this financial burden.

I might add at this time that this suggestion would not present any solution to the problem of nursing students because they do not get any income while they are learning their profession.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to raise a question concerning the administration of the estate tax by the Department of National Revenue. This question has been raised before with the minister on another occasion and his answers on that occasion were comparatively satisfactory. The difficulty can be best illustrated by indicating to the minister exactly how the matter works. A person dies leaving a commercial property which is immediately listed with real estate brokers for sale. It is sold at the highest possible price that can be obtained and the sale is completed within three months of the date of death. If you take the sale price as the basis for determining value, then the value is the gross sale figure less the agent's commission. The estate only receives the net figure.

The department, however, takes the position that the estate must pay tax on the gross sale price and injustice is caused by the increase in taxation caused by that administrative practice. The estate tax legislation deals with value, and the departmental interpretation should not enable the department to increase the "value". The value is what the selling authority can get for the property. This is one of the tests of value, in any event, although there are many others. In a case where there is an attempt made to sell immediately, the value must be what the vending authority realizes. I should like to have the minister's comments on that situation because I feel that what the department is in effect doing is to amend the Estate Tax Act by interpreting the value of the property in the example which I have given to mean the real estate agent's commission as well, a wholly unfair practice.

Mr. Dinsdale: I should like to speak briefly on the subject raised by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I believe he raised a query as to the desirability or eligibility of certain religious groups having contributions to their organizations exempted from income tax. It seems to me that this principle that has been espoused by the Department of National Revenue has many benefits. As a matter of fact, I would be inclined to support this principle in preference to the principle recently adopted to the effect that automatically $100 per person be allowed as an income tax deduction.

We have many religious and charitable organizations in this country which are doing good work on behalf of Canadian citizens. It seems to me it is an entirely desirable principle to assume that this work should be encouraged by providing an incentive of the kind that is provided under our income tax legislation. So far as the Moral Re-Armament group is concerned, my acquaintance with the organization goes back to my student days when it was known as the Oxford group and carried on religious activity amongst the students of this country as well as England and European countries. The impression I have always received has been that it was made up of dedicated believers in the concepts and doctrines of the group, and that its purpose was none other than to encourage and stimulate religious life among the young people of this country and throughout the western world. More recently, in the post-war world, under the name of the Moral Re-Armament group, the Oxford movement has reached out into the international field. I am certainly not going to enter into a discussion tonight along the lines of the subject that has been introduced here by the hon. member for Kootenay West, that is, as to whether or not the work they are doing in this field is tied up with international intrigue.

I would certainly lend my support to the principle that as a religious group they should enjoy the same privileges as all other religious organizations working for the moral enlightenment and benefit of mankind everywhere. I do not think this House of Commons is the place to indulge in intolerance of this kind and I certainly would lend my support for the continuation of the principle so far as this group is concerned.

Mr. Fisher: Just one or two comments with regard to this matter. I do not think it is a question of intolerance at all; it is a question of judging the organization by its aims and programs and claims. I would like to suggest to hon. members who are so strongly for Moral Re-Armament that they look very closely at this organization and make up their minds whether this particular privilege they have received from the department is a benefit. I think a close examination would alter their judgment.

Since this point is being brought up I would like to know from the minister a little more about how such decisions are made. I know I helped put forward the appeal of one organization, the Canadian ski patrol, for an exemption. At the time I was somewhat bothered whether this was a worth-while cause so I spent a week end out on a ski slope as an observer and I came to the conclusion that it performed a worth-while function.

I can also see that there are unlimited possibilities in trying to prove or show that an organization is of a charitable or worthwhile nature and I would like to know more about how the limits are arrived at. As far as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is concerned, I can get much more sympathetic about a genuine cause which deserves support or about the Canadian ski patrol or the Canadian Olympic association than I can about Moral Re-Armament.

I did ask a question previously of the minister on orders of the day about a big story which broke in Montreal with regard to an investigation currently going on into the question of charitable donations, and I believe this newspaper, the Montreal Gazette, mentioned the word "racket". I asked the minister about it and he indicated that there would be more information later about this. I did not want to address him further on orders of the day because I thought I would have an opportunity here to ask for more detail about this investigation, what is involved and what kind of organization is involved. If there is very little truth to the matter I would like to know how this story was released, because the particular newspaper man who broke the story, Arthur Blakeley, has a reputation for probity and fairness, at least as far as I know. I must assume that there was something to the story and for that reason I would like an explanation from the minister as to what was behind it and where the information came from.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Benidickson: No explanation?

Mr. Nowlan: I will reply later.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it the intention of the minister that we ask our questions on any item and then he will deal with them at the end?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, on the last item.

Mr. Caron: Does that mean we can go back to the items or will we have to stick to one?

Mr. Nowlan: You can come back, of course.

Item agreed to.

263. District offices, $29,576,139.

Mr. Caron: I have a problem which has been raised for years. It has been raised by all public bodies in western Quebec from the different counties because they want a collection office for the Quebec side separate from the Ottawa office. This has been asked for by boards of trade, by the junior chamber of commerce and the union of the chambers of commerce of western Quebec; and they have been asking for it for years.

Therefore I would ask the minister to think about this, not just to say, as he said last year, that he will look it over. I ask him to try and think how advantageous it would be for the Quebec side, and even for the Ontario side. We have the same trouble with the statistical information. It is all at Ottawa, unemployment statistics and everything, so we cannot make a difference when it is for the Quebec side or the Ontario side.

I know the minister will say, why did I not ask for this when the Liberals were in power? I did and I did not succeed then but I hope I will succeed now. If I do not I hope I will succeed with the next Liberal government in two years' time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Caron: I will give the minister the chance to make a good move before he goes out of office, and it is only a matter of generosity on my part. I would like him to think about it seriously this year and give it to us for the beginning of next year.

Item agreed to.

Tax appeal board—

264. Administration expenses, $116,500.

Mr. McIlraith: This is the last item and I understand the minister will now answer.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes; I was waiting for other comments. Mr. Chairman, at least we are on the last item of my department and perhaps I could refer briefly to some of the matters which have been raised this evening.

The hon. member for Nickel Belt raised the highly technical question with respect to valuations of lots at Sudbury which were bought at a certain time and he asked what valuation might be put on them now. Frankly I do not think I can get involved in a technical discussion of that kind. He also mentioned the problem of joint property and raised many other technicalities which frankly I am not competent to deal with. Even if I thought I were I think it would be the height of presumption to try and deal with them on an estimate and give what might be construed as a legal opinion and afterwards have it used against me in another place. I would be very glad to discuss this question with the hon. member in my office, or he can discuss it with legal officers or with other officers of the department.

I can well understand how he takes more than a passing interest in the increase in the value of lots at Sudbury because I know about that from having visited my son there some 15 years ago. I saw vast expanses of rather unoccupied land, shall we say, and one can see how it has been built up during the last few years so that now you have almost a continuous town in areas where for miles you hardly saw a house. I realize the importance of the problem and I will do everything possible to provide satisfactory answers to it.

The hon. member also asked about the staff at Sudbury and the impact of this centre which we have in Ottawa upon the staff there. The hon. member for Laurier also asked about this problem of the reduction in staff. It is true we have reduced the temporary staffs who are normally employed during the rush season in the spring. As the result of centralizing operations here in Ottawa we have effected substantial reductions in those temporary staffs. We have not reduced all our permanent staff in any way, shape or form.

Earlier in my opening statement I spoke about the over-all reduction in staff. That was accomplished by efficiency and by modern methods perhaps, but we did not let anyone out of the department. What happened was that the people we had retired for various reasons, health, age, and so on, and we were able to effect economies by not filling all the vacancies which normally occur. That is how we accomplished a reduction in staff; it was not by letting anyone out who was in the employ of the department.

The hon. member for Kindersley raised with me a theoretical problem with respect to the evaluation of oil and mineral rights and the principle which the department follows in assessing those rights on those old properties when they were not reserved at the time the original grants were made. That, again, is a technical and legal matter and I think it would probably be better dealt with in conversations between the persons concerned and the officials of the department rather than my trying to deal with it inadequately at this time.

The hon. member for Gloucester raised a question as to the number of bilingual employees we have in the district office of Saint John. I am advised by my officials that we do not have a break down of the number of bilingual people we have at the district offices in Canada. We know, through a card record of individuals, those who are bilingual and those who are not. It is the policy of this division, as it is the policy of all branches of government, to make sure that there is a sufficient number employed in each one of the offices throughout Canada to serve whichever of the official languages that is used. I am sorry I cannot give the exact number tonight, but if the hon. member wishes me to obtain it we can get it by checking the individual cards of the staff in Saint John.

The hon. member for Calgary South together with others made some flattering references to the deputy minister and his staff. I want to express my appreciation for this. I think it speaks very highly of them, and I join with what has been said by hon. members in this committee tonight. Praise has been given to officials of the customs and excise division which is a tax collecting department and a tough one. I presume that of all the tough jobs in the service of Canada, administering the income tax division is probably the toughest of all.

Mr. Benidickson: They do it very well.

Mr. Nowlan: They deal with millions of individual taxpayers, somewhere in the neighbourhood of six million individual taxpayers, I think. In addition we have scores of thousands of corporations and the number of complaints or criticisms we receive is so negligible that it does not come as a surprise to me that the officials responsible should receive praise. I do appreciate it, having served in the office for some three and a half years, and I want to express appreciation of what hon. members have said on behalf of the staff.

I might say that another deputy minister here, not too long ago, was marking down those who were tendering praise to him because he said he was sure they would be coming to his office with requests. I am sure this does not apply to those who have been bestowing praise on the income tax division, because they know they will not get anything anyway.

The hon. member for Calgary South also referred to the report and recommendations of the committee last year, as did the hon. member for Oxford. I have a long memorandum here which I do not think it is necessary for me to read in full. The recommendations of the committee did receive the very careful attention of the officials and of myself, and as far as we could in keeping with the rulings of the Department of Justice and the statutes involved we have attempted to meet them. There have been changes made in the assessment procedure and in the appointment of assessors. One hon. member, I think it was the hon. member for Port Arthur, raised the question of the salaries we are paying to the assessors and pointed to the recommendation which was made last year. I regret very much to have to say that no great progress has been made in that field.

Mr. Fisher: Who is the stumbling block?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not want to say there is a stumbling block. I am convinced, of course, that the officers of my department are the most valuable, the most able, the most intelligent of the officials of any department of the government of Canada, and that they make the greatest contribution to the public service; but many of my colleagues mistakenly hold the same opinion about their officials. The Department of Agriculture, for instance, is concerned about its veterinarians and the Department of Transport is concerned about its engineers, and the civil service commission has found it very difficult to deal with one class of officials, valuable as I am sure they realize they are, without dealing with them all at the same time. However, this matter is now under review by the civil service commission and the treasury board. I am disappointed that more concrete action has not yet been taken in this field. I am told that some time within the next few weeks we shall have a recommendation to go before treasury board from the civil service commission which I hope will rectify this situation.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the minister a question? The recommendations of a parliamentary committee are, of course, of some consequence. I know the minister has in his hands an observation on practically every point which was raised by the parliamentary committee when it examined the minister's estimates. I wonder if there is any chance of the minister making that document a public document in some way? I refer to the statement which the minister would perhaps, if pressed, be prepared to make with respect to the observations of the parliamentary committee of last year.

Mr. Nowlan: Speaking from memory I feel certain that I did send to the chairman of that committee last year a copy of this memorandum. If I did not, I certainly will do so tomorrow, and I would also be glad to send one to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River so that he can see what has been done.

Mr. Benidickson: Not for myself. I was thinking that it might be filed with the Clerk of the house.

Mr. Nowlan: Anyway that is the situation with respect to the salaries of assessors. There was another recommendation, one specific one, on which we made progress, of course. The committee recommended that the tax appeal board be enlarged and, as the committee knows, in the tax bill which is going through parliament at the present time —it is possibly in the other place—there is provision for one additional member of the board. That will assist in dealing with the problems with which the board is confronted.

We have spent a fair amount of time this evening dealing with a matter which is somewhat extraneous, that is the relative merits and demerits of a system or an organization known as Moral Re-Armament. Far be it from me to pass judgment or to enter into such a discussion, because I know that many hon. members in this house feel keenly on this matter and have had personal connections with this organization. This is not a subject on which I want to pass any judgment except to say that years ago, before I came into this department, the minister then responsible ruled that Moral Re-Armament was a charitable organization within the meaning of the act, and I have seen no reason, and I have heard no reason tonight, why that decision should be reversed or interfered with.

This is one of the problems with which the minister is continually confronted, this matter of ruling on charity, and I must say that I think there has been, if anything, a greater leniency shown in this respect in the immediate past than there was in preceding years. This is a very difficult problem. Lawyers here know we go back to the definition of charities as laid down back in the time of Queen Elizabeth. The present minister as, I am sure, did all his predecessors, has attempted to define charities within the meaning of those statutes and has sometimes given them a very charitable interpretation.

I refer now to the question which the hon. member for Laurier raised with respect to lay-offs. I may say this about the temporary centre: there have not been many questions asked about it, and I thought that perhaps more attention would have been paid to it than has been the case. We have carried out a most interesting experiment this year by establishing in Ottawa a centre which deals with all the T-1 short returns recording incomes of less than $20,000. That is something we have watched with great interest. It was an experiment.

Mr. Benidickson: Was it successful?

Mr. Nowlan: We brought in electronic devices. It is necessary because of the increasing growth of population. We hope to have this as a sort of pilot plant here and having ironed out the bugs, as it were, to use a slang expression, we hope to establish the system in other parts of the country. On the whole we think it has been very successful. We have not got the complete returns, of course, but what I am about to say will interest the hon. member for Laurier who was talking about reduction. Speaking now of Ontario, at the peak load on April 30 this year we had 60 less temporary employees than we had at the peak load last year. Of course, we had many temporaries employed here in Ottawa so in areas such as Sudbury the diminution in temporaries would be greater than it would be in the whole province.

As a result of having the work centred here our permanent employees in the various departmental offices were able to give much more time to assessing the problems there. We had our senior expert people dealing with the urgent problems rather than with routine assessments as was the case in the past. It has been a successful experiment. We have had difficulty, of course, in working it out in the first year but I think it reflects credit on the staff responsible for it, and on the deputy minister and the senior officials who planned it. I want to pay my tribute to them for it.

One thing which did result was that rebates and refunds were processed much more quickly than last year. We got hundreds of letters of appreciation from people throughout the province. I think the only person whose enthusiasm about the speed with which rebates were made was somewhat tempered by other considerations was the Minister of Finance who found that the refunds were going out so fast that before the end of the year he was paying out more money in refunds than he anticipated. I do not want the financial critic of the Liberal party to hold that against the minister next year because probably next year the refunds will not be as great as a result of so many having been paid out so promptly this year.

Mr. Benidickson: Notwithstanding what has been said, has the minister got the capital and current costs of the system?

Mr. Nowlan: No, frankly, I have not. As I said, there were 60 less temporaries this year. The current cost was less than the cost of the administration throughout the province.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister was referring to Ontario only?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes. There was some capital equipment that we got from the electronic firms as my hon. friend knows. I am not sure what the cost was in that connection.

The hon. member for Port Arthur raised the question of assessors and I have dealt with that. He also raised the question of what he called legal patronage. This term "patronage" is one that rather intrigues me. I have not found any evidence of it in this place since I have been here. I thought it existed in some other fields. I doubt if that term can be justified in reference to the dealings of the federal government and certainly not in so far as legal counsel are concerned.

My hon. friend may recall a statement which was made by the Minister of Justice last year, I believe on his estimates, when he said and quite properly that he had to assume responsibility for the administration of justice in the trial of cases and when it came to cases going to appeal and cases in the superior courts of this country the Department of Justice and not the Department of National Revenue reserves and exercises the right to appoint counsel to handle cases where the Department of Justice feels this is justified.

I have the highest respect in the world for the legal staff of the Department of National Revenue. That staff is the permanent part of the department and could not possibly deal with all the cases and litigation with which we are confronted. We would have to enlarge the staff tremendously to deal with the volume of work confronting us. Everyone here knows and certainly the lawyers know that when you are handling cases involving millions of dollars in taxation, with all due respect to our permament staff who are fully qualified, it is highly desirable to have counsel who have had a great deal of experience in the appeal courts and in the higher courts of the country. Whether or not you call that patronage I am sure you must admit that it is the only way you could administer a department such as this.

Mr. Fisher: That ain't the way I heard it.

Mr. Nowlan: If the hon. member for Port Arthur has heard anything else I would like to see him rise in his place and say so and not mutter from his seat. I would like to know who the man is that has left the department and is now talking about legal patronage. I would like to know his name. Let us bring this out in the open. I am telling this committee and the hon. member that we do not appoint counsel except on the advice of the Department of Justice and the deputy minister of that deparment. Anyone in this committee who has had any experience in these matters knows, and certainly my hon. friends opposite in the Liberal party who had experience in administration know very well, how scrupulous the deputy minister of justice and all officials of that department are in naming counsel.

We have many counsel on our staff today whose political antecedents, if they have any, I am sure are not those that are identified with the party now in office; but that is a matter for the Department of Justice. I said I would defend that practice anywhere in this country. I challenge anyone to suggest that in the matter of handling cases in the superior courts—cases where you really have to present the best possible case because you are confronted there with the most competent and experienced counsel in the country—patronage in the accepted sense of the term has never been used in any way, shape or form.

The hon. member for Ottawa West raised the question he raised last year with respect to valuations of the sale of real estate. The hon. member suggested—and I can see where from a public standpoint there would appear to be some merit in it—that when one sells a lot of land or a piece of property the estate tax branch assesses the gross price received whereas in many cases the vendor has retained an agent and perhaps with respect to a large and valuable property has paid between $20,000 and $40,000 in commission. As I said that is an argument which was an appeal.

All I can say, is that I am advised that the law is that the fair market value does not allow for agents' commissions. That has been laid down, I am told. I am not now giving a legal opinion. I am informed that this has been laid down in the courts of this country. One can see from a practical standpoint that whether a vendor uses an agent is, shall we say, a matter of option with the vendor. According to the argument advanced he would have to pay the tax on the whole property if the man sold the property himself whereas one who employed an agent would be able to claim payment of a commission even though it was somebody closely related to himself. In any event that is the practice that has been established and laid down, I am told, in accordance with the law as we interpret it. If there is any further clarification the hon. member would like I shall be glad to discuss the matter with him.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris also raised the question or Moral Re-Armament and entered into a defence of it as did the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo in relation to Newfoundland.

The hon. member for Port Arthur also referred to the question of charity and mentioned some newspaper articles dealing with this matter. I do not know, of course, the sources of the information of the press gallery and I have been told that is something one can never discover. I have even found out that it is very difficult to discover the identity of those who take part in television shows, although that perhaps has been disabused. I believe it is much more difficult to define the sources of information, therefore I cannot satisfy the hon. member's, shall I say, curiosity on that any more than I can satisfy my own.

Mr. Fisher: Has there been a special investigation?

Mr. Nowlan: Yes; there are always investigations going on with respect to these matters. The affairs of individual taxpayers are subject to investigation and, of course, they are also a matter of absolute privacy. I do not think I can properly or profitably go into the matter any further than to say what issues have arisen from time to time with respect to these matters. They have been, they are and they will be investigated in years to come and settled in the best possible manner that the department can achieve.

The hon. member for Hull uttered a very forceful plea for the inauguration of a taxation office in his city. He said he raised this matter last year. Frankly if he did I have forgotten it. My recollection is that I passed my estimates last year with a great burst of speed. Today we had a great deal of praise.

I could have done without the praise if we had had the luck of last year. The estimates were passed last year in 30 seconds. Before the officers got down from the gallery we were through. If the hon. member raised the matter last year it must have been in the hurry of that moment and I did not notice it. He said that he raised it in years gone by. He did not say he had a deaf ear, but he certainly did not get it. He has no deaf ear this time, Mr. Chairman, but I am particularly concerned about him because the hon. member said if he did not get it from me he would keep at it here and finally he would get it from the next Liberal government.

Mr. McIlraith: Next year.

Mr. Nowlan: I have the highest regard for the hon. member; we like him and we love him, but I do not want to see him around here forever. I think he does deserve a rest before the time he is 75 or 80. He would have to be coming here when he is that age if he expects to get it from a Liberal government. I will promise him we will give the matter consideration. If I made a promise last year I forgot it. I promise him that we will give this the most careful consideration and next year when he raises the matter again I hope I shall be able to be more specific on the matter.

I think this covers fairly well, if not fairly well at least slightly, the various points raised by hon. members. If there is anything further I can do—I hope there is not—I shall be very happy to do it. I think that covers the points at the moment.

I am sorry, one question was asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge with regard to the assessment for income tax purposes of farming corporations in western Canada known as the Hutterite brethren. This is a matter which has been raised on several occasions during the past few months. It is a matter of great concern to the members from western Canada and to the department. All I can say at the moment is that it is receiving the most careful study by the departmental officials. I am not in a position to go farther than that at the moment except to say that the whole matter is under review.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, there are two matters that I should like to raise that were dealt with by the minister in his remarks. I want to return first to this matter of valuation of estates. I am afraid the matter is not quite as simple as the minister has indicated in his most plausible answer. It is not a simple problem.

Mr. Nowlan: If you can find anything simple about the administration of this act I should like to know it.

Mr. McIlraith: The point here is one which should be pursued by the minister because the problem is whether a taxing department is in fact increasing the taxes imposed by the statute. I am sure this is something that the minister will agree it is not desirable for it to do. The amount of the tax is fixed by statute and not by the department; at least, we like to think that that is the theory of our system.

The minister said the sale price was the absolute criteria and the estate executors, presumably, or beneficiaries, could sell the property themselves. That is neither possible nor practical with 80-year old widows when they are dealing with commercial property in most cases. I think it will be readily agreed that that is just not a good enough answer.

The problem does not arise in those commercial properties where you obtain a valuation because such valuation is based upon the amount the vendor can realize from the property and takes into account all factors; but where a sale is made within a short time after the death then the estate is improperly penalized because in most instances the only method of making a sale of a commercial property in a short time after the owner dies is by employing competent real estate agents. The real estate agents will sell the property to the best possible advantage, because they get a percentage in fees and because they seek to serve their clients well, but they turn over to the client only the net amount of the sale. That is all he gets. It is not a simple matter; the agent's commission is not a debt of the testator. The value is a matter of what the estate is able to realize from the asset. That is the true test of value. The test can only be determined in that way.

There are two practical methods of determining the value of those properties. One is to obtain a valuation by qualified appraisers, and usually no problem arises there. But this other problem arises and it can be a penalty that is very severe on the estate. If the minister would take the trouble to compute out the penalty in the case where the estate is of a value of $100,000 and the selling commission is $7,000 and from $60,000 to $80,000 is exempt, he will see just how heavy the penalty is. I respectfully submit that taking the gross sale price as the value is a wrong practice; it is only the practice of the department and I do ask to have the matter pursued.

It is not a sufficient answer to say that this matter can be appealed to the courts, because that involves tying up releases or deposits, as the case may be, and usually it is difficult to have the cash available to provide the deposit against payment of the tax, and it is not possible for the estate to involve itself in the delays inherent in an appeal and the cost involved in an appeal to the courts. For these reasons I ask the minister to pursue the matter in a more thorough way than his answer tonight would indicate. This is not a matter at all of simply working out the answer that will make for easy administrative practice. I am not sure but that the minister's department is verging on the difficulty of working injustices on taxpayers, by its attempt to be what it calls efficient in reducing its staff, as he has done. There is a point where your apparent efficiency becomes an injustice to the taxpayer.

The other matter I wanted to raise was the question of salaries of assessors. The matter was dealt with by the minister and in his answer the minister was unaware of what he did. He took shelter behind the civil service commission recommendations on this matter of pay increases and I am quite sure he did not want to do that, because the inference from his remarks as delivered by him—I think he will agree with me it was the only inference that could be drawn from his remarks—was that the civil service commission had not dealt with this matter, had not recommended the increases.

Under the act the civil service commission made a report to parliament on the matter of pay increases and for some reason or other that report was not tabled in the house although it was made at the request of the government of which the minister is a member. Notwithstanding the fact that the minister must assume responsibility for the failure to table that report, he is now seeking to leave the inference that the report failed to deal with this important matter. A great many of us will be quite unconvinced that it did not deal with this matter unless we see the report. For my part, knowing the work of the civil service commission I feel quite confident that they did deal with the matter of pay increases in a proper manner and that the responsibility for the failure to grant these pay increases must remain with the government. It is a government responsibility. The civil service commission has enough burdens without being treated in the way the minister in his remarks, perhaps unintentionally, treated the commission tonight. I would ask him to clarify that matter so far as the civil service commission and its report are concerned.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I have in mind another matter which I should like the minister to clarify. Why is it necessary for officials of the taxation division, in many instances accompanied by officers of the R.C.M.P., to raid commercial establishments and seize all the books and papers of such corporations? I can understand why under liquor acts or the narcotics act it is necessary for the R.C.M.P. to raid certain establishments but I do not understand why it is necessary for long established companies with branches throughout a province or throughout the country to be raided at seven or eight o'clock in the morning by officials of the taxation division accompanied by R.C.M.P. officers and why officials of these companies have to open their safes and hand over all their books and papers. At a time when we are talking about the rights of individuals it seems to me that there must be ways and means of obtaining any necessary information without taking such measures. I should like to have an explanation from the minister as to the reason for such action.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I am looking for guidance from you. On this department's estimates can I raise at this time the question of doing something about the vision of the government—

Mr. Fisher: The vision?

Mr. Hardie: The vision in developing northern Canada, particularly with reference to the policies of the taxation department and giving the same type of treatment to Canadian companies as is given to United States companies that spend money on exploration. I should like you to advise me whether I can speak at this time or whether I should delay my remarks on this subject which will be made for the purpose of helping the minister and the cabinet do something about the vision.

Mr. Nowlan: It is a matter of fiscal policy and should be under finance, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Hardie: Did the chairman give me a ruling or did the minister?

The Chairman: I have not given a ruling yet as to the point raised. I may say that this afternoon I gave an indication of my views on the discussion of fiscal policies and said that in my opinion they could not be discussed under the estimates of the Department of National Revenue because this department has no other duty than to collect the taxes imposed under such policies. Normally it would be a matter for the budget debate but it may be that in certain respects the matters the hon. member wishes to discuss could be discussed under the estimates of northern affairs.

Mr. Hardie: How about finance?

The Chairman: And possibly under finance. In any event I would not want to make a ruling in advance.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I wonder whether I could make a comment with the consent of the hon. member.

Mr. Hardie: On a point of order, I want to accept the ruling of the chairman that this is not the time to enter into such a discussion, a discussion that would add to the happiness and welfare of those people who have had so much to say about the northern vision. I accept the chairman's ruling that this is not the time for such a discussion.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I obviously gave the wrong emphasis in the remarks I made about the question of lawyers outside the government service being called in to handle income tax appeal cases with the result that such cases pass out of the hands of the lawyers of the department. I think we all know that patronage in connection with legal appointments exists. I do not think the minister is so naive or would expect me to be so naive as to think it does not. I can give him examples in the appointment of lawyers to handle real estate dealings under Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I have collected such examples for several constituencies, and it is obvious that a lawyer has to be an open supporter of the government if he is going to get such an appointment. I obviously gave the wrong emphasis. What I was interested in was whether the system of using outside lawyers is by far the best or much better than using the legal staff of the department to carry on these cases.

In his reply the minister indicated that he felt it would be impossible for the poor overworked lawyers of his department to carry on these appeals and we accept his word for that. However, if the minister doubts the information I have put before him I should like to say that I too can doubt information but on the other hand may I suggest that this would be a most unlikely type of thing to be put before me if it had not been done by someone who at one time worked for and was familiar with the department.

The other point is that in challenging anyone to produce his source of information the minister must be aware that one is most unlikely to be in a position to do this. I make no apologies for not giving the source. I do not think it would add any additional validity, but I think the matter I have referred to remains as an insight into how these matters are conducted. Perhaps it is a wrong one. The minister certainly seemed to indicate that he thought it was a wrong one. The only way I can follow up this matter is by putting questions on the order paper. I will have to do that and obtain from the department details as to how many lawyers have been hired over the years, how many cases they have handled and what their fees have been. We will also know something then of the identity of these people. As a result, next year I will be in a much better position to present an argument to the minister on this point.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): The minister made a very comprehensive reply to two of the three questions I put to him. I am sure he did not deal with the third one because he had such a variety to answer that it was not possible to remember them all. However, I would ask for his comments with respect to the suggestion of his department providing advance tax rulings for those individuals or corporate bodies who engage in venture or risk undertakings. There are a great many people involved in the development of our resources who are hesitant as to the extent to which they should use their capital because they have some doubt in their minds as to their tax position. This only tends to discourage the development of these resources by Canadians.

I know the committee is well aware of the fact that this is a practice which is followed in the United States. I realize also that the minister has some misgivings about it in that it would require a substantial additional body of assessors and that it would also disrupt certain procedures which are currently followed. The minister is quite right in saying he did give me a memorandum which, unfortunately, as chairman of the committee I could not submit to the committee because it was received after the committee had completed its hearings.

As I recall, in this memorandum the minister said some consideration is being given currently to this problem and stressed the difficulty in staffing such an operation. However, I do impress upon him the need for a very clear definition of what is taxable income and what is capital gain and, in particular, when any of these companies are in a position to bring a situation to his department which does involve extreme risk in my view it would be helpful if the taxpayers were in a position to know exactly where they stood with the department rather than having to complete the undertaking and then proceed without a clear understanding of their tax position. I wonder if the minister would comment on this particular aspect of my question.

The Chairman: Shall this vote carry?

Mr. Hardie: Not until after the minister has commented on the statement just made.

The Chairman: Shall the vote carry?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Chairman, there are some replies to be made.

Mr. Nowlan: I was waiting for the hon. member who was addressing the Chair to stand on his feet.

Mr. McIlraith: I did.

Mr. Nowlan: I was not referring to the hon. member for Ottawa West. This matter which the hon. member for Ottawa West has raised is one, of course, which is always a subject of discussion and debate. He did refer to the fact that the matter was discussed last year, and he suggested that there were rulings handed down or suggestions brought down which were not implemented. This is quite true. The matter, as the hon. member knows, is being reviewed this year. We are getting classifications and rulings on various classes in the national economy, and undoubtedly there will be one come down on some of these matters to which he referred. I am not in a position, of course, to disclose any of these matters which he did raise. He said he would not be satisfied until the various matters are brought down. After all, the matter has been the subject of discussion in the house, and the issue was closed. We are getting further information on these matters and a further report dealing with them class by class. I hope further action will be taken on this particular matter in the early future.

The hon. member for Gloucester raised a question with respect to seizures of books and records by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. It is true that under certain circumstances officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police do accompany officers of this department in making seizures. However, it should be stressed that these documents are not seized at any time in that manner without an order of the exchequer court. We have to apply to the exchequer court and have to satisfy that court by affidavit that this action is necessary and then the seizures may be made. A mounted police officer accompanies the official of this department, not to participate in the seizure in any way, shape or form, but simply to be there—what shall we say—to lend the majesty of the law to the procedure of the department and make sure that if there is a breach of the peace then the officer will be there to deal with it. Fortunately these cases which do arise very seldom involve any breach of the peace and the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police go along and are there but do not actually participate in these seizures. This is only done, as I said, after this action has been brought in exchequer court and an application made to that court. We cannot take that action otherwise.

The hon. member for Calgary South has again raised this matter which was raised last year in the report of the committee, as he said. I, perhaps, overlooked the fact that when he received this memorandum from the department the committee had been released and, therefore, he could not deal with it at that time. The committee advanced several points last year and the departmental officers attempted to deal with them to the best of their ability. This matter of advance rulings was under very careful consideration, and perhaps at this time I can do no better than to read an excerpt from a paragraph in this memorandum which I sent to the chairman of the committee.

The advantages and disadvantages of providing a service of advance tax rulings to a greater extent than is done at the present have received further study, and it is our feeling that the tax practitioners are not unhappy with the service presently being offered. The problems of attracting and retaining the qualified staff referred to in item 4 make it difficult to envisage an extension of the tax ruling service in the near future. There is some merit in this suggestion and it could be argued pro and con for some time. On balance, considering the demands made on our staff, we feel it is impossible at the moment to go further in the matter of making these rulings than we are doing, and that is the only definite answer which I can give to the hon. member for Calgary South at the moment.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not want to be overly persistent on this matter of salary adjustments and the civil service commission report. However, I think it should not be left the way it is. The minister indicated that the matter of the publication of the report had already been dealt with in the house, and that is so. But that is only part of the truth of the situation on that point, as I think he will agree. There was a motion made in the house for the production of that report, to which the government took exception, and the house sustained the government in that objection. It now becomes impossible for a member to put another motion on the same point because it has already been dealt with by the house.

However, the minister overlooked the fact that he chose to refer to the civil service commission recommendations in connection with these pay increases when he dealt with this subject. If he does that, he leaves himself open to the requirement of having to table the report. The minister's parliamentary secretary does not seem to agree with that, but I think if he looks at the rules he will find that is the requirement. The government having taken the position it was a government document, and the minister having relied upon it, he is obliged to produce the report. I believe the rules are quite clear on that point.

In any event, I am not pressing the minister to table it now. I am pointing out to him the impropriety of taking shelter behind the document or leaving an inference as to the contents of that report, and then not producing it. This is the point I wanted to leave with him. If he does that, it is not open to him to say the matter of the production of the report is closed because by his own action he opens the whole matter and is required to produce it. I think it is quite important that the position of the government vis-à-vis the civil service commission in these matters be kept quite clear. I think he would be the first one to agree, having the responsibility he has for administering legislation of the parliament of Canada with his large staff, that the independence of the commission should be guaranteed and that nothing be done to impair or jeopardize its position in these matters.

Item agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

41. Grant in respect of the net operating requirements of the radio and television services, $62,085,000.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say to the minister that we have not got the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the past year. We have the board of broadcast governors coming up perhaps this evening and again we have not got the report. These would be very important to us in our consideration of the estimates since they will be the first reports since the passing of the provisions of the Broadcasting Act. According to the Broadcasting Act both the board of broadcast governors and the corporation are required to file within three months of the end of their financial year their annual reports with the minister and he has to lay them before parliament within 15 days, which takes us to July 15. The minister must have in his hands the reports of these two agencies and I wonder whether it would be possible for us to have them tonight or before his estimates come up next time. It would make our criticism and judgment of the activities, especially of the board of broadcast governors, much more sensible and I ask the minister where these reports stand at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, on this item I think the committee would be entitled to know what is the position of all these applications which have been made for private stations. I think the committee is entitled to a report from the minister on the result of the new policy. I am speaking generally now but I think the minister will know what I mean.

It is true that the committee has been set up and there will be a possibility to discuss many of these things and it may not be necessary to go into great detail at this time, but I think we are entitled to get a statement from the minister about the applications which have been recommended. My understanding is that applications are made to the Minister of Transport for technical clearance and from there they go to the board. The board then holds public hearings and after having heard the evidence makes a recommendation to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, as he knows, but I thought we were dealing exclusively with the C.B.C. Is not the matter to which the hon. member refers a matter for the B.B.G. and the application of that act rather than the C.B.C.? I would be very glad to discuss the matter with him, but frankly I prefer to have the officers of the B.B.G. in front of me, because as he knows under the act the B.B.G. has to deal with all the applications for licences.

Mr. Chevrier: I apologize to the minister. I was outside and when I came in I understood we were on item No. 40. I will reserve my remarks for a later occasion.

The Chairman: Item 40 will be called after the items dealing with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I called item No. 41.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, may I deal with an item in relation to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

The Chairman: Yes, but I was going to recognize the hon. member for Madeleine islands.

Mr. Keays: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of my constituents of the Iles-de-la-Madeleine, may I ask that facilities for French language television broadcasts be provided in that area of the country, which is so isolated from the mainland.

At the moment, reception is quite poor, because coming as it does from station CHAU-T.V., at Carleton, 180 miles away, reception is equal only to about 5 per cent of the station's power.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, this 5 per cent efficiency of reception given to my constituents in the islands only angers them to the point where they wish to know why people living in this area are not entitled to television reception given other parts of the country.

To establish the policy that television will first be brought to those areas where the per capita cost is the lowest is, to my thinking, a good policy so far as the mainland of Canada is concerned. But when we think of those people who live 50 to 150 miles from the mainland I believe closer scrutiny should be given to their problem and we should consider very favourably an exception to the rule and bring at least a little bit of comfort to these people who spend from November until May almost completely isolated from the rest of Canada, with the exception of one plane service per day.

Would the solution be the extension of the microwave system of the French network from Moncton, first of all by increasing the output from that station and bringing it to the closet point to les Iles-de-la-Madeleine? From that point would then be a satellite which could bring to the Magdalen islands the reception which they so ardently desire, and we would like reception from the French network because 95 per cent of the population speak the French language. It would thereby bring to those few islands in the gulf of St. Lawrence, so often referred to as the gem of the gulf, television service which they deserve and so ardently desire.

I should like to speak at this time in the name of the hon. member for Gaspe who is unavoidably absent from this committee due to illness. As the minister may know, the station at Carleton, CHAU-TV, at present gives 65 per cent French television and 35 per cent English television service. That serves only a very small part of the Gaspe peninsula, and I, along with the hon. member for Gaspe, have received numerous representations asking why that part of the lower St. Lawrence should not be given television service when so much has been given to the area immediately to the west. I am thinking now of approximately 2,000 English speaking families in the Gaspe peninsula who enjoy this 35 per cent English television at about 35 per cent efficiency. I think also of the other 2,000 English speaking families and the 2,000 French speaking families in that area who have no opportunity whatever of enjoying television in that remote but beautiful area of Canada.

I trust that the engineers of the C.B.C. will immediately begin to study the problems which I know exist, and that they will look at this request favourably, put forward as it is on behalf of these two areas which are so far away from the main centres of Canadian population. I can assure the minister that the people there will be very grateful and they will feel they are getting their just due and not having to pay a penalty for living outside the urban areas of the province of Quebec.

(Translation):

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of C.B.C. authorities, I wish to thank the hon. member for Magdalen islands (Mr. Keays) for the sound remarks he made tonight, because he explained the situation with regard to television in the Magdalen islands. The same situation also prevails in several other places in Canada. However, the hon. member must realize that certain technical problems cause serious difficulties at present. Anyhow, I can tell him that C.B.C. officials are aware of the situation and that, even if they have not yet inquired on the spot, the problem concerning the Magdalen islands and the Gaspe peninsula has been reviewed and is still being carefully looked into.

Moreover, it must be realized that some stations mentioned by the hon. member have rather low transmitting power and, since they are operated by private interests, the C.B.C. is not in a position to interfere and boost that power.

At all events, I can say to him and to other members who would like to raise similar matters, that the C.B.C. is doing its best to improve the service.

(Text):

The hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine has raised a somewhat serious problem with respect to certain areas of Canada. I hesitate to use the term fringe areas to describe them because we do not like to consider them as being beyond the centres of civilization, if we can call it that, of Canada. They are an integral part of Canada and they are entitled to the services which are provided to their fellow citizens. However, it will be realized that because of the population pattern and the long distances involved there are severe technical problems which have to be faced not only by the corporation but by private radio facilities. I know that the same problem exists in certain areas of western Canada and in those regions where the corporation is not represented by television stations from which it can operate satellites where private stations are faced with similar problems, and the technical difficulties that arise from them.

However, I am assured by the officials of the corporation that continuing studies are being made of these problems and while detailed studies may not have been made in certain areas the situation there has been reviewed in some detail by the corporation. We hope that in due course those people who are affected will get some measure of satisfactory television service. I hope, also, that this time will not be too far away.

Mr. Batten: I have one or two comments I should like to make on this item, but before doing so I point out that we have got well into this item already and since it is one which includes a large amount of money I wonder whether before we go any further the minister intends to make a statement.

Mr. Nowlan: As the hon. member says, we got into this item quickly. Far be it from me to try to delay my own estimates, but I do have a preliminary statement here which perhaps I could make at this minute. It is very brief, and it would at least lay the foundation for other matters which might arise.

This is a brief statement dealing with a tremendous corporation and one which is among the largest spending corporations in the government service. I think it can be said that during the year we have improved the over-all broadcasting service through strengthening our Canadian produced programs and through continued development of the radio and television services.

In radio, C.B.C. station schedules were started one hour earlier in the day for the benefit of the early morning audience and I am sure that includes hard working members of this house. In television the program service was started one hour earlier in the afternoon during the fall and winter schedule. C.B.C. coverage was improved. Twelve new low power radio repeater stations were established. Radio coverage was further developed in the north country with the establishment of five additional C.B.C. stations located at Fort Smith, Hay River, Churchill, Fort Nelson and Watson Lake. The C.B.C. is now operating nine of these stations in its northern service and expects to add another at Inuvik by September of this year.

In television, four new low power stations were brought into operation. In addition, C.B.C.'s national program service was further improved for viewers of ten private stations affiliated with the C.B.C. when the corporation replaced television network recordings with microwave service to each of the stations.

Members may recall that the corporation forecast some years ago that the greatest coverage problem to be faced by the national service would arise in attempting to bring television service to the final 10 per cent of the population.

We have now arrived at that stage. I am told that just about 16.5 million Canadians now live within the A, B and C contours of at least one Canadian television station. This means that about 94 per cent of all Canadian homes have Canadian television coverage available. It is significant to note that 80 per cent of all homes in Canada actually have television sets.

This brings me to a quick look at the year ahead. The corporation expects to start work on new low or medium power television stations at various centres as well as continuing its studies of the problems and costs involved in making television available to other still unserved areas. The corporation does not expect to further increase its hours of regular program operation in the year ahead, other than a move toward equalization of the programming hours of the French television network with those of the English network.

In radio, the corporation expects to establish about 12 new low power repeater stations and to also continue work on the further development of the northern service. The experimental C.B.C.-Radio Canada FM network between Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto will be continued.

Referring now to the vote before the committee, hon. members will note that the appropriation they are being asked to approve represents an increase of $2,131,000 over last year's amount. This figure includes an increase in operations of $3,681,000 and a decrease in capital requirements of $1,550,000. The increase in operating requirements represents demands on the corporation as the result of union negotiations, artists' fees and wage scales, the development of broadcast coverage, as well as continued program development.

That is a very brief indication of the work of the corporation and the reason for the expenditures which are before the committee at this time.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I want to assure the minister that I have no intention of delaying his estimates but I did feel that upon an item of this size and particularly one of such importance to the people of Canada he would want to make a statement and I thank him for the statement he has made. I wonder if the hon. gentleman would now give us a break down of the $62 million covered under this item?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I am indebted for the applause with which hon. members have greeted me. I should like to ask the minister a number of questions which come to mind as a result of the committee's examination of the corporation a year ago. At this time I will make reference to only one or two.

I would hope that in the course of his remarks the minister could indicate the success or failure of the corporation in its attempt to obtain a greater recovery in relation to some of their productions which as we recall were produced at a great expense to the public treasury and from which in many instances the corporation received no return and in some instances received only a partial return. I would be interested in learning if they had any success with their sales staff in attempting to reduce the amount of money which the public treasury had to put up and upon which no return was realized.

Another point which is perhaps more local in nature but which is of great importance to us in western Canada is this. The corporation was recently awarded the television licence in the city of Edmonton. Naturally I do not want to discuss the award itself. Frankly I regret that the corporation decided to go into a market which is or could be so adequately served by private interests. I am interested in knowing whether or not the corporation is yet in a position to indicate if they are prepared to give extended facilities or boosted facilities at their Lacombe transmitter in Alberta so that all the corporations' interests are not centred in the northern half of the province. The situation as it is of present is that their radio signal covers only an area roughly south to Red Deer and no further. Consequently southern Alberta receives no radio signal and therefore no broadcasting from the corporation at all. It seems unfortunate that the corporation would entertain the idea of establishing at a great capital expense a television studio before fulfilling what I suggest it is their duty to complete, the establishment of facilities for the rest of the province with respect to radio transmission.

I also want to ask the minister whether in his view it is a sound policy for the corporation to compete in market areas such as Edmonton, and many other similar locations when there are yet so many areas in Canada which receive no television service. We have witnessed the unusual situation wherein these moneys were made available to the corporation and thus they entered into a market area to which a number of private broadcasters were prepared to offer much the same service. From the policy standpoint I ask if this is not a backward step in failing to provide television service to areas that require it. As it is we are providing this service to areas which could and should be adequately served by private interests.

There are a number of other points I should like to raise with respect to the corporation but I see that it is eleven o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what the business is for tomorrow and Friday?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the debate on second reading of the bill of rights. In view of the lengthened hours, each day now being the equivalent of two normal days, I am assuming that this debate will conclude during the course of the day. We will then go on with the estimates we were considering this evening, those of the C.B.C. and then the board of broadcast governors, followed by the estimates of the Department of Transport on which the committee has already spent four days. We are part way through.

On Friday there will be a continuation of estimates in the order I announced earlier in the week: external affairs, northern affairs, labour and public works. All of these are available for consideration.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—WORK ORDERS, ETC.

Question No. 379—Mr. Argue:

1. Were any work orders issued in connection with the main contract for construction of the substructure for the south channel high level bridge at Cornwall, Ontario, by the St. Lawrence seaway authority?
2. If so, what was the number of orders, the date of each, the name of the official authorizing and signing each, the value of each, and the nature of such orders?
3. Was any change in tender price accepted by the St. Lawrence seaway authority for construction of the substructure after the contract was signed?
4. If so, what was the date of each change, the name of the official authorizing it, the reason for it, and the actual amount?
5. What is the actual number of work orders, which have been issued for remedial work in connection with the substructure of the Cornwall high level bridge, the date of each order, the value, the name of the official signing each, and the purpose of each?
6. What is the total actual cost of remedial work on the substructure of the Cornwall high level bridge as of April 1, 1960?
7. What is the total actual amount unpaid on this contract for the substructure as of April 1, 1960, and amounts unpaid on (a) the prime contract; (b) extras in connection with the main contract; (c) remedial work, and the reason for non-payment on each category?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. Five—as follows:

No. 1, dated December 29, 1956, providing for the substitution of 75-ton capacity "Franki" caisson piles at $15 per lineal foot for the 50-ton cast-in-place piles specified at the contract unit price of $10 per lineal foot. Because of a reduction in quantity from an estimated 7,000 lineal feet to 4,667 lineal feet, there was no change in total cost.

No. 2. dated August 18, 1958, providing for the supply and installation of rigid struts between the upstream and downstream cylindrical shafts of each main pier to assure their stability during the 1957-58 winter season before the stabilizing effect of the steel tower weight and its bottom strut had been added. Value at cost plus 10 per cent—$5,435.28.

No. 3, dated November 12, 1958, providing for the removal costs of trestlework damaged beyond repair during winter of 1957-58 when left in place for the performance of remedial work on the main piers. Value at cost plus 10 per cent—$47,140.28.

No. 4, dated March 5, 1959, providing for the refinishing of the bearing surfaces on approach piers Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 10 and 20 as required to suit changes in the psecified elevations and the relocation of anchor bolts in approach piers Nos. 1, 3, 4, 16, 21, 23 and 24 to suit revisions to the contract plans. Value at cost plus 10 per cent—$10,649.22.

No. 5, dated April 1, 1959, providing for a change in detail of the upper portion of the north abutment. Value $3,239.50.

All work orders were authorized by the authority and signed by the chief engineer and the president, as stipulated in the contract.

3. Yes, as covered by work order No. 1 referred to in answer 2.

4. Answered by 2.

5. One, work order No. 3, referred to in answer 2. (Another formal order covering remedial work to the main piers is to be issued.)

6. Estimated $335,402.20. (by contractor $228,218.81; by authority $107,183.39).

7. $190,488.80 (estimated); (delayed pending negotiations of final quantities and extra work)

(a) Overpaid $2,953.95;

(b) $12,364.22 (work order No. 4—$10,649.22; work order No. 5—$1,715.00).

(c) $181,078.53 (estimated).

GRAHAM AIRPORT, EXPENDITURES AND LANDINGS

Question No. 410—Mr. Benidickson:

1. In each of the years 1957-58, 1958-59, 1959-60, what expenditures have been made at the Graham airport (a) of a capital cost nature; (b) for operation and maintenance?
2. How many landings have been made at the Graham airport in each of the above years?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

Supply—Items Passed

1. Expenditures:

	Capital expenditures	Operation and maintenance expenditures	Total
(i) Airport
1957–58	$ 17,052	$ 35,004	$ 52,056
1958–59	—	67,204	67,204
1959–60	—	32,993	32,993
			$ 152,253
(ii) Radio range
1957–58	$ 1,481	$ 28,085	$ 29,566
1958–59	695	32,882	33,577
1959–60	—	32,899	32,899
			$ 96,042

2. Landings:

	Non-schedule (revenue)	Itinerant (non-revenue)	Local	Military	Total
1957–58	73	92	46	2	213
1958–59	7	103	—	—	110
1959–60	15	89	29	1	134

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:
