The minister said that the resolution and the bill which will follow and the other measure dealt with by this house several days ago when we agreed to present an address to the parliament of the United Kingdom in the matter of the retirement of judges—including what we thought at that time was an unnecessary violation of the present constitutional practice with regard to the county and district courts—were interdependent and that both should be read together. They are interdependent only, of course, I would suggest, in one particular and that is with regard to the compulsory retirement at the age of 75 of judges who now—and properly, I believe—are to be given more satisfactory pension or annuity arrangements attendant upon their retirement. However, I would submit that only in that sense are these two measures really interdependent.

To the extent that there is interdependence I should have thought that this measure, in so far as it provides for other terms of annuity arrangements, should have preceded the introduction of the other measure of which this is a companion, to use the analogy of the minister. In that event it would have been possible in discussing the former measure to give full consideration to the extent to which there was any violation of the independence of the judiciary in the minds of those who expressed concern on that point and also whether there was, with regard to judges now on the bench, any breach of contract or any breach of implied contract.

With regard to the judges who are now on the bench and who, after the parliament of the United Kingdom will have dealt with the matter, will be forced to retire, one wonders whether or not the minister has met the argument—admittedly it was not accepted on the other side but it is one that was made with sincerity and conviction in this house a few days ago—that to cause a judge to retire under circumstances of which he could not be expected to be aware at the time of appointment, was a matter that involved a breach of what I would call at least an implied contract. I am aware of the fact that the other night we used the phrase "breach of contract". Possibly that was too loose a use of the expression "breach of contract". There was not a contract in the sense perhaps of an enforceable contract at law but there were certainly present all of the elements of what one might regard as an arrangement between the state and the judicial appointee having all the qualities of a contractual arrangement which the state would feel at least morally bound to recognize as imposing on it an obligation not less than the kind of obligation that would have been imposed if an arrangement of some sort based on the same principle had prevailed between individuals, one of whom was not a judge and the other who did not represent the crown.

I suggest to the Minister of Justice that the argument of "breach of contract" in the sense in which I have mentioned it tonight is a sound one and is one that is not met by this resolution. Those judges who are now on the bench and who in the future will be forced to retire will retire under circumstances that were not present, were not made known to them or could not have been presumed at the time of appointments. I have no hesitation in saying that the government is justified—and the house is with the government—in suggesting that judges should retire at the age of 75. That is not a matter in issue. What is in issue in so far as I am concerned is that this failure to provide for an economic treatment of judges now on the bench, in a manner that would not in any way put them in a less advantageous position than they would be in if there was no compulsory period of retirement, is an act which in principle—and if you will, only theoretically at this stage—involves a breach of contract and, I submit, moreover is a violation in principle again of the independence which all of us in this house want to see the judiciary have in Canada. That principle was argued in this house in 1927, in 1930, in 1933 and in 1954 was thoroughly discussed in the parliament of the United Kingdom. There the position was taken, as I reminded the house the other night, by Mr. Churchill among others, that any economic treatment of the judges that would be less than what they would be entitled to pursuant to the terms of their appointment would be regarded and must be regarded as a violation of the kind of independence which in that island they regard the judges as being deserving of, which indeed they regard as one of the essential conditions of guaranteeing the integrity and independence of the bench.

However, in the resolution and the bill based on it which the minister will introduce the government does not accept this argument because the judges who are now on the bench will retire on the same annuity terms as judges who have yet to be appointed. I contend that that is wrong on the two grounds I have mentioned. It is wrong on the ground that it is a violation of the terms of the arrangement, and for me more particularly it is a violation of the kind of independence which I believe our judiciary should possess.

That is not an empty statement. Whether the argument which has provoked it is accepted or not, we will all agree, I think, on the necessity of recognizing how important in a free society the judicial arm is. We pride ourselves on the preservation of freedom in this country, and rightly so. We know that one of the reasons for the preservation or existence of that freedom is because, unlike in totalitarian countries, our judiciary is not, and is not under any circumstances encouraged to be influenced in any way by the executive or by political or any other considerations than those which should attend an absolute regard for judicial objectivity.

So I feel that we are making a mistake in principle in treating judges on the bench now who will have to retire at the age of 75 in the way that they will be treated under this particular measure. No great economic loss or inconvenience would result if we had made, or were even now to make, a differentiation between judges on the bench and the financial terms of their retirement as distinguished from the situation in that regard which under this measure we are going to apply to judges yet to be appointed and the circumstances of their retirement. However, the government has given this matter its consideration; it has taken this position and I can do no more than point out what I believe to be the unsound position it takes.

I agree with the minister that our judges should be able to retire in dignity. In saying that I am not oblivious of the fact that in dealing with the judges consideration must be given at some other time to the retirement circumstances of other classes of people in our community. I am not going to say, as one could easily be tempted to say, that the pension requirements of other classes in the community deserve attention. That I assume we will all recognize to be the case. We are now dealing with the judges. The judiciary is an important institution in our country and it must be surrounded by the kind of economic security which will enable it to discharge its functions ably, objectively and honourably; and I say that without in any way being open to the suggestion that I am oblivious of the need to provide satisfactory retirement schemes for the people of Canada as well as for other groups in our country.

The minister said that the annuities for the widows of judges are not adequate at the present time and that he proposes to take steps to deal with this problem. When the bill is presented to the house we shall be able to examine that question. He pointed out that judges now retire on salaries fixed in 1951. That being the situation I think we will have to recognize the equity of the matter and raise the level of annuities in relation not to the salary of nine years ago but to the salary of the present day.

As the minister has said, and I think we would all agree he has said rightly, the annuity paid to a judge should not be related to a former salary but should be based upon the salary which under the law is given at the time of retirement. Certainly this matter is one that should now come before the house, because as the minister has said there has been no revision since 1951.

The minister then spoke of judges retiring on a voluntary basis, and in that connection he said that there were three changes in contemplation. In the first case a full annuity would be provided to a judge at the age of 70 providing that judge had been on the bench for 15 years. The second case had to do with judges retiring after 15 years, if in the national interest he should do so. I will be interested when the bill is presented in knowing precisely what the minister means by "in the national interest". Incidentally, in all three of these cases, the judge will receive, I understand, the full annuity. As I say, I will be interested to know what the term "in the national interest" means in this particular situation. Does voluntary retirement mean that a judge is retiring because of criticism of his administration, because of criticism of his capacity or because of a possible intervention that might be made to have him removed? Would that warrant a consideration of the matter "in the national interest"? In any event, Mr. Chairman, when the bill is presented I would want to know more about what is meant in that regard.

Then the minister instanced the third case where retirement of a judge is voluntary because of sickness or disability. The full annuity is provided in that case, and as the minister pointed out in answer to a question of mine, voluntary retirement can take place even though a judge may have been on the bench for less than 15 years.

The minister then dealt with the matter of travelling allowances, and I think this general statement by him will appeal to all of us, knowing the cost of living particularly in the larger communities of our country. As I understood the scale, it will be from $8 to $12 and then to $15 a day, beginning at $12 where the judge was presiding in a community of over 5,000 people. I did not catch what the circumstances were with regard to the amount of $15, but I suspect that would depend upon the cost of living in a community likewise over 5,000 people.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I did not make it clear, but the hon. member realizes that that is the present provision. What he has just enunciated are the present provisions and I propose to put it on the basis of actual living expenses incurred by the judge when he is away from home.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister; I did not catch that. It is based on actual living expenses, and I thank him for correcting me on that point. While I am dealing with this, I will simply observe in passing that this principle might possibly be applied to other public servants, notably those serving Canada at the United Nations. I am not referring to members of parliament or members of the government but to the public servants who work in New York and whose per diem allowance is not, as I recollect it, altogether adequate.

The minister pointed out that hereafter judges in the province of Quebec will have their travelling allowances approved on the same basis as judges in the other nine provinces. I do not know why in the past a different arrangement was made, and it may be that when the bill is before us in committee we shall have an opportunity of going into this matter further.

Finally, the minister said there would be other matters which would ultimately be dealt with by way of legislation. He indicated there were other questions he had under review. He did not, however, say what those matters were, and it might be possible for the hon. gentleman when he concludes this debate, to give us some information in that regard.

Briefly, to summarize what I have said, I repeat that in principle this resolution is one that is acceptable to those of us in the official opposition. We shall want some explanation along the lines I have mentioned with regard to the federal government's acceptance of only four federal judges in the province of Quebec when seven were asked for. That can only mean that the government will have to indicate why the seven asked for by the province of Quebec were not warranted in the circumstances. No doubt the minister will give us his point of view in that regard.

Then there is the argument that I made, and which I believe to be a sound one, that we are here concerned with the independence of the judiciary and the decision to treat judges now on the bench on terms similar to those to be appointed from this date onward. This is a matter which we regard as a vital one, affecting not any individual judge but the whole of the judiciary which in a free society is no less important in the preserving of good order in the state than are the other arms of government.

Our system of government could not possibly function if alongside the executive and parliament we did not have an objective, neutral, capable and industrious judiciary not open to interference or influence from any quarter. I am not suggesting that our judiciary is open to such influence, but because we want to take the greatest possible care to ensure that it is not, I again tell the minister and the house that we shall examine with interest the bill on which this resolution is based.

Finally, I say again that no one can say from anything we have said on this side of the house in support of this measure that there is a failure to appreciate that the problem of the retirement of other classes in our community is still a problem that has to be dealt with. We are not seeking to deal with those matters tonight, but we ought to be able to deal with all these matters on terms that do not necessarily affect objective consideration of the case of each group.

Mr. Herridge: I do not for a moment suggest that I have the same knowledge and understanding of this subject as has the distinguished member for Essex East who has just resumed his seat, an hon. gentleman who is a distinguished member of the bar and who has demonstrated on occasion after occasion his great capacity to plead lost causes in this house.

However, speaking for this group, I must say that judging from the minister's explanation the proposed amendments to the Judges Act to be based on this resolution appear to us to be reasonable and founded on humane considerations of the need of judges' status, their responsibilities to the nation, their duties and their requirements. I listened carefully while the Minister of Justice was making his explanation and while, as I said before, I have not the detailed knowledge of this subject which the hon. member for Essex East possesses I think the explanation the minister gave was very reasonable and very fair. On that account this group will be pleased to support this resolution.

However—don't clap—I must say we do hope that the government will soon give some humane consideration to the needs of disability pensioners many of whom are on war veterans allowance; to the needs of those on old age security relief and a considerable number of persons in Canada who are unemployed and not able to receive unemployment insurance benefits. Like the hon. member for Essex East, I hope the government gives early consideration—similar consideration—to the needs of these people in our society. With those few remarks I will conclude, though I may possibly have more to say on second reading.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member for Essex East has dealt with our position on this side of the house and I have no intention of repeating the points he put forward. I think all of us would agree with most of the points which were made by the Minister of Justice in bringing in this resolution, subject, of course, to what will be contained in the bill.

It is impossible on the resolution stage of any bill to give complete consent to what may be contained in the measure itself but I do not think we on this side can quarrel with the greater part of the statements made by the Minister of Justice. There are, however, one or two things which I should like to bring to his attention.

One of them has already been dealt with by my hon. friend from Essex East, and that is the number of judges in the province of Quebec. The minister said at the outset that this matter had slipped his mind and that he had therefore made no reference to it. I will not repeat the arguments of my hon. friend other than to put it this way; that I know there is a great shortage of superior court judges in the city of Montreal. The Minister of Justice is perhaps far more aware than I am of the tremendous number of cases which have to be handled from day to day in the various courts of that city. With the increasing population, and for other reasons, it becomes every day more necessary and more important to have additional judges. I shall say no more as far as the request from the province of Quebec is concerned.

I presume that when the request was made and approved of by the legislative assembly it was done after careful consideration with the chief justices of the various districts in the province of Quebec. However, I notice the minister said that it was the intention to appoint four judges at this time. It may well be that the minister, after consultation with the provincial authorities and with those who are in touch with the various districts of the province of Quebec, may come to the conclusion either before the bill is brought in or at a later date that the needs of justice and of the national interest as he put it, would be met by an additional number of judges.

Then there is the point dealing with the question I raised at the end of his remarks, namely that the minister takes it that this resolution is complementary to the one which was discussed in the house recently and that the two are interdependent. I simply want to support the view of my colleague, the hon. member for Essex East, and our position taken at the time of the discussion of the earlier resolution which sought to amend the British North America Act, and the attitude taken by us at that time. We felt then and we feel now that there should be included in this bill consideration of those judges who had certainly an implied contract when they were appointed. Surely, they could not be presumed to know that at a later date an amendment such as that which was made earlier and that which is now contained in the bill which will follow this resolution would be enacted.

In so far as the other matters are concerned, I think that we on this side of the house find ourselves in agreement with the minister.

Mr. Fulton: There are one or two points which I should like to reply to before the resolution carries. I appreciate the position taken and the comments made by hon. members opposite with respect to the question of the provision which is to be made for those who are compulsorily retired, but I am sorry we will apparently not be able to reconcile our views in that regard. However, I point out that while I do not in any way retreat from my view that there is an absolute right in this parliament, in conjunction with provincial governments, to make amendments to the British North America Act in this field, I do agree, and said at the time of the earlier debate that I did agree that one must take account of the financial position of those who will be affected thereby. In fairness and in decency one must do that.

I therefore point out that under this resolution the positions of those judges who will be affected by the introduction of the retirement age, will be very appreciably improved, not perhaps to the full extent that would have been done by the measure suggested by my hon. friends, namely that they retire on full salary, but their financial position will be appreciably improved and brought closer to that point. Certainly, I would suggest that in a large number of cases, particularly those appointed a number of years ago, their positions will be brought up to the level of at least the salary prevailing at the time they were appointed. I think that at least meets the argument of my hon. friends in effect even though we are not entirely agreed in principle.

The other point that I should like to reply to is the question of the extra judges for the province of Quebec. I regret very much to have to apologize to the committee for having made an error. I think I said the Quebec legislature provided six for Montreal and one for Three Rivers. I should have said five for Montreal and one for Three Rivers. The total provided by their legislation is six. We are asking parliament to authorize salaries for four.

My hon. friend will, I know, understand that I am not for a moment disagreeing with the fact of the need for additional judges in the Montreal area where five are provided for provincially. I think my hon. friends will also agree that five is a substantial number of judges to ask parliament to provide salaries for and to appoint at one fell swoop. The fact that we are asking for salaries for only three now should not be taken as an indication that we think three will meet the problem. It is only an indication—and I hope it will only be taken as an indication—that we are asking for three and intend to appoint three at the present time and that we shall have another look at the situation as soon as possible at, say, the next session.

This has been discussed with the provincial authorities and while they do not moderate their position, as one would not expect them to with respect to the need, they have agreed that the provision of three extra judges at this time, as soon as we can do it, will be a real contribution toward meeting that need. Therefore, there is no difficulty between us on this point.

With respect to the other question that was raised in this connection, that is the propriety of the federal authority in not filling immediately the number of positions provided for by the provinces, there are two cases that I can cite which might serve as a precedent for this. There is the case of Prince Edward Island. There has been on the statute books of that province for many years provision for an extra judge which position has not yet been filled, and there is the case of Saskatchewan where originally there were provided positions for 20 district court judges. By agreement with the province the actual number to be appointed for years was set at 18. It is only recently that Saskatchewan legislation has actually been changed to provide positions for only 16; so that for all those years, until last year, although their legislation provided for 20, Saskatchewan asked Ottawa to appoint only 18, and that was the number that we in fact appointed, notwithstanding the provision made by their legislature. Therefore, there is no new or startling precedent in the fact that for a short period although five have been authorized for Montreal by the provincial legislature we are appointing only three. I emphasize that this is merely the situation for the present. It does go, and it is agreed by the provincial authorities to go a long way toward meeting the need they felt when they asked their legislature to provide for five further positions.

These, I think, Mr. Chairman, are the two main points raised by my hon. friends opposite. As they said, when they see the bill there may be other specific questions that will come up and I shall endeavour at that time to give such further explanations as the house may wish.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fulton thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-78, to amend the Judges Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND APPLICATION, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, June 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Comtois for the second reading of Bill No. C-64, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. Speaker: When this debate was last adjourned the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) had raised a point of order which I shall be glad to deal with very briefly now. The point of order was raised as a result of lengthy quotations by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) from the Winnipeg Free Press. I am sorry the hon. member is not here at the moment. The point made was that our practice does not permit the reading of such extracts in a debate, which is correct. I refer the house to Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 157, paragraphs 5 and 7. Paragraph 5 reads as follows:

> It is not in order to read articles in newspapers, letters or communications emanating from persons outside the house and referring to, or commenting on, or denying anything said by a member or expressing any opinion reflecting on proceedings within the house.

That is the general rule and practice. Although I had some thought there might be some difference between a case where the article quoted was against the interests of the member speaking and a case where it was in favour of the point of view he was expressing I think that perhaps the better view is that such articles should not be read at all. If it is against the interests of the member speaking and amounts to a question of privilege then paragraph 7 of the same citation applies. It is in the following terms:

> When a complaint is made of a newspaper, it is the practice in the House of Commons of Canada for the member to rise on a question of privilege and point out that he has been libelled or misrepresented. He may read as much of the article as is necessary to prove his case but he cannot go farther. He is bound to confine himself strictly to the question of privilege.

In effect what the hon. member was doing was dealing with a question of privilege in the course of the debate, and in my view the point taken by the minister was well taken.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put this suggestion before the house this evening. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) is absent at the present moment but this bill has been before us for some time and is not opposed. I have read the long debate at the resolution stage on May 25 in which eight members of the house participated and expressed their intention to support the bill.

Debate on second reading commenced on June 13. Two members of the opposition indicated support for the bill in very brief remarks and the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) was making comments with respect to the newspaper article you have just mentioned, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the house would like to proceed with the business fairly rapidly, I was wondering whether we could go on with this bill tonight and put it through second reading and the committee stage. I make this suggestion for the reason that the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are before the house and will be called again on Thursday or Friday. The minister will be available and I give the undertaking now that any questions which might arise during a study of the bill on second reading or in the committee stage can be asked on the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. If this course of action is not agreeable to the house, I will not press the point.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion made by the house leader is a very reasonable one. I think he is quite correct in assuming that those of us on this side of the house have supported the measure. Our main speaker was the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) and, as the house leader has said, there was one other speaker, if not more, who gave their support to the measure. Therefore I can see no reason why we should hold up the bill, particularly in the light of the very reasonable suggestion which has been made that if second reading is given the matter can be discussed more fully in committee or on the estimates when the minister will be here. There is only one reservation I should like to make and I make it with my tongue in my cheek. It is that, like the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, I too should like to be away from the house at this time.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, in view of the late date in the session, the fact that coming legislation will no doubt require lengthy debate and that this subject can be dealt with on the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and as we are in a very generous and amiable mood tonight, we agree with the minister's suggestion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Mr. Chevrier: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Next sitting of the house.

BRIDGES

LA SALLE, QUE.—AUTHORIZATION FOR CONSTRUCTION ACROSS ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-32, to authorize the construction and maintenance of a bridge across the St. Lawrence river at or near the town of La Salle, in the province of Quebec.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I hope the temper of the house will be the same when I am finished. May I say that this is a simple bill which is merely a formality. Its purpose is to authorize the province of Quebec to go ahead with the building of a building—excuse me, I am talking about buildings all the time because I am so overwrought on account of the housing problems—the building of a bridge adjacent to the Mercier bridge. It will be a one-way bridge to take the traffic load from the town of La Salle to the south side of the river off the Mercier bridge. The building of the bridge involves parliament in no responsibility other than the fact that because of the Navigable Waters Protection Act it becomes necessary to get the authorization of parliament for the building of any structure across navigable waters. This involves us in no cost and no responsibility. The cost will be borne entirely by the province of Quebec, as well as the maintenance. I suggest that the house might give consent to the authorization of the construction of this bridge.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be, and in fact I am sure there will not be any objection to this legislation. None the less, there are some things I think should be said at this time on the subject of the construction of this bridge. I hope the minister will not take issue with what I am about to say. I am in agreement with him that by virtue of section 11 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, no approval shall be given under this part for the site or plan of any bridge over the St. Lawrence. In other words, because of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, no bridge can be built over the St. Lawrence except by authorization of special legislation. It cannot be done by virtue of the act, but it may be done by a separate bill such as is being done in this case. This was done in the case of the construction of the present Mercier bridge which links Caughnawaga with Ville La Salle, and was done in the case of the Victoria bridge as well as in the case of the Jacques Cartier bridge.

My main purpose in rising was to make some reference to the traffic conditions in the city of Montreal, that is the conditions separating the island from the south shore. I am sure that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) and also the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker), who has been in his post for perhaps a lesser period of time than the Minister of Transport, are well aware of the very difficult transportation problem that exists in Montreal. They are brought about by a number of reasons. They are brought about by an increase in the population of greater Montreal. They are brought about by economic conditions. They are brought about by a tremendous development on the south shore that includes the whole Laprairie basin as well as along the St. Lawrence river from Montreal down to Sorel. It therefore becomes extremely important for the metropolitan area of Montreal to have adequate transportation facilities.

With that in mind I am sure the house and the minister will not begrudge my saying that when the St. Lawrence seaway was built provision was made for the construction of approaches to the Mercier bridge, the one now under construction. Provision was made for the construction of approaches to meet not one bridge, as was then in existence, but to meet a parallel bridge. While the province did, for a period of years, give the indication that they intended to build a parallel bridge to that of Mercier, nothing was done in that regard. I believe that because of the decision, about which I should like to say a word later on, to build the approaches as they were then built, that is approaches of such a nature as to permit the construction of the parallel bridge. We would not have this bridge now. Because of the approaches which were built on the south side it will not be necessary for the province of Quebec to do these now but only to link the bridge with the approaches which were constructed by the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Here I should like to bring to the attention of the house the fact that this is a vehicular bridge which is located at the head of the Lachine rapids and was built by a private corporation. It was built by La Corporation du Pont du Lac Saint-Louis, which corporation was authorized by a special Quebec act known as 18 George V, 1928, chapter 110. The provision was made for the construction from Ville La Salle to Caughnawaga. At the time the Mercier bridge was constructed it was thought that the seaway channel would be on the north side of the river and provision was made in the legislation for the appropriate works to be constructed by La Corporation du Pont du Lac Saint-Louis, and the federal government gave approval to the construction of this bridge upon certain conditions. I should like to put on the record one or two of those conditions:

1. The corporation undertakes to instal a movable span in the bridge, if and when, in the opinion of the governor in council, such action is required in the interest of navigation, the cost of installation of such movable span to accommodate deep water navigation on the proposed canal section, as well as the cost of operation and maintenance of this movable span to be borne by the owners of the bridge.

2. The corporation further undertakes to remove, after the completion of the proposed work, all temporary constructions such as cofferdams, false works, rip raps, pile work, etc., from the bed of the river or the site of the work as the governor in council may direct, in order that there shall be no obstruction in the way of navigation or of the flow of water or of future works.

I am sure the Minister of Public Works will realize immediately the importance of introducing conditions such as these, having regard to the Navigable Waters Protection Act itself. Then there was clause 3 which said:

3. Should the works mentioned in clauses 1 and 2 not be carried out within the time specified in the notice of the governor in council, the latter shall have the right to perform the same and recover the cost thereof from the corporation.

4. The corporation further undertakes to maintain at night on the work during construction the necessary lights at its own expense.

5. The corporation further undertakes, in constructing, maintaining or operating the said bridge, not to interfere with navigation in any way avoidable in the opinion of the governor in council.

6. It is further understood that the approval of this application shall not relieve the corporation from any liability for damage which may be caused either directly or indirectly by the said work.

The house may wonder why I put these conditions which were in the legislation on the record. I put them on the record for this purpose, and I think the house should know this. At the time the St. Lawrence seaway was under construction a decision was taken in the early years to move the channel from the north side to the south side. A legal point arose as to whether the liability of the province of Quebec to conform to the clauses which I have just mentioned was related to the south shore in the same manner as it was to the north shore.

I must say that we in the seaway authority took the position that they were liable and the government of the province of Quebec took the position that they were not liable. There were several discussions between the minister of transport at the time, members of the seaway authority and the government of the province of Quebec, through several of its departments, including the premier himself, but it was not possible to reach agreement. If the matter had been referred to the courts or had been delayed further it would not have been possible to complete the St. Lawrence seaway in the time required.

I mention that matter at this time simply so that those who are in office now, including both the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport, may keep this matter in mind when there is a reckoning of accounts with the province of Quebec. As the house knows, water lots were expropriated—and properly so—under this bridge now under construction and all along the Laprairie basin to the entrance of the Jacques Cartier bridge and certainly there will be moneys owing by the federal government to the province of Quebec. It may well be that the government will want to take these matters under consideration.

The Mercier bridge in any event was constructed in due course—I refer to the one which is now in existence—under the supervision of the Quebec commission already referred to and was initially operated as a toll bridge but the tolls were discontinued in 1942. The abolition of tolls referred to a number of bridges in the province of Quebec on which tolls were abolished under the provisions of the Quebec act which was known as 6 George VI, 1944, chapter 44, section 13.

The principal features which were mentioned in the discussions between the various departments of the province of Quebec and the seaway authority namely the department of public works which is responsible for the maintenance and operation of the bridge, the department of roads which is responsible for the highway connections, had to do with the provision by the province of Quebec of a four-lane highway on the south shore and connections from that four-lane highway to the bridge that is now under discussion.

I should like to place on record the principal features involved in the reconstruction of the southern approaches to the Mercier bridge. They were, first, the construction of a temporary diversion from pier 14 of the existing bridge to the south shore; second, the demolition of the southerly approach to the bridge from pier 14; and, finally, the reconstruction of the southerly approach to the bridge by means of a steel and concrete viaduct to provide for four-lane traffic ascending on a grade of approximately 4.5 per cent from pier 14 over the seaway channel with a clearance of 120 feet; and descending partly on a steel and concrete viaduct and partly on a fill to easterly and westerly connections with highway No. 9C in its revised location.

I do not know whether the final cost of this work has been estimated but it was substantial. I want to come back to the question of transportation facilities across the St. Lawrence river. Unquestionably the construction of this bridge is going to be of tremendous assistance. However, I am afraid that this will not be sufficient and that a great deal more will be required by way of bridges between the island of Montreal and the shores of the St. Lawrence.

There was prepared in 1957 a study of conditions of traffic over the bridges which separate Montreal from the south shore. I should like to put some of these figures on the record before I conclude. The traffic counts which were made at that time—that was in 1957—indicated that the annual daily average for the Jacques Cartier bridge was about 40,000 cars per day. Peak hour flows of 3,500 cars per hour had been registered almost daily while several peaks of more than 4,000 cars per hour had been counted, particularly during the summer season. As to the practical capacity of one bridge, namely the Jacques Cartier bridge, it will accommodate up to 7,500 cars per hour, especially if in the two lanes that have been added to this bridge—one by the former administration and the other by this administration—the traffic is reversible and they are used to balance the directional pattern of the traffic demand.

The Victoria bridge has had a bracket constructed on the downstream side and there is now provision for two lanes of 17 feet wide, one in each direction. These lanes will accommodate 1,800 cars per hour with no trouble. Several counts have shown a density of more than 2,000 cars per hour in one direction. The annual daily average is a little less than 20,000 cars per day.

The Mercier bridge figures which were taken at that time indicated that that facility was going through a complete change-over, following the completion of the approaches which were constructed by the St. Lawrence authority and to which I have referred. The new approaches on the south side, the traffic study reported, will guarantee capacity equivalent to that of the existing roadway. However, since the construction of a twin structure has been strongly suggested for the near future, the study was taking for granted the availability of the increased capacity of the Mercier bridge. When the two bridges, one operating in one direction and the other operating in the other direction, are in operation as twin structures, the Mercier bridge should be easily able to accommodate 4,500 cars per hour. At present the bridge has an annual daily average of about 15,000 cars and peak hour flows of 1,500 to 1,700 cars per hour. But as the study indicated at the time, that was not nearly sufficient to look after the traffic conditions in Montreal. It is true, of course, that a new bridge is under construction, namely the Champlain bridge, which also will link the island of Montreal with the south shore over Nuns' island. That bridge also will assist tremendously.

Here let me bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport, if I may, the fact that that bridge is not proceeding according to schedule. I do not want to be critical in any way but I want to raise the matter at this stage because I find that when these matters are brought up in the House of Commons the Minister of Transport generally takes cognizance of them and brings these suggestions to the attention of his officers. There is no doubt but that the progress of the work on the Champlain bridge is certainly not going according to schedule. It may well be that the majority of the contracts have been let, but I do think—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member that he is straying a little from the principle of the bill when he deals with the progress of construction of the Champlain bridge.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear the hon. member, I think he is making a very good contribution to the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the Minister of Public Works for his intervention and I would be the last one to quarrel with Your Honour's suggestion that I am not in order. But may I draw your attention to the fact that the Navigable Waters Protection Act provides clearly that no bridge across the St. Lawrence shall be built except by special legislation such as this, and I believe this authorizes a member of parliament to deal with all of the bridges that were constructed by virtue of legislation of this character.

Mr. Speaker: I would not argue with that but I did think the hon. member was straying a little in dealing with the rate of progress of construction. However, the house apparently is quite content to have him proceed.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not going to take undue advantage of this kindness on the part of the other side of the house, but none the less I was just concluding my remarks on that matter. I would ask the Minister of Transport to bring this matter to the attention of his officers. I think if he does there should and will be greater progress.

Now I come back to the position of vehicular traffic across the St. Lawrence river. I make another plea here for the construction of a bridge east of the Jacques Cartier bridge. I am not going to labour it unduly because this matter was discussed during the estimates of the minister, but I would say that according to the study which was made in 1957 the construction of this bridge, which is the most westerly of the four, will certainly not look after transportation conditions adequately in so far as conditions east of the Jacques Cartier bridge are concerned.

There is, as I have said, tremendous industrial development here, much of it in steel. There are the equivalent of three large steel industries which have been developed in that area. I think the government should give careful consideration to the representations which have been made by its own members and which have been made by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) following a statement which I made in the house some time ago when I referred to a report on the St. Lawrence ship channel and the Montreal harbour committee in 1950, which report recommended construction of a bridge east of the Jacques Cartier bridge.

All I want to say on that is this. I think the time has come to give consideration to it now, because I know that in order to prepare plans and specifications and to get the various approvals from the province, the municipality, and so forth, time is necessary and unless it is done now and consideration is given to it at this time I doubt very much whether any progress will be made. Where it should go I am not in a position to say. I think that should be determined by a committee, as many committees are established from time to time by the government concerning railways. In fact there is one royal commission at the present time determining what location the Pine Point railway should follow. It might be advisable for the government to estabush a committee which would determine where the location of this bridge should be.

In the eyes of some people it should be at the foot of Boulevard Pie IX, adjoining it with the south shore. In the eyes of others it should be further east of that. As I say, I am not in a position to state where it should be other than to say that owing to the increasing population in Montreal, and because of this traffic study which indicates that within the next ten years there will be an increase of close to one million in population of the city, consideration must of necessity be given at once to the plans for an additional bridge in that area.

I think we on this side of the house are quite happy about the construction of this bridge. We think it is timely. We support it and we trust and hope that it will be built with the least possible delay.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the quite brief but lucid explanation of the purposes of this measure given us by the minister, and the longer and very interesting speech of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), who has a first-class knowledge of the situation along the St. Lawrence and the traffic requirements as a result of the very high position he held in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway, we in this group have no hesitation whatever in supporting this non-contentious measure which provides for the province of Quebec to build a bridge as a transportation facility across the St. Lawrence river to meet the increasing traffic requirements occasioned by the developments in that province about which we are pleased to hear.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Short Title.

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Chairman, I ask this question purely for information and I think perhaps the hon. member for Laurier can answer it. Who paid for the original Jacques Cartier bridge?

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Transport perhaps knows the answer better than I, but it was paid for by the Montreal harbour commissioners, and eventually by the government of Canada.

Mr. Walker: Yes, the hon. member for Laurier is correct.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TERMINAL FACILITIES AT TORONTO

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. C-72, respecting the construction by the Canadian National Railway Company of certain railway terminal facilities at and in the vicinity of the city of Toronto.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1—Short Title.

Mr. Hellyer: Just before this carries there are a few brief questions I should like to ask. Unfortunately, I was not able to be present in the committee which dealt with this matter. I wonder if the minister received any report of the discussions in that committee. As I said at the resolution stage, I think this is a very useful project as far as the life and growth of metropolitan Toronto community is concerned. There have been some problems with respect to location. I do not know whether these were discussed in the committee. Perhaps the minister could indicate whether they were.

In addition, I wonder if the minister would give us some indication of how soon this project can get under way so that we may have some idea whether it will assist in providing a limited amount of employment in Toronto in the near future.

Mr. Hees: As hon. members know, following second reading this bill was referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines where it was thoroughly discussed over a period of about four and a half hours with officials of the C.N.R. who were present to answer all questions.

The officials outlined the route, gave reasons for choosing it and dealt exhaustively with this whole project. I can say in answer to the hon. member for Trinity that I will be very glad to see that he gets a copy of the report of the committee. As I say, it covered about a four and a half hour period—

Mr. Chevrier: How long?

Mr. Hees: It just shows how thoroughly we go into these matters of importance, and it is right that we should. Regarding the time when this project may be started, I may say that as soon as this bill passes, as I hope it will, the C.N.R. officials will begin the preliminary work. I do not believe it will be possible to do very much extensive work requiring a large labour force this winter, though everything that can be done will be done to get work done during the winter period.

Mr. McGee: It is more in sorrow than in anger that I rise at this point to make a final contribution regarding this matter of the by-pass line which runs for most of its length through the constituency of York-Scarborough. For the information of the hon. member for Trinity, the subject of employment did come up at the committee. The question was asked, I believe by myself, and the answer was a rough estimate of 5,000 man-years as a gauge of the direct labour content of the project, to say nothing of the endless thousands of jobs created in secondary industries as a result of the large amount of material required for construction.

The committee during its hearings was left, I will not say unimpressed, but certainly unconvinced about the alternative routes which were suggested by various ratepayers whose districts are to be greatly affected by the proposed route. None of the three alternative routes commended themselves to the committee.

There was one unusual aspect. The timing of the committee was such that an opportunity was not given to me at the time to reply to the allegation of an hon. member who made certain comments. I was hoping he would be in the house tonight to hear my reply. Certainly I would like to put it on record. The suggestion made by the hon. member for York North to the effect that the objections to the proposed route in the Thornhill area were largely centred on a few large estates in a certain area is completely and utterly without foundation. The proof of that pudding is in the eating, or in the reading of the many hundreds of letters which I and other hon. members connected with the area have received from persons of modest means.

As I said, it is more in sorrow than in anger that reluctantly I accept that this route will have to pass through the sleepy village of Thornhill bringing an accompanying disturbance to that area.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to

On clause 3—Competitive bids or tenders.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us if this is the usual clause including the provision that the lowest tender must not necessarily be accepted and that the management is not precluded from negotiating better prices or terms?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: None of your interjections. If you have anything to say, stand on your feet and say it. I was asking the minister if he could tell us whether this is the usual provision and, second, if this would in any circumstances permit the renegotiation of a bid or tender after tenders have been opened.

Mr. Hees: This question was asked of the vice president of Canadian National Railways and he assured the committee that this was the usual clause introduced in bills of this kind. I do not believe that renegotiation could take place under it.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 10 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Hellyer: With respect to the schedule, which includes a number of works to be constructed, I have just two or three brief questions to ask. The first concerns grade separations. I wonder if the minister could give us any indication of how many grade separations would be required in respect to this proposed yard. That was under item 6. Second, under item 7, I should like to know, where it refers to terminal and local stations, if this is just for freight or whether any other facilities are planned such as limited passenger facilities.

Mr. Hees: Regarding the number of grade separations, that whole matter was thoroughly discussed. I am afraid I have not got the information here as to the exact number, but it is in the evidence which was given. It is on record. Further, it is my understanding that these stations are only for handling freight.

Mr. Peters: Will this have any effect on the union station itself and the line running from the north into the union station?

Mr. Hees: No; I am advised this will not affect operations into the union station, which are primarily for passenger traffic, and that will still be handled by the union station.

Schedule agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a case of saying that we really have reached the bottom of the barrel. May I ask the house leader what he intends to do tomorrow? I see there are only two pieces of legislation left. I do not know whether he intends to take legislation or to deal with estimates alone.

Mr. Churchill: The house has made very good progress and I should like to thank hon. members for their co-operation.

Perhaps tomorrow we will go on with estimates. I have to make a change from the tentative program I announced last week. We will call health and welfare, followed by northern affairs, and then continuing on through Thursday and Friday with those departments if not completed. Justice and mines and technical surveys will be resumed. These four departments are available for the next three days.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 22, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO HON. MEMBER FOR HURON ON FIFTIETH WEDDING ANNIVERSARY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unusual occasions demand that unusual actions be taken. I am sure the house will permit me on this unusual occasion, the celebration by one of our members of his fiftieth wedding anniversary, to mention this event. I am sure I speak on behalf of all hon. members in the house when I express to him, and through him to his wife, the warmest congratulations and felicitations, coupled with the hope for many more years of health and happiness.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has said this is an unusual procedure to which we are resorting, but since we are the masters of our own rules in this house it ought to be possible for us to recognize a unique occasion. The Leader of the Opposition has suggested that since I come from the same section of the province of Ontario as does the hon. member whom we are recognizing at this moment I might, on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition and the members of this party, extend our very sincere congratulations to the hon. member and to his wife. We can only hope that when he celebrates his centenary, he will then be celebrating it under different political auspices.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wish to make it unanimous, Mr. Speaker, and with real sincerity I wish on behalf of the C.C.F. group to extend our congratulations to the hon. member for Huron. We have been in the house together for many years. I have always considered him a very good friend and have enjoyed working with him, particularly when he had the post of chief government whip. This is a very important occasion, and it is a great pleasure for me to extend to him and to his wife our congratulations and best wishes on their fiftieth wedding anniversary, in the hope that they will have many more years of health and happiness together.

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a very embarrassing position this morning as a result of the fact that I had the misfortunate to lose a tooth and I had to send my denture out to be fixed. I assure you that it was not because my wife hit me. I wish to thank those who have been kind enough to remember my fiftieth wedding anniversary. I can only say "thank you".

What was the amount to the credit of the unemployment insurance fund as of May 31, 1957, 1958, 1959 and 1960?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The answer is May 31, 1957, $846,819,435.32; 1958, $662,056,156.77; 1959, $432,847,911.14; 1960, $299,293,511.04.

IVANHOE LAKE, ONT., DAM

Question No. 188—Mr. Godin:

1. Did the federal government assist financially in the construction of the dam on Ivanhoe lake near Foleyet, Ontario in 1931? If so, to what extent?

2. Was permission required under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for the construction of the dam? If so, did the Department of Public Works satisfy itself that the structure was safe?

3. Has the federal government received any request for assistance in replacing the dam? If so, what reply has been made to such request?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Since this question will involve a great deal of research going back over 30 years, I wonder whether the hon. member would be good enough to allow this matter to stand?

Mr. Badanai: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—REPORTED AGREEMENT ON U.S. STORAGE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he cares to comment on a report in the press this morning to the effect that nuclear weapons for United States jet interceptors are to be stored in Canada.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): There have been discussions with the United States government regarding the possible conditions under which nuclear weapons for jet interceptors might be stored in United States leased bases in Canada. No agreement has been arrived at.

Mr. Pearson: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Are these discussions concerned with the storage of nuclear weapons in leased bases in Canada, and in leased bases only?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—REPORTED NEW U.S. COMPROMISE PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the minister care to comment on the report in this morning's press—the encouraging report, I might say—that the United States will make new compromise proposals in the east-west disarmament talks? Has the minister any information to give to the house on that matter, and any information on the role that Canada may have played in the formulation of these new proposals?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The house will not be surprised to learn that in the course of the past several days the Canadian government has made its view known to its colleagues in the western five members of the 10-nation disarmament committee, to the effect that the western response to the new Soviet disarmament proposals of June 2 should be both flexible and forthcoming. This attitude is, of course, entirely consistent with the position which Canada has taken from the beginning of the preparation of the western position.

I think I may safely reveal that in the earliest stages of the negotiations we suggested that progress might be based upon comparison of the western and Soviet proposals with a view to finding common ground. As hon. members know, I myself have emphasized this theme several times in recent weeks in the house in referring to the possibility of bringing the 10-nation committee to grips with specific issues through negotiations on the basis of balanced concessions.

We welcome all indications that other members of the western five, on whom we have pressed these views with insistance both at Geneva, within NATO and in bilateral exchanges of view, now seem to be approaching the negotiations with the same attitude.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the minister say whether there will be new proposals made by the western five and, if so, at what time they will be made?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, of course this is a team operation, and I do not know at what time the proposals will be made; but I am confident that proposals will be advanced dealing with the suggestions recently made by the eastern five.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question arising out of the minister's statement that this is a matter of team work among the western powers. Has the Canadian government been informed of the proposals discussed by Mr. Eaton, the delegate of the United States, and has Canada indicated its views, if consulted about the United States proposals?

Mr. Green: I do not know to what proposals made by Mr. Eaton the hon. member for Essex East refers. Mr. Eaton was recalled to Washington a few days ago to discuss the situation with his government, and those discussions are still going on in Washington. Mind you, we have made it known that we think there should be proposals submitted in response to the Russian proposals of a few days ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the minister not aware that Mr. Eaton, the United States delegate, is reported in today's press as having discussed with his government proposals which are shortly to be discussed by the 10-power committee, and that he is now returning to Geneva for the purpose of laying those proposals before the committee?

Mr. Green: I believe Mr. Eaton is getting instructions in Washington as to what stand he should take at Geneva. As I said, these discussions in Washington have not yet been completed.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REPORTED POSTPONEMENT OF MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Justice based on a most interesting press dispatch by Mr. Harold Morrison of the Canadian Press, Washington, yesterday. I will just read the dispatch because it is most interesting to us, and then I can pose my question. It says:

New snags in Canada-United States negotiations have eliminated the possibility of beginning Columbia river power construction this year. United States authorities said they had planned to meet with their Canadian counterparts at Ottawa yesterday and today—

That would be Monday and Tuesday of this week, June 20 and 21.

—in what might have been the closing stage of a draft construction treaty, but the Americans were asked by the Canadians to postpone the talks until mid-July.

The said they could only speculate that the reason for the postponement was that the Canadian government could not iron out differences with the provincial government of British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the great importance of this issue and its interest, would the minister care to comment on this statement or has he any information he wishes to give to the house?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the hon. member gave me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I would like to point out that the information contained in the article is not completely accurate, and that the article itself indicates that it is based on speculation. I think the inaccuracies in it verify the fact that there is speculation here. The dates tentatively set for the meetings here in Ottawa were June 24 and 25, not Monday and Tuesday of this week.

In connection with this whole matter there are some problems, it is true, which are difficult of solution, as is natural in a project of this magnitude, and time and care are necessary to ensure that the best and most acceptable solution is found. In negotiations of this kind, dates set for meetings must always, to some extent, be tentative, and no special significance should be read into the postponement of the next meeting which we now hope it will be possible to hold by or before the middle of July.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question arising out of the reply given by the Minister of Justice. Does the right hon. gentleman still expect, as he stated some weeks ago, that there will be agreement between the two governments on this matter before the end of the parliamentary session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hope springs eternal; but the hon. gentleman will realize from his wide experience in the Department of External Affairs that sometimes there are unexpected delays.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister make any comment on the report that the Vancouver city council has requested him to convene immediately a conference of federal, provincial, municipal, employer and union leaders to consider the present serious unemployment situation in British Columbia?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will examine the record to see whether or not representations have been made, and then give the hon. gentleman a reply.

INQUIRY AS TO WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. In view of the current unemployment situation, and notwithstanding the inadequacy of the program in the past, could the minister inform the house whether he will be in a position to announce shortly a winter works program for the coming winter?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if and when the government takes the decision that it will sponsor a municipal winter works program the announcement will be made in the usual way.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister any intention of announcing a summer works program as well?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For the House of Commons?

CHILLIWACK, B.C.—REQUEST FOR STRAWBERRY PICKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Anderson (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to be of assistance to one of my colleagues, the hon. member for Fraser Valley, who I believe should change the colour of his suit. During the orders of the day yesterday he was on his feet nine times and was not recognized, and he has been on his feet four times this morning.

Mr. Harold Hicks (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether it is because of the colours of the curtain and of my suit or what the reason is.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps it is lack of voice. If the hon. member will rise and give voice I will certainly hear him.

Mr. Hicks: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. It has to do with an article in the Chilliwack Progress together with a photograph of some beautiful Fraser valley strawberries. The crop is now ready to pick. Five hundred pickers are needed at Chilliwack and there are only 200 people registered at the national employment service office. Further down in the article it says that 4,000 pickers are wanted in the whole valley. My question to the Minister of Labour is of a somewhat different nature from what he usually gets. Can he give me any idea where we can get pickers?

Mr. Benidickson: What wages are offered?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will bring this requirement to the attention of the national employment service, and I am sure we can help to fill it.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON REVISED SYSTEM OF MEASUREMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question of the Minister of Labour. In view of his reported announcement the other day, when he spoke of statistical unemployment, that a committee selected by the government for the purpose of considering a revised measurement for unemployment had reached a conclusion, will the minister advise the house what the decision of that committee is so that we might assess its validity?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I have received no report of any conclusion from this committee as yet. As soon as we do, very careful consideration will be given to the recommendations contained therein.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the seriousness of unemployment at the present time, does the minister not think that committee, having now sat for almost three months, should make up its mind in a matter so important?

Mr. Starr: I do not know what the hon. member means by that question. We are anxiously awaiting that report.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

MANITOBA—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER ON STABILIZATION AND EQUALIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I may put a question to the Minister of Finance. In the light of a statement attributed to the premier of Manitoba, who is also the provincial treasurer of that province, reported in the Globe and Mail this morning as having been made yesterday in Winnipeg, to the effect that whatever happened Manitoba would fight at the federal-provincial conference to retain the twin principles of stabilization and equalization, can the minister say whether it is going to be necessary for any provincial government to fight to retain the principles of stabilization and equalization?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the report in question nor any statement by the premier of Manitoba. Every government attending this conference is perfectly free to take whatever position it wishes with respect to financial relations between the provincial and federal levels of government after March 31, 1962, and there will be no attempt to dictate to members of any government with regard to the position to be taken by them at this conference. It is a free conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has obviously misunderstood the point of my question. Can the hon. gentleman assure the house the government has no thought whatsoever of abandoning the principles of stabilization and equalization?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government has no intention whatever of abandoning the principle of recognizing all the rights accorded to the provinces under the constitution.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

CHIGNECTO CANAL—PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH NEW BRUNSWICK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. D. C. Stewart (Charlotte): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister in a position to inform the house what progress has been made in negotiations with the province of New Brunswick in connection with the Chignecto canal?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): In reply to the hon. member for Charlotte, may I say that after consulting many times with Premier Hugh John Flemming, and the government of the province of New Brunswick, having undertaken to pay one half of the cost thereof the federal government has agreed to a survey being proceeded with to determine the feasibility of building the Chignecto canal.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether he expects to make the same progress with this project that is being made with the Prince Edward Island causeway?

Mr. McIlraith: There is no election proceeding in Prince Edward Island at the moment.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, at least we expect to do it much faster than the former government did.

FLOODS

LAKE NIPISSING—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. In order that the French shorthand reporters should not be completely unemployed today I will ask my question in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, has the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Walker) prepared a report to the house on the present situation at Lake Nipissing?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have a question directed to me in French. My reply is no.

(Text):

HEALTH AND WELFARE

POLIOMYELITIS—NUMBER OF CASES HAVING RECEIVED SALK VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Trinity asked me for any figures available to my department relating to the number of cases of paralytic polio this year that had received Salk vaccine.

I find this information is not available at the moment, as detailed figures on individual cases have been supplied by the provinces at the end of each year. However, this year, following discussion with the provinces, a new method of reporting polio designed to provide current information is under trial. With respect to the cases of paralytic polio reported last year, 65 per cent had received no Salk vaccine and 10 per cent had received three or more doses of Salk vaccine.

PUBLIC SERVICE

OTTAWA—OPPORTUNITY TO VOTE IN QUEBEC PROVINCIAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question through the house leader. I apologize for not sending him notice, but my staff is overworked. My question is based on the long-established desire of the C.C.F. to ensure that every citizen may exercise his democratic rights to the full regardless of whether in any particular instance such an exercise of rights is to the advantage of the C.C.F.—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Herridge: I am most objective in this case. In view of the fact that the polls are open in Quebec today from 9 a.m. to 6.30 p.m., and since there are many employees of the House of Commons resident in Quebec whose hours of work are from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m., has the government made any arrangements to give these public servants time off today so they may exercise their democratic right to vote? And if these arrangements have been made, have all the employees concerned been notified?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that this question comes within Your Honour's jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: I shall be glad to provide information privately to any hon. member who is concerned with the House of Commons staff.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the house leader or the Prime Minister, as the case may be, advise the house whether arrangements have been made for federal civil servants who are entitled to vote in the Quebec election to have time off in order to exercise their franchise?

An hon. Member: It is the same question.

Mr. McIlraith: No, it is not restricted to the House of Commons. The difference is several thousand employees.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the same arrangements have been made as were made on previous occasions. I think civil servants would naturally exercise their right.

Mr. McIlraith: Does that mean they can take the required time off without penalty?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is not for me to give an answer to that question. I think today, as in the past, civil servants will exercise their own rights and will not require assistance from either the hon. gentleman or myself.

Mr. McIlraith: No arrangements have been made, then.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES—INQUIRY AS TO RECEIPT OF REPRESENTATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I think hon. members will recognize that they have not yet received the printed Hansard of yesterday's proceedings. I am informed that when it does appear it will not include a question I raised yesterday. I referred to the debate of June 20, when I addressed a question to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance with respect to representations that may have been received by the government from the Canadian postal employees association. Yesterday I addressed this question to the Acting Secretary of State. Naturally, he is not in his seat today, for reasons that we can comprehend, but he said he would look into it. I believe this question will not appear in Hansard. Unfortunately I will be away tomorrow, and I draw this to Your Honour's attention.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

WHOOPING CRANES—REPRESENTATIONS BY U.S. RESPECTING PRESERVATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked me a question concerning whooping cranes. He inquired whether any representations had been made by the United States government to the Canadian wild life service. I am now informed that no such representations have been made in relation to the preservation of whooping cranes in Canada.

SPORTS

REPORTED REQUEST FOR SUPPORT FOR NATIONAL COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Like that of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, it is unusual. It relates to a Toronto Star account of yesterday about the crude efforts of government members of parliament to get government support for a Canada sports council. The effect of the article was that the cabinet was cool toward the scheme because of the unemployment problem, but these members of parliament have argued that unemployment will always be a serious problem and that it should not be a deterrent. Has the minister any information to give that will create more optimism about employment on the government benches?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me the question is one that is rather broad for an immediate answer on the orders of the day. As I recall it, the house has discussed this very matter on five or six occasions. I do not want to prevent the minister from replying, but it seems to me that sort of question is not one that can be answered briefly.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the knowledge possessed by the hon. member is such that I will have to look at his question carefully before I decide whether it needs a reply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

LABOUR DEPARTMENT—REQUEST FOR CALLING OF ESTIMATES THIS WEEK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the leader of the house whether he would not arrange to have the estimates of the Department of Labour called this week so that we can have a debate, in the light of headlines like this in the Globe and Mail today—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —"6.2 Per cent Jobless—"

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: "—in Total Labour Force Post-war peak for May".

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You should be ashamed to turn your back on the Speaker and go on talking.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the Chilliwack paper? There was no objection to reading from it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the ministry seems to regard this question of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate as an improper one, particularly the Minister of Finance. I suggest that the question is in order, and in view of the seriousness of the situation I suggest that the government should answer the question at once.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the impropriety to which the Minister of Finance took objection was the action of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in going on talking for the record when you were on your feet and when he well knew you were on your feet.

Mr. Speaker: In its first phrases the question was one about the business of the house and was in order. The reason I rose, of course, was that the hon. member sought to reinforce his inquiry about the business of the house with other material.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which I suggest, sir, with deference is not unusual in the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On the part of the Liberals.

Mr. Pickersgill: We had the precedent of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. Has the house leader no intention of replying?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there has been a fine spirit of co-operation in the house with regard to the order of business as it has been arranged from week to week. We have tried very hard not to upset the order as announced on Thursday nights for the balance of the week. I wonder whether the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate really wants to change the order now; because other departments which are of great importance are ready for consideration today, tomorrow and Friday. There will be ample opportunity to discuss the problems that arise in connection with labour on the labour estimates, and I will consult with hon. members opposite as to the appropriate time to introduce the estimates of that department.

BILL OF RIGHTS—INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF INTRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the proposed bill of rights is to be submitted to a committee, and in view of the fact that it may be more difficult in July and August to secure witnesses who may wish to appear before that committee, will the Prime Minister inform the house, if he can, as to his intentions with regard to the introduction of this bill?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, subject to consideration being given to the matter by opposition members and the house leader, I would think it would be available next week on whatever day is satisfactory. I hope that it would be available Wednesday or Thursday so that consideration can be given to the bill in committee, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

AIR TRANSPORT

DORVAL—STATEMENT ON REGULATION OF JET PLANE TAKE-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. F. Villeneuve (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister comment on the meeting he had with representatives of the city of St. Laurent yesterday regarding the question of jet aircraft noise around Dorval airport?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The meeting afforded a useful opportunity for us to discuss the problems occasioned by the introduction of jet aircraft into commercial service and the steps we are taking to alleviate the problem of noise.

The department is working in close co-operation with the air lines to solve this matter. There are no scheduled take-offs of civil jets between midnight and early morning, but due to flight delays of one sort or another there have been a number of delayed take-offs during these hours in the course of the last few weeks. Discussions are being held with the air lines aimed at preventing this situation from continuing. A substantial number of other steps have been taken or are being discussed with the air lines as well, including noise suppressors on engines, the use of preferential runway take-off patterns to avoid built-up areas whenever weather conditions permit, and similar items.

Scientific tests have in fact indicated that the noise caused by a pure jet is in fact somewhat less than that caused by some of the current piston engine types, such as the Super Constellation, but the jet noise has a different frequency value and therefore comes as a new and troublesome sound to the listener who has not had a chance to become accustomed to it. I can assure the hon. member that every possible step is being taken to deal with this problem, and particular attention is being given to means which will avoid jet take-off noise during the core of the night hours.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION INTO NEWSPAPER COMPETITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I regret not having been able to send him notice of it. My question is based on a newspaper report in yesterday's Globe and Mail of a speech made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in Niagara Falls, in which she is reported to have said that competition in the newspaper field in a great many Canadian cities has diminished or completely vanished. Has this opinion been transmitted to the Minister of Justice, and are there any investigations under way to determine whether the diminishing or vanishing of competition is contrary to the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that an inquiry is taking place in one city of Canada and that this has been mentioned before. As he knows, it is not the custom to refer to specific inquiries. I am not aware of any general inquiry that is in progress, but I will be glad to find out and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Howard: I wonder whether the minister could indicate—and I will mention the company and the city—because it has been well publicized, when we may expect the report of the restrictive trade practices commission on the operations of Pacific Press Limited of Vancouver.

Mr. Fulton: I cannot give an answer to that question now, but I will find out.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN CIVIL SERVICE REPORT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): May I ask leave of the house to revert to motions for the purpose of moving concurrence in a report of the civil service commission which was tabled in the house on Monday and is printed in Votes and Proceedings of June 20, at page 671.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Income Tax Act

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I move on behalf of the commissioners of internal economy:

That the report of the civil service commission concerning certain employees of the House of Commons laid upon the table by Mr. Speaker on June 20, 1960, be now approved.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF U.K. BOARD OF TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he has any comment to make on the statement reported to have been made by the president of the board of trade of the United Kingdom at a press conference on his return to Great Britain yesterday, to the effect that in Ottawa he had found great concern that Britain might join the European common market.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I do not understand why there would be any observations on my part about comments made by the president of the board of trade with regard to anything he might have discussed or considered on his trip to the North American continent.

Mr. Pearson: I asked the question because this was the president of the United Kingdom board of trade commenting on what he found in government circles in Ottawa with respect to this matter.

Mr. Churchill: I have not seen the report to which the Leader of the Opposition refers. I am not certain of the words used. Does he mention government circles?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, he said that in Ottawa—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: —he had found certain things. Of course he was speaking about the people with whom he had consulted in Ottawa, who were members of the government. He reported that he found great concern that Britain might join the European common market.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-68, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed and bill read the third time and passed.

Supply—Health and Welfare

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND APPLICATION, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (for the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-64, to amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

242. Departmental administration, $1,641,729.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Chairman, as the committee is aware, the department's spending program for 1960-61 has been given very careful and extensive study by the standing committee on estimates. If hon. members will refer to the proceedings they will note that a total of 17 sessions were held from March 8 to May 12, involving more than 25 hours of deliberation. In addition to myself some 15 departmental officials were called as witnesses, including the two deputy ministers and the heads of many of our directorates and divisions. On the matter of emergency planning we were joined by my colleague the Minister of National Defence, the clerk of the privy council, and the director of the emergency measures organization.

In view of the comprehensive nature of the investigations and the fact that the minutes, which of course are available to the house, include my own lengthy opening statement as well as various working papers presented to the committee, I feel it unnecessary to make any general presentation regarding our estimates at this time. Instead, I should like to make a few comments on the very interesting and constructive report which emerged from the hearings and which has also been tabled in the house.

Before doing so, I want to take this opportunity to voice a word of thanks to all those who served on the committee and particularly to its chairman, the hon. member for Calgary South. Their helpfulness and co-operation were greatly appreciated. For myself, I consider that the discussions were extremely valuable to the department, and I can only hope that they were useful also to the committee. In any event, I believe the record shows that all the many pertinent questions put forward by the committee members did receive answers.

With regard to the report, I am pleased to note that the general tenor of its comments would seem to be in the direction of reinforcing various efforts and programs already under way in the department. As examples, I would cite the recommendations on mental health, Canada's native population, physical fitness and narcotic control. The main points of issue, particularly in the first two of these areas, are simply the availability of added funds and the question of whether or not increased expenditures would lead to effective results under present circumstances.

The report raises a number of other points which clearly involve government policy and on which I feel I cannot at the moment go beyond what I said during the committee proceedings. In this connection I have in mind the recommendations concerning grants to health, welfare and related organizations; family allowances, blind persons allowances, and disabled persons allowances. As I indicated to the committee, the questions raised on these several matters have received study and will continue to be reviewed in the light of changing conditions.

There are certain additional areas of the report with which I feel I should deal in more detail. The first of these has to do with hospital construction grants. Here I welcome the committee's concurrence in my view that as long as new construction remains in large measure the responsibility of communities, Canadian hospitals will retain their traditional autonomy and independence. The committee goes on, however, to express concern over reported crowding of hospital facilities. I can assure the committee that the department is also concerned with this matter. At the same time we have serious doubts as to whether the suggested immediate review on a nation-wide basis of the availability of beds in relation to demand would be the most effective approach.

The point is simply this. The provinces are administering their own insurance plans, which are dependent both now and in the future on adequate hospital accommodation for active treatment and chronic care. Since they have this responsibility, it would seem appropriate in those instances where there may be shortages of hospital beds for the provinces to initiate studies and surveys in the light of the particular provincial situation.

Having in mind that Canada is a federal state, the role of my department, as I see it, should be to bolster such efforts through the provision of financial as well as technical assistance. This is the approach which we have followed and which we consider to be the only sound one under the circumstances.

The committee also mentioned the problem of chronic bed care, and this is certainly a most urgent need. It is, however, a very complicated business. The provision of additional beds would by no means provide the complete answer. It would not, for instance, remove an obstacle such as staff shortages, nor would it give attention to needs with respect to home care and other types of alternatives to hospitalization.

To explore the whole question of chronic illness, my department has set up a special committee under the chairmanship of the director of health services. We are hopeful that the studies being conducted by this committee, along with work being done in the provinces, will form a fruitful basis for joint consideration and action in developing a number of realistic avenues of approach to the question of chronic illness. The latter will, of course, continue to be a long term and stubborn problem in Canada and in other countries.

On the matter of outpatient services, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act has left this to the discretion of the provinces. It does, however, encourage development along these lines by including the cost of diagnostic services for outpatients within possible shareable costs. Some provinces have taken almost full advantage of this provision, while others are still in the process of extending the outpatient sector of their plans. On the basis of recent developments I would say that the outlook for further progress in this field is most encouraging.

Another area of the committee report I should like to touch on deals with hospital administration. Here, I am afraid, I am in basic disagreement with the implications of the committee's comments relating to closed hospitals. The report indicates, for example, that:

> While it is appreciated that the administrative responsibility for these hospitals does not come under jurisdiction of the federal authority, it should be pointed out that these hospitals are recipients of financial aid from the government of Canada under the health grants program and the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

In other words, as I interpret this statement the fact that the dominion government provides hospital grants to provincial governments should imply the right to say how individual hospitals should deal with matters of this kind.

This I believe is a dangerous principle to put forward. Having in mind the constitutional and traditional development of responsibilities in the health field in Canada, the tying of this kind of federal control to financial aid would jeopardize the whole system of co-operation built up over the years between federal and provincial health authorities. I feel very strongly that a matter such as closed hospitals must be left with the provinces.

Admittedly it has long been a contentious issue as far as the medical profession and hospitals are concerned, but I do not see that this fact warrants federal interference. This issue and others like it must be resolved in each province among health authorities, hospitals, medical schools and the medical profession itself.

The committee's recommendation that "every effort should be made to prevail on local authorities to ascertain whether a policy involving any form of restriction or discrimination places hardship on either patients or non-staff doctors" would involve direct federal intervention in an area in which the provinces have full and exclusive authority.

While I cannot therefore agree with such an action, I would emphasize that the department does have a definite interest in this matter, and we have expressed this interest through what we consider to be the proper channels, namely the dominion council of health made up of federal and provincial deputy ministers of health as well as representatives of the public at large, and more recently through the advisory committee on hospital insurance and diagnostic services. What I believe we must avoid is any semblance of dictation or any effort which would tend to introduce rigidities into the management of hospitals across the country. Hospital administrations in the provinces and in local communities are well aware of such problems and can, I am sure, more appropriately develop solutions in keeping with regional and local circumstances.

With respect to the matter of deterrent charges, the committee suggested that certain provinces were unable to qualify for full benefits under the Hospitals Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act presumably because authorized charges are excluded from the provincial per capita cost of inpatient services under the sharing formula. I would point out that such charges are paid by patients at the time of hospitalization and do not come out of provincial revenues, whether these are raised through premium payments, special taxes or general provincial revenues. Since the prime purpose of the federal legislation is to relieve persons of the cost of hospital care at the time of service when they can least afford it, and since authorized charges are not a burden on the provincial treasury, it has not been considered reasonable to include them as a shareable item.

As to whether or not this type of co-insurance charge under a hospital insurance program has any deterrent effect, the department will be pleased to review this subject with the provinces concerned. It is questionable, however, whether a comparative study of provincial programs with and without co-insurance charges would produce evidence to show that either admissions or the length of stay in hospital have been favourably affected by the use of such charges.

Regarding the committee's comments on staphylococcal infection in hospitals, I agree that any light which anyone can shed on this very difficult problem should be made available to hospitals at once. Here I might point out that in addition to investigations being carried out by a committee of the national research council, a great deal of work is being done in this field by the department particularly in our laboratory of hygiene and in our epidemiology and research and statistics divisions.

The report also mentioned questions relating to civil defence and the emergency measures organization. Most of the recommendations apply largely to matters outside my department's present responsibilities and have therefore been drawn to the attention of the authorities concerned. There are, however, certain aspects on which I might comment briefly.

For example, we are making every effort to accelerate the health side of the national survival program. An interdepartmental committee has been organized and has met for the purpose of co-ordinating the survival health responsibilities of the federal Departments of National Defence, Veterans Affairs and National Health and Welfare. The committee will continue this work and it is hoped that similar types of organizations will be formed at the provincial level.

As for stimulating provincial efforts in the field of emergency health services, several important steps have been taken in recent months. At the October, 1959 and April, 1960 meetings of the dominion council of health, the matter was discussed with provincial deputy ministers of health. A national conference on emergency health services has been held at which provincial representatives and delegates from national health organizations were briefed and the matter of establishing emergency health services across Canada was discussed. These various steps are being followed up by my department's emergency health services division, which is also carrying out its responsibility of assisting the provinces in developing their emergency health service assignments.

On the matter of uncontaminated food supplies, the special weapons section of our emergency health services division is collaborating actively with the Department of Agriculture in developing means for protecting and decontaminating food supplies.

Active efforts are also being made to further the development of emergency welfare services. Here the main emphasis is on encouraging provincial and municipal governments to include such services within their regular departments of public welfare. In the case of five provinces this has already been achieved at the provincial level, and it is hoped that current discussions will have a similar result in the remaining provinces. I might add that my department's emergency welfare services division is collaborating in this work for which federal funds are available under the financial assistance program.

With regard to informational material, the department has produced over two million copies of an emergency welfare instructional pamphlet entitled "Your Emergency Pack". A further pamphlet, "Welfare Tips for Survival", is now in production and is intended for people living in target as well as reception areas. Finally, nine exhibits have been developed with a view to giving emergency instructions to as many individuals as possible. These depict essential steps to be taken for survival.

In reply to the committee's reference to the department's general educational and informational material, I can only emphasize again, as I did during the proceedings, that this is a matter in which opinion reigns supreme. I would like to stress three points, however.

In the first place, our publications for the most part originate with requests from the provinces and are used to reinforce provincial educational programs. The views and demands of the provinces are, therefore, given considerable weight in our assessment as to the type and volume of material published. Second, on becoming minister I made a close personal survey of every piece of material which we put out. While I was not fully convinced of the usefulness of every single item, I did feel that the vast majority of the material was filling a very definite and legitimate need. Finally, the department has repeatedly discussed with the Queen's printer the question of charges for our publications. As a result we have gone a considerable distance in pricing certain items and in limiting the amount we distribute free to the provinces. The Queen's printer has been of the opinion that we have done about as much as we can in this direction.

But again I would stress that this whole area really boils down to a matter of opinion; and, as the house well knows, opinions differ widely on subjects of this kind. I would not maintain for a moment that we are right in every instance, but I do think our over-all program is justified having in mind all the various circumstances which must be considered. I can assure hon. members that I will continue to keep a close watch on this important aspect of departmental operations.

I now come to the final area of the committee report which I believe merits comment at this stage. This is departmental efficiency evaluation. Here I was gratified to note that, in the words of the report, "the committee acknowledges that it was unable to establish any concrete evidence of a breakdown of operational efficiency". It went on to recommend, however, that the department request the organization and methods division of the civil service commission to undertake a somewhat more comprehensive study of the department's operations. While recognizing that we have already made considerable use of such surveys, it felt that more should be done in this regard pending the forthcoming general review of government efficiency announced not long ago by the Prime Minister.

I personally sympathize with this recommendation and would emphasize that the department has welcomed such studies as a means of obtaining an outside assessment of our operations. In my testimony before the committee I indicated that our policy of utilizing such analyses would be continued, and I now repeat this assurance to the committee. I believe quite definitely that such analyses could provide a very useful basis for any more general survey to be carried out with respect to government operations as a whole of which my department would be a part.

In its report the committee has expressed concern about a number of positions of similar classification in our establishment. It seems to me that this concern may arise from a misconception on the part of the committee, for which the department is no doubt responsible in that we failed to explain the situation adequately. I would like to clear up this matter with respect to the principal group mentioned, the 21 economists in our research and statistics division.

In years past it has been the policy of the civil service commission to use the general classification of "economist" for a variety of positions in this division rather than to create a number of special research categories. It should be emphasized, however, that this general classification merely provides an indication of the level of responsibility for salary purposes. It does not imply that all those classified in this way are assigned the same responsibilities. I realize now that in providing the committee with characteristic duties and responsibilities of economists used throughout the civil service we may have caused some confusion on this subject. But in point of fact the various professional positions within the research division represent an extremely wide range of responsibilities.

I should perhaps elaborate a bit on this matter. The research division services over 20 directorates and divisions in our health branch and four divisions in our welfare branch, as well as the offices of the two deputy ministers and the minister. Experience has shown that research personnel employed in a centralized unit of this kind can be used to carry out research projects for the various divisions of the department more economically than if they were placed in the divisions themselves. Staff time can be shifted more efficiently from one project to another to serve needs as they arise.

To my mind the research division has made a very considerable and comprehensive contribution to the department's operations. For example, a number of research officers have been employed in projects connected with the development of the hospital insurance program and in the continuing studies of hospital care involving expenditure analyses, cost estimates, assessment of hospital utilization and hospital services. In a program with so large a financial commitment these activities have been and will continue to be of the utmost importance to the provinces and to the dominion government.

As a part of technical assistance to the provinces, the research division has assisted in health surveys, and at the present time the director is acting as a consultant to the government of Manitoba in connection with its survey of hospital facilities and personnel. Two members of the staff are also acting as research assistants in the conduct of this study. This survey, which among other things relates to hospital bed shortages and to the need for chronic hospital accommodation, is the type of activity which the committee has endorsed in its recommendation relating to hospital construction.

I trust that these comments have helped to clarify this matter of economists in our research division. Since there has been confusion, however, I feel that the department should approach the civil service commission with a view to developing some more appropriate designation than "economist" for our health and welfare research officers. This we intend to do so that such misunderstanding may not arise in the future.

Mr. Chairman, I have now come to the end of the remarks I want to make at this time regarding the estimates committee report on our operations. Once again I want to thank the committee for its co-operation and for the various suggestions it has put forward. I would like to thank the members of my staff for their loyal and dedicated attention to the department's business during the past year. I would also like to thank them for the assistance they so ably provided during the deliberations of the estimates committee. And, Mr. Chairman, may I conclude by thanking the committee for bearing with me during this rather lengthy presentation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister need not apologize to the committee for the comprehensive character of the statement he has just made. He is the minister in charge of one of the important departments of government, a department that can satisfy as perhaps no other department in the government can one of the basic purposes for which government is established in a free society. So the minister may be assured that in so far as the Liberal opposition are concerned our well known dedication to health and welfare matters signals our approval of the time he has taken today in giving a review of the department which he administers.

I do not propose to follow the minister in detail along the particular lines he has chosen to pursue. When the individual items are presented there will be an opportunity for consideration of a number of matters which the hon. gentleman raised, and for comment thereon. I want simply to say that there were many things which I would have expected the minister to deal with in his opening statement. I should have expected him to say something about the criticisms which have been levelled against the administration, particularly in the field of social welfare, by the minister of welfare in the province of Ontario and his deputy minister. I should have expected the minister to make some comment on the position of the federal government concerning the question of medical care as particularly emphasized at the present time by the situation in the province of Saskatchewan. In that connection I should want to know whether the federal government proposes to give any financial assistance to the plan which the government of Saskatchewan has proposed. What is the view of the government of Canada generally with regard to this important step toward providing for the health of the people of Canada?

My views in this regard are well known. The views of my party were stated clearly at our last national convention, and they are in these terms:

> We urge:
> As a further step to implement health insurance provision against major medical, dental and surgical expenditures which combined with hospital insurance would ensure that no Canadian would be financially crippled by illness.

It simply cannot be argued that no one in this country now can be denied the advantage of the best hospital and medical care on the mere ground of financial incapacity. We shall want to approach this problem, which I believe must inevitably now be faced, particularly in the light of the success which has attended the hospital insurance program in Canada, in a manner which takes into account our regional attitudes and needs and our financial capacity. The overriding consideration must be to provide our people with the most effective instrument against illness and ill health. To the extent that we measure up in that particular we shall give effect to the merits of our society as presently constituted.

The minister at the present time is without a deputy minister on the welfare side. Dr. Davidson, who has gone to another department, will no longer be available to the minister as his chief official in the matter of welfare policy and administration. I do want to say this now; that Canada owes to Dr. Davidson a debt which perhaps I am in a special way able to acknowledge and recognize. He was my deputy minister on the welfare side for 11 years, during which time Canada developed a social welfare and security system which I believe is comparable to that of any other country in the world. The contribution made to that development by Dr. Davidson is one which I am sure most Canadians will recognize, as indeed social workers throughout the world recognize, because of his outstanding talents and his devotion to the interests of responsible social welfare measures.

In this connection I should hope that the minister will see to it that the government does not delay in the appointment of a new deputy minister on the welfare side. That is, of course, a responsibility of the government, but I wish simply to say that the minister has within his department the talent necessary for the discharge of this important responsibility. I hope there will be no delay in the appointment of a deputy minister on the welfare side, because whatever may be the good intentions of the minister I am sure he will recognize that the appointment of a deputy minister will in itself be an indication of the government's concern with the problems of social welfare.

I am one of those who believe we have not reached the end of necessary social welfare programs which must progressively be devised in this country. I know it is said by many people, now that we are spending more on health and welfare than on any other department, that the time has come when we should consider whether or not we have overreached ourselves. I recognize of course, that there are limits to what can be done, that there are financial limits. This does not mean that consideration cannot be given to future programs, or that we have not the duty to consider whether certain existing gaps may yet be dealt with. I believe that while there must be a balance between need and the capacity to meet that need, we as a parliament must recognize that we have by no means exhausted the things that have to be done.

I would remind the minister that when we assembled at our national Liberal convention in 1958, which elected our present leader, we not only dealt with the matter already mentioned, namely provision against medical, dental and surgical expenses, but we also urged that consideration be given to the extension of unemployment insurance in case of illness. There is now in my name on the order paper a resolution dealing with this matter, and I hope we shall have occasion to discuss that resolution.

In 1958 we also urged, and we still urge, the extension of pensions for disabled persons to include groups not now included in the disability program. We also urged the extension of old age assistance to unmarried women and widows of 60 years of age. We further proposed an improvement in the family allowance program with special reference to payment of the allowance with respect to children remaining students until they attained the age of 18 years. In addition, we proposed the introduction in new pension plans of provision for the early vesting of benefits, so that if an employee changes his employment he will reap the advantage of pension contributions previously made by himself and by his employer, so that in effect the pension would follow the man.

We also proposed that immediate consideration be given to a national contributory pension scheme co-ordinated with existing provisions for retirement, an old age security pension beginning at age 65 to be based upon federal government contributions as well as on the contributions of employees, employers and self employed. That is an objective to which we must direct our attention. I mention it at this time because I believe we should not feel that all the problems of social need have been met simply because we have devised a social security program that is balanced and expanded. In this connection I would remind the minister that we have not heard from him in this chamber about the submissions made to the government by the Canadian welfare council in 1959 and in 1960. This voluntary organization of public-spirited citizens on two occasions in the past two years has met with the cabinet and pointed out the need that still exists in certain areas of social welfare, some of which I have mentioned.

They have proposed a number of specific improvements in the field of old age security and public assistance, blind and disabled persons allowances and unemployment insurance. They have also recommended the establishment of a royal commission on social security. I am not saying that I believe this is the best way to assess our existing program and determine what further modifications and advances should take place, but I am asking the minister to tell us what is the policy of the government with regard to the submissions made by the national welfare council. In spite of several questions that have been put earlier this session we have not yet been told by the government what is its view of the suggestions made by the national welfare council, nor have we had from the minister any satisfactory reply to the questions which were put to him and declared out of order the other day, when we were discussing certain modifications of the regulations having to do with residence under the Old Age Security Act.

I refer, of course, to the strong suggestion made by the Prime Minister in 1958 that Canada should embark upon a program similar to the old age survivors' scheme in the United States. I now wish to address myself to this problem. It will be recalled, if I may briefly retrace the situation in this regard, that in January of 1958 the Prime Minister announced that he had asked Professor Huson of the University of Western Ontario to make a study of the old age survivors' plan in the United States, a plan that provides for annuities or old age security on the basis of a fully integrated contributory system of old age security. The Prime Minister said that the study which he was then proposing would take not more than four months. At the end of that four months we were told without doubt, by process of implication, that the government proposed to embark upon a program based on such a study.

Of course the four months coincided with the termination of the election. The election took place, and we have not yet had any indication from the administration as to whether it proposes to bring forward a program that was so precious to the convictions and to the heart of the Prime Minister in January of 1958.

It will then be recalled that Professor Huson, on learning that he was to complete his report within four months, resigned saying he could not complete it in that allotted time. Whereupon Professor Clark of the University of British Columbia was designated for that purpose. We were not told that Professor Clark could not complete his report in a period of four months. However, when the election was over the government returned to serenity and we now know that instead of taking four months the report of Dr. Clark took well over a year. The report was finally tabled by the minister, notwithstanding the fact that we had some difficulty in getting him to table it once we had learned that the report had been prepared. It is a voluminous report and contains very valuable information, which I contend was always available to the minister and the government through the instrumentality of the officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

In any event, we have now had the report for over a year. The minister has had an opportunity of reading that report many times. Many hon. members, too, have had an opportunity of carefully considering its terms. We now ask the minister again what is to be the policy of the government with regard to this report on the program in the United States, a policy which the Prime Minister said would be forthcoming once the study, lasting four months, was made. He had said there could not be more than four months' study spent on this subject so that we could embark on this program. In the light of that background it is not improper or unfair to ask the minister, now that he has had a period of protracted study, what is the policy of the government. Is it going to embark on such a program?

I have before me in this regard the view of the minister of health in the government of Premier Leslie Frost. The province of Ontario has an interest in this matter, as has every province; because if we were to adopt the system in the United States that might conceivably affect the rate of contribution paid by the provinces to the existing universal scheme which we have now and which was established in 1951. I draw attention to what Mr. Cecile had to say in this regard. His view, as expressed on March 26, 1960 in an article in the Globe and Mail of that date, is the same view expressed by the Prime Minister in January of 1958. The article reads in part as follows:

> The federal government yesterday was criticized in the legislature by health minister Cecile for failing to introduce a contributory insurance scheme similar to that in the United States.

The Globe and Mail of April 5, 1960 reported the statement made by Mr. James S. Band, deputy welfare minister of the province of Ontario. Mr. Band who comes from the city of Windsor is an old friend of mine and of the hon. member for Essex West. The article reads in part as follows:

> Mr. Band praised the old age, survivors and disability insurance program in the United States. He called it a well-rounded contributory plan that covers 93 per cent of the population.

He went on to call upon the federal government to do something about this program. What is the policy of the government? Is the government through the minister going to reply during the course of our discussion and say that the minister is continuing to study this matter? If he gives that reply—and that is the reply the minister gave us in the estimates committee and that he gave to me the other day in the house—then one can only conclude that when the minister says he is studying this matter he means that the government has no intention whatever of doing anything about this program. Or if that is an unfair interpretation we might conclude that if the government intends to do something, it proposes to do it at a moment it will regard as more advantageous in political terms.

I am the last person to criticize the government for having any such political motives in mind. I know the present Prime Minister would be the last person in the world to bring in legislation because of political considerations or because he hoped to gain some advantage in an election. As I say, I would not accuse the Prime Minister of that, but I have a grave suspicion that an exception to his political technique might arise this time and that he might be tempted in 1961 or 1962, or even in 1963, to use the possibilities of this program as a means of enticing an unwilling public to support him again for a second time.

An hon. Member: Unwilling?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If that is not the situation, then the minister should tell us forthrightly now whether after his study of the Clark report he believes that the United States survivor program is one that is adaptable to our needs and to our purse. If he tells us that it is adaptable, then does he agree with the position we took at our convention in 1958 that such a scheme ought to be based on federal contributions as well as contributions of employees, employers and self employed? We are entitled to know where the government stands in this matter, and I hope that discussion of the minister's estimates will not conclude without his telling us, as I believe under our parliamentary system the government should, what the intentions of the government are. If the government feels that this scheme is not adaptable to our needs, let the minister say so. If he proposes to wait until an election, let him frankly say so. That kind of frankness would raise the minister in the estimation of all his fellows in the house, and it would give us an opportunity of appraising the program itself.

The minister also spoke of civil defence matters. I propose to say little on that subject at this time but rather to wait until we reach the particular estimates. I would say now that while the minister continues to discharge his functions in a limited field we are convinced, with regard to certain outside operations of civil defence and particularly those having to do with the absence of any definite authority in the matter of emergency regulations and action, that the time has come when we should clearly know where the final authority resides in such a situation. Does it reside with the Prime Minister? Does it reside with the Minister of National Defence? Does it reside with the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Or is it clear that this point has not yet been decided?

If that is the situation it is, of course, a serious reflection on the administration of the government. I look forward to an opportunity on the estimates to discuss further other aspects of this program. I hope the minister will take advantage of these estimates to tell us frankly what the policy of the government is on a number of matters, particularly in the field of social welfare to which I have referred. I hope he will tell us what the government's position is with regard to medical care insurance. I hope he will tell us what the government's position is with regard to the United States old age survivor security system.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, as recently as last week the Canadian people saw a very important step being taken on the road to proper health care in this country. If we cast our minds back to 1947 we can all remember that it was the same provincial government of Saskatchewan that brought into being the first hospital insurance plan in this country. That hospital insurance plan was fought very bitterly at that time. Any of us who were closely interested and who watched the struggle at that time can recognize the similarity in the viciousness of the fight against the medical insurance plan which the Saskatchewan government is going to bring in next year.

But we also recall that following that historic step in the field of health care, within three years the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia had both followed suit, and that after 10 years the federal government, through the process of an election and the acceleration of action because of a change of government, finally took the lead as far as the rest of the country was concerned, accepted its responsibility and took its part in the field of hospital insurance. We find that only three short years after the federal government accepted its proper responsibility six more of our provinces followed suit, and there are negotiations under way to provide hospital insurance for the Canadian people in the last province in the country that does not have such a plan.

Now we see a second step being taken by the prairie province of Saskatchewan. It seems very strange to me that one of the poorest provinces in Canada should be the one to take the lead in this field. Those of us who have followed the newspapers in the last couple of months realize the bitter fight they had on their hands. The program was fought most bitterly by the doctors' association in the province and, incidentally, the doctors overplayed their hand. They apparently hired advisers who did not advise too well, and as a result they made their position completely untenable from the point of view of any political party in that province accepting it.

Because of the stand they took they became more or less orphans in the field and in a way the fourth group opposed to the plans of the provincial government. The Liberals in the province did not say they were against the implementation of health insurance but rather said that they would hold a plebiscite.

Mr. Argue: They were against the government's plan.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): They were against the government's plan. In listening to the hon. member for Essex East I was quite amused to hear him reminiscing about the stand taken by the Liberal party at their last national convention. I might remind him of the much more recent stand taken by the Liberal leader in the province of Saskatchewan, who expressed his opposition to the implementation of health insurance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us speak as members of the federal parliament.

Mr. Argue: You are wise on that one, Paul.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am always wise.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The Conservatives in the province of Saskatchewan were not opposed to health insurance, but they thought the province might be better served by setting up a royal commission to investigate the matter. The Social Crediters were not opposed either, but they thought the public could be better served by having private insurance companies or private enterprise look after health needs.

I would say that the Canadian people are deeply indebted to the government of Saskatchewan for taking the lead in this matter, a lead that should have been taken by the federal government. I predict that in the period of the next few years, depending on how long it takes for the federal government to accept its responsibility, we will find, as in the case of hospital insurance, that health insurance, having taken firm root in the province of Saskatchewan, will spread across the country from coast to coast.

It is very unfortunate that the Canadian people are not always given a proper opportunity of studying both sides of the question of health insurance. I recall that one day earlier this session the matter of health insurance was debated in this house, and both sides of the question were very thoroughly covered by various people. Unfortunately at that time the Canadian public, as the result of some oversight or for some other reason, only received information on one side of the question through the medium of the newspapers. They received information concerning the fear expressed by certain hon. members that the implementation of health insurance would drive doctors out of the country and would increase medical costs beyond the ability of individuals to meet them. They received information concerning the fear that state medicine, as it was described, would inevitably lead to a situation where we would not have sufficient doctors to look after the Canadian people. In addition, it was stated that the standard of health care would deteriorate upon implementation of a health plan.

At that time, Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised. Had the opinions expressed in opposition to this plan been those of laymen I could have understood very easily why the newspapers would not necessarily accept their views as against those of professional people in their own field. However, the views expressed in opposition were not those of laymen but opinions contained in the report of a commission set up for the very purpose of studying that problem. The findings of this commission were in complete opposition to the fears expressed in the house that day. Unfortunately it was only the fears which were conveyed to the Canadian public, and the report of the commission set up to investigate this subject was not carried in the newspapers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, health insurance is probably one of the most important of all the problems facing this country today in the social security field. We find that health insurance weaves in and out through the whole social security field and affects many other aspects of social security, as well as being affected by the other aspects of social security. We find that over the last couple of decades a whole host of various forms of health insurance and hospital plans have grown up across the country, some through the trade union movement, some implemented by industry, some through non-profit organizations and co-operatives, some by the doctors themselves and many more by private insurance companies. The greatest difficulty that we find with these plans is that usually they are too limited in scope, cover too few people or do not give adequate coverage or, because of duplication, the cost has been increased. We find that people are paying far too much for what they receive from this conglomeration of plans in operation across this country today.

Another very important reason for the unsatisfactory method we have at the present time for meeting our health needs results from the fact that the private insurance companies run these plans as a business, and as a business they must show a profit; that is only natural. If these plans are to be run as an efficient business they can only afford to insure healthy people in particular groups. The result is that the people who are in the greatest need of insurance are not insured, and the people who are insured have to pay too much for that insurance. I have always felt, Mr. Chairman, that there is something akin to ghoulishness in people or organizations making a profit out of the health needs of our citizens.

We have heard so much, Mr. Chairman, about how nice it would be to have a comprehensive health care program in this country, but where would we find the money to take care of the cost? I maintain that the costs would be no more than they are now. The only thing is that they would be honest costs. It seems to me that in this country we have a revulsion to facing up to a situation or a realization of what we are actually paying. I do not know whether it is because of the promotional devices to which we are subjected from the time we are old enough to listen to a radio or watch television, but we absolutely refuse to face up to facts. As long as we can keep the costs hidden, we think we are not paying them; we like to fool ourselves in that way.

I had an opportunity of reading an excellent article by Mr. Leonard S. Rosenfeld, M.D., associate executive director of the community health association, Detroit. He points out that in the period from 1940 to 1958 the amount of money paid through workmen's prepayment plans for health insurance in the United States increased from $100 million to $4.5 billion, and that industry's contribution had reached the point where it amounted to 14.7

per cent of the payroll or 32 cents per man hour worked. At the same time we find that only 27 per cent of the money paid for health care in the United States was covered by this insurance, $4.5 billion out of a total in 1957 of $15.1 billion. So you see, supposing complete coverage were given and supposing the cost were increased from the $4.5 billion which was paid in health insurance to the $15.1 billion, there would be no actual increase in cost. The only difference would be that the cost would be out in the open and people would recognize that cost for what it actually was.

I believe on a previous occasion in this house I pointed out—I think it bears repetition—a provision which we have in the Ontario hospital insurance with regard to what is termed temporary indigents, in other words people whose unemployment insurance benefits have run out and who have to fall back on the municipality for assistance. The municipality pays the premium for these people under the Ontario hospital insurance plan, and at the end of the year the municipality is reimbursed. However, the strange part of it is that the municipality is not reimbursed for the amount actually paid out but is reimbursed on a per capita basis. There may be two towns each with a population of 10,000, and one may have massive unemployment while the other may not. However, they both get the same rebate under the Ontario hospital plan, regardless of what they paid out. There are no strings attached to this rebate. The result is that the one municipality can pave the sidewalks and charge the amount to the hospital insurance plan. What kind of perspective can we get of the costs of health insurance when we have this sort of situation?

We also find in the remarks of Dr. Rosenfeld some further information concerning just how much coverage they really have at the present time in the United States. I might say that the coverage in the United States is much better than it is in Canada. I should like to read from his remarks. He said this:

> The vast majority, covered by Blue Shield and commercial plans, are not eligible for general medical care in the office or in the home. This gap in coverage may deter the seeking of care early in illness, and reduces the availability of preventive services. Well baby care, medical inventories, medical advisory services and diagnostic services would, in general, not be covered by insurance. The fact that they can be covered has been amply demonstrated in those programs which provide such service.
> The common practice among commercial plans and among many Blue Shield plans of paying the patient on an indemnity basis rather than paying the provider of service in full has led to serious inflation of medical care costs. This is largely due to the fact that there is no incentive for the physician not to charge the patient more than the amount provided for in the fee schedule. One measurable effect of this practice is the fact that between 1951 and 1956, costs of surgical care rose twice as much as the general cost of living. The result is a diminishing amount of service per dollar of expenditure. This is a source of concern to the community in general and to labour and industry in particular. It may have the effect of veto in the clinic of gains made at the bargaining table. Money expended for physicians' services is not available to meet other needs. Recent information indicates that about one half of the 15,000 union-management health and welfare plans in the United States are experiencing a deficit, largely as a result of rapidly rising medical care costs.

I quote that statement, Mr. Chairman, to point out in a small way the vastness of the scope of this field that I am discussing today. This is something that the federal government owe a duty to the Canadian people to grasp and to get their teeth into. They must remember that there are many interested parties and many interested groups in our country, many of whom have pioneered in the health insurance field and have brought it up to at least what we have today.

The medical profession and their legitimate interests must be well guarded and must be well thought out in any plan that we devise in this country for medical care. The hospitals must be taken into consideration. The insurance companies have filled the need in the past but, as I pointed out, I do not think they have a proper jurisdiction in the health field. If we are going to look at the over-all picture and take the proper government responsibility for looking after the interests of the Canadian people as a whole, I think the day must come when we have health insurance at cost in this country and not at cost plus a profit to some organization.

Non-profit prepayment agencies have pioneered this field, and I feel that use should be made of the vast amount of knowledge and experience they have gained through dedicated service by many people across this country. Industry has taken a lead in some respects, particularly the railway industry and the mining and timber industry. But again, as I pointed out previously, this action has not only tended to hide the proper costs involved in this field but unfortunately has also tended to build up across the country little pockets of vested interests which may in the long run hinder rather than help an over-all solution.

Organized labour have been among the first to become interested in this field. But again, as with industry, their responsibilities and their objectives have been too narrow and have been confined to too small groups. There has always been a tendency to look after their own membership and to say that they are the only ones for whom they are responsible. That is not good enough in this country. They may have two members living side by side, but there must be some responsibility to the neighbours living on each side of them.

Then there is a final group which is an interested party, namely the general public; and that is where the federal government responsibility comes in. Judging from past history in this country it seems that the role of the federal government has never been to take the lead in this field, in this war on sickness, but rather has been to fight a rear-guard action against all the progressive elements in the country who have been trying to find some solution in order to meet this great need in our society.

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at one o'clock for lunch I was criticizing the present government because similar to past ones we find that instead of taking the lead and showing some initiative in fighting the war on sickness and disease they seem to be dragging their feet down the road to health insurance and proper health care and we have to wring this out of them step by step, election by election.

I think it is time this government made some effort to put a stop to the sham and hypocrisy of the health costs we are now paying in this country. Here is what we are paying for at the present time; at least, these are some of the ways we are paying for health care. We are paying private doctors' and hospital bills. We are paying hospital insurance premiums. We are paying sales tax for health care. We are paying insurance plans and non-profit organization plans. We are paying municipal taxes for charity cases, provincial taxes and federal taxes. We are paying into crippled children's funds, retarded children's funds, cancer funds, mental care funds, polio funds, tuberculosis funds, multiple sclerosis funds, muscular dystrophy funds. We pay charity through our churches, through service clubs and individual charity. We have funds from industry, hospital funds and, last and far from least, doctors' charity through the doctors themselves. As the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa, who himself is a doctor, mentioned this year in a similar debate, estimated, up to one third of doctors' bills are written off as charity to their patients.

I have listed this number and there may be more. Imagine what we could save in just administration costs alone by eliminating the duplication of services and administration costs which we have in this conglomeration of so-called health plans across the country. Probably the worst feature of all is that it is not doing the job. In spite of this multitude of various schemes and organizations we are still not doing the job.

I would like to know when this government is going to recognize that the nation's health is the nation's wealth. When are we going to make health care available to our people as a matter of right and not as a matter of charity? When are we going to start including the people who are completely left out now in spite of all this multitude of plans which we have? So far, unfortunately this Tory government seems no better than the Liberal government which it succeeded in accepting these responsibilities. I hope that before this debate is over the minister will give the committee some indication of just when this government is going to accept its responsibilities in this regard.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): By all means.

Mr. Brunsden: The hon. member has had a great deal to say about the health wonderland of tomorrow in Saskatchewan. I wonder if he realizes that there has been a tremendous flight of doctors and surgeons from Great Britain as a result of the introduction of a similar scheme there? We have hundreds and hundreds of them in Canada. They have gone to all parts of the world and—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member said he had a question. Would he ask it immediately.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, my question is this. How does the hon. member relate this flight of doctors from this sort of scheme to the Saskatchewan future?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I would be only too delighted to answer that question. According to the Willink committee which was set up in Great Britain to look into this very matter, we find that contrary to this concept which has been built up across this country about this tremendous exodus of doctors from Britain there are less than 200 doctors a year leaving Britain out of 60,000, which amounts to something like .03 per cent. I would say that the exodus of doctors from Canada is a lot greater than that, and if the doctors who are leaving Britain are going to the province of Saskatchewan where we have the most advanced health care scheme operating in Canada I would say it is a very good recommendation for the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few comments at this time on the estimates of the department. First of all I should like to commend the minister and his officials for the very good way in which they have operated their department and the way in which they presented their case to the estimates committee earlier this session. I have listened with interest to the speeches of both the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Timmins, and I will comment on them a little later.

Taking first the hospitalization scheme as it is now in effect in Canada, I believe that a good portion of the reason it has operated so effectively and well is the very adequate administration which the minister and his officials have given this scheme. I believe there are some wrinkles which still have to be ironed out; certainly in any scheme as large as this there are bound to be some. I believe that the hospitals at municipal and private level should have more say on the advisory committees. Certainly these are the people who are in a position to put forward solutions to the problem of overcrowding and to the difficulties regarding the provision of increased care for chronic and convalescent cases. They are the people who are going to supply outpatient and diagnostic services. In my opinion this is an area which the provinces should be encouraged to enter to a greater degree than they have done so far. Certainly I can see no reason why the province of Alberta cannot put outpatient and diagnostic care into its hospital scheme. This would relieve the acute shortage of beds which exists particularly in the larger urban centres.

There is another thing I should like to say with regard to the hospitalization scheme, and this has to do with deterrent charges, and with what the committee had to report concerning that subject. This is a particular problem in the western provinces, and when I use that phrase I include Alberta and British Columbia and, though to a lesser extent, Saskatchewan. Possibly the provincial government is not being penalized because of these charges, but certainly the people of the province involved are being penalized because they are not recovering their full share from the federal government with respect to hospitalization costs. I support the recommendation that a study should be made with respect to these charges, because such a study might give us a lead in deciding whether they serve any useful purpose.

I also wish to comment on the Indian health services and the health services provided by the department for the native population as a whole. We in Alberta are pleased that the department has announced plans to go ahead with the construction of a new Charles Camsell hospital for the treatment of our native population in Alberta and as a centre for those requiring treatment in northern Canada. I have only one suggestion to make to the department in this regard, and I am sure they will take it into consideration. I refer to the fact that for a great many years Indians all over the country have been going to private doctors for care. Sometimes these accounts are submitted to the appropriate branch which deals with Indian health services for payment, but I believe the doctors are not too well taken care of.

We have heard a lot today with regard to health insurance. The hon. member for Essex East spent some time outlining what he would do, but I was a little disappointed that he did not supply any details concerning how he would bring the principles he mentioned into effect. That is, in essence, the problem. I do not believe anybody in Canada disagrees with the premise that all Canadians should have adequate medical care available to them. It is all a problem of how one is going to bring these ideas into practice.

I should like to put on record the principles that the profession to which I happen to belong has recently enunciated at its annual convention. I think these principles are reasonable, and I commend them to every hon. member of this committee for study. They read as follows:

That every resident of Canada is free to select his doctor and that each doctor is free to choose his patients.

That the competence and ability of any doctor is determined only by professional self-government.

That, within his competence, each physician has the privilege to treat his patients in and out of hospital.

That each individual physician is free to select the type and location of his practice.

That each patient has the right to have all information pertaining to his medical condition kept confidential except where the public interest is paramount.

That the duty of the physician to his individual patient takes precedence over his obligations to any medical services insurance programs.

That every resident of Canada, whether a recipient or provider of services, has the right of recourse to the courts in all disputes.

That medical services insurance programs do not in any way preclude the private practice of medicine.

That medical research, undergraduate and postgraduate teaching are not inhibited by any medical services insurance program.

That the administration and finances of medical services insurance programs are completely separate from other programs, and that any board, commission or agency set up to administer any medical services insurance program has fiscal authority and autonomy.

These are all worthy of note. The hon. member for Timmins had a great deal to say with regard to health insurance and I should like to point out to him that human dignity is the essence of humanity in my opinion and the more we lose our individuality the more we lose our status as individuals and as a nation. Socialists invariably fail to realize this and the harm it does, despite their sincere humanitarian interests.

A colleague of the hon. member for Timmins spent a good deal of time dealing with the health scheme in the United Kingdom. I suggest we cannot compare medical practice in Great Britain with medical practice in Canada, because we are two entirely different kinds of country. In Britain one finds a very small area in which a dense population is situated, while here we have a very large country where the population is spread from coast to coast. Thus, in Canada we depend primarily for the adequacy and the high standard of care which our people receive upon the general practitioner, while in Great Britain they do not. This is an essential difference which makes proper comparison between Great Britain and this country impossible.

Nor can we correctly compare the medical costs which we have in Canada with those in the United States, as the hon. member for Timmins did by referring to a publication from Detroit. There can be no comparison of medical care costs between Canada and the United States because those in the United States are three to four times as high as the fees charged in Canada. I would point out that the medical profession has been among the leaders in supporting health insurance. These plans are all on a non-profit basis. As I say, the profession has been one of the leaders in experimenting with health insurance for Canadians.

Another point with which the hon. member dealt at length was an assertion that the federal government should take the lead in encouraging health insurance and such matters. I do not pretend to have a legal mind as great as that of the hon. member for Essex East but it was pounded into my head when I came here that constitutionally it is the provinces which have the prime responsibility for initiating action with regard to such matters as health insurance, and that it is only after they have come to a decision that the federal government can consider entering into collaboration with the provinces with regard to any such schemes.

The other important difference I should like to bring to the attention of the committee is the difference between the question of hospitalization, which is a service supplied by an organization or institution, and that of medical care which is a very personal relationship between two people, the doctor and his patient. While you may be able to socialize hospitalization, provided you allow the hospital some local autonomy, when you delve into the very personal relationship between doctor and patient then I suggest that the idea of forcing it into one mold will not and cannot work if humanity is to progress.

One final word with regard to health insurance. We have seen the action of the profession in the recent election in Saskatchewan. I do not hold any cause for the way in which they conducted their part of the campaign. I believe it was wrong. I believe that doctors as individuals must take a greater part in the political life of their communities in all levels of government from the municipal to the federal and in this way contribute to the various political parties in Canada their views and those of their colleagues in the medical association. I do not believe that any organization including labour unions should have a party of their own and do as the profession did in Saskatchewan, that is, launch their own campaign.

I wish also to deal briefly with the question of drug prices, a subject which I know is of great interest to all hon. members and of particular interest to the hon. member for Skeena. I agree that this area needs investigation but we must look at the problem in a reasonable light so that patients receiving medicine will not be hurt. In other words, we must make sure that the Canadian pharmaceutical industry develops on a par with other countries, that our medical research program is not hampered and that there is no restriction in getting drugs to the patients who require them. Certainly there are areas in the developing of drugs and the availability of certain kinds of drugs which in my opinion require investigation. I would be very happy to support the idea of such an investigation as I am sure would every ethical pharmaceutical house in Canada.

With respect to the social welfare legislation, I listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for Essex East had to say in this regard. I commend to the attention of the committee, the minister and the government the recommendation with regard to blind persons' allowances. It seems to me that the means test should be completely abolished in respect of this affliction. I have a particular interest in the question of disability pensions, having a number of patients who are now in receipt of this pension. I strongly recommend to the government that the income limitations placed on those in receipt of the disability pension should be at least doubled and this should be done as soon as possible.

I have encountered completely disabled people in wheel chairs who prior to the advent of the disabled persons' allowance got through by handicrafts or work of that nature. After the inauguration of the pension they continued working at their handicrafts or other work and immediately had their pension cut off by the provincial authorities. It seems to me this takes away the very meaning of the pension. These people benefit therapeutically from working in handicrafts or other work and enjoying the feeling that they are making a useful contribution to society. To rob them of this feeling has an adverse psychological effect.

With respect to disability legislation we have heard a great deal of discussion inside and outside this chamber with regard to the very strict nature of the definition of disability. I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members and particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Essex East a paragraph to be found at page 522 of the minutes of proceedings of the standing committee on estimates dated May 24, 1960 with respect to disabled persons' allowances:

> It was drawn to the attention of the committee that certain provinces have introduced programs of their own which provide relief to disabled persons who are unable to qualify under existing federal regulations. Where an applicant is disabled and only employable at intervals, or incapable of working except under special circumstances, the provincial authorities grant relief through the Unemployment Assistance Act. Members of the committee were of the opinion that as the federal government pays substantial amounts to certain provinces through this act, a possible solution to the problem referred to above might be found if a similar action were taken in other areas of Canada.

I commend that to the attention of the hon. gentleman and suggest to him that it was the action of the present government in late 1957 when it removed the threshold provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act that enabled those provinces to set up their own disability allowance based on employability rather than disability alone.

I think it is worth while reminding the committee of a statement to be found at page 116 of the annual report of the Department of National Health and Welfare for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958 relating to conditions under which unemployment assistance might be given:

> The conditions under which assistance is granted, including the rate of assistance, are determined by the province or municipality.
> Expenditures for both employable and unemployable persons may be included and the costs of maintaining individuals in homes for special care, such as nursing homes or homes for the aged, are sharable under the agreement.

I suggest that the hon. member for Essex East and all members of the Liberal party are a little late. This government did in 1957 what hon. gentlemen opposite were advocating in 1958.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The previous administration initiated the whole thing.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): But it put a threshhold on it so the provinces could not enjoy the benefits they would have liked to enjoy.

I agree with the hon. member on one point. When we look at social welfare legislation we should seriously examine a proposition which would provide survivor benefits for the elderly and disabled.

Returning to what is for me a vexing problem, that with regard to income limitations, the abolition of the means test at age 55 or 60 for aged persons in receipt of disability pensions should be considered. I highly recommend to the government that the income allowable with respect to recipients of old age assistance should be elevated a great deal. Invariably you run into situations in which you find elderly people prevented from getting out and enjoying exercise by taking a light job and doing the things they would like to do because of the strict interpretation that is given the means test and the rigid application of it.

I cannot speak for the rest of Canada but a serious situation exists in the province of Alberta. I have a great number of elderly patients who have given up doing anything. This is not good for them medically or otherwise. They are afraid that any income they earn in this manner will be deducted from their pension. I know elderly women who have ceased baby sitting because the welfare inspector was prepared to deduct the amount so earned from their pensions. I know elderly men who surrendered the jobs they had as janitors for Legion and other community halls and buildings in small towns in western Canada. They gave up the jobs because the small amount of money they earned was to be deducted from their pensions. Part of the reason for this, of course, is the way the regulations are interpreted by the provinces with regard to the amount of income that is calculated for the home they own and other capital assets.

It seems to me that we could do a great deal for our older people with respect to this very serious problem and it would not cost the government a great deal of money if we raised the allowable income under the Old Age Assistance Act and Disabled Persons Act and waived it altogether with respect to assistance to the blind. We could do something really worth while to encourage self-help which is the kind of thing I believe we need in this country. I know a great number of these elderly people, some even in their eighties, who would love to be able to do a little light work. They are physically and mentally able to do it but they do not, and I do not blame them, because they do not want to give up the security of their pension benefits.

Again, sir, I want to commend the minister and the department for having done a great deal for the health and welfare of the people of this country. The institution of the hospitalization scheme has certainly meant a great deal to the people of Canada.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I should like to touch on one or two matters to which he made no reference. The first is the fluoridation of water. I know that last year I tried to get him to commit himself officially that he was in favour of the fluoridation of water and he said he was in favour of it in his own area, Stratford. But I think that if the Department of National Health and Welfare would go on record as being in favour of fluoridation it would help the cause of fluoridation a great deal in the province of Ontario and in Canada generally. In the Toronto Star of December 31 last there was an article to the effect that the federal government was giving new backing to the fluoridation of water as a safe and efficient means of drastically reducing tooth decay among Canadian children. Dr. H. K. Brown, dental consultant of the Department of National Health and Welfare, was the author of a report which said in part:

> There is no doubt as to the efficacy of a mechanically fluoridated water supply containing one part per million in very markedly reducing the caries experienced in children born subsequent to fluoridation.

He went on to say that no ill effects had been observed by the medical and dental authorities in Brantford and Stratford where fluorine is present in or added to the water. Previous to that time there had been some investigation in three cities of about equal size, Brantford, Sarnia and Stratford. Stratford has natural fluorine in its water. I do not know how many parts there are per million. In Brantford one part of fluorine per million was added to the water while Sarnia gets its water from the great lakes and it has very little fluorine in it.

In Brantford and Stratford the results in children were about the same. From 1948 up to last year the number of children in Brantford and Stratford showing no decay or caries in the teeth had increased from 6 per cent to 44 per cent. In Sarnia the increase was from 6.6 per cent to 8.6 per cent. I think that definitely shows that fluorine has a very marked effect in preventing caries in teeth. I might say that in my home town fluoridation of water was started in 1952 and since that time caries in teeth among children in the schools has gone down by 65 per cent.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In Thorold.

Mr. McMillan: Yes. There is a consolidated school in my area and about half the children attending the school come from country districts where they drink well water with a natural fluorine content while the other half of the children come from the city where the water supply is from the great lakes. As I said before, the water from the great lakes contains very little fluorine. One would not need to be a dentist or doctor to be able to go into that school, look at the teeth of the children and know where they come from. I certainly think this is a very important matter because we know that caries of the teeth can lead to certain infections which have systemic effects. I know that an investigation is going on in Toronto as to the value of fluorine and I observe in today's paper that evidence is being heard in camera. I do not know why evidence should be heard in camera. However, that is a matter outside our jurisdiction.

But when so many associations have gone on record in favour of the fluoridation of water supplies I think the minister should state publicly that the Department of National Health and Welfare is in favour of the fluoridation of water. He may not think that this means anything. In the municipalities of Ontario people can apply to have a vote as to the fluoridation of water and in my town the anti-fluoridationists did force a vote. They put up all kinds of signs outside the town to the effect that the water supply was contaminated, that it contained rat poison and was not fit to drink. This certainly hurt the tourist trade.

One reason advanced by these people was that the Department of National Health and Welfare at Ottawa had not said that fluoridation of water supplies was a good thing. I think the department should definitely take a stand one way or the other.

I was sorry that I was unable to attend the meetings of the committee on estimates, but I have read the reports of the committee. The minister referred today to some of the recommendations made by the committee and I was particularly interested in their recommendation with respect to hospitalization, particularly the overcrowding in our hospitals. I think the minister said that the department would not conduct a survey as was suggested. In my opinion a survey should be undertaken because many municipalities and some provinces have no idea what may be needed in the future. I think some advice could be given by the department.

I believe a full investigation should also be made into the chronic bed situation and the provision of beds for convalescents. Most of these patients do not require the facilities of an active treatment hospital and in my view they can be better provided for in chronic bed hospitals or by the addition of wings to hospitals for this purpose or in convalescent centres. This can be done much more cheaply.

In recent years many insurance companies, and I think probably this applies as well to the regulations of the hospital commissions, stipulate that outpatients cannot get diagnostic procedures unless they are admitted to hospital. I feed that this helps to make the bed situation more acute. For instance, if a person needs a gastro-intestinal series he will need to be admitted to hospital in order to obtain these particular X-rays at no cost to himself. He will have to be in hospital from five to seven days. He could just as easily go to the hospital for radiology, have this diagnostic procedure and yet stay at home. I do not see why some movement has not been made by the health branch to take up this question with the different provincial commissions.

Reference has been made also to the fact that we should have more research in connection with mental health. I am in favour of more research here. I think much can be done. In St. Catharines, just to give an example, we have a number of beds available for those who are mentally ill. They are set up in connection with a mental health clinic, and people who are mentally ill are admitted to the hospital there. From observations I have made I can say that many of these people improve and are able to return to work who would otherwise stay outside the hospital until their condition deteriorated to the point where they would have to be committed to a mental institution. I believe that more work along these lines would cut down the number of patients in our mental institutions. These clinics are doing all sorts of work with shock treatments and with the newer drugs, and I believe that with proper direction many of these patients could be kept out of our mental hospitals. They could be taken into these other hospitals that are connected with our general hospitals, kept for a short time and after being discharged they could report to the outpatient clinics. A good many of these patients do well. I think a lot more work along that line should be done in other centres.

In addition to this I find that patients will readily go to a mental health clinic connected with a general hospital and occupy one of these beds for a short time, whereas they are very backward about going, or will refuse to go to a mental hospital unless they are committed. There is still a stigma connected with being committed to a mental hospital. I think a lot of work can be done for our mentally ill patients, particularly in the early stages.

There is one thing upon which I feel the minister should comment, and that is the content of strontium-90 in our food and milk supplies. I noticed an article in the Toronto Telegram of June 1, 1959 which said that the department was neither exercised nor panicked over the condition, which is probably right. I do not believe any of our scientists, and some of them admit it, know how much strontium-90 it takes to have a deleterious effect on our bodies, both genetically and directly in causing bone cancer and leukemia. I was glad to see the Canadian delegation proposing that we set up a committee of all nations to calculate the amount of strontium-90, resulting from fallout from atomic explosions, which enters our food supply. More work can probably be done along that line.

Since I am a doctor, and since the health insurance question has been very much to the fore in Saskatchewan, I think I should say something about it. I think I can best describe what I think about health insurance by quoting what I said when I first came to the house in January, 1951. It was my honour at that time to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I had this to say about health insurance as reported on page 10 of Hansard for January 31, 1951:

> I am quite aware of the fact that most health measures come directly under provincial jurisdiction; but after practising medicine for over 30 years I realize that one of the main elements in connection with the insecurity of our people is the high cost of hospitalization and the expensive diagnostic, medical and surgical procedures so often necessary without warning. I have often seen life savings wiped out in a few weeks or months of unexpected sickness or accident. I cannot help but express the hope that we shall soon see the day when there will be available to all our people a contributory health plan to meet the cost of major sicknesses and accidents. We have many group plans that are fine so far as they go, but they are either not available or are not easily available to the large majority of our people.

I said that when I first came here in 1951. I can clearly understand the objections that the members of my own profession may raise in connection with this matter. I would be less than honest if I did not admit that I would prefer to practise medicine as it is now practised in Ontario. The doctors themselves naturally have a fear of the disturbance of the doctor-patient relationship. I must say from observations of the scheme in operation in Great Britain that I found this interference did occur. I hope the same thing will not happen in Saskatchewan.

Many doctors whom I observed in Great Britain had large panels of patients and they could not give them close attention, certainly not sufficiently close to make any proper diagnosis. The doctors' offices became largely clearing houses for sending patients to hospital. I saw that in two or three areas. Some doctors admitted to me that since they could not follow their patients to the hospital they did not keep up as well in the practice of medicine as they should. I could quite understand that. They were working hard and seeing too many patients. In the areas which I visited, there were too many patients and too few doctors. I hope nothing like that will happen.

Mr. Argue: There are more doctors now than there used to be.

Mr. McMillan: I am referring to the time when I was over there, seven years ago. I know that there is a tendency to criticize the doctors, at least by the press and by others. What I say of myself certainly applies to a good many other doctors. I will say that during the depth of the depression and since then I have worked from 12 hours to 18 hours a day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You still do in this House of Commons.

Mr. McMillan: During that time fully three quarters of my time was devoted to medical and surgical work for which I received and expected no remuneration. That was in the worst of the depression. It was difficult at times to get enough on which to live. I do not mind admitting that. The fees were not high back in the 1920's. The fee at that time for looking after a woman during pregnancy for nine months and attending her during delivery varied from $10 to $20, and it was mostly $20 when you got it. Of course, attending a delivery generally involved the loss of a night's sleep. I do not believe that over the years I have been overpaid, no matter what some people may say about doctors. During the depression there were times when upwards of 75 per cent of the people in some of the hospitals in Ontario did not pay their way. They were paid for by municipalities and the province. Certainly in those cases no medical man or surgeon sent them a bill. Many a surgeon spent many nights at the hospital—and I include myself—trying to figure out surgical problems in order to try to go ahead with some surgical procedure. I do not think I am prejudiced, Mr. Chairman, when I say that there was not a time during the thirties and certainly during the early forties when the doctors did not discharge more than their full obligation to the people of this country. I will say this, however. If we had had hospital insurance at that time the doctors would have been a great deal better off but the country would not have been as well off. There were no doctors at that time who complained of that fact. I have stated my position in connection with this matter and the hon. member for Essex East has stated the position of our party. I should like to hear the minister state his position on this matter also.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was a very courageous speech.

Mr. Campbell (Lambton-Kent): I have listened with great interest to the contributions which have been made by the various speakers on these matters of health today, and I must say that I greatly appreciate the privilege of taking part in these discussions concerning the need for the appropriation of moneys for the purpose of improving the health of the people of our country.

May I say that it is my intention to speak about and to attempt to place special emphasis upon the need and the part that a physical fitness program encouraged from the federal level could play in working toward such a goal of improved health. I feel that there are practically unlimited possibilities in this field. I feel that I should at this time also acknowledge that it is generally recognized that the responsibility for this matter of physical fitness falls under the jurisdiction of the provincial authority, but I have long felt that more encouragement should be given from the federal level to encourage and assist the provincial governments, and in turn, the local municipal governments and the people themselves, in a program which would broaden and intensify their efforts in this regard.

At this time I wish to pay my tribute to the great contribution made by the medical profession in maintaining the health and thereby increasing the life expectancy of our people in these late years. I want to express my appreciation to the medical men for their latest effort to get our people to become more fitness minded. May I say also that I appreciated greatly the remarks of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson when he was commenting on the need for activity, particularly for older people. I have in my hand a clipping from the London Free Press of a few days ago which outlines a meeting which was held in Banff, Alberta. I should like to read from this clipping which states in part as follows:

You will be healthier if you have some physical activity—no matter what your age...

These were the findings of committees which reported Wednesday to the Canadian Medical Association's annual convention.

The committee on public health said that even though proof is lacking, "we are all agreed on the benefits to health for all ages which are derived from physical activity and participation in games."

That was the meeting of the Canadian Medical Association. I also have here another clipping to which I should like to refer. It is headed "Fitness Program for All: Children get Priority, House Told". This is in Toronto. The article reads in part as follows:

Health minister Dymond said yesterday the government's new physical fitness program will be slanted towards giving every child in Ontario a chance to develop mental and physical soundness, rather than place emphasis on the development of a small number of outstanding athletes.

In asking the legislature to approve departmental estimates of $92,195,000 for 1960-61, Dr. Dymond said this year's budget of $35,000 for physical fitness would go towards a small study committee to formulate a suitable program.

I have here another clipping which I took from an Ottawa paper a short time ago. It mentions a series of articles entitled "Keeping in Shape". The author of this series is Bonnie Prudden who is, I believe, an expert in advising women on keeping fit. I should just like to read one extract from this article. It states:

Keeping in Shape is dedicated to the proposition that no reader is too young, too old, too full of aches, too fat, too thin, too flabby, too lazy or too far gone to keep fit.

The feature is written by Bonnie Prudden, one of America's foremost champions of physical fitness. For years she has carried on a long crusade against limp muscles, drooping postures and joy-killing fatigue.

I also have here a copy of a resolution from the central fitness council of British Columbia. It is a long resolution and I am not going to take the time of the committee to read it all. However the meat of it is as follows:

It is requested that the federal government authorize action to recognize and support, in co-operation with the provinces, such a national fitness council, based upon the policy, administration and operational plan submitted with this proposal.

Mr. Chairman, I feel I can speak with some authority on this matter myself as on May 24 last I had participated in organized sports for a period of 40 years. It was exactly 40 years ago last May 24 when a ball team was organized in my part of the country to play other teams, and that was the start. The sports I have participated in include hockey, football, boxing, wrestling, baseball, a little softball, and in recent months the sport of curling and a bit of bowling. I know there are many hon. members in this committee today who can vouch for the last two at least.

I have had some experience as an instructor in physical culture in my early days and I have often said since that time that what you eat, the way you think and what you do will determine what you will be. I am more convinced than ever of that as the years pass by.

I do not say this boastfully, but I offer this as proof of my statement. I have here a photograph of myself which was taken on December 22, 1924, at the time when I first started to be an instructor in physical culture. I have another photograph, a newspaper clipping, taken just shortly before I came here as a member, when I was acting as an instructor for the police departments in the city of Chatham and the town of Wallaceburg, instructing in physical culture, judo and wrestling. This photograph is taken some 30 odd years after the first one, and if I do say so myself, I had little difficulty in handling men who were 30 years younger and 60 pounds heavier than I. I say that as proof of the value of this work.

May I say that I have not had the opportunity to participate in these activities as regularly as I would like since coming here as a representative of the people of my area, but this experience here has given me an opportunity to make an accurate comparison of one's physical well-being when engaged in work such as this, compared to the kind of life to which I had been accustomed in days gone by. The opportunity to participate in organized sports at that time was of the kind which I found gave me considerable benefit, more than I get here. I have to make special effort to keep in condition as compared with those times when I was participating more freely in sports.

May I also say that I am one who possesses the firm conviction that there is great value in the kind of training—and I would lay special emphasis on the word training—that sports coaches and athletic trainers generally recognize as being essential to the development of physical and mental strength which is a part of the successful athlete. It develops self-reliance, self-confidence and self-control. It teaches one to think while on his feet under fire.

I am one of those who believe that health and strength is just as valuable and important to the average business man and other people as it is to the athlete, and that the same things which the athlete does in a somewhat modified form would also promote strength and health for the one who may not wish to participate in organized sports. The difference is that the sport often provides the stimulus and the incentive to the effort that is necessary to inspire individuals to do the things that are essential for their well-being which they would not do otherwise. To put it in a short sentence, one must work and earn and deserve his well-being.

There is another thought I should like to leave with the committee in connection with this matter, and it is that one can continue to participate safely and sanely in quite strenuous activities long after most people think it is safe for them to do so if they would continue to train their bodies for those activities. However, by the same token I would seriously stress the folly of attempting to participate in strenuous activities without training, particularly after an extended period of inactivity, no matter how expert a person may have been in his former years.

I should like also to draw your attention Mr. Chairman, to the part that physical activities play as a deterrent to crime. It is a recognized fact that there is not only a higher physical and mental standard among those who are sports minded, but generally the true sportsman will possess the higher ideal and more objective goal in life. This to my mind is a factor that is well worth considering, because when you stop to think of the many thousands of dollars that are spent on the administration of justice, the building and maintenance of prisons, and so on, it is not perhaps an exaggeration to say that if some of the cases of crime could have been prevented through the medium of wholesome physical activities the money required would be well spent.

I should like also to point out that the need for a physical fitness program on a national scale is becoming increasingly more important in this day and age when men are devising mechanical ways of doing the work which they did by hand in days gone by. As a result of the increasing nervous strain caused by the pace at which we are moving today I predict that there will be an ever increasing need in the years to come for something to take the place of the work that our bodies were intended by nature to perform.

As I have sat here in my seat my memory has taken me back many times to the time when that fine old gentleman—quite a number of hon. members here today will bear me out on this—the Reverend Dan McIvor would march in here in what he would call his parliamentary stride and sit, I believe, in this self-same seat I occupy today. There was never an occasion that he would miss to rise in his seat and extol the virtues of physical fitness. He was a fine athlete, I understand, in his youth, a good sportsman in later life and still young at heart when I knew him, when well on in his eighties in years. The last I heard of him he was still active in the ministry, which is further proof of the value of physical fitness in the building of good citizens, and I feel that his words and his works will live long after he has passed on.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to take a moment to point out the tremendous benefit that could come to the people of Canada from a dollar and cents standpoint if a concerted effort were made to sponsor a health program which would be dominion wide and in which physical fitness would play a prominent part. I feel this to be especially important at this time since the government has become responsible for the health insurance of the people. An ounce of prevention to my mind is worth any number of pounds of cure. I therefore suggest that the government give most serious consideration to the advisability of encouraging some such program. However, I feel that in fairness to the people and so as not to give them the impression that you can just pick this physical fitness condition off trees, the people should be told that they are entitled to that greatest of all assets, namely a high standard of physical fitness. However, to be fit will also require a bit of self-discipline, a measure of self-denial, a bit of the will to do and a bit of hard work. But for their efforts they will acquire a greater enjoyment of their work when they realize that work is a necessary part of their well-being.

It has been a great privilege to have been given the opportunity to take part in this discussion today and I trust I have contributed something which will be of benefit to the people of this country.

Mr. Argue: We in the C.C.F. believe that now is the auspicious time for Canada to move forward in the field of social welfare measures. There is a school of thought which believes that the welfare state has already gone too far and that the measures we have today are hurting initiative, but we in this group feel that these measures which we have today provide only a basic minimum of protection and are the foundation of a better life for the majority of Canadians.

Because there is widespread unemployment, because the government has balanced its budget on unemployment and a depressed economy, is no reason for the rest of us to acquiesce in the government's belief that it should mark time, forget about its election promises and do nothing of substantial importance in the welfare field. I think the people of Canada expected this government to go forward much more rapidly in this regard than it has done. One of the pressing needs of our country today as we see it is for a vast increase in the pension benefits which accrue to Canadians upon retirement. We feel it is not nearly good enough to have a basic minimum pension given to everyone at the age of 70 of a mere $55 a month. Surely the minister would be the first to agree that anyone who is forced to live on an income of $55 without a supplementary income has not sufficient money to provide the very basic necessities of life, food, clothing and shelter, to say nothing of the costs of medical care should they arise. I think it is a disgrace to our country that thousands upon thousands of our elderly citizens are living in hovels, living in fire traps, and suffering malnutrition in this year 1960 because of an inadequate pension.

I had hoped that this government really meant business when it said it intended to embark on a greatly improved old age security system. As has been pointed out today by the hon. member for Essex East, the Prime Minister, when he was in the position of having only a minority in this house, seemed in great haste to do something for his fellow Canadians who were in receipt of old age pensions. At that time he was not only in great haste but he was convinced that Canada should benefit from the type of old age security they have in the United States which to a large degree is related to recent income and is not merely a minimum pension paid to everyone on reaching a certain age. After that appearance of haste we had a long delay in the final preparation of the Clark report. We are confronted with an even longer delay in the government's consideration of that report. The fact is that this government has a hard, calloused and inhuman attitude toward the people on old age pensions who have no other means of support, since the government has failed to take any steps to improve their position.

Before the election this government was very expansive in its protestations of generosity for the aged. The Prime Minister has indicated great sympathy for the people living on a minimum old age pension. Since then he has had the Clark report. The minister says it is being studied, but that means, to all of us who have had experience in this house, that the government is delaying, that it is procrastinating, that it is postponing the issue. The government is failing to do now that it is in office what the public expected it to do after they had given it this tremendous majority at the time of the last federal election.

We in this country need an old age security system which has embodied in it a type of pension system so that people neither feel bound nor tied because of potential pension benefits to a given industry, nor can they be cast aside and dismissed without benefit of pension when after many years of service a company finds their employment is no longer needed. It breaks one's heart to ride on the railways of this country at this time and to hear the sad tales of railroaders who are being unceremoniously dismissed without pension benefits after 25 or 30 or more years of service. These are people who have spent their whole lives working for the railroads of Canada, and they now find that in their declining years they are placed on the labour market without the benefit of an adequate pension program to which they can look forward within a few years. This is certainly one of the best examples of the need for an over-all security system in this country containing a portable pension plan which will provide for the best protection of Canadian citizens.

I think now is the time for action by this department in co-operation with other departments, and I refer particularly to the Department of Transport, to ensure that Canadians in our nation will not be placed on the labour market in their declining years without the benefit of a pension scheme to which they have contributed for 25 years or more.

During many years in this house I have taken an active interest in making suggestions for the increase and expansion of family allowances. Many Canadians raising families find it difficult to meet the expenses of a home and the family budget particularly during that period of earning power. Family allowances have been a great benefit to Canadian families. I think it was wrong under the former administration and it is just as wrong today for a government to allow an increase in the cost of living to whittle away and undermine the benefits of family allowances.

I feel there is a substantial argument in favour of increasing family allowances so as to restore the purchasing power of the family allowance cheque to the purchasing power it had at the time when family allowances first became effective in 1945. That would mean an increase of more than 50 per cent.

I believe, too, that the time has come when there should be an extension of the age for which a family allowance cheque can be received. I think the age should be extended particularly in view of the fact that many young people whose parents no longer receive the family allowance on their behalf remain in school. If family allowances were paid to the age of 18, or even better to the age of 21, while a child was still in school this would be of great assistance in meeting the large costs of the education of a child at late high school age or of university age. I recommend this to the government as I did to the former government on other occasions as an expansion of our social security system which would be of great benefit to Canadians.

Much has already been said in this debate on the subject of a prepaid medical care program. I am pleased to come from the province of Saskatchewan that has shown great leadership in the field of health services in recent years. Saskatchewan and its people have the distinction of having formulated and implemented the first provincial hospitalization plan in Canada. Although it is some 13 years since the plan was first placed on the statute books of Saskatchewan some Canadians are still not covered by the hospital plan. Despite this fact there is now an assurance that this situation will soon be corrected.

The people of Saskatchewan gave the Saskatchewan government a mandate to implement a prepaid medical care program in that province. I express the hope that it will not be another 13 years until all Canadians in all provinces have the benefit of a prepaid medical care plan like that soon to be provided for the people of Saskatchewan.

The hon. member for Essex East referred to the Saskatchewan situation when he used the words, "with regard to this important step toward providing for the health of the people of Canada." This is an important step forward, a step being taken after a great deal of consideration, study and planning.

The reason we in the C.C.F. believe a prepaid medical care program is necessary for all Canada is that a substantial part of the population is not covered by any plan whatever and will have to bear the whole of their medical expenses in time of illness. About one third of the people of Saskatchewan are not covered by any plan whatever. There is another reason why we feel a program is necessary at this time. It is because of the increasing cost of medical services. With modern medical techniques being improved and introduced and with an increasing number of specialists' services being required, the cost of medical care mounts. This makes it difficult for Canadians to afford the kind of medical care they need.

There is a third reason why we feel now is the time for action in this field. That is the tendency on the part of many private plans to reduce the amount of coverage under the plan, or to increase the premiums, or both, and very often to exclude persons they feel are a high risk and therefore persons who are likely to be in need of medical care. Private plans, good and valuable as they have been, have not provided the amount of prepaid medical care to which we think Canadians should be entitled.

The Saskatchewan program has been twisted and misrepresented in many ways. It has been called by our political opponents, state medicine, socialism, regimentation, dictatorship and other things. We feel the program has been and will be based on sound democratic principles. It will provide universal coverage. Everyone will be covered under the plan, not just those who can afford to pay the premiums under private plans, or those whose health record is such that they are accepted in private plans or those who happen to live in a certain geographic area or belong to an occupational group where they are covered.

The second principle of such a program is that there will be a small prepaid payment into such a plan. It is estimated it will cost approximately $35 to $40 for an adult couple with no cost for children. This would mean that in the province of Saskatchewan by an annual payment of some $70 or $75 a whole family would have their hospitalization and medical care covered. This would not be the total cost of the plan, of course, but it is believed that additional costs can be raised from general revenues within the province.

A third principle that has been enunciated is that the patient will have free choice of doctors. There will be no interference whatever in what is called normal doctor-patient relationship. The main principle of the plan will be that a doctor instead of sending his bill to the patient will send it to the central prepaid medical agency established by the government and from that agency will be issued to the doctor payment for the services rendered. A schedule of fees and costs will have to be worked out but I think there is every indication that doctors will fare very well financially under the proposed plan.

I am sorry to say that whenever the C.C.F. has proposed a prepaid medical care program each of the other political parties has opposed it. It was opposed and very bitterly opposed by the Liberal party. It was opposed by the Conservative party whose candidates said that if they were elected their government would establish a royal commission. In other words, they were going to duck the issue and shelve it as quickly as possible.

Mr. Jones: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: The Social Credit party said that they would have nothing to do with it at all. They were completely opposed to any universal plan which would cover everyone and all they would do would be to use public money to bolster private plans already in existence. Three political parties were opposed to a prepaid medical care program and the C.C.F. took on the field.

But these were not the only people who opposed a prepaid medical care program. They had the help of the Saskatchewan college of physicians and surgeons and they had the help of the Toronto Telegram. They also had the help of some people who found untold sums of money to use to publish scurrilous attacks on the government of that province and to issue a lot of nonsense and tommyrot to which the authors failed to attach their names.

They have become rather worn but I have in my hand what appear to be four pages taken from the Toronto Telegram of Saturday, April 23, 1960. These pages contain a number of articles by a man by the name of George Brimmell, Telegram staff reporter, about Saskatchewan's plans for a prepaid medical care program. I might say that this literature was issued freely and placed in the box of every boxholder in the province of Saskatchewan. There is no indication who published it or who authorized it to be mailed but it is indicated that the series is reprinted by permission of the publisher of the Toronto Telegram.

After the speeches yesterday I do not know whether this was a Tory medical axis in operation or a Liberal medical axis that had been arranged for the election or whether there was some insurance company money behind its distribution. But there are some interesting things said in these articles. One article is entitled, "Blood Boils Over Saskatchewan Medical Plan". Another is entitled, "Scalpels Out, Saskatchewan M.D.'s Fight Socialism". The scalpels were not out on this occasion for an appendix that needed removing but for the democratic franchise of the people of that province. On the next page there is an article headed, "Many Saskatchewan U.K. Doctors to Move if Douglas Wins".

I have been following the newspapers since the election and I have not heard of any doctors moving out of Saskatchewan. I do not know of any satchels being packed and doctors leaving. This afternoon the hon. member for Welland said that a number of doctors had left the United Kingdom. As has already been said in reply to him, this, of course, is correct.

Mr. McMillan: I did not say that.

Mr. Argue: The good doctor tells me that he did not say it. My ears must have been fooling me. A number of United Kingdom doctors have left that country but there are more doctors in the United Kingdom today than there have ever been. I hope the day will never come in the United Kingdom, as in Canada, when doctors along with other citizens will not be free to remain in the country or to leave as they see fit.

In Saskatchewan we have the services of a very fine group of doctors who have come to Saskatchewan from the United Kingdom. If they left Great Britain to escape socialism and state medicine, it is a strange thing that many of them came to the Swift Current health region in Saskatchewan, the only area where there is a prepaid medical care plan, and that they have been practising under that plan. Their neighbours say that economically they have been doing very well and that they are exceedingly good doctors. In spite of this kind of scaremongering I am certain that the United Kingdom doctors now in Saskatchewan by and large will remain in our province, as I hope they do.

But this article goes on to say that if the United Kingdom doctors move from Saskatchewan "they will have to fill up the profession with the garbage of Europe". I think that is an uncalled for slur on doctors in Canada who have come from European medical schools which I feel in many instances are among the best in the world. I notice that the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, who is a medical doctor, is nodding his head in the affirmative. In this modern day and age I do not think we need to attempt to divide the medical profession—

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I agree with you.

Mr. Argue: —or any other profession or group on the basis of the country in which people happen to be born. There should be medical standards set, as I know there are, for all newcomers, and there should not be any slur cast on the basis of the part of the world from which these people happen to come. I think the medical profession themselves, and I still do not blame the majority of medical doctors in the province of Saskatchewan—

Mr. Bigg: You killed that straw man.

Mr. Argue: What straw man?

Mr. Bigg: The one you just built up.

Mr. Argue: The hon. member should know all about straw men. Apparently some of his people believed this fiction but I do not believe it.

Mr. Bigg: Wheat straw.

Mr. Argue: I think wheat straw is a very good type of straw. A lot of things can be done with it that might compare favourably with some things I could say about the hon. member. In any case, I do not think it is necessary to attempt to divide the medical profession by this kind of slurring attack. I think the medical profession in the province of Saskatchewan has been badly led and badly misled by some of the people who have been giving them this kind of advice. Of course, they should know better than to go along with some of the propaganda that they issued. I have in my hand an advertisement in which a number of names of doctors are listed. It appeared in the Assiniboia Times of Wednesday, June 1, 1960, a weekly newspaper, but similar advertisements also appeared all over the province. The advertisement reads as follows:

> In recent weeks, we have been increasingly disturbed by the numerous comments made by a number of politicians regarding a compulsory government controlled medical care plan.

The advertisement goes on to say:

> We, the undersigned doctors, will continue to serve our patients to the best of our ability and will strive to give them the same high quality of medical care they have known in the past regardless of what may take place at government level. However, we will not participate in any compulsory government controlled medical care plan. We shall continue to conduct our practices on a private and personal basis.

This is another method of trying to influence the electorate. I do not believe this statement for a moment.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, are we discussing the Saskatchewan election or the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Jung): I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the estimates.

Mr. Argue: I was endeavouring to point out how the prepaid medical care program had been misrepresented and attacked in Saskatchewan. Nevertheless, the people of that province showed themselves in favour of the plan.

An hon. Member: Forty per cent.

Mr. Argue: That interjection is significant; it makes it clear that the people who voted C.C.F. were for the plan and those who voted for the other political parties were opposed to it. If you want to take the attitude that a political party has to have an over-all majority in order to implement its program, then democracy would come to a standstill in this country because very few governments ever obtain a clear majority from the electorate.

All Canada will watch this program with a great deal of interest. The C.C.F. in Saskatchewan is once again showing the way. But I plead with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to speed up the government's consideration of a prepaid medical care program. Let us hope the federal government will not take another 10 years to act on this type of program as the federal government took to implement a national hospitalization program. The people of Saskatchewan, because of the results of the recent election, will have the opportunity to enjoy the benefits of a prepaid medical care program.

I am asking this government to also show some leadership so that the Canadians in other provinces may have a chance to benefit from a prepaid medical care program. The federal government has a responsibility in this field, just as the federal government has accepted responsibility in the field of hospitalization. The Canadian government should come forward now with a federal prepaid medical care act by which the federal government would co-operate with any provincial government prepared to embark on such a prepaid medical care program.

Mr. Speakman: He wants us to bail out the C.C.F. in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: Nobody will need to bail out the C.C.F. This is a strange remark coming from the member of a party, the Conservative party, that failed to elect a single member in the recent election. It is not the C.C.F. that needs bailing out but the Tory party which has ceased to exist in Saskatchewan on a provincial basis since 1938.

Even with a prepaid medical care program we will not have a complete health program. The day must come, and it will come, when we have a dental program and a program which will take care of the costs of drugs. Only when we have a comprehensive national health insurance program which will include hospitalization, medical care, dental care and drugs will the people of Canada be able to enjoy a modern, scientific, health program to which every citizen has a right.

Mr. Taylor: It is a pleasure to rise in my place today and find the chairman of the committee is a colleague of mine who represents a riding adjacent to mine. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speakers from both sides of the house who have spoken on the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I particularly enjoyed the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent who spoke about national health and fitness. I enjoyed also listening to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson who spoke on these estimates, as did the hon. member for Assiniboia who just sat down.

Hon. members will recall that about a year ago I had the pleasure of placing on the order paper a resolution which read as follows:

That in the opinion of this house the government should give early consideration to the advisability of establishing a Canada sports council with the object of fostering and encouraging amateur sport in Canada, such council to have representatives from each of the provinces of Canada.

Hon. members will recall that on that occasion sincere and wholehearted support was given to the principle of the resolution. It was encouraging to me to find that the Leader of the Opposition and the representative of the C.C.F. group, the hon. member for Vancouver East, gave wholehearted support to that resolution. Again this year I placed the same resolution on the order paper, but for one reason and another I, along with other members, was not able to debate this resolution. Today, therefore, I want to speak for a few moments on that resolution as it pertains to the minister's estimates.

When I spoke last in the house on this resolution I referred to the fact that it was only a few years ago that the prime minister of the day rose in his place and gave, in a most refreshing manner, the reasons for the necessity of establishing the Canada Council in order to assist the arts, humanities and social sciences. The reasons advanced by the then prime minister for the establishment of the Canada Council could be applied equally to the case for the establishment of a sports council. If there was a need for the Canada Council, then I submit that there is an equally pressing need for the establishment of a Canada sports council because we are dealing with the health and fitness of the people of Canada.

We must remember that a nation's health is a nation's wealth. In glancing at the report of the Canada Council one would seem to find confirmation of the views and opinions of those who advocated the council. I noticed on reading page 20 of the report for 1957-58 that the council supported seven symphony orchestras and while the number of regular concerts given was the same as in the previous year, the number of performances for children and others was almost double, increasing from 93 to 175, while the total attendance increased from 320,000 to 477,000. I am sure that if hon. members were to give support to the establishment of a Canada sports council the first annual report of the proposed new organization would be equally glowing.

I suggested when I spoke before in the house on the subject that if a sports council were formed one paramount rule should be that the organization be as free from state control as it is prudent for any body to be that is entrusted with public funds. I would further suggest that the general rules which now apply to the Canada Council also apply to the proposed Canada sports council, with of course minor changes.

I also suggested, that a representative from each of the provinces of Canada be appointed so that the organization would be a truly representative one. The resolution speaks for itself in that regard. The persons chosen, as I mentioned before, should be familiar with the great problems now facing all athletic clubs and all athletic associations from one end of the country to the other. The persons chosen should be prepared, I submit, to devote much time to the youth of Canada who desire to play games in national and international competitions.

In my earlier address I referred to a few outstanding Canadians who would, I was sure, serve on this sports council and would give substantial leadership to the pressing and urgent problems facing amateur athletes in Canada today. If suitable persons are chosen, and if a reasonable fund is created, the indignities and embarrassments that have plagued our amateur athletes can be to a large extent eradicated.

In 1958 at the British empire games we gained one gold medal in rowing. In the final point standing we ranked fourth, well behind South Africa and a mere 100 points in front of Pakistan and the host country, Wales. At the last Olympic games held in Melbourne in 1956 Canada gained only 52 points to place 16th amongst 44 nations. What about the forthcoming games in Rome? We can only hope that at least once the Canadian flag will be atop the masthead in the Rome coliseum to warm the hearts of all Canadians attending. It would appear that there will be a large delegation from this country, and I only hope that we do well in Rome.

There are indications that we will not do so well. I feel that now is the time, before the results are posted, for some remedial action to be taken, so that at some future international show we can make a better showing. In 1958, in Davis cup tennis, Canadians played against a United States team that was virtually untested and the United States team made a clean sweep of the five game series. At the Pan-American games a year ago in Chicago Canada made a fair showing but in a limited field. May I say there was one significant thing about those games—I refer to the Pan-American games in Chicago—namely the fact that the Canadian Prime Minister was there in person. That was the first time to my knowledge that a prime minister had attended such an international event outside of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But not the first time a minister of the crown had done so.

Mr. Taylor: I did not hear what was said by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said that was not the first time that a minister of the crown had done so.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. member may be right but I think it was the first time a prime minister has attended an international event outside of Canada. It was heart warming, of course, to see him there. He certainly gave great encouragement and lifted the morale of the Canadian contestants. I am confident that under the inspiring leadership of the Prime Minister appropriate help will not be long withheld from our Canadian sports ambassadors.

At the 1956 winter Olympics in Cortina our Canadian hockey team was defeated by Russia. In 1960, as hon. members well know we had the opportunity of regaining the Olympic hockey award but we did not do so to the dismay, discouragement and annoyance of Canadians everywhere. It is for that reason that we should possibly plan now to make a better showing when we play again. That is possibly one of the reasons why I am urging the minister and the hon. members in the chamber today to do something about the situation. It is no sin to lose. I do not think that is what is bothering Canadians. What is bothering them is the fact that the nation does not go to sufficient trouble to assemble and train the best that we have.

We know what took place with respect to our Canadian hockey club. At Squaw Valley we placed eighth out of 16 countries. As a country which should normally excel in winter sports we placed behind such countries as Austria, Norway and Finland. We secured less than half the points of Sweden and Germany and we gained about one fifth the points obtained by Russia.

After almost all of the international events, certainly after the Olympic games of 1948, 1952 and 1956 and after the event at Squaw Valley, considerable publicity was given to Canada's inadequate showing. Generally speaking, there are many who say that we have been left wallowing in the wake of some of the more energetic countries which have become activated by the spirit of competition. I hope in the days to come we can make a better showing. Certainly when you sit in these large stadia outside of Canada you would like to see our contestants do well and go to these international shows properly clothed and equipped.

In the last ten years many countries refusing the role of also-rans have introduced development programs. The idea is to encourage many to take part and from the many more super-stars as a natural by-product will be produced. These countries have also set up a centralized coaching system. Certainly a study could be made through the proposed sports council of Canada's athletic needs and problems. Canadians like any other group like something to cheer about. Certainly it does something for our morale both nationally and individually.

How proud we all were to be Canadians —and I can certainly speak for those of us in western Canada—that day in 1928 when the lean and hungry Percy Williams popped the eyeballs out of the athletic world at Amsterdam. He became a national hero, and in his home town of Vancouver, in particular, he provided the spark and incentive to hundreds of school children to take an interest in track and field. The result has been that Vancouver annually stages the largest track and field meet in Canada. That credit, as I have indicated, is due to one performer who did so well in an international competition.

How proud we were as a nation of Anne Heggtveit of Ottawa for her great triumph at Squaw Valley. The same statement applies to Bob Paul and Barbara Wagner who did such a fine job in skating competitions. They certainly inspired to greater feats the other athletes assembled and, let us say, the small fry on rinks and ponds everywhere.

Canadians at the winter Olympics were provided with an emotional thrill through the victories of the people whom I have just mentioned. Because of their victories and their examples will not hundreds and hundreds more take up skiing and figure skating? Does anyone feel that because of Barbara Ann Scott fewer Canadians became interested in ice skating? Is not the morale of Canadians higher and thus is not Canada a better place in which to live because of the great achievement of these fine amateur athletes? Take away national pride and what have you left?

What we legislators and the various government departments must realize is that our citizens are interested not only in these international sports but in sports in general. What we must also realize is the substantial potential ability of our amateur sport ambassadors in improving public relations around the world. Surely Barbara Ann Scott, Anne Heggtveit and so many others have left a lasting impression upon the peoples of the world that Canada is a place of nice people and fine things. How else do you become acquainted with a country? If our few sports ambassadors have left a good impression upon the minds of the nations overseas, have they not made it just that much easier for our Department of External Affairs?

Mr. A. D. White, who I believe is not now a coach at the University of Toronto but who was a very popular and successful coach, delivered an address to the Couchiching conference and when referring to the Olympic games he said this:

> It appears that in Canada there is little understanding of the professional calibre of this international sports show in which our athletes seem so poorly equipped to compete.

One interesting observation was this. Some observers have interpreted our results at the games as an indication that the Canadian population is below par physically. I do not go along with the general notion that we are well below par. However, I think there is a real problem to be met. If we are below par physically then something ought to be done about it at an early date. I am sure that all hon. members and for that matter all ministers are tired of the appeals being made to them for federal funds to assist travelling clubs. The creation of a Canada sports council would not satisfy all of them by any means but at least the athletic governing bodies would be able to police themselves better and the essential things could be taken care of. That is what the Canada Council has found to date. That council could not and cannot take care of all appeals but certainly some of the essential appeals are being taken care of.

During a relatively short period I have received as I imagine have all hon. members, letters from various athletic clubs throughout the country. There was an appeal made by the team that represented Canada in Moscow in November, 1958. There was the appeal of the basketball team that represented Canada in Chile. There was the request for funds by the Canadian grass hockey team that played in half a dozen countries in Europe in 1959. All hon. members will recall the general appeal of the rugby team which left from Vancouver and toured Japan and made so many friends there. It made an equal appeal for funds but unfortunately, like the others, received nothing.

We all know about the plight of the Belleville McFarlands and the appeal for funds for the Canadian Pan-American games committee and the Canadian winter olympics committee. In almost all of these cases the Canadian team was seen abroad either in stadia or on television by millions of persons. During the Squaw Valley games the Columbia broadcasting system estimated the total television coverage reached an audience of some 66 million people. The cost to the C.B.S. company was $2 million. This, I submit, is in the realm of big business.

The Minister of Transport when being interviewed over a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation program in Toronto mentioned that some Canadian athletes are better known outside Canada than most prominent politicians.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Leader of the Opposition was denied a similar opportunity.

Mr. Taylor: Yes, I recall that. I may say that I have long been a follower of the Leader of the Opposition, and perhaps on some of these sports programs I would find it a pleasure to hear about some of the events he participated in so many years ago. I am very pleased he took the time to support this resolution and I feel sure that he will continue to support it, at least I hope he will.

Mr. Chairman, if you agree with me that our amateurs now perform before millions of persons and have the fortunate ability of assisting us in so many ways, what, might I ask, do we as federal legislators do for them, and in turn for the younger sports minded people of the country? I am not criticizing in any way the present administration or even the previous administration, but from almost time immemorial the senior government of Canada has been obliged to reject about 99.9 per cent of all appeals for financial assistance save and except the appeals of the Canadian Olympic association, which makes an appeal every four years.

For the 1956 Olympic games this house provided $60,000. That was provided by the previous administration. When it came to 1960 the present administration provided the same amount of money. But I want to point out that the $60,000 in 1960 had to be spread over three major international events, the one at Squaw Valley, part went to the Pan-American games in Chicago, and part to the large sports event which is coming up in Rome later this year. I wish to point out that we provide such seemingly small sums for these international events, whereas in the field of entertainment, for example the C.B.C., we provide some $79 million. We also provide upwards of $1 million to the national gallery and many millions to the national film board. I feel that some of these sports ambassadors are doing the same job as a finished product of the national film board does for Canada when shown outside the country.

I might add that when I looked over the budget of the Canadian Olympic committee I noticed that there was a contribution from an unidentified person from the United States. Certainly all contributions are to be welcomed but it was something rather unique to see that contribution there.

I might also point out that at Squaw Valley the Canadian Olympic committee had about $22,000, out of the fund which totalled $60,000, to spend there. While Anne Heggtveit received from Ottawa a glittering welcome after her great victory at Squaw Valley, there was another Ottawa youngster by the name of Fred Gravelle who left for Squaw Valley without sufficient funds to take care of him while there or to bring him back home, and in this case Ottawa citizens were obliged to pass around the hat as is the usual custom during fund raising campaigns to assist athletes.

The hockey clubs that represent Canada at these international events receive no money from the federal government, and I do not know whether hon. members are aware of that. Hockey teams representing Canada receive no money from the Olympic fund and in turn no money from the federal government. The hockey clubs must therefore fend results. All in all there is no money for the many extras that arise, and this does not improve morale. I submit that you cannot expect excellent performance and deportment from these teams when they leave Canada undermanned, poorly equipped and without for themselves with the most humiliating some modicum of moral support from the government. I suggest that if the player is entitled to wear the maple leaf on his sweater when playing in these international shows he must expect better support from the senior government. May I suggest that in future we should send these people out of this country properly equipped and properly dressed or not send them at all.

In the 1958 annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation it was stated that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation coverage of the final game between Penticton and Russia was the highlight of the year. Millions listened to the broadcast; yet when the Penticton players proceeded overseas en route through Montreal, to the surprise of some local business man in Montreal he saw the team leaving without proper blazers. The players were measured for blazers at that time and the blazers followed them overseas. I have also seen other clubs leaving Canada without the usual blazers and proper ties. It looks much more fitting to see representative clubs going overseas dressed in a manner which is a real credit to Canada.

After travelling with Canadian clubs in England, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia and the United States, I can say that because of the shortages we are not doing the job that could be done. With the shortage of funds and confusion as to who actually sponsors our national clubs, no uniformity is followed in club colours. The Canadian hockey team that played in Russia in 1958 wore red, and the Canadian team which represented Canada in the winter Olympics wore green. The spectator might just ask what are our national colours in the world of sport. It is confusing to all overseas to see a maple leaf, or sometimes the lack of it, on the front of a sweater and find some other advertising material on the back. I presume this situation will get worse unless some federal assistance is forthcoming. It may well come to pass that we shall see the words "Ace Beer" on the front of a sweater and "Acme Moving Company" on the back. When the Toronto Lyndhursts represented Canada there was a report in a newspaper article "that the Russians at least managed to beat a team from a used car lot".

Other countries have recognized the problem and action has been taken. I referred in some detail when I spoke last to the legislative program in other countries. Certainly other nations have realized that national prestige is increasingly associated with athletic showing. Since we last debated this resolution in the house a general election was held in England. It is interesting to note that the election manifestos of the Conservative party and the Labour party contain references to the establishment of a sports council. In the Conservative booklet which was issued just prior to the last election in Great Britain appears the following:

> We propose that, on the analogy of the arts council, a small, independent body, to be called the sports council of Great Britain, should be established under Royal Charter as the instrument for distributing government money for all the purposes we have mentioned.
> The sports council would receive appropriate grants from the exchequer, paid on a quinquennial basis, with the power to carry forward balances from year to year.

These grants could accrue to something like five million pounds a year. On another page of the same booklet issued by the Conservative party in Great Britan, what the sports council could do in that country is discussed. Then in another pamphlet published in Great Britain by the Labour party appears the following:

> The youth service, which could provide recreation for boys and girls leaving school, has, year after year, been starved of funds. Many youth club premises are dingy and unattractive, trained leaders are too few, and facilities for sports and games are quite inadequate. Over the next five years we have got to make provision for a million more teenagers leaving school. Our new sports council will go some way to meet their needs.

The labour party went on to say:

We shall make much better provision for the enjoyment of sport, the arts and the countryside. A sports council will be set up with a grant of £5 million.

That is what is taking place in Britain and it is, I submit, a very forward step. Also, in one of the Conservative publications, there was reference to a large national training centre to be constructed at the Crystal Palace outside London at a cost of £2,185,000.

In closing, may I say that in order to assist our amateur athletes and at the same time to improve the health of Canadians and the stature of Canada, I suggest we do the following:

First, I think a Canada sports council should be established and a fund created under the control of the council in the same way as with the Canada Council.

Second, I feel that the government should request the council to survey the needs and basic requirements of our athletes.

Third, I would suggest that the defence department assist the council and the amateurs in a number of ways. The navy and air force do make trips overseas, and in peacetime arrangements could surely be made to carry our sports representatives while the navy and other branches of the armed forces carry out training manoeuvres. As it is, out of $20,000 allotted for the Canadian Pan-American committee, $9,000 went to T.C.A. and other commercial carriers. I suggest that the practice of the United States department of defence and the state department should be followed with respect to carrying these amateur ambassadors overseas.

Fourth, I would suggest that the government proclaim once every four years an Olympic week, when citizens could be urged to support with money the Canadian Olympic team.

Fifth, the government could help the city of Vancouver, or any other Canadian city which offers to hold the Pan-American games. If Chile and other such small countries can be hosts to such a large gathering, surely Canada could do as much. Incidentally, while I was in Chicago, attending the Pan-American games I read a publication there that the United States federal government had assisted Chicago to meet the financial problems of holding the Pan-American games.

Sixth, I suggest that a national school for coaches be established by the senior government through the Canada sports council. I suggest that coaches properly trained could do so much with the young people of Canada. Here would be a national program aimed at the masses. The health of Canadian youth would improve, and from the many we could select more super athletes for international competition.

Seventh, the senior government in its national parks could give every consideration to the construction and erection of those things which would encourage the youth of Canada to participate in outdoor activities.

Eighth, the senior government could work out a plan with the provincial governments, using the council, for a similar work project in provincial parks. Further, capital loans at low rates of interest could be made to resort owners willing to instal equipment to meet the demands of outdoor sportsmen.

The Chairman: I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, it was a pleasure to speak on this subject again, and I hope the minister will do everything possible to assist.

Mr. Howard: While I was listening to the discussion a moment ago I thought there had been a cabinet shuffle and I was about to offer my congratulations to the new minister of national health and welfare. But I see now the hon. gentleman was only substituting while the real minister absented himself for a moment or two.

I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Jasper-Edson and the hon. member for Welland, both of whom are practising medical men who have an intimate knowledge of the subject matter of this discussion. Many others of us can only attempt to understand in a vicarious way these questions affecting the health of the people of this nation. While, as I have indicated on other occasions, I believe that the health and physical welfare of our Canadian citizens is the most important national effort we have, and while the department, through its various branches deals extensively with the health and welfare of our people, I feel, especially in view of the fact that the hon. member for Timmins and the hon. member for Assiniboia have both dealt with the question of further promoting the health of our citizens, that I might, perhaps, leave further discussion of that subject at this stage and perhaps comment more extensively upon it when the individual items of the esitmates are before the committee.

I was interested in the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson, especially his reference to the need for an investigation into drug prices. The hon. member also mentioned the methods of advertising used in the drug industry. He was referring, of course, to the ethical drug industry. I want to say that we support him wholeheartedly in this regard. It is to this end that I should like to direct some of my remarks at this time.

There has been a good deal of discussion in recent months instigated by the remarks of hon. members of this house, by the so-called Kefauver committee hearings in the United States and by the inquiry presently being conducted by the combines investigation branch of our Department of Justice. Out of all this there has been probably more public information given about this industry both by the pharmacists themselves and by the manufacturers than has been available for a long time with regard to what the industry is doing and what it plans to do.

One of the main reasons for what I consider to be the unnecessary high cost of drugs is that the ethical drug manufacturers—and I cannot understand how that word "ethical" got in there in relation to them, but it is there—are obliged to spend a considerable amount of money each year on research and in developing new drugs. The high prices therefore are said to be necessary in order that they may recoup the investment on research before the product is replaced by products of better quality, or of a different type or of greater effectiveness. Now the drug directorate of the department prepared a statement in March of this year for presentation to the estimates committee, and I should like to refer to part of that statement which appeared on page 2 of the report in so far as the question of research is concerned in relation to the drug manufacturing industry in Canada. Under the heading "Research and Investigation" the report deals with the administration and enforcement within the department itself. Then it says:

> It should be noted that there is almost no investigation work on foods carried out by the industry or the universities in Canada and only a few drug manufacturers have research laboratories in this country.

Just the other day a booklet came to my attention entitled "Facts about Pharmaceutical Manufacturing" and no doubt it was sent to every hon. member of this house as well as to myself. It is published by the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers association, whose address is the King Edward-Sheraton hotel in Toronto. There are some passages in this booklet to which I should like to refer in relation to research in Canada. As to the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers association about which I shall have something to say later, I would simply point out that it is not a Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturing association. They are not Canadian but claim they are and make some reference to it. On page 9 of the booklet it is stated:

> As we have noted, it costs money to bring a new drug or compound into being. Penicillin and the Salk vaccine each cost $20 million before they were available to the medical profession in quantity.

The inference is quite clear, that the drug manufacturing industry spent $20 million on the development of each of the drugs, Salk vaccine and penicillin. That is not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The government of Canada spent a lot of the taxpayers money on the development of Salk vaccine.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member has stated the point I am making. The implication in the booklet is that this money was spent by the industry in the development of penicillin and Salk vaccine which is not in accordance with the facts. The discovery of penicillin had nothing to do with the drug industry in Canada or the United States. It was developed in the United States almost exclusively by the use of government funds. The same with Salk vaccine. The treasury of this nation put up the money to develop Salk vaccine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the United States it was developed out of the moneys collected by people through the march of dimes campaign.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate that the hon. member for Essex East has a thorough understanding of this subject and if he wants to enter the debate in a formal way when I have concluded the committee will benefit from his experience and he could comment without interruption. However, if he attempts to continue at this time his presentation will be interrupted by me because I have the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I merely want to help, that is all.

Mr. Howard: The drug manufacturing industry in Canada did not spend one red cent on the development of Salk vaccine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not completely correct.

Mr. Howard: I know the industry spent some money after it was developed. However, now the situation is worse. My hon. friend has left his seat and is half way out the door.

Mr. Argue: Now he is gone.

Mr. Howard: Yes, he has left. The booklet goes on to state:

> It is estimated that in North America this year the pharmaceutical industry will spend approximately $200 million on research and development—

Reference is then made to the distribution of that amount of money. The sum of $200 million is a considerable sum to spend on research and development. I do not have access to the financial statements of the companies concerned but the following statement casts some doubt on the validity of the previous quotation. In the 1958 issue of Consumer Reports there appears a statement by Mr. Chet Shaw, director of the health news institute, who addressed the American drug manufacturers' convention in 1956. I appreciate that there is a difference of four or five years in the figures. With reference to the amount of money spent on research Mr. Shaw is reported to have said:

> We've done a lot of talking about an estimated $100 million—

Spent on research. I continue:

> —but we'd be hard put to document it. What if someone questioned it—someone whose voice we couldn't afford to ignore?

Most research work is done in the United States. Generally speaking the amount reported to have been spent on research is not very great compared with the portion of the sales dollar that is spent on advertising to sell the product. I have in my hand the United States federal trade commission's economic report on antibiotics manufacture dated June of 1958. It is their policy not to refer to specific companies by name because this would disclose information about the companies and they are simply enumerated as company No. 1, No. 2, No. 3, etc. The report reveals that in 1956 company No. 1 spent 8.1 of the sales dollar on research and 26.4 per cent on advertising and selling; company No. 2 spent 13.9 per cent of the sales dollar on research and 24 per cent on advertising and selling; company No. 3 spent 7.9 per cent of the sales dollar on research and 28.1 per cent on advertising and selling; and company No. 4 spent 3.5 per cent of the sales dollar on research and 30.7 per cent on advertising and selling. In other words an average of between 8 and 9 times what was spent on research was spent by these companies on advertising and selling. Therefore the reference to the amount spent on research has been over-stated to a large extent.

I return now to the booklet published by the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers association. They indicate that they are representative of 60 pharmaceutical manufacturing companies which are listed by name on page 20. By reference to Moody's directory and the industrial index I have discovered that only 3 of the 60 are Canadian. I find that 25 are subsidiaries wholly owned or controlled by United States pharmaceutical houses and others are subsidiaries of German, British, French or Swiss manufacturing concerns. When the booklet refers to money spent it is talking about money spent by the United States drug manufacturing industry, not the Canadian industry. The booklet also distorts the figures as I illustrated by referring to Salk vaccine and penicillin research.

In recent years there has been an intense and continuous search for a drug to retard the progress of cancerous growths and to cure this dread disease. I have examined university publications containing lists of gifts, bequests and grants and have here the one pertaining to the University of British Columbia. While it would appear that some contributions are received from certain drug manufacturing companies in Canada, in looking through reports of this type I have not been able to find one single instance where any drug manufacturing concern in Canada or the United States has contributed a cent toward cancer research in any of the universities of Canada. They may have done so but I cannot find that they have contributed a single cent to organizations such as the cancer research foundation.

I think it would be a tremendous asset to the health of our nation and in finding a drug or other method to curtail cancer if some of the money these companies say they are pouring into research could be directed toward finding some cure for cancer. It may well be that they spend funds along these lines within their own research establishments. I do not know about that and have not heard any reference to them doing so. However, a great deal of research work is done under sufferance through grants from government and individuals by the cancer research foundation and the universities, and I think the drug industry could provide some money for this work. They are not spending their money specifically on an attempt to make a major break through in the pharmaceutical field and do not have too good a record in this regard but are rather spending their money on developing additional uses for or refinements of drugs and pharmaceuticals that have already been developed to a great extent under public control.

I should like to deal with the question of quality control to some extent and refer to page 11 of this booklet issued by the Canadian pharmaceutical manufacturers association. It will be recalled that its publication stems from the fight with regard to the purchase of brand name drugs or generically named drugs, the idea being that if you buy by the generic name you pay less than if you buy by the brand name, although that is not necessarily always the case. The association also says that generically named drugs are imported from other countries, notably Italy, where the manufacturers do not have the same standard of quality control as exists in the United States or Canada and therefore the drugs are of poor quality. On page 11 of the booklet I find the following:

> The keynote of production and quality control is uniformity. The last batch of a pharmaceutical must be identical in every way with the first batch, even though years might separate them.

This leaves the impression that every time you buy a particular drug in a drugstore you are guaranteed that it is precisely the same in every way as when you bought the same drug four or five years ago or even longer. That is the impression they leave. They say that every batch meets certain standards over the years and that if I buy a certain pharmaceutical today there is a guarantee that in every way it is the same as when I bought it some time ago, even though I may not buy it in the same place. That is the impression that is being left and we know that is not so.

We know that variations are allowed by the food and drug directorate in their testing of drugs. We know that a drug may range from 90 per cent to 110 per cent or 115 per cent of the initial standard. There is a variation of 15 to 20 per cent from the norm set by the food and drug directorate. I am not trying to leave any false impression about the matter. I am merely trying to clear up what I think are incorrect impressions created by this booklet.

I know that some members of the committee are pharmacists and I am sure that the committee would be delighted as I would be if any of them would get up and give us their point of view because, so far as the drug question is concerned, I think they have been much maligned. It would be helpful if they would participate in the debate and explain their point of view as to this matter. As an aside, may I say that unfortunately for the pharmacist he is the person with whom the consumer deals. When a person is given a prescription he takes it to a pharmacist to have it filled and the pharmacist is the person to whom the customer pays $10, $15 or $20. Because the pharmacist is the one who deals with the patient, he is the one to whom the patient looks as being responsible for the high price of the drug. This is not so because the pharmacist is merely doing business. These are things that those members who are pharmacists could explain to us.

I should also like to deal with the question of advertising in the ethical drug industry. We know, of course, that the expression "ethical drug industry" means that they do not make drugs for sale directly to patients but for sale under prescription by a doctor and through a pharmacist. Therefore they do not advertise in the normal sense of the word in that they are not trying to reach the consumer but rather the doctor, pharmacist or wholesaler, those people who are in between the consumer and the manufacturer. There is a difference in the advertising approach that is used.

While the advertising of proprietary medicines is, I understand, controlled pretty well and carefully checked by the food and drug directorate, advertising directed to doctors by the ethical drug industry is not controlled to that extent and there is no check as to the truth of the advertising. In this field perhaps I might call upon some comments by Professor Nickerson, professor of pharmacology and therapeutics at the University of Manitoba and Associate Professor Gemmell, associate professor of medicine at the University of Manitoba. These two gentlemen wrote an article which appeared in the Canadian medical association journal of April 1, 1959. It is entitled, "Doctors, Drugs and Drug Promotion". The article is five pages long and that is far too much for me to read.

However, I should like to make one or two references to the attitude and opinions of these two gentlemen, one a professor of pharmacology and the other an associate professor of medicine, with respect to what they think about the advertising approach of the drug manufacturing companies which, as I indicated earlier, spend from 25 per cent to 30 per cent of their sales dollar on advertising. Actually I have a reprint of the article here. I do not think I should ask the committee to listen to extensive reading but perhaps I might be permitted to make one or two references. I quote from the article:

> A casual local survey during the past year revealed the following:
> 1. A majority of physicians utilizing a "new" and effectively advertised analgesic did not know that it is simply the standard A.P.C. (acetylsalicylic acid, phenacetin and caffeine) plus a little barbiturate.

Apparently in the advertising this was represented to be a new and effective drug but was substantially the same as that which had been on the market for some time. Then the article says:

> 2. Several physicians did not know the composition of the mixed electrolyte solutions they ordered by a simple number or letter designation. As a result, we have seen two recent patients with post-traumatic oliguria receiving potassium-containing solutions. Both died of potassium intoxication before renal function was re-established.
> 3. A mixture of antimalarials and a steroid was administered for a dermatological condition without any appreciation of the amount of steroid in the mixture, and consequently without any provision for gradual withdrawal to allow recovery of suppressed endogenenous pituitary-adrenal function.

Mr. Argue: Look out.

Mr. Howard: As long as I can wrap my tongue around them I will be all right.

Mr. Argue: You are doing as well as the minister.

Mr. Howard: I have been practising my reading. These are the results of the type of advertising in which the drug industry engages in trying to sell its products. It is something like an Alice in Wonderland approach; we will have the verdict first and the trial afterwards. As Professor Nickerson points out, it is the advertising department that will discover and establish the superiority of a particular product, not the drug manufacturing industry or the medical man himself. This is unfortunately the result of this intense concentration on the selling approach to advertising; the industry is trying to push particular products.

As I have said, I have only selected one or two excerpts from this particular article, and of course if we went into it in detail then the full article should be read, especially in view of the fact it is a scientific paper. Then my remarks could be related to the text of the article and a full appreciation gained of the points Professor Nickerson is making. I have quoted from the article because it refers time and time again to the advertising. At another point he says:

For example, the full significance of a recent promotional effort, which provided references to both efficacy and lack of toxicity, was not apparent until it was noted that the doses used in studies quoted to demonstrate the lack of toxicity were considerably lower than those used to substantiate efficacy.

References such as this are all through this particular article. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that I have perhaps run out of time. I had two or three other references I wanted to make on the question of advertising.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: That is the democratic reaction of the Conservatives, as I have noticed them in many places. As soon as a member who does not belong to their party indicates that his time is up, they are quite pleased. In any event, perhaps they should show the same appreciation when the Minister of Finance is speaking. Perhaps I will have an opportunity later to make some other remarks on this important subject. Perhaps my remarks will promote the entry into the debate of other people who are interested in this particular field and perhaps as a result of our exchange of views and attitudes we might come up with a more successful approach to this drug question than has been the case in the past two years.

Mr. Beech: Mr. Chairman, I want to add my congratulations to those of other hon. members to the Minister of National Health and Welfare upon the splendid strides forward that have been made during the time he has had charge of this department. He has done such a good job that I hestitate to hold up the passage of these estimates. I hope he will excuse me for taking a few moments to speak on this subject because it is the only opportunity I have had during this session to make these remarks.

I am referring to the appeal for assistance for housing for elderly persons. I introduce this matter in the hope it will encourage the building of more accommodation for our elderly citizens by municipalities and service groups such as the Canadian Legion, Lions, Kiwanis and Rotary clubs. This is not to belittle in any way the progress that has been made since the limited dividend section of the National Housing Act was first introduced. In fact the success of these early developments has brought into being many such projects, sponsored by various agencies but all financed under the limited dividend section of the National Housing Act and administered by the sponsors. Since 1950 some 4,825 units have been approved and it is interesting to note that of this number 1,328 units were completed up to the end of 1956 and since that time, 3,497 units to the end of 1959; in addition to which there were 586 hostel beds provided in the province of Saskatchewan during the latter period.

The provinces in which they were approved are: New Brunswick, 16; Quebec, 993; Ontario, 1,837; Manitoba, 216; Saskatchewan, 860; Alberta, 124; British Columbia, 779. The amount of loans approved for these projects totalled $24,711,318, and the sponsors for the projects were as follows: city and municipality, 41; church or church groups, 7; private enterprises, 16; the Canadian Legion, 8; corps of commissionaires, 1; charitable organizations, 16; service clubs, 35. There are approximately 9,000 persons accommodated in these projects, including the hostel beds.

These figures indicate the growing interest in this problem by the people and the various governments. Indeed, the very acceptance by the public has only accentuated the need and desirability of this type of housing. What does this type of housing accomplish?

First, it provides housing for those who are in advanced years and still able to perform the necessary duties to maintain a home without supervision.

Second, it allows these senior citizens to have their own homes and live their own lives instead of living with sons or daughters who may be hard-pressed to provide a place for them or living in back rooms or attics.

Third, it provides accommodation at rents they can afford to pay, thus maintaining that feeling of independence which comes with the knowledge that they are paying their way.

Fourth, it gives them a feeling of security when they know they will not be asked to move at a landlord's whim.

Fifth, it gives them a feeling of content because of the design and comfort of the accommodation and the environment.

Sixth, it reduces the need for costly county homes for the aged.

Seventh, the first grants made are the only assistance needed with the exception of some aid in relation to taxes as the projects are self-sustaining.

Eighth, welfare costs in these projects are practically nil.

Ninth, it encourages the introduction of new sources of money into the housing field.

In this connection, I may say that the Canadian Legion branches in the Toronto area have been trying for some time to induce the trustees of the Ontario canteen fund to make grants for the purpose of erecting housing for elderly veterans or the widows of veterans. This fund still has some $470,000 which belongs to the veterans of world war I, and there is no better way in which to use these funds than to provide decent homes for them in their declining years. So far the appeals have not borne fruit but it is hoped that continued pressure by the veterans concerned will convince the board that the five cents required from them out of every dollar spent on such housing is the best investment that can be made.

I may also say that there are many trade unions that have many thousands of dollars in funds which could be spent for this purpose and not only provide housing for our elderly persons but also provide work for their members. I mention this to point out the type of funds that can be made available for this type of housing and encouragement should be given to the use of these funds for this purpose.

All of these points have been recognized by some provincial governments which made grants under the following legislation. In the province of British Columbia the act is cited as the elderly citizens' housing aid act and came into being on March 15, 1955. The main body of the act reads as follows:

Subject to an appropriation by the legislature for the purpose, and provided the plans have been approved by the provincial secretary, the lieutenant governor in council may grant aid to a municipality or non-profit corporation incorporated for the purpose of providing homes for elderly citizens, to assist in the construction or reconstruction of low rental housing units for elderly citizens of low income who are unable to purchase adequate accommodation according to their needs.

The amount of such grant shall not in any case exceed one third of the total cost of construction or reconstruction; and no grant shall be made unless the municipality or non-profit corporation makes a cash grant towards the cost of construction or reconstruction equal to at least one tenth of the total cost of construction or reconstruction.

In the province of Manitoba the elderly persons housing act came into effect on March 15, 1956. The requirements under this act are somewhat more complicated but for the purpose of these remarks the following apply:

In the case of an elderly persons housing unit for two persons, 10 per centum of the capital cost of the construction thereof, but not exceeding $500.

In the case of an elderly persons housing unit for one person, 10 per centum of the capital cost of the construction thereof, but not exceeding $350.

In the province of Ontario an act to authorize provincial grants to assist in the erection of housing units for elderly persons came into effect on April 10, 1952.

The amount of any such grant shall be calculated at the rate of $500 for each dwelling unit or 50 per cent of the capital cost of the project to the municipality, whichever is the lesser.

The minister of public welfare may grant aid to any municipality to assist it in any project for the construction and equipment of low rental housing units for elderly persons.

This act was amended in 1952 as follows:

The minister of public welfare may grant aid to any limited dividend housing corporation that has been incorporated by or on behalf of a municipality or has been approved by a municipality and that has had a loan made to it under The National Housing Act, 1944 (Canada) to assist it in any project for the construction and equipment of low rental housing units for elderly persons.

The purpose of this amendment was to allow service clubs and other interested organizations to sponsor this type of housing and to assist in the obtaining of equipment such as stoves, refrigerators, venetian blinds, et cetera, necessary for these developments.

I have been unable to find the legislation under which the province of Saskatchewan operates but from information gleaned from the report on social welfare and rehabilitation it would appear that this province has advanced up to 20 per cent of the total cost of housing projects for homes or lodges constructed by non-profit housing companies for the accommodation and care of aged, needy, infirm and blind persons.

I have mentioned these facts in order to point out that grants made for housing for elderly persons are made by the welfare departments in various provinces. In addition to this assistance, most of the municipalities in which these projects are erected give substantial assistance either in the form of land grants or in a reduction of taxes. In metropolitan Toronto, for instance, the council makes grants to cover the cost of taxes over and above $25 per unit. These grants have been made and this assistance has been given all with the primary purpose of keeping the rents at a level the tenants can economically pay, and up until the last few years this assistance has been sufficient to achieve this purpose. Perhaps I should point out here that the rents on the earlier projects run from $18 a month up, depending on the percentage of grants made by the province. However, with the increased interest rates, cost of construction and cost of land, it is now impossible to develop these projects and rent them to people on old age pensions, war veterans allowances or low fixed incomes.

This brings me to the purpose of this appeal. In these days when it is so necessary to reduce the cost of government I believe that more attention should be given to increasing the value of the dollars paid out under social security measures. For instance, while it might be impractical at this time to increase old age pensions generally, grants to elderly persons housing would increase the value of the pensions of the tenants and assist the more needy section of our aged population. By doing the thing in this manner we would avoid what happened after the last increase was made in the old age pension when some landlords immediately increased their rents and so gobbled up the increase granted to these people.

The federal government has recognized the need for assistance to the provinces and municipalities by paying 50 per cent of old age security pensions, old age assistance, blind and disabled pensions; and it seems to me there could be no more worth-while assistance granted than that which would allow our senior citizens to obtain the type of housing I have been speaking about.

It is my firm belief that the costs of construction and financing of the more recent of these developments will eventually spell disaster for this plan which was designed to assist elderly persons with low incomes and which has worked so well and with such great benefit throughout the country, because when rents for this type of accommodation exceed $50 a month they are exceeding the amount which these people can afford to pay unless they have other income than the pension mentioned.

When I first spoke of this problem in this chamber it was my belief that perhaps a fixed rate of interest was the answer to the problem. This suggestion did not seem to be acceptable and so I am making the appeal to the same department that handles this type of assistance in the provinces, namely the Department of National Health and Welfare. This grant would be as in all cases, for the primary purpose of keeping the rents at an economic level and in no case to reduce the equity of the sponsors of such projects. Sufficient safeguards already exist to prevent the abuse of this type of assistance.

We cannot praise too highly the work being done by members of the limited dividend companies who sponsor and administer these projects, all of whom serve in an honourary capacity and who must be really dedicated to the work to which they are committed. The best way for this government and this committee to acknowledge the splendid work being done by these citizens, and to encourage others to do likewise, is to give them a tangible expression of our appreciation by making grants in the form I have mentioned. To this end I earnestly solicit the government's favourable consideration of this appeal.

Mr. Herridge: I have always been interested in health and welfare, and the older I grow the more my interest intensifies. First of all, before going on with the few remarks I wish to make, I must express my appreciation for the courtesy that has been extended to me by the minister when I have taken any matter up with him or have raised any question in the house. I must also express the appreciation of this group for the excellent work being done by his two deputies and his competent staff. The minister's staff in Ottawa and throughout Canada carries on quietly this excellent work, with all its ramifications and many divisions, and does so without glamour. I do not want to be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman. I am not suggesting that the department has not within it individuals with glamour. What I am suggesting is that its work is carried on officially without glamour. I have heard it whispered that there are members of the staff of the minister's department whose glamour is in such evidence that they have actually influenced the attitude of committees of the House of Commons. I therefore do not want to be misunderstood. When I say "without glamour", I mean as far as the scientific, administrative and technical work of the department is concerned.

By the way, in looking around, I am somewhat inspired and flattered by having a lady in front of me, one to the right of me and one to the left of me, all listening raptly while I volley and thunder. So I have a good start now.

The first movements in the direction of the modern state health, health insurance and other welfare plans and ramifications appeared toward the middle and latter part of the Victorian period in western Europe, and had their beginnings in Great Britain prior to 1900. Why? Because there were many new problems created in the development of industrial society and the increasing densities of population which were not so apparent previously. New conditions of poverty were created as the result of the development of industrial society which did not exist even under feudalism, where, with the exception in the case of crop failures, the people had a roof over their heads and good and sufficient plain food to eat.

It came to fruition with increasing rapidity after the turn of the century. While I appreciate that we must give credit to those persons in Great Britain who had some influence in other countries of the British commonwealth, such as Kier Hardie—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And Cadbury.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, Cadbury and Lloyd George. They were a small and devoted group of Labour and Liberal members of parliament to whom the British people owe a great deal in the development of their social security system.

The first legislation in Great Britain was in 1911 when there was passed the national insurance act. I read about that with interest at the time and I read some of the debates. That act was inspired by the activities of this small group led by the Right Hon. Lloyd George, assisted by people like George Bernard Shaw, the Cadburys, the Rowntrees, the Fry's and all the Quaker families who took some interest in social welfare in Great Britain at that time.

However, as far as Canada is concerned there has been a somewhat slower development, and understandably so. First of all, we have a more difficult problem in a country like Canada than in a unitary state like Great Britain to establish an over-all security scheme on a national basis. Our industrial development was later. We had a pioneer society much later than in Great Britain; in fact it has not entirely gone today, although I must say the spirit has gone in some quarters.

Anyway, the first official recognition by a political party of this question was at the famous Liberal convention of 1919. I do not think the hon. member for Essex East was in attendance. Possibly there might have been a little better result if he had been in attendance. But that was the first official recognition of the problem in Canada, and we all know about the famous resolution which was passed at that convention.

However, very little was done, except in very limited national, provincial and municipal spheres, to look after the poverty stricken and those people next door who were going to the Salvation Army or rescue organizations, and things of that kind.

Then we had the Rowell-Sirois report of 1940. War brought about an interest in this subject. Then we had the Marsh report of 1943 and the House of Commons special committee on social security in 1944. I am sure the hon. member for Essex East was a member of that committee and took a very active part in it. Then the latest was the Clark report, which was tabled in the house on May 5, 1959, and according to the Prime Minister is still under study.

I had the report sent to my office, like other hon. members, but I simply did not have the time to wade through all that material so I took advantage of the opportunity to purchase a condensed copy of the report issued by the Canadian welfare council. I should like to congratulate them upon providing that condensed report because it is an excellent piece of work and contains the essential features of the other rather massive report. One can digest the facts contained in the condensed version very easily.

There was a great fanfare when the person was appointed who was going to make the investigation. He was told to do it as quickly as possible, but it took longer than expected. There is no doubt that a great deal of information is contained in the report which could have been obtained from the department. I am sure the former minister of national health and welfare will agree with me on that. Other information was gathered together, and I do not want to belittle anyone's efforts in this respect, but after all this fanfare we got a massive report without any recommendations contained in it. There were a few evaluations and hints and timid suggestions in various paragraphs but no definite recommendations, and we are still awaiting the decision of the minister and the government who are studying this report.

In addition to that I am safe in saying that studies of the reports have been conducted over quite a period of years by other professional and public bodies interested in helping Canada. I would also give credit to the work which has been done by prior governments. But it has all been done on a piecemeal basis, and possibly no one is to blame for that in view of the fact that these things have to be sold. They have to obtain common acceptance. Provinces have to be dealt with and, as I said before, it is not quite as simple as dealing with this matter in a unitary state such as Great Britain or some of the other states in western Europe.

Then we have old age pensions, and hon. members will remember that the late J. S. Woodsworth was a very prominent figure in this sphere. We have had family allowances, unemployment insurance and health grants given us by the former Liberal government; and I have no hesitation in saying that I am quite confident that when the former minister of national health and welfare arrived here as one of the more radical members of the Liberal party, I think in 1935, he was one of the more aggressive members of that party at that time who did everything he could to urge the government in power to take action along the lines which was later taken with respect to family allowance, unemployment insurance, health grants and so on.

That was a step forward and this legislation has been of great benefit to many people. But the big weakness today is that this has all been done on a piecemeal basis and we in the C.C.F. group say that what we want is an over-all social security system in Canada.

This action which was taken by the former government was spurred on by representations from farmers organizations, labour organizations, women's organizations, various groups from universities and various other devoted groups throughout Canada as well as devoted individuals who all took an interest in this problem throughout the years. Today we have on the statute books the legislation which was passed by this parliament, largely under the auspices of the former Liberal government. In that respect at least they were following up the traditions of the Right Hon. Lloyd George.

However, we say that more should be done and that more should have been done prior to this. Up to a few years ago people were opposed to over-all security and national health insurance on financial grounds. They said it was impracticable, impossible. That phase has passed entirely as the result of the experience in Great Britain. We all recognize the accomplishments of the British health service and legislation providing over-all security. No aspect of the peaceful revolution brought about by the British Labour government is more dramatic than their health services legislation and their social security legislation, and I must say that is to the everlasting credit of the pioneers I mentioned previously.

The Labour government which was elected after 1945 gave, I think, the lead to the British commonwealth of nations with respect to national health insurance and social security. In a matter of a few years the old style fee for sickness system has been converted into a new style socialist free health service.

Whether hon. members like it or not, a free health service available to everyone in Britain, including visitors, is accepted beyond doubt and there is no need to search for socialist opinion in support of this view. I want to quote two authorities to indicate how solidly this idea is based in Britain and in the west European countries and how great is the need for action on the part of the present government. I have read some of Sir Winston Churchill's speeches when he was a member of the Tory party early in the century, and the Tory party took a very strong stand against suggestions by various Labour and Liberal members such as I have mentioned. But I want to read a quotation from the converted Right Hon. Winston Churchill. He said in the United Kingdom House of Commons in March of 1943—and the war had a definite impact on the thinking of even Conservatives in Britain and most countries with respect to this question:

> Anyone can see what large savings there will be in administration once the whole process of insurance has become unified, compulsory and national.
> Here is a real opportunity for what I once called "bringing the magic of averages to the rescue of millions." Therefore you must rank me and my colleagues as strong partisans of national compulsory insurance for all classes, for all purposes, from the cradle to the grave.

I quote that statement with some relish because you still get a remnant of Victorian sentiment criticizing people who suggest that when we aim to produce security from the cradle to the grave we are going to make a soft, coddled nation. Here is one of the most distinguished figures in our history, and one who cannot be accused of coddling anyone, recognising that in an industrial society this type of overall security is imperative and necessary.

I also want to quote from the London correspondent of the Wall Street Journal of November 27, 1951 just after the Labour government had been elected in Great Britain. This is what I read:

> —one pillar of socialism—'socialized medicine'—is certain to remain intact... The "free" health service set up by the late Labour government is so popular that it can no longer be made a political issue here.

Now I want to tell the committee of an interesting conversation I had with Mr. Rab Butler, who was, I think, at that time chancellor of the exchequer. Mr. Butler, in addition to being a very charming individual, is a very progressive type of Conservative which is more than I can say for some members of the Conservative party we see on the opposite side of the house. British Conservatives are really progressive both in national and international affairs and I am sorry I cannot say the same of all the Progressive Conservative party members who sit in this chamber. I was chaffing him about the attitude of the Tory party when I was a boy, a long time ago, about its antagonism to over-all social security and national health insurance. I said: Mr. Butler what is the attitude of the Conservative party now? This was shortly after the election in 1950 or 1951; I am not sure of the date. I asked him what the attitude of the party was then in view of its record with regard to the national health insurance and over-all security legislation which the Labour government had built up. He said: Mr. Herridge, the national health insurance plan and social security in Great Britain meets a need in a modern industrial society. It has served a great purpose and it is performing a great function in the nation. Its retention is demanded by the great majority of the British people. When you ask me to tell you what is the policy of the Conservative party with respect to national health insurance and social security, I simply put it in these words: It is the aim of the Conservative party in Great Britain to continue to improve it.

I offer that suggestion to the minister and his colleagues when they come to deal with legislation concerning old age pensions, unemployment insurance, family allowances and other pension legislation which is sought and which is considered desirable for the welfare of Canadians.

Having said that, I want to go off on a somewhat different tack from the one which is usually expected of an hon. member speaking on these estimates. I do it because of my work with a certain organization which has not received sufficient recognition from this chamber or from Canada generally. I refer to the Canadian welfare council of which I have been a member for some years. As a matter of fact, I have taken a good deal of interest in health insurance and welfare services for many years. I was a director of a hospital for 18 years and I have been on relief committees during the depression. In addition I have operated a sort of one-man welfare service on occasions.

On one occasion, in order that hon. members may be able to see the type of assistance which I was able to provide, may I say a young lady wrote to me asking for assistance in deciding which of two young men she should marry. It appears she was in love with both. I wrote to her saying that I did not wish to risk either her future or my own by advising her definitely in favour of one or the other of the candidates for her affection. But I did eventually advise her to observe a cooling off period of six months, at the end of which time I felt confident she would be in a better position to make up her own mind. As a matter of fact this was exactly what she did. I forgot all about this incident until I was on a visit to a town in my constituency, and as I was coming out of one of the public buildings a young lady rushed up to me and said: You are Mr. Herridge aren't you? I said I was, and she said to me: I want to thank you for the wonderful advice you gave me. Then she took me over to her car which was nearby and there in the back were four children.

That is just by way of example of the manner in which I sometimes function as an unofficial welfare officer. Perhaps I might tell the committee of another occasion on which I was able to be of assistance to people in difficulty with the welfare authorities. I can recall an occasion when a small farmer was being questioned by a relief officer. The man was in possession of a few cows—four or five cows, I believe—and a small quantity of hay. The relief officer was pressing the owner of the cows to explain why he did not sell the hay. I said: He uses the hay to feed the cows, and the officer said: Oh, I did not think of that.

But I see my time is slipping away, and I want to put on record the basic principles of the welfare council which I think are worth putting on the record:

> The responsibility of government to provide financial assistance to those lacking the basic necessities of life should be stated in legislation. Such legislation should, among other things, define eligibility for assistance and provide for the establishment of eligibility tests. This would aid in securing impartial administration and lessen the number of people who, even in circumstances of dire need, will not apply for assistance because in their minds there is a stigma attached to it.
> The legislation should make provision for the right of the applicant to appeal and, while it safeguards the interests of the person in need, should clarify the authority of the administration to give assistance.
> The assistance given should be sufficient to maintain the health and welfare of the recipients. If society does not provide this minimum, the results of its policy will be physical, mental and social breakdown which will in the long run be more costly to the community.

We in this group say amen to that statement of basic principles. Over the years the council has worked unobtrusively. It has had a devoted number of members, officers and governors interested in the problem and representing a cross section of Canada. The list of members for 1959-60 contains about a hundred names and I see the names of prominent industrialists, church people, people engaged in church work and social welfare work as well as well-known socialists, Liberals and Conservatives.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And well-known businessmen.

Mr. Herridge: Yes. I give credit to these people who have a social conscience and who recognize that this is a problem that must receive consideration, not only by governments but by organizations such as this and others throughout the country. Indeed, the problem has received consideration by farm organizations, women's organizations, labour organizations, other organizations and devoted individuals.

The Canadian welfare council published a policy statement adopted at the annual meeting held June 2, 1958. I understand the policy statement still stands although more emphasis was contained in the final recommendation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I referred to it this morning.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to know that for once I am following in the steps of the hon. member for Essex East instead of him following in mine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are walking along parallel roads.

Mr. Herridge: I hope I am walking on the road to over-all social security.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am walking on the road to Damascus.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. member suggests that he has just seen the light. Not everyone will agree with these recommendations but I think it is worth while to read them. They are:

1. The present universal flat rate pension commencing at age 70 should be retained.
2. Consideration should be given to arrangements which would enable certain classes of people in the 65-69 age group to qualify for the old age security pension.
3. Provision should be made for a continuing review and periodic consideration of adjustment in the amount of the universal flat rate pension on the basis of adequate statistical data relating to such important factors as minimum needs and levels of expenditure of older people.
4. Financial assistance should be made available by the provinces to all persons 65 and over who are in need, with federal sharing of benefit costs.
5. A joint parliamentary committee should be established to study the question of contributory wage-related old age benefits in addition to the universal pension and to make recommendations to parliament.
6. Whether or not a compulsory contributory old age pension program is developed, the dominion government should lay down appropriate standards for private pension plans in connection with which income tax deductions are granted.
7. There should be a federal public assistance act which would be, in effect, an extension of the Unemployment Assistance Act and which would enable the dominion government to share the aggregate costs to a province, and to the municipalities in a province, of providing financial assistance to all persons who are in need. The Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons' Allowances Act, and the Disabled Persons' Allowances Act should be incorporated as specific sections of this general public assistance act. The proposed act should, under these sections, provide the provinces with the option of continuing old age assistance, blind persons' allowances and disabled persons' allowances as separate programs, or of incorporating these categories in a generalized public assistance program with the same provisions respecting the sharing of costs as in the Unemployment Assistance Act.
8. The operation of all public assistance programs should be based upon sound and clearly defined standards, particularly with respect to amount of assistance, etc.
9. The basic assumptions underlying the Unemployment Insurance Act and the regulations pertaining to it should be reviewed in the light of experience and of changed conditions since the system was established and should, where necessary, be revised.
10. Unemployment insurance coverage should be extended to include as many of the uncovered groups as possible.
11. The ratio of benefits to earnings under the Unemployment Insurance Act should be increased.
12. The services provided by the unemployment insurance commission should be improved. Particular attention should be given to the need to strengthen the staff and administration, especially of the special placements section.
13. More attention should be given to the problem of long term unemployed and marginal workers who find difficulty in obtaining satisfactory placements in a competitive labour market, but who may have the capacity and potential to profit from training.
14. Adequate health services should be an integral part of public assistance programs and as such, should be eligible for federal sharing of costs.
15. Consideration should be given to the establishment of a cash sickness benefit program or programs.
16. A program of benefits without a needs test should be instituted for dependent survivors.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the business will be for tomorrow and Friday?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we shall carry on with estimates, Mr. Speaker. Responding to requests we will postpone taking the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources until later on. We will continue tomorrow with the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. Depending on the length of time we spend on that department we will follow with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of Justice. The estimates of the Department of Transport will be available for either Thursday or Friday.

I may have to ask the house for some slight change at the conclusion of the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare depending on various circumstances that may arise tomorrow. There will not be any change in the departments I have named but perhaps a change in the order.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the House, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

EXPORT CREDIT FACILITIES

Question No. 358—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has the government received representations from the Canadian exporters' association or any other body requesting that export credit facilities be provided for shorter periods and lower amounts?
2. If so, what action was the government requested to take?
3. What was the nature of the government's reply?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. Yes; the Canadian exporters' association submitted a brief to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in April, 1960. The brief contended that the Export Credits Insurance Corporation was unduly restrictive in not covering transactions under $250,000 on a medium term basis, but did not request that export credit facilities be provided for shorter periods.

2. Answered by 1.

3. At a meeting between officers of the Canadian Exporters' Association and the Department of Trade and Commerce, this item was withdrawn from the agenda at the request of the exporters' association.

On short term business the corporation insures transactions of any amount. With regard to medium term business the corporation has actually insured several transactions of less than $100,000.

2. Have any such contracts been awarded to Mr. Deragon during the past three years?
3. If so, where and for what specific work?

Answer by: Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. Yes; on April 25, 1960, but cancelled on June 16, 1960.

3. At St. Jean, P.Q., for window washing at the public building (Cote building), St. Jean.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 23, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVATE BILLS

REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN SPONSORSHIP OF BILL S-24

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the hon. member for Saguenay (Mr. LaRue) who regrets that he will be unavoidably absent from the house, I suggest that I be made the sponsor of Bill No. S-24, an act respecting the Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company. Accordingly I would request, with the leave of the house, that my name be substituted for the name of the hon. member in the records of the house as sponsor of the said bill.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to giving unanimous consent to the request of the hon. member for Davenport that his name be substituted as sponsor of this bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GRAIN

REFERENCE OF WHEAT BOARD AND GRAIN COMMISSION REPORTS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the annual report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year ended July 31, 1959, which was tabled on February 10, 1960, and the report of the board of grain commissioners for 1959, which was tabled on May 2, 1960, and the supplementary report of the Canadian wheat board on the 1958-59 pool accounts for wheat, oats and barley, tabled today, be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REPORTED COMPLAINTS BY CHINESE RESPECTING R.C.M.P. INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice, in view of the fact that he received a delegation from the Chinese community yesterday, whether he has any comment to make on that part of their brief which charged that some members of their community had been picked up by the R.C.M.P. and held incommunicado; that they had then been questioned by special agents from the Hong Kong police, and that they were being asked to submit to the indignity of completing questionnaire forms.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that allegation in the brief yesterday when the delegation was before the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and myself. I pointed out to the members of the delegation that one or two complaints with regard to this sort of alleged treatment had been received, had been carefully investigated and had been proved to be entirely without foundation, particularly with regard to intimidation and being held incommunicado.

May I point out that so far as the R.C.M. Police are concerned the investigation and the questioning are being carried out by a group of most reliable, highly trained and experienced members of the force. It is true, as has been known, that we are making use of the services of some members of the Hong Kong police force who have been sworn in as special members of the R.C.M. Police. They have also been carefully instructed in Canadian police methods and in the law regarding the carrying out of investigations and the questioning of individuals.

I have suggested that if in fact there should be any improper conduct it be brought to my attention for investigation; but I stress again that such allegations of this nature as have been brought to my attention have been proved to be without foundation.

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—IMPOSITION OF AGRICULTURAL IMPORT CONTROLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the press report this morning that Canada, along with Australia and New Zealand, will challenge the legality of certain import controls that the European common market have announced will be levied against agricultural products, and that this challenge will be made at the meeting of the general agreement on tariffs and trade in Geneva this fall. Would the minister say whether Canada is preparing such a protest, and would he enlighten the house as to why this is necessary since we have been given the assurance from time to time that the European common market was not being used to reduce or exclude imports from outside?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the problem of what may happen within the common market concerning its agricultural policy has been under study now for several years. I spoke on this subject at the GATT conference in 1957, and ever since then at the ministerial level and through official channels we have expressed our point of view concerning the agricultural policies which might be developed by the Six.

At the present time the representatives of Canada, the United States, Australia, New Zealand and Argentina are participating in a round of informal consultations with the common market countries regarding the agricultural policies of the European economic community. The Canadian delegation is headed by Mr. J. H. Warren, assistant deputy minister of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Representatives of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance are included in the delegation. That delegation will, in the course of consultation with representatives of the common market, once again express the point of view of Canada and urge that restrictions be not placed against our trade in agricultural products.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Would the minister not agree that this is now a matter of greater urgency in view of the fact that the tariff arrangements of the common market are to come into effect at the end of this year?

Mr. Churchill: It has been treated as a matter of great urgency all along, but whether those tariff arrangements will come into effect at the end of this year is a matter of question. It was proposed that they should come into effect on July 1 of this year but there was a postponement until January 1, 1961. Consultations will be continued in the interval.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Can the minister give the house an assurance that representations of the strongest kind will be made with regard to any suggestions that there should be a discriminatory tariff on salt fish?

Mr. Churchill: That will be taken into consideration, and every possible step will be taken to protect the marketing of Canadian products overseas.

[Mr. Argue.]

[Later:]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the answer the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave a little earlier may I ask whether he can report what headway, if any, is being made at meetings of the O.E.E.C. so that the disastrous consequences that might flow to the Canadian economy because of the actions of the inner six or outer seven may be averted? Have any meetings been held lately?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, a series of meetings have been held since January. Tentatively a date has been set later in July for a meeting of ministers to discuss the various problems. I deplore the use of the words "disastrous consequences" by the hon. member. I think we do not need to be that fearful. There is proper concern with regard to the development of these trading blocks, but I suggest that a more moderate phraseology would be acceptable.

Mr. Regier: Is the Canadian government making any move to associate Canada with either one or a number of these trading blocs?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance and I were at the conference in Paris in January that matter was taken into consideration. The meeting which may be called in July will have that as one of the subjects for discussion.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED WALKOUT OF REPRESENTATIVES OF TELEVISION PERFORMERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue, and ask him whether he is aware that representatives of 1,200 television performers walked out of contract negotiations after they had termed the offer of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation a ridiculous one. Has the minister any comment to make on this information which appears in this morning's Gazette, which I presume the minister has seen?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have seen the statement and I heard the news dispatch with respect to it this morning. I presume the hon. gentleman may have heard the C.B.C. news, too, in which the corporation denied that this was an unreasonable proposition and said it was prepared to discuss further arrangements at any time.

I have not been able to contact the president himself during the last two or three days because he has been busy at a meeting of directors in Ottawa. Thus I have had no formal or, indeed, any discussions with him, but I propose to get in touch with him tomorrow after the meeting of directors is over.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister not think it would be a good idea to have top management sitting in on these discussions, as has been requested and as was done last year, I believe, during the course of similar negotiations?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not dissent from the general principle, which seems to me a fair proposal. However, the C.B.C. has acquired a lot of experience in these matters in the last year or so and I hope the corporation knows how to deal with the situation. But I will discuss that matter with the president tomorrow.

TRANSPORT

LAKE WILLIAMS, N.S.—INQUIRY AS TO DROWNING INCIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister say what steps are being taken to avert tragedies similar to that which recently occurred on lake Williams, Nova Scotia, when a boy was drowned because a pilot, taking off from the lake, failed to notice the sailboat in which he was a passenger?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I shall be very glad to look into that matter.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am now in a position to give an answer to the question asked me this morning by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception. Under the air regulations certain regulatory procedures aimed at guarding against mishaps of this nature are prescribed. We have not yet received from our district officials the formal report with respect to the tragedy referred to by the hon. member.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO VISIT BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Finance whether the report is correct that he is contemplating a visit to Newfoundland on public business, and whether he can inform the house the nature of the public business he proposes to deal with there?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I have accepted a very kind invitation from the board of trade of the city of St. John's to address them at a meeting in that fair city next Wednesday evening. I hope, if the business of the house permits, to lengthen my stay in the province by perhaps another day or two.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would consider being very, very careful about the choice and use of his statistics on that occasion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The minister, Mr. Speaker, tries according to his lights to be very careful about his choice not only of statistics but of other things; and I can give to the hon. member the assurance that I know he so much wants, that in anything I do or say in Newfoundland I will not be placing any reliance on the Martin bureau of statistics.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a supplementary question. On his way to Newfoundland will the hon. gentleman be stopping in the city of Quebec?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is intended to be a direct flight, but I can assure the hon. member that under any circumstances it is always a pleasure to visit Quebec.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO EMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister bring the house up to date on the employment situation in the province of Quebec?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will be watching with interest from now on what is done in that respect in that province.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the minister if the several cabinet ministers from Quebec have applied for unemployment insurance?

Inquiries of the Ministry

ELLIOT LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the committee considering federal assistance to the uranium communities in Canada will be in a position to report?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I hope very soon, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO NEWSPAPER REPORT RESPECTING NATIONAL ECONOMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister any comment to make on a report which appeared on the financial page of today's Globe and Mail to the effect that Canada's economy is falling short of earlier expectations?

Mr. Speaker: That question sounds like an invitation for a half hour dissertation.

Mr. Chevrier: Your Honour certainly knows the habits of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister could answer yes or no I could perhaps permit the question.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I answered "yes" I should go on for at least half an hour to complete the answer.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FARNHAM, QUE.—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR BILINGUAL SIGNS AT CAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Egan Chambers (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, the hon. member for Outremont-St. Jean (Mr. Bourque) put a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) concerning a bill-board erected at the entrance of the cadet camp at Farnham. That question was based on a letter published in Le Devoir of June 20, 1960, under the assumed name of "Passant" (passer-by). The correspondent complained that the inscription on the bill-board erected outside the Farnham camp reading:

(Text):

Department of National Defence Canadian Army Camp Farnham.

(Translation):

—was in English only.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The hon. member asked if the department intended to erect a similar bill board carrying a message in French. Mr. Speaker, the answer is simply no, for the good reason that there is already a similar sign in French on the camp grounds. I am forced to the conclusion that the writer of the letter must have gone by a little too fast since the bill board bearing the French message faces toward Montreal, while the one carrying the English message faces toward Farnham.

PUBLIC WORKS

BLIND RIVER, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF DOCK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether a decision has been taken by the government to construct a dock in the Blind River area in order to facilitate the industrial development of that district.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, that and many other suggestions and recommendations are being considered by the Department of Public Works.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA FOR JULY MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, arising out of requests by the premier of Ontario and the premier of Manitoba for more generous federal-provincial financial arrangements and the reported request of the Ontario association of municipalities for the federal government to establish a bank loan service. My question is, at the next federal-provincial conference is it the intention of the federal government to submit to that conference a series of proposals, or will the conference be more along the lines of general discussion?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the determination as to the course to be taken by the conference will of course be made between now and the opening of the conference.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BIRTHDAY CONGRATULATIONS TO HON. MEMBERS FOR ESSEX EAST AND BONAVISTA-TWILLINGATE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I speak on another matter. It is unusual that two hon. members should have a birthday on the same day, as have the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I on behalf of the official opposition thank the Prime Minister for his kindly reference to these two bright young members of our party.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I associate the good wishes of the C.C.F. with those offered by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition to these very distinguished members, who sometimes act as the delinquent twins of the Liberal party.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

242. Departmental administration, $1,641,729.

The Chairman: Department of National Health and Welfare, item No. 242. This item will be found on page 50 of the blue book and the details on page 331.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): It is my intention, Mr. Chairman, to speak for only a few minutes, having had the pleasure of acting as chairman of the committee to which the minister made some detailed reference. May I therefore, at the outset, join with many hon. members of the house who have congratulated the minister on the manner in which he has conducted the affairs of his department during the past year; and in particular may I thank him on behalf of the committee for the great co-operation which he and his departmental officials extended to us during several weeks of intensified hearings.

First of all I should like to say that I recognize that I have no authority to make these comments as chairman of the committee and that these remarks are not intended in any way to serve as a rebuttal to the statement of the minister. However, having had the responsibility of compiling the report I thought I would make one or two references to the statement, perhaps by way of explanation or clarification of the references contained in the report of the estimates committee. In so doing, while the minister has already indicated the great degree of unanimity in the views of the committee and his departmental officials, I hope I can illustrate that we are even closer together in our views than his statement might have indicated at first glance.

In his opening remarks the minister made reference to our conclusions with respect to the hospital bed shortage in Canada. If I may quote from his statement as found at page 5246 of Hansard, he said in part:

> I can assure the committee that the department is also concerned with this matter. At the same time we have serious doubts as to whether the suggested immediate review on a nation-wide basis of the availability of beds in relation to demand would be the most effective approach.

He then went on to point out the responsibility in the first instance of the provinces in dealing with this matter, with which, of course, the committee agrees. The explanation that I would make to him and to his department officials is just this. Throughout the entire report we were very conscious of the thin line separating the responsibility of the federal government and that of the provinces. We realized that in many of our recommendations we were indeed treading on dangerous ground having regard to the impropriety of making recommendations affecting the responsibility of the provinces. But having said that, we should also state that we felt that even though the responsibility in the first instance lies with the provincial authority, this fact does not relieve the federal government from some responsibility as well. If I may, I should just like to make reference to the recommendation itself with regard to the hospital bed shortage in Canada:

> ... the committee recommends that the relationship between the three levels of government be examined—first, to determine the seriousness of the hospital bed shortage in Canada by instituting an immediate review of availability in relation to demand;
> Second, by discussing the results of this survey with provincial and municipal authorities so that any future critical bed shortage may be averted;
> Third, in co-operation with the provinces, by attacking the problem of chronic bed care, with a view to providing increased accommodations for the more critically ill patients.

In all three references we acknowledge the responsibility of the provinces. We also accept the view of the minister that every effort should be made by the provinces to determine what is their problem with respect to the hospital bed shortage. However, it seems important to us, if only to standardize the review in order to determine what is the seriousness of the problem, that this could best be initiated by the federal authority. This does not, Mr. Chairman, in any way offend the rights of the provinces. It merely assists them, and of course the federal government, in coming to some conclusion on the question of how we can resolve this serious problem.

I would point out that there is not a city in Canada that is not concerned with the problem. That being the case, we concluded that the federal government as such could do a service to the provincial and municipal authorities by assisting in a review to ascertain how great the problem actually is.

The next point to which the minister took some exception dealt with the question of closed hospitals. In fact he said that his most serious exception to our recommendation was what he described as a basic disagreement with the implication of the committee's comment relating to this problem. I do not intend to argue the point at all, but merely point out that in the final paragraph of his statement dealing with this problem he said this, as reported at page 5247 of Hansard:

> While I cannot therefore agree with such an action—

The action of the committee, or the recommendation of the committee.

> —I would emphasize that the department does have a definite interest in this matter, and we have expressed this interest through what we consider to be the proper channels—

From this I think it is right to conclude that the committee had brought to the attention of the minister the problem of which he has been well aware, and that we disagree only on the method by which this problem should be approached, not on the existence of the problem.

There are a number of other items on which the committee and the department, through the minister, have expressed general agreement. The item with respect to civil defence and the emergency measures organization perhaps is one obvious example. The minister rightly points out that some of the recommendations of the committee are outside the jurisdiction or the authority of his department, and that he has referred those recommendations to the departments that are concerned with them.

He then went on to point out the progress that has been made on health studies with respect to his own department. We of the committee, of course, were happy to learn of this progress and I congratulate him on it, but perhaps the one point I would make is this. He discussed the amount of literature or pamphlets which are currently being printed or are under review. I would ask permission to draw to his attention the one reference we made in this respect, and which reads as follows:

> (d) Information in either pamphlet form or through visual aids should be reassessed so that in the event of a national emergency, instructions will be expressed in concise and simple terms, thus avoiding confusion by too many complicated orders.

In other words the committee, or at least this member of the committee, expressed the view that the essential thing is to have the population realize, in the event of an emergency, what action they must take immediately. We must avoid any risk or any danger of overcomplicating the problem by overwhelming our people with too much information or too many pamphlets.

The next reference which the minister made deals with the comment in our report concerning the difficult problem of publications within his department. He pointed out that these publications have provided a very useful service, and in that the committee concurs. He went on to state that provincial authorities have, in the first instance, requested these publications, and of course, this is true. I would point out however that when the cost is so small to the province it is perhaps understandable that these publications would be requested in great volume. We also acknowledge, sir, that in many instances these publications have been extremely useful, and it would undoubtedly cause some distress if they were all eliminated.

What we do ask, though, is whether the department should not review an item which represents something in the vicinity of $400,000 to the government and which involves a staff of 33 people, to ascertain whether, in relation to the cost, the department and the country are receiving fair value for this expenditure. I feel this is a sound argument. The minister agreed, as the report points out, that this comes under the heading of information. Here again I am happy to note that the minister intends to keep this matter constantly under review.

In his reference to the efficiency evaluation of the department the minister rightly took credit for the fact that the committee were not able to find any breakdown in operational efficiency of the department. He then went on to make reference, as the committee did in its report, to the number of surveys and reviews which have been made by the methods division of the civil service commission. Our whole approach in making our recommendations assumed that further reviews would be made by this organization. We have looked at the type of surveys that have been made by the methods division in the past, and in each instance, taking a particular segment of the department, there is no evidence to suggest that this is in any way related from one department or one division of the department to another.

We suggest, therefore, and I think rightly so, a survey of a nature which would make an over-all estimation of such problems as overlapping of responsibility. Such a survey would no doubt be useful. We need not remind the committee, Mr. Chairman, that the department under review is one of the largest in terms of the expenditure of money, spending something over a billion dollars. This need not be construed as meaning that the department is necessarily not inefficient, but quite the reverse. It means that if it is to maintain its present status these reviews from time to time could maintain its operational efficiency and therefore would be extremely useful to the minister. Here again I am happy, Mr. Chairman, that the minister concurs when he suggests that he has some sympathy for this recommendation as well.

I finally come, sir, to the one reference I would make outside of the minister's report in which he lumped together a number of recommendations and categorized them as part of government policy. Of course the committee recognizes them as such. There is one in particular however, the blind pension, payable to our handicapped in Canada to which I should like to refer.

We argue, sir, that not just from a humanitarian point of view but also from a basis of a practical policy our recommendation to eliminate the means test makes good sense and has validity. If this action were taken, this group of people who suffer such an unusual handicap would be encouraged to rehabilitate themselves to a greater degree and thus conceivably make of themselves even more useful citizens. We hope, therefore, that the government, the minister and his colleagues, will give special consideration to this recommendation.

I do not propose to go on, sir. I wanted to make reference only to those items, as I said, by way of explanation and not by way of disagreement. Perhaps it is significant to note, Mr. Chairman, that this department was under review by the committee during some 18 meetings, and on examination of its activities has produced what we hope will prove to be constructive suggestions rather than anything in the nature of serious criticism of the functions or operations of this department. As a private member of that committee I would be one of the first to congratulate the minister and his officials.

On this note, sir, I shall resume my seat and thank the minister again for his reference to the committee's work. We sincerely trust that in the not too distant future he and his officials will again come before the estimates committee.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, rarely do I speak at such length that my remarks have to be continued in the next edition of Hansard. However, I am interested in this question, and I do wish to complete bringing to the attention of the committee the recommendations contained in the policy statement of the Canadian welfare council. Last evening when I was required to take my seat because my 30 minutes had expired, coincidental with the arrival of six o'clock, I had dealt with all the recommendations up to No. 16. I now wish to continue the recommendations. I quote:

17. The dominion government should create in the Department of National Health and Welfare consultative and technical services in welfare, analogous to those now available in health. These services should include such technical advice as may be required in, for example, statistical reporting, and the professional consultation that may be useful in such matters as the care of the aged, problems of social welfare administration and staff training.

18. The dominion government should contribute substantially to the cost of professional and in-service training required in the administration of social security programs.

I think that is a very good suggestion indeed.

19. The dominion government should make funds available for demonstration and research projects, in the causes and prevention of dependency, social and economic rehabilitation, and similar problems.

We see the need for that to an increasing extent in the various communities in Canada.

20. Machinery should be devised to ensure regular communication among provinces, and between provinces and the dominion government, on all welfare matters of common interest.

I might say at this stage that I am very pleased to note that they always refer to the federal government as the "dominion" government.

21. The dominion government should establish a broadly representative body of competent persons, the purpose of which would be to keep under constant review all aspects of Canada's social security program and to advise on changes and improvements that may from time to time be desirable.

I think that really does provide for co-operation and an exchange of competent persons across the country in a continuing review of the changing circumstances, the changing needs, and the need for changed programs to meet those needs.

Then the final recommendation, No. 22, reads as follows, and I am very interested in this one:

22. The dominion government should appoint a royal commission to study all aspects of social security for which it has a direct or indirect responsibility and more particularly to make recommendations with respect to:

a. Gaps in existing provisions and priorities in dealing with unmet needs.

b. The appropriate methods of providing social security benefits, whether by social insurance, statutory social welfare payments, public assistance, or by a combination of these methods, in respect of old age, unemployment, sickness, disability, death of the breadwinner and the cost of child rearing.

c. The development of a more integrated system of social security.

d. Federal-provincial co-operation in the field of social security.

e. The negotiation of reciprocal agreements with other countries in order to provide social security coverage on an equitable basis for immigrants to Canada and for Canadians residing in other countries.

f. Other questions having to do with the design, content and administration of Canada's total social security system.

The council suggests that in the selection of members of the royal commission account should be taken of cultural differences, and of the need to include people with practical and theoretical knowledge of social welfare and social security.

I think the final paragraph is well worth reading into the record:

The appointment of a royal commission would ensure that these problems receive the thoughtful consideration they require. It would also provide an opportunity for interested and informed groups to appear and present their views. Only through such careful study and wide consultation can we be certain that the kind of design and structure toward which we move in our social security system will satisfy both the needs and wishes of the Canadian people and take full account of the realities of Canadian life.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sure all hon. members of this house receive correspondence almost daily which indicates the need for an over-all social security system. I have received a letter just this morning from a lady in my constituency whose husband has been unemployed for six months, who has done his best to obtain employment and who has exhausted his unemployment insurance benefits. The provincial authorities refuse to place him on social assistance, and he is left stranded without any source of income or any money even to travel around and try to locate employment. That type of situation arises because of the lack of an over-all social security system which dovetails the policies of the federal and provincial governments.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I think all of us recognize this need and that it is obvious, but the need requires immediate attention. Without doubt we have the financial capacity to meet the cost of an over-all social security system. We have the administrative staff and the medical personnel. We have the technical and other staff both in the federal and provincial governments as well as in other institutions; competent, talented people capable of administering such a program. We do not go into this in darkness, because we have the experience, although the circumstances are somewhat different, of Great Britain and other western European countries to guide us. We also have the information as to the attempts in this direction in the United States; and best of all in Canada we have the experience of that pioneering province in social security, Saskatchewan, which has now received a mandate from the people of Saskatchewan to institute a provincial health insurance scheme. No doubt within a few months we will have valuable experience as a result of the institution of that scheme.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that in the immediate future this government should attend to the urgent needs of the people, particularly with regard to old age security, old age assistance and other forms of relief which require attention, by means of amendments to social security legislation. At the same time the government should accept this recommendation of the Canadian welfare council for the appointment of a royal commission which would have the opportunity to do the things mentioned in their policy statement; which would get the views of provincial governments, municipal organizations and other organizations and interested people across Canada, and which would have not vague terms of reference but terms of reference that would authorize the royal commission to make recommendations for an over-all social security plan to meet the needs of the Canadian people.

(Translation):

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Chairman, the standing committee on estimates, of which I have the honour to be a member, convened for a few days to look over all sections of the important Department of National Health and Welfare. First of all, I must say that our task was greatly facilitated by the full co-operation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) and all the department's officials. As a matter of fact, the minister, after stating that he was very happy to take part in the discussion of his department's affairs by the members of our committee, supplied a detailed report which enabled us to have a good general idea of the work to be accomplished.

According to the minister, the total estimates of his department for the year 1960-1961 would amount to $1,439,240,729, which means an increase of more than $38 million over those of the previous year. One reason for that increase can largely be attributed to payments intended under the unemployment insurance scheme, in which the province of Quebec has decided to participate in the future. At this stage, I am very happy to point out that wise decision on the part of the legislators in my province.

In future, many unemployed who are unable to work because of their age or physical handicaps will therefore receive assistance of which they had been deprived under the Disabled Persons Act. Indeed, under that legislation, assistance was available to only fully disabled people who had no hope of recovering.

Among the many items provided in the significant budget of $1,439,000,000 submitted for the Department of National Health and Welfare, there are three main ones which almost cover the whole amount. I referred to the sum of $599 million required for the Old Age Security Act, the sum of $508 million required to enforce the Family Allowances Act, and finally the sum of $167 million to pay the federal government's contribution under the provincial Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act.

May I be allowed, as a doctor, to make a few comments on that last item.

As mentioned by the minister in his general report on the operations of his department, the implementation of a federal-provincial contributory hospital insurance program is just beginning. However, the budget had to increase more than twofold yearly, since 1958, to such an extent that the estimated budget for 1958, that is, $55 million, will reach $162 million for 1960-61.

With regard to those estimates, the province of Quebec remains the only province not included in that program. That abstention on the part of my province may have seemed unusual to the other nine. In this connection, I have heard here, several remarks, often commented upon in our newspapers, and which were all of a political character.

I myself, during the last session, referred here in the house to some remarks I personally heard from the late Mr. Duplessis on that matter. "Tell your colleagues in Ottawa", he told me, "that I am not opposed, in principle, to hospital insurance, but we have to be wise and honest. Wisdom compels us to see how the other provinces will fare in this field, and to benefit from their experience, favourable or unfavourable; honesty compels us to avoid establishing a hospital insurance plan before we have a sufficient number of beds to meet the needs. Nobody has the right, he added, to open a drugstore if he has not the necessary drugs to put on his shelves".

Consequently, the policy of building hospitals of all sizes and for special requirements has received a new impetus in the province of Quebec, these last few years. While there were 9,000 beds in 1944, there were 27,000 in 1959.

May I be allowed to point out, incidentally, that several large hospital construction projects are still under way this year. I would refer in particular to Savard Park hospital located in my constituency, so often referred to here and in the press, as an example of injustice towards Indians and Eskimos. That hospital will be the first of its kind to be placed at the disposal of family doctors who, until now, had the greatest difficulty in getting their patients admitted and treating them there in general hospitals.

Our province will therefore have its hospital insurance plan this year. A commission has been appointed by the Barrette government—and I hope it will continue its job under a new government—to consider a particular plan appropriate to the needs of a province that is different from the others—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Lesage made a statement on that subject.

Mr. Bissonnette: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The new premier made a statement on that subject.

Mr. Bissonnette: Yes, but we shall have to wait and see whether his statements will be translated into action.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You can be sure there will be no delay. Mr. Lesage is a man of action, as yesterday's results show.

Mr. Bissonnette: We hope so.

An hon. Member: Time will tell.

Mr. Bissonnette: —a plan, as I was saying, that will answer the needs of a province that is different from the others, especially in the field of hospitalization. In fact, Quebec hospitals are mainly owned by religious orders and this will have to be taken into account.

Besides, as I said earlier, action on this plan having been delayed, the experience of the other provinces will allow to make up for lost time and to avoid many mistakes. So, in due course, we will have our hospital insurance plan, as my hon. friend from Essex East (Mr. Martin) has stated, and as I personally hope. This plan has become necessary because of the prohibitive costs of hospital care especially for people of average income. The quality and improvements of care, the ever increasing cost of construction, development, equipment, drugs, food, wages, etc., are responsible for this situation and the whole medical profession has recognized the need for such a plan.

But we must make a distinction. If the medical profession is in favour of hospital insurance, I hope they will always oppose state health insurance. The doctor is, by reason of his professional character—and here I express my own view as a doctor—

Mr. Habel: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bissonnette: By reason of his professional character, the doctor can never become a civil servant.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Bissonnette: Unlike the latter, he must retain his freedom toward his patient, who after all is his employer, while the patient must remain free to choose his own physician. Unlike a civil servant, he has to work devotedly round the clock in his fight against disease and death, which are unpredictable and have no time limit.

I hope none of you will ever suffer a heart attack at two o'clock in the morning, at the very moment when the general practitioner or specialist, having become a civil servant, could refuse to get out of bed and answer your call until nine in the morning. A British doctor whom I met in Geneva told me he had had to wait three weeks for his turn to get a tooth pulled by the civil servant dentist, who inevitably closed his office at 5 p.m. and reopened only at 9 a.m. That just shows the drop in professional standards under state medicine. And what about a doctor's ambition to improve himself, to study and to devote himself, when he knows that his statute as a civil servant will be based less on his efficiency in treating the sick, than on his readiness to fill departmental forms. Doctors have not deserved to be drafted.

There are practically no citizens in the world except doctors who can claim to devote 18 to 20 hours a day of their time to their fellow men, and at a rate of remuneration reduced to 60 per cent in the case of the poor. The charges of greed recently levelled by a provincial premier at the doctors of his province were therefore baseless, and were just intended to justify his state medicine scheme. Under such legislation, doctors will become slaves to the state and the sick.

I therefore solemnly urge my colleagues in the noble medical profession never to lend themselves to the schemes of politicians of any colour or stripe. They will use every device they can think of to get their program through at the expense of the medical profession, and at the expense of something we deeply cherish, the nobility of our mission, with all the freedom of action it involves.

I am pleased to mention here the position taken by the Canadian medical association, particularly by its Quebec section, at its last meeting a month ago. It passed a resolution in support of hospital insurance, but came out squarely against state health insurance. It will therefore support every form of free, non-compulsory health insurance, to which governments may perhaps contribute in favour of the poor and of the small wage earner, but it will never be persuaded to accept compulsory state insurance. It will not prostitute that noble profession, nor betray its ideals for political ends.

Then too, doctors should remain free, and their devotion should never be drafted, mainly to gratify the ambitions of politicians or socialist extremists.

I therefore urge the government never to agree to share in the costs of a policy of drafting the members of the medical profession into a state-run plan whose standards will certainly be lower.

Mr. Chairman, a third item of the estimate, which it is also very important to point out, is the one dealing with preventive medicine and general health grants. The amount included in the estimates in this regard, for 1960-61, is $63,591,941. This shows the vital role of preventive medicine and of measures to preserve our health and to prolong human life.

A learned physician and physiologist stated recently that man is built to live a hundred years or more. Hardly 30 years ago the average life expectancy was 40 years, but today it is between 68 and 70. We are therefore well on the way towards the objective suggested by our learned physiologists.

Before concluding, I want to add a few words about the very noble and honourable mission that our government entrusted to me in May 1959, when I was appointed as an observer at the 12th annual meeting of the World Health Organization in Geneva. Perhaps I should have reported immediately upon my return, but the session was drawing to a close and I have had no other opportunity until now.

I owe this honour especially to the minister of health and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and I take this opportunity to thank them publicly and cordially.

Our delegation was headed by Dr. G. D. W. Cameron, deputy minister of national health, a man of prestige and wide experience. Deputy head of the delegation was Mr. Wershop, ambassador and permanent representative at the European bureau of the United Nations.

As acting delegates we had such distinguished men as Dr. C. F. Amyot, deputy minister of health for British Columbia, Dr. D. B. Layton and Dr. Percy Moore, both senior officials of the department of national health, and Mr. R. X. Jay, first permanent secretary at the European bureau of the United Nations. I was therefore happy, Mr. Chairman, to be appointed as an observer with such a team, in so important a delegation.

Mr. Chairman, may I summarize now some of my impressions. This organization, a United Nations agency, is in my opinion, one of its most important ones. Because of its objective, the health and welfare of men all over the world, it is indeed the best peace organization, the most beneficent and humane one, without which peace cannot be achieved.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, during all those meetings there were no bitter discussions, none of those intractable obstinacies which, unfortunately, so often mar meetings at United Nations headquarters.

At the opening sitting, after the roll-call and the examination of delegates' credentials, Sir John Charles, chief medical officer of the department of health in Great Britain was elected chairman for the term 1959-60. Delegates from 87 regular member countries and from three associate member countries were in attendance. It was therefore a large gathering. Some representations were made by representatives of the communist bloc against the barring of continental China from a regular membership in the World Health Organization; but there were no attempts at sabotage. I might add that representatives from communist countries missed no opportunity for propaganda whenever the occasion offered.

Mr. Chairman, with regard to the barring of communist China, I daresay, speaking as a physician of course, that I found that discussion rather saddening. Indeed, when you consider the World Health Organization on a strictly medical and humanitarian basis, something comparable to the international Red Cross, it is distasteful to a doctor to think that 600 million human beings in communist China are being kept out of that essentially humanitarian organization, prevented from sharing in its great advantages, and of making their own scientific and material contributions to it.

On the other hand, if you look upon the World Health Organization as a United Nations agency, there was obviously no point in discussing the problem, at least until such time as communist China is admitted into the United Nations family.

I said a moment ago, that the WHO is doing highly humanitarian work which is needed throughout the world. I would even go further, Mr. Chairman and say that this indispensable work is being carried on particularly in underdeveloped countries. It is all to Canada's credit and honour, Mr. Chairman, to have been one of the first countries to join the WHO in 1946. Dr. Brock Chisholm, then Canadian deputy minister of health, was its first director general. It is therefore obvious that, since the start, our country has joined with the great powers in financing and promoting the establishment and growth of that peaceful organization. Its procedure is similar to that of a parliament. There is, first of all, a general meeting of all delegates to discuss the program of the session and to form committees on the various matters to be discussed; committees on health problems, on financial and legal administration, on research, on resolutions, the committee on estimates, et cetera.

The general assembly meets when necessary and is supplied with the reports of the various committees, to discuss and pass them.

Mr. Chairman, those committees discussed many of these matters, particularly the main causes of the appalling death rate in underdeveloped countries and ways to reduce it. Among the leading causes of heavy mortality are such infectious diseases as malaria. typhoid fever, smallpox, tuberculosis, leprosy and venereal diseases. However the problem of drinking water transcends all others. Water, almost to the same degree as air, is necessary to life.

My deskmate at the meeting, a delegate physician from Pakistan, stated that the average life expectancy in his country is 28 years and that 50 per cent of deaths were due to the lack of drinkable water. The water problem became the general theme because of the great number of countries which were deeply affected and interested by it.

A delegate from France even suggested that WHO should concentrate solely on the study and solution of this single problem, that of polluted water—which incidentally would have helped solve many other health problems, instead of trying to tackle all problems at once, because, he said, quoting an old French proverb: "Grasp all, lose all". In other words, he who tries to solve everything at once solves nothing.

Therefore, before Mr. Khrushchev offers to settle the water problem, there is urgent need for all the favoured nations in the world to take the necessary steps, at least, to supply good drinking water to the hundreds of millions of human beings who are dying of hunger, thirst and infectious diseases in underdeveloped countries. Is it believable that two persons out of three in the world do not have enough to eat, nor enough to drink, except infected water?

Very serious studies have been undertaken about the steps to be taken to control contagious diseases which are so widespread and dangerous among tropical peoples. But money will always remain the sinews of war.

The assembly expressed regret that its budget was inadequate to achieve its dedicated program of controlling malaria. To obtain additional funds it called upon governments, industries and all private organizations that are in a position to contribute towards the control of that plague, malaria, and to press further, if possible, the implementation of a health program throughout the world.

Reference was made also to special funds designed to organize research and to direct it along the efforts being made by the organization to raise health and welfare standards throughout the world. The sum of $500,000 was therefore added to the budget for research purposes.

The assembly also decided to have the necessary plans prepared for the construction of a special headquarters building for the permanent staff, and for carrying on of all the activities of the World Health Organization. The space it has occupied until now at United Nations headquarters has become inadequate. The federal government of Switzerland, and of the canton of Geneva in particular, have offered the land and their assistance in preparing the financial operation, totalling close to $7 million, involved in that construction.

Before closing its session, the World Health Organization approved a budget of $16,918,700 for the implementation of the 1960 program, Canada's contribution being fixed at $483,000.

In conclusion, I may state as an observer that it is altogether impossible to evaluate the work carried out by the World Health Organization. This work is absolutely necessary and essentially humanitarian, as I said earlier, since its purpose is the health and welfare of human beings. It is a work likely to bring peace because its object is to fight thirst, hunger, disease and death. World peace is unattainable in the presence of extreme poverty. So far, peace secured by armaments has always proved a failure. Physical and moral misery has always been the spark that ignites war.

You may be sure that our annual contribution of $500,000 to the World Health Organization fund is an investment much more likely to bring peace than the hundreds of millions of dollars that we spend each year on armaments whose effectiveness in establishing peace is not only often questionable but actually nil.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, before commencing my remarks I wish to express appreciation of the excellent address given by the hon. member for Quebec West. Those who have known him over the last number of years realize that he is one of the men most devoted to the principles of the medical profession of which he is so distinguished a member.

Having paid my respects to the hon. member, I wish now to comment on what he said. Among other things he seemed to be apprehensive about what is happening to prepaid medical care plans. This group has always advocated prepaid medical care for the Canadian people, but I believe I can honestly say that none of us has ever advocated state medicine. If we decide on how we are to pay for medical care, while at the same time leaving to the doctors the pursuance of their profession as they deem wise and advisable, we feel that is far removed from what is commonly understood to be state medicine.

I do not think our group has ever been an advocate of state medicine. All we advocate is that when we are well we pay for the days when we shall be ill, and that we all hold one another's hands so that all of us can receive the finest care that the medical profession has to offer, regardless of the financial ability of the particular individual at that time.

The hon. member may wish to make a distinction between voluntary prepaid medical care plans and prepaid medical plans operated by various levels of government. I believe that is a minor detail. Our main contention is that it is only when it comes to the matter of payment that we ought to co-operate one with another so that no one shall go without necessary medical care. I believe that in the long run it will even be of assistance to those engaged in the medical profession; because I cannot understand how a doctor, having to worry about income, can more ably attend to his work as a doctor, namely the healing of the ill, than if he does not have to worry about who is to pay the bill.

At this time I wish to express my appreciation to the minister for the courtesy and kindness that have been extended to me and, I have noted, also to other members in the opposition within the past year. I believe that all of us in this house, regardless of where we sit, are vitally interested in the work being done by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I believe the health of our people ought to supersede political interests at all times. Never, to my notice at least, has the minister replied to inquiries with a political ax hidden behind his back. He has never done that when we have asked him for information. I think that attitude is commendable.

This house is exceptional in that it contains an unusually large representation from the medical profession. However, the minister has, as had other ministers before him, made it very clear that to be vitally interested in and to have some knowledge of the work of this department and the needs of the department do not necessarily mean that one has to be a medical man. The minister has shown that an accountant can be as greatly interested in this work as can a lawyer coming out of the Windsor area.

I wish to offer a number of recommendations. My initial recommendation has to do with our whole approach to the administration of social security in this country. We have veterans pensions, family allowances, widows' allowances, mothers' allowances, pensions for the disabled, pensions for the aged, pensions for this and pensions for that, pensions for almost every other thing, each with its own administrative arrangements. I feel there is a reason for this. We have obtained what little social security we have in Canada by concessions here and concessions there, always from unwilling governments, and some have been given at election time. However, that may be a political reality or even a need in Canada.

Now that we have this vast array, this vast conglomeration of welfare and pension plans in Canada, I think the time is overripe when we should begin to think in terms of consolidation; because, as every hon. member knows, we continually meet individual Canadians who, despite our terrific array of plans designed to help the unfortunate in Canada, are left out, who do not get into any of the many existing plans and schemes. I think if we agree to broaden the base and accept the fundamental concept that no one in Canada shall have to do without the basic needs in health, education, food, clothing and housing, then we should begin a process of consolidation. I see no real, valid reason why there must be a separate plan to pay pensions to the handicapped as apart from pensions to the blind, for instance. After all, even the blind are in receipt of pensions because they are handicapped, yet we have two different administrations with all the costly overhead. And, as I said before, because of this terrifically complicated machinery, for each little new need we set up a whole new administration with its overhead; yet it fails to meet the needs of ever so many individuals as each hon. member, I am sure, has experienced.

At an early date the government might well begin an investigation in to whether it is not possible to combine most if not all of our social security measures into one social security organization. This is in existence in those countries of the world where the people did not get their social security measures by bits and pieces, where they received it all at one time. In those countries we do find this over-all administration. Here in Canada we have not arrived at our social security measures in that way; therefore we have built up organization after organization after organization without having one over-all machine adequate to meet the needs of each and every individual.

I noted what the minister had to say in regard to hospital care for those who are chronically ill. I know he has given this matter a great deal of consideration over the past year, and that some research is under way. However, I noticed the minister's great hesitation in imposing any care for chronic hospital cases upon any provincial government. I can understand why he takes that attitude, because according to the British North America Act fundamental health care is under the jurisdiction of the provinces. However, when the minister and the federal government are under attack for this lack of action in certain respects, and that attack emanates from a provincial government, then I do believe the minister would be completely within his rights if he replied to such attacks without hesitation.

What I have reference to is that at the last meeting of the British Columbia legislature the minister of health of that province explained that the reason the people of British Columbia could not enjoy chronic hospital care was that the federal government refused to make grants for the building of chronic hospitals or to pay any of the cost of the maintenance of chronic hospitals. The health minister of the province of British Columbia knows that his contention at that time was not in accordance with what the situation really is, because for many long years now Ottawa has always been ready to share on a per bed basis the cost of building hospitals designed to care for the chronically ill. I believe that right now the federal government is prepared to contribute to a program in any part of Canada for building hospitals for the chronically ill an amount of $2,000 per bed. In spite of this the minister of health in British Columbia wants to lead the people of that province to believe that Ottawa is responsible for the fact there is not any real chronic hospital care in that province.

The federal government since the introduction of the national health insurance plan has gone a little farther and, as I understand our national health insurance plan, if a province now institutes a hospital insurance plan for those within the province who need hospital care because of chronic ailments, the federal government is prepared to share, to the same extent that it shares in other hospital care matters, in the cost of such care. The federal government, therefore, by legislation is prepared to contribute toward the construction of hospitals to look after the chronically ill, and also for the maintenance of such hospitals. The British Columbia minister, I rather suspect for political purposes or in order to avoid having to face this issue as a result of the demands of British Columbia residents, unjustly attacks the federal government. I believe the federal government should immediately reply to that attack, and reply in such a manner that the residents of that province become aware of that reply.

We in British Columbia are interested in seeing that the chronically ill are given adequate hospital care at the earliest possible moment. As the minister knows quite well, our hospital insurance plan in British Columbia provides only for hospital care so long as the doctor certifies the patient as acute. Immediately the patient passes the acute stage—this applies especially to our elderly people—and the doctor declares the patient to be chronically ill, then you have to leave the hospital or pay roughly $18 a day to the hospital, or you have to go to a nursing home. If you want to enter a nursing home the rates are $185 a month and up, and the waiting list is as long as your arm. If you have not got that amount of money you have to either impose on some relative, if you have one who is able to look after you, or you have to go to one of the many disreputable nursing homes or so-called rest homes that will accept you in exchange for your old age pension or whatever pension you get from the municipality or provincial government.

The people back home are insisting that our existing hospital insurance plan be expanded to cover those declared chronically ill. I know that the federal government, by legislation, long ago decided that if a move is made anywhere in Canada to look after the chronically ill, there will be national money available to help.

I should like to see our national health insurance plan amended to include the cost of all prescribed drugs. I believe this would, perhaps, do more than anything else to resolve the questionable prices of these commodities. I have every sympathy, Mr. Chairman, for the interests of the men engaged in the practice of medicine. In the light of the income received by a lot of other people in Canada today, I doubt whether the income of our doctors is at a level which will inspire many young men or women to spend all the necessary years in obtaining that particular degree.

However, what really upsets me is the fact that when I receive a bill from the doctor and then when I receive a bill from the druggist I very often notice that the drugs that were prescribed cost much more than the time and work of the doctor who had the responsibility of prescribing the drugs. I believe that is away out of line. The man of medicine certainly ought to receive a higher compensation than the man who mixes chemicals, who is a chemist or a scientist and who only knows how to mix up a prescription in accordance with the orders of the doctor.

I should like to plead that the government, in the light of what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and others, give serious consideration to the restoration of grants for a physical fitness program in Canada. When these grants were abolished a number of years ago that was done on the ground that few parts of Canada had taken advantage of the physical fitness legislation. I believe at that time only Saskatchewan had done so. Perhaps if the federal government again offered to share the cost of a physical fitness program, now that even such an eminent individual as the Duke of Edinburgh has made reference to the need for such a plan in Canada, many more parts of Canada would indicate an interest and a willingness to participate.

I should like to say just a few words with regard to the physically handicapped. Mental retardation and physical handicap are often related, possibly more often than not. I note with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction the hard work that thousands of parents in Canada are undertaking on a voluntary basis to supply education to the mentally retarded. I believe that if the federal government could aid in the cost of vocational education, and I agree that it ought to do so, then the health department ought to give some consideration as to whether in the long run it would not be more economical to help pay for the cost of providing mentally retarded children with an education. I believe that if our educational program for the mentally retarded could be greatly enhanced we might save ourselves a lot of pension money because many of these people, in later years, would not need pensions.

I should like once again to call the attention of the minister to the urgent need for establishing a portable pension plan available to all Canadians, but more specifically immediately designed for the industrial workers of Canada. I have spoken to many audiences and have asked them to indicate by a show of hands how many of them, in their lifetime, have paid into a pension fund and have later, either through some fault of theirs or through no fault of theirs, had to leave their place of employment, thus losing their pension rights. In most cases 90 per cent of those in attendance who had contributed to a plan have, somewhere along the line, lost their pension rights.

I know very well that in most cases when they leave these places of employment they can obtain a refund of their contributions. However, if most people are like me in this regard, a lump sum of money always comes in handy and may be used to buy a new car or a new television set. I do not realize that the money I am spending was really designed for my old age.

I do not think the refunds should be allowed quite so freely. I am glad that the annuities branch of the Department of Labour does not permit a refund. If you pay money into the annuities branch in order to buy yourself an annuity, that money must remain there for that specific purpose. However, because of the vagaries of the Canadian economic picture—partly, I think, because we are a growing nation—we find that less than 10 per cent of the people who today pay into a pension plan will ever receive the benefits of that pension as those benefits were designed to be paid at the time they were making their monthly payments.

I think the government could help the Canadian people to help themselves if they showed some initiative in this regard. I know there is a great deal that organized labour and employers could do. If they all invested their pension funds in the Canadian government annuities branch, our problem would automatically resolve itself. I deplore the lack of initiative on the part of labour unions and on the part of employers, when they sit across the bargaining table, in that they do not explore ways and means whereby the pension arrangements they are making with their workers shall carry the provision that the pension being arranged for will be portable and that the worker will be able to carry his pension rights with him wherever he goes, exactly as today he carries his unemployment insurance book and unemployment rights with him in moving from one employer to another or from one part of Canada to another.

I should also like to plead with the government to reconsider the level of grants it pays in the field of research in health matters. We have the heart foundation collection, the tuberculosis collection, and the diseases of children collection. We have umpteen health organizations all depending on charitable donations for their research work which is most essential. I have every respect for the voluntary efforts of tens of thousands of Canadians, and especially those of Canadian women who undertake this important and often thankless task of going out in the rain from house to house, knocking on doors and asking for donations in these multitudinous appeals. The work is necessary because there is no other way at the present time. The grants from the government are modest indeed. However, when this research turns up some useful knowledge it is added to the general pool of knowledge and everyone in Canada receives the benefit.

There is no one in this chamber who does not know that he may some day receive the benefits of the research going on with regard to heart ailments. I therefore submit that if we all share the benefits of this research work, we all should be made to share the costs as a community. I submit that this research work should not be handicapped by the lack of funds or by the lack of volunteers or by the unwillingness of some people to make voluntary contributions. Even if the government today absorbed all these organizations and the responsibility for them, I know that tomorrow there would be more volunteers for other worthy causes in Canada, and I think that is the way it ought to be.

But once the need has been established and once the volunteer work has reached a certain stage of general public acceptance, then I think the government ought to move in and assume this responsibility on behalf of the people as a whole.

When the minister replies I should like him to tell us what exchange of research information is taking place between countries of the western world and countries behind the iron curtain. I believe the minister is well aware of the fact that in many respects in the field of research the medical profession in the Soviet union has made remarkable headway. I often wonder whether we in the western world receive some of the blessings of that research and, vice versa, whether the people behind the iron curtain receive the blessings of the research work that our medical scientists are doing. I know there is some medium of exchange through the auspices of the United Nations. I hope we can obtain a bit of information on that particular score.

I want to express in only one or two minutes my utter dismay at the issuance of this particular little book having to do with civil defence and entitled "Your Basement Fallout Shelter". I should like the civil defence department of the minister to be called the civil disaster plan. I believe it would be much more acceptable to the Canadian people, because we often face severe disaster in our communities. I think the population as a whole would be much more united if, behind any plans for community survival and for survival of the individual, the whole plan were called a civil disaster plan.

I am a little afraid that there may be interests at work who are attempting slowly to convince the people of North America that there is hope for survival in case of a nuclear war. I hope the Canadian people will maintain what I believe is their present position, namely that should we have a nuclear war there is no defence for the Canadian people. I hope there is not a move afoot gradually to convince them and to condition them into thinking that "maybe I and you will survive". I think we ought to realize that in case of nuclear war there is no defence and that we will not survive. I do not expect that I will survive, and I do not think any other Canadian has any logical reason to expect that he can survive the rigours of an all-out nuclear war. I hope this is not part of a process of conditioning the public mind. It is for that reason as well as for practical reasons, in order to get the public to really rally around this effort, that I believe the whole effort ought to be changed in name from civil defence to civil disaster.

[Mr. Regier.]

Mr. Bissonnette: On a question of privilege, I should like to convey to my colleague the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam my sincere thanks for his compliments, and to tell him how greatly I appreciate his agreement on the health insurance question and his recognition of the work of the doctors in the community.

Mr. Jones: In speaking on the subject which I intend to discuss now for just a moment, may I say that I ordinarily would have raised it later on the estimates, but I am not quite sure that it neatly fits into any one particular category. I refer to the matter of household chemicals. Before asking the minister the question I have in mind, however, and in view of the great amount of attention which has been paid by the members of the C.C.F. group to the Saskatchewan medical care plan, I think I should say just a word about that situation.

Much has been said about it except who is to pay for it. On June 13 I asked the Minister of Finance whether the premier of Saskatchewan had as yet approached him for federal assistance to help pay for the Saskatchewan medical care program. That question was received with cries of anguish from the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Fisher: Derision, not anguish.

Mr. Jones: "Derision", says the hon. member for Port Arthur; but yesterday the hon. member for Assiniboia did exactly what I have mentioned. As reported on page 5268 of Hansard he said:

> The Canadian government should come forward now with a federal prepaid medical care act by which the federal government would co-operate with any provincial government prepared to embark on such a prepaid medical care program.

That of course is a clear call for federal aid for the Saskatchewan medical care plan.

The point I wish to draw to the attention of the minister, and my principal reason for rising at this time, is the serious situation in my view which has arisen because household chemicals are not properly labelled as to whether they are dangerous or poisonous. Many of them do not have described on the label antidotes which would provide for emergency treatment where children or even adults might take these kitchen chemicals by mistake. It is my opinion that something should be done about this problem.

In the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of June 13 appeared the headline "Coroner warns householders against household poisons", and the article under that headline sets forth the sad case of a two and one half year old boy who died of poisoning as the result of getting to a can of household chemical labelled "RX.15", containing plant food. Apparently there was not an antidote on the can or any suggested course of emergency action. I am not suggesting, of course, that this child would be able to read the label, but certainly the parents might have been in a position to take action which could have saved the boy's life. In certain cases, I am advised by medical people, when children take substances like this that may be poisonous, if a finger is stuck down the throat or if they are given some mustard emulsion the poison may be regurgitated and the child saved. But in this particular instance the child unfortunately lost his life.

Mr. Chairman, I would urge that some action be taken to deal with this particular problem. I think it is necessary action for the protection of children and people in general in the home. It is not always possible to have a doctor immediately available, and often emergency action is required. Even when a doctor is available the doctor cannot be expected to have at his fingertips the antidote for every type of household chemical. The case I have described is by no means an isolated one but one which has occurred time after time in this country, and surely we should call for action to bring about a remedy to this problem.

I do not know whether this responsibility lies solely upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare or whether the Minister of Justice should be called upon to assist in providing a remedy under one of the acts for which he is responsible. But I would suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare might very well take this problem unto himself and discuss it with such members of the cabinet as may be necessary in order to bring about action whereby packages of household chemicals are labelled and indicate whether or not they are poisonous. Also they should have on the label the antidote and the required emergency remedial action in case the substance is taken by human beings.

Mr. White: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to delay the deliberations of this committee for very long, and I think I can finish by a minute or two after one o'clock.

First of all I wish to commend the minister for his able administration of the department, and I want to compliment the hon. member for Quebec West for his very sound contribution to the deliberations of this committee this morning.

The reason I rise at this time is to bring to the attention of the minister and the committee a certain amount of consternation which was aroused among my constituents, as well as, I feel, many other people in the province of Ontario, when it was mooted in the press that the cost of hospital insurance in the province of Ontario would be increased by 10 per cent. Ontario residents are not unaware that prior to the commencement of hospital insurance, hospital rates were increased considerably. I am not prepared to say the percentage, but there was quite a considerable increase percentagewise. The residents of Ontario were sold the hospital insurance plan simply because the cost of hospitalization was getting to the point where many citizens of the province felt that unless they had a hospital insurance plan of some kind they certainly could not afford hospitalization.

So I rise to protect an increase in hospital insurance rates, and I do so also because we were told that this was going to be an economical method for the people to obtain insurance. We hear a good deal today from certain quarters about monopolies; there is a lot of complaint about monopolies on the part of companies. But the worst monoply in my estimation is a state monopoly, something against which you cannot legislate, something against which you cannot argue. It is a bureaucratic monopoly, and that I am certainly against.

If hospital rates could be increased by 10 per cent after one year without any protest from the people paying the rates, what is to hinder them being increased another 10 per cent two or three years hence? This leads to sloppy administration on the part of hospitals, and I do not think we want that.

I want to commend the hon. member for Quebec West for his plea that we evade at all possible cost what is spoken of as state medicine. I believe it is quite possible for the medical profession—and I am certain they are engaged in doing so—to work out a prepaid plan that will be acceptable to all Canadians. Then the medical profession can go on with their very worth-while work and the ill can have the doctor of their choice. Bureaucracy in the treatment of the ill is something which I personally have no wish to see.

Mention was made of annuity plans and the possibility of being able to transfer from one job to another or from one industry to another the pension plan that was commenced at an earlier date. All these pension plans are commendable, but let us look back 20 years and see what has actually happened. We must examine the value of the dollars people contributed to pension plans some years ago, and recognize that it bears no resemblance to the 50-cent pieces they draw out today. That is what inflation does. If we are going to witness a continuation of the galloping inflation that has gone on since 1945 we will witness a corresponding decline in the incentive for people to save and the ultimate destruction of all incentive so to do.

I thank the committee for its indulgence.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I intend to make only a few brief comments this afternoon, because the field has been fairly fully covered. One comment I will make is that we are going to have more and more hospitalization costs in the future as an increasing number of our population will be people over the age of 65. In the light of medical statistics it is interesting to glance around this chamber and realize that 30 out of every 100 people in this or any other group in the country owe their lives to the miracle drugs and serums and vaccines that have been developed in the last 50 years. I have only to list a few of the significant discoveries in this field to illustrate my point.

In the early 1900's, I believe in 1906, diphtheria antitoxin was developed. This was followed by the development of typhoid fever vaccine. It is important to remember that during the time of the Boer war more people lost their lives as a result of this dread disease than lost their lives in active service. It is significant to remember, too, that the war of 1914-18 could not have been fought on the scale it was if typhoid vaccine had not been discovered.

Coming to the twenties we find that on this continent, in the city of Toronto, there was discovered one of the most important findings in the history of medicine, insulin. This is an injection of pancreas that has extended the lives of many people and enabled them to live a full life span. Those of us who are old enough to be able to look back to the time before the discovery of this drug well remember those afflicted with diabetes who had poor, frail bodies and enormous appetites, and who could not pass a pail of water or a pump without pausing for a drink, and will be grateful that this is a disease now under control.

In 1928 significant advances were made by Minot and Murphy, working in a laboratory in Chicago, with respect to the discovery of the anti-pernicious anaemia factor, from liver and stomach. This represented another great victory by science in the field of human welfare.

Then came the discovery of the sulfa drugs and their derivatives in 1935. May I remind hon. gentlemen that dagenan and sulfa derivative was worked out after more than 600 attempts. Hundreds of scientists have worked diligently in laboratories in their search for the elusive materials that would cure human ills.

The forties witnessed the discovery of penicillin. I well remember the first case in which I used penicillin. A shot was required every two hours and there was much pain involved. Hon. gentlemen will know that further advances have been made with respect to this drug, and it is no longer even necessary to take penicillin through a needle. It may be taken by tablet, and only one dose is required in a 24-hour period.

I have listed a few of the advances made by science over the years. Not long after the discovery of penicillin came the discovery of the new antibiotic drugs, the myocins; achromycin, terramycin, chlormycin, ilotycin and other derivatives that have saved countless human lives.

My friend the hon. member for Welland in his excellent speech dealt with his experience as a general practitioner. He recalled to my mind that in the early days when we were called out by a patient with pneumonia we went with the knowledge that one out of every five persons suffering from pneumonia was doomed to certain death. Today it is possible to go to a doctor and be cured of pneumonia within a few days. This in itself is of vast economic assistance to Canadians, not only in work hours saved but in eliminating hospital costs and in the prevention of suffering.

The speed with which many illnesses can now be retarded or cured results in decreased costs for many Canadians. The advances made by science have also served to increase longevity in the population. As an illustration, may I point out that during the last 50 years the general population of Canada has increased two and a half times but that portion of the population age 65 years and over has increased four times in that same period. I do not have to point out that this will mean that there will be an increasing number of people in hospitals.

At the turn of the century, life expectancy was under 50 years. Today a child coming into the world can look forward to 70 years of life. This, however, is creating a problem in the field of employment and in other fields. For instance, the cost of hospitalization and welfare will continue to rise at a rapid rate as more people reach advanced age.

I suggest that it is not fair to put people age 65 and over suffering from chronic diseases in general hospitals along with persons who are under active, acute treatment.

I do not think you have to stretch your imagination very much to realize that the person who is acutely ill, whose life is hanging in the balance, will probably get the major share of the treatment, and that the older person with the chronic disease will not get the aggressive treatment that he would receive, perhaps, if there were a wing put on to that hospital where all those cases of people over 65 suffering from chronic diseases could be treated in accordance with what their condition demands.

I have only to recall to the committee that in 1920 I do not think there was a pediatric unit across Canada, if my memory serves me correctly. I well remember that when I was a student a few years later a pediatric wing was organized in the Kingston General hospital under Dr. MacGregor; and to tell you that the establishment of that pediatric unit as part of the general program of establishing chairs and professorships in our universities has cut our infant mortality so that today we can boast of life expectancy of 70 years for a child born in this country today is just to remind you of the results of our work in the field of pediatrics over the years.

I should like to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the same principles and the same practice be followed by our hospitals today in the care of the increasing number of people in the geriatric class; that the same procedure be followed with chairs set up in universities and departments headed up with people concerned with the treatment of those older people. I think we would find that hospital costs would be cut considerably and that the people in the older age brackets would get better and more efficient treatment.

I wish to dwell on this for one more minute. There has been some talk about building separate units. I do not go along with that at all simply for the reason that we have to train medical students. Those medical students will be going out as general practitioners. They need all the knowledge of the treatment of those cases they can possibly get. I would remind you further that in the care of those cases certain drugs and certain types of treatment will be used, and the general practitioner will require to know about them. If they were put in separate units the tendency would be, in my opinion, to make the teaching inadequate.

I should like to dwell for a moment or two on the matter raised by an hon. member who said that only 200 British doctors had migrated to Canada and therefore conditions must be satisfactory in the old country. I have only this to say. When a doctor graduates from a university in another land and then comes to Canada, in most of the provinces he is required to write another council examination. It is pretty difficult for a fellow who has been in practice a number of years to remember all the scientific theory that he was taught. The remark was made that there were 60,000 doctors in the United Kingdom. If my memory serves me correctly there are only 50,000. I know this is just an error in figures, but I do wish to point out that the figure of 200 is no criterion of the satisfaction or dissatisfaction of the doctors in Great Britain. The fact is that it is difficult to pull up your roots, go to another country and write examinations before you can practise.

I just bring this to your attention, Mr. Chairman. In Saskatchewan, where people are inclined to say "Here comes the golden age", according to statistics one third of the doctors practising in that province are from Great Britain. I am wondering why that province has such a high percentage of British doctors when the rest of the country does not have that percentage. Maybe there is an answer to it.

I am also wondering about this. The golden age which they talk about in the province of Saskatchewan is in a little difficulty, or was in a little difficulty, with the hospitalization plan; because Dr. Erb, who I believe is their minister of health, stated that something had to be done to cut down on these spiralling costs. It was suggested to him by the head of the college of physicians and surgeons of that province that perhaps a deterrent would have to be added to control hospitalization.

I am just giving these facts, not to condemn any plan that will give the Canadian people the best of care, because I am sure every hon. member would want to do that. I hope we shall never let politics interfere with the profession or with the training schools in the United States of America and Canada, the countries that have given us the highest standards of medical practice in the world today, that have given us most of the major discoveries in the last 50 years.

When we consider some of the places that are state controlled perhaps we should hark back and take Russia, as leader of the communist world. We can state that there has not been one major discovery in medicine or one major advance in the field of medical science come out of Russia in the last 40 years. I am not saying that we should not have forms that are changed a little from what we have today; that may be necessary in a changing world.

I do wish to refer to New Zealand as an example of socialized medicine. We hear people stating over and over again that 52 per cent of the doctors there practise outside the hospitals and 48 per cent practise in the hospitals, all graduates of the same schools. The 52 per cent who practise outside are the have-nots and the fellows on the inside are the haves. Their social legislation brought them to the point where they were almost bankrupt. I talked to many of the doctors, both the ins and the outs, and I wish to tell you that I did not find any of them perfectly satisfied with those plans. I had the same experience in England where I talked to some gentlemen on the inside and some on the outside whose names I will not mention. The fellows on the inside were getting better pay. You would think they would be satisfied but they said, "No, we do not believe in any system that tends to downgrade the fellow who graduates from the same school we did and from that day onward is an outside fellow, as compared with the fellow on the inside". This is the answer to those people who say that this is the system, this is heaven. It is not. I ask the committee to weigh all the facts and not just be swayed by some written arguments to the end so that any change we inaugurate in this country will be right and proper and best for all the people.

I want to spend a minute on rising medical costs. The hon. member for Middlesex West spoke about this. We have been told some of the reasons why our people are living longer. We in the field of medical science are responsible for that. I think every doctor and scientist in Canada will surely take pride in that, but I also want to recall to the attention of the committee that many of those people have given gratuitously of their services on boards or as nurses receiving small pay and working 12-hour days. When I was in hospital in those days the nurses took their 12-hour shifts. I remember the dear old superintendent we had. She supervised everything. She made up her books at night, and if anybody was short or off she covered up. She had an 18-hour day. I remember the personnel, the nurses in training. I recall back to the days when some of them just got enough to buy their stockings and their shoes. If they got more than that they were lucky. We do not want to go back to those days, and I am not suggesting that we should.

I want to pause now to pay a compliment to that great group of nursing sisters and nurses of all faiths who did such a great job in those training hospitals and are still doing it. They have made a wonderful contribution. They gave us the care that has enabled many of us to be in this house today, and the drugs that were developed through a system of individual enterprise that stimulated freedom of thought and action to its fullest extent.

So in conclusion, I say that the cost of hospitalization has risen simply because two thirds of that cost represents the cost of labour; that is the situation. Does anybody want to cut costs by decreasing the payment to labour? Only one third of the cost is made up in other ways.

Then someone mentioned the high cost of drugs. There is one drug item I might mention which was used in this hospital that I selected at random, the cost of which represents only 4.5 per cent of the total cost of these life-saving drugs. These drugs can save you anywhere from one week to four weeks of hospitalization in cases of pneumonia and other diseases. I remember the cases of appendicitis that we used to see in which the appendix had ruptured, and now as a result of these drugs such patients may be out in a week. These are the contributions these drugs have made to us.

There are one or two other things upon which I should like to dwell for a moment. The first is disabled persons; I noticed that someone referred to them. I want to say that in my opinion the examination policy respecing disabled persons by both provincial and federal governments may be wrong. I am not saying it is, but I am wondering about this policy. I recall a case in which I was interested during the time the hon. member for Essex East was minister. This was a difficult case, and this fellow was positively entitled to a pension. The pension was turned down by Ottawa. I knew the case well, and I knew it was grossly unfair to turn down the application for pension. I am wondering, therefore, whether we should perhaps take a long look at that situation and eliminate the doubling up on these examinations.

The other thing about which I want to speak is the provision of adequate shelters in our hospitals. I am wondering if this is being done. This thought occurred to me when we were talking about shelters the other day. It appears as though we are going to have to make preparations, such as the construction of shelters, for a long time to come. If that is true I am wondering whether we are looking at this problem realistically. Perhaps these shelters should be built in when hospitals are constructed, and perhaps they should even be built into houses constructed under the National Housing Act; because I am sure everyone will admit that it appears the need for them will not be removed in the foreseeable future.

The next thing about which I am wondering is our training of medical personnel. I just want to leave a few figures with hon. members. As has been mentioned before, we in Canada are not managing only with our own graduates but with the help of graduates from other countries. In the United States today they have in their hospitals over 8,000 interns who are foreign born. I am not giving any statistics for Canada. The Minister of National Health and Welfare might have them, but I have not. I know that we would not be able to run our hospitals the way we are today if it were not for the fact we have in this country a great many graduates from British and other universities. I think we should look at that, too, in order to assure ourselves that this country will provide the proper medical care.

In conclusion may I say that any criticisms I have made have not been in the nature of destructive criticisms. They have been made for the purpose of stimulating interest in this problem in order that the people of Canada may continue to get the best medical care in the world.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, perhaps other members have noticed what I thought was a very significant development in the discussion of these estimates. The minister began by giving what amounted, in the main, to a rebuttal of the report by the House of Commons estimates committee which examined the Department of Health and Welfare. When I say "rebuttal" I mean it in the wide sense rather than in the sense of a direct confutation.

Today we had one of the earlier speakers, the hon. member for Calgary South, who is chairman of that committee, get up and make a rebuttal of the minister's rebuttal. I do not draw attention to this to particularly underline anything in connection with the department, but I think it is a significant parliamentary development. There has been a large grey area in so far as the rights and powers of parliamentary committees are concerned. I was not a member of this committee, but I thought it did as good a job as a committee could do in analysing the estimates of the department. I thought its report was vigorous and direct, and it was certainly understandable in so far as the average member was concerned.

I knew, from talking to some of the civil servants in the department, that the department's reaction to the report was to say the least rather strong. One could expect to get from the minister, therefore, a reflection of the bureaucratic feelings toward the committee's report. It seems to me that a house committee, even if the civil servants and the minister concerned react against its recommendation and against the policy considerations it entertains, should stimulate the department. In my opinion there is inertia on the part of the administration at times which must be overcome, and I think much of the stimulation will come from parliamentary committees that will face up to an analysis and perhaps make some overbold suggestions and criticisms. I believe this committee is to be congratulated, and I think the hon. member for Calgary South should be congratulated very strongly for standing up today to rebut the minister's rebuttal.

The comment I wanted to make about the minister of this department would be much the same as the comment made by other members. The few times I have had anything to do with the department he was most agreeable. Unfortunately he has not been able to find a solution to the largest constituency problem I have in connection with health and welfare matters. I refer to the problem of one of my constituents who writes letters on a weekly basis to me, to the minister, to the Prime Minister, to the Leader of the Opposition and to almost everyone in Ottawa in connection with a marvellous invention he has in the field of health. I wish the deputy minister would tell me how we can satisfy this dissident gentleman in my riding who has a magic invention which, when applied to the shoes of all Canadians, would cure so many of the ills to which they are subject.

In trying to assess the stature of a minister, Mr. Chairman, I think all of us have tended to look at his predecessors holding that post. We all know that the urbane gentleman, the hon. member for Essex East, was the minister of national health and welfare. The distinction I draw between him and the present minister is that as minister, the hon. member for Essex East was much more ambitious in a political way, in terms of looking for political promotion and going right to the top. I have a feeling that the present Minister of National Health and Welfare has no ambition to be prime minister or anything like that.

You may wonder, Mr. Chairman, what particular distinction I am trying to arrive at. It is this. I think the hon. member for Essex East, as minister, because of his ambition was constantly trying to expand, if you wish, or blow up his role as minister of national health and welfare and make it appear as one of the major posts in government, an extremely important one. I believe he achieved that to quite an extent. The only comment I would make about the present minister, giving him credit for his lack of over-all ambition to reach the summit, is that he should not be so quiet or so passive in his relationships with his more ambitious, thrusting colleagues in the cabinet as to allow the department to shrink in stature.

I was interested in the committee's comments on the amount of printing being done by the Department of National Health and Welfare. I have always found it difficult to become enthusiastic about these publications, but I would be willing to accept the minister's argument that he has gone into the matter thoroughly and feels that the amount of publications is justified.

I hope he will continue to be tougher and tougher with the Queen's printer, because if ever there was an agency in the government charging too high prices to the departments for the services provided, I think the Queen's printer is an example. I have raised this matter in the house with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who is responsible for that particular branch, and I think it still holds true that the system under which the Queen's printer tends to give a blanket price under which there is no volume discount—that is, no discount to the department—if it happens to come up with a best seller or something that really moves or for which there is a great demand, is a rather unbusinesslike practice, to say the least. I think it would be a great encouragement to departments in connection with their publications if there were some kind of volume discount, and if we had a more flexible policy in so far as printing is concerned.

I do not know how far one could go in doing printing on a direct basis as between government departments, in certain kinds of publications, and private printers. But from this procedure I think you would get a stimulation in terms of design and some greater level of competition as between the standards of the Queen's printer and those of the private printers. This is a minor aspect of the minister's department, but this is a problem that ranges through all the departments in their relations with the Queen's printer. It is not an organization of the government in which I at least, as a member looking at it, take a great deal of pride.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who is well known for his interest in sports and who returned last winter with that lovely tan after his visit down to the Olympics in the Sun Valley area, was off on his kick about a Canadian advisory sports council or a Canadian sports council. I have spoken to this argument of his before, especially when his resolution had a day's debate. I admire the fervour with which he, the hon. member for York Centre, the hon. member for Calgary South and the hon. member for Hamilton South, who is an ex-footballer, are pushing their efforts in this regard. I pointed out to the Minister of Labour yesterday how amusing was the story in the Toronto paper about the expressed feeling of this small volunteer group that the cabinet was not taking too seriously their suggestions about a sports council because of serious unemployment in Canada. The newspaper went on further to say that it is perhaps arguable that Canada will always have serious unemployment, and that this consideration should not be a deterrent to creating this council.

I was interested in this for the humour of it, and also because it indicated a certain amount of bravery. I think it is a fairly brave member of parliament who will rise in his place and express himself to the effect that even although there is serious unemployment, he thinks the government should go ahead with a project such as this. I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, who is pushing this matter, and also to the minister that we have a genuine cultural lag in Canada in our attitude toward sports. If the minister wants to go into the matter in a sociological way I could give him bibliographies on it, although I do not think it is a topic of extreme importance.

However, we have the attitude that now we have finally reached the stage—and the Canada Council is an example of it—where we are prepared to subsidize through our government agencies musical and artistic endeavours, but we are still some way from the point where we are prepared to subsidize sports or sporting endeavours through the government; and this is the situation despite the fact that the Canadian people in the main are much more interested in sports than they are in the group of seven or in classical music.

When the Canada Council estimates were before the committee the hon. member for York-Scarborough tried to make the argument that there was no reason at all why a barber shop quartet was not as justified in getting support from the Canada Council in order to take part in that particular phase of cultural activity as was the Toronto symphony orchestra or the Ottawa philharmonic orchestra. I would not necessarily agree with the hon. member for York-Scarborough, but I was bothered by the headline reaction to this, indicating what a silly proposal this was. I put it down to the fact that there is, if you want to call it that, an educated elite in Canada who have reached the stage that they feel that fine painting, symphonic music and cultural things of that level are wonderful and fine—and more power to them—and they have an agency now in the Canada Council.

But I should like to point out to them and to the minister and to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that our problem so far as sports are concerned is that the common denominator of the people are strongly for sports. Not only do they want their nation to be represented by good teams, but they want Canadians to have fine hockey teams at the Olympic games and they want us to express our national spirit by having a winner. Unfortunately the elite have not quite come to that point yet. What we really need is a Vincent Massey in the sports field. I do not know whether the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard or the hon. member for Calgary South are going to be able to rise to that particular challenge, but I hope they will continue the fight.

It is rather disturbing to national pride to know that in so many fields of both team sport and individual sport in track and field we make such a poor showing. I tend to blame our very success in certain professional aspects of sport for our refusal to support on a government basis those elements of our sport that cannot be put on a professional basis. Because we have viable football leagues and hockey leagues, such as the National hockey league and the two professional football leagues, I think we tend to feel that the judging one makes as to whether a sport is worth while is based on whether it can be put on a commercial basis. Every country in the world which has a sporting thrust within its population has discovered that you cannot compete as amateurs on an international basis with any kind of professional organization.

I think the British experience in the sport of football is a fine example of that fact. There is not any question but that England and Scotland have the best professional football leagues in terms of the number of teams, the public response and everything else, but just because of the very selfishness of the professional set-up they are not able to field an international team, and so the disgrace is very great in Britain about their showing there. We have tended to have much the same kind of reaction in the field of hockey. I think the hon. member's argument for a sports council is a good one. However, I think we must have a great deal more educating before we are going to achieve it. As I say, we need a Vincent Massey in the sports field.

The question of a national fitness program as put forward by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent had a great deal of force behind it. The bothersome thing there is the pitiful way in which the last effort in that field collapsed. The National Physical Fitness Act, when it was introduced in 1944, came in with a fanfare of trumpets. This was to be the answer to the disturbing physical situation that had been discovered in the enlistment or recruitment for Canada's armed forces. We were to have an answer. The answer was to be this voluntary council with one permanent director and approximately $225,000 each year to go out to the provincial agencies to support this effort.

It broke down. I think it broke down, first, just because there was not enough money for each team, and second, because of the difficulty of working out something in this regard within our constitutional framework.

I suggest to the minister that if he is going to subscribe to a national physical fitness program that is going to be a real contribution he must look carefully at the failure of the previous effort. As I see the situation and as I read the speeches made when the scheme was introduced, as well as when the whole matter was discarded, the failure was based upon an inability to get all these agencies working for physical fitness. It seems to me that if something is going to be set up it needs to be much more centralized and should have much larger funds at its disposal than the last national physical fitness council had, and I think the provisions of the act should be broader and should give the federal government a larger role than it played before.

In saying this it is in almost diametrical opposition to what the minister said in his rebuttal to the committee report. The main thing which seemed to concern the minister in his rebuttal was that the committee was urging federal encroachment into a field which was primarily a provincial one. So far as the sports aspect is concerned, I suggest that our interests there are not provincial or local but national. I would tend to think that the same situation has been reached with regard to fitness. We have a crisis of a kind in the fitness field, as the hon. member for Lambton-Kent exposed very well. If the federal government is going to play any role at all I cannot see it being a mere liaison organization; it has to have something of real power. Like most people, Canadians respect money as far as power is concerned. There is no use going into such a field unless the government is prepared to spend considerable money in setting up a really strong organization.

The last point I want to make to the minister deals with the situation of the blind people in my constituency, who are quite dissatisfied with the present provisions of the act which the minister's department administers. I am not going into details as to what they want, because I think the minister is very much aware of that, but I can assure him that from my contact with the blind group in the lakehead area there is a unanimity of view on this matter which one rarely finds, to use a phrase, in pressure groups.

The hon. member for Simcoe East made a speech which I took to be an appeal to us to consider very carefully any moves to be made in the direction of medical schemes, and he generally extolled the worth of the medical profession and also pointed out the difficulty which the medical profession is having in recruiting people and developing its organization. Mr. Chairman, if I were a doctor I would be almost as concerned as I think politicians should be about the general low state of their reputation amongst the general public. As a matter of fact, I think those of us who are politicians are sometimes stunned on going around when we find how little we are appreciated; but recently I have heard more and more of the same kind of thing said about the medical profession. The picture is getting out into the land that they are money grabbers, graspers, people who will not make a call and who want only people who will come to their offices; that they want prompt payment of their bills, and so on. In other words the old charm and aura which hung over the medical profession have disappeared, and I think disappeared remarkably fast.

Because of this I think the public is perhaps much better prepared or much more prepared to want the kind of medical schemes which have been debated out in Saskatchewan and which are in existence in other parts of the world. As most hon. members know I support that type of scheme, and I am well aware that most of the doctors, certainly the ones of my acquaintance, feel at the moment that such a scheme is undesirable. I would suggest to those doctors that the only way they will save themselves from this kind of scheme is by doing something about the general reputation of the profession as a whole in the country.

I cannot put my finger on all the reasons why this should be. It was startling to me as a school teacher in contact with quite a number of students who want to go to university when I discovered how few of them were any longer interested in being doctors or dentists. I tried to find out why they were no longer interested in going into these fields. The standard answer—I do not know whether it is the right one—is not a question of money at all. It has nothing to do with the fact that more and more doctors are becoming employees. It is always the length and the cost of the training rather than any worry or concern about the kind of money they will be making later. If this is one of the fundamental reasons why the profession is no longer recruiting, then it seems to me that the profession should be prepared to make some very strong recommendations to some agency somewhere which will be effective in righting this situation.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that today the only way you can get young people to go into professions where further education is required beyond high school is to offer a very attractive set-up both in terms of scholarships and of—I was going to say easy courses, but I do not think it is that so much; the kind of course which is comparable in its length and toughness and difficulty with some of the other training carried out in universities.

This to me is the root problem of getting more people into the medical profession. As most hon. members know, the situation is much more serious in the dental profession than in the medical profession. We are getting to have a grave shortage of dentists, and most dentists are still very much more under a private enterprise set-up than are the doctors. I know the hon. member for Simcoe East is an employer of doctors, and as I understood an article I read recently, one third of the doctors in Canada are on salary rather than on an individual private enterprise basis.

This does not hold true as far as dentists are concerned. A very small percentage of dentists are employed; in the main they are self employed and in many ways comparable to lawyers and small business men. Yet it is a group which, as any one who looks at the income tax statistics can determine, is one of the higher income professional groups in Canada. Despite the fact that there is a good chance for individuality and working on their own as well as having a high income, the situation is not able to meet the challenge and in so many parts of Canada we are short of dentists.

The problems of recruitment in this field I think have to be part of the minister's concern, if not his responsibility; and if the professions themselves will not come up with answers, I think he has to try to find some of his own. All the medical schemes and dental schemes in the world, whether of the state or of the prepaid kind, are not going to be much good if we have not got the practitioners to work the schemes.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I hope I have said nothing which would hurt the minister's sensitivities as minister. I reiterate that I think every hon. member of the committee appreciates the friendly manner in which he carries out his duties.

Mr. Carter: I should like to pay my word of tribute to the minister's department and his devoted staff, and to express my gratitude for the co-operation I have always received with respect to the problems I have brought before him. In particular I am very grateful for the assistance they gave and the interest they took in connection with the radiation problem which occurred in one of the mines in my area.

My purpose in intervening in this debate is twofold. First, I should like to support what the hon. member for Simcoe East had to say about disability pensions. There is no doubt that great progress is being made in achieving greater uniformity with respect to the administration of these pensions, yet there are still a large number of people who are subjected to unnecessary hardship because of the difficulty which arises out of the wording of the act, in particular the words which require a person to be "totally and permanently disabled".

In the light of the great advances which are being made almost every day in medical science these terms are no longer valid. In many cases what appears to be a permanent disability today may be curable tomorrow; what appears to be a total disability may be alleviated or reduced later on by new techniques, knowledge or appliances. Nevertheless, hardship exists as long as a person is disabled and prevented from earning his livelihood as a consequence.

I see no solution to this problem unless we change the wording of the act, or at least agree to place upon it an interpretation different from the one now being used. It seems to me that if a person has been disabled for six months and the best medical advice he can get agrees that he is likely to remain disabled for another six months, that should be regarded as total disability. There is no reason why such cases cannot be reviewed every year, or every two years, or even every three years. We have cases now where people have to remain in this state for years before they can get somebody to certify that they are totally and completely disabled.

The other problem I wish to draw to the attention of the minister is one which has to do with mental health. It seems to me that most of our efforts with respect to mental health have been directed toward the adult, and there is no doubt that great progress is being made not only in the direction of new drugs and new treatments but also with respect to the general attitude of the public toward mental illness.

The part of the problem which I emphasize today has to do with the children. I recognize at once the difficulty of this problem, because it ranges all the way from children who are slightly retarded to those who require custodial care. It seems to me that because this problem does flow over into the realm of education the federal government has tended to leave it to the provinces and to private groups. We know enough today to realize that the problem is too great to be handled properly in this way. It is too big to be handled by private groups, and in many cases it is beyond the resources of provincial governments. Even those provinces which in the past have been able to provide accommodation for these mentally ill children are being hard put to increase this kind of accommodation in accordance with the growing needs. In my own province we have no such accommodation at the present time, and we are finding it almost impossible to keep pace with the increase in the demand for expansion of present facilities, not to speak of being able to branch out in the direction of providing new facilities along the lines I have mentioned.

It seems to me that two things are necessary. First, we should have a complete survey made so as to know exactly how big this problem is. We should then find out not only how many children would fall into this class but how they can be divided into the different classifications. Once this is done I think it should be possible to work out some agreement with the provinces whereby those classifications which fall mainly into the realm of education can be treated on a basis different from those who require custodial care.

That is the field where I believe the federal government could take the initiative, and I would urge the minister to show the way in determining just how big the problem is, and in finding out just how many children require custodial care. I should like him also to take the lead in providing the necessary staff and accommodation for this latter group, because at the present time it is beyond the capacity of most of the provinces of Canada to do so.

Mr. Peters: I should like to say a few words on this subject, some of them having to do with the Clark report, which was brought in sometime ago. I believe the Canadian people have been promised that pensions would be raised in keeping with their needs, though we as a government have found great difficulty in financing the increase we made in old age pensions on the last occasion we made improvements. We believe this old age pension should be at least $75 a month, and we are also of the opinion that it would obviate a great deal of difficulty if this were implemented under the present scheme.

I believe the government, when they set up the Clark commission, did so with the backing of the people in general who believed that an investigation of the pension schemes in other countries throughout the world, particularly in the United States and Britain, would be advantageous to the Canadian government in ascertaining how best to provide for the elderly citizens of Canada. One of the sad facts of political life is that though we set up commissions to investigate certain matters, and although these commissions come to conclusions with which we agree or disagree, it does not seem to make a great difference because nothing happens once the reports are presented. This is evidence of the fact that the government has given little consideration to the report. Upon receipt of a report the government should state why it cannot implement its recommendations.

I am sure the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet will agree that in 1957 they wanted to increase the old age pension even more. A pension higher than $55 is needed. The old age pension is contributory in a sense. It may be the sole pension which a Canadian receives or it may be supplementary to an industrial pension. In any event the old age pension has some effect on pension plans throughout the country. The old age pension is payable on the basis of citizenship and length of stay in Canada. It should be made portable in an industrial sense. There should be a national pension plan which a worker could take from job to job, province to province, industry to industry. At age 65 he should draw a pension equal in value to at least half of his wages. Such a plan could be easily introduced and would be in keeping with the recommendations of the government's own commission.

We have unemployed over 40 years of age who are not accepted in other lines of work because it is not actuarially sound to accept people of that age under many existing pension plans. I believe I heard someone say that this may make a difference in Quebec and there may well be some people in that province who would be interested today. Everyone, including politicians, should have an opportunity of retiring on a decent standard of living without having to accept jobs on the basis of political patronage.

I recently heard of a new excuse advanced by industry for not employing workers. I spoke to a young lady who is disillusioned about the slowness of her promotion in a large Canadian company. After some persuasion her boss told her that the company got in trouble for hiring her. The reason was that she was over-weight and therefore a poor risk under the company's pension plan.

We are not asking the government to give our senior citizens something for nothing. They should be able to take their pension from job to job and find employment up to or beyond age 65. The pension would be contributory or compulsory. If it were a national pension plan the government would have to administer it. Such a plan would make money rather than lose it. This must be so or else insurance companies would not be involved in this business. Administrative costs would be slight. The minister could assist his colleagues especially those concerned with national housing and public works. Money would be available as a result of a national pension plan for use in making loans for home construction.

Canada is not poorer than other countries. The United States is not better off and in many respects is much poorer. Canada has national resources, an expanding population and challenging opportunities. If other countries can pay higher pensions and make more money available to the citizens than we can it must be because we are not using our resources to the best advantage. We should examine the recommendations of the Clark report and make more money available to our senior citizens. This will enhance industrial harmony because industrial disturbances are caused by pension plans as presently operating. People grow dissatisfied with their work but cannot change jobs without losing their pension rights. Workers could make more valuable contributions to society if a national portable pension plan was in effect.

The government should institute a superannuation plan to provide a fair and reasonable retirement fund in keeping with the earning power of an employee during his working years. The government could incorporate existing pension plans under a national scheme without disturbance to the plans now in operation.

We should examine the pension plan available to the hon. members of the House of Commons. Through the death of the provincial member of parliament in my riding it was brought to my attention that Ontario has a better plan than ours. I understand that at the last session of the Ontario legislature they amended their pension plan so that upon the death of a member his rights in that pension plan go to his wife as survivor insurance, and that consideration is given to his family.

It would seem that we in Ottawa are living in the horse and buggy days of long ago. It appears to me that our thinking is somewhat along the line of the old timer who said, "Let everybody worry about himself; I will worry about myself; I have been able to save a few bucks, I am looking after myself and to heck with everybody." This may be all right in some respects; it might have been all right in those days when it was possible to save. It seems to me that pensions in particular are one field in which we cannot look after ourselves any longer. Pensions we buy in the form of annuities and superannuation are very expensive and apply to a very limited number of people. The time has come when we should be able to devise much better systems of pensions for ourselves and for the Canadian people than we have at the present time.

We are not suggesting that we can finance this out of the present plan; we are not suggesting that at all. We are not only suggesting that the contributions and the amount paid be increased but also that there be a complete overhaul of the plan and a different method arrived at to supplement the contributions that it would be necessary to make for this type of plan. The government has an obligation to do this now. The old age pensioner should not be put in the position of having to wait for an election before he gets an increase in his old age pension.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, there are several groups of people in Canada who have no voice; they have no union and once in a while it becomes the honour of a private member like myself to stand up and espouse their cause. I speak of student nurses. This group is one of the neglected groups in all Canada. I say they have no effective voice. They do have a student nurses association in their own hospitals, which has no voice whatever. In fact if they stand up and say they should have a little pocket money, in some cases they are expelled.

The only one excuse for not paying these girls, as I understand it, is that the hospital believes that this would put out the lamp. Of course, they are referring to Florence Nightingale. Florence Nightingale was an English gentlewoman with considerable private means. She did light a lamp in nursing and it has not gone out yet. But there are literally hundreds of girls, the finest girls in Canada, serving long hours at what is at times a very disagreeable job, and I believe the highest rate of pay they get up to graduation is $12 a month. This may have been all right in the days when the R.C.M.P. rode across the plains on horseback for 50 cents a day. But, as my hon. friend has just said, it is about time we got out of the horse and buggy days.

Those girls are giving a signal service to our people and are not being paid for it. I do not know why they should not be. The hospitals are hard pressed financially and the dominion government has come to the aid of the provinces and the hospitals during the last few years. I think we can do more and I think we shall have to earmark our help in this respect to make sure that it gets to the people whom we want to help, namely the student nurses. I speak with some authority because one of my daughters has just graduated. It is safe to bring this up because she has graduated and therefore we stand to gain nothing in our own family at the present time except that I have two more daughters. They may want to be nurses, but at the present time I can hardly recommend the training period to them on financial grounds.

I would suggest that perhaps a student nurse be given $12 pocket money during the first six months until she finds out whether she really wants to be a nurse. If she can stand the first six months in hospital she wants to be a nurse all right. I think we can afford to give her at least $1 a day to buy her nylons, or take herself to a moving picture so that she would not have to rely on a date with an intern. In the second year I suggest she is of more value and perhaps $45 a month might be a reasonable figure. In her graduating year, when she has already learned to be a nurse—she is just staying in hospital to pay for her first two years board—I think $2 a day should be the minimum sum.

You will never get the nurses together; they are not unionized. You will never get them together in one body; they are too busy working. They have nobody speaking for them but I venture to say that everybody within earshot of my remarks has been in hospital and has been looked after by one of those wonderful girls. I think it was probably a shock to some hon. members to know that they did all that work for nothing. At the end of three years they are so fed up working for nothing, whether they admit it or not, that they rush off into marriage, they go south of the line or they quit nursing altogether.

There are no scholarships for nurses and yet they are our best young girls. A smart girl today in high school can qualify to go to university if she wishes without very much expense to herself. But if she wants to be a nurse she has to put in these three years of near slavery. This is a harsh word. I can call it nothing else.

There are a good many families in Canada who can no doubt afford to keep their daughters in nursing school for three years, but there are a great many more who cannot. Therefore I do not hesitate to stand up here today and start the ball rolling. I know that everybody who hears me will agree that this is a worthy cause. I expect the minister himself will be sympathetic to it. If we can rouse public opinion I think we will get a reform which is long overdue. I hope the minister and his department will carry the ball from here.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, first of all I should like to pay my public respects to the hon. member for Essex East on the occasion of his birthday anniversary today. I might point out that he is one day older than me but, of course, many years older in his experience in this particular department.

I should also like to mention that I could not agree more wholeheartedly with his remarks concerning the ex-deputy minister of welfare, Dr. Davidson. I should like to repeat what I said at a testimonial dinner which was held by the department for Dr. Davidson on the night of May 30, to which the hon. member for Essex East was invited but happened to be out of the country at that time. I then labelled Dr. Davidson Mr. Social Security of Canada. I think this is most appropriate, and I cannot speak too highly of his service to the department and to the country in this capacity in the past number of years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I should like to thank all hon. members who have spoken on these estimates for their very helpful remarks. There are undoubtedly some things I shall mention as I go along. I cannot cover all the items, but I should like to point out that in his remarks the hon. member for Essex East indicated that he wondered why I had not commented on certain remarks by officials and ministers in other spheres of government.

I do not believe that this is my particular obligation at the moment. I feel that all these items, such as portable pensions which many hon. members have mentioned, and with which I have some sympathy; the study of the Clark report which has been under way in my own department and is in the hands of a very competent committee in the department, are receiving study in one bundle, one might say. This includes the presentation of the Canadian welfare council which we have received for the past two or three years and which was particularly spoken to by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Other hon. members mentioned it as well. Here again, these representations have been given close study and are being given a tied-in close-up look.

I believe the hon. member for Essex East asked what I might think about medical insurance. My remarks to the estimates committee on that subject are contained on page 13 of my brief, I am not sure of the actual page in the committee report. However, I am sure they cover the picture completely. Pages 31 to 41, by the way, of the same brief cover some of the problems and difficult considerations that have been gone into in connection with the Clark report.

The hon. member for Timmins spoke about the Saskatchewan medical plan. It seemed to me that there were other members of his party who mentioned this subject and who seemed to be fighting the Saskatchewan election over again.

Mr. Peters: It was not necessary.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That was what I thought. I was just a little concerned about one intimation the hon. member for Timmins gave. Perhaps I am wrong, but I gathered that he might possibly do away with all charitable organizations, all voluntary organizations.

The hon. member for Jasper-Edson spoke, and I should like to thank him for his kind words concerning the operation of the hospital plan. There certainly are wrinkles still to be ironed out; we do not deny this. As I pointed out when we were before the estimates committee, there are certain possibilities under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act of which full advantage is not being taken. I was interested in his remarks concerning deterrent charges. I would just repeat one sentence from my opening remarks to this committee. It was to this effect: As to whether or not this type of co-insurance charge under a hospital insurance program has any deterrent effect, the department will be pleased to review the subject with the provinces concerned. This is just one of the aspects of the hospital insurance program which are being reviewed all the time.

The hon. member for Welland returned to his favorite topic. I would point out that actually there is a study being conducted in Ontario of fluoridation. I shall be interested in the report when it is forthcoming.

The hon. member for Lambton-Kent and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard spoke at some length about physical fitness. I certainly will be glad to examine the remarks of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent in greater detail. I know he has given a great deal of study to this important problem, as has the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

Other hon. members, I believe, also mentioned the possibility of a Canada sports council. Incidentally I might say that I saw the pictures to which the hon. member for Lambton-Kent referred at close range, and I think in some 30 years he has only varied in weight by something like one pound. I would not suggest that would apply to me.

The hon. member for Assiniboia suggested giving increases in practically everything, and again I gathered he was refighting the Saskatchewan election. I would suggest that we have lived up to our undertakings in the social welfare field.

There was a return requested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, which I think is somewhat self-explanatory. The question was:

> Has there been an increase in social security payments between the fiscal years 1956-57 and 1958-59? If so, how much?

Then under No. 2 he asks:

> How much of such increase is attributable to (a) an increase in the number of recipients, and (b) legislation enacted before June 21, 1957, and (c) legislation enacted since June 21, 1957?

Under (c) I should like to point out that old age security has increased approximately $91 million as a result of legislation passed since June 21, 1957; old age assistance by $5,900,000; blindness allowances by $775,000; disability allowances by $4,900,000. Also under unemployment assistance the estimate in the return is approximately $250,000 monthly. Then, hospital insurance and general health grants, the amount paid as a result of legislation permitting the provinces to start their schemes on July 1, 1958 meant that there was an expenditure of $54,708,474 in 1958-59. Incidentally the change in the hospital construction grants resulted in an increase of $5 million. This is a small indication of the increases between 1956-57 and 1958-59 as a result of legislation passed following June 21, 1957.

The hon. member for York South had a very interesting suggestion that the department make grants toward housing for elderly people. I think possibly this would be better dealt with by the Department of Public Works because these loans are made through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

The hon. member for Kootenay West certainly made quite a philosophical dissertation. I was very interested in some of his remarks concerning some of his personal problems and his ability to give very sound advice.

The hon. member for Calgary South, I think, rebutted the remarks made by the hon. member for Port Arthur who claimed that the hon. member had been making a rebuttal of my rebuttal. In other works, I think the hon. member for Calgary South was really making a rebuttal of the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur rather than of mine. I can only thank the hon. member for Calgary South for making the explanation he made and setting forth the simple fact that the department—myself as minister and the officials of the department—do not differ with the committee fundamentally in their findings but more in the way of approach in that we felt there were certain things which might appear to be interfering with what have always been considered to be provincial rights. We are always here, of course, to give advice and financial assistance in many areas. I should like to repeat what I said in my opening remarks, namely that we will keep a continuous review under way of our informational division.

Many hon. members have mentioned the problem of the blind and the disabled. These are under constant consideration. Last October, I think it was, we had a meeting with provincial ministers of welfare with a view to bringing up to date the regulations concerning these various assistance acts. These changes in regulation have been made through the justice department and have been agreed to by the provinces at this stage.

The hon. member for Quebec West mentioned several problems. I should like to thank him for his remarks concerning the World Health Organization and its extremely important work. He might be interested to know that the membership has now risen to 101 countries.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam speaks, as always, after having given considerable thought to matters. I should like to thank him for his remarks concerning myself and the members of my department. He recommended the consolidation of all of our assistance acts. I recognize the problems in this particular matter and certainly will view his remarks with interest.

I would point out that, as he mentioned, the federal government has definitely offered to share the costs of constructing chronic hospitals on a per bed basis, the same as with any other hospital and also in the hospitalization of the chronically ill. All that would be needed to have the province of British Columbia have us share in this particular, namely in the hospitalization of the chronically ill, would be simply a request to amend the schedule of hospitals which would benefit from the act.

One item on which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam requested information was the exchange of research information with countries behind the iron curtain. Last March we had two representatives from Canada in Russia in order to view the use of live polio vaccine in that country. That is one instance.

The hon. member for Saskatoon was interested in poison control or labelling. I should like to mention something about the poison control program in Canada. This program is established for the emergency treatment of children and others accidentally poisoned with household products including medicines. The food and drug director of my department has collected information about the potentially dangerous constituents of substances such as cleaners, soaps, fuels, paints, waxes and polishes often found in the home. This information and the composition of household medicines has been tabulated on cards. Incidentally, information on the methods for treating poisoning from the products listed was also put on cards. In 1957 sets of these cards were sent to provincial deputy ministers of health who selected the hospitals where poison control centres were established in the provinces. These centres used the information supplied by the department and have facilities and staff present at all times for the treatment of poison cases.

I should like to mention one or two statistics in order to point up what, in my estimation, is the root of this trouble. Having raised three children, at least to varying degrees of maturity, I know the problem involved. Up to April, 1960, 8,826 accidental poisonings have been reported, of which 56 per cent were due to medicines and 44 per cent were due to household chemicals. Almost all of these poisonings were of children under four years of age. I would point out that there are actually more than 170 poison control centres in Canada at the moment. I cannot help feeling that one of the gravest problems is simply ordinary care in keeping dangerous medicines and chemicals out of reach, in view of the fact that almost all of these 8,826 poisonings were of children under four years of age.

The hon. member for Middlesex East was worried about the reported increase of 10 per cent in hospital insurance premiums. I would point out that this is a provincial problem in that they decide how to collect their share of hospital expenses or operational costs. Whether it is done by current revenue —general taxes or sales taxes—or a general hospital tax or by premiums, the matter is up to the province. I must not leave the impression that we are not concerned with the increase in hospital costs. We are concerned, but these costs have been going up over the years.

I think the hon. member for Simcoe East gave a fairly direct answer in this respect. I think it lies in the simple fact mentioned by the hon. member, namely that in 1920 there were no pediatric wings in Canada. Today's modern pediatric wings in many hospitals—possibly in practically all of them—indicate the great progress we have made. We cannot do this without some increased costs. Statistics indicate that the cost of operating hospitals had actually been increasing at something of the rate of ten per cent a year before hospital insurance came into effect.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo thanked the department for its assistance in the St. Lawrence mine radiation problem and I would like to acknowledge that appreciation. He is also concerned with the disability pension and the mental health problem, and he mentioned the education of mental children. I would like to point out that the William Anderson school for retarded children in Galt is the first new experimental school in this particular category, and I understand that as of this morning it has been indicated that property has been purchased for the extension of this project so that it will include students over 18. This is being done incidentally by private endeavour and the Kinsmen's club of Galt.

The hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned the portable pensions in which I said I have great interest. The matter of the members' pension I think is one for finance, not one which comes within the sphere of my department.

Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly I have not answered all of the questions of hon. members who have spoken, but I do feel that most of them spoke with the thought in mind of assisting the department and offering suggestions. We heartily accept these suggestions and will study them very closely. Again I would like to thank the committee and hon. members for the helpful suggestions which have been made.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

Health services, including assistance to the provinces—

243. Administration, $367,444.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to thank the minister for his good wishes, and in anticipation of his anniversary tomorrow I would like to extend to him, and I think I speak for all hon. members of this committee at the moment, our very best wishes.

The minister has replied to a number of questions in the statement he has just made to which I directed his attention when I spoke briefly yesterday, but he has not answered all the questions. It may be he is reserving some of them for some particular items as we come to them.

On this particular item of administration of the health services, which includes assistance to the provinces, there are a number of matters I would like to raise at this time. In the first place, the minister might give some indication of when the department will move into new and more permanent quarters. We would be interested in knowing what progress has been made with regard to planning and actual construction of the new administration headquarters in Tunney's Pasture.

The hon. member for Calgary South in his statement, a statement which had more than unusual importance because he spoke not only as a member of this house but as chairman of the committee on estimates, dealt with a number of points and indicated that while the objective of the recommendations made by the committee and the minister were the same, the methods to be pursued in the realization of those objectives were different.

One of the matters that the hon. member for Calgary South mentioned was the question of the shortage of hospital beds at the present time. The administration of the hospital insurance act requires for efficient operation the availability of the maximum number of beds, and while a great deal of preparation was made between 1948, when the national health program was announced and the passage of the hospital insurance act, in assisting the provinces in reducing their bed shortage, it was never anticipated that those efforts could possibly succeed to the full in meeting the requirements.

I mention that because I want to indicate to the minister that I am not attributing any blame to the Department of National Health and Welfare for this situation. Nor am I blaming anyone, because I have in mind the tremendous strides which have been made in hospital construction over the past decade and a half in this country, the great contributions that have been made by governments on all levels, by voluntary organizations, individuals, nursing groups, the medical profession and so on. We have no reason to be ashamed at the results of this co-operative effort.

However, if I understood the minister correctly he took the position that the matter of a national survey of hospital bed capacity and of hospital bed needs was something that he did not feel could be initiated by the federal government. I agree with him that the direct responsibility is one for the provincial governments; but under the national health program it would seem to me that it would be open to the federal government to provide the necessary financial assistance which would make possible such a survey. Certainly such a survey of the national need at the moment is one that could not be accomplished by any provincial government except by a provincial government within the territories of that government. But what is needed is not only an assessment of provincial needs but an assessment of the situation in the light of the national interest.

It will be remembered that when the national health program was embarked upon in 1948 there was provided for at once the sum of some $600,000 which was to be expended by the federal government in co-operation with the provinces and which was provided for entirely out of the taxpayers' resources on recommendations of federal government policy for the purpose of making health survey grants to assist the provinces in assessing their health needs and finding ways and means in which they could be made. There was likewise provision made for what were then the eight annual grants to assist in the extension and development of provincial health services; and finally the annual grant to assist in hospital construction, the increase of which was provided for by the present government two years ago.

That survey is still available and undoubtedly the minister has examined and studied its contents. I would think that from that survey, which was exhaustive, it ought to be possible to draw certain deductions, not only as to provincial needs but indeed as to local needs of common bed capacity requirements. It is open to the minister, out of the $42 million now being voted, to provide funds which would make possible a survey and assessment of the hospital beds required throughout Canada.

I suggest to the minister that he give this matter further consideration to determine whether or not the provinces could be assisted in this way, and thereby run more efficiently the hospital insurance program which, as he said, is generally speaking, operating very efficiently now in all the provinces of Canada which have adopted the scheme. As the minister has said, there are, of course, some problems to be ironed out. It was to be expected that a scheme of such gigantic proportions would present difficulty from time to time, but looking back in retrospect and looking at the situation as it is today I think we have reason to be satisfied with the very satisfactory way in which, generally speaking, these schemes are operating.

Now I should like to ask the minister a further question, and I do this only because I am anxious to see hospital insurance extended in the one area where it is not now available. I am thinking of the declared position of the premier designate of the province of Quebec with regard to hospital insurance. I hope the minister will lose no opportunity of seeing to it that his officials and, if necessary, he himself take every occasion to present to the new administration, if and when that is effective, the federal government's material in this regard so that in accordance with the wishes of the new government and of the people of that province, which must of course be the governing factor, there may be no delay in implementing for that province a program which we know to be so beneficial to the people in those provinces who are now able to take advantage of a hospital insurance scheme, and so that the province of Quebec can take advantage of a scheme to which its taxpayers, in so far as the federal contribution for existing schemes is concerned, may utilize these benefits.

I simply want to make one more statement with regard to this matter. I outlined our position on the subject of prepaid medical care. All the parties in this house on this side have taken their positions with regard to this important matter; a matter which, I think, will increasingly engage the attention of government and of the public generally. The minister referred to the statement he made on this subject in the estimates committee. As a member of that committee I recall that statement, but it seems to me it was of such importance that it ought to be made in this house where other hon. members who were not members of that committee would have the opportunity of learning the position of the government and, if they felt so disposed, of interrogating the government with regard to it.

For my part I regard the government's policy in this particular as unsatisfactory and as not giving the kind of leadership which I think a matter of such great importance requires. The initiative, I recognize at once, is a matter, as the minister said, for the provinces themselves. Under our constitutional arrangements that is an essential requirement. We cannot develop these schemes in a country like ours, which is based on the principles of federation and confederation, unless we recognize the division of jurisdiction. The federal government cannot do these things alone, and it seems to me it would be difficult for the provinces to do these things alone. But together, I am sure, the two senior levels of government can do something to deal with the problem of medical care in this country on a responsible basis, a basis that will recognize, as several medical doctors who are hon. members of this house have said, the principle of the traditional doctor-patient relationship, the principle of free choice of doctor and the other principles which I believe at the moment are not in issue here. Those freedoms must be preserved.

I quite agree with the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Bissonnette) that there should be no restriction whatever of a patient's freedom to choose his own doctor, nor any attempt to impede the medical profession in the pursuit of its calling.

(Text):

I believe that this freedom of choice in so far as the declared positions of the parties are concerned is not actually in doubt. But we do have to face this point, and in facing it I want to say that I agree with those doctors who have spoken, that the medical profession, while it may have its point of view in this regard, and one must respect it—and I note with interest what the hon. member for Jasper-Edson had to say on this subject—I want to say that while I feel strongly on this subject, and while I feel that the basic consideration is the public interest and that we must see to it that Canadians are not denied the best medical care because of financial incapacity, I do not want anyone to think that by recommending prepaid medical schemes I was in any way reflecting on the medical profession.

But there have been suggestions here about the doctors, and I can only say that my own experience over 11 years is that Canada has every reason to be proud of the over-all objectives and contributions of the Canadian medical profession. We need only think of the work of the general practitioners and others —the family doctor, the man with the black bag—to realize this debt. I do not think we should allow an occasion like this to pass without—not rising to every incident requiring their defence—recognizing, as we should, the public service, the contribution, which the medical profession and other health workers make in our country.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I can recall last year that when questioned about the hospital insurance plan the minister stated that a considerable number of bugs had developed in the administration of these plans and I wonder if the minister could say what progress has been made to overcoming these difficulties.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): To answer the hon. member for Timmins first, I do recall intimating at that time that there were certain bugs, as he suggested, in the scheme but I think good progress is being made in ironing them out. A meeting is held twice a year of the advisory committee on hospital insurance and diagnostic services to consider everything which has been happening in the intervening six months. The problems which have developed are brought to the attention of that committee and eventually to the attention of myself and the provincial ministers, and we believe great progress has been made in ironing them out. No doubt there is still the odd individual case which comes to mind. I do believe, however, that the provinces themselves are also trying their best to iron out these problems.

The hon. member for Essex East asked at what stage is the administration building. I am happy to say the drawing board stage is almost complete and we hope to get along with construction quite rapidly. I will be pressing the Department of Public Works in that respect.

The hon. gentleman also referred to grants to provinces for technical advice. As I pointed out in my earlier remarks, this is now done and as a part of the technical assistance to the provinces the research division has assisted in health surveys. At the present time the director is acting as a consultant to the government of Manitoba in connection with its survey of hospital facilities and personnel.

I have not as yet today received a wire from the premier designate of Quebec concerning hospital insurance but whenever I hear from him I shall be pleased, of course, to enter into negotiations. With respect to medical insurance I would refer the hon. member for Essex East to the comments I made in my earlier statement which is in the record of the proceedings of the committee. I do not feel it is necessary to repeat those remarks here.

Item agreed to.

Health services, including assistance to the provinces—

532. Laboratory and advisory services—further amount required, $125,479.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, would the minister give us the details of this item.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, this is an amount for the work undertaken by the department on behalf of a resolution by the United Nations concerning the analysis in Canada of fall-out samples from all around the world.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a matter of very considerable importance. It is one, of course, that concerns not only the Department of National Health and Welfare but also the Department of External Affairs and arises out of the initiative taken by Canada at the last assembly of the United Nations. We know from a report made to the house during the course of the present session by the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the hon. gentleman had gone down to the United Nations to see if he could not ascertain why more progress had not been made in the co-operative effort pledged by other member states in the United Nations toward this objective.

Could the minister tell us something about the progress that has been made in Canada itself? New testing stations have been set up to measure more accurately and comprehensively the levels of radioactivity. Could the minister also tell us what progress has been made in getting other countries, pursuant to their commitment at the last assembly, to carry out their share of this effort on a world scale so that we can determine whether or not the levels of radioactivity are continuing? This is a matter which in the future may be of first importance.

We are told by the minister and by other ministers of health that there has been no appreciable increase through nuclear tests in the amount of radioactivity that would add to the sources of human danger and the like but the only way in which we can have a reasonable certainty about this is by making sure that our instruments of assessment are as effective and as accurate as we know how to make them. I would hope that the minister could give us some details along the lines I have asked.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member can rest assured that the equipment to be used in making these tests will be the best available. There is no doubt in the world about that. I wish to say that we consider our radiation division is one of the best in the world in the field of testing.

I agree with the hon. member that this matter is of first importance. The question of communications with foreign countries is actually in the hands of the Department of External Affairs. I understand there are negotiations going on with two countries at the moment but until they are completed I think perhaps I should not name them. This is really a responsibility of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree that it is, Mr. Chairman, but I am sure the minister will appreciate that our own assessment cannot be effective unless other countries are also co-operating. We cannot hope to create in Canada a wall against the danger of radioactivity unless there is world-wide co-operation. However, I will not press the point any further except to ask the minister if he can tell us how many testing stations there are now in the country. I know that our equipment is as up to date and as good as that of any country. I am also aware that we have taken a lead in this field by our participation in the original 12 state committee at the United Nations and in the work of our own medical scientists in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I believe, however, that the people of Canada would like to know how many new stations there are in the country and what is the total.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, there were originally 15 stations set up to collect monthly samples of milk powder for analysis in our laboratories here in Ottawa. More recently a second network of 24 stations has come into operation for the collection and subsequent testing of air, rainfall and soil.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has the department yet decided upon the increase in the permissible levels of strontium-90 pursuant to the initiative taken by the United States in that regard?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I understand that the new report will be available within two weeks. Actually the departmental report for January to March, 1960 will be available on Monday. That will give the complete picture. I believe that fairly recently I answered a similar question by the hon. member for Trinity and perhaps also the hon. member for Essex East concerning the permissible level having been decreased from 98 to 79 or some figure in that neighbourhood as a result of the study.

Item agreed to.

National health branch—

246. To authorize general health grants to the provinces, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory upon the terms and in the amounts detailed in the estimates and under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council including authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, to make commitments for the current year not to exceed a total amount of $63,591,941, $42,000,000.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct two questions to the minister under this item but before doing so I wish to associate myself with the expressions of commendation the minister has received for the fine way he is administering his department. I also wish to compliment the hon. gentleman on the splendid outline he presented of the operations of his department and on the many answers he has already given to questions asked by hon. members of this committee.

I do not think proper acknowledgement or credit is being given to the minister, to his department or to the federal government with respect to the financial assistance in various health programs being given to my own province of Saskatchewan and to the other provinces.

In order to direct more attention to the federal health and welfare contributions to Saskatchewan and to the other provinces, I should like some detailed information from the minister under item 246, and other items coming before this committee. Item 246 refers to health grants to the provinces. On page 339 of the blue book details of the item show, for Saskatchewan, "Hospital construction grant, $1,857,967." Then, there is another item listed as "Other health grants, $1,875,-046." I hope the minister will outline what is covered under this heading of "Other health grants".

Under the same item, but with a separate vote of federal money, are listed what are known as contributions to provinces under agreements entered into pursuant to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. When the minister answers my first question in regard to health services will he also inform this committee what federal contribution was made to Saskatchewan this fiscal year under the hospital insurance act. Will he also indicate whether this federal contribution goes directly toward helping to pay the cost of Saskatchewan's hospital plan which last year cost a little over $31 million? In this regard I might point out that the hon. member for Assiniboia made no mention of federal financial help to Saskatchewan's proposed hospital and medical plan when he spoke in the committee yesterday. I presume he was speaking officially for his party in Saskatchewan when he said, as reported in Hansard of June 22 at page 5266:

> —by an annual payment of some $70 or $75 a whole family would have their hospitalization and medical care covered.

As I said, I presume we can take this as an official party statement as to the annual cost of the direct compulsory payment. The hon. member for Assiniboia went on to say that the remainder of the cost will be raised from general revenues within the province. I should like to emphasize the statement. He said that the remainder of the cost will be raised from general revenues within the province. To go back to my question, will the minister outline what federal payments are being made to the Saskatchewan government under the two parts of item 246? To what extent is the federal government helping to pay the cost of the Saskatchewan hospital plan?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre mentioned the hospital construction grant, estimated for 1960-61

as $1,857,967. The breakdown of the $1,875,046 of other health grants is as follows: General public health, $744,881; tuberculosis control, $151,035; mental health, $464,936; professional training, $94,856; cancer control, $185,656; medical rehabilitation and crippled children grants, $140,406; child and maternal health, $93,276.

If the hon. member will turn back to page 338 of the blue book he will see that the first item is labelled "General public health grant". This is not specifically allocated to provinces, but it is to be used in support of research projects sponsored by one or more provinces, and in this instance some might be going there.

To answer the second question, for the fiscal year 1959-60 the federal government paid $13,152,145.37 to the province of Saskatchewan for Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act purposes.

Mr. Pascoe: Does the minister have any indication of the payment for this fiscal year?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I cannot give that at the moment.

Mr. Rogers: Will the minister give the committee the same information on Alberta?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Can we table that, Mr. Chairman? Is that agreeable to the hon. member?

The Deputy Chairman: I understand the minister wishes to insert something in Hansard?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I will have to do a little searching to get the figures.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Would it be possible for the minister to give us the information for all the provinces? I am sure it would be interesting.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes; I shall be glad to get this information for all the provinces.

The Deputy Chairman: Do I understand that the minister wishes to table it or put it in Hansard?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am in your hands. How can I get it in Hansard?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I make a suggestion to the minister. If he inserts in Hansard the detailed plans pursuant to the question which was properly asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre I am sure that Hansard would be considerably increased in the number of pages, not that the information is not desirable. It is available through another medium. Does the minister not have a composite table showing the totals for each province, and that certainly would not be an unnecessary encumbrance.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That is the type of thing I was going to suggest. I suggest we produce a table for all the provinces, but I am in the chairman's hands because I do not have it with me at the moment. I am in your hands, sir, as to how I get it on record.

The Deputy Chairman: Unfortunately, we cannot table anything in committee. The only thing we can do is print it in Hansard. Perhaps the minister might make a request tomorrow to put it in Hansard, or table it when the house sits tomorrow.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes. I think that this can be ready later today and it could possibly be printed in today's Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The question asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre was a valuable one because one forgets that considerable sums of money are being provided by the federal government out of moneys made available by the taxpayers and passed over to the various provinces to assist them in carrying out their health services. The response to the question of the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre will reveal the extent to which this is being done in this current year in the province of Saskatchewan, and the table to be produced will show the extent to which it has been done in all of the provinces. That has been going on now since 1948 when the national health program was announced in May of that year. It is important to realize that when the health grants were announced it was said by the prime minister of that time that this departure on the part of the federal government was a prerequisite to the establishment of health insurance in Canada. These grants were being made available for the purpose of preparing for the ultimate realization of health insurance in Canada, so that we would have the necessary facilities, hospital beds, the necessary personnel and the like. That is the purpose of this particular grant.

I asked the minister yesterday what was the policy of the government of Canada with regard to the only announced pre-medical care program in Canada, namely that in Saskatchewan. If and when the government of that province embarks upon this scheme of medical care, what is to be the policy of the government of Canada with regard to providing financial assistance? Has a policy been formulated? The minister has not replied to that. Of course, if he says that the policy is to be announced by the government in due course that will be a reply which we are obliged, under our usages, to accept. I repeat it because it is a matter of some importance. The reply will be noted by other provinces as well, and it will be an encouragement or discouragement depending upon what is the reply.

With regard to the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, this much is clear: The province of Saskatchewan has been assisted to some extent in the consideration, not only of its hospital insurance program which frankly it brought into being before there was any action taken by the federal government, and the province will be assisted, perhaps in a way that is not easy to detect, in the consideration by the government of that province of its proposed medical care program. Now, I suggest that is an important fact to remember.

I should like to ask a question of the minister based on the suggestion made by the hon. member for Athabasca, with regard to student nurses' assistance. I think we all appreciate the problem which he has outlined. It is not a problem which has arisen since the present minister has been in office, but it is a problem that has existed for some time. We all appreciate the sacrifice that has to be made by parents in providing for the training of their daughters in this particular field, as well as in the provision of a university education for their children. The minister might possibly give us some more detailed information in reply to the hon. member's observations.

In considering this particular question, I should like to know how many new nurses training schools have been built. There was one at the Western hospital in Toronto; there was one at the Metropolitan hospital in Windsor, and I think there was one in Alberta. Assistance was given to these schemes, which were pilot schemes in order to assist in assisting and rationalizing the nurses training. That represented a considerable measure of assistance, not directly in the way the hon. member for Athabasca had in mind, but assistance of some sort by the federal exchequer. I noted that the day before yesterday in Toronto there was an announcement made by the nurses—I do not know whether it was the nurses of Ontario or the nurses of Canada, but I suspect the latter—to the effect that they proposed to set up a college training establishment of their own. In addition, they have been given by the province of Ontario adequate power over nurse training, somewhat similar to the control that is exercised under provincial statutes over the medical profession and the dental profession. These are all steps which, while they may not meet what the hon. member had in mind, are in that direction and which seek to emphasize the importance of the problem which he has raised.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We do not have any information available at the moment concerning the number of nurses schools, as requested by the hon. member. He did refer to the one at Toronto, and that information will be obtained.

I may say, however, that I have these figures available now and I can give them to the Hansard reporter to be inserted in the record. I refer to the figures concerning the distribution of general health grants as between the provinces and territories, and also the payments for 1959-60 under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. I should like to point out that the latter are advance payments, and that the final payments have not been made.

The Deputy Chairman: Just to make sure there is no misunderstanding, does the committee give unanimous consent to put these tables on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The tables referred to are as follows on pp. 5321 and 5322:]

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Before the vote carries, there is just a minor point to which I should like to refer. Both the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and the hon. member for Essex East made reference to the federal grants to the provinces of Saskatchewan. One might think that there were special grants given to the province of Saskatchewan, and I should like the minister to clear up that point if he could. The grants given to the province are no more and no less than those given to all the other provinces.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, it is the same principle.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I notice that the amount estimated for the health branch last year was $46 million and this year it is estimated at $42 million. Before putting my next question, perhaps the minister will jog my memory by telling me how much he would be authorized to request for the fiscal year?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The commitment authority for the fiscal period is $63,591,941. The commitment which is not expected to be spent amounts to $21,591,941, leaving what we estimate to be spent, $42 million.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At a time when there have been various suggestions made in this house about various health problems that remain to be solved, and of course which will continue to confront us in one form or another in the days to come, it does seem to me that the minister owes the committee an explanation as to why the $21 million additional is not being made available, pursuant to the declaration of policy originally made in 1948 and confirmed by the present government. We do know that there are many problems requiring attention. The hon. member for Athabasca mentioned the question of nurses' assistance. We hear from time to time of the great need for further research into heart disease, and the like.

The minister and I were present one night in Ottawa when he spoke at a meeting of the Ottawa heart foundation, a branch of the national organization, whose purposes are designed to promote greater research into the greatest killer of all. Some provinces and some communities have through voluntary efforts provided funds for what is required in their communities, but not enough money is available in the country to make the kind of attack on heart disease which medical scientists believe should be undertaken. In view of the fact the minister has the power to ask for another $21 million, I think he ought to explain why he has not asked for this additional sum of money.

I know that the expenditure of these sums of money depends largely on the capacity of the provinces to utilize these funds. They must have the necessary personnel to make a wise and economic use of the moneys provided by the federal government. To the extent that the provinces are not prepared or are not adaptable to accept further assistance, that will be a satisfactory answer, as far as I am concerned. But in so far as certain voluntary organizations are concerned, such as the heart foundation, I believe a more comprehensive answer should be given by the minister.

For instance, are we satisfied that we have enough funds with which to deal with cancer? The Canadian cancer society are providing assistance out of these grants to the extent of $3,500,000, I believe. Is that enough to meet this research problem? If it is enough, is it possible to provide more money in order to bring the best possible cancer treatment within the reach of those in Canada who for one reason or another cannot get it? I merely mention these as samples of the kind of problem which yet requires attention and which could be met if the necessary funds were provided. There are funds available and it would be valuable, I think, for the minister to explain why they are not used.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I can assure the hon. member that the necessary funds are available as set out in the estimates. As he well knows, this difference between $63 million and $42 million is largely a carry-over and chiefly in the hospital construction grants, mainly because, while a commitment may be made this year, there may not be any payment at all until next year. There are three progress payments; one at 25 per cent, one at 50 per cent and then one at 75 per cent; and when the construction is completed the final 25 per cent. Hence there must be a large carryover from year to year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of that $21 million, what portion represents hospital construction commitments?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am told we might be able to work that out. But actually the $42 million, from past experience, is the estimate of what will be required finally this year. The other portion is simply open for determination, and may not be committed because the provinces may not request all their shareable grants.

Indian and northern health services—

247. Operation and maintenance including grants to hospitals and other institutions which care for Indians and Eskimos, $21,362,102.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is the program now for additional hospital construction for Indians and Eskimos in the current fiscal year?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The main program ahead is the building of the Charles Camsell hospital in Edmonton. As the hon. member is probably aware, this past year we completed the hospital at Inuvik. The Charles Camsell hospital is the next big project. There are, of course, smaller items of building going on all the time such as nursing stations, offices and so on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I note that there is an increase—and I am not criticizing it—in this vote of a little less than a million dollars as compared with the amount for last year. How much of this $21 million estimated for this year is going to be devoted to new construction?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): New construction is covered by the next vote.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh yes.

Item agreed to.

248. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $1,786,600.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister give the answer to the question about new construction?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): For new construction during the current period, $702,800.

Item agreed to.

249. Medical advisory, diagnostic, and treatment services, $3,863,807.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What does this vote deal with exactly? Does it cover any of the diagnostic services provided for under hospital insurance or are they only dealt with in a statutory way? My memory does not serve me at the moment and I forget precisely what they are for.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This vote covers principal medical officer, medical advisory service, quarantine and leprosy examination, medical and sick mariner service, civil service health and civil aviation medicine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The diagnostic reference I suppose is for the personnel that advise on the diagnostic services grant.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No; on immigration, I am told.

Item agreed to.

250. Administration of the Food and Drugs and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Acts, $1,984,777.

Mr. McCleave: Carried.

Mr. Howard: I note that I provoke an automatic reflex in the hon. member for Halifax whenever I rise. I want to assure him that this is a matter which is of great concern to more than just the people in one particular province.

You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that last evening, under the administrative item I had some remarks to make with respect to the advertising approach used by the ethical drug industry in advertising its products to the medical profession. I should like to make one other reference to this matter before I make inquiry of the minister. I should like to point out that the drug manufacturers in many cases, or at least in one case of which I have knowledge, make use of so-called invisible physicians to prove the efficacy of their particular product. I should like to make reference to an article which appeared in the January 3, 1959 edition of Saturday Review, at pages 38, 39 and 40 of that particular edition. This has reference to an advertisement or a brochure produced by the Pfizer Laboratories, which is a division of Charles Pfizer and Company, a drug manufacturer in the United States, and has reference to a drug called sigmamycin. There is here on this particular page a reproduction of part of that particular advertisement. It is headed as follows:

Everyday . . . Everywhere . . . More and more physicians find sigmamycin the antibiotic therapy of choice.

Then it lists the names, addresses and telephone numbers of a number of specialists who had made use of this particular drug and had endorsed it. The cards of four of them are reproduced here and reference to another four is made in name only. The four whose cards are reproduced are as follows:

Thomas Wright, M.D.
Eye, ear, nose and throat

And an address and phone number are given in Lowell, Massachusetts.

E. N. Stephens, M.D.,
Pediatrics

And a phone number, address and office hours are given. The address is Taylor street, Portland, Oregon.

Joseph Burns, M.D., internal medicine, 245 South 1st street, Miami, Fla.; Paul D. Friend, M.D., dermatology, 1345 Eastbourne avenue, Tucson, Arizona;

As I said before, there are others; a urologist, a general practitioner, a surgeon, just picking them out of the article. The article goes on:

The staff of SR/Research has tried to reach each of the eight individuals named. Telephone calls have been made, telegrams have been sent, and the following letter has been written:

"Dear Dr.—:

If you have published any of your clinical experiences with sigmamycin, I would appreciate your sending me the reference or preferably a reprint, if available.

Then reading further:

The telephone operators have reported all of the phone numbers to be false numbers, Western Union has reported inability to find such persons, and seven of the eight letters had been returned unclaimed by the post office—

Four of those letters are reproduced in photostat form which were returned unclaimed with various postal marks on them to indicate they were returned by the post office because the doctors to whom they were addressed could not be found. In fact they did not exist. Here is one indication only as shown by this particular article where Pfizer and Company, I say, attempt to mislead other doctors by indicating that some members of the medical profession, specialists, general practitioners and surgeons alike, had used and had endorsed it, had found that this particular drug was a good drug for the purpose for which it was to be used.

I also read other references yesterday from a paper by Professor Nickerson, professor of pharmacology and therapeutics at Manitoba university, which paper was co-authored by an associate professor of medicine whose name I have forgotten at this moment. The gist of Professor Nickerson's article was that perhaps we should have some form of control by a public authority such as the food and drug directorate over the type of advertising material that is prepared by these drug manufacturers and which is sent out to various medical doctors' offices across the country.

It is quite true that the reference I have just made to the Saturday Review concerns the United States and only makes mention of the names of each of the doctors who are supposed to have existed but in fact who did not exist. But it is also a fact Charles Pfizer and Company has a subsidiary which sells various pharmaceuticals in Canada.

I wonder if the minister would indicate what has been the experience of the food and drug directorate so far as checking the advertising material which drug manufacturers produce in the ethical trade compared with the type of checking and editing that is made of such food and drug advertisements directed to the consumer such as in the proprietary medicine field?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, the food and drug directorate do check on the advertising of patent medicines and preparations which are on the shelf or are sent through the mail or even sold on the streets, as well as advertisements concerning goods which may be ordered by mail, and that sort of thing. But we are not in a position due to staff shortage to concern ourselves particularly with the advertisements going to doctors. We feel they are possibly sufficiently knowledgeable to be aware of the situation. We are concerned with it but we just do not have the staff to do this at the time and we feel that our responsibility is to the public rather than to the medical profession.

Mr. Howard: May I just follow that up. I believe this is probably the reason why there were no checks by public authorities of the correctness or otherwise of brochures and advertising material for the ethical drugs which were directed to doctors, because doctors themselves are sufficiently trained and knowledgeable with regard to the intricacies of the field of medicine and would be able to determine whether any advertisement was incorrect or otherwise. Therefore they could disregard the advertisements which were not correct and only use those drugs which had been clinically tested and proved to be safe.

Of course I am not casting any reflection whatsoever on the medical profession. However, I have spoken with four or five medical men in the city of Ottawa and with one who is a member of this house and they all say that they are virtually swamped with advertising material. I have heard estimates ranging from 300 pieces of literature a year to perhaps a thousand pieces a year which get into a doctor's office advertising particular medicines and things like that.

All the doctors I have spoken to in this city say that most of it is wasted. They are very selective and naturally will pick out that piece of advertising material relating to pharmaceuticals which they would use in the normal course of their practice and they discard that advertising material they would not normally use or which is new material about which they would rather have additional tests made to prove its efficacy. They all say there is far too much of it. It is far too sketchy and it is designed solely to leave the brand name of the product in the mind of the doctor. The initial advertising material makes very sketchy reference to the clinical tests given to a particular drug, and if the doctor is interested he can follow it up by consulting the detail man as he comes around or he can get the information himself.

I read into the record yesterday the results of a casual survey which had been conducted. The article I read did not give any indication as to exactly where this particular survey had been conducted, amongst how many doctors it had been conducted, or who had conducted it; but Professor Nickerson pointed out that the majority of the physicians who were contacted who were utilizing a new and effectively advertised analgesic did not know that it was simply the standard A.P.C., which is listed as acetylsalicylic acid, in other words a well-known headache cure. Professor Nickerson pointed out that this had been advertised by the ethical drug industry as a new and effective analgesic, yet in fact it was something which had been on the market for many years, plus a little barbiturate.

The article pointed out that certain physicians did not know the composition of pharmaceuticals of certain types and that they ordered by a simple number of like designation. As a result, it continues, two patients died of intoxication because of the use of these preparations. One or two further references are made to similar incidents.

As I say, I have heard reference to the effect that this is an attempt to brainwash doctors. I have no remarks to make which are derogatory in any way of doctors themselves. I have the greatest admiration for the persons in the medical profession whom I have met. They have been people of extremely high calibre, solely concerned with the health and welfare of their patients. But I point out that some of the advertising which is directed toward these doctors is absolutely untrue, false and misleading, and I express the view very strongly that there should be some check against it.

If the ethical drug industry itself intends to persist in this sort of practice about which I read from the Saturday Review a while ago in which they pull out of thin air a list of eight doctors and state that these eight doctors have used a particular pharmaceutical and found it good, whereas in fact the eight doctors do not exist, it is obviously time that this false and misleading type of advertisement should not be allowed to continue. If the ethical drug industry—and, again, I cannot understand how the word "ethical" got into it—is going to carry on this false and misleading advertising and if it is not prepared to put its own house in order, then some public authority will have to do it in order to ensure that in the final analysis the consumer is protected to the fullest possible extent and also that the doctor himself is protected against having his office invaded by false propaganda which misleadingly states a product to be something which it is not.

I know that the food and drug directorate may be overworked at the moment, but I do think steps should be taken at some time to ensure that the public of Canada are not left at the mercy of these misleading claims such as are made by Charles Pfizer and Company, not for the purpose of producing more effective drugs but for the purpose of racking up tremendous profits. There has to be some protection placed between such firms and the public.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I should like to assure the hon. member that the public is protected in that respect right now.

Mr. Howard: How?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Because we check advertising.

Mr. Howard: The department checks all advertising that is mailed by the ethical drug manufacturers?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I indicated earlier that we do not check advertising sent to doctors' offices, but we do check advertising which appears before the public.

Mr. Howard: We are talking about the ethical drug industry, and this is an industry wihch produces drugs which are only sold on prescription. The great majority of the advertising of this industry is not directed to the consuming public; it is directed to the doctors, and I still say that outlets such as Charles Pfizer and Company about which I read from the Saturday Review—and I take the report to be correct, because I do not know of any libel action instigated by Pfizer against the Saturday Review—should be prevented from carrying on advertising of this type. In fact, we do not check this sort of advertising by the ethical drug industry, and that is what I took to be the case from the minister's remarks.

Mr. Herridge: On June 13 I directed a question to the minister on the orders of the day as to the possibility of lipstick colouring containing cancer-causing agents. The minister at that time replied in part that as far as the colouring now being put in lipstick was concerned there was no evidence that amounts normally absorbed into the system could create any risk to health.

Since that time I have read in a Washington dispatch that the food and drug administration in the United States was continuing to study this question because it suspected these cancer-causing agents, and on June 16 in Washington, according to a dispatch from that city, a decision to ban the use of 14 coal tar colours in lipsticks was announced by the United States government. Coal tar colours had been mentioned by the officials as a possible cause of certain types of cancer.

I suppose as a result of my question, which I asked on account of correspondence which I had received, there has been a greater interest aroused, and I have received further correspondence. I want to make it clear that I have no personal concern in this matter, because I am far beyond the age to indulge in osculatory exercises; I am doing this because persons have written to me and shown concern, not only about the colouring used in lipstick but also in respect to cosmetics imported from the United States such as hair dyes and nail polish which may or may not contain harmful ingredients which could produce toxic conditions in the human body over a period of time if used constantly.

My question to the minister is this: would he inform the committee what the division is doing to check on these substances which apparently are causing the food and drug division of the United States government some concern in order to make certain that the health of the Canadian people and, in this case, particularly of the ladies in whom I am sure we are all interested or at any rate maybe some of the younger hon. members are, is protected.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We are, of course, continuing to study this matter. Our regulations regarding colouring agents are very tight and very severely administered. As a consequence we are not worried about cosmetics in Canada. However, we are following the developments in the United States very closely.

Mr. Herridge: That was the question I was about to ask. Thank you.

Item agreed to.

251. Administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, $247,081.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The annual report of the department with regard to narcotic control and the authority of the minister and the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act reminds us that there has been no marked trend either way in the number of addicts in Canada over the last five years. The last figure given is for 1958—I refer to page 94 of the department's annual report—and the number of drug addicts given for 1958 is 3,412, a slight increase over 1957 and a somewhat larger increase over 1956 but a reduction compared with 1955 and an increase of about 200 over 1954. This figure, however, represents much economic loss and much human suffering. In this country we must try to deal with this problem through the Criminal Code, through the operations of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act and through the health departments of the provinces. I rise at this time mainly to request the minister to comment on the problem as he sees it at the present time.

I note that there were 522 convictions registered under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act during the calendar year and that this represented 494 persons of whom 336 were male and 158 female. We are all aware of the great misfortune that attends those who are addicted to this practice but we in this country and in other countries have not yet succeeded in finding a formula that really meets the problem.

I have before me a report which appeared in the New York Times in the month of March in which the commissioner for drug control in the United States pointed out that in his judgment the heavier mandatory jail sentences for agents has resulted in a decline in narcotic usage and in what is called dope peddling in that country. It will be remembered that pursuant to the recommendations of a committee of the other house four years ago there was an increase provided in the terms of punishment which could be meted out by the courts in respect of those found guilty of a violation of the act. It would be interesting to know whether the minister subscribes to the view of the United States commissioner that as a result of the increase in the severity of jail sentences that are now open to those exercising judicial administration of this act there has been any decline in the usage of drugs or in the activities of peddlers in the manner suggested by the United States commissioner.

On several occasions during the past six months the Minister of Justice has made public declarations about his intentions in regard to this matter. The Minister of National Health and Welfare will recall the question I put to him this session—I believe in the month of February—when I asked whether he regarded this matter as one that came within the responsibility of the Minister of Justice or as one coming within his own competence. I am not clear in my own mind at the moment what the reply was. I think it was to the effect that the Minister of Justice has some responsibility under the Criminal Code but that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has a responsibility on the health side.

If that was the reply, of course, that is a clear statement of the demarcation of the functions that exist as between the two ministers. It has always been the practice for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to regard this as his matter because in many respects, perhaps in so far as the majority of drug addicts are concerned, the problem has deep health aspects in addition to criminal aspects. Be that as it may I have no quarrel with the two ministers. What I am more concerned about, as we all are including the ministers themselves, is that as satisfactory a solution as we can find be provided for this problem.

The Minister of Justice said in British Columbia and also in Winnipeg, I believe, that he hoped within the foreseeable future to carry on some discussions with the provincial governments for the purpose of dealing more effectively with this matter of narcotic control. The hon. gentleman did not say whether that had to do with further punitive measures. From what the hon. gentleman said in this chamber in answer to my question it was not clear exactly what he had in mind. I asked him whether or not it was the intention of the federal government, for instance, to make available in British Columbia quarters where there could be provided treatment for drug addicts on the assumption that this is basically a health problem. I did not receive a satisfactory reply to this question. It may be that the Minister of Justice was thinking of the experience in the United States, particularly in Lexington, Kentucky, where they combine both the principle and method of treatment with confinement, where there is an admixture of the criminal and the patient, with results that I do not think have yet been properly and finally assessed. I would be interested in knowing from the Minister of National Health and Welfare if that is what the Minister of Justice had in mind. Obviously there must have been consultations between the two ministers in this regard.

Is there any intention of which the minister is aware—and this would be within his ministerial interest and concern even though it might be more strictly applicable to the Minister of Justice—to give consideration to the imposition of punishments heavier than those now provided for under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act and under the Criminal Code? Is there any contemplation such as is frequently suggested that the sentence which ought to be meted out is a sentence which must go away beyond even confinement? It has been suggested that there is no more effective punishment for certain crimes having to do with drug traffic than capital punishment. I am not advocating that and I would think that would not be the most constructive way of dealing with the problem but that is a suggestion that has been made in this house once this session.

I do not know what the government has in mind. Is the government thinking merely of attempting to do what has been done in Lexington, Kentucky, or was the Minister of Justice just out on a fishing expedition? Was this really a serious effort on the hon. gentleman's part and, if it was, would the minister whose estimates we are considering give us the details?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, I could hardly be expected to give the details of what might be a serious concern of the Minister of Justice. I might point out that there has been some interesting experimental work on rehabilitation going on in New York. We had observers at the meeting held there some three or four weeks ago and we are in close consultation at all times with the Department of Justice on this matter. We have a responsibility for the supervision of the legitimate distribution of narcotic drugs. Because many addicts do become criminals the Department of Justice has a responsibility for their custody and through the parole service for some aspects of their rehabilitation. The whole matter is continually being studied by my department and the Department of Justice.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I cannot accept that reply. If the minister has something in mind with regard to narcotics control that is a matter that ought to be divulged to this committee either by the Minister of Justice or the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister whose estimates we are considering is responsible for the administration of the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act. He is the hon. gentleman who recommends to the Department of Justice the personnel employed in prosecutions. He is the one who provides for the compensation paid to prosecutors. The minister surely cannot say, because the Minister of Justice may have some pet scheme about which he is unaware, that this is a matter concerning which information cannot be supplied to the committee. I would remind him that that has not been the attitude of his predecessors. I am not talking about myself because I would be a very poor example for the minister and I am not suggesting that.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Thank you very much.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The other ministers never hesitated to indicate this.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt, no minister has ever tried to tell the house what he was going to do at all. Our responsibility is to report to the house after a decision has been made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the minister's reply is along that line it is a reply he should have made a while ago. He is now saying that government policy will be announced in due course. If that is the minister's reply I can do no other but accept it, except to say that I believe in a matter of this kind, where there is such public interest, and where on other occasions there has been such wide discussion in this house, there is no reason why the government should not tell us of its broad concepts in this matter. That was done on other occasions, and I regret that the minister does not take advantage of this very festive mood to give us a frank statement on this very important problem.

Mr. Peters: We are not too concerned to any extent with drug addiction in my area. The suggestion has been made that the government itself deal with the distribution of drugs to those people who will declare themselves to be addicts. There would be little cost involved to the people who declare themselves to be addicts. The drugs would be given to them at a nominal cost. This system would, according to some informants, eliminate pushers in the field entirely because there would be no profit. Has the department ever given consideration to this particular proposal?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, extensive consideration has been given to all these problems, of course. My understanding is that the vast majority of those who have any close contact with this problem are not of that line of thinking.

Item agreed to.

Family allowances and old age security—
252. Administration, $3,077,462.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is the item that deals with the administration of the welfare branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The minister said in his statement in reply before we left the main item—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): This is family allowances and old age security administration only, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; that is what I was referring to. This is the welfare branch. Family allowances and old age security have to do with welfare. This is the administration item.

When he was making his reply before we had concluded the main item the minister said that the government had lived up to all its social security commitments. I do not believe that one could allow that statement to pass unchallenged because, of course, the case is otherwise.

I do not want to retrace what I said about the government's proposals with regard to the old age survivors system. I dealt with that yesterday. That and other matters that still have to be dealt with would hardly warrant the statement made by the minister. Has the minister any comment to make on the proposal which I outlined yesterday and which represents the view of the Liberal opposition with regard to increasing the age of students who are now entitled to receive family allowance? When I spoke I asked the minister to give us an indication of his intentions in that regard. If he is in a position to do so I would be very grateful for the answer.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): We are always giving continuous consideration to those problems and, of course, when any decision is made it will be reported to the house.

Item agreed to.

Old age assistance, blind persons and disabled persons allowances—

253. Administration, $113,390.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thought when you passed item 252 you were referring to family allowances, Mr. Chairman. Now we have the old age security item.

The Deputy Chairman: I called item 252.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You called family allowances but you did not call old age security.

The Deputy Chairman: I called item 252; I am now calling item 253.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will wait until we come to item 253.

The Deputy Chairman: We are on it now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I asked the minister what was the government going to do about the Clark report and he has not told us except to say that he is studying the matter. I pointed out yesterday he has now had a long time to study this matter. As I indicated before, I recognize that the minister is a studious man, but there ought to be limitations on the capacity of a man to study; there ought to be a limitation on the length of time that he is expected to take in studying a report which the Prime Minister said in 1958 should be prepared in four months. That is a long time ago, and nothing has happened except the presentation of those two volumes containing information that was already available. We have asked the minister time and time again what is the government going to do about this report. This report was to be prepared in four months. Because the man to whom the writing of the report had been assigned could not do it within four months he was asked to resign or he voluntarily resigned and his place was taken by Professor Clark, who has taken not four months but over a year in the preparation of a document which we were told had to be prepared in four months. That period of four months coincided with the holding of an election. The election is over and we have heard nothing more about the report except the minister has told us time after time, day after day, that this matter is receiving very close study.

Surely the minister can give the committee, if not his final conclusions, at least the results of his present study because that study, which has been so extensive, cannot have failed to yield some results in the minister's mind. Perhaps the results have not congealed into definite convictions on all fronts, but they certainly have touched some matters about which one could conclude with some reasonableness that the minister has reached a conclusion. Are we to have it? Is it too expensive in the minister's mind? Is it properly supplementary to our existing universal system? If we do have it, what would be the contribution made, if any, by the government of Canada towards its realization? Are we satisfied that, while the returns of the United States system are in some respects larger than our own, the long period required for the making of contributions balances out and possibly puts the whole scheme in a different perspective? What is the situation?

Surely with the encouraging words which I have now used in asking the minister to give a reply in the presentation of his estimates in 1960 we are not to be told once again that the minister is studying this matter. That is not what we were told by my dear friend the Prime Minister who has now come into the chamber. That is not what was told by others, and the minister is the one responsible for the administration of this matter. He cannot hope to convince the Canadian people that the government was serious about this matter unless at least on the presentation of his estimates he gives us some kind of progress report. I would be encouraged beyond dreams if the report which the minister gave was even so small that it would indicate some progress.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am afraid the hon. member is probably just a little frightened that the government is serious about this problem. We really have been studying it, and that will certainly be demonstrated to the hon. member if he will read pages 27 to 31 in the report of the estimates committee which indicates the problems we have encountered thus far during our study.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am familiar with what the minister said in the estimates committee and it was because of that I have taken the position which I have taken this afternoon. I find it difficult to do that today because the minister has been so generous and the Prime Minister has been so generous that one naturally cannot forget about an obligation of that sort. However, one has a duty to perform.

Mr. Grafftey: Twenty two years of study.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend from Brome-Missisquoi has finally come into the house. I might say I am surprised to see him here so early after the cataclysmic event which occurred in another part of the country. However, I am always glad to see the hon. member for whom I have, as he knows, great affection if not always the fullest appreciation. The minister has to realize, I think, that the statement he made in the estimates committee does not meet the point that I have raised.

In any event, all members of this committee were not members of the estimates committee, and on a matter of this sort I think we are entitled to have all members learn what the government's policy is, as stated by the minister in the pages referred to in the estimates committee report.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): All members of this committee receive copies of the estimates committee report. It does not seem to me that it is necessary for me to go through all that evidence again in the committee of the whole.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I make one final observation? I can only conclude from what the minister has said that he is going to continue to give serious, conscientious study to this problem on which he has spent so much of his valuable time already.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member can rest assured I will certainly be doing that with the utmost vigour.

Mr. Pascoe: In view of the fact that I consider the Saskatchewan government gives little credit to the federal government for financial contributions to the programs listed in this vote, would the minister give the committee a breakdown of the federal contributions to the Saskatchewan government for old age assistance, blind persons' allowances, disabled persons' allowances and unemployment assistance?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The sums are, old age assistance, $1,757,281; allowances to blind persons, $195,614; disability allowances, $433,-211; unemployment assistance, $1,828,313.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister able to inform the house as to exactly who determines the regulations or conditions governing the means tests as they apply in the case of old age assistance, blind persons' allowances and disabled persons' allowances? Which level of government is responsible for laying down all the details and conditions?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, these are set out in regulation form. They are discussed by the advisory committee. I mentioned earlier that this committee met last autumn. At that time there were some changes suggested in these regulations, which were agreed upon and which have since been agreed to by the provinces and put in form by the justice department.

Mr. Regier: Is the means test equal in each of the provinces? Is the means test for residents of British Columbia exactly the same as it is for a resident of Alberta or Saskatchewan?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The federal provisions are exactly the same.

Mr. Regier: Would the minister admit that each provincial government is able to impose its own conditions in addition to the conditions that apply nationally?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): As long as they meet the federal conditions. We would not share in any extra costs; we would only share the moneys that were paid out under federal regulations.

Mr. Regier: I think the minister somewhat misunderstood me. Is the minister admitting that the provincial government is able to add additional handicaps to the regulations before an individual is eligible?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, I would not say that.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister might then explain how a province has any right to impose conditions of its own, if it is not by way of limitation or the imposition of extra handicaps?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, there would be nothing in the way of limitations in that respect, but they might decide to pay something extra.

Mr. Regier: Would the minister then care to say that no province is imposing any limitations that prevent anyone from receiving these allowances or these pensions, that no province is able to impose any of these limitations if they do not apply in any other province?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): All provinces must abide by the federal regulations, and we will only participate in these cost-sharing plans if the provinces are following the federal regulations.

Mr. Regier: May I be a little more specific? If our regulation was that a man may have $2,000 in the bank and yet be eligible for old age assistance, can the provincial government hold that within that province a man may have only $1,000 in the bank?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Chairman, this is not so. They must abide by our regulations in these cost-sharing plans. If the hon. member has something in mind where some variance seems to have occurred I would be pleased to hear about it and look into it.

Mr. Herridge: Is it correct to say that the means test regulations are drafted by the federal government and agreed to by the provinces before they are applied in that province? The province accepts the regulations and agrees to them after discussion?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Peters: Is the minister able to explain why there is such a large decrease in the old age assistance payments? The tendency normally is for them to go up.

Mr. Pallett: Increased prosperity.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I have not any real explanation. The monthly expenditure for the current year has shown an increase of approximately $6,000 per month. It seems that we estimated a little high last year, and that is the explanation. There was an overestimate in 1959-60. The actual expenditure was $30,349,000, so we are estimating for $30,900,000 this year.

Mr. Herridge: With respect to the statutory unemployment assistance, it has increased from $20,960,000 to $38,660,000 this year or an increase of $17 million. Does that increase indicate that the government expects a continued high level of unemployment?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, this increase results from the fact that the province of Quebec signed an agreement with the federal government effective July 1, 1959.

General—

254. Grants to health and welfare and related organizations, as detailed in the estimates, $243,250.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, I am very interested in this item. I notice that we are contributing a considerable amount of money to various health and welfare organizations in Canada. I should like to refer specifically tonight to the donation of $35,000 to the Canadian welfare council. I quite realize that they are doing wonderful work but at this time I should like to refer to part of the report of the president of the council for 1958. I wish to read part of the report to substantiate my argument.

> Because of the nature of our membership, we act from time to time as spokesman for welfare interests in Canada, and it seems to me that the council has for this reason a particular and effective place in Canadian life. Two recent activities illustrate this function. Last year when we had a large influx of refugees from Europe, the council acted both as a spokesman and a co-ordinator in resolving many of the problems which arose. Then the council's discussions of certain social security issues stimulated our members' interest and drew outstanding participants from a wide field.
> There are two sides to this role of spokesman. One is that the community at large or legislative bodies look to the council for advice, counsel and suggestions. The other is that any or all groups and individuals with an interest in social welfare find in the council a forum for the expression of their views, and frequently discussion leads to an influential public statement on social welfare policy.
> But of course national planning and action is only one side of our activities. In this report, which gives examples of our work in all its branches, we can look beyond the reports, surveys, conferences and briefs to governments. We can see a homeless child placed in a new home by an agency the council has helped to improve its practices; old people benefiting from a program set up with council advice; an unemployed man regaining his self-respect through financial assistance and services the council has worked to bring about; an ex-convict going straight because of help the council has promoted.

I have only read part of the report of the president of the Canadian welfare council for 1958. Within the last couple of days a case has been brought to my attention which is actually not a welfare case but I wish to bring it up at this time. A young lad with his wife and three very small children got off the train in Ottawa the day before yesterday and we were very fortunate in being able to take care of them for one night. In the meantime we got in touch with various people for advice and assistance without receiving any help at all. We got in touch with practically all the social service agencies in Ottawa, the traveller's aid, the public welfare society, neighbourhood services, city services, social services, the Salvation Army and last of all a member of the Department of National Health and Welfare, in order to try to solve the problem.

As I look at the picture now, no one has been able to do anything for a Canadian citizen who has served in the armed services overseas. This is an emergency that should be met now, not tomorrow, not next week, not next month. It was necessary that something be done today and it was impossible for us to find anybody in the city of Ottawa or the government department who could deal with this case on an emergency basis.

If leadership is being given by the Canadian welfare council to local organizations such as I have mentioned, then something is definitely lacking because the incident I have described should not have taken place under any circumstances. I have looked through this report and I find that immediate assistance can be given to indigent travellers, to refugees and to immigrants coming into the country. It can be given to prisoners who are out on parole and it can also be given to offenders released from our penitentiaries.

But no assistance or help, and I am speaking now of immediate help, can be given to a Canadian citizen who comes to the city of Ottawa or any other Canadian city. He is not able to get any immediate help to look after his wife and his children until certain applications have been made, investigations have been carried out and all the red tape has been gone through. I am simply using this case as an example and I am not reflecting on some of the good work this organization does accomplish. Nevertheless, I think some action should be taken to look after cases which require immediate attention.

After spending two days on this problem there is, as far as I can see, no welfare service that is capable of or able to handle problems on an emergency basis without going through a tremendous amount of formality. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the committee. I hope that some good will come out of my having done so and that the minister will find time to look into the matter through the welfare department.

[Mr. McFarlane.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the minister would like to deal with this matter.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I thought that the hon. member might have something to say on this item so I was waiting.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was going to deal with something else.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Is it on this item?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. However, before mentioning what I have in mind with regard to what has been said by the hon. member who has just spoken about the Canadian welfare council, may I say that while I can understand his frustration, I do not believe that body should be indicated for the failure of existing machinery to deal with the case which he has quite properly brought to our attention. If it is possible for us, as it is and as I think it should be, to provide assistance to the needy not only in our own country but in other countries such as assistance for refugees, it would be difficult to argue that we should not provide assistance to our own people. Under the public assistance act it would be possible to provide assistance in the case mentioned by my hon. friend if the province to which the individual had come had an agreement with the province from which he came providing for a reciprocal arrangement. It is surprising to me that it was not possible for the hon. member to get some indication from the various sources he mentioned as to how help might be provided. Because of the particular experience he had with regard to this case I do not think he would want to imply that the national welfare council is not a body that should not receive the support of parliament. The Canadian national welfare council was strongly supported this afternoon by the hon. member for Kootenay West who at one time, I believe, was one of its national executives and may still be. In any event, he was.

This is a body of public-spirited citizens who do not provide relief administration but who are mainly concerned with promoting an interest in and an understanding of social welfare problems and social security programs. The minister will recall that yesterday I referred to a submission which had been made to the government of Canada in 1958, in 1959 and again this year by the Canadian national welfare council. That body had pointed out that commendable as was the social security program there were existing gaps, there was a pattern yet to be fully formulated and that as a means of accurately defining activities in social security by the two senior levels of government and also for the purpose of making an assessment of the flexibility of the existing programs, a royal commission should be appointed by the government. This point was also emphasized by the hon. member for Kootenay West but the minister has not given us a reply as to whether the government proposes to accept the suggestion made by the national welfare council.

Supplementary questions were asked on this subject during the present session, and I find that the point of view of the national welfare council was referred to by implication recently in an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal. That article posed the question: "Are Canada's social security laws being abused?" We recall that there have been references this session to the alleged abuse of certain social welfare measures in this country. I think that some of these abuses have possibly been overemphasized and, again, others may not have been recognized, but I think the minister should indicate to the committee what consideration he has given to this recommendation of the national welfare council.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Presumably the hon. gentleman means the Canadian welfare council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What consideration has been given to the suggestion of the Canadian welfare council that a royal commission should be appointed and, more especially, will the minister tell the committee whether he accepts the projection as to the future of the Canadian welfare council, particularly in the representations it made in January, 1960.

Mr. Herridge: I support what the hon. member for Essex East has said. While the hon. member for Kootenay East was speaking there was some conversation around me and I did not hear his opening remarks clearly, but in general I endorse what the hon. member for Essex East had to say. The Canadian welfare council has done a magnificent job. Its national offices here are, of course, to deal essentially with policy and administrative questions. When I listened to the commendable efforts made to assist one unfortunate person, I thought the case demonstrated very clearly one of the points made by the Canadian welfare council in its policy statement and its representations to the Canadian government. It is obvious that in this case no one is taking any responsibility for assisting this unfortunate person.

I do not recall whether the hon. member for Kootenay East mentioned that he was a veteran or, in that case, whether the Legion authorities here in Ottawa were contacted. I am sure that if he was a veteran, and if they had been told, the Legion officials would have assisted him at least on a temporary basis until he could be settled.

I suggest this situation adds weight to the argument made by the hon. member for Essex East and later by the hon. member for Kootenay West that there are gaps in our national welfare system which have to be filled, and I trust the minister will have a few words to say with regard to the unfortunate case which has been brought to his attention.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): First, I cannot express myself too strongly about the particular situation which arose on that occasion, and if the hon. member for Kootenay East will bring this question to my notice personally I shall be happy to examine it and see what might be done in the future to prevent a similar situation from arising. I should like to think that such an unfortunate situation would never have to arise in this Canada of ours. However, I do not suppose we shall ever be perfect. We have made a great deal of headway during the last few years, I think there can be no doubt about that, and I trust that as time goes on all these gaps will eventually be closed.

The hon. member for Essex East brought in another angle concerning the Canadian welfare council, suggesting that I did not reply to a question directed to me asking whether the government had considered the proposals made to us by that body. I did reply in this vein earlier in the afternoon. I do not know whether the hon. member was present or not. However, I did at one time during the afternoon link portable pensions, the Clark report and the representations of the Canadian welfare council in one loop, so to speak, in that they are all being considered in one context. I do not have anything further to add. We have these representations under consideration continuously.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I cannot say that I am happy with the minister's reply. I have tried now three times to elicit information on this subject but I have not succeeded, and I can only characterize my efforts in terms of a distinguished British ambassador and say this represents on my part the failure of a mission.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Don't admit it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is that?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Carry on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the list of national associations which are given financial assistance as set out on page 352 I note that there is one organization which is not included. It may be that assistance is being given to this body under the national health grants. I certainly know that when the heart foundation was established in Canada under the presidency, first, of Mr. Douglas Ambridge, I think, there was a commitment made that if a request was put to the government, such request would receive very sympathetic and, I believe, we said, even favourable consideration. I do not know whether since 1957 such a request has been made or, if it has been made, whether assistance has been provided out of the national health grants program for that organization. But I do urge the minister to give careful consideration to assisting the Canadian heart foundation.

Illnesses of the heart represent the major cause of death in our country. We have had examples from the membership of this house which indicate the strength and the relevancy of this statement. We know of its existence all over the country. The federal government is, I believe, or was at one time, providing assistance toward research into heart diseases through the Dr. David institution in Montreal and through a research body in Toronto which engages in the study of heart diseases. But more than this is required.

Since the heart foundation is not referred to here I am wondering if the department is giving any financial assistance, (a) for research into heart diseases and (b) into the operations of the heart foundation which is a body that receives support from the public but because of the primacy of this particular disease it would seem to me it warrants some special consideration by the government of Canada.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, the government of Canada is certainly giving this foundation very special consideration. I would point out that as an assistance to the organization in itself no request of this type has ever been received similar to the situation that obtained when the hon. member who has just taken his seat occupied the ministerial chair. I would also reply, however, that there are substantial funds from the health grants which go to studies and research of this nature. Concerning assistance in this respect I may say that substantial funds for the purchase of special equipment and research studies have been provided through the general public health grant. For example, aid is given to the Ontario heart foundation which sponsors a program of clinical research in this field. I would imagine that answers the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Were those grants given this year? Does what the hon. gentleman said relate to this year?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I cannot definitely tie that in with this year but may I say that it goes on continuously. There may not be a similar amount each year but certainly there is something given every year.

Item agreed to.

255. Civil defence health, welfare and training services, $4,593,008.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, does the minister intend to make a statement on this item?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Chairman, I made a statement in my opening remarks covering this department's responsibility in the field of civil defence.

Mr. Weichel: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us how many civil defence organizations there are across Canada?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but we do not appear to have readily available information as to the number of civil defence organizations across the country.

Mr. Weichel: The reason I asked that question is that I wondered if the minister would care to comment concerning whether we have a number that might give us adequate protection.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Let me deal with that question in this way. I have publicly made the statement before and I repeat that when I first came into this department it was four days before I realized that civil defence was under my department. My experience in the first year was to say the least very frustrating. There seemed to be no out on the whole matter. I have to say this and I do not do so in a spirit of disparagement or anything of that nature. I believe that as far as civil defence is concerned the question has always been one involving a certain amount of frustration for the department. Upon considering the whole picture the government undertook to revamp the entire civil defence set-up. This has taken some time but I believe we have at last achieved a functional form of national survival which can be and will be effective if the need arises.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I can understand the minister's difficulties in this matter.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member should.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When the minister says he experienced frustration at the beginning of his administration with regard to civil defence, that, too, I can understand, because civil defence is one of the most difficult assignments which could be entrusted to a government or a department of government. Difficult and frustrating as it may be, however, as long as we are going to spend public money in this matter we have to explain policy, discipline our frustrations and present a report about the usage of moneys which we are asking the taxpayers of Canada to provide.

It is in the light of that background that I approach the question. I feel it would not be right for us to pass these estimates in this parliament without some consideration of this important problem. If one has any doubt about how important it is all one has to do is to think what would happen if for any reason there were set in motion those agencies of human destruction which civil defence is designed to try to meet.

The budget for civil defence in the fiscal year 1959-60 was $7,220,817; it is given for 1960-61 as $4,593,008, a decrease of $2,627,809. Am I right in saying that the decrease is because of the assignment of civil defence functions to the office of the privy council and to the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister says, "Yes". The total amount of moneys—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could intervene for just a moment. There are really three reasons for this reduction. The emergency health service has increased 10 per cent or approximately $325,000 mainly due to an increase in the cash provision for the medical stockpile and portable hospital programs. The second reason is that emergency welfare and training services remained at about the same level but major decreases are due to the deletion of provisions for those functions which have been transferred from this department; namely (1) $2 million for grants to provinces for general civil defence purposes; (2) $913,950 for the acquisition of equipment resulting from the deletion of provisions for warning systems such as mobile broadcasting transmitters, sirens and a federal civil defence radio station at Arnprior, Ontario; (3) $215,000 for professional special services mainly related to siren installation costs; (4) $134,207 in salaries and wages resulting from the deletion of 40 positions; (5) $102,652 no longer provided for the lease of communication services; and, offsetting this gross decrease, is the assurance of a bulk reduction applied to this vote in 1959-60 in the amount of $752,000.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was about to say that the total amount spent for civil defence by the Department of National Health and Welfare, the office of the privy council and the Department of National Defence basically is the same as last year. Can the minister give us the figures?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I cannot give the figure for the Department of National Defence without looking at the details but I know that the figure for that department is up considerably and the figure for our department is down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would it be up over half a million dollars?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Oh, more than that; E.M.O. is up considerably; the office of the privy council also.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The fact that civil defence is now assigned to three departments does make a review of the matter in the immediate perspective somewhat difficult. My own calculations had been that the total expenditures for all three divisions of government were not much over half a million dollars.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Oh, yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On purely civil defence matters I think the minister will find this is the case. In national defence they are charging up to civil defence some matters which normally were charged up to the Department of National Defence before the division of powers, and the functions being carried on in respect of those expenditures are no different. When we come to analyse the total expenditures I think it will be found that my statement is correct.

The government appointed Lieutenant General Graham, former chief of staff, to make on behalf of the government of Canada a survey of all aspects of Canada's civil defence. We did ask the government to give us this report, but he regarded it as confidential. Although it had been discussed with the provinces it was felt that the government was not disposed to give its recommendations to parliament. I regret that because it would give us an opportunity, apart from security matters, to make an assessment of the recommendations of General Graham.

The Prime Minister said on March 23, 1959 that the government had decided to make rearrangements in the division of responsibility for civil defence. As I understand it, the health and welfare aspects of civil defence continue to be the responsibility of the hon. gentleman and his department. The emergency measures organization is to be attached to the privy council and it is to co-ordinate the work of other agencies in the field of civil defence planning and the like. The Department of National Defence is to be entrusted with the responsibility of warning of an attack, the location and the monitoring of explosions and radioactive fallout, the assessment of damaged areas, contamination and clearing of such areas and the rescue of the injured.

It seems to us that the minister ought to explain the situation as he has done so only in part in the committee. We ought now to be given this information because of the importance of the matter if for no other purpose than emphasizing to the public what the chain of authority is.

The minister is in charge of health and welfare measures. The office of the privy council is in charge of the work of co-ordination. The army is in charge of those functions which I have just outlined. The Prime Minister told us that the Minister of National Defence is the minister to whom one must look for ministerial direction in the first instance. Since in the national health and welfare report reference is made to the emergency measures organization one, I think, must ask the minister which minister, the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or the Minister of Justice, which of those four, is responsible for the decision that must be taken in the event of an emergency. Is it a decision that must be made by the Prime Minister? What active interest does the Prime Minister have in the particular responsibility which comes under the privy council? Is this matter left to the Minister of National Defence? If an attack were to take place tomorrow and a very important decision had to be made which one of the four ministers would make the decision?

The Prime Minister said that the question was one that should be addressed to the Minister of National Defence. The Minister of National Defence says it is one that should be addressed to the Prime Minister. This matter ought to be resolved so that we shall have a clear idea as to where—in the event that what we all hope sincerely will never happen, does happen—the ultimate authority and responsibility lie. I am asking the minister now on these estimates to outline the facts for us.

I should also like to know from the minister when the last meeting of the federal-provincial advisory committee was held? In the report of the department at page 121 reference is made to the fact that early in 1958 such a meeting was held with provincial ministers from all of the 10 provinces and at that meeting a committee was established on a continuing basis for the purpose of maintaining a continuing interest and concern in civil defence policy between the two jurisdictions. When was the last meeting held? To what extent are the provinces fully acquainted with all of the plans of the federal government? What about the question that I have just mentioned, the ultimate authority and chain of authority? What is the situation with regard to compensation agreements? Have all the provinces now an agreement with the federal government in the matter of compensation?

I understand that in January of last year an extension was made to some of the agreements covering enrolled civil defence workers while engaged in operations arising out of natural disaster as opposed to civil defence. Since the minister deals with sirens, line rental and maintenance, as indicated in the report at page 123, what is the situation in that regard? Are sirens still regarded as effective instruments of alert? Under which minister does a matter of this kind come?

With regard to the information services division, is there a special civil defence information service division serving all the departments concerned, or is there an information service division in the matter of civil defence for each department? These are questions to which I think we should have some reply.

Then I should like to know from the minister how many civil defence workers on the health and welfare side he estimates we now have in the country? If he is in a position to give us the over-all picture that will also be of immense value.

On the welfare side, which is unmistakably, of course, the responsibility of the minister, I understand that at the end of 1959 we had some progress in the organization of welfare services in at least five provinces. These provinces I think were Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Has there been any expansion since that time?

In the field of emergency feeding, what progress has been made in developing the program the government had in mind when it made its report?

Now the minister in his report at page 26 says that some time ago seven hospital disaster institutes were held across the country for the purpose of studying hospital disaster plans. When was that? Was it in 1959 or in 1958? Have there been any similar institutes held in the past year? This is obviously a matter that comes within the present responsibilities of the minister. Were there any courses held at the civil defence college within the last calendar or fiscal year for physicians, dentists and other health workers? Perhaps the minister would give us an indication of the work that is now being done by the radiological defence group. This is a very important matter. Some reference was made to some aspects of this today in another context by the minister, but perhaps he would find it possible to expand his remarks in this connection.

Then I should like to ask the minister what progress has been made with regard to civil defence organization in the civil service itself. These are some of the matters to which I direct the minister's attention in an effort to try to assist him in what I recognize at once is a very difficult task.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I am glad the hon. member does not have a birthday every day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We will not have a very happy birthday unless we take every precaution we know how to take within this difficult context to deal with this difficult situation. If we are going to spend this much money we ought to have a clear case made for what we have done. The minister has not told us what the government is thinking. Do they feel we should do more or are we taking a calculated risk? Our pattern, I know, is not unlike that of the United States. However, I am sure I need not remind the minister of the continuous criticisms that are made in this country with respect to this matter. He has received them, just as I have received them. Does he not think he ought to take advantage of this opportunity of explaining exactly what he has in mind?

If he will do me the honour of looking back at some of my pearls of wisdom which were uttered when I sat where he is he will find that I faced this situation squarely. I did not fail to disclose anything. I discussed the matter frankly. I discussed the question of evacuation. I discussed the question of shelter. The minister has not told us anything about evacuation. We know now that that is no longer the policy of the government, but the only statement we have had on that was a statement by the Minister of National Defence to the effect that evacuation was no longer our policy.

What is our policy in connection with shelter? The other day the Prime Minister tabled a pamphlet in which we were given instructions on the building of a shelter. The shelter is to be built by individuals. In spite of that, a civil defence official from the province of Ontario was speaking the other day in Windsor and he said the province was taking steps, in co-operation with the federal government, to provide assistance to individuals in the construction of shelters. Is that the policy of the government? We certainly have been told nothing about that.

This and many other engaging questions in this field, I think merit more than a brief, terse, businesslike statement from so imaginative a minister as my friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I must say that I cannot cope with the hon. member for Essex East when it comes to imagination. First of all, Mr. Chairman, I could not possibly reply at this stage to all the questions which were suggested or which perhaps should be asked. I do not believe the hon. member actually came out and said, I should like to know this. He was suggesting that perhaps I should say something or other.

I should like to remind him, first of all, that there has been quite a change in the oragnization of civil defence which I think will be an improvement and for the betterment of the country. I cannot help but feel that the hon. member perhaps has not fully assimilated the changes that have taken place. Perhaps he has had quite a bit of ground to cover in his present position and it may be a little difficult to keep on top of every move that is made. I fully appreciate that. I sympathize with him in this respect. I should like to point out only one thing. If war were to come, and I mean this very sincerely, I feel there would be only one job for the government of Canada, headed by the Prime Minister of Canada, and that would be the survival of the Canadian citizens to the greatest extent possible. Now, under those circumstances, that is the thing for which we are working.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Essex East asked the minister if he was going to make a statement on this very important question he said he had already made a statement in his speech. I looked up his speech and I found there were a few brief paragraphs dealing with this very important question in connection with which the committee is being asked tonight to vote $4,503,000. This is not good enough.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I beg to differ, Mr. Chairman. There are many more paragraphs in my opening remarks to the estimates committee. The hon. member should check back on my report to the estimates committee.

Mr. Herridge: I am referring to the minister's reply to the hon. member for Essex East when the hon. member asked if the minister was going to make a statement tonight and the minister referred to his opening remarks on these estimates. We have three departments concerned with civil defence, national defence, veterans affairs and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And privy council.

Mr. Herridge: And privy council. Why are we not able to get an over-all statement on the situation? When the national defence estimates come before us the minister will say that the militia is involved to such and such an extent and that is about all. We do not know what General Graham's report was or what he recommended. In so far as veterans affairs are concerned, we have heard very little to date from that department with regard to civil defence. We have the minister's very brief statement on these estimates. I do believe that even though the minister did make a statement before the committee, this matter is of such importance he should deal with it at greater length before this committee.

Only a certain percentage of the hon. members can attend committee meetings, and I think this is information which the public should be given as frequently as possible so that the public understands the situation. Like the hon. member for Essex East, we would like to know who makes the decisions under certain circumstances. We would like to know how the three departments concerned are getting along with the provinces. The minister, in his opening remarks in this connection, in the two paragraph to which I referred, said that he hoped—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I must take exception to that. My opening remarks to the estimates committee start on page 24 of the report and end on page 28. The hon. member is not giving a correct inference. He should check on the committee reports which are delivered to his office.

Mr. Herridge: I have read some of the committee reports, but I have not had time to read them all.

An hon. Member: You have not done your homework.

Mr. Herridge: I can tell the hon. member that if he does his homework as well as do the members of this group he will do well indeed.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You would not be on your feet if that were the case.

Mr. Herridge: There are other matters that are not even raised in the minutes. I think the hon. member for Essex East was quite correct when he said we would like to know the degree of co-operation with the provinces. The minister says that he hopes there will be similar re-organization in the provinces—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Where do I say that?

Mr. Herridge: In this report made to this committee.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): What page?

Mr. Herridge: Page 5248 of Hansard for June 22, 1960. The minister said that it is hoped that similar types of organizations will be formed at the provincial level. This is purely a hope. We should know why it is only a hope at this stage because civil defence has been going on for a number of years and money has been voted year after year. The members of this group think we should have from the minister—I am not asking for a great deal of repetition—at least a summary of the situation as it exists today with respect to the organization of civil defence in the federal field and the co-operative arrangements with the provinces and municipalities. I think the hon. member for Essex East was quite correct in suggesting that this was the place for the minister to make a brief statement of the situation for the information of the members of the house and the public.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I think I made quite an extensive statement on civil defence as it concerns my department. I do not propose under any circumstances to go into civil defence as it concerns other departments. I do not think I should be called upon to do that. I do not propose to do it. We are responsible for emergency health services and emergency welfare services and the operation of the civil defence college at Arnprior.

Mr. Herridge: Why is it that under the heading of civil defence there are nine pages in the report of the department which cover a number of matters other than those that come strictly under the jurisdiction of the department itself?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I want to be fair with the minister but I do not think he is being fair with himself.

Mr. Monteith: I am being more than fair with you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What was that remark?

Mr. Monteith: I said I was being more than fair with you, but only because it is your birthday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the hon. member for being considerate with me. I need that kind consideration. I greatly appreciate it. But nevertheless, we have an obligation to perform in the opposition and the minister's generous treatment of opposition members must not in any way interfere with what we regard as our duty. The minister says that he made a statement in the defence committee—I have it before me here—of six pages on that account he is precluded from the obligation of making a statement to this committee.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No. I made a statement yesterday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Kootenay West—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): He said there are two paragraphs and there are many more.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know the number of them. I do not think there were many more.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Look at your copy of Hansard.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I did so. In any event, whether there were two paragraphs or three paragraphs—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): There were eight paragraphs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says there were eight paragraphs. That does not represent in my judgment a very comprehensive statement on civil defence. We are now in the parliament of our country discussing a matter of great importance. We have the right to know what is the policy of the government in this matter. If the minister continues speaking, as he did at the beginning, I will understand his predicament. I think it was a difficult problem. We all appreciate that fact. Our effort here in this matter should be to assist, and I say this to him sincerely because we recognize how difficult this problem is.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I thank the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister does not help himsdelf when we seek information from him. In answer to the hon. member who has just taken his seat he takes the position that as he is responsible for health and welfare measures, that he should not be called upon to deal with other matters that since March 23, 1959, have come under the jurisdiction of the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and himself and, in so far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are concerned, the Minister of Justice.

However, I would point out to the minister that he presented parliament with a report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959. That report deals with all of the activities in the field of civil defence during the period from January 1 to March, 1959 and the period from April, 1958 to the end of December, 1958; and that refers to such questions as compensation agreements, financial assistance, siren installation, supplies and equipment.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Is the hon. member actually discussing the estimates for next year in the year ending March 31, 1959?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Are we not discussing next year's estimates?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely on the discussion of next year's estimates one is entitled to detect what government policy is in the light of what the government has done during the past fiscal year or other years.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The hon. member has gone back two years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It does not matter whether I go back ten years. That is the privilege of debate. My hon. friend may not like my argument but he certainly cannot take issue with my desire to build up a case, as I see it, referring to policies that he has pursued. All through this report reference is made not only to health and welfare measures but to engineering, training and education. There is reference here to the Canadian civil defence college. A few moments ago I asked the minister what about the civil defence organization in the government of Canada. I asked him when was the last meeting between the provincial and federal governments. I received no reply to that question.

All the minister said—and I believed him when he said this, of course—was that this was a difficult problem and that he and the Prime Minister who were in charge of civil defence were doing their best. I have not any doubt about that, but I want to know what constitutes their best. That is the great difficulty that we have with the minister, not only with regard to civil defence but other matters as well. I say to him, as Mr. Humphrey Mitchell used to say, in the kindliest way, that my hon. friend when confronted with a problem tells us that the matter is receiving study. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is, in my judgment, the most studious minister of those who sit on the ministerial benches. However, we do not want only a scholar sitting in the ministry, we also want a man of action. The minister is a man of action. I ask him now to show that such is the case.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I cannot go beyond my responsibility of dealing with civil defence as it resides in this current year in the Department of National Health and Welfare. I would mention this to the hon. member who is in a very conciliatory mood today as usual, but particularly today. I should like to mention that a conference was held on, I gather, the last Friday before April 27, 1959. I can only say that because I have here a copy of the question that was asked of me by the hon. member for York-Humber as to giving the house a report on the civil defence conference with the provinces that took place "last Friday". This question was asked on April 27, so I presume that was the date. I should like to mention this. I do not have, as the hon. member for Waterloo North reported earlier, the number of units across Canada but I have the approximate number of civil defence workers who attended courses. During 1957-58 there were 3,524 and in 1959 or during the calendar year 1959, 2,737.

Then there is within my responsibility the civil defence college at Arnprior, and I should be glad to answer any questions with respect thereto. We continue to hold courses. There was a very interesting course not long ago which was arranged by the province of Ontario actually, at which many of the mayors and the officials of the province of Ontario were present. These conferences go on week after week. Incidentally, during 1959 there were staff courses, including all phases of civil defence planning and operations; indoctrination courses on civil defence for physicians, dentists, nurses and pharmacists. Welfare courses in organization, emergency feeding, personal services, emergency lodging, registration and inquiry; radiological defence courses; techniques of instruction; rescue courses; casualty simulation courses; indoctrination conference of agrologists from provincial and federal departments of agriculture and forums on communications and engineering.

Special courses in civil defence indoctrination and rescue were again conducted for the training of personnel of the armed services. The Department of National Defence also took advantage of the course schedule, primarily for civilians, to train a large number of officers and warrant officers in civil defence procedures.

Just as a matter of history, the civil defence college was established in Arnprior during 1953. The main function of the college is to train key civil defence personnel at federal, provincial and local levels and, in addition, to train civil defence instructors for all levels of civil defence authority.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the minister has gone somewhat further than he did at the outset in answer to the question raised by the hon. member for Essex East, but he did make a statement a moment ago which I think is a strange one and which I think he should explain to the committee. He said in effect that so far as civil defence was concerned, he was going to deal with the matters that affected his department and his department only and was not going to enter into the fields of other departments. I think the committee is entitled to more than that.

If it is a fact that civil defence is a matter which concerns several departments then we should have the over-all policy as it concerns these other departments or otherwise the ministers who are responsible in part for the over-all policy should be here and should report to the house on that policy. I know that from time to time the Prime Minister has made statements of a general nature, but I do not know that any minister rising in his place has spoken on behalf of all the others.

If we are going to have to ask each minister to deal with that portion of this matter which is under his jurisdiction, then we will not know what the over-all position is. For that reason I think the statement made by the minister is not a proper one. I do not think it is the kind of statement that the committee should accept. Certainly it is not the kind of statement that should be expected in a matter of this importance.

I do not want to repeat what has been said by those who have spoken. I think we all realize that this is a matter of extreme and grave importance for every citizen of Canada, and I think it behooves the minister, whose estimate reads "civil defence, health, welfare and training services" to give to the committee the over-all position as it affects other departments as well as his own so that the committee will have before it, when considering the last item of his estimates, the position so far as the various departments are affected.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Chairman, this is a bunch of nonsense, if I may say so. I do not think we were required to do so by any means, but the Minister of National Defence was requested to come before the estimates committee and give evidence, as were the officials of the emergency measures organization, including the clerk of the privy council. I think the hon. member for Laurier is completely wrong in suggesting that these officials should be here tonight. The hon. member has seen or has had an opportunity to see the evidence given before the estimates committee and I do not think this committee should be called upon to go further. As Minister of National Health and Welfare I do not think I should be called upon to go one step beyond accounting for my estimates concerning the emergency and welfare services.

We did our best to co-operate in the estimates committee. The Minister of National Defence did his best. He appeared before several meetings. As the hon. member for Essex East knows, there were several times when he could not be present at meetings and so it was arranged that the Minister of National Defence would attend when the hon. member could be present. The greatest of co-operation was shown, and in my estimation what the hon. member is saying is simply nonsense.

Mr. Matthews: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak on this important subject because I thought it was well in hand all the way through. I can well remember that the minister made arrangements for two civil defence displays and that it was open to all members of the house to go and see what was being done and what was in store for people in case of an emergency. I attended. I do not recall whether the three members who have been doing so much talking tonight were there, but they had the opportunity to attend. I will go further and say that if they would shut up and listen they would learn more. I want to say that I have found from experience in the House of Commons that a lot of loud talking does not constitute an education. I have found that out.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not think the remarks made by the last speaker are going to deter anyone on this side of the house from insisting on what we think are our responsibilities and our rights in this matter. Even though it was discussed in another committee, the House of Commons is entitled to get the information which has been requested. I thank the minister for saying that the remarks I made earlier were nothing but a bunch of nonsense, but I should like to recall the attitude taken on more than one occasion by government members when they were in the opposition. I can think of one particular item which concerned more than one department and I know what the opposition did at that time. They insisted that the two ministers responsible for the matter should be present and give the house the information and details required.

It is not necessary to have the officials here. The minister should have his colleagues here to give us the additional information, and he says there is, which falls under the jurisdiction of other departments in connection with the over-all policy. That he has not done. He has replied by saying that is bunkum. That is all right. The record is there and can be seen by those who want to read it.

But I repeat again what was said on more than one occasion by those hon. members who sat on this side of the house. When matters fell within the jurisdiction of two ministers there was the strongest insistence that the ministers be here so that we would have the over-all policy. The minister continues to state that he is not going to do that. That is his business, but I am telling him now that the House of Commons is entitled not only to part of the situation but the whole of it and his colleagues who are responsible for the other parts should be here to explain the matter to the House of Commons.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could say a word on this matter because some little responsibility falls on me in that I was chairman of the committee to which reference has been made. The three other elements in the national survival program were investigated by the committee. Surely that was the purpose of the estimates committee and when we now have before us one vote in the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare surely that is the subject matter for us to consider at this point.

Under the principle of the committee system and because of the interlocking nature of the other elements, national defence and the privy council, it was considered advisable by the standing committee at that time that they should be brought into the picture. With the flexibility of the committee system, all members of the house, including the hon. member for Essex East, had an opportunity to examine every aspect of national survival, and that is where the whole problem of civil defence and national survival should be considered. I would remind the hon. member for Laurier that this was done and that, like every other member, he has access to the full deliberations of this committee with respect to the three separate votes brought before the committee at that time.

I am also bound to note that it is regrettable that certain members of the opposition did not take advantage of the committee meetings to have a full discussion, in accord with the flexibility of the rules of the committee, with respect to all three votes. Surely we are considering one item now in the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and for the hon. member for Laurier to insist that all the people who were heard before the estimates committee be now called is simply an illustration of the kind of thing that is slowing up the business of the house and making the work of the estimates committee of absolutely no use.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his remarks about the flexibility of committees but I would remind him that he has not been in the house so very long.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): It is not becoming to the hon. member for Laurier to make an observation which is not relevant at this point.

Mr. Chevrier: I would remind the hon. member that the flexibility of committees applies not only to the government which is now in office but it applied in former years also.

An hon. Member: It sure did not.

Mr. Chevrier: The flexibility in those years, I will remind the hon. member, applied in so far as at least two committees of this house are concerned, that is, the committee on railways and canals and the committee on railways and shipping to which all matters concerning Canadian National Railways were referred. All the officers of the C.N.R. and those of Trans-Canada Air Lines gave evidence, and repeatedly I would come with my estimates before the house and say: we have discussed these matters in committee. But do you think the members of the opposition would accept that? No, they would not. They insisted upon a discussion of matters which had, very often, been discussed at length in committee. They insisted, not that the officers should be called again—I am not asking for that—but if a minister was not able to give a statement on the over-all policy, then some other minister should come forward and make that kind of statement.

This question of the flexibility of committees should apply in the same sense now as it did when we were in office. I know that repeatedly I would be asked exactly what I am asking those who sit on the other side of the house today and I had to repeat on a number of occasions many of the things which were dealt with by the committees to which I made reference. All I am asking now is, not that the officials be brought back but that time be saved by someone acting on behalf of the government, and in a position to give a picture of the over-all position as far as civil defence is concerned. If that were done I am sure this item would go through quickly.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): It is my regret that I have not been in this house as long as the hon. member for Laurier, but at least I am attempting to live in the present.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope the hon. member for Nanaimo will not take exception if I speak again. He is a new member and I do not wish to take advantage of him—

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Grafftey: We have lots of new members.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are lots of new members, but I can assure them that if they try to abridge us by shouting "shut up" they will not be here very long, because the people of Canada sent us here to discuss these matters in accord with our concept of what is our duty as members of parliament. The very essence of this chamber is that we should have the fullest freedom of discussion without regard to where we sit, and without it being suggested that we should not take up the time of the house. We are here for that purpose, and it is the responsibility of the opposition to scrutinize, as we are endeavouring to do, the policies of the government and its proposed expenditures. We shall not be doing our duty if we bow to suggestions from the numerical strength that surrounds us at the moment that we have taken up too much time. We are taking time in order to elicit information which we have not been able to get.

Mr. Grafftey: Filibuster.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member says "filibuster". I should think that after the experience he had yesterday in Quebec he would not want to be talking about filibusters. I listened with interest to the hon. member for Calgary South—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Would the hon. member permit a question? Accepting, with regret, that the hon. member was, unfortunately, ill, can the hon. gentleman acknowledge how many meetings he attended during the period when this particular department was being discussed? I will tell him if he cannot tell us.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall be glad to. I was going to deal with that in a few moments. The hon. gentleman made a statement a few moments ago, and I thought it was a fair statement. He had a perfect right to make it as chairman of the estimates committee. I went to as many meetings of that particular committee as I could stand. The hon. member for Calgary South, who is an able chairman, depending on one's point of view, would give members of the committee a nod: he would say, you may ask a question now, you may ask three and a half questions, but after that you must give the floor to someone else. The committee became a schoolroom performance—

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): On a point of order, we are completely out of order in discussing the procedure followed in that committee.

Mr. Chevrier: You started it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): But in view of the fact that the hon. member for Essex East has introduced the subject, may I say that he occupied more time during the period he was in the committee than any other member.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, surely the hon. member for Calgary South is the one who introduced the matter of the action in the committee. Now he is complaining about the hon. member for Essex East discussing it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): It is to be noted that I had no reply.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I was saying, the committee was chaired very effectively by the hon. member for Calgary South, depending on one's point of view I soon ascertained that in order to get a clear elucidation of civil defence policy something else would be needed; I was not going to be able to get it in a committee where time was abridged and where I was repeatedly told I was taking up much time.

Now we are in the House of Commons, and we are taking the time. The position we are in is exactly as was stated by the hon. member for Laurier.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those catcalls are not going to hasten in any way our acceptance of this item. We intend to discuss these estimates as long as we think they should be discussed, and if hon. gentlemen want to see them passed I ask them to give the attention implied in the bill of rights shortly to be brought down by the Prime Minister in this house. That means there has to be freedom of discussion, not only outside this chamber but right here within the precincts of parliament itself.

The Chairman: I think the hon. gentleman is right in saying that he can discuss the item which we are considering, but I ask him to come back to that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree, and I hope you will recognize that these interventions warrant—

Mr. Matthews: Before the hon. member goes on any further, I should like to explain something. I should like to explain to the committee and to the hon. member for Essex East that I was not telling anyone to shut up. All I said was that if people would shut up they would hear more. The hon. member for Essex East certainly did sow pearls of wisdom, and perhaps he has pearls of wisdom to sow, but I want him to remember that tapioca pudding looks like pearls but it contains no pearls.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Nanaimo obviously understands the rules of this house, and for that reason I do not propose to take issue with what he has said. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but their laughter will be noted outside this house. The people of Canada will learn that while we are discussing this important matter this government with its large majority has taken the whole subject as lightly as hon. members opposite would take one of the amusing incidents that they might read in their comic strips.

An hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is not a laughing matter. This is something which, as the hon. member for Calgary South said, affects the survival of the people of Canada. In spite of that, hon. gentlemen have treated the subject tonight with a levity rarely seen in parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): On a question of privilege, I certainly do not think that is an appropriate statement for the hon. member for Essex East to make.

Mr. Chevrier: Where is the privilege?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I repeat that statement. Hon. gentlemen opposite—I do not say the minister but hon. gentlemen sitting behind him—have treated this debate with a levity which will be noticed by the Canadian people. What we now say reflects our concern over the fact that the government of Canada does not regard the matter of civil defence as the important issue it is.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East has just made a statement which I think reflects on every hon. member of this committee. Just because the manner in which he made his presentation caused a certain amount of amusement among hon. gentlemen on all sides of the house the hon. member has no right to suggest that our laughter in any way reflects the approach we take to the serious question of civil defence.

Mr. Chevrier: Why do you laugh?

Mr. Morton: We were laughing not at the matter but at the manner in which the hon. member for Essex East and his colleague the hon. member for Laurier have been making a mockery of this debate.

An hon. Member: For political purposes.

Mr. Hodgson: The hon. member for Essex East should be in Hollywood.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not think that valid questions of privilege have been raised. I did not intervene when the hon. member for Davenport was speaking because he comes from the city of Toronto and I know that in that city there is great public interest in civil defence.

Mr. Morton: That is correct.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In the city of Toronto there is also strong criticism of this government in regard to its policy in the matter of civil defence.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): And a great deal more co-operation since the change-over.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I expect that the hon. member for Davenport rose on his question of privilege in order to indicate that he wished to be excluded from the general condemnation that I made about hon. gentlemen opposite. I will therefore exclude the hon. member from that condemnation. I will say that there was one hon. member of the Conservative party who tonight took this matter as seriously as it should be taken and that was the hon. gentleman who just raised the question of privilege.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is only your opinion.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. It is the same question of privilege raised by my friend the hon. member for Davenport. I think the hon. member for Essex East is drawing inferences which are completely false as to the attitude of Conservative members in respect to this highly important question of civil defence.

Mr. Hodgson: The hon. member for Essex East is trying to get ready for the next election.

The Chairman: May I suggest that we stop discussing the personalities of hon. members and return to a discussion of the item under scrutiny.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I believe your suggestion is valuable now and it would have been valuable a few minutes ago before these interruptions took place. The fact is that hon. gentlemen opposite have treated this subject tonight with levity—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members object. I say again that hon. gentlemen opposite have treated this subject with levity.

[Mr. Morton.]

The Chairman: I have just asked for the co-operation of the hon. member for Essex East in not discussing the conduct of hon. members. I invite him instead to direct his attention to the problem of civil defence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I would respectfully suggest to you that my remarks are perfectly in order. I have the right in debate to explain why I take a particular position and why I condemn attitudes with regard to that position. That is what I have done and that is the essence of a free assembly.

The hon. member for Laurier stated the situation as it has always been observed in this committee. Where there is a matter of divided responsibility the government, when confronted with questions as to over-all policy, must be in a position to state that policy. It is true, as the hon. member for Calgary South said, that when we were in the estimates committee the Minister of National Defence, the director of the emergency organization and the clerk of the privy council were present but the Prime Minister who has over-all responsibility was not there. I am not saying that the Prime Minister should have been there because I recognize that he has heavy obligations. We know that those I listed were present. That was a committee of this house. We have the right to discuss policy in this parliament regardless of what went on in a committee of this house. That is what we are doing tonight.

The minister has not satisfied us on the questions we have put to him tonight. The hon. gentleman has not answered all our questions and with some he has not dealt at all. We cannot go any further. When the Minister of National Defence comes before us with his estimates we shall expect him to give us an over-all statement of the problems of civil defence which we were not able to elicit tonight. We will expect that those who are in charge of E.M.O. in the office of the clerk of the privy council will also be here, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of Justice, all of whom have responsibility for civil defence.

As the hon. member for Laurier has said, only by eliciting from the government as a whole what its policy is will we on this side of the chamber feel that we have discharged our duty in scrutinizing these estimates presented by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Spencer: Read the evidence of the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I resent the remark made a moment ago by the hon. member for Davenport when he said that the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Laurier were making a mockery of this debate.

When I rose a moment ago I asked the minister to take responsibility for the other departments that were concerned with civil defence in this country. I emphasized that point on two occasions and I repeated it in so far as it concerned two committees of the house with which I have had some experience and that is as far as I went. That I was entitled to do. My hon. friend has made a grossly exaggerated statement. The hon. gentleman should not have made the statement which he made when he said I was making a mockery of this debate.

I believe that I have the right that is enjoyed by any hon. member of parliament to ask the government questions about the over-all position in so far as the several ministers responsible for civil defence are concerned. If that is making a mockery of this item or of parliament then I want to plead guilty to it.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Chairman, in no way did I wish to imply that the hon. member for Laurier had no right to make any observations he might care to make in this debate. I was objecting to the fact that when a certain atmosphere of amusement was created through the manner of presentation adopted by the hon. member for Essex East and by the hon. member for Laurier in a supporting role the hon. member for Essex East accused hon. members on this side of the chamber of not treating the subject of civil defence with the seriousness it deserved. In taking that attitude the hon. member for Essex East was in my opinion taking an unfair advantage of hon. members of this committee.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I remember making a speech last year on the subject of civil defence. I read at that time a statement about a meeting of the federation of mayors held at Edmonton on August 31, 1955. Present at the meeting were experts from NATO speaking on the subject of civil defence. They stated that the time to take action was at that very time, August 31, 1955. Tonight we are witnessing all the Rip Van Winkles waking up from their long sleep. I am very happy to see that they are finally taking an interest in the question of civil defence. They should have taken action in 1955 when they were warned by their own experts to do so. The experts at the conference to which I referred included General Worthington and experts from NATO and an outstanding doctor who explained the dangers of the situation.

To indicate that action is now being taken I wish to point out that starting tomorrow there will be a bomb shelter exhibited in the city of Winnipeg at the opening of the Red river exhibition. Publicity on the subject will be made available to the citizens of Canada. Last week a pamphlet was issued telling Canadians how to go about building a bomb shelter. When I came to the house in 1958 I had to write to the United States in order to get information about civil defence. The Liberals were in power for a long time but took no action at all in this field despite the fact that their experts advised them to take action in 1955. It is not my wish to take up any more of the valuable time of the committee. I am very happy to see a few of the gentlemen of the old Liberal party wake up tonight.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: This concludes the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Departmental administration—

187. Administration, operation and maintenance, $860,962.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 187 of the blue book, and the details on page 260.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, there is a matter that I wish to point out to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois), and one that I usually raise every time his estimates are being considered by the house. The minister probably knows what I have in mind. It is about the dividing line between the province of Quebec and Ontario in lake St. Francis and in one section of the St. Lawrence river.

I should like to call his attention to this problem again this year, because I think that there might be some chance of finding some answer to it.

In order to be brief and not to delay the house unduly, I shall recall only the broad lines of the problem.

The south boundary between Ontario and Quebec on the St. Lawrence river has never been marked. All other boundaries, to the east, west and north, with a small exception, have been settled as a result of acts of parliament. But the boundary dividing the provinces of Ontario and Quebec has not. This matter has been outstanding for 40 years.

Attempts were made to settle it, boards were established by both provinces and a great deal of progress was made.

I think that this line which runs from la Pointe-au-Beaudet to the international boundary between Canada and the United States opposite Cornwall and which is perhaps 25 miles long has been marked, except for a distance of about 10 miles. It is this 10 mile boundary that should be defined by a board of some sort.

I am convinced, as I have already stated on more than one occasion, that this matter does not strictly come under federal jurisdiction. It is under federal jurisdiction indirectly, so that if both provinces could reach an agreement, the federal government could pass legislation for the purpose of marking this boundary. But the point on which I wish to call the minister's particular attention is that in several instances, I suggested to him that if he invited those two governments to set up such a board, the problem might be settled once and for all.

The circumstances are quite different today from what they were two years ago. Since the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway, there has been a channel extending more on the north side of the St. Lawrence than on the south side. Perhaps some agreement might be reached with the two provinces partly on the basis of that channel. I realize that the matter has been considered, and I know there are a few islands at the upper end of lake Saint Francis that are a cause of dispute between the two provinces. However, while those islands were tremendously important some 20 or 25 years ago—I am not saying they have no importance today—they have lost some of their importance. The federal government is interested in the problem, because it is holding those islands in trust for the Indians. I would ask the minister, therefore, when he deals with the various questions that have been put to him, to tell us whether he intends to make another attempt at settling this problem.

Oh, I am afraid the minister will give me quite a different answer now, because of the recent events.

Mr. Comtois: Not at all.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. minister says "not at all". I am quite pleased at that, because I was speaking quite candidly, and the minister is right in pointing out it is not a political matter. I think the leader of the next Quebec provincial government will be just as willing to settle the problem, because the province of Quebec has as much interest as Ontario in taking a special interest in the problem.

Therefore, I am wondering if the hon. gentleman will not make a new attempt with regard to what I said a few moments ago. If he succeeds, I shall be the first to commend him, because I have told him before, that, when I was at the head of another department than his own, my efforts to settle that issue had not been successful. It is a very delicate problem for people living on both sides of the boundary between Ontario and Quebec. I am speaking, more particularly, of the citizens in the riding of Huntingdon in the province of Quebec, and of the counties of Glengarry and Stormont in Ontario.

The suggestion would prove to be of benefit, not only with regard to the administration of the fishing and hunting legislation, but in the case of accidents which are always liable to happen on the seaway.

As a matter of fact, if there were some accident, if two ships collided, for instance, causing severe damage, it might very well happen that nobody would know if the civil code, which is recognized in Quebec, or the common law of Ontario would apply.

There is no need to stress the point any further. I know that the minister noted my remark, because he told me so personally.

May I only remind him, knowing how kind he is, to ask the governments concerned to establish some commission which would, once and for all, settle that delicate matter.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the last time the estimates were before the committee the hon. member for Yukon did not have an opportunity to get on with his remarks. My speech was incomplete on the first day. The minister spoke to me afterwards about one of my remarks in which I had suggested that the Canadian metal mining association had indicated it wanted a restricted rather than an expanded research program on the part of the government. I have also been in touch with the Canadian metal mining association and I have the original clipping from which I gained the impression. I do not want to apologize particularly, but I took the wrong interpretation from the information I had. In actual fact the association was, I understand, willing to go along with the minister's suggestion that the mining research organization should handle production and ore problems, while the federal government mines department concentrated on basic research. I should explain to the minister that my reason for pushing the interpretation further was the result of a personal conversation I had with someone in the metal mining association who did not represent the official view of the association.

One point I wanted to make to the minister is that in our part of the country there is great concern over the fact that if it is at all possible for a direct reduction steel mill to come into existence we think it would be a powerful thing for our economy. One of the minister's own economists, Mr. Elver, has made an analysis and indicated that either Port Arthur or Seven Islands would be an economic site.

One of the suggestions that has been put forward by groups in our area is that the government consider some kind of subvention such as that now offered to the maritime coal people in order to get their material into the central Canadian market. This suggestion is that a subvention or a subsidy be given in a rather revolutionary approach to get this direct reduction mill into operation. This is something that is completely new in North America, this kind of mill is rather revolutionary and I believe the idea of a subsidy would be revolutionary, too. Perhaps the economist who made this estimation of the prospects for the iron ore industry in Canada might consider what a policy of subventions of various kinds, such as developmental rates, might do for progress in this field.

I feel there will be an important contest in the next decade between Canadian iron ore resources and Venezuelan and African resources in competing for a share of the United States and European markets. Any assistance that we could get that would enable us to get a producer into the field now, especially with such a high value product as is put out by a direct reduction mill, would be of great value.

The last point I want to make concerns, in a sense, an apology to the house. A number of weeks ago I brought up a question with the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with the uranium industry and the tremendous number of telegrams that had been received by the hon. member for Assiniboia as well as other members of the house. I understand the telegrams numbered well over 2,000, and they were dispatched to Ottawa in order to sway political opinion here in favour of Rio Tinto's plans to amalgamate or take up some of the contracts that existed. I think the minister and hon. members may be interested in knowing that the hon. member for Assiniboia and I took the trouble to send replies to several hundred of these people. I sent replies to over 300 people who bothered to send me telegrams. I sent the replies to the names and addresses on those telegrams, but I have received back almost every one of those replies. The same thing has happened to the hon. member for Assiniboia. In other words, we can do nothing but suspect that these were dummy telegrams suggested by the mine interests, and we must assume those interests to be Rio Tinto.

I bring this up at this time because the minister has indicated that his department has been consulted by another department to estimate the stature and economic prospects of one iron organization in my area. I just wish that the same people would take a look at Rio Tinto and this kind of situation because to me this is almost blasphemy against the House of Commons and the integrity of the members of this house when we receive telegrams from people who apparently do not exist. I can understand that in a community such as Elliot Lake there would be a portion of the replies that would be undeliverable because the population of the community is shifting. However, when almost all of these hundreds of letters come back as undeliverable, then one can only suspect that some mining manager is taking some members of parliament for a ride. Since these telegrams were sent not only to members of this party but to all the Liberal party and the members of the government, I think this is a situation that merits some kind of check. It certainly arouses a great deal of scepticism in my mind about the integrity of the Rio Tinto organization or whoever it was in that organization that got this particular scheme going.

There is one other point I do want to mention. The minister has made a suggestion, not publicly but I do not believe he will mind if I refer to it publicly, that members of this group, especially the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Timmins, have been sceptical of the underground inspections carried out under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. He has made the suggestion that this question of underground inspections might be aired in the mines, forests and waters committee. We would appreciate that suggestion. We think the question could be gone into very quickly, perhaps in one or two meetings, and it would certainly go a long way toward satisfying the views we have expressed.

Mr. Nielsen: The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is of great importance to the people of my riding, and I hope any remarks I make this evening will indicate just how important I think the department is in so far as the development of the rest of the nation is concerned. I feel that nothing is more basic or more fundamental, nothing is more vital to the advance of Canadian human and material betterment, than the work of this department.

One thing stands out most clearly from the evidence heard while the estimates of this department were before the standing committee on mines, forests and waters last year, that is, the failure of government for at least 10 and, in some branches 25 years to recognize the value of the work of the department. Not only has there been a continuous disregard of the material benefits to Canada which would have resulted from allowing the department to fully perform its proper function but the skill and brilliance of the departmental scientific and technical personnel has gone almost unnoticed, and their counsel and advice unheeded. Over many years, at least a decade, there have been clear and persistent indications of the need for reform. For just as long and just as clear have been the indications of the important benefits to Canada which would be the natural and inevitable result flowing from these reforms. But the need and the importance of the need were either ignored or neglected year after year.

The kindest thing that can be said for the Liberal administration in this regard is that they failed to realize the real significance of the work being produced by the department, that they remained for so many years in ignorance of the true value of this work and its relation to all phases of Canadian development. If they did realize the significance of the contribution to be made by the work of the department, their failure to do anything about it amounts to the grossest neglect of their duty while in office.

I submit that the evidence given before the standing committee last session stands as a massive indictment against the former administration to which they may plead either ignorance or neglect but to which they cannot be heard to plead innocence.

I have said that there is no single phase of the economic life of this nation that is not affected by the work of this department. Despite this very important fact, however, the restrictions which have been placed upon the functions of the department in past years have relegated it to playing an insignificant role in national development. When it had so much to offer, advantage was not taken of its capacities. It became the orphan of government and continued to be regarded as such over the years.

This is the condition then that faced this government when it first took office in June of 1957. Members know that one of the first steps taken by this government during the first session of parliament after the present cabinet took office was to reactivate the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, a committee which had lain dormant for over 22 years during Liberal administration. In my opinion the first fruits of the work of this committee have been realized. The searching inquiry conducted into the function of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has resulted in the production of a useful report to the house.

It would be exceedingly difficult to exaggerate the importance of the functions of this department. Its chief role should be regarded, I feel, in the light of the significance of the Canadian mineral industry. The significance of minerals in providing the material basis for the economic life and social organization of humanity has long been recognized. Our civilization today, more than ever before, depends for its continuance on the minerals which permit and sustain its existence. The geometric increase and the concentration of world populations, the frequency and speed of movement of transport, the extent and quality of human control over the forces of nature are all directly dependent upon the discovery and utilization of mineral resources. It is, therefore, of prime importance that we in Canada should have as accurate information as can be obtained about the extent of the available reserves in this field.

It would be a great mistake to assess the functions and the needs of this department on the basis only of the requirements today. And it is not enough to simply say "We will not make such a mistake" without giving a good deal of thought to the reasons for saying such a thing. I believe there are sufficient indications of the trend of future demands for minerals as to warrant the assertion that Canada must be prepared to meet the needs of 10, 20 or 30 years from now. Indeed, there is no reason why we should not, in our considerations, contemplate the fact that upon the expiration of a century from now all world sources of minerals will likely have been exhausted. There are a number of very basic factors which justify taking this position. I feel that these factors are clearly distinguishable now, but before discussing them I should like for a moment more to deal with the importance of minerals to Canadians today and tomorrow, all in the light of the objectives which should be those being pursued by this department. A good many of the department's requirements and shortcomings are known now, thanks largely to the examination of departmental activities and deficiencies by the mines, forests and waters committee last session.

It is very difficult to chart future courses but I think all will hasten to agree that we must make a concerted effort to do so; and in doing so I do not think it would be desirable for us to confine ourselves to domestic needs and trends. In so far as the world picture is concerned, the more optimistic observers point out that there is today no serious or general shortage of any essential metallic or non-metallic mineral product. These people say that the discovery of new sources has always kept abreast of the increasing demand and, further, that new discoveries combined with increased efficiency in methods of processing and utilization will be adequate to meet any future needs.

How about the pessimists? They emphasize, and rightly so, the fact that mineral resources are wasting assets. They are not replaceable as are our agricultural products, our forest products and the like. Once the mineral content supplied by nature in the crust of the earth has been exhausted either by wasteful or beneficial use, it cannot be restored. These people say that the rate of consumption today presents an entirely new problem for which past experience gives no assurance of a solution.

But there is one thing that all scientists agree on and that is the necessity of maintaining an ample supply of minerals and metals if our civilization, as we know it, is to be maintained or if further progress is to be made. Iron, copper, lead, zinc, nickel, aluminum, magnesium and other base metals are, by definition fundamental to our way of life. Almost equally important are such alloying metals as manganese, chromium, molybdenum and tungsten, which are essential to the steel industry. The industrial minerals, limestone sulphur, salt and fluorspar supply the raw materials for much of the world's chemical industry, while the mineral fertilizers, phosphate rock and potash, are of growing importance in agriculture. Without these or effective substitutes large segments of the prospective population of the earth will be condemned to lives of misery and degradation.

Eminent scientists have said that the implications of these facts raise a problem so vast and of such universal incidence that in a sane world they would be made the immediate subject of common study and cooperative planning. The best proof of this statement is to be found in the difficulties that are being experienced in adapting atomic energy to beneficial rather than to destructive uses. In the race between education and catastrophe, education is falling farther and farther behind.

I said earlier that we are justified in stating that within the century ahead we can see the exhaustion of practically all known ore deposits and that there were a number of factors that justified such an assertion. The first of these is the rapidity with which the number of human beings on the earth is increasing. This geometric increase is resulting in the addition of some 122,400 births every day or 45 million per year. In the 30 minutes allowed me to speak here 2,550 more humans are born than have died.

A second fundamental factor is the almost universal demand for a higher standard of living. This will mean, inevitably, an expansion of the demand for mineral products. In fact, it is quite clear that the combination of an increasing population and rising standards of living will place a strain on world metal resources which will almost certainly in the end prove beyond the capacity of man and nature to supply.

I do not think I need dwell at any length upon the importance of these factors in the common western fight against the spread of communism.

May I now say a brief word on conservation. I think it is important to observe that since 1914 the depletion of world mineral resources has been proceeding at an unexampled rate. It should cause us all to pause for serious reflection to realize that the quantity of mineral products consumed between 1914 and 1949—that is 35 years—far exceeds that of the whole preceding period of man's existence on earth. It is a fearful realization that human intelligence has allowed a great proportion of the minerals used in the last 50 years to be criminally wasted in the most destructive wars in history.

As world resources of metals are exhausted the significance of Canada as a major supplier increases. The importance of the work of this department becomes even more significant as we consider the factors affecting resource consumption.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business will be for tomorrow? Also can the house leader indicate what we will be doing next week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will carry on with the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, followed by the Department of Justice; and, if things move rapidly, we have the Department of Transport.

Next week, on Monday and Tuesday there are a number of legislative items which can be dealt with. The first item on Monday will be a motion to extend the hours of sitting of the house just as was done last year at this particular time. The second item will be second reading of Bill No. C-76, an act to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act. The third item would be second reading of Bill No. C-78 to amend the Judges Act. Between now and Monday there will be appearing on the order paper certain resolutions. One will deal with the extension of the freight rates assistance act for another year or part of a year. The next will be a resolution with regard to setting up a department of forestry. The third will concern an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act and the fourth an amendment to the Criminal Code. These should be available for the house on Monday or Tuesday.

For the balance of the week, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, I believe the program with regard to estimates will be a continuation of the ones which may not be finished tomorrow. So that members may make preparation but without determining the exact order at this moment, may I say that we will then take external affairs, northern affairs and national resources, public works and national revenue. On Monday night we might reach agreement as to the order in which these estimates would come forward.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 24, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

(Translation):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ST. JOHN THE BAPTIST DAY—DISCOVERY DAY, NEWFOUNDLAND

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, today our French-speaking fellow Canadians throughout Canada are rejoicing for they are celebrating St. John the Baptist day, in honour of their patron saint.

Even if members of this house do not all share in the same traditions, I am sure, however, that all of them will join me in tendering to our French-speaking colleagues and to all French Canadians of this country our best wishes on this festive occasion.

The elements of the Canadian nationality are many and not easily definable. It is generally recognized, however, that one of the features of our nationality is the free association, over a period of two centuries, of two cultures, two traditions, for the achievement of one great Canada.

It is fitting that each year our French-speaking fellow citizens relive the finest pages of their history, which is the history of all Canada, since their gallant forebears extended their activity to the furthermost reaches of our country.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I and the members of our party wish to subscribe to the words spoken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

As the Prime Minister has just said, on this patron saint's day of French Canadians, though we are of different racial origins, we have often had occasion to pay tribute to our French-speaking fellow Canadians for their great contribution to the development, unity, vigour and wisdom of this country.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat the statement made a few months ago by the distinguished chancellor of the University of Toronto:

> Our country has been enriched by both our ancestral cultures, and each ethnic group should retain its way of life and heritage, while respecting those of the other. May our patriotism be haunted by the dream of unity of our two great races. However, let us pray God that it be unity in diversity, and that each group remain true to its past.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, may I also remind the house that this is an important day for Newfoundland. It is, if I may call that, their national day, Discovery day. So may I also pay my tribute to the contribution of courage and determination that the people of Newfoundland have made to the development not only of their own historic nation but to the confederation of which they are now part.

(Translation):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is fitting to celebrate the French fact in Canada. I am happy to associate myself with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), on St. John the Baptist day, in congratulating those of my fellow citizens who speak French much better than I do.

(Text):

I also wish to associate this group with the words of the Leader of the Opposition in acknowledging the great contribution which the province of Newfoundland is making to the Canadian nation, and to wish our fellow citizens in that province the very best in the years to come.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): As the member for St. John's West I should like to thank both the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia for the kind remarks they have made with regard to Newfoundland this day. This is the 463rd anniversary of the discovery of Newfoundland by John Cabot. It is true that the first part of Newfoundland which he saw in the early morning was Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Pickersgill: Bonavista.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): —when he said, "Oh, happy sight". But on the same day he went into the beautiful landlocked harbour of St. John's, which therefore received its name from the feast day on which it was discovered. The people of Quebec are today celebrating the feast of St. John the Baptist. Newfoundland is expanding and its population is growing; large groups of people from Newfoundland now live in Montreal and Toronto. If French-Canadians and Newfoundlanders could get together, perhaps we could make this a national feast day for Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not think that two days ago the Newfoundlanders and the Quebeckers did get together?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before turning to another subject, may I say I am sure that when the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Assiniboia and myself spoke French a minute ago, there was not an English speaking member of the house who did not understand, even without the benefit of the translation system.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—RESIGNATION OF DEPUTY MINISTER AND APPOINTMENT OF SUCCESSOR

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make, of the resignation of Mr. Wilbur R. Jackett, Q.C. as deputy minister of justice effective as of July 1. In announcing the resignation of Mr. Jackett I should like to express on behalf of the government our great appreciation for the service he has rendered since he first joined the department in 1939. Since May 1, 1957 he has been an outstanding deputy minister of that department.

At the same time I wish to announce the appointment as deputy minister of justice, effective July 1, of Mr. Elmer A. Driedger, Q.C. who has been assistant deputy minister. Mr. Driedger was born in Saskatchewan, as was Mr. Jackett, and following admission to the bar in that province he came to Ottawa in June, 1940, as law librarian of the Supreme Court of Canada. In December 1941 he was transferred to the legal branch of the Department of Justice as junior advisory counsel. Subsequently, on April 1, 1945 he became senior advisory counsel, and assistant deputy minister on July 1, 1954.

I do not think I need say anything more regarding Mr. Driedger, other than that he has devoted most of his time to the preparation of the government's legislative program and has taken a leading part in the advisory functions of the Department of Justice. He is recognized as an outstanding member of the bar and is one who I know will adorn the position to which he has been appointed.

There are two other appointments to be made and announced shortly. They are associate deputy ministers of justice, each having the rank and status of a deputy head of the department. One of these will be French speaking and the other English speaking.

[Mr. Browne (St. John's West).]

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house would like to associate ourselves with the words of appreciation the Prime Minister has just uttered in connection with the deputy minister of justice who is retiring. Mr. Jackett has served his country in this position for many years now effectively and with devotion. He will be greatly missed in the public service. Our sense of loss, however, is minimized to some extent by the Prime Minster's announcement that Mr. Jackett will be succeeded by Mr. Driedger, who has been long in the department, has served it well and I am sure will be a very adequate deputy minister in every respect.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

TABLING OF REPORTS ON APPLICATIONS FOR EXPORT LICENCES

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table two copies of a report by the national energy board on two applications for licences to export gas to the United States. Both these applications involve small volumes of gas and both, in effect, represent renewals or extensions of existing export licences.

The Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company has been exporting gas from Alberta to the state of Montana since 1952. The existing licence expires September 1, 1960. The new licence applied for would terminate on May 14, 1974, the same date on which its Alberta permit and the federal power commission permit to the Montana Power Company to import gas into the United States expire.

The national energy board found that the total quantity of gas proposed to be exported exceeded the established reserves for the fields from which the gas would be removed, and accordingly reduced the total quantity of gas which the applicant might export over the period of the new licence from some 268 billion cubic feet to 190 billion cubic feet.

The second application, that of Gordon Plotke, is for a five year licence, and the maximum annual volume of gas to be exported is only 10 million cubic feet. This is a local matter involving the gas from one well only, and gas which is not considered saleable other than in this particular export.

In its report the board indicates that it is prepared to issue export licences to the Canadian-Montana Pipe Line Company and to Gordon M. Plotke. The government concurs with the board's findings on these applications, and accordingly will authorize the issue of the licences on the terms set forth in the report.

SOYA BEANS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT PRICE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the agricultural stabilization board has been authorized to continue to support the price of soya beans produced in Ontario for the year 1960 at $2 per bushel for Canada No. 2 grade or better, which is the same support price as last year. The prescribed price for 1960 is 91 per cent of the 10 year average as compared with 87 per cent for 1959. The final figures for the 1959 crop are not yet available, but it is estimated that the deficiency payments which will be made to the producers will total approximately $1 million.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for making this announcement. I have only one comment to make, and that is that the price support announced for this year is the same as for last year, and not as high as it was in the year immediately following the last general election. The support price announced today is one that will not fully satisfy the requests made of the government by the soya bean growers.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF CONSIDERATION UNTIL NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the suggestion made to the Minister of Finance when consideration was being given to the resolution preceding the introduction of amendments to the Civil Service Act. My question is whether the Prime Minister has now been able to give consideration to this suggestion and whether he does not agree that it would be wise, in view of the time element, to postpone further consideration of this matter until next session, when in the early days of the session it can be submitted to a committee where evidence can be taken?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the time element is concerned, I do not think it really enters into the equation at all. I think there would be sufficient time between now and the end of the session to give full consideration to this very important piece of legislation. However, suggestions have been made both by civil service organizations and by individuals that because of the fact that some 40 years have passed since the Civil Service Act came into effect, and these amendments are made consequent on the experience of that lengthy period of time, the very fullest consideration should be given to the various sections of this rather lengthy bill.

In the circumstances, if it meets with the approval of the house, I can see no objection whatever to acceding to the suggestion made, namely that the bill remain on the order paper. It can be introduced again at the next session, and a committee set up at that time for the purpose of going thoroughly into this question, to the end that when this act is brought up to date it will be generally acceptable to all and in accordance with the traditions of the civil service so that the civil service of Canada may continue to occupy the pre-eminent position that it now occupies among civil service organizations throughout the world.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I might just say a word. I think this is a wise course to follow with this very voluminous bill. Civil service associations themselves are desirous of making representations. We think if it were laid over until next session the final legislation would likely be much better from the standpoint of the civil servants of the country than if it were rushed through during the dying days of this session.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: For the sake of clarity, Mr. Speaker, there is something I should like to find out. I am not permitted, of course, to direct a question to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: You will before long.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hope the day never comes when I have to cross-examine my hon. friend.

The question I wanted to have cleared up was simply this. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) said that he would be agreeable to the course suggested, namely that the civil service bill be left on the order paper and be brought forward again at the next session. I said that if the house was in agreement, that course would be followed. Possibly the Leader of the Opposition will let the house know what his attitude is.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Prince Albert. The course which he suggested with regard to this bill, for reasons among others with which he himself has put forward, is quite agreeable to us on this side.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—MEETING WITH WESTERN FARM ORGANIZATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture. Can the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture inform the house whether the date has now been set for a meeting between the government and the liaison committee of the western farm organizations to discuss deficiency payments, or the government's alternative to that program?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, the date has not yet been set.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether a date will be set before the end of the session?

Mr. Harkness: Well, I do not think I have anything further to add at the present time. The date has not yet been set, and I am not in a position to say what date will be set.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Does the minister still take the view that before he will arrange to see this delegation the farmers of western Canada must place an alternative proposal in writing before the government?

Mr. Harkness: I am not sure that I understand exactly what the hon. member means by this question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My question was, before setting a date to meet this delegation does the government still take the position that the farmers of western Canada must place before the government in writing an alternative proposal, as the Minister of Agriculture suggested when his estimates were under discussion in this house?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, this has been one of the causes of delay. We asked the western farm organizations to make a definite proposal in writing, but instead they sent a brief which, as I indicated before, reiterated three of the proposals they had made when they attended here in numbers somewhat over a year ago. They also made some reference to acreage payments. Subsequent to that time we have had representations from some of the organizations who are members of the liaison committee indicating that they would like to discuss acreage payments.

Mr. Argue: What was the government's reply to that request?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[Mr. Pearson.]

[Later:]

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Agriculture tell the house what reply he gave to those farm organizations which requested a meeting on the basis of the proposition that acreage payments should be paid?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I told those people that we would certainly consider that matter very seriously, and that we would consider it even more seriously if all these ten western farm organizations made the same request.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGE IN MARRIAGE REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. F. Browne (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister inform the house whether it has now been decided to change the Royal Canadian Mounted Police marriage regulations?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The commissioner has announced this morning that there has been a change in the long-standing marriage regulations. Under the new regulations a member of the force may be permitted to marry if he is at least 21 years of age and has served in the force in a satisfactory manner for two years. Formerly the regulations required that a member serve satisfactorily for five years before marriage, with one or two exceptions.

The original intent of the rather stringent regulations was to ensure maximum mobility in the service by having at all times a 50 per cent strength of single men. This arrangement is no longer considered necessary and, in fact, the married strength of the force now exceeds this figure. The commissioner is of the opinion that the change in regulations will be welcomed by many young men already in the force, and will also remove an obstacle to recruiting those young men otherwise suitable who regarded the marriage regulations with disfavour. I concur in that opinion.

TRANSPORT

CHIGNECTO CANAL—SUGGESTED PAYMENT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OF INVESTIGATION COST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the constitutional jurisdiction of this parliament over navigation and shipping, he does not think it would be reasonable for the federal government to assume the full cost of the investigation into the Chignecto canal.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): My colleague the Minister of Public Works made an announcement on this subject the other day which I believe has met with the widest satisfaction, not only in the important area of Canada that is principally concerned but in this house as well.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister not think there would be even wider satisfaction if the taxpayers of New Brunswick were relieved of this charge, which is really a federal responsibility.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question has some interesting timing features to it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Answer the question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It accords well with the proper interest shown now after 22 years of neglect of this subject under the former regime.

NATIONAL PARKS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED OFFER OF GARIBALDI PARK FOR OLYMPIC GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. Payne (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister heard of the recent statement of the premier of British Columbia to the effect that he is now prepared to turn over the magnificent alpine area of Garibaldi park to the federal government as a national park, upon condition that the development program will commit the federal government to have the park in shape and condition to service the requirements of the Olympic games in 1968?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen that report. I would imagine that if the premier of British Columbia is serious about the matter he will be writing me, because the federal government have already written to the province of British Columbia saying that we would consider taking over this area as a national park if it is granted to us on the usual conditions.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF SLUM CLEARANCE PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Public Works report on the progress being made with respect to the urgent problem of slum clearance on the south side of Burrard inlet in Vancouver?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member may I say that an order in council was passed yesterday relating to a federal contribution of one-half of the cost of acquiring and clearing three redevelopment sites in the blighted area in the east end of downtown Vancouver, and the redevelopment area on the south side of False creek. The total estimated cost of acquisition and clearance is $5,243,417, and the gross federal contribution is therefore estimated to be approximately $2,621,709.

The area when acquired and cleared will be sold or leased for residential and industrial development. It is proposed to construct two federal-provincial subsidized rental housing projects consisting of approximately 389 units on land thus located. These housing units will be used to rehouse displaced persons from the two areas and other families of low income. The estimated cost of the rental housing project is approximately $4 million, of which the federal government's share is 75 per cent or $3 million.

ST. JOHN'S EAST LAND ASSEMBLY PROJECT—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house what progress is being made with the land development project at St. John's?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): We are getting along nicely with the investigation, and in due course a report will be made to my hon. friend or to the house.

An hon. Member: In how many years?

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

FINE PAPERS—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE TARIFF ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. I apologize for not having sent him notice of it, but I am sure he has immediate knowledge of this matter. Can the minister indicate whether the cabinet is considering taking action under section 29 of the Combines Investigation Act to lower or eliminate the tariffs on fine papers in this country?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have noticed some comments in the press this morning on this general subject. One of them at least attributed certain information or statements to "informed sources". I have been considering the matter since, accordingly, and have come to the conclusion after consultation also that, as in the case of an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act, it is not considered appropriate to confirm or to deny reports on inquiries in specific cases. Therefore in this case it will not be appropriate to confirm or to deny the report of consideration of section 29 under the Combines Investigation Act with respect to tariffs.

The reason for that rule is that it is not considered proper to make such statements which might prejudice the public mind against individuals. The policy therefore has been followed of never confirming or denying such reports. I therefore have no comment to make on the report.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice. Is it a fact that some time ago he notified a number of these companies to show cause why the government should not take the action that has been suggested under section 29 of the Combines Investigation Act?

Mr. Fulton: I think the former answer I gave covers the situation here, namely that it would not be appropriate to comment on matters of this kind until some conclusion has been reached.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO MAIL BOX FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is the minister in a position to make a report on the investigation he must have ordered following the fire which was set to a mail box situated close to the committee room of Mr. Rene Levesque, the first Rene Levesque on the voting ballot, then an official Liberal candidate and now a new member of the new legislature in Quebec?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Beyond the fact that we put out the fire, Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to say at this point.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO POSITION OF MINISTER'S PRIVATE SECRETARY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. May I ask whether the hon. lady's private secretary is on loan to the leader of the opposition in the house of assembly in Newfoundland?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I believe the person to whom my hon. friend refers is on a visit to Newfoundland, and that he is leaving me on July 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. lady say whether he is still receiving a salary from the treasury of Canada?

Mrs. Fairclough: I believe he is on his holidays at the present time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

USE OF CANOE BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Public Works be good enough to tell the house why he paddles a red painted canoe?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Would orange be more suitable to the hon. member; or would he settle if I just painted it blue?

Mr. Small: Why not try both?

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. While he is out canoeing on the Rideau river I wonder whether he fully realizes that he is up the creek on housing?

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I would sooner be going up the creek than be in the flood waters of Nipissing.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

JOHN CABOT—MONUMENT TO MARK LANDING IN NORTH AMERICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland. Is he aware that the Cape Breton historical society are this afternoon unveiling a bust to the memory of John Cabot in northern Cape Breton, to mark where Cabot first landed on the North American continent?

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the first place where he landed on the mainland might have been on Cape Breton. The first place where he really landed was at St. John's.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether, in an effort to restore unity to his own side of the house, he would consider suggesting to the historic sites and monument board that a monument be erected at cape Bonavista which would record the true fact of the discovery of Canada, namely that John Cabot, the first European to see Canada, first saw it at cape Bonavista?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In the wisdom of past years it was decided that the minister should have an historic sites and monument board composed of leading historians across Canada to advise the minister in order to protect him from all sorts of suggestions like the one made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we had better bring our explorations up to date and pass to orders of the day.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF ONTARIO ON COMING "FIGHT"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance a question based on a statement made by Premier Frost yesterday when speaking of the federal-provincial fiscal conference scheduled for July. The premier said:

> All I know is that I am going into a big fight down in Ottawa on fiscal matters.

My question is this. Since it takes two to make a fight, will the Minister of Finance comment on this statement?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): If Mr. Frost made the statement referred to by the hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that he did not have in mind the thought that he would be entering any kind of contest or fight with the federal government. Therefore I have not the slightest idea whom he may have chosen as his adversary, but perhaps the hon. member for Essex East had better look out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. That being the case, is it now a fact that Premier Frost may look forward to receiving the additional $100 million odd which he has been asking from the federal government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is trying to anticipate an event which will take place later this month.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may be permitted to ask a question which was frequently asked by the minister when he was over on this side. Could the minister provide us with the agenda for this conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, whenever the agenda has been agreed upon by all the governments concerned, and whenever they are agreeable that it be made public, there will be no hesitation at all in making it available to the hon. member or to it being brought before the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister include the federal government's proposals to the conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the federal government's proposals were made part of the agenda, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—

Departmental administration—

187. Administration, operation and maintenance, $860,962.

The Chairman: Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, item No. 187. This item will be found on page 40 of the blue book and the details on page 260.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, at ten o'clock last night I was discussing the importance of the work of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys with regard to the exhaustion of our reserves of minerals. The rate of consumption of any mineral resource is subject to many factors. Under any system of free enterprise, mineral deposits are normally exploited only when the margin between costs of production and the price to the consumer will yield a profit to the operator. Obviously, therefore, any improvements in mining, milling or refining techniques that result in lower production costs or an increase in the percentage of the metal recovered will correspondingly increase the total of our commercially available resources. The more efficient we become in the utilization of low grade ores, the more satisfactory our supply position. The same results can also be obtained in the free market when the consumer is willing or able to pay increased prices.

The part that this department should have been playing in technological research is, I think, abundantly clear and has been for a long time. It is essential that this work now go ahead. No less important is the essential work required in the field of conservation. I find it most significant that in the cases of agriculture, forestry, fisheries and certain other fields of resources development, some progress has been made in the direction of conservation. All these are renewable resources. Yet in the case of minerals, which are not renewable, there has been practically no effort, except in time of war, to interfere with the free play of a market that is interested primarily in profits. This is an anomaly that cannot continue forever. So we have several reasons for being concerned about the mineral resource future of Canada.

Well, what should this department be doing now as well as for future generations? Our hopes for the future, in my view, should be directed first toward the discovery of new ore bodies. There is certainly ample scope in Canada for such activities today. The greatest hope for fresh supplies of ore depends upon the discovery of new ore bodies in those areas of Canada yet undeveloped. Here I cannot help but draw the attention of this committee to the vast areas of the north where such activities have a very wide scope.

The second step to be taken in our effort to meet the undoubted future demands which will be placed on our mineral resources and to forestal shortages at home is the improvement of our techniques of extraction and processing. New and more efficient methods of mining are constantly being sought. In addition, we must broaden the field of research in our metallurgical practices. The record of discovery in this field offers good evidence that further research will result in further refinements. In the future, as higher grades of ore are depleted, more attention must be given to the treatment of complex and low grade ore bodies by leaching or other chemical methods. Further study should also be given to the possibility of obtaining minerals from sea water.

Finally, in addition to the search for new ore bodies and the improvement of our processes of extraction and treatment, greater study must be given to the possibilities of conservation and substitution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how is the department to meet the demands which are being placed upon it now and in the future should the course which I have advocated be implemented? The evidence before the committee on mines, forests and waters last year clearly indicated an extremely complicated general administration of the diversified activities of this department. There are many factors which contribute to this situation; the nature of the operations of the various branches of the department; the large number of individual projects conducted under mobile and remote conditions; the operation of a fleet of ships and launches; the operation of a large number of fixed and rotary wing charter aircraft; the operation of a fleet of about 225 motor vehicles and railway speeders, tracked vehicles, dog teams, horses and the like; and large scientific laboratories in Ottawa. No wonder, then, that procurement, supply, maintenance and financing are difficult tasks, and it will—it must—get even more difficult as the volume of field operations increase and as they progressively move to more outlying areas of the country. The problem of logistics must become more acute.

The department must be allowed to relieve the scientific and technical staff of the administrative requirements associated with their work, and to the maximum degree possible. An accelerated effort toward this objective should be immediately undertaken by the provision of the necessary staff. It is abundantly clear that the growth of the functional operations of the department over many years has not been matched by a corresponding growth in administrative assistance.

The functional operations of the department are hampered by unduly restrictive policies of financial administration. The policy now requires treasury board approval to be given to a very considerable number of individual financial proposals. The department's job could be made much easier and more efficient by enlarging the authority of the minister to meet these flexible demands. As the department expands its activities generally an increased administrative activity will require staff additions if the department is to attain any degree of efficiency.

The most serious difficulty facing the department in the solution of its problems is the recruiting and retention of capable technical and scientific staff. No organization can maintain a high order of research productivity without a high percentage of creative personnel. An organization such as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is only as productive as the quality of its staff. To me it is simply amazing that the staff in the number existing in this department for many years has produced such a quality of work, which has allowed Canada to maintain at least a tenuous position in this field.

The department is recruiting and operating in a professional field where the competition for staff reaches its highest intensity. This competition comes from industry in both Canada and the United States, and more recently from the universities. Even junior staff is now being attracted to the secondary schools. Competition for staff begins at the recruiting stage, where salary levels are slightly less than those of crown organizations such as the national research council and the defence research board and much less than in industry, through to the more senior and specialist grades, where salaries in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are much below those offered elsewhere, often to the extent of between $3,000 and $4,000. This situation hurts the organization now and affects the future operations of the department itself and consequently the future of the mineral industry and the future of Canada.

A proportion of highly capable young men must be recruited to assure the future efficiency of any research organization. There is no substitute for intelligence and ability in a research organization. What possibly presents a more serious situation is staff who have become national or international specialists in research areas, and who are attracted away when they are most productive by offers of salaries which are far beyond what the department can pay.

I understand that the purpose of the department is to encourage the mining industry in every way possible, and in keeping with this policy I do not feel that we should mind losing some of our staff to Canadian industry. In fact I think we would welcome and encourage a healthy interchange of staff with Canadian industry. What really hurts, however, is when we lose highly trained specialists to the United States. A specialist takes 10 to 15 years to reach his maximum usefulness, and this may represent $100,000 in training costs. The loss of these highly trained engineers and scientists presents a serious national problem. A high percentage of our specialists who leave go to the United States. It might be of interest to note here that the Financial Post of May 2, 1959 stated that 1,200 Canadian engineers settled in the United States during 1958.

If the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is to maintain a staff capable of meeting the national demands, salaries must be raised to a competitive level. This is most important at the senior engineer and scientist level. I understand that in recent years the personnel establishments of the various divisions of the department have been fixed by yearly meetings between treasury board, the civil service commission and the department, and that for the 18 months following this meeting there is little elasticity for changing staff about to meet new demands or altering situations. This presents a most difficult problem, since extraordinary demands, which are being continually presented, follow no established pattern. The result is a measure of inefficiency and administration confusion. A department such as mines and technical surveys, which must meet unexpected demands, should have more flexibility in the recruitment and use of its staff. The rigid formula now applied is fraught with difficulties, and efficiency suffers.

These steps require to be taken now. They should have been taken many years ago. If we fail to act now, future generations of Canadians will have to bear the consequences of our blindness; and our responsibility for failing, with full knowledge of the facts, to take the necessary measures, will be heavy in their sight.

Mr. McQuillan: One of the bright spots in the economy of British Columbia at present is the tremendous increase in interest and investment in metal mining. I was on the coast a few weeks ago and took the opportunity to drop into the British Columbia and Yukon chamber of mines office. While I was there it was obvious that it was a most active place. There were a number of people there from various parts of the United States and other parts of the world, and the manager of the bureau informed me that they had received make grants to such organizations as this, but ever before in their history. I know that to date it is not the policy of the department to make grants to such organizations as this, but I do think such an organization is worthy of a grant because it is doing a splendid job for the mining industry not only in British Columbia but in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Interest in mining in British Columbia is general throughout the province, and is particularly apparent in the coastal region as the result of a recent supreme court decision. Development of new mining operations and increased production from existing operations can be anticipated, particularly with regard to crown-granted claims affected by that decision.

For years there has been a false idea that Vancouver island and the coastal area in general are areas where mineral deposits are small and uneconomic. This, of course, is not so. We have had several major producing mines on the coast. One of them is the mine at Britannia which has come to life again, and which I understand is rapidly expanding its production. The Granduc property near the head of Portland canal shows promise of being a major copper ore body, and there are a number of large ore bodies along the coast.

Shortly after I came down here I was in conversation with an official of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I pointed out to him the promising mineral potential of Vancouver island, particularly the northern area, and I referred to the desirability of encouraging the development of this potential under the roads to resources program. He disagreed with my view as to the resources there, and I asked him where he had got his information. He said he had got it from the department of mines. I think it is high time that the department of mines reassessed its estimate of the mineral potential of that area, because I think its assumptions are not based on sound or up to date information.

Just to show how wrong the department was, I am going to list some of the operating mines in the area as well as a number of known ore bodies awaiting development. On the southern end of Vancouver island we have Cowichan Copper, which was brought into production through the tenacity and perseverance of an old prospector and mining man in British Columbia named Ozzie McDonald. Great credit is due to him for bringing this mine into production, because many people had scorned its chance of ever becoming a success. Mount Washington Copper is another ore body which is being developed by the Noranda company, and it also has great possibilities. Further north, near Nimpkish lake, there is an important iron-producing property under development and large shipments are being made at the present time. There is also Quatsino Copper at Port McNeill, which is also concerned with the production of iron ore. There is a well known property near the northern end of the island called Coast Copper in which Consolidated Mining and Smelting holds a substantial interest. I believe they are anticipating a large expenditure there commencing almost immediately.

On the west coast there are innumerable mining properties. Many of the properties may not be very large, but with the network of roads that have been developed by the logging companies these mines could be economic producers and successful operations through the hooking up of these roads. The grouping of these ore deposits would provide a very substantial tonnage. We should benefit from the mistakes of the past and recall the experience in the United States. People did not think roads would be developed in that country. There were mines developed, one producing perhaps 500,000 tons in one area and another producing 500,000 tons in another area. In the old days these were considered uneconomic, but with the development of roads it was possible to take full advantage of such ore deposits. In many instances a very small mileage would be required to hook up existing roads and thus provide a very valuable transportation system.

[Mr. McQuillan.]

I do not think the day is too far distant —indeed, I feel it is very close—when we are going to see once again a smelter on the coast particularly for the copper ores. In the Portland canal area a famous mine has come to life again. It is now called the Silbak-Premier; it used to be known as the old Premier mine. A tremendous amount of wealth was taken from this mine, which was later almost abandoned and thought to be worked out. I have an adventuresome brother who went in there last year, took a lease on the property and brought the property to life again. It has proved to be one of the outstanding mining rediscoveries in the country.

There is a great deal of activity in the development of iron ore, all of which is shipped to Japan. Ore shipments amount to approximately 1,000 tons a day from such mines as Texada Iron Mines, Silver Standard and others. Iron ore shipments are going from the west coast of the island, and substantial shipments will be going from the Queen Charlotte islands. By the end of this year the coastal area will be producing about 5,000 tons of iron ore per day. This, of course, is being exported to Japan. As well, there will be substantial shipments of copper and copper-nickel concentrates from coastal and interior mines.

While I can understand the British Columbia government's desire to conserve iron ore for ultimate processing in a long hoped-for steel mill, I think they have been seriously misguided in their efforts to promote the establishment of such a mill. They have discouraged the discovery and development of iron ore property. They now reserve for themselves in the coastal area 50 per cent of the iron content of any ore body, which pretty well eliminates any interest in prospecting in that area. The claims being developed and the properties being worked are largely the old crown grant claims. The difficulty to date in effecting the establishment of a steel mill on the coast has been the insufficient tonnage of known iron ore reserves.

I maintain that the only way they are going to increase these reserves is by giving more incentive to the prospecting and development of iron ore properties. I believe I can truthfully say that there is a much greater known reserve of iron ore on the coast of British Columbia than there was before a ton of it was shipped to Japan; because as these properties are developed—and most of them have been known for many years—they have found substantially greater ore reserves than the mining engineers and geologists anticipated. Mining legislation and taxation that discourages the prospecting for and proving up of iron ore deposits will delay indefinitely the possibility of discovering the necessary tonnage. No one is going to waste time and money prospecting for new deposits of any minerals on the coast when the provincial government reserves to itself 50 per cent of the iron content of all ore.

My belief, and I think it is sound, is that investors in the highly speculative mining industry are entitled to every possible consideration in regard to taxation, depreciation allowances and government technical services. I know there exists in the minds of some a great fear that someone might make a little money out of a mine and not pay what they consider to be sufficient taxation. I would rather see an over-all development of mining even if we had to permit undue tax benefits to very large and successful operations, because if we are going to tax them the taxation seems to extend down to the little fellow and discourages the whole mining industry. It is my conviction that if neither government got a cent in direct taxation the employment in an active, healthy mining industry would pay dividends that would benefit the whole country.

In a large section of Vancouver island there is a situation that is a serious discouragement to the discovery and development of mines. About 1885 the provincial government of the day, in order to promote the construction of what is known as the E. & N. railway from Victoria to Courtenay on Vancouver island, made a grant including the lands, forests and minerals of one of the richest areas of the island. This grant went northward to the 50th parallel near Campbell River, and took in a strip approximately 20 miles wide extending from the south tip of the island.

At the time the grant was made my grandfather, who had then been settled in Comox valley for approximately 25 years, wrote a letter to his cousin in England stating as follows:

> A railroad is being built between Victoria and Nanaimo—

At that time the terminus was intended to be Nanaimo. I continue:

> —the company getting a strip of land about 20 miles back from the coast up as far as the Euclatawville.

For the information of hon. members who are not familiar with that part of the country the old Indian name applied to Seymour narrows was Euclatawville. I continue:

> Did anyone ever hear of a more scandalous bargain? The M.P.P.'s should be strung up. Victoria and the neighbourhood is all those potheads care for.

I am sure there are many throughout the area who still feel the same about this as my grandfather did in those long-ago days. This grant ultimately passed into the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which still holds it, and their policies of administration are a serious handicap to mining development. They have no set royalty on mineral discoveries and deal with each deposit on a different basis. They not only want all that the traffic will bear in royalty but considerably more, and demand royalty on the gross—not on the net—returns to the investing mining company. Consequently companies are loath to make investments in an area where they run the risk of not only losing their own investment but of paying an exorbitant royalty to the Canadian Pacific Railway on the gross values produced.

On this score I do not think the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway are aware of the effect their policy is having in that area, because it would be to their own advantage in many other ways to have a healthy mining development in the E. & N. railway belt. I know myself of many properties that nobody will bother to stake, nobody will bother to spend any money on, simply because of the present policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I hope the minister will take this matter up immediately with the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and endeavour to relieve this area of mineral development from the strangling policies of the company.

This so-called E. & N. belt is a perfect example of the dangers of giving large grants of resources to individual companies without any stipulation for their development. I hope the experience of 75 years will prove a useful lesson to all provincial governments, and to the federal government as well.

Mr. Carter: There are three points that I should like to put briefly before the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In the first place, I should like to pay tribute to the splendid work which the hydrographic survey branch of his department has done in charting the coastal waters of my province.

As was pointed out earlier today, Newfoundland was discovered 463 years ago, and up to a year ago there was still part of our coastal waters not completely charted. The first charting of our waters was carried out by the British admiralty under the direction of the famous Captain Cook. With the few facilities that he had at his disposal at that time it is amazing how accurate his calculations were, but still it is essential that this work be pushed ahead, and we are grateful for the way in which the minister and this branch of his department are doing that job.

Two years ago, I think, there was some question as to who was in command of the survey ships when they were actually doing the survey work. There was some question whether the captain had actual command or whether the hydrographer had full command. I hope the minister will be able to tell us that this question has now been fully clarified so that no further confusion on this point can take place in the future.

The second point is one that I brought to the minister last year, and I am not going to repeat what I said then but simply draw to his attention the fact that as far as I have been able to find out nothing has been done with respect to the prevailing rate system of pay. I know the minister does not have full control over this, that it ties in with the Minister of Labour, and that there are other departments such as the Department of Transport, the Department of Fisheries and also the Department of National Revenue which have this problem. I would ask the minister to get together with his other colleagues on this matter and see whether something cannot be done about it, because I do not think it is good for morale to have men working side by side in a boat, or two little boats working side by side doing the same work exactly, yet with the men getting different rates of pay. As an employer I believe the federal government should follow the principle of equal pay for equal work.

The third point I wish to bring to the minister's attention has to do with the situation at the fluorspar mines at St. Lawrence. Last year it was discovered that those mines were subject to radiation hazards. I understood that some arrangement was to be worked out with the minister's department, or some mechanism would be installed, whereby the miners themselves would be able to monitor the amount of radiation so they would have a check against the monitoring done by the operators. I understood this was to be done by the miners themselves. Can the minister bring me up to date as to what progress has been made in that regard?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a word at this time with respect to two sections of the important Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. As others have done, I should like to congratulate the minister and in particular the divisional heads of the geological survey on the work they have carried out in the past year. I hope that what I say on this point will provide some encouragement to them to do more than they have done in the past.

Perhaps I might make reference, sir, to one important problem. A decision will have to be made eventually with respect to the greatest known resource of oil in the world. I refer, of course, to the Athabasca tar sands. The committee is fully aware, of course, that a study has been made as to the feasibility of developing the tar sands by using a nuclear instrument. We are also familiar with the fact that the government of the province of Alberta, through the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board, has undertaken and is continuing a study to determine other methods by which the sand can be separated from the oil and thus permit the crude oil to flow freely. I impress this on the minister, and perhaps he will comment on it.

We realize, of course, the international implications, and that it is quite obvious that we are not going to have a nuclear test until several other factors have been determined. First of all, of course, there is the disarmament conference which, among other things, involves the feasibility of banning any nuclear tests whatsoever. In my opinion this need not defer any studies or any work which should be undertaken eventually in the hope that when we resolve the international aspects of this problem we can then move ahead to determine how best we may be able to utilize this vast volume of oil.

I am not placing any particular urgency on it, because it is well known to the committee that in the province of Alberta we are already having some difficulty in marketing the oil we have at the present time. I do, nevertheless, impress on the minister and his department that we offer the utmost cooperation to the provincial officials and any persons in the industry who wish to undertake studies or research into either nuclear tests or any other separation process. We should make it abundantly clear in this committee that we shall do nothing to discourage the eventual development of those resources. I accept all the arguments on the importance of maintaining the health of our people, but having done this I suggest that we give every possible encouragement, as I have said, and I hope the minister will make some comment on what has happened thus far.

I would also hope that in the geological survey division the government will continue the practice of the last two years of putting as many young graduate geologists to work as they possibly can, because they will get no better experience anywhere in the field of geology. In addition, I know the minister recognizes that there are areas to which we have given perhaps too little attention, and what is perhaps even more important is that these young men could be very usefully employed in conducting investigations in these areas. I acknowledge the fact that the minister has given some leadership in the past and has started a very active campaign in this respect, but I suggest that we could still improve on it by making use of added numbers of these people for the two reasons I have mentioned.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to examine the possibility of developing more research facilities than he now has in the department. He may shudder to think he would have to assume any further responsibilities in his department, but I feel that in relation to our resources we have not developed our research facilities to the fullest extent. For example, we should perhaps have a look at the possibility of using the by-products of petroleum products as a rocket propellant. We might look at the possibility of upgrading various ores. There are a number of aspects that could be examined. I mention this because it would undoubtedly encourage further secondary industry and keep the basic product within Canada to a greater degree. It would follow, of course, that a greater number of Canadians would be employed if this should take place.

In this respect I have previously mentioned the problem of government in relation to resources. It does seem to me that the department now under consideration might take on some of the responsibilities which have been allocated to two other departments of government. If we look closely at the resources of Canada we find that jurisdiction with respect to them is roughly divided among three different departments of the government. In order to avoid the duplication that obviously must follow, and in order to centralize activity with respect to the promotion and development of our resources in so far as they are a federal responsibility, I suggest that the minister might take the lead in discussing with his colleagues the advantages of placing under his administration those responsibilities which are currently shared by two of his colleagues. Perhaps the most notable, of course, are those which come under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I am not suggesting that these same responsibilities might not come under the minister of that department, but I do think a centralization of the effort in this field in relation to all mineral products, not just petroleum products, under one department and one divisional head would be most beneficial.

May I conclude as I did in commencing my remarks by congratulating the minister and his officials on running what I consider, having had close association with it, a most efficient department, and I hope he will take these suggestions under advisement.

(Translation):

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I carefully read the remarks made yesterday evening by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) with regard to the boundary between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and I should like to ask the minister a question. Now that we have a wiser and more reasonable government in Quebec, can the minister offer his good offices for the final delimitation of the boundary between the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland?

(Text):

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I am not entering the debate at this time to engage in "cabotage" with regard to the claims of Newfoundland and Cape Breton to discovery by John Cabot. I should like to make two comments on the estimates presented to us by the minister.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo with reference to the dual control over the hydrographic survey ships of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I know he had in mind the grounding of the Baffin off the Nova Scotia coast some years ago, and I think it would be helpful if, before the end of the debate on these estimates, the minister could make a statement that would establish that control of the ship at all times does in fact remain in the hands of the mariner rather than in the hands of the master scientist. In the Baffin incident, as perhaps in others too, it was very obvious that what happened was like a car going down the highway and a back-seat driver suddenly seizing control of the vehicle, with disastrous results.

My other reference is to the oceanographic institute on the shore of Bedford basin in the constituency of Halifax. I welcome the speed with which the minister has made progress at this very fine plant. A million dollar plus contract for jetty work will shortly get under way. When the institute is completed, which I gather from the speed with which the minister and the department are proceeding will be well before the deadline, there will be employment for several hundred scientists, and the institute will fulfil an obvious need. Perhaps of most satisfaction to a maritimer is the fact that this is a very concrete and substantial indication that the government is following a decentralizing policy and moving some of its very large projects from the central part of Canada. On behalf of all maritimers or Atlanticans I thank you sincerely, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will not think I am a little too pessimistic in some of the things I feel I must say with reference to the coal industry in the province of Alberta. In 1946 there were 2,116 men employed in the coal industry in the Drumheller area, and by 1958 the number had dropped to 695. At one time in that area there were 137 mines, but today the number has been reduced to approximately 8 which operate only part of the year.

As I have said on previous occasions, in order to understand the problem one must realize that the type of coal mined in the Drumheller area is a sub-bituminous or soft coal which is used particularly for domestic fuel. Some confusion has developed with reference to imports of coal from the United States, in that it has been suggested by some critics that the policy of the present government—this was also suggested to the former government—should include some provision for a quota or the use of some other method to prevent the import of coal from the United States. The answer to these critics is that the type of coal imported from the United States is entirely different from that mined in the Drumheller area.

I might draw another analogy with respect to coal that is mined at Canmore, which is located in another part of my constituency of Bow River. Canmore, as many people know, is situated in the Rocky mountains. They produce a high anthracite or coking coal. The Canmore coal has benefited considerably by this particular government's trade policy with Japan. I believe that at the present time a deal is pending for the sale of 674,000 tons of coking coal from Alberta, and that most of it will come from the Canmore area. The workers in the Canmore area at one time suffered just as the workers are suffering today in Drumheller. But now with the new markets in Japan they are not only working during the winter season but are also working during the summer season. The type of coal that is mined in Canmore, in the maritimes and in the Crowsnest pass—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member might perhaps better reserve his remarks until we reach item 214, which is the dominion coal board, and when perhaps the minister's advisers are here at that time.

Mr. Woolliams: I considered doing that, Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member wishes to speak now, of course he may do so. It is just a suggestion from the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: I was wondering whether the Chair would bear with me in this regard. There may be a chance that I will be absent on Monday, and I wanted to make a few remarks in relation to this industry. I appreciate the fact that there is in the estimates a particular item so far as the coal board is concerned. If I may be permitted to do so, Mr. Chairman, I should like to continue.

Coming back, then, to the problem in Drumheller itself, may I say that there are approximately 600 men employed in the coal industry today in the Drumheller area, when it is operating. However, as I was saying, the soft coal is used only for domestic fuel, and the mines are in serious competition with natural gas and other fuels that have been competing with them in reference to this domestic market in the urban centres and the fuel now used by the farmers. The coal miners in that area, which is the area of Drumheller which takes in the towns of East Coulee, Wayne, Nacmine and others, work approximately only from December to March. The rest of the year they are unemployed and on unemployment insurance, or must seek employment in other fields of industry.

At the present time the problem is this, as many say. Why are these men not moved, or why do they not seek other types of employment? The situation, and it has been stated by other members in this house who represent coal mining areas, is briefly this. As to the coal miners themselves, all their investment is in their homes in these areas; and when they leave them they leave behind all their life savings. The situation is such that the coal employees themselves wish to remain in those areas even on short employment, because they do not want to give up their homes and their small savings.

I want to make myself doubly clear on two more points. One is that the coal mined in the Drumheller area is sub-bituminous coal, soft coal which is used as domestic fuel. There may be some opportunity for the use of this type of coal in reference to other products, but at the present time this area is depressed and employment in this area has been going down for the last four of five years. In fact ever since the war ended and their market for coal for use as fuel ended, there has been a considerable amount of unemployment in this area.

This reference may seem somewhat out of place, but we had the Springhill tragedy as a result of which certain steps were taken by the government. This is the point I want to make. I dealt with this problem in the budget debate and I want to be brief. Here we have an area with surplus labour because of the coal problem. Here we have an area with a plentiful water supply, with good agricultural land surrounding it. In fact in the Munson area we have some of the finest agricultural land in the world. It is the centre of the judicial districts in the province of Alberta. It has good hard-top roads leading to the city of Drumheller from all leading cities, towns and villages, and Drumheller is situated on the main C.N.R. line.

It seems to me that when we have this surplus pool of labour as a result of the depressed coal mining industry, this would be an excellent site—and this is the point I am making—for the building of a penitentiary in the province of Alberta. We are the only province in the whole of Canada that does not have one of those federal institutions. In this way these people, numbering 500 or 600, or at least some of them would be able to find employment elsewhere than in the coal mines until some other industry develops in the area to use the coal and give them employment.

I therefore say today that I trust the minister, when this matter is considered by the government, will remember that this is one of the most depressed coal mining areas in the whole country; and when they are considering a federal institution for western Canada will decide that this is the spot at which it should be built.

Mr. Chevrier: I know that the committee is anxious to get on with these estimates and I shall not delay them unduly, but there is a matter to which I should like to refer. It has been up for consideration previously, and for that reason I believe I can abbreviate my remarks substantially. My purpose in raising it again is that the problem has not been solved. Neither of the ministers involved has made any answer, and before the estimates of this department are completed I think we should get a reply to some of the complaints and charges, in fact, that were made from this side of the chamber concerning a contract awarded by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to Autair Helicopter Service Limited.

Briefly the situation is this. Although this company was operating in the province of Quebec without a licence, and although it has obtained contracts from various departments in the province of Quebec without a licence, it made application to the air transport board to be relieved of certain of its restrictions in order to operate the Sikorsky S-55 on the polar shelf. That application was refused or turned down by the air transport board for a number of reasons.

I shall not go into these at all, but refer to them in a general way. The air transport board, which is charged under the Aeronautics Act with the responsibility of granting or not granting licences of this character, decided in its wisdom to turn them down, and one of the reasons given was that the company refused to file a statement of financial responsibility. While this did not appear in the evidence but transpired afterwards, there were other clear reasons why the air transport board refused to grant this company a licence. Another was that the insurance on the helicopters of this company had been cancelled on two occasions. A third was that in 1959, I believe, they had six accidents and in 1960 three or four, involving in several cases the complete—I have forgotten the insurance expression, but it means the complete disappearance.

An hon. Member: Write-off.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, write-off; I thank the hon. member. It resulted in complete write-off for the helicopters involved, and that brought about the cancellation of the insurance. The company then insured with another United States corporation with which I am informed the air transport board was not very happy.

Be that as it may, the application to the air transport board was turned down emphatically. I have here, and I have already put on record, the decision of the board refusing to grant the application. Thereafter an appeal was made to the minister, and the minister overruled the air transport board on a matter of a judicial nature. I have already complained that the minister should not have done that, and I have put on record why that was the case.

I can only direct my attention to the matter at this time in so far as the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is concerned, because the other matters are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. There was a contract for a substantial amount awarded for helicopter services on the polar shelf. That contract was awarded to Autair without tender, according to the words of the minister himself as contained in Hansard, when he replied to my statements. What happened on that occasion was that prices were required of certain helicopter companies, four or five, I have forgotten which; and although one of the aircraft companies, Pacific Helicopter I think, did operate S-55's they were eliminated and Autair, which had never operated an S-55 Sikorsky helicopter before, were allowed to put in a price.

From the information I have, which is reliable information, their price was not the lowest, as is indicated in the return by the minister. It is true that it was the lowest on 100 hour operation in the area, but as the committee knows helicopters are not operated for that length of time. On the minimum operation and on the operation of 50 hours they were not the lowest, or their price was the same as that of several other helicopter companies.

When I made these complaints the minister said that the matter was not his responsibility; that was not his business to look into the antecedents of the company; that that was the responsibility of the Minister of Transport, and I say to him with respect that that is not correct. Even though the Minister of Transport by overruling the air transport board had authorized this company to operate, it was none the less the responsibility of the minister or his officers to look into the financial responsibility of Autair Helicopters and their record for air safety because his officers were being transported in dangerous areas and these men should have the best protection possible.

The next point was that the minister stated that this company had had experience on the D.E.W. line. I was perhaps in error on one occasion in stating what the minister had said, but so that I will not make that error again, what the minister said was this:

(Translation):

The pilots of Autair Helicopter Services Limited acquired experience on the D.E.W. line, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, there is not much difference between the D.E.W. line and the areas where those aircraft will fly.

(Text):

In other words, the minister stated that this company's pilots had had experience on the D.E.W. line. Well, I have in my possession evidence which indicates that when the Autair pilots left to perform that task on the polar shelf they had had no experience whatsoever in that kind of operation. One pilot had had only 30 days' experience in the Knob Lake area, and the other two had had no such experience whatsoever. However, the main point is that this company should not have been allowed to obtain the contract without tender.

I am not going to pursue this matter unduly. I think, and I repeat, that there should be an investigation into this matter by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, because the story which is now going around—and it is well founded—is that an attempt is being made by certain companies to take over Autair Helicopters to give an air of respectability to it, because up to the time it got the contract, as well as before that, there was no air of respectability whatsoever about it. It looks as if this whole operation had a very serious political tinge.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister to investigate this contract. That is the least he can do. If there was no serious charge, then I would have no complaint if the answer were no. But it is a serious charge. Here is a responsible body under the Aeronautics Act which turns down the Autair application, yet the application is granted none the less. A contract is awarded without tenders being called for, and as I say these people had had no experience whatsoever in the important polar shelf area where they were to work.

In view of the fact that on a previous occasion no reply was made by either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, I hope there will be a reply on this occasion. I hope the minister, knowing him as I do, will want to conduct an investigation to satisfy himself that the charges which I have made seriously on my responsibility as a member of parliament are investigated, so there will not be the slightest tinge so far as he and his officials are concerned.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I plead with the minister to consult with his colleague so that an investigation into the operations of Autair Helicopters be instigated without delay.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make about hydrographic services. As the minister well knows, two of the hydrographic ships, C.G.S. Acadia and C.G.S. Cartier are based at the port of Pictou. Last July the waterfront of this port was almost completely wiped out by a very serious fire. As a result the hydrographic services set up there were destroyed as well as most of the piers and wharves in the area. Thanks to the co-operation of the Department of Public Works work is going ahead in the restoration of the waterfront.

Thanks to the minister the decision was made last year that the two boats I have referred to should return to Pictou for the winter as usual, and to help in this the Department of Public Works erected a temporary berth for these ships. I would like to point out, although this fact is known to the minister, that these two ships although not large are both important to this town, as are also the hydrographic services, whose members have their homes in Pictou, where there is ample housing for them. It is also important to this town in that the supplies for the ships are obtained there, which gives the local merchants an opportunity to supply them.

Another matter is that the local shipyard, Ferguson Industries, Ltd. is given an opportunity to do the work on the ships during the winter, and this provides employment for the area. With regard to work on the smaller launches and other vessels, some of it is done at Stright and MacKay Limited, which is also in Pictou, and this again provides employment.

My submission in essence is this. I ask the minister to give serious consideration to seeing that these two ships return to Pictou this fall, because as I have pointed out this is most important for this town and indeed for my whole constituency.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on this particular item of the department. As the committee probably knows, I represent one of the large mining communities in the pre-Cambrian shield, and I am very interested in the mines department. However, as a miner who worked in the mines in the pre-Cambrian shield for many years, I never at any time saw any mines officials from the federal government; I never came into contact at any time with agents of the federal government or of the department of mines, and as far as I know none of my colleagues in the mines had ever done so.

So we begin to wonder just what the department is for, who it works for and what is the purpose of the department. I notice that a number of officials are present in the gallery. Each of them must head a separate branch, and I would be interested to know how many of them are connected with the part of the department which is concerned with mines.

We want to be fair, and I must congratulate the department on the valuable work which has been done for Canada on a national scale in the field of mapping and surveys. I have talked to many United States pilots and others who have used maps prepared by the department, and they claim that these maps are better than any maps which are available from any other source. As I say, I think the department is to be congratulated on the high calibre of the work which has been done in this particular department. The fact that Canada has, in the main, been mapped, means that we can assess the possibilities and be in a position to make the best use of them. Certainly the work which has been done, particularly in those areas where few or no people live and which have, in the main, been entered only by survey teams, is of a high calibre.

However, as to the other half of the department, that which deals with mines, I think less can be said in favour of its activities. I have here a booklet which is put out by the department under the name of the director of the mines branch setting out the history of the branch and describing the work it does. The booklet is certainly comprehensive and the branch has a great deal of equipment and machinery, by the look of it. I do know that the branch has done some useful work for particular companies with regard to the processing of ores and other things of that nature, but I suggest that this work might well be done by some of the companies themselves. Very little has been done, to my knowledge, in the field of development to assist new mines where this type of assistance would be of great value to people who are less well established. So far as I know this help is either not available to them, or it is not being used.

In my area especially for years we have been producing precious metals, silver for half a century and gold for almost as long. In conjunction with this, the extraction of certain other precious metals, such as plutonium, is taking place, but the work is being undertaken by the mines themselves by techniques devised in the individual mines. There are large deposits of iron ore in this area which have not yet been developed. There are deposits from iron ore in the Belcher islands which will have to be processed before shipment can be made. If the companies concerned could be assisted in carrying out this work they would then have some opportunity to develop their enterprises.

I am thinking of small mines such as one which came into operation in northern Ontario recently, owned by a man who started work in a mine at almost the same time I did. He has now developed his own asbestos mine. Over the years he has run into many problems which I am sure could have been solved with assistance such as the department claims is made available. This man's knowledge of the industry had advanced to such an extent that he would, I am sure, be in a position to know of any development, or any assistance in processing, which was available to him, and I think if such assistance had been available he would have taken advantage of it.

I presume that companies such as Consolidated Mining and International Nickel have no problem in sending someone to Ottawa with samples of ore, or sending half a ton of ore to have it processed and getting the department to do the work necessary to find the easiest and most economic method of extraction. However, I suggest that those in the prospecting field would find great difficulty in bringing their ore to Ottawa and having this work done. Many of them do not even know that this service is available.

One of the problems is that the department of mines, federally, and the departments of mines, provincially, overlap and cover approximately the same field. In Ontario, in particular, the department is extensive and has done a great deal of work in its own right. This means that less use is made of the federal department of mines than would otherwise be the case.

Another major problem in the development of the mineral resources of this country is the achievement of a completed industrial process, which would be of the greatest utility to the people of this country so they might profit more completely from the resources available. For instance, there are mines in Ungava, and we have known companies go into development in Labrador. We have let them take the basic metal, the raw iron ore, and ship it out as raw material rather than having it processed here in Canada.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before the luncheon adjournment I was outlining the fact that there are problems created by the division of responsibility for mineral resources between the provincial and federal governments. There should be more co-operation between the two bodies and more authority in this field should be assumed by the federal government. An assessment should be made of the full potentiality of our mineral resources. I cite what has been done by the national energy board as an example. An assessment of this kind would assist the development of our resources on a national rather than a provincial scale.

Many known ore deposits are not being developed now because of conditions existing in the provinces. In my own province we are interested in the development at Steep Rock where an open pit and deep mine operation have been undertaken. We are interested in taking full advantage of those natural resources. We are also interested in the development at the Belcher islands, at Kirkland lake and at Kapuskasing where there are known iron reserves which have not been developed.

The method of financing mining companies has created a problem concerning the overall mineral distribution in Canada. Mines in the Belcher islands could be developed advantageously. Problems would have to be overcome but the opening up of the north would be greatly assisted. Assistance should be given to the companies in the Belcher islands. This would mean a deep seaport being established at Moosonee and an extension of a railway into the area. New development would take place with international implications. We would likely have to export to markets other than United States markets. The people of northern Ontario feel it would be advantageous to develop some of our mineral resources for new markets in Europe in addition to United States markets. They feel we should not place our eggs in one basket. A large United States company holds mining rights at Dane. The company has no intention of developing the property but proposes to keep it as a future potential source as it keeps other property it holds throughout the world.

The federal Department of Mines and Technical Surveys should eventually develop a liaison with the provinces under which there would be recognized the right of the federal government to ascertain the value to Canadians of the development of our national resources.

All hon. members are familiar with the uranium problem. Operations in this field should have been restricted. The government should have assessed the potential reserves of uranium and the anticipated markets. The department should have had some concept of the potentiality of reserves in relation to the demand on the world markets. If the department did have this knowledge the development of uranium at Bancroft and particularly at Elliot Lake should have been curtailed. We have spent more money in the development of Elliot Lake than we will ever get back out of it unless the present circumstances radically alter.

If mines are to be assisted under federal legislation, as one hon. member suggested they should be, we should determine what we want to have accomplished in this field. We made a mistake in enacting legislation that made possible the financing of an uranium development that had only a limited life time and limited sales. The mines could not possibly have made the money they did without taking advantage of the situation on the scale they did. It is rumoured that one financier borrowed up to $40 million in the United States to establish a mining operation at Elliot Lake. Through subsidies and the sale of the contract he had—it was a government affair—he paid back the money, took $10 million and entered the exploitation field. He is now working in the Arctic region in the development of an oil industry.

I suggest that these people are taking advantage of the federal government. They are taking advantage of the very things that were made available to them to allow the mines to be developed. They are now using this privilege and, in many cases, abusing it, because we were shortsighted in allowing the condition to develop. The minister may say that this does not come within his jurisdiction and it is not his field, and he may be right because, as I said before, I am not too sure what are the rights and privileges of the mines branch.

The advantages that the mining companies get flow from the federal government and therefore in my opinion the federal department must take some responsibility in this matter. I believe that in fields such as gold mining, where we give emergency assistance, the mines department should take an interest in the industry. I have made the point, and certainly other hon. members have made it also, that the inspection of the mines toward which we are paying assistance is nil, especially when the amount of money paid over is taken into consideration. We are not in agreement that all those companies are honest, for the simple reason that, as an example, one of the mining companies in northern Ontario for years bragged about having a portfolio of $70 million. They have now taken this portfolio and have gone into the steel industry and into a number of other interests. They have taken that money out of the community and the country and it is no longer available even for pensions for their employees or for retiring some of the debt of the communities that had to be built to allow the company to make the money it originally put into its portfolio.

We think the department has some responsibility in such fields as safety. I do not think it should go into it in the same way as the provincial governments do, but a great deal of work must be done in the field of silicosis. It is not enough to say that silica dust in the lungs is a very bad thing and then pour into the same lungs a great deal of aluminum dust and say it will solve the problem. When we do that we have covered up the problem but we have not solved it. The responsibility for this type of research should not rest entirely with the provinces because each province has adopted a different attitude, and the problem is not the same in the mining industry in all provinces.

The federal government has an exceedingly important role to play in this field in the Northwest Territories where it has done very little for the protection of its miners. Many of the miners coming back to the fields in which I have worked have been in very poor physical condition. They have suffered and have been able to get very little recompense for their suffering. I attended a meeting in Elliot Lake not too long ago where the problem of radiation was under discussion. It is very interesting to know that no regulations have been drawn up in this regard. While this may be a provincial matter, the federal government must assume some responsibility because we are responsible for that industry being born in the first place in that area. We control their sales. We loaned them the money; we gave them the tax exemptions which made it possible for them to be there, so we have some responsibility. Yet, some of the mines have not even granted their employees the right to obtain a urinalysis to determine radiation effects. We have supplied no film strips, no matter what the jobs are.

I was very surprised to know that to such men as repairmen and men working in high concentrations of uranium production, some of the mines give urinalysis tests which determine the radiation effects. Others do not bother doing so. They have pointed out that there was no reason why they should do so.

These are fields in which the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys can serve a useful function for all the Canadian people, and particularly the people who work in that industry and their families. They must exercise some responsibility in this field. I would suggest in particular that in these fields in which the federal government makes a large contribution it should assume much more authority and much more responsibility with respect to industrial relations and safety measures than it does now. I see no reason why the government cannot do that.

For years I have been interested in learning why the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys explosives division did not do something about demanding a change in the type of explosives used in mines. Many of the employees suffer more from exposure from nitrogen gases than they do from exposure to dust. Many miners will tell you that this nitrogen gas, by burning the linings and the membranes of the nose, throat and lungs, eliminates the hairs and other protection which were there originally and that a great deal of the problem that develops, along with silicosis, is brought about by nitrogen in the gases caused by the explosion of ordinary nitrogen.

There are other types of explosives which could be used which have no large amounts of nitrogen in them and which would serve the same purpose. They would probably cost a little more money but in relation to the amount of material that could be produced in a mine, which is attached to this problem, the cost factor probably would be greatly reduced because of the increased efficiency and increased production that would take place by a simple change in the type of explosives used in the mine.

Then there is the matter of government subsidies and government assistance in the mining field. As I pointed out, in my opinion this gives the federal government a great deal more authority than it has ever exercised in this industry. We have the problem of coal in British Columbia and in the maritimes. In those areas the production of coal has been greatly reduced. At the same time we are paying very high subventions on coal from the maritimes. We have tried to solve these problems in one way but we have not really solved anything at all. We have accomplished very little except to postpone the time when the inevitable will take place. This is true with respect to emergency gold mining assistance. We have never opposed the assistance because it was absolutely necessary when it was put into effect to alleviate a problem over which neither the mines, the employees nor the mining communities have any control. But this type of subsidy has been used for the protection only of the industry and the few results which will flow from that protection, such as a given number of jobs and a slight wage increase.

The wage increases flowing from this assistance have been very slight. The wage increases which have taken place have flowed, in my opinion, more from automation in the mines than anything else. A large mine that used to have 3,000 employees is now operating and turning out the same tonnage with from 900 to 1,200 employees. Obviously production per man has increased to such an extent that they could easily double the wages without adding to the cost factor. Very little of the benefit that the mines sometimes claim flow from the emergency gold mining assistance returns to the community in the form of wages and spending by the employees of that industry.

I am sure that this problem is common in the coal industry. This is why I am afraid it is going to exist in Elliot Lake. I would not be the least bit surprised to find the department suggesting to the minister that we should stock-pile uranium; that the government should buy it and should make some attempt to keep those mines operating on a partial basis. I would rather see Elliot Lake close down tomorrow than have this happen, than have them carry on for the next 15 or 20 years on a subsistence level where they are not able to increase wages and living standards. I do not want to see them remain in the kind of situation that has existed in the maritimes for years and in my own area where gold is the principal product. I would much rather see these mines closed down completely and the municipalities have to fend for themselves and find secondary industries. If the minister looks at the problem at all I think his conclusion will be similar to mine. If assistance by way of subsidy, subvention or otherwise from the federal government is going to go into these areas, let us at least make it in a form that the areas can develop and help themselves.

[Mr. Peters.]

While this type of hand-out has served a purpose and will serve a purpose, in my opinion it is only justifiable if it is carried on for a short period of time until other assistance of a permanent nature can be provided. As far as I am concerned, some of the assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act should have been earmarked for secondary industries and secondary development in the mining fields. It should not have been left wholly to the mines to do what they felt like doing about it because in many cases it has been of very little benefit to the areas concerned.

In many cases, however, the mines have done an admirable job and in my area there is one that in my opinion has been well managed. I never liked the manager. I have negotiated with him and we never saw eye to eye. I have known him for a long time and he is a rough, tough fellow who knows what mining is all about. I refer to Mr. Ken Gray who is the manager of Sylvanite mine and also controls it to a large extent. He is a man who in my opinion has practised all possible conservation methods and has taken full advantage of assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. But in reading the Northern Miner I find that even with this type of leadership the mine is going to close down. This is inevitable because emergency gold mining assistance will only help them up to a point. This community is going to be faced not with an emergency gold mining problem but with an emergency problem involving the community itself in which gold will not be a factor because unless the price of gold increases considerably we are not going to be able to do the prospecting and development necessary to bring in very low grade properties.

I hope the government does not follow the course that it appears they might follow. I say "appears" in the light of the reports made from time to time by the committee originally established to consider the problem of Elliot Lake. In my view Elliot Lake is a specific problem that can be solved in a specific way because it only has to do with uranium mines, but on one occasion the house leader got up and dragged in Bancroft and Uranium City and said he would not be able to do anything for Elliot Lake that he could not do for Bancroft and Uranium City. The problem is not the same at all.

The mines at Bancroft and Uranium City have been operating for quite a number of years. There are also other interests in these areas. When you throw in a number of unrelated problems you confuse the issue. The issue is no longer clear-cut. The problem can be solved quite easily by paying a subsidy or subvention or doing something else to enable the industry to carry on at a limited capacity and with a very low rate of production. It seems to me this is going to be the solution, and I should like to caution the minister about using a subvention of this type to help to solve the problem of the uranium industry. The problem in the Elliot Lake area can be solved by putting money into bringing in secondary industries and conserving the mines for the day when they can be operated at peak efficiency. The day will come when uranium may be used in steel production and other things. In the meantime I hope that the minister does not confuse the problem with all the other problems that can be and have been introduced in the past in this field.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to speak except on the technical surveys branch of the department but having listened to the hon. member for Timiskaming who has just taken his seat I feel I must comment on and disagree with one statement he made. I may not have heard him correctly but I understood him to say that when some of these mines, and he mentioned a number of them, get into difficulties they should close down completely rather than struggle along. I cannot agree with that at all. If this were carried to its logical conclusion it would mean the closing down of a good many of the coal mines in the maritimes which have struggled along and a good many other mines which have struggled along and provided a minimum subsistence for a number of people, thus enabling them to remain in their home towns. The hon. member made a very broad statement and as a broad statement I think it was incorrect. In my view there are a good many occasions when people are justified in continuing to carry on as best they can in the hope that some change will come for the better.

I should like to speak for a minute or two about the question of technical surveys. This department has a major role to play in the development of Canada. Unlike some of the other departments of government, the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has to take the lead rather than follow. In the case of many departments they cannot operate until the country is opened up and proper conditions prevail. The reverse is true of this department. Those who work for it must go into unmapped and uncharted territory, make surveys and maps and locate resources before other departments can follow in their path.

To keep this lead we need a large supply of able and enthusiastic scientific personnel. As the department is now constituted it has a very satisfactory nucleus of specialists in the highly specialized fields which we find throughout the department. But when the mines, forests and waters committee examined the estimates of this department last year the members of the committee discovered that one of the greatest difficulties concerned the retention of scientific personnel in Canada, people with the ability to carry out geological surveys, mapping and other work in our northern territories. It was found that these people were easily attracted elsewhere by the great differential in salaries.

At one time it was considered that the government service was one of the better services in which to work but gradually this changed to the point where, up until quite recently, the government service was declining. Industry became the most lucrative field of endeavour and until recently the universities were in second place because they had raised their standards. The branches of the government were gradually declining. I was very pleased to see that the latest salary increases proposed will include improved salaries for scientific personnel and will cover a great many of the people now in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys whom this country needs very badly.

We also need to bring into the country and educate here other persons who have special scientific abilities for the jobs that they will undertake. I was pleased to learn in the research committee recently that the salaries and working conditions of scientific personnel are improving. The president of the national research council, who is very much concerned with the standards of scientists in this country, many of whom eventually find their way into the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, stated that there is now a net immigration into Canada of scholars seeking postdoctorate fellowships.

In other words, the Canadian reputation for scientific advance and research is increasing throughout the world and more people are coming to this country to receive advanced scientific education in research than are going from this country to receive such education elsewhere. As a result of the high standard that is being set in Canada, I feel we are becoming well recognized in the scientific field.

I was also pleased to hear the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration recently invite persons from the United States particularly to come to Canada in order to help to develop this country. A few years ago this suggestion might have been considered fantastic. For many years the flow was the other way. I think it is not such a fantastic thing now. We are hopeful that persons who come here to receive advanced scientific training will be more inclined to stay; and I think that many may take seriously the request of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to come to this country and to help to develop it.

There is one other matter I should like to mention in connection with this department. This concerns our advance in the field of radio-astronomy. On June 20 the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys opened at Penticton, British Columbia the new radio astrophysical observatory. This observatory brings Canada into the field of radio-astronomy for the first time. The radio telescope at White lake near Penticton is not the largest in the world. That honour is reserved for the radio telescope at Jodrell Bank in England. However, it is a radio telescope on a scale comparable to that of others established in North America and in various other parts of the world and it will assist our astronomers and those persons interested in space research to obtain information which it is absolutely impossible to obtain by observation, even with the best telescope that is available. These things indicate that Canada is advancing in the scientific field and that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is keeping up with the most recent advances in astronomy and in the other scientific endeavours which it has undertaken for the development of this country.

Mr. Herridge: I am one of two members of the House of Commons who represent one of the most famous mining areas in Canada, namely the Kootenay mining area in the southeastern portion of British Columbia. I had the pleasure and the opportunity as a young man to know a good many of the early pioneer men in the mining industry, and some of the pioneer women, who helped to build up the mining industry in the interior, including the at that time well known Nels Demers who went into the Kootenays in 1856 and stayed there until 1910.

When I look over at the genial minister who has charge of this socialist type of service to society I find it extremely difficult to be critical, and I will not be very critical this afternoon. I simply want to make a few suggestions and a few observations as a result of my contact with the department on various occasions and my experience around the country in the various mining companies in my constituency and meeting persons interested in mining and others.

[Mr. Aiken.]

This department which carries on essential services in research, scientific work and technical work that is essential in the location, surveying and the proper and adequate development of our natural resources is somewhat generally considered to be a non-contentious and non-political department, a department that does not arouse much contention or controversy. However, it contains a staff which is performing an essential and, to many people, little known service to this country. I say that because I have had the opportunity to discuss the work of this department with various groups, when I have been speaking to groups in the constituency and in other places.

I am amazed at how little is known by the average Canadian outside of the mining industry and the universities, of the essential work that is undertaken by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and that so little is known as to the valuable information that can be obtained from this department, its reports, its publications, its officials and its staff. While this information is essential and valuable to the mining industry and to others interested in the development of other natural resources, I think much greater use could be made of this information on a wider scale on the part of people who are interested in the development of this country.

Interest in this department has been stimulated in recent years in my constituency and in the Kootenay area generally because of its officials and staff taking some part in the surveys in the Columbia river basin. That work has brought the people of the district for the first time, in many cases, in contact with the engineers and the other staff conducting these surveys. As a result of that contact I notice an increased interest in the work of the department and, as a result, inquiries as to where they can obtain maps, information and so on.

I want to make a suggestion or two. I suggest these parties are working for the people of Canada, not for any particular group. Their work is usually directly related to some development. When a party goes into an area the people of the area are obliged to depend on casual information and, in some cases, on rumour. I think there should be a form of press release issued periodically so that the people will know what this survey crew is doing as part of a larger project and so on. It is only right and I think it would be well for the department. I think that would be interesting information and very much worth-while information. I have had that suggestion made to me by a number of people in my constituency who are greatly interested in the work of the department.

In addition to that, I think it is ministers who usually give talks to public meetings and various organizations. I am quite sure that the officials and members of the staff in any given locality would be quite willing to co-operate with local organizations, for instance, as was done in the Columbia river basin where there were parties of this department in that basin for years. I think it would be an excellent idea if the appropriate engineer or person would give a chat to the Rotary club or to the chamber of commerce in this area on the particular work of the department and the project that is being undertaken and the scientific information it is trying to obtain.

In this connection I want to quote very briefly from page 31 of the report. I have read a considerable part of this report before but not all of it. It says:

> The Vancouver office gave information and assistance to industrialists and others interested in metallic and industrial minerals, engineering geology, ground-water supplies, and construction materials. A number of short term field projects were carried out by the staff geologists, mainly at the request of other government departments among which were engineering-geology reports on dam and power sites along the Columbia river. Activity at the office continued to increase: there were more than 8,039 visitors, and 17,705 copies of publications of various kinds were distributed.

This is all to the good but the information is going largely to persons directly interested in the mining industry or to governments or persons interested in the development of hydro power, and things of that sort. I suggest that having this extra organization with the information as well as the Vancouver office it could be used to greater advantage by making certain the information was available to high schools and other various organizations through appropriate outlets.

I think something more should be done to let the people know what information can be obtained, the maps which are available and the services which are available through this department. I know the larger corporations know all about it. Officials of Consolidated Mining and Smelting Corporation told me that they have had wonderful contacts with the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. They get every co-operation and other companies do as well. But I suggest that this department should also make certain it does all it can to serve all the people, such as the smaller mining companies —I have run into cases where they were not aware of the services rendered by this department—prospectors and others.

I should like the minister when he replies to indicate what arrangements are made with provincial departments of mines or other related departments to avoid any overlapping in services or expenditures. I realize when speaking on this question that natural resources generally speaking come within the jurisdiction of provincial governments; but I would like the minister to inform the committee what is done in the way of consultation with provincial departments of mines and related branches of government to make sure there is no overlapping in any work being undertaken in surveys and things like that, or in publications, thereby creating unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. Comtois: There is none in publications.

Mr. Herridge: Following on the lines of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni when he spoke this morning, I want to bring to the minister's attention the excellent work which has been done over the course of 50 years by the interior chamber of mines which has its headquarters at Nelson, British Columbia. That organization is financed by subscriptions from local mining companies interested in smelting, mining and so on. I want to ask the minister if he would inform the committee if co-operation exists between his department and organizations such as chambers of mines in the development of knowledge of the work undertaken by the department.

I suggest that as most of these chambers of mines—and in British Columbia there is the chamber of mines in Vancouver and in the interior we have the interior chamber of mines in Nelson—are located on a main or well travelled street, usually with good window space. They could be used as an agency or a medium to advertise the work of this department and the information which is available in the form of publications, maps, and so on. I think they would be very willing to co-operate in this respect. Nelson is the centre for the Kootenay West area and people going there could get this information.

There is an increasing interest amongst these people in where they can obtain maps of the Columbia river basin area. The department has published some excellent maps in that respect and I think I have copies of maps covering the whole basin. But I get frequent inquiries and I think this would be a valuable outlet for information. I am sure the interior chamber of mines would be only too willing to co-operate. They could also provide information as to the services offered with respect to checking up on certain ores, recommending certain processes and treatments and so on.

I have another suggestion. I am one inclined to travel around the hills and mountains and I have been interested in the geological surveys which have been undertaken all through the southeastern interior. This is very necessary work when it comes to the consideration of hydro development and I have one suggestion to make. I notice that the longer I talk the sadder the minister looks. I suggest that instead of having just a number on a given monument, which is usually just a cement post and a copper or bronze plug in the top of it, it would be much more interesting to local people, travellers or tourists to have the elevation mentioned at the same time. Usually there is a number on the post, like "No. 96 geological survey", and if you want any information you write for it. I think with very little extra expense you could have the elevation marked on the plug and on the monument as well which would make for much more interest. I advance that as a suggestion.

The final matter on my list of very mild complaints is this. The minister knows I am interested in this because a good number of my constituents are interested as well as visitors from the south who come up by water craft along the Columbia lakes up as far north as Revelstoke. They are interested in obtaining a chart to assist them in navigation. The minister knows about this because last year he informed me that his department was very busy and had not had time to work on charts of this sort. I suggested that they could be sold at a price which would show little expense to the treasury. I am sure that everybody using water craft would be willing to pay a dollar in order to be able to find a safe channel from the international boundary to the south up as far as Revelstoke. When the minister replies I would like him to tell me what progress is being made in the preparation of a chart suitable for navigation purposes from the international boundary along the Columbia as far north as Revelstoke.

I have a few more remarks to make on appropriate items, but at this point I shall resume my seat.

Mr. Peters: I would like to reply to something said by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka when he attributed to me the suggestion that many small mines would close down. I worked for 15 years in a small mine and I would be the last one to suggest that we do anything which would close the mines down; but we do suggest that the end result will produce the position which I am sure is in the minds of the people who suggested that aid should be given.

Looking at it in retrospect I am sure we could solve the problem of the few communities who depend on this industry. I am sure we could take a few million dollars and resolve some of the problems in the same way as we solved the subsidy question in relation to coal. All I say is that we have tried this method and it has not been satisfactory as far as the communities were concerned. There have continued to be emergency problems, and I suggest this step should be taken not in the uranium industry but that assistance be given to those communities for which we are responsible. Our responsibility to them is not necessarily to keep the mines in operation just for the sake of operating them; it is a responsibility to the people of the community to see that some alternative is provided for the employment of those working in mines which may cease to operate.

May I say I am surprised that the department of mines is not making greater effort to assist the coal mines industry in the maritimes. I am surprised that the government has not undertaken a research program in that area perhaps with a view to producing a form of distillation such as is used in Germany. I understand that when a deep coal mine has been shut down one can close everything off, drill holes into it and begin burning the coal in seams where the coal is not of an economic grade. A methane gas is thus produced which, while it may not be suitable for burning in homes, can be used in the manufacture of steel and other industrial purposes. This particular suggestion may be of no great value, but it seems to me some solution must be found to the problems of these people in the maritimes who have long been dependant upon this industry.

We should not wait until a problem develops before action is taken. Before we develop a new industry, such as the uranium industry, let us in future decide what the industry is worth to the Canadian people and the purpose it is intended to serve. Then let us go all out to get the most out of it for the benefit of Canadians and the economy generally. All too often the action taken is haphazard and uncontrolled. For example, we are still drilling hundreds and hundreds of oil wells every year, yet the hon. member for Calgary South tells us that there is a great problem about selling the gas which we are already producing. This seems to me rather silly. What is needed is for the department of mines to make an estimate of our potential and an estimate of what our needs are going to be. Then we could develop this natural resource so that the Canadian people can get the most benefit out of the industry.

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask the hon. member a question? He has said we should have an assessment made of our resources. Was not that the very reason the Borden commission was set up by this government and was that information not contained in the Borden report?

Mr. Peters: I am aware that the Borden commission did carry out a survey, certainly in the field of energy, yet we had this great problem to face in connection with the uranium industry, and that whole story only lasted for five or six years. The Borden report said that in 1975 or thereabouts we would be in the position of having industrial uses for that type of energy, but there is the period of waiting to be considered, and in the meantime we have no adequate means of carrying the communities affected. We cannot very well expect people to continue to paint the houses in which they are not able to live, or to wait about for a job which does not exist, hoping for industries to develop. Some of these assessments have been made, yet despite this we are continuing to develop our program in a haphazard manner. The Borden commission estimated what the needs of the Canadian people will be with regard to oil, and also made an estimate of the potential—

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask a second question? That is the very point I am trying to make. If the hon. member reads the Borden report he will see how many trillion cubic feet of natural gas we need for Canada, how much we can export; how much electrical energy we can export, how much we need and so on. That was the very purpose of the report.

Mr. Peters: I agree entirely with what the hon. member says. That is exactly what I was trying to say. These things should be a matter of common sense. We know that the Borden report gave us a lot of information as to the needs of the Canadian people and the productive capacity available. What I am saying is that the department of mines has not asserted its right to decide what is going to be done about it.

The natural resources of Canada belong to the people as a whole yet we are continuing to drill for oil, although we already have more than we can sell. Not only that, but I understand we are going to buy oil from Russia and other places. I think the department of mines should be in a position to govern these things and do something about what is contained in the Borden report.

This brings up another question which puzzles me. I read all the reports which are presented to the house and perhaps I did the department a disservice in my opening remarks by not referring to all the publications which have been put out. I did not mean to imply that the department is not doing any work in this regard. All I was trying to say was that they were not doing their work in the mining field in the way in which I should like to see it done. Reports such as the Borden commission report are placed before the government and before the Canadian people. Politicians tear them apart and say they are good reports, or that they are not good reports, but what does the government do about it? What good are these reports if no action follows as a result? In the short period during which I have been here I have seen very little effort on the part of the government to implement the recommendations made by these commissions.

I should like to say a few words now about the assistance which is provided to the gold mining industry and subsidies to industry in general. The gold mining assistance act was introduced, first of all, as an emergency measure but it has continued until the present time and the word "emergency" has not yet been taken out of the title. Today the industry is facing the same problem as it was facing in 1948 and the government has given no indication that it intends to consider some form of long term solution in which the gold mining industry would be interested.

One of the most satisfactory solutions would, of course, be the raising of the price of gold to the producers. If the present method of assistance were used in order to assist other industries, that is, emergency measures rather than long term solutions, I do not think the consequences would be at all favourable and while we do not want to put any company out of business, it would seem desirable that the government should consider some other method of assisting communities dependent on the mining industry. We would be well advised to try another method of helping the industry along the lines of a long term solution which would not be in the nature of an emergency measure.

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to thank the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) for his complimentary remarks directed at the officials and other employees of my department. His compliments were so sincere that they even elicited a discreet warning from the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

In reply to the request of the hon. member for Villeneuve, I intend next year to prepare, for the benefit of all hon. members, a report on the activities of my department in the previous year, and also a brief outline of the program for the current year, with particular regard to geological, topographical, geographical and other assignments. Such information will be useful to every hon.

member when the estimates of my department are taken up in the house.

(Text):

The hon. members for Villeneuve, Port Arthur and the Yukon have referred to the recommendation of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters concerning the indicated need for expansion of the activities of my department. I should like to assure them that I have studied these recommendations with my officials and we have attempted to plan what we believe is the needed expansion of departmental activities for the next five years. This plan will be reflected in our future estimates to the limit that it can be accommodated in the future budgets of our government.

(Translation):

The hon. member for Villeneuve has raised a number of questions, such as federal aid to Quebec roads, the mining exploration program carried out by the Eldorado Mining and Refining Company and finally the transfer to the provinces of the resources found in the continental shelf. Such matters are not the responsibility of my department, but I shall be pleased to discuss them with those of my colleagues who are concerned.

(Text):

Recommendations were also made by the hon. members for Villeneuve and Port Arthur to the effect that we should increase the number of university students we employ in the summer months. There is a limit to the number of students we can accommodate without decreasing the efficiency or accuracy of our work. In years when work opportunity makes possible the employment of only a limited number of students we are always willing to take on more of them provided we know soon enough in advance to properly plan for larger size or additional field parties. I should like to mention that of the 786 geology students in our universities this year my department provided jobs for 245 of them; that is, 32 per cent or nearly one third of the total number of students.

I was pleased to hear the comments of the hon. member for Port Arthur concerning the economic reports of our mineral resources division such as those on iron ore. I can assure the hon. gentleman that more of this type of report are contemplated.

The hon. member for Port Arthur also asked what my department is doing in the form of research which could lead to more uses for uranium. May I say that in 1959, following discussions with Eldorado Mining and Refining, a research project was initiated by our mines branch for the development of non-nuclear uses for uranium. Eldorado made a grant of $10,000 to cover the salary of one engineer and incidental expenses relating to the project. Prior to the arrival of the Eldorado engineer on November 1, 1959 some experimental alloying work had already been undertaken in the ferrous and non-ferrous fields. Attention was focussed on possible modifications of various types of steels when these are used in large tonnages. Aluminum, copper, magnesium and some other metals were also investigated. The basis of the research was related to the affinity that uranium has to oxygen, nitrogen, carbon, sulphur and other elements. At the present time there are four engineers and three technicians who are employees of the mines branch engaged in this work. The staff provided by Eldorado Mining and Refining consists of one engineer and two technicians. However, they have increased their original grant to $100,000. This increase was made to provide funds for an additional staff of four engineers and five technicians.

Investigations have indicated that small amounts of uranium might have very important results in improving the physical properties of steels used for many purposes. A few examples which may be quoted are axles, shafting, chain, high temperature tubing, piping, bolts and tool steels. Rolling tests have been carried out at a Canadian steel plant which proved that the uranium bearing steels are not difficult to work. In fact they reacted similarly to ordinary carbon steels in the rolling process. Steels are being made up at the present time in order to actually fabricate items which will be tried in service.

If the service tests duplicate the experimental results already obtained in the laboratory the whole program will be pushed forward another important step. It should be pointed out, however, that large steel tests will eventually have to be carried out before any item may be considered successful. There are variations in every stage of the process as one scales up such a laboratory test. It is anticipated that should one use prove successful, there will be more and more uses discovered over a period of time, which will pyramid the use of uranium in the metals industry.

May I also say that steps are far advanced for the creation of a research foundation which would help finance research in new uses of uranium. This project has been initiated by the uranium mining industry. Eldorado Mining and Refining Company of Canada and the mines branch of my department would most likely be associated with the foundation, making it a joint industry-government venture.

The hon. member for Port Arthur has asked how information was gathered in connection with a turndown of a request for a road to a mining property in his constituency. Most of the information was obtained from the president of the company when he appeared before the interdepartmental roads appraisal committee and in subsequent discussions with officers of my department. The conclusion reached by my officers as a result was that considerable additional work had to be done before the prospect could be considered an economic proposition, and hence at this stage federal participation in a road to the property would be inadvisable.

I should also like to assure the hon. member that this government is very alert to the question of the further processing of ores and minerals in Canada including the possible use of direct reduction processes in the case of iron ores. A cabinet committee exists of which I am a member. This committee constantly keeps the situation under review and stands ready to encourage by any reasonable means the further processing of ores and minerals in our country.

In reply to the question put by the hon. member for Laurier, I am glad to inform him that I personally discussed the matter of the boundary between Quebec and Ontario on lake St. Francis, with the ministers of lands and forests of Ontario and Quebec. There seems to be some agreement on a formula that would satisfy both provinces. The new demarcation line would coincide with the middle of the St. Lawrence seaway navigation channel.

I shall gladly submit further representations to the authorities concerned for the final settlement of this matter. I am not making a political issue out of this. I am simply offering the services of my department for the purpose of delimiting the area. I made that suggestion to the Quebec minister of lands and forests some time ago. I have also conferred with the Ontario minister of lands and forests. Both agreed that it was an excellent idea, and I think they are prepared to settle the problem. Of course, I shall have to contact the new Quebec minister of lands and forests, and I shall be pleased to do so. I assume he will show the same readiness as did his predecessor in accepting the recommendations of his departmental officials, and that we shall succeed in settling this problem once and for all.

Mr. Chevrier: I find it an excellent suggestion.

Mr. Comtois: I think it is the best possible one under the circumstances, and we will avoid any disagreements at some later date. This is a natural demarcation line, one that should always be very simple to maintain. It is a line that requires no markings. The markings are already in place, everything is ready, and I hope that before long we shall have succeeded in finding a final answer to this problem.

Mr. Chairman, I was also asked a question by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). This being the first time he deals with the problem, I think the hon. member for Laurier might enlighten him on the matter, which so far has always been considered as coming exclusively within the purview of the two provinces concerned.

Again I repeat that if we intervene in this matter, it will only be as go-betweens, to help reach a settlement. I assume that the authorities of the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec, who are on very friendly terms, will be unable to refuse each other anything. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate should have no difficulty in persuading his Quebec friends.

As far as my department is concerned, we shall always be happy to offer the services of our team to establish the boundary line once and for all. I doubt, however, that the problem can be settled before some time, because in this case it is not a boundary such as the one between Ontario and Quebec, and I am not sure whether the premiers of the two provinces will be able to reach agreement. I hope so, but in any event it will be the responsibility of the premiers of those two provinces to settle the matter, and I repeat that our attitude towards the problem will always remain the same.

In reply to a question by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, I wish to inform him that as far as the safety of the ships and personnel is concerned the responsibility rests fully with the sailing master of the ships, and definite instructions have been issued to that effect.

As far as wages of ships' crews are concerned, I had taken note of the problem because the hon. member had spoken to me about it. I can tell him that the same day that we spoke about the matter I got in touch with the Minister of Labour and he agreed that this problem had to be settled. He admitted it seemed unfair and that it should be settled and I have a memorandum prepared for him explaining the situation and I am quite sure it will be settled once and for all.

With respect to the St. Lawrence fluorspar mine, may I inform the hon. member that requests have been received by our mines branch for assistance toward monitoring radiation. The matter is being discussed with the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The hon. member for Pictou asked a question about the berthing of departmental ships in Pictou. I can assure him that we are planning to berth some of our ships at Pictou next winter, namely the same ones as least year. I think this answers his question.

In reply to the hon. member for Calgary South, I can only inform him that the technical feasibility committee has not yet handed in its report. Research and investigations are still being conducted in our mines branch, and by Richfield Oil Company.

The hon. member for Kootenay West asked what is being done to avoid the duplication of work with the provinces. Our directors of branches—geology survey and so forth—meet every year with officials of the provinces and discuss programs and projects to avoid duplication and to learn of the priority needs of the provinces in certain surveys which we then undertake. Our association with the chambers of mines is on a very friendly basis. We supply them with copies of our maps and reports and generally support any of their activities which have something in common with my department.

We have not yet got around to producing a chart of the Columbia river from the United States border to Revelstoke. We plan to undertake this as soon as possible. I can assure the hon. member for Kootenay West that I will do my best to see that the work is done and that we can produce the chart. I do not know how many copies can be sold. The hon. member mentioned $1 a copy, but how many copies could be sold at that price? That is what I do not know. This chart will cost a great deal of money. I do not expect we could ever be reimbursed by the sales made. Anyway I shall certainly discuss this matter with my officials and will do my best to satisfy the hon. member for the benefit of his wonderful district. I can say that.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for the statement. Possibly I was a bit optimistic, but I would say that at the present time there would be anywhere from 100 to 200 copies sold a year. About 100 boats came up from the United States last year.

Mr. Comtois: They might buy more than one at a time and give some to their friends.

There is another matter that I wish to clear up. The hon. member for Laurier brought up again this matter of helicopters. To begin with, I should like to say something about Okanagan Helicopters Limited.

[Mr. Comtois.]

In my statement in the house on April 13, in answer to the charges made by the hon. member for Laurier respecting Autair Helicopter Services Limited, it was my concern to be as fair as possible to all parties involved. However, after reading over my statement, particularly the part which contains a passing reference to the sources of the hon. member's information, I wish to correct any wrong impression this statement may have left quite unintentionally. I wish to make it clear that it was not my purpose to imply that Okanagan Helicopter Services Limited had directed the hon. member for Laurier to raise the matter in the house, nor did I want to imply that the hon. gentleman had obtained all of his information from officials of the company.

I wish to assure the house that the high standards of operations of Okanagan Helicopter Services Limited have always been recognized by myself and officials of my department, and that the recent discussion with respect to this year's helicopter operations, in support of our polar continental shelf expedition, has not altered the high esteem which we have for this company. I want to make that statement to be fair to the company.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister allow me to interrupt? I thank him for having made that statement but I should like to say that I have never on any occasion spoken to any of the officers of Okanagan Helicopter in connection with this matter.

Mr. Comtois: Thank you. I wish to correct the impression I may have given to the house. There are some details I should like to clear up to the best of my knowledge and ability. With respect to the matter of a letter of intent, the hon. member for Laurier will recall that there was mention made of such a letter by him. In answer to the charge made on April 13, 1960 by the hon. member that a letter of intent had been sent to Okanagan Helicopter with respect to the aforementioned contract, I wish to re-emphasize that no such letter was ever sent by any official of my department to the Okanagan group or any other group except the one which was going to have the contract. The only letter of intent which was ever sent by this department with respect to this contract was forwarded to Autair Helicopter Services Limited on February 17, 1960. No other letter of intent was sent. Therefore I am doubtful about the source of the information received by the hon. member. It is certainly not reliable as far as this matter is concerned.

The hon. member for Laurier also made a statement to the effect that Pacific Helicopter Services Limited was eliminated because it did not operate a Sikorsky S-55 type of helicopter. This charge is unfounded. In a letter dated January 6 Pacific Helicopter Services Limited advised the department that they were unable to quote on this type of helicopter service. Therefore the company was not eliminated by officials of my department but they eliminated themselves, not only with regard to the supplying of the S-55 but also with regard to the Bell G-1 or Bell G-2 because, for the efficient operation of the project, it was considered essential that both the Bell and the Sikorsky helicopters be operated by the same company. The quotation submitted by Pacific Helicopter Services Limited for the supplying of two Bells could not, therefore, be considered further.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: If the facts are as stated by the minister, why was Autair allowed to submit a tender when they did not own a Sikorsky S-55 at the time?

Mr. Comtois: If the hon. member will be patient I think he will get the answer. Let us take one matter at a time.

With regard to the charge that Autair Helicopter Services Limited did not operate the S-55 type of helicopter, I am advised by reliable sources that this is also unfounded. In fact, Autair Helicopter had two S-55 helicopters under operation at that time. Furthermore, this company had only to indicate their interest in supplying this type of helicopter to the department to be considered, as long as we were satisfied under the regulations of the air transport board that they could supply one and that the necessary permission, rates and so forth had been established.

It was also said that Autair's tariffs were not the lowest. The hon. member for Laurier stated in the house on April 13 that "a careful analysis of the sessional paper which the minister tabled in the house, No. 235, tabled on March 25, 1960, indicates that the tariff filed by Autair was not the lowest." I cannot disagree enough with this statement as the sessional paper to which the hon. member referred indicates that Autair's tariffs, based on a utilization of 100 hours per month are clearly the lowest.

The charges made by the hon. member for Laurier to the effect that Autair was not sufficiently qualified to do this type of operation are quite incorrect.

Mr. Chevrier: The air transport board disagrees with you on that.

Mr. Comtois: I will deal first with the suggested inability to operate. As the hon. member for Laurier knows, the Department of Transport has very strict safety regulations, and any company that cannot comply at all times with these safety regulations is not allowed to fly. Furthermore, Autair Helicopter Services Limited had two Bell helicopters on location with my department last season in support of survey parties. The survey season of those two parties was a complete success, which is partly accounted for by the efficient support given by the helicopters' operators. It is a fact recognized by officials of my department that when a contract is awarded to a new company the department usually receives far better service because the company goes all out to make a success of its operations.

As far as management ability is concerned, I might also point out to the hon. member that Bristol Aero Industries Limited, which are now owners of Spartan Air Services, have called upon the services of the president of Autair to manage the integrated services of Spartan's and Autair's helicopter services division. The choice of Mr. Connor, the president of Autair, certainly is a reflection of his ability. I might say that I have had no personal contact with Mr. Connor; I do not even know him. I am not here to defend Mr. Connor. The only matter that concerns my department is to be fair to everybody and to assure the best service.

I come now to the department's estimate of 100 hours flying per month per machine, another matter mentioned this morning by the hon. member for Laurier. The hon. member stated in the house on April 13 and again today that our estimate of 100 hours per month per machine flying time was a rather unlikely figure under extreme Arctic weather conditions, and that we had chosen the 100 hour figure to suit Autair's interests. I will simply say that our own departmental estimates, which were considered by treasury board officials some time before December, 1959, were based on a utilization of 100 hours per month per machine.

I should like the hon. member to listen to what I am saying now. To confirm this, may I say that an interim report on the operation of this project indicates that the three machines had accumulated 200.25 hours of flying in a 12-day period from the start of the operation up to and including the 30th of April. If my hon. friend wishes to make a few calculations he will see that if this rate of flying is maintained the basis of 100 hours per month per machine will have been greatly underestimated.

These are the facts as far as I know them, and I am making these statements and giving this information to the committee in all sincerity. In concluding I wish to thank all members who have made contributions to the discussion of my estimates. I am grateful for their constructive suggestions and the officials of my department will certainly take advantage of them.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few observations in connection with the reply which the minister has made to the charges and complaints made by myself in connection with this matter earlier during the session and again today. In replying the minister did not make any answer with respect to the request I made that he either investigate this matter or suggest to his colleague, the Minister of Transport, that an investigation should be held. In replying the minister said a great deal about safety regulations and the safe operations of Autair Helicopter.

I am telling the minister, without any fear of contradiction, that the air transport board turned these people down because of, amongst other things, their lack of safety. They had had six accidents in 1959 and they had four accidents in 1960, and their insurance was cancelled. Under those circumstances, how anyone can say that these people were conducting a safe operation, I do not know. Certainly the governmental body responsible for the operation of air carriers felt otherwise and they turned the application down. I am therefore not paying a great deal of attention to what the minister has said in this respect, and of course I say that to him respectfully.

Then the minister has made a great deal of the fact that Pacific Helicopter withdrew or eliminated themselves by saying that they did not possess any S-55 Sikorsky machines. Did the minister or his officers make any attempt to inquire whether Autair Helicopter had any S-55 Sikorsky machines in operation at the time? The minister said they had two. But if the minister looks at the evidence which was given at the hearing before the air transport board and which I have read through carefully he will find that it is clear from this evidence that they did not have any S-55 Sikorsky machines at the time. They may well have leased one or two of them afterwards as a pretext in order to comply with the terms of the contract, but certainly in the evidence which was given before the air transport board, and which I have gone over very carefully, there is not the slightest indication of that situation. I do not think it behooves the officers of the minister's department to determine this matter; I think it is up to the air transport board. The committee knows what has transpired in so far as this matter is concerned.

Then the minister has stated that Bristol Aero Industries now own Spartan and that they have called on Mr. Connor to manage their operations.

Mr. Comtois: I have been told that.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the point. I asked the Minister of Transport on the orders of the day for a reply to that question and the minister's reply to me was this: the hon. member for Laurier seems to know a great deal more about this matter than I do or than does the air transport board; let him find out from them. Now the minister rises in his place in the chamber and says that is the information he has. The official information from the Minister of Transport certainly is not indicative of that situation. It seems to me that before the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys can say that Bristol have availed themselves of the know-how of Mr. Connor we should at least have a statement from the air transport board because this sale or presumed sale or presumed taking over by Bristol of Autair must be approved by the air transport board. I should like to know whether it has been approved. I think the minister who comes forward and makes a statement such as that which he has made should at least tell us whether or not the air transport board has approved of this and whether or not Mr. Connor is now, because of his great experience, in charge. That will make all the difference in the world. I have grave doubts that such is the case. I cannot imagine in my own mind the air transport board on the one hand turning down Autair because they did not have financial responsibility and on the other hand saying "Put this man Connor in charge of the new operation".

Then something was said about a letter of intent. The minister has made a clear-cut statement that there was no letter of intent. I said originally that upon the information I had at the time there was a letter of intent. If the minister makes the statement that there is not one, I think it is the duty of an hon. member to accept the statement made by the minister in that respect. It may well be that the information I had was erroneous, although that was the information which I gave to the house at the time and which I had every reason to believe was accurate. However, I am not going to enter into a dispute with the minister in so far as that matter is concerned.

As the minister knows, there is more than one way of giving a letter of intent. As the minister knows, sometimes loose language is used. It may well be that while I was not entirely accurate in the statement I made originally, in effect I am accurate. It may very well be that without any actual letter of intent, what was told to the Okanagan people by word of mouth was that, being the lowest tenderer, they would have the contract. That is certainly the information that was given to me, although not by the Okanagan people. As I said earlier, I have had no communication with any officer of the Okanagan company in connection with the matter.

However, there is unquestionably a doubt about this whole matter. Here a governmental body turns down this company because it is not responsible financially and I have here the order of the board turning it down. On appeal to the minister it is approved. Then the company gets this large contract. Notwithstanding what the minister has said it seems to me that there is on record enough to warrant an investigation. That is all I have asked for. In view of what I have said and in view of what I think raises certainly a grave doubt, I wonder whether the minister would not ask his colleague the Minister of Transport to carry on an investigation so that once and for all we would know whether these complaints and these charges are well founded.

Mr. Comtois: All I can say about this matter of investigation is that I will discuss the matter with my colleague the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister leaves that point, may I say this. I think perhaps the minister should go a little bit further than that. If the Minister of Transport is not willing to have an investigation by the air transport board into the matter, will the minister himself give an undertaking that he will see that it is specifically referred to the public accounts committee at the next session of the house?

Mr. Comtois: This is not my responsibility, Mr. Chairman, this is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport. When the minister is in the chamber with his estimates I think the matter might be raised again and discussed with him, not with me.

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister any comment to make with regard to the department's views or its investigation into the question of offshore rights as promulgated by the regulations that were issued by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources with regard to the north? I wonder whether the minister's department has a view or is making any study on this matter because it raises an issue that is likely to be of great interest to some of the provinces.

Mr. Comtois: I understand that this matter is not under the responsibility of my department. However, I will simply do my best and discuss the matter with my colleague, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Fisher: I know the matter is not definitely under the department. I do not know that the regulations as issued by the minister's department are really under his department. I imagine they may be open to challenge in the courts on the part of the provinces because, as I said, under the regulations that came out the federal government assumes that it had these offshore rights. I think this matter still has to be settled. I was wondering what interest was being taken in the matter by the minister's department. After all, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is not a department that has been primarily interested, except in the Northwest Territories, in mineral resources of various kinds. I would just hope that we could learn from the minister at some time—and I will be quite wiling to do it by correspondence—what the views of his officials are on this matter and just what consultation took place before what I think is an outright statement of the federal position came out as contained in these regulations.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that these regulations have been promulgated by the minister of northern affairs, I assume the minister also agrees with them as far as his department is concerned. Presumably the minister accepts the position laid down in these regulations, that the ownership of mineral resources at the bed of the sea under territorial waters, and indeed to the extent of the continental shelf, lies in the crown in the right of the federal government. I take it that is the position of the minister and his department on this matter.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is the position we take and we have always taken it. The regulations are established by the other department. They are studied and discussed by the officials before they are published.

Mr. Fisher: Then I would like to make the statement that in the view of our party we think that is as it should be and that these offshore rights should be controlled by and belong to the federal government. However, I am quite aware of the fact that it is open to question and future argument.

Mr. Pearson: Just one final question. Has any province made any representations to the minister on this issue, because it is not now an issue between the provinces and the federal government?

Mr. Comtois: No representations have been made to me personally. It might have been the case with the department of northern affairs, I do not know, but not with my department.

188. Acquisition of common-use field survey and other equipment, $198,300.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, with regard to the camping equipment, will that equipment be used by the various teams the department will be sending in the field through the summer season?

Mr. Comtois: It is equipment that is common for all teams we have across the country; it is kept in a pool, or stores if you prefer. Such equipment is distributed according to the needs of the teams in the various provinces.

189. Explosives Act administration, $95,418.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, has the chief inspector of that division been promoted to the post of chief of division? I see here that a salary of $10,500 has been provided for the chief of division, whereas, last year, we had no division chief. We had only a chief inspector.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, there has been a promotion and he is now chief of division.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister what progress is being made in the problem I raised about nitrogen explosives. What work is the department doing to eliminate that type of explosive and adopt an explosive which would not create this nitrogen gas problem in the mining industry?

Mr. Comtois: There is no question of replacing the explosives, but we did make tests to reduce the danger to the public. Does that answer the question?

Mr. Peters: Every year miners die from the use of this type of explosive. It is not because they get involved in the blast, but they die because of the after effects. I am told there are other substances besides nitrogen which can be used in the manufacture of explosives which does not leave a deadly gas in working areas after they have been used. I understand other forms of material can be used in the mines which will not produce this nitrogen effect. If that is true, I suggest that the department of mines outlaw the use of nitrogen in dynamite and replace it with something which will fill the same need.

Mr. Comtois: I might say that the use of explosives is not the responsibility of the federal government; it is the responsibility of the province concerned. The services we provide relating to safety are the making of tests in our laboratories which are designed to help advise the provinces of the danger of such and such explosives. But the responsibility of deciding on the kind of explosives to be used belongs to the provinces.

Mr. Peters: I agree that is probably true but what happens is that the federal government agrees that dynamite must meet certain specific requirements, that it is properly labelled and has proper ingredients. I assume there are inspectors in all the large explosive factories who check the content of the explosives, but what I suggest is that part of the manufacture of explosives entails the use of a lethal material which in the past has killed many people and maimed quite a number of others.

This would appear to me to be the responsibility of the government. If we have a research department which can ascertain the method of making an explosive which does not have this lethal quality, then I think all we have to do to produce this type of powder is to pass a regulation that no nitrogen is to be used. It is true that once the powder is approved and used by the mines, the condition of which I am complaining does not come from the powder itself but from the explosion which takes place. This is the responsibility at the present time of the provincial government under their mine safety regulations. But the basic commodity which the government is approving as acceptable in the manufacture of dynamite is lethal, and if there is a substitute for it, as I understand there is, I think it is the federal government's responsibility to see that this new type of powder is the only powder which should be licensed for use underground or in closed quarters.

I see no reason why the government could not make this type of regulation. We make regulations that you cannot carry dynamite in certain types of trucks without certain protection being provided. I would suggest even more protection in this case because I have never heard of anyone getting into any trouble by improper handling of this material, throwing it around, or that sort of thing. However, a lot of people do get into trouble from this nitrogen gas problem.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Peters: No. I would like to know why the minister is reluctant to insist that his department develops this type of explosive which is not dangerous and why his department continues to licence companies to manufacture dynamite which I consider to be dangerous to health.

Mr. Comtois: I can say this, that this explosive might be safe on the ground but unsafe or dangerous underground. They are two different situations with the same explosive. As I said, we make the tests and all the assays and make our report to the provinces. It is then up to them to forbid this or that explosive in their own regulations. We cannot interfere in that matter. We can have regulations about transportation, but as far as the use of explosives themselves is concerned, the responsibility belongs to the province concerned. If there is any other danger the Criminal Code would come into the picture and it would then be a matter of provincial responsibility. That is why we cannot interfere.

Item agreed to.

190. Mineral resources division, $321,524.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. gentleman tell the committee if an officer in his department has been appointed to a post higher than chief of the mines branch? I find in the detailed estimates that a senior officer is mentioned for the first time.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member be kind enough to repeat his question?

Mr. Dumas: Yes, I want to know if a senior officer has been appointed above the chief of the mineral resources branch?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Dumas: A senior official has certainly been appointed. Is it the chief of the mines branch who has become a senior official? If so, what is his title?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, the fact of it being mentioned in the estimates is no indication of a senior officer having actually been appointed. We are providing the amount for the purposes of reclassification, and not because of an additional appointment.

Mr. Dumas: Consequently, there is only one official for the two posts now mentioned in the estimates?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether the hon. gentleman would give us some explanation with regard to an item entitled: "Assessment for membership in the Pan-American Institute of Geography and History"?

(Text):

Mr. Comtois: Yes, this is a new vote. I have a note prepared in English, and I know the hon. member will not mind my reading it, nor will the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Pearson: I prefer French.

Mr. Comtois: Especially today. May I say that I congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on his very good French.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Comtois: We should have four or five St. Jean Baptiste days.

Mr. Pearson: Three hundred and sixty five.

Mr. Comtois: The objectives of the institute are to bring about co-operation and collaboration among the American nations in the conduct of their cartographic, geographic and historical activities and to assist them in their scientific and cultural work in these fields. It serves as a medium for stimulating and co-ordinating these activities and for disseminating information relating to the progress being made within the respective countries.

Since the institute's major fields of activity are surveying and mapping, geography and natural resources, history and anthropology, three commissions are set up within the institute: the commission on cartography, that on geography, and the third on history. The institute comprises 20 member states, and Canada has participated as an observer in all meetings since 1943.

The work of the institute is scientific and technical in nature and does not in any way reflect political attitudes. Canada has since the formation of the institute participated as a welcomed non-member in the sections dealing with cartography and geography. This co-operation has been in the form of reports and advice in dealing with the technical aspects of mapping and geography. The participating member countries of the institute have welcomed this help and the secretariat has consistently urged that Canada become a member. I am pleased to report that Canada has now accepted the invitation to join as a full member of the institute.

When my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs reported on his trip to Latin America in this house, on May 30 last, he said:

> We have very much in mind the need for closer co-operation with these western hemisphere neighbours of ours and steps will be taken toward that end.

Besides providing an opportunity for common discussion of matters relating to cartography, geography and history, our membership in the Pan-American institute of geography and history will assist toward this furthering of co-operation and good will between Canada and the Latin American countries.

Mr. Pearson: May I congratulate the minister in taking over the field of Pan-American history for his department? May I ask him if this is just another way in which we are edging into the organization of American states?

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Do the expenses mentioned here cover the cost of attending meetings?

Mr. Comtois: No. The costs of government representation at conferences come under general administrative expenses.

I understand that the amount mentioned here for our participation is $9,150. That is the amount of the contribution.

Item agreed to.

Survey and mapping branch—

192. Branch administration, including the expenses of the Canadian board on geographical names and a grant of $1,000 to the Canadian institute of surveying and photogrammetry, $172,933.

Mr. Chevrier: With regard to this item I have just one question to ask regarding the Canadian board on geographical names. Has the board finally adopted the names for the various lakes on the St. Lawrence seaway; I mean, have they been accepted by the St. Lawrence planning commission at Morrisburg, and are the names such as have been suggested by the Canadian geographical board now effective?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Topographical surveys—

195. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,973,430.

Mr. Chevrier: On this item dealing with topographical surveys, would the minister give us some indication of the areas which are encompassed by these surveys and, next, would he tell the committee whether it is in this division that the summer students about whom the hon. member for Villeneuve asked are being taken on? Would the minister give us some indication of how many students have been taken on this year as compared with former years?

Mr. Comtois: There are 81 parties engaged in topographical, geodetic, boundary, hydrographic and legal surveys. It would take quite long to give a breakdown respecting all these parties. I know they are scattered about the whole country. There are some in every province and in the Yukon and in the Northwest Territories. Where there is no hydrographic work, parties are engaged on topographic, legal or boundary surveys.

Mr. Chevrier: This is a continuing job?

Mr. Comtois: Yes. We are trying to increase the number every year because the demands are very strong from all quarters. This year there was an increase, as the hon. gentleman will have noticed.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister deal with the question of these students? I do not mean exclusively under this heading, but in the whole department. Perhaps I can get the figures.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, as was mentioned, in these parties we have 120 students who are called student assistants and 170 labourers in addition to nearly 1,000 officers and crews of the ships of the Canadian hydrographic service.

Item agreed to.

Canadian hydrographic service—

197. Administration, operation and maintenance, including Canada's fee for membership in the international hydrographic bureau, $4,729,528.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister give the position in so far as the hydrographic vessels of his department are concerned? I know there is a new up to date vessel and I presume that is what the hon. gentleman had in mind when he gave the number of personnel on it. Is that vessel under the exclusive jurisdiction of his department? Is it operated by his department? How many other hydrographic vessels are there in operation? Does the department intend to build any more in the near future?

Mr. Comtois: We have four ships on the east coast and three on the west coast plus three others that are chartered every season for the northern operation. I do not know if the hon. member refers to the new one for which we are calling tenders.

Mr. Chevrier: I asked first about the new vessel that is now in operation.

Mr. Comtois: I think the hon. member refers to the Baffin.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Comtois: That is the newest we have. It has been in operation for three years.

Mr. Chevrier: Is it under the exclusive jurisdiction of the minister's department?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: What about new vessels?

Mr. Comtois: The same thing applies. The new vessels will be under the jurisdiction of my department.

Mr. Chevrier: Are there any new vessels in contemplation? What is their position? Are there plans and specifications for new hydrographic vessels in the department?

Mr. Comtois: Yes. There is the ship that will be called the Hudson for which a contract has recently been given.

Mr. Chevrier: To whom?

Mr. Comtois: The hon. member must know about it. It has been reported in the press. The Minister of Defence Production and I issued a joint release. The contract has been given to the St. John's drydock. No decision has been taken up to now about the propelling system and the matter is under study by the committee comprising several officers from different departments. I must add that we are planning for three other ships to serve our program in the coming years.

Mr. Dumas: Have tenders been called for the ships the department is planning to build?

Mr. Comtois: No, not yet. The plans are not made.

Mr. Dumas: Is the amount included in the estimates?

Mr. Comtois: Oh, no. There may be a small amount just for the design, but nothing else.

Mr. Chevrier: Where will they be stationed?

Mr. Comtois: One will surely be in Victoria on the west coast and the others on the east coast.

Item agreed to.

198. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $6,256,995.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understood the minister to say that a contract had recently been let for the building of a vessel in the St. John's drydock. Were tenders called?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: And they were the lowest tenderer?

Mr. Comtois: Yes. Tenders were called three or four months ago. The subject has been under study since that time. As the hon. member knows, it takes quite a long time to examine the details especially when the ships are to be equipped with laboratories and so forth. It is not an easy matter to examine the designs.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister sure that the vessels were not allocated by the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Comtois: No, there was no allocation. The contract was let after regular tenders were called.

Mr. Dumas: The amount of $1,389,300 appears in the details on page 271. Is there anything for the Bedford institute?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, the sum of $1,389,300 is for the Bedford institute.

Item agreed to.

199. Legal surveys and aeronautical charts, $793,495.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, the Vancouver board of trade and other boards have been making representations as to the feasibility of holding the winter Olympics in Canada. Some have been going to great expense in the preparation of various surveys. Would the minister say whether he might make available to them hydrographic maps and charts showing the contour of the area 90 miles north of Vancouver and 100 miles east and whether he would have information in his department as to winter temperature, snow conditions, et cetera, in the area which would be very helpful to the various boards conducting the surveys?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that my department will be very pleased to lend every possible support to this demand and will readily make available whatever information is in the department with respect to charts concerning contours and sites, information concerning temperatures and every detail of that nature. We will make as many copies available as the hon. member would like to have and will provide the information with pleasure.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the minister explain the purport of this vote which relates to legal surveys and aeronautical charts?

Mr. Comtois: That is in connection with tenure lands, any lands owned by the federal government, including Indian reserves, national parks, etc. This service is given by our department. We have inspectors and surveyors to do that job and make reports for the departments concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: What about aeronautical surveys. Does the department make them for the Department of Transport?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I thought that the hon. gentleman would surely know that this was done by this department for the department of which he was formerly the minister and that the work continues to be done.

Item agreed to.

Map compilation and reproduction—

201. Administration, operation and maintenance, $1,484,957.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to know how much revenue comes into the department from the sale of maps? How much came in in the past year and in past years? If I understand it correctly, the department is taking steps in implicit terms to publicize those maps more widely. I would gather it is spending more money to bring those maps to the attention of possible buyers. What success has the department had in this endeavour?

Mr. Comtois: My officials are making some calculations and I shall give the answer later on.

Item agreed to.

Geological survey of Canada—

203. Administration, operation and maintenance including Canada's share of the cost of the geological liaison office, British commonwealth scientific conference, London, England, and $50,000 for grants in aid of geological research in Canadian universities, $3,769,929.

Mr. Fisher: I have a few questions I wish to ask here. How many of the publications of geological survey pre-1935 are out of print now? May I put it this way: Is the department still continuing its policy of bringing into print again publications that have been out of print for some time?

Mr. Comtois: When the publication is an important one and is asked for we make a reprint and a new edition is put out.

Mr. Fisher: I know you do. We are very pleased that you brought out a new edition of the Fort William-Port Arthur report several years ago. More and more results are taking place in the educational field in particular where libraries seem to be able to purchase sets and to be able to fill in sets, and this is what I am interested in. I think in the long run, not only because of the geological and historical interest, we are pretty safe in assuming that for the next 20 or 30 years and thereafter there will be a continuing, although I admit a very slow, need for the geological survey publications. I just wanted to be sure that wherever possible the department was filling the holes where they occur and is seeing that the stock of publications which will be out of supply is kept up.

Mr. Comtois: I am taking a note of that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fisher: How often does the national advisory committee on geological science meet? I notice that the travelling expenses this year are up slightly. I wonder whether this indicates more meetings or more trips? I should like to have some kind of a review of this work. Is this committee still publishing its annual report that gives one a prospectus of development in geological science?

Mr. Comtois: The members meet only once a year. This year they have decided that the meeting will be held on the west coast and accordingly the expenses will be higher. The hon. member should know that.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could indicate to the committee how many teams the geological survey has in the province of Quebec this season?

(Text):

Mr. Comtois: There are two in the province of Quebec and four for New Quebec and Newfoundland together, the same area. We put in the item New Quebec and Newfoundland; the same thing applies to Quebec and New Brunswick in the same area. We also have a party there.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Now, with regard to the teams located in the Arctic, may I ask how many geologists are included in the group now there, and whether there are geologists working in that area?

Mr. Comtois: Does the hon. member refer to the polar continental shelf?

Mr. Dumas: Yes.

Mr. Comtois: Two.

Mr. Dumas: There are two geologists with the group at the moment?

Mr. Comtois: There are, in fact, two geologists in the group.

(Text):

Mr. Southam: Last year the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys was good enough to intimate to me in answer to a question, which I think comes under this item, that a survey was being made by a ground water team in Saskatchewan. I was wondering whether a report covering this survey was available, or how much progress has been made up to the present time?

Mr. Comtois: This information is not available yet, but I will see that the report is given to the hon. member.

May I give the information to the hon. member for Port Arthur about the sales of maps. In 1958-59 the amount was $112,774; in 1959-60 it was $122,166. We estimate that for the coming year the sales will be around $130,000.

Mines branch—

205. Administration, operation and maintenance, $3,798,711.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I notice a substantial reduction in the number of scientific officers, grade 2 and grade 1. What are the reasons for it?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member looks up the higher grades, he will see that there are more of them and that there has been reclassification among the lower grades. There has been no staff reduction, but only a reclassification. It is a reclassification with regard to those listed.

Mr. Dumas: However, under this item there is a reduction of scientific personnel. There may be an over-all increase of 21; but, on the other hand, there is an increase of 53 for handymen, labourers, machinists, welders, electricians, motor mechanics, toolmakers, sheet-metal workers, carpenters, and labour foremen. There is an increase of 53, but there is, nevertheless, a reduction of 32 in the scientific personnel.

Mr. Comtois: If the hon. member will look at item "Scientific Officers I", he will note that there are less of them, as the example I am giving. Does the hon. member realize, on the other hand, that in the item "Senior Scientific Officer I", there is an increase of 61 to 75? Therefore, nothing is changed as regards number.

Mr. Dumas: However, in the next one there is a reduction of 70 to 56.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, there are, however, two increases: the first, from 19 to 23; the second, from 61 to 75. In both cases, it is a change in classification.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I would not like to criticize the minister, and I do not intend to pursue the debate on the matter but, just the same, the total number of employees in that branch we are now considering, that is the mines branch, is 674, while it was only 653 last year. That actually shows an increase of 21; that is easy to see.

And now, on the same page, you show 53 new employees, for completely new jobs which did not exist last year. Therefore, there are actually 32 employees less in the scientific services division.

Geographical branch—

207. Administration, operation and maintenance including a grant of $500 to the Canadian association of geographers and a grant of $3,500 to the University of British Columbia in aid of research in foreign geography, $399,833.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions on this item. Would the minister explain to the house the grant of $500 to the Canadian association of geographers? What work are they undertaking in connection with the grant? Would he also explain the grant of $3,500 to the University of British Columbia in aid of research in foreign geography? What projects are under way for which these moneys are being voted?

Mr. Comtois: This vote provides for the continuance of a grant to the Canadian association of geographers to assist that organization in the sponsorship of the Canadian committee of the international geographic union and in publishing a journal of geographic research in Canada. This journal is of great benefit to the work of the branch in that articles dealing with scientific matters written by members of the staff are published without charge and reprints are obtained at a minimum cost.

The grant to the University of British Columbia for research in foreign geography is $3,500. There is no change in the amount from last year. This item provides for the payment of a grant to the University of British Columbia for research on a specialized phase of foreign geography mutually agreed upon by the department, the privy council office and the university. This is part of a research project approved in principle by treasury board and on the recommendation of the special interdepartmental committee in accordance with the agreement with and recommendation of the University of British Columbia.

Mr. Herridge: I suppose this is the best time for me to bring this matter to the attention of the minister. I refer to the operations of the geographical names board which all through the years has been a bit of a mystery to me. I will tell the committee why I raise the matter. A number of my constituents from all parties have made representations to me throughout the years suggesting that a mountain peak or some physical feature in our constituency should be named after the late W. K. Esling.

Mr. McQuillan: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think we have dealt with this item previously.

Mr. Comtois: The matter to which the hon. member has referred is included in vote No. 192 and this item has been carried.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could just bring the matter to the attention of the minister. I mistakenly thought this was the item because it concerns the geographical branch. Representations have been made from time to time and yet nothing has been done. I remember on two occasions getting a letter saying I would understand the reasons why this could not be done. I have not been able to find out the reasons yet. I should like the minister to explain how this board works and who makes the decisions with respect to the naming of physical features in the provinces.

In British Columbia we have physical features in some cases named after very much less worthy persons than Mr. Esling. He came into our region carrying his printing press on his back in the early days of the mining and railroad construction camps. He was highly respected by everyone in the district as a pioneer, and if physical features are to be named by the geographical names board it is my opinion that consideration should be given to a distinguished person who rendered such lengthy service to the district both prior to his being a member of parliament and later.

Mr. Comtois: All I can say is that the board includes members from every province and decisions taken about names are made on the recommendation of the representative of the province concerned and after consultation and discussion. That is how they proceed. There is nothing else I can say.

Item agreed to.

Dominion coal board—

214. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $119,400.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister bring us up to date on the situation with respect to the coal mines in Cape Breton?

Mr. Comtois: You are asking for a rather broad statement.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has broad shoulders.

Mr. Comtois: Yes. I am tempted to say something else. I am not as broad as my shoulders.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether we could call it five o'clock and then return to the estimates in a few minutes on the basis of the arrangement reached between the parties.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to call it five o'clock?

Mr. Comtois: Perhaps it is just as well. We will deal with the dominion coal board later.

Mr. Pickersgill: Later this day.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15 it is my duty to rise, report certain resolutions and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former have precedence, pursuant to standing order 15, section 3.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I think it has been agreed by all the parties that second reading will now be given to order No. 261 on today's order paper, Bill No. S-24, respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company, and that by agreement the house will then revert to the business interrupted at five o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreed to take second reading of Bill No. S-24?

Mr. Chevrier: I suppose there will be some discussion on Bill No. S-24 in the usual manner.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. Subject to debate being concluded, the house will then revert to the business interrupted at five o'clock. Is that agreed unanimously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WABUSH LAKE RAILWAY COMPANY LIMITED AND ARNAUD RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-24, respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company.

He said: I wish to give just a brief outline of this bill which deals with the Wabush Railway Company Limited, a Newfoundland railway company, and the Arnaud Railway Company, a Quebec railway company. These two companies are presently subject to the laws and statutes of their respective province. The purpose of this bill is to bring these companies within the jurisdiction of this parliament and also to give the companies permission to construct a railway from the site of the Wabush Lake Railway Company and the Arnaud Railway Company, if necessary, prior to 1965. The purpose of the railway is to transport concentrate ore products to be produced by Wabush Iron Ore Company Limited from a mine site in Labrador to a point on the St. Lawrence near Seven Islands approximately 290 miles distant. The whole matter involves an investment of about $200 million, of which about $20 million has already been invested. It will cause direct employment for about 2,000 people and naturally it will indirectly result in further numbers being employed. It will also involve the development of a new town site in the location of the mining site. It is hoped that after the mine is in operation it will involve an output of about 10 million tons of low grade ore.

The purpose of this railway is to connect with a railway already developed and known as the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway and hence to transport the products of the mine down to the St. Lawrence. I understand some of the ore is to be delivered to Hamilton.

The arrangement is that the officials of the company will be present at the hearings of the committee which will deal with this bill and they will be able to answer any particular or technical questions that might arise. Those who are interested might go to the committee at that time. However, if hon. members of the house have some questions I might be able to answer them at this time. I understand the hon. member for Laurier has some questions.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to deal with the bill which is now before the house, namely Bill No. S-24, respecting Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited and Arnaud Railway Company. I am pleased that the matter has come forward in this fashion, although I cannot say that I am particularly pleased about all of the actions that have gone on so far in connection with the bill. None the less, I think I would be remiss in my duty were I not to say immediately at the outset that those of us who are on this side of the house, will support the bill. We will support it because we think this is a good thing for Canada, and because we feel that the development on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, partly in the province of Newfoundland and partly in the province of Quebec, will bring about, as the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) has said, an expenditure of some $200 million, $20 million of which have now been either expended or committed.

As I understand it, the project is to link the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company which now exists and which brings iron ore from Knob Lake or Schefferville down that company's railway to the St. Lawrence river at the port of Seven Islands. The object of this bill is to tie the two lines to the Quebec Iron Ore Railway Company, namely the Wabush Lake Railway Company at the northern end, which will make the link with the Labrador mine and the Arnaud Railway Company on or very close to the shores of the gulf of the St. Lawrence, which will make the link between the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company and a new port on the St. Lawrence. As the hon. member has said, the intention is to bring these railways under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada and the board of transport commissioners.

But in rising at this time I have another purpose; and I hope the hon. member and those on the other side of the house who have sponsored this bill will not begrudge me the occasion that I intend to take to say a word about, first, the tremendous development that has taken place all along the north shore of the St. Lawrence, thanks to the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. I think it can be said with accuracy and with truth that because of the transportation facilities which have been established and because of the reduction in transportation costs there is great industrial development from the lower St. Lawrence right up to the head of the lakes. I have been told—and I believe this to be true—that more money is being expended upon industrial development because of the opening of the seaway to the commerce of the world than upon the power and navigation facilities themselves.

There is no question in the world that the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway as well as the iron ore development would not have taken place had it not been for the decision of the former government—and I say this to the members of the government now—unanimously, because that attitude was adopted by both sides of the house—which was a good one for Canada. The Iron Ore Company of Canada has a development which I think runs into hundreds of millions of dollars. I may be mistaken in the amount but it is a tremendous one. It consists of the townsite at Schefferville, originally known as Knob Lake, a 360-mile railway built at private cost extending from Knob Lake to Seven Islands; a vast mining operation; and extensive dock facilities. There has been the development of hangars, warehouses and the like at Seven Islands and it is really the project which broke the back of the opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway. Had it not been for the discovery of iron ore in the fields of Labrador and Quebec I do not think it would have been economically possible to convince the governments of both Canada and the United States that this project should be proceeded with.

The second thing I want to say, and I want to direct this particularly to the attention of those who sit in the government benches, is that it seems to me that the proper advantage is not being taken of this development by the government. It has repeatedly been said, and I believe it is true, that the seaway both from the power and the navigation point of view would aid the development of this country tremendously. That is a fact. But I think it could be helped a great deal more by the development of secondary industries, and I wonder whether the government should not be directing greater attention toward the development of secondary industry all along both shores of the St. Lawrence seaway.

I say this because I have given it a great deal of thought, and I am convinced that those of you who sit in the cabinet benches feel the same way about this matter. It was predicted that there would be, because of this iron ore development large movements in domestic traffic. That is, iron ore traffic that moves from the lower St. Lawrence up to the south shores of lake Ontario and lake Erie; and conversely grain traffic that moves from the head of the lakes to Montreal and other St. Lawrence ports.

That is taking place, but I think because of the development of the common market areas on the continent of Europe greater attention should be paid to the development of secondary industries. In the metropolitan area of Montreal there is a great deal of development going on now. I think that if the federal government in co-operation with the provincial governments and the planning departments of provincial governments was to give consideration to establishment of secondary industries which arise out of developments such as this bill will bring about that would be one way in which to reduce not so much the seasonal unemployment as the cyclical, the business and the technological unemployment which exists in this country at the present time.

Then there are one or two other matters which I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member, and they are these. I do not think that the Iron Ore Company of Canada, through its subsidiary Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company, because of the agreements which it has made with the Wabush company, should be placed because of this bill in an inferior position to that in which it was placed prior to the existence of this bill should it be passed by the house. In the other place, in an attempt to meet that position, one amendment was made and I think that consideration should be given to another amendment which should be made to this bill, and that has to do with the rights covered by the agreement between Wabush and Iron Ore. I believe these have to do with rights on the northern end of the project, namely the 40 miles which extend from the Labrador mine to an area south of the Schefferville area. The Iron Ore Company have, I believe, certain perpetual rights because of that agreement.

The hon. member and the house probably know, or we will be told when the bill is brought before the committee, that it may well be that the Iron Ore Company will not be placed in the same position as it was heretofore because of this bill. However, I think this development is going to inure to the benefit of Canada. I believe that any project wherein $200 million is going to be spent for the development of Canadian resources is a good thing and should be approved by all parties in the house, subject to the amendment which I indicated a moment ago.

I think the hon. member should tell us who is the owner of the Wabush railway company and who is the owner of the Arnaud railway company, and whether Canadian Javelin still hold interests in either of those companies.

Hon. W. J. Browne (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly interested in this bill and I am very gratified to learn that the members of the opposition are giving it their support.

I was a member for the Newfoundland legislature when arrangements were made between Canadian Javelin and the Newfoundland government and authority was then given to the Wabush Lake Railway Company Limited. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has described pretty accurately the position with regard to the railways concerned. The present railway, known as the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company runs from north to south from Seven Islands to Schefferville almost in a straight line, and the two railways concerned here run from east to west, one at a point about 224 miles from Seven Islands and the other one I believe about ten miles from Seven Islands. The lower line runs west along the gulf of St. Lawrence toward the new port which is going to be created there. The other branch line which runs 40 miles from the main line west to lake Wabush and Carol lake will run to two new mines, one of which is almost ready for operation at Carol lake owned by the Timmins interests, the Hollinger interests and steel companies in the United States. It is hard to say who owns the other one, the lake Wabush development. It was promoted by the Canadian Javelin company and there are a number of steel companies in the United States associated with its development.

The hon. member for Laurier referred to the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway made this development—I do not think he said possible, but certainly made it much more promising than it would have been. It made it much more successful than it would have been because the mines were discovered many years before it was decided to build the seaway. But I believe that even if the seaway had not been built the mines would still have been developed. Certainly the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway has made it a very promising affair and has also given justification for the consideration of secondary industries which the hon. member advocated, some of which I believe have started already.

Mr. Chevrier: I think what I said was that were it not for the discovery of iron ore in Labrador and Quebec it would not have been possible to build the seaway; it was really the discovery of iron ore which overcame the opposition to the seaway.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): I did not understand that that was the point which the hon. member was making. However, I accept his explanation.

I should like to give credit to the Iron Ore Company for the tremendous development which has been brought to Labrador and Quebec territories which adjoin Labrador. This has been a remarkable development and it is still only at the beginning. The ore at Schefferville and Knob Lake is of high quality. It is even beautiful to look at. Last year I was looking at some of the ore as it was taken out of the mines in Schefferville and Knob Lake, and I was surprised to find that this was so, as I believe, most other hon. members who saw it would be. The other ore at Lake Wabush is ore of a lower grade of iron content, but as a result of benefication processes it has been possible to produce a high grade product which will be shipped along this new railway to the main line and then down to the St. Lawrence.

Those of us who come from Newfoundland have been thinking of using the tremendous power of the Hamilton river in the neighbourhood of Grand Falls, and it is certainly pleasant news that the Brinco people—the British Newfoundland Corporation—have already begun the construction of a power plant with an initial development of 120,000 horsepower. But when we remember that this great river is capable of developing over eight million horsepower we can see that there are further possibilities for the utilization of this great natural resource for the refining of ore in one way or another whether by the construction of blast furnaces or in other ways. This great source of power may also be used to bring power to sites along the St. Lawrence river where some of the secondary industries mentioned will be established.

I am certainly glad that this measure is going through and that it receives the approval of hon. members of the opposition. I am sure the sponsor of the bill will be pleased to answer any other questions in connection with it.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): After surveying the record of the proceedings in the other place it is apparent that there is some kind of principle of government ownership involved in the problem of the Wabush railway. In fact, the railway as it exists now is not so much a railway as an extension of the Iron Ore Company's facilities and this will probably come to an end when the railway becomes geared to handle ore from the other company or perhaps from two other companies. This, in our view, is in many ways as it should be. While one could compliment the Iron Ore Company of Canada for its imagination in creating this line, the fact is that this is a major communication using the public land of Canada though in this case it is under provincial jurisdiction. Through this bill the whole enterprise as a transport medium comes within the orbit of the federal government and the board of transport commissioners. To that extent the people are given more control and a wider interest in the operation.

One can understand the reason why the Iron Ore Company of Canada was not too pleased about this particular development—I have taken that view of the company's attitude after reading the cross-examination—and I am certain that from a business point of view one might have great sympathy with the company's position. But at the moment unless we go forward with the bill as it is—and I cannot really see the value of making amendments—we should be placing the Wabush group and the other group associated with them in the branch line which is going to be constructed in a position where they would not have any bargaining strength as against the Iron Ore Company of Canada or the Quebec North Shore railway or whatever you want to call it. For that reason we feel the bill should be approved.

When the measure comes up for consideration in the committee I hope whoever is responsible will call the meetings at some time when some of the other committees of the house are not sitting, because I think this is a bill involving the kind of issue which deserves a good attendance at the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. We look forward to taking part in such committee meetings, and I do not expect we shall have any particular criticism to make. I hope that because so much of the discussion has already taken place in the other place we shall be able to forgo covering all the ground again, and I hope the sponsor of the bill will recommend to all members of the committee that they look at what took place in the other place, because the main points in the argument have already been set out there and there is no need for our proceedings to be repetitious.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): If the hon. member for Davenport speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): First of all, I will answer the question asked by the hon. member for Laurier. The Canadian Javelin Company does not own any shares in the company which owns these two railways. The company which owns these two railways is the Wabush Iron Company Limited which holds all the shares in these two railway companies. With respect to the observation as to the contractual—

Mr. Chevrier: What is the position of Javelin vis-à-vis this company?

Mr. Morton: The lands and the property are leased from Canadian Javelin who in turn have leased the property, as I understand it, from the Newfoundland government. Apparently this company was in there first and had certain leased rights from the Newfoundland government which they turned over to the Wabush Iron Company.

Mr. Chevrier: Will Javelin receive any royalties from this company?

Mr. Morton: I have no information about that, but I will endeavour to have the answer ready for the hon. gentleman in the committee.

With respect to the other matter I think the crux of the difference of opinion between the Iron Ore Corporation and those who are proposing this bill was in order to obtain an equitable freight rate for the transportation of the ore out of the mine. If the rates were obtained on the present set-up over the existing federal railway the Wabush Iron Company could not get credit in their rates for ore originating from their company's site but by incorporating these two railways with the present federal railway there will be created one transportation system as a result of which rates would be more equitable and the company would get a certain credit ratio on iron ore originating from their site. I think that is the main purpose of it. Otherwise all contractual and proprietary rates remain the same with no other disadvantage to the Iron Ore Corporation which originally developed the railway.

For the assistance of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) I might say it is the hope to have the committee meet on Tuesday next. I understand that all the officials and parties concerned with the bill are prepared to come on that day. I am not yet sure of the time.

Mr. Fisher: Will the hon. member try to arrange it so the meeting will not conflict with the time of meeting of the combines committee because 15 or 30 hon. members of the combines committee are also members of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Morton: We will do the best we can.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

B—Dominion coal board—

214. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $119,400.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, when the business of the committee was interrupted there had been a question asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate with reference to coal and I believe the minister was about to reply to it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the minister replies I wish to apologize to him in advance. I have a very important engagement and will have to read the hon. gentleman's statement. I am somewhat embarrassed.

Mr. Chevrier: I will listen to it carefully.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I have a short statement to make regarding the dominion coal board estimates. Hon. members will agree, I think, that a long statement would be inappropriate at this time while all of us are looking forward to the report of the royal commission on coal.

Let me deal first with policy. From the long range point of view the government's policy is simply to keep a sympathetic and open mind until the information, the conclusions and the recommendations of the Rand report are available for study.

But a short range policy is necessary. This is positive, clear, easily understood and practical. It is simply to improve the present situation wherever we can—and if the situation cannot be improved, then to maintain it without deterioration—until the Rand report is ready and long range policy can be formulated.

The dominion coal board estimates have been prepared from this policy background. It is essentially the same policy that reduced to normal proportions the huge stockpiles of coal at Sydney and Montreal, held unemployment in Cape Breton to a minimum when mass unemployment was threatened, restored a good measure of coal mining employment in the Crowsnest pass area of British Columbia and Alberta and is currently staving off suggested mine closures in Nova Scotia.

This is a good record by comparison with other countries which are experiencing crisis conditions in their coal industries. I understand that 25,000 miners are unemployed in one small European country. There are huge stockpiles of unsold coal at nearly all European coal mines. Last year while our Canadian stockpiles were being reduced to normal the undistributed stockpiles in the United Kingdom grew by 10 million tons and now contain 32 million tons of coal.

Any review of the current coal situation in Canada has to begin with the fact that coal consumption in this country is still declining under the competitive impact of oil and natural gas. The total Canadian consumption of coal in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1960 was 23,758,621 tons. This was a decrease of 1,650,000 tons by comparison with total consumption in the previous year. Viewed, however, against the more than four million ton drop in consumption which occurred in 1958-59, it can perhaps be regarded as a levelling off of the downward trend.

One item in the consumption figures deserves a historical footnote. I refer to the railway consumption of coal. Last year it was only 895,000 tons. The footnote for history is the fact that railway locomotives in this country once burned 13 million tons of coal annually.

Another item in the consumption figures is of interest. Coke and gas plants used nearly one million more tons of coal last year than in the previous year, a reflection of the high level of activity in our steel industry.

On the production side, Canadian mines produced 10,870,000 tons of coal during the year ended March 31. This was a decrease of 300,000 tons by comparison with the previous year but again it was a reduction of the decline by comparison with the year before last. One has the feeling that, if it were not for the intense new competition of natural gas and residual oil, the worst period would now be over for coal; that the upswing, so long predicted by the economists, would be about to begin.

Nova Scotia coal production in 1959-60 was 162,500 tons greater than in 1958-59 and New Brunswick production was 88,700 tons greater. The other coal regions produced somewhat lower tonnages last year than the year before, with the greatest decrease, 356,000 tons, occurring in Saskatchewan.

The Saskatchewan decrease is probably less a reflection of contracted demand than of disrupted production by a fire at one of the large mines in the Estevan district. As a matter of fact, Saskatchewan and New Brunswick are the two regions where the coal industry can be said to be in a definitely healthy condition. We have reports that Saskatchewan lignite has been able to hold its markets fairly successfully against low cost natural gas.

Little that is encouraging can be said about the household market for Alberta's subbituminous coal. Its use continues to decline as more and more homes throughout the prairie provinces are converted to oil and natural gas.

Here is a case where the hard fact must be faced that increased subventions or any other measure within federal jurisdiction would be powerless to maintain this sector of the Alberta industry. All but a few tons of the markets that are being lost are in the west itself. For some of Alberta's sub-bituminous coal there is a future in thermal electric power generation; but this is small comfort to the miners who have produced the coal for the prairie household market and now see employment diminishing. The coal for thermal power will be mined by strip methods.

I have already mentioned the Crowsnest pass area of Alberta and British Columbia. The greatly improved situation in that district is the result of increased export subvention assistance combined with the sustained efforts of the coal board and the producers to interest the Japanese steel industry in our western coking coals. About a year ago, you will remember, Mr. Chairman, a Canadian coal mission visited Japan with excellent results. During the 1959-60 fiscal year 263,541 tons of Alberta and British Columbia coal were exported to that country.

The coal board followed up its efforts of last year by arranging with the fuels and mining practise division of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to carry out extensive research on blends of Japanese and Canadian coals. The board then borrowed two specialists from mines and technical surveys, one an expert on coke production, the other an expert on steel making, and sent them to Japan to hold discussions and exchange information with the technical experts of all the major Japanese steel companies. It was the first such technical mission ever sent by any of the numerous countries which sell coal to Japan. The Japanese have been genuinely appreciative of our attempt to determine scientifically how Canadian coals can best meet the special requirements of their growing steel industry. This year the Japanese importers have already placed firm orders for half a million tons of Canadian coal. These favourable export developments could not be fully foreseen when the main estimates were prepared. At a later date I shall present to you a supplementary estimate of the subvention funds needed for this additional tonnage.

The Nova Scotia situation is known to all of us. You are aware, Mr. Chairman, of what we have been doing to maintain the Nova Scotia industry and keep unemployment among the Cape Breton miners to a minimum while awaiting the report which, we hope, will point the way to fundamental solutions for the industry's problems.

Using the increased subvention funds which you approved last year, combined with the special contribution of the provincial government of Nova Scotia and combined also with a tremendous sales effort, much of it conducted personally by the chairman of the coal board, we squeezed a substantial tonnage of Nova Scotia coal into the Ontario market. We did this while the Ontario market has been so contracted that it has been buying approximately 4,500,000 tons less United States coal. We additionally succeeded in maintaining, to a considerable degree, the traditional Nova Scotia coal markets in the province of Quebec against the competition of natural gas, residual oil and surplus hydro-electric power.

The Nova Scotia government has asked us to continue this high emergency level of assistance during the 1960-61 fiscal year, again offering to make a contribution of up to $500,000 to the increased cost, and we have agreed to do so.

[Mr. Comtois.]

Nova Scotia subvention payments made during the last fiscal year totalled $13,518,-398.11. This was $5 million more than had ever been paid out in Nova Scotia coal subventions in any previous year. However this total includes a small number of carried-over payments from the final weeks of the previous fiscal year. The amount paid out on the 2,414,786 tons of Nova Scotia coal that actually moved with subvention assistance between April 1, 1959 and March 31, 1960 was consequently approximately $12 million. The estimates which you have before you, Mr. Chairman, represent about the same degree of subvention assistance.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, at this stage in the discussion of estimates, I simply want to say a few words in connection with the coal mining industry. I am speaking as a layman, but I would like to express some general ideas and make one or two suggestions which, I think, are of some interest.

Coal is obviously one of our most versatile natural underground resources. It can be used in hundreds of ways other than a source of energy. It has been said that North America has about 40 per cent of all the coal in the world, and to give an idea of the importance of coal as a natural resource, experts state that, even if present production were doubled, we would have coal for perhaps a thousand years. That shows the abundance in this country of that recuperable wealth which can be used for years and years to come.

As the minister suggested a few moments ago, there is now heavy unemployment in the coal mining industry, and all experts and specialists in the matter agree that the next ten years will be the hardest. However, the prospects are that, in 15 or 20 years, large scale production will be resumed. Present conditions are due to several causes. The minister mentioned a few of them, like the dieselization program of our railway systems, which has certainly been a blow for our coal industry. We also may say today that, with regard to other sources of energy, prices have remained stable, while in the coal mining industry, prices have increased for several reasons.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, these last few years, we have found new sources of energy, such as natural gas, but we can already see that those sources are not as plentiful as coal and the time will come when we will just have to go back to mining coal on a high scale. For that reason, I should like to make a suggestion to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois).

If we expect to have to go back to intensive coal mining say in ten years, why do we not start at once stockpiling coal, to help out that industry and provide jobs for miners? Why, for instance, should we not intensify present production and stockpile coal in various places that could extend, let us say, from eastern Canada to Montreal? I presume that, in case of war, several other sources of energy could become exhausted or rendered unusable; coal so stored would constitute a reserve that could be readily used. I would therefore ask the minister to consider the possibility of stockpiling coal at various places in Canada; that would allow us to accelerate production in our coal mines.

This I think, is a suggestion which deserves to be seriously considered since, I repeat, experts agree that coal production will cease to be a problem 10 or 15 years hence. However, the problem now exists, and I think that if the government seriously considered this suggestion, it would be much easier, during the next ten years, to stabilize that industry which promises to be one of our most important resources in coming years.

Now I have little to add to what I have already said. However, I would also ask the minister to consider raising the amount provided for research on coal uses. I have been reading various articles from the United States and elsewhere, dealing with new processes, permitting the use of coal for a number of purposes, indeed for hundreds of purposes.

I think we in Canada should constantly keep abreast of research being carried out in other countries, so as to be up-to-date and thus help the coal industry, which I think is one of the most important and most promising of our industries.

In closing my remarks, I should like to subscribe to what the minister said about the officers of his department, and particularly those who are in front of his desk. I want them to know we appreciate the magnificent job they are doing and we think that with their know-how, we should be able to give that industry a new lease on life as it cannot be allowed to remain in its present state of stagnation.

I think we should take bold steps to insure that this industry will recover its former activity, for let us not forget that within 15 and even 20 years, we shall be back to the high level of production of recent years.

(Text):

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to express appreciation to the minister and the government and, as the previous speaker said, to the chairman of the coal board and his assistant for their efforts during past years on behalf of the coal industry. We are facing a very serious problem, one that is causing great concern. Not only do I wish to express our appreciation but appreciation has also been expressed by the union leaders, the coal corporation and the provincial government of Nova Scotia.

The question has been gone into in many different ways and I hope the government and those I have mentioned will continue to exert every effort toward the day when we shall have full employment in our coal mines. Before I resume my seat, I know it is getting rather late but I wonder whether the minister is able to suggest when the report of Mr. Justice Rand will be released.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, to answer in a few words what has been said by the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, I would say that we are ready to study the suggestion of stockpiling. With respect to his other suggestion, we already have a fuels division in the mines branch of the department.

(Translation):

And in that division of the department we have experts continually carrying out research and experiments on the use of coal for other than the ordinary purposes, in an effort to discover new possibilities applicable both in industry and elsewhere and with a view to making a more extensive use of certain materials that we have.

Mr. Deschatelets: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Do officials of his department attend certain meetings held in the United States or elsewhere in order to be made aware of new methods?

Mr. Comtois: Certainly. Dr. Ignatieff, head of the fuels division, has taken part in every symposium or conference of that type not only in Canada and in the United States but in Europe. He is one of our best specialists, and we rely on him very much.

As to the inquiry of the member for Cape Breton North and Victoria—

(Text):

In answer to the question of the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, I cannot say definitely when the report will be ready but as far as I can foresee it will be next September.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Shall I rise, report certain resolutions and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Mr. Fulton: Could you call item 151 and stand it?

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

151. Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada, $872,484.

Item stands.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask whoever is leading the house whether there is any change in the order of business as announced last night?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Last night the house leader outlined generally the business for next week, as found on page 5350 of Hansard. There are some slight changes in the order in which he gave these various items. The business for Monday will be as follows: First, the motion to extend the hours of sitting of the house, which was announced last night; second, second reading of Bill No. C-78, to amend the Judges Act; third, second reading of Bill No. C-76, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act; fourth, the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act; and, fifth, the amendment to the Criminal Code, both of which were announced last night.

On Tuesday it is expected that the first order of business will be the resolution regarding the setting up of a department of forestry. The other items which I have announced will be taken in the order in which I have given them if they are not completed on Monday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—SUBSTRUCTURE CONTROL MEASURES

Question No. 378—Mr. Argue:

1. Were any control measures set up to guard against possible substructure defects developing unnoticed in the Cornwall high level bridge (a) during steel erection; (b) after completion?
2. If so, what were they?
3. Were these control measures as set up followed out?
4. Were reports made from time to time under these control measures?
5. If so, what was the nature of the reports, by whom, and to whom were they made, and at what frequency?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. (a) Yes; (b) yes.

2. The initial survey control system for substructure construction was expanded to cover the precise checking of possible movements of the piers.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. Result of observations, by resident engineer to division engineer and engineer of construction at approximately weekly intervals. In addition, the U.S. army corps of engineers and the superstructure contractor carried out precise surveys during the course of steel erection.

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—SUBSTRUCTURE REMEDIAL METHODS

Question No. 381—Mr. Argue:

1. Were remedial methods applied to the substructure of the Cornwall high level bridge approved by both American and Canadian authorities, and accepted by the United States corps of engineers, Dr. Steinman and the St. Lawrence seaway authority, prior to starting such remedial work?
2. If so, who approved in the case of each authority, and on what date?
3. If not, what person or authority did not approve?
4. Were remedial procedures approved on the completion of said work by both American and Canadian authorities as being satisfactory according to specifications and standards?
5. If so, who approved for each authority, on what date, and on what results were such approval based?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

Questions

1. Yes, subject to verification of work then to be performed.

2. R. M. Boynton for D. B. Steinman, December 13, 1957 and January 6, 1958; Col. L. W. Olmstead, U.S. army corps of engineers, January 6, 1958; M. W. Oettershagen, deputy administrator, Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, December 13, 1957 and January 6, 1958; A. G. Murphy, chief engineer, the St. Lawrence seaway authority, upon the recommendation of the late P. L. Pratley, December 13, 1957 and January 6, 1958.

3. Answered by 1 and 2.

4. Yes.

5. Those named in answers to question 2, consequent to the favourable report by the special board of consultants appointed to investigate the matter.

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—PIER SILT ANALYSIS REPORT

Question No. 383—Mr. Argue:

1. Has the St. Lawrence seaway authority received a report of an analysis of the silt content of the piers of the substructure of the Cornwall high level bridge from an inspection company which had made such a test at the request of the contractor doing the remedial work on the substructure?
2. If so, (a) on what date was the report made; (b) who was the official signing the report; (c) what was his position; (d) the name of the company employing him; (e) what were the findings of this independent report?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Two independent analyses were made and reported upon at the request of the authority, not the contractor.

2. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e)—Report dated February 14, 1958, signed by J. E. Hurtubise, P. Eng., professor Ecole Polytechnique, stated that "most of the material in the 35 wash samples came from the till underlying the pier and not from the drill grindings".

Report dated February 21, 1958, signed by Henri Trochu, M.Sc., M.C.I.C., chemist, industrial and Commercial Laboratories Limited, concluded with the following statement: "Considering all above results, it is our opinion that the solids from the 37 samples are mostly till, and contain little if any of the concrete mixture prepared with the ingredients submitted."

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—GLACIAL TILL CONDITIONS

Question No. 384—Mr. Argue:

1. Did the St. Lawrence seaway authority receive a report or letter from the contractors working on the substructure for the Cornwall high level bridge, regarding a difference they found re soil or glacial till conditions as compared to information supplied to them by the authority from previous test borings carried out by the United States corps of engineers or the St. Lawrence seaway authority?

79951-0—341½

2. If so, what was the date of the communication, and what was its nature?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Yes, but subsequent investigations and construction operations disclosed the fallacy of their allegations.

2. By letter dated January 4, 1957, the contractor stated that in drilling and blasting on the sites of the main piers to loosen material so as to facilitate the driving of steel sheet pile cofferdams and the excavation therein, the material on the Canadian side was found to be dense, glacial till with all kinds of boulders, as expected, and they anticipated no trouble to get a satisfactory bearing for the concrete piers, but that on the United States side the material seemed much softer and did not require any blasting. They expressed the fear that they might need longer penetration of the sheet piling on the United States side and suggested that excavation be carried to a lesser depth than specified and that tubular pipes be driven, as bearing piles, to rock.

N.B.—Consequent to the receipt of this letter the authority had further borings made which confirmed the findings of the U.S. army corps of engineers that the material on the United State side comprised a dense glacial till as found on the Canadian side, except that it was overlain in part by relatively loose gravel and boulders. This indicated no need for a change in design.

By letter dated July 4, 1957, the contractor again made reference to the drilling and blasting of the previous December at which time they "found the Canadian side very hard, the United States side very soft" but that in driving their H-pile falsework in the spring they "could not possibly drive through or dig the Canadian side and the United States side". They were at a loss to explain the December conclusions and questioned if they had been properly located on the United States side. The main feature of this letter, however, was a complaint that the authority had restricted the drilling and pre-blasting on the site of the main piers to elevation 114, three feet above the elevation to which excavation was specified and in consequence of this they could not guarantee excavation to elevation 111 nor could they guarantee that the steel piling in the cofferdams would have enough penetration.

N.B.—Subsequent operations, following drilling and pre-blasting disclosed that the till on both the Canadian and United States sides was so dense that the consulting engineers agreed to the founding of the piers from one to two feet above the specified elevation 111. The nature of the material excavated from within the caissons was the same as that described on the contract plans.

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—MOVEMENT CONTROL SYSTEM

Question No. 385—Mr. Argue:

1. Has a control system been set up at any time since July 1, 1957, by the St. Lawrence seaway authority for the purpose of checking, shifting, rocking or movement of piers and substructure of the Cornwall high level bridge?

2. If so, (a) on what date was it set up; (b) by whom was it authorized; (c) what were the terms of reference; (d) the date of each check; (e) the results of each check; (f) the name of each engineer who carried out the checks or surveys and what were their duties and qualifications?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. The initial survey control system for substructure construction was continued and expanded to cover the precise checking of possible movements of the piers.

2. (a) Prior to commencement of construction.

(b) Division engineer.

(c) General instructions from engineer of construction applicable to all construction work.

(d) Routine checks, as necessary, throughout the period of construction and until stability of the structure was assured.

(e) Main piers:

A comparison of elevations taken on December 20, 1957, with elevations previously taken at four points on the top of easterly shaft of pier No. 12 indicates uneven settlement with a maximum differential of about one quarter inch between two diametrically opposite sides. This would suggest tilting of the shaft which would cause a horizontal movement of the top. As there was no apparent horizontal movement of the top of the pier, and as there has been no further evidence of settlement, it has been concluded that the first observations must have been in error. There was no further suggestion of movement in this shaft or any evidence of movement in other shafts.

Cable-bent pier No. 13 (Canadian side):

Initial movement observed to be: Top of west shaft—easterly one eighth inch and southerly one half inch. Top of east shaft—westerly one half inch, and southerly one inch. There has been no vertical settlement or further horizontal movement. It is believed that the displacements were caused by abnormal forces resulting from the temporary support of construction equipment used in placing parts of the superstructure.

North abutment (Canadian side):

Initial movement observed to be one and one half inch southerly, at the top. There has been no vertical settlement or further horizontal movement.

(f) The checks were made by a qualified instrument man under the personal supervision of G. S. Jardine, P.Eng., resident engineer or M. A. Hanson, P.Eng., division engineer.

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—INITIAL PIER DESIGN

Question No. 387—Mr. Argue:

1. Did the initial design for the Cornwall high level bridge by Dr. Steinman call for piers to go to bedrock?
2. If so, was the design in this respect changed?
3. For what reason, on what date, and who initiated the design change?
4. Were any substructure design changes approved by or on behalf of the St. Lawrence seaway authority?
5. If so, what were they, on what date were they made, by whom, and what were the names of the engineers consulted re the design change in each case?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. The "Preliminary Engineering Report" by D. B. Steinman, dated July 12, 1956, prepared prior to obtaining complete information on foundation conditions, contemplated the founding of the main piers on rock but the D. B. Steinman "Design Memorandum", dated August 17, 1956, contains the following notation: "River Piers: Due to the compactness of the glacial till overlaying rock and the difficulty of driving steel sheeting to substantial depths due to such compactness and the presence of cobbles and boulders, the two main piers in the river will be founded at elevation III., ten feet below proposed channel dredged depth, instead of carried down to rock—"

2. and 3. Answered by 1.

4. Yes.

5. Seven approach girders and their piers at the northern end were eliminated and replaced by the extension, in a southerly direction, of the embankment fill. The northern abutment was changed from a U-type gravity structure to a buried pier. These changes were made by D. B. Steinman, upon instructions from A. G. Murphy following consultation with P. L. Pratley.

Questions

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—CONTRACT VARIATIONS

Question No. 388—Mr. Argue:

1. Were all specifications contained in the contract agreement relative to the substructure of the Cornwall high level bridge strictly adhered to?
2. If not, what variations were permitted, for what reason, and by whom were variations approved in each case?
3. Did any defects show up at any locations where the original specifications were not followed?
4. If so, what were they, at what locations, on what date did they occur?
5. Were remedial measures undertaken? If so, what were they, on what dates were they begun, and who decided on what measures to take in each case?
6. Did any defects or faults show up (a) during the remedial work; (b) subsequent to the remedial work, at locations where such work was conducted?
7. If so, (a) what was the nature of such faults and defects; (b) what further corrective measures were taken; (c) by whom were they ordered, and on what date; (d) by whom were the final results approved?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. No.

2. The specified use of an air lift as an aid in cleaning all loose and soft material from the bottom of the excavation within each caisson of the main river piers was waived by P. L. Pratley, consulting engineer, presumably because he was satisfied that the caissons had been satisfactorily cleaned by other means.

3. Yes.

4. Test borings in each concrete shaft of the main piers disclosed the fact that at the plane of contact with the glacial till foundation there existed a shallow layer of crushed stone aggregate the interstices of which contained fine silt and sand instead of intrusive grout as intended.

5. Yes. Remedial measures, commenced early in December 1957, comprised the drilling of numerous holes through the concrete from top to bottom of each cylindrical shaft; the washing of fine silt and sand from the interestices in the stone; and the filling of the interstices with cement grout introduced through the cored holes under pressure. The remedial measures, initially proposed by P. L. Pratley, were approved by R. M. Boynton for D. B. Steinman and decided upon by the seaway authority and the U.S. army corps of engineers.

6. (a) Yes; (b) no.

7. (a) During the washing of the downstream shaft of pier 12 on December 19, 1957, the steel sheet piling of the caisson separated from the concrete of the shaft; (b) each of the four cylindrical shafts was encircled with a 15-inch thick collar or sleeve of concrete placed within a shell of straight web steel sheet piling; (c) chief engineer upon approval by consulting engineers, December 23, 1957; (d) special board of consultants.

CORNWALL HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE—SUBSTRUCTURE FIELD NOTES

Question No. 390—Mr. Argue:

1. Were field notes kept by the resident, field or assistant engineer at Cornwall, in relation to the construction of the substructure of the south channel high level bridge?
2. If so, (a) to whom were they submitted; (b) on what dates; (c) by whom; (d) what was the nature of each?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. (a) (b) (c) and (d). In compliance with specific instructions relating to all construction contracts, routine notes on construction activities were submitted by field engineers to the resident engineer, daily; by the resident engineer to the division engineer, weekly; and by the division engineer to the engineer of construction, monthly. Unusual events of importance immediately were reported through the chain of responsibility to the chief engineer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 27, 1960

The house met at 11.45 a.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Second report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization—Mr. Stanton.

Twelfth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF HOURS OF SITTING UNTIL END OF SESSION

Hon. Howard C. Green (for the Prime Minister) moved:

That commencing on Monday, July 4, 1960, the hours of sitting will be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.; 2 to 6 p.m. and 8 to 11 p.m. on each sitting day until the end of this session, and that the provisions of standing orders 2(1) and 6(3) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: In view of what has happened today, Monday, June 27, I am a little diffident about speaking on this resolution. However I am sure hon. members of the house will realize that this was one occurrence for which the government had absolutely no responsibility.

The proposed motion will provide for several additional hours of sitting, in the first place by cutting the luncheon hour time from one and a half hours to one hour. I do not suppose anyone will quarrel very seriously with that particular change.

Then it is proposed to add one extra hour after 10 p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays. It will be recalled that frequently at this stage of the session the house sits beyond ten o'clock in the evening in any event, and I suggest that there would be no serious inconvenience to hon. members if we could make it a rule that until the end of the session the hour of adjournment should be 11 p.m. instead of 10 p.m.

Then the motion adds Wednesday and Friday evenings. Wednesday evening, throughout most of the session, is reserved for meetings of one kind or another, and there seems little reason why these could not be dispensed with in order that we may reach the end of the session that much earlier.

As for Friday evenings, I must appeal to the magnanimity or the broadmindedness of hon. members who come from Ontario and Quebec. Ever since January 14 hon. members representing the Atlantic and western provinces have been sitting here over the week ends with time wasted in so far as the house is concerned on Friday evenings, whereas for many years Friday evenings were a most useful time for the sitting of the house and resulted in the passing of quite a large number of estimates and also brought about extremely helpful discussion.

As we all know the Friday evening sittings were taken away in order that it might be possible for hon. members living within a short distance of Ottawa to get to their homes. I realize that hon. members had good reason for wishing that change made, but I suggest that at this stage of the session it would be very helpful if the house could consider estimates on Friday evenings.

No attempt has been made to provide for sittings on Saturdays. I am not sure that this may not be necessary at a later stage, but it is certainly not included in this motion.

In drafting these proposals the government has tried to consider the best interests of hon. members and also of the staff of the house, who of course carry a greatly increased load when there are additional hours added and particularly if, for example, we were to sit right through the meal hour. That, I think, would be very unwise. I have seen it done here on one or two occasions and have had my lunch brought into the lobby for fear I might miss something that was going on. It is a very demoralizing way of carrying on the business of the house, and we are not proposing that meal times be taken away. We are also trying to consider the members of the press gallery, who have a very important function to fulfil in connection with parliament.

Hon. members will realize that there is very little legislation remaining on the order paper. On today's order paper there are three measures that have been dealt with in part, and there are three minor measures being introduced. I should really withdraw that statement; the bill of rights is one of the measures being introduced, and I would not call that a minor measure. In addition there is an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act, a bill from the other place dealing with the international boundary commission, and a resolution concerning the proposed department of forestry.

Quite good progress has been made with legislation, and it is likely that additional progress will be made during the present week. Also, quite good progress has been made with the estimates. I am advised that by the end of the week most of the committees of the house will either have finished their actual sittings or be winding them up. Of course some of them may not have brought in final reports, but the sittings of some will be concluded although there are four or five which will have to carry on next week and perhaps some of them until the end of the session.

I ask hon. members to bear these thoughts in mind. I hope it will be possible to have this motion accepted, with the result that a great deal more work may be done commencing next Monday than would otherwise be the case.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am not rising to oppose the motion, but I am rising to bring to the attention of the Acting Prime Minister and the government some of the matters to which in my opinion consideration should be given on a motion such as this. When the advanced hours of sittings were considered on an earlier occasion I think we adopted the only attitude that could have been adopted at that time. A short time thereafter we have the present motion before us for additional hours of sitting. As I understand it, the effect of the motion will be to increase the hours of sitting by adding 11½ hours more to our sitting time during the course of one week.

Notwithstanding what the Acting Prime Minister has said, there is no doubt but that there remain on the order paper a number of serious and contentious matters. I should like to bring these to his attention, because these additional working hours are being sought now when the order paper indicates that there is substantial work for the house to do and a considerable volume of work which, if not on the order paper, is in the hands of committees.

We are being asked to do more work, about which I am not complaining, but we are being asked to do this at a time when very important business of the session is brought down at the last minute. For instance, the combines legislation was brought down only recently and is now before a committee of the house. I understand that the committee is still waiting to hear a large number of witnesses. It is not likely that that legislation will be disposed of very quickly. The bill of rights is now on the order paper for the first time this session and this will involve a debate of some length in addition, I take it, to reference to a committee where I believe a large number of associations and groups desire to be heard. That being the case I do not think it can be said that most of the important legislation has been disposed of. It is true that apart from the bill of rights the other bills on this morning's order paper, with possibly one exception, can be disposed of fairly rapidly.

I am sorry I cannot agree with the Acting Prime Minister's contention that there will be no serious inconvenience to those of us who sit on this side of the house because of this motion. It is not only inconvenient but difficult for those of us on this side, with these additional working hours, to have to sit on Friday evenings. My hope was that the house might find it possible to sit through the lunch hour instead of sitting on Friday evenings. The Acting Prime Minister seems to have disposed of that, because he said it would be unwise to do so. I remind the hon. gentleman that we have done it in the past not too unsuccessfully. It seems to me it is easier to work during the day time than at night. However, I realize that there may be some who are opposed to that view.

With that in mind I am wondering if the government would not give consideration to an alternative proposal. It has been the practice in the last few months to deal with legislation on Monday and Tuesday and to deal with estimates on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. The alternative proposal which I should like to make for the government's consideration—I am not going to move an amendment to this motion because I ask the government to look at my proposal before it moves as indicated on the order paper—is that on days on which legislation is being considered we sit as suggested in the motion, with an hour's adjournment during the lunch hour; because when legislation is being considered an hour sometimes gives us an opportunity to consider more carefully what should be said on the legislation which still remains on the order paper some of which is very important; and that on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, when estimates are considered, we sit through the lunch hour and adjourn at six o'clock on Friday. We would then be discussing estimates under conditions with which we have had to cope before in this house and which have not been too unsuccessful.

I suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that he give consideration to this alternative, which takes in a portion of the motion and gives to hon. members Friday evening, and of course Saturday, which this motion does not include. Therefore, in effect, the alternative proposal I make is that we accept what is now on the order paper for Monday and Tuesday, days on which legislation is generally considered, and that on the three remaining days when estimates are considered we sit through the lunch hour instead of adopting the proposal now before the house.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we shall vote against this motion. We recall the introduction of a similar motion last year and two or three years ago. At that time the minister who introduced something similar suggested that the function of the opposition was to be good whiners. We certainly feel like whining over this. I do not think anyone is more anxious to conclude the business of the house than are the C.C.F. members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: I am glad to hear those cries. No party takes its duty more seriously or works harder in fulfilling it than we do. We know that the first extension of hours some three weeks ago stretched us beyond our limited resources. This motion makes our role, and we think that of the official opposition, ridiculous, and underlines the arrogance of this government in pushing the opposition around.

When electors vote in Canada they have no accurate preconception of what the make-up of the House of Commons will be, but surely they expect that there will be a function for the opposition. Hon. members recall the 1958 slogan, "Let us have another link in the Diefenbaker chain." We have 208 links in it, and now it is the missing links which beat us. We are aware that the pace for most government supporters is different from our own. We watch with envy the coming and going of the contingent out making a supplementary living at law or business, or on holiday. Between 40 and 70 are away at any one time, and the figure is even larger early in the week and at the end of the week when those fortunate fellows who live handy to the capital can junket to home and all that that means.

Those missing links defeat us. Four shifts can beat one shift at any time; and the ignominy of our position is always rubbed in. We are taunted with being repetitious, with trying to be big league and to cover everything when it is obviously beyond our means to do so. When we challenge all the rush, the forced pace of committees and the plethora of their meetings, we are told that we cannot expect to cover all such activities; that government members have some rights; that they have a job to do and wish to get it done and go home.

Then there is the more sophisticated approach to this matter. The Prime Minister, with either pious reference to his recognition of the opposition's role or jaunty phrases on his love of parliament and that he is always glad to have it sitting, apparently indicates that time is not of the essence; that consideration for the opposition is centralized in his conception of parliament.

Mr. Brunsden: On a point of order, is the hon. member reading his speech? If he is, when did he write it?

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member asks me a question. I have a few notes. I wanted to be precise—

Mr. Pearson: Why shouldn't he?

Mr. Argue: Anyway, it is not put out by Grosart.

An hon. Member: It was written by Knowles, though.

Mr. Pallett: The voice of Fisher but the hand of Knowles.

Mr. Fisher: Save all the contentious items to the end; wear away our energies and our perceptions by rounds of committee meetings, by lengthening the sittings; get parliament out of here, and give the ministers five months to draw up another session's business. Even then we are not given any definite schedule as to where they are going. We are not the only ones to complain. I noticed in this morning's paper that the Conservative members complain about the lack of liaison between cabinet ministers and the ordinary members. I do not know what goes on in those Wednesday morning pep meetings. Maybe the government members are treated with lack of consideration as well as the opposition members. I think it would be much simpler, perhaps brutally fair, if the government gave us a 12-hour closure in relation to each bill and each estimate. I do not know a single member of this party who is not anxious to get home, and I have not met any members of any other parties in this house who are not anxious to get home. We wonder whether this is the way to go about it, to fritter away the days and weeks of the session—

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Another hon. Member: What about the divorce bills?

Mr. Fisher: Someone asks "What about the divorce bills?" I should like to point out to the hon. member who made that remark that the time consumed on those bills amounts to two hours a week, and it affects public and private bills and private members' resolutions and has nothing at all to do with government business.

Mr. Cardiff: You took two full days.

Mr. Fisher: We insist that it is time the House of Commons and the government, since the government controls the House of Commons, smartened up their way of doing business. We think the best way of doing it is by splitting the session. I personally cannot see any reason why we need to be in Ottawa for more than five and a half months in the year, if we would split the session and draw up a proper schedule and get some kind of procedure actually working.

You can classify members of this house, Mr. Speaker, in a number of ways; by parties, by regions and everything else. But I always think that one of the classifications is between the commuters and the stuck. The commuters are the ones who can always get away to their homes in a comparatively short time; the stuck are those members from distant places, referred to so kindly by the minister when he introduced this motion. The pressure on the stuck is always rather severe. They are the ones who are always here on Friday afternoon and Monday, and usually they are members from a distance. They are not in the "T-to-T" school. "T-to-T" usually means Tuesday to Thursday. I could change that to "M-to-T", Montreal to Toronto. They happen to be the lucky ones. We think it is outrageous for the opposition members from the places farther away to carry the burden of the members who spend the week ends at home throughout most of the session. I notice that this morning we could almost outvote the official opposition, but this is not unusual on a Monday morning.

This party, Mr. Speaker, has the greatest respect for members of other parties who diligently attend to the business of this house in this chamber and in committees. We feel that this government by introducing motions such as this mocks us all. If it is a rubber stamp this government wants, why not sit all night, or put us on the hours reputedly worked by the Minister of Finance? Then we would be out of here in a real hurry.

An hon. Member: Is that an invitation?

Mr. Fisher: An hon. member asks "Is that an invitation?" Certainly it is an invitation. If you want to do it this way, go ahead; you can do it.

We cannot gauge the end of the session now, Mr. Speaker. The house leader expects it to be over by mid-July. If that should happen all of us will know how cursory the examination of the work will be. The government can have its own way. The house leader and the Prime Minister certainly have the forces behind them to rub us out and push it through, but I do not see how it can look at the business that is ahead and expect to get us out of here in two or three weeks and do any kind of a decent job. If the legislation ahead is as important as the minister argues; if the bill of rights is important; if the Combines Investigation Act amendments are important; if the changes in the Canada Shipping Act are important; if the new forestry department is important, is it not a fiasco that we should be forced to work under hours of sitting of this kind?

I suggest to the members of the government on the front benches who were in the opposition that they should have a little bit of sympathy and understanding for the fact that the opposition at the present time is not even in as good a position as they were at their weakest. At least when their numbers were smallest there were other opposition groups in the house of a little more substance in numbers. I refer to the larger C.C.F. group and the Social Credit group which, whatever you may believe of them, did carry some of the opposition load. That is not the case at the present time.

We have never had a parliament which has been so unbalanced and whose representation has been so much in favour of the government. Nevertheless it seems that the government ministers play upon the sympathies and feelings of the government backbenchers in pushing down the opposition even more than is understandable in the light of its small size. It seems to me it is time the ministry gave those in the opposition a fairer deal, because we have a difficult role to play at the present time and until the next election. It is ridiculous to think that 206 or 207 men should not have their way, but surely it is understood in a democracy that that way is best exercised by recognizing some of the rights of the minority, and these extensions of the hours of sitting are nothing more than an abuse of the minority's rights.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Read it again.

Another hon. Member: Who wrote this one?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I am greatly amused by remarks from the government benches about members of this group reading their speeches. I do not know of anything more amusing than to hear that kind of charge made. I suggest that if government backbenchers had been as keen in their objection to the reading of speeches at the start of the session as they are now—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member will realize that he is not discussing the motion.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, it has always been my opinion that when there are such interjections as were made when I started my remarks the hon. member who has the floor should have the opportunity to reply. Most of the things I intended to say have been covered very well by the hon. member for Port Arthur but there is one thing that I think should be put on the record; that we are not alone in this country in our objection to this type of thing. To prove this I should like to refer to an editorial in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 1, 1960 and read the first two and the last paragraphs:

> The British parliament is in session for the greater part of the year, and so is the United States congress. The Canadian parliament takes its duties less seriously; it gets tired, or maybe bored, after three or four months, and prepares to pack up.
> If the Canadian parliament had spent those three or four months constructively, if in that time it had debated most or all of the important subjects, appropriations, and new pieces of legislation, it might be forgiven for getting restless around the end of May. But this is rarely, if ever, the case. Parliament crawls along for week after week fruitlessly discussing secondary issues; then it looks at the calendar, realizes how much time it has wasted, and switches into high gear. The important issues, the important legislation, are crowded into a hectic series of all-day sittings and six-day weeks, the object being to clean things up and go home by dominion day.

The last paragraph is very significant.

> The imperative thing is to do away with the home stretch stampede which gives major issues hasty consideration or none at all. This is a performance which overtaxes parliament and debases parliament; which disappoints the electorate and short changes the electorate.

As the hon. member for Port Arthur said, if the Prime Minister and the government believe that the bill of rights is so important, then it should not be brought in now during the prorogation stampede. If the government does not believe that the Civil Service Act amendments—I believe there are 91 of them—are important enough to be accorded proper consideration by the house sitting during proper hours, then we certainly cannot agree with them.

It is for these reasons that we intend to vote against the motion.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a word about the resolution and to make an appeal to the government at least to consider the alternative proposal that we put forward. From the point of view of the opposition, and I think even from the point of view of government members, I think the suggestion that we work during the lunch hour in respect of estimates only has something to commend it. We have done that before. We have found that while it is perhaps inconvenient or even worse to use the lunch hour for legislation, because we do not have any time in the middle of the day to discuss matters between the morning and afternoon sessions, that objection has not applied in the past to the consideration of estimates.

Therefore we would accept the proposal, as my hon. friend pointed out, in respect of legislation, and we would hope the government would perhaps accept the proposal to work through the lunch hour in respect of estimates so we could then have Friday evening off. I think that is a reasonable proposal, and I hope the government will at least consider it. If they cannot accept this compromise this morning, perhaps they could consider it during the day and we could decide tomorrow, because the new hours of sitting will not go into effect until next week in any event, so the decision would merely be postponed until tomorrow.

I feel more strongly about this matter than I otherwise might because of the remarks of the Acting Prime Minister in connection with the legislation before us. The impression he left—and he is a very optimistic member of the house, not only in respect of our business—was that we were approaching the end and therefore we could speed up in this way because there are only a few more days to go. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that at almost the end of June the bill of rights has appeared on the order paper for the first time. That bill is going to be given a very thorough discussion on second reading and is going to be sent to a committee. There are individuals and organizations all over the country who will want to be heard and should be heard when the bill of rights goes to its committee, and that is going to take a long time.

Then we have the Combines Investigation Act, and we know what has happened before the standing committee. There are a great many organizations still to be heard. There is a great deal of interest and feeling about this bill, and it is going to take a long time before we finish consideration of this very important and controversial measure. On the order paper we also have a resolution setting up a department of forestry. Then there is also the bill to amend the Canada Elections Act, which is not yet on the order paper.

Therefore it is not a question of rushing toward an end which will be reached within a few days. The broadcasting committee has not even started its work. We have a good many weeks of work ahead of us, and I think we have to consider the extension of the hours of sitting with that in mind. Therefore I hope the government will find it possible to give consideration to the compromise proposal which has been put before them. If, however, the proposal which we put forward is rejected and a vote is taken, then, because of our strong preference for our proposal but not because we object to extra hours of sitting, we will have to vote against the motion before the house at the present time. I hope that will not be necessary.

We have just heard some remarks from the C.C.F. party. While there were four members of the C.C.F. party in the house at that moment, we were told—

An hon. Member: Six.

Mr. Pearson: —that they could almost outvote us. There were four members in the house when that statement was made, and the member who made that statement is not now in the house. I see that he is almost in the house. However, the only group that the C.C.F. could outvote this morning or at any other time would be the Social Crediters.

So, Mr. Speaker, while we have some sympathy with some of the points made by the hon. member for Port Arthur, when he tries to speak as the conscience of the house we find, as is so often the case, that he ends up by speaking as the conscience of the C.C.F. We do not go as far as the C.C.F. in its objection to the extension of the hours of sitting at this time, but we have put forward an alternative view to which we hope the government will give consideration.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise to congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs upon his very reasonable and lucid explanation of a very poor case. His defence of the government and its views with respect to the hours of sitting nearly brought tears to my eyes.

I am not rising to repeat what has been said by my colleagues, because I am not in favour of repetition. I rise simply to bring to the attention of the house the fact that, first of all, we are rather pleased to note the shift in the position of the official opposition after two or three of our speakers expressed their point of view this morning. This is another indication of the influence the speeches of two or three of our members have on the official opposition when it comes to dealing with a problem like this.

I do want to bring to the attention of the house the fact that not only have we the legislation to deal with mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, the bill of rights, the bill to establish a forestry department, the combines legislation and other legislation but, Mr. Speaker, we have nearly $3 billion in estimates to consider. This means that if we are going to conclude the session within the time suggested by the government we shall have to consider the spending of the people's money at the rate of about $300 million a day. We in the C.C.F. say that is not good enough.

I rise to emphasize the fact that we are protesting this procedure and will vote against this motion. I also rise to emphasize the fact that we are opposed to these unplanned sessions; and to again say that we are in favour of a split session in the future. We could then complete our work with reasonable dispatch and greater efficiency, to the advantage not only of the members of this house but of the people of Canada. When the vote is called, therefore, we will vote against the motion to emphasize our continuing protest against this unnecessary procedure. We hope also that as a result of past experience, not for the benefit of the members of the C.C.F. group in this house but for the welfare of all members, and of the country this government will learn something and improve our procedures at the next session.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, this has blown up into quite a little debate for a Monday morning. I am intrigued with the position of the official opposition. The hon. member for Laurier told us they did not like some of the terms of this resolution, but that they were going to vote for it.

Mr. Pearson: He did not say that.

Mr. Green: Then after argument by the members of the C.C.F. the Leader of the Opposition became convinced, apparently and now says they are going to vote against it.

Mr. Pearson: That is quite wrong.

Mr. Green: I must say this is very effective argument on the part of the C.C.F., and I congratulate them upon a victory of that type. However, I shall have a few words to say about them as well.

The proposal made by the hon. member for Laurier and endorsed by the Leader of the Opposition is to get around sitting on Friday nights. Apparently the Liberals have very strong objections to staying in Ottawa on Friday evenings, and they are determined that that sitting must be dropped. They suggest as an alternative that the house should sit through the lunch hour on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, provided that legislation is not under consideration. In order to show how amenable we are the government are willing to accept that suggestion.

Then, in so far as the C.C.F. are concerned, they are in the wonderful position of announcing to all and sundry that they are the specially chosen guardians of the House of Commons and of the constitution, in spite of the divorce bills, and that they alone represent the people; they alone are against closure, and all these sorts of hallucinations from which they suffer. Actually, when the hon. member for Port Arthur said we were pushing him around I was amazed, because if any member in this house has ever tried to push other people around it is the hon. member for Port Arthur. He not only tries to push the government around; he also tries to push around private members and members of the press gallery. He is the greatest pusher we have in the present parliament. There is no doubt that he is well able to take care of himself.

[Editor's note: Following a disturbance in the gallery:]

An hon. Member: That is a C.C.F. supporter.

Mr. Argue: Even the gallery turns against you.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, evidently the C.C.F. have a supporter in the gallery.

Mr. Argue: No, you threw her out.

Mr. Green: Evidently the essence of their argument is that they believe there should be two sessions of parliament, one in the spring and one in the autumn. I admit at once that there is a good deal to be said for a proposal of that kind. However, that is not the issue before the house today. The question today is whether the house is going to sit these few extra hours to complete the work of the 1960 session. I do not think any member of the opposition is going to be very badly hurt by the proposal which the government is making today. I sat in opposition for 22 years, and I must admit that during that time I made speeches resembling those made today by the hon. member for Port Arthur and the hon. member for Timmins.

This is just a natural complaint that is to be expected from the opposition. I do not believe that either one of these two members or any other member of the C.C.F. party believes that the present government is being unfair with the House of Commons. Sometimes in the heat of debate we hear charges of that kind, but right down deep in their hearts the members of the C.C.F. who were here with us during some of those opposition days know very well that there is not the slightest chance of the members who now occupy the front benches doing anything that will injure parliament.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: I do not pay so much attention to these "Oh, oh's" I hear from the four remnants of the dictatorial Liberal government. They have nothing else to do but shout "Oh, oh" on this question, because that is the only explanation they can give for their own conduct when they formed the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. minister permit a question. Would he say that the speeches he made about the rights of parliament when he was over here in opposition were as insincere as he said the hon. member for Port Arthur's speech was?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) ought to be a first class judge of insincere speeches. I do suggest, Mr. Speaker, that nobody across the way is being hurt one tenth as much as the howls we have heard would indicate. As I said, we are prepared to alter the motion in order to do away with sitting on Friday night and to substitute sittings through the lunch hours on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday except when legislation is under consideration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister wish to move a specific amendment, or shall I ask the house to give its consent to the amendment of the motion?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the house will agree that we should vote on the proposed change, that instead of sitting Friday night we sit through the lunch hour on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday except when legislation is under consideration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent that the motion be amended as indicated by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, does the minister mean that on these days we will have to sit until eleven at night, or until ten?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it understood that I shall put the motion as it is now?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, before we vote on an amendment we would want to know what it is.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no amendment before the house at the moment. Is the house ready for the question?

Business of the House

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, perhaps if you could wait for a minute or two we can draft an amendment in accordance with the undertaking I gave.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the minister that unless the house gives unanimous consent to having this amendment moved formally, the question has to be put as it is. Does the house give consent to a formal amendment being moved by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion as amended will now read as follows:

That commencing on Monday, July 4, 1960, the hours of sitting will be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.; 2 to 6 p.m. and 8 to 11 p.m. on each Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday; on Thursday from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. and 8 to 11 p.m.; and on Friday from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m.—

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to make this remark. I think perhaps the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition is a good one, and that this matter should stand until tomorrow; then perhaps we will agree on it, because this is certainly not the suggestion which was made by me. I do not want to spend another 15 minutes or so discussing it if that can be avoided, so my suggestion is that we allow this matter to stand over until tomorrow.

Mr. Green: If I understand the hon. member for Laurier correctly, he means we should put the motion tomorrow and that it stand until then?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Green: Then that would be satisfactory to us, and we will get it worded properly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think I am more familiar with the wording now. I may be able to read it more clearly if I may be permitted to try again. The motion as amended is as follows:

That commencing on Monday, July 4, 1960, the hours of sitting will be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.; 2 to 6 p.m. and 8 to 11 p.m. on each Monday, and Tuesday; on Wednesday and Thursday from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. and 8 to 11 p.m.; and on Friday from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker. The proposal as I made it, at least as I thought I made it, was in accordance with what you have read save that for Wednesday, Thursday and Friday we sit through the lunch hour, and that we adjourn at 10 p.m. save on Friday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Chevrier: That is certainly what was in my mind, and that is what I had understood. My suggestion is that since there is some misunderstanding, perhaps it had better stand as I proposed.

Mr. Churchill: On the point raised by the hon. member for Laurier, I think on reflection he will recall that he did not mention closing at ten o'clock. It was always 11 p.m., and the concession was that we should not sit on Friday evening in exchange for sitting through the lunch hour on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, and that is how the motion is now drafted.

Mr. Pickersgill: I listened most attentively to the hon. member for Laurier, and my hon. friend was putting forward as an alternative that on the days when estimates were called we should sit through the lunch hour instead of sitting until eleven o'clock.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON RUSSIAN ACTION IN COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has anything which he thinks he should say to the house at this time in view of the decision taken this morning at the 10-power disarmament talks by the Soviet union, when it refused to continue to participate in the discussions that were set up as the result of agreement among the four foreign ministers, including the foreign minister of the Soviet union.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid the 10-nation disarmament committee has been scuttled by the action of the eastern members this morning. I spoke to General Burns earlier in the morning, and apparently there were at least two western speakers on the list to participate in the discussions this morning. Mr. Zorin, the chairman of the Soviet delegation, had been told by Mr. Eaton, the chairman of the United States delegation, that there would be a western proposal submitted later this week. This was before the committee actually met.

When the committee did meet under the chairmanship today of Mr. Naszkowski of Poland, Mr. Zorin made a statement in which he accused the western members of the committee of refusing to negotiate, and made other charges, and said that the eastern members would be carrying their proposals to the United Nations. Then, in spite of the fact that western members were trying to get the floor, the Polish chairman refused to allow any of them to do so. Instead he called on each of the other four eastern members, and then he and the whole eastern delegation stalked out. Therefore no representative of the western nations was permitted to speak at all. When this happened Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the head of the British delegation, took the chair and Mr. Eaton tabled the United States plan. Of course that was all that could be done at this meeting.

I should like to explain to the house that the Soviet plan, as hon. members will recall, was issued with a great flourish of trumpets just a day or two before the 10-member committee resumed its sittings, which I think was on June 2. All the foreign ambassadors in Moscow were called in and given copies of the Soviet plan. In reporting to the house I said then that there were heavy propaganda overtones to the introduction of this Russian proposal.

[Mr. Green.]

Once the meetings of the committee had commenced, the western delegates endeavoured to get clarification of the various points in the eastern proposal, and made various suggestions. For example, the head of the Canadian delegation, General Burns, made a very useful speech on Friday last. I have not yet received the verbatim report of his remarks, but when I do I will probably ask for leave to table it. In addition, of course, there have been discussions going on among the four western nations concerning what reply should be made to the Soviet proposals. The Canadian reaction to the Soviet proposals was duly given to General Burns some days ago. It has been important that in the work of this committee the western nations should work together as closely as possible. Of course the eastern nations do not have that problem, because the four, apart from the Soviet, simply appear to do exactly what they are told by the Soviet.

The United States completed their reactions to the Soviet proposals late last week, and we received a copy on Thursday evening. There have been consultations in Geneva over the week end concerning the United States proposals and proposals which had been put forward by the other four western nations, including Canada, with the intent that there would be a western plan announced within the next day or two. In addition, the western plan was to have been taken before the permanent council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization probably today or tomorrow, but certainly early this week, and then it would have been presented in the committee of ten.

I am not yet in a position to table the Canadian proposals in response to the Russian suggestions or to the United States proposals —to which, incidentally, they were very close —but in my opinion the new western proposals and the Soviet proposals of June 2, which the Soviet bloc has now refused to discuss further, could have provided a basis for detailed, businesslike and uninterrupted negotiations. It now becomes obvious that the Soviet side were not seriously interested in negotiating on the last plan they put forward. I believe that their action in stalking out of the committee as they did this morning was irresponsible, and was taken for propaganda purposes. We will now hear great talk in the United Nations general assembly about the wonderful plan the Soviets proposed, and there will be charges made that the western nations refused even to discuss it. I believe further, Mr. Speaker, that the eastern side have overplayed their hand again, just as they overplayed their hand in the breaking up of the summit conference a few weeks ago.

Canada, from the start, has been very much in earnest about the work of this disarmament committee. I believe that the Canadian government, in following that policy, has had the support of every member of the house, regardless of the party to which he or she belongs, and also the overwhelming support of the Canadian people. We shall continue to be very much in earnest and will do everything we possibly can to work out some solution to the problem. Unfortunately the problem still exists, and Canada will be willing to negotiate and, as I said, do everything she possibly can to help bring about a relaxation of tension.

Naturally these developments are a bit disturbing; but we are dealing here, I believe, with the survival of mankind. This problem we are facing is just that serious. I regret more than I can say that the Soviet and the other four members of the eastern side should have deliberately walked out of these negotiations knowing that there was a proposal to be discussed within the next day or two. Apparently they were afraid of what would be in those proposals, in so far as world public opinion is concerned. This looks like a deliberate attempt to prevent the western proposals from getting out to the nations of the world which have not been involved in the work of this committee.

I take it, of course, that there will be no opportunity now for the committee to do any further work. I understand that a message has been sent by Premier Khrushchev to the heads of government of the five western nations, but we have not actually received that. This is obviously a deliberate step taken to try to upset the west and also to gain a propaganda advantage.

I regret having to give such a report to the house, Mr. Speaker, but I am afraid that is the situation. I suggest that Canadians should not be downhearted. This is a long road that we are on now and, as I said a minute ago, it is a road which may prevent the ending of civilization. I know all Canadians will do their part in an endeavour to see that some solution is eventually found.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of these discouraging and disturbing developments in a matter which, as the minister has just pointed out, is of such vital importance to us all, and having regard to the arrogant and indefensible action taken by the communist delegations, would the government put forward on support a course by which the committee should be reconvened as soon as a western member is chairman—I understand the chairmanship rotates—and at that reconvened meeting the new western proposals would be put forward to the committee and the communist delegation would be put in the position, if they insisted on staying away, of refusing to even discuss those proposals.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the United States proposal was tabled today in the committee. I believe that within the next day or two steps will be taken to make public the western proposal; that is, the proposal of the five western nations. The suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition may be one which can be followed and I am very grateful to him for bringing it up.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the members of this group wish to thank the minister for his outline of these unfortunate developments, which I know concern us all. I was going to ask the minister whether it would be possible for him to outline in brief the highlights of the western proposal. My second question is this. If this matter goes to the United Nations, as I understand is suggested by the Soviet authorities, is Canada giving consideration to putting forward proposals at the United Nations to narrow this gap and get the thing back on the rails?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I will table the western position in the house as soon as it is available, and probably also the United States reaction to the Soviet proposal and the Canadian reaction to the Soviet proposal of June 2. It is still early yet to know what course will be followed in the United Nations, but I would think it is fairly clear that the Soviet and the other four will do their best to make all the propaganda possible out of their own proposals, and that the western nations will also be dealing with their western proposals. As I said a moment ago, it now appears quite obvious that the Russian proposals were put forward on June 2 with the idea of establishing a propaganda position.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask two supplementary questions. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether or not Canada supported the proposal put forward by Mr. Eaton today, a proposal which it was announced on Friday last was being supported by the United Kingdom? My second question is this. In view of the fact that the external affairs committee agreed at its last session to afford the minister an opportunity, following his return from Latin America, to appear before that committee, would the minister consider that it might be useful if he would put himself at the disposal of the committee so that he, and possibly General Burns, could report in greater detail on the events which have so sadly eventuated?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are set for consideration later in this week, although they may not be reached until next week. General Burns has responsibilities in Geneva for the time being, and I think it is very important that he should stay there until this whole situation is ironed out.

There was no question this morning of other western members of the 10-nation committee approving or disapproving the United States proposals. They have been under study over the week end by all five western nations, and I think the suggestions Canada has made have been accepted as alterations or additions. I do not know what attitude the United Kingdom took with regard to the proposals, but I should think that as the United States proposals are very close to our own proposals, probably the British thinking was very much like the thinking of the Canadian and United States governments.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour which is based on a news report in the Toronto Globe and Mail. Has the minister received the request from the Ontario association of mayors and reeves, now sitting in Cornwall, for a full investigation by the federal government into the causes and cure of unemployment? If so, what action does the minister propose to take in connection with this resolution which was passed on Saturday?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received the communication.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether, when it is brought to his attention, he would be so good as to give his reaction to it to the house?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, may I have an answer?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is really asking a supplementary question which is hypothetical. It depends on whether the minister receives the request.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour in view of the evidence of still high unemployment in Canada, as witness the 85,000 increase in unemployment insurance claims as compared to a year ago. Could the minister tell the house whether Mayor Phillips of Toronto was correct when he was reported in Saturday's Globe and Mail to have said—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that is not a proper question at this stage, to ask for verification of something which appears as a report in the press.

Mr. Argue: Then, Mr. Speaker, I will put the question directly to the minister. Has the government at this time undertaken a scientific study of the unemployment problem and, if so, would the minister explain to the house what is involved?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member means by "what is involved", but I understand that in the other place a committee has been set up, with capable help, to undertake such a study. We in the Department of Labour are continually, through our research and economic branch, looking at the whole situation, and reports are being made from time to time.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Has this government, apart from the other place, undertaken a scientific study of unemployment at the present time?

Mr. Starr: The Department of Labour, as I mentioned a moment ago, is continually making studies of the unemployment situation through the economic and research branch.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. Can the hon. gentleman in all his capacities inform the house whether he has received a telegram from the city council of Vancouver relative to the unemployment situation in British Columbia, asking that a conference among federal, provincial and municipal governments, management and labour be held in order to deal with the most serious situation which has developed in our city and our province?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I received such a wire just before the house sat this morning.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. What does the government propose to do about it?

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question. May I ask the Acting Prime Minister, in view of the fact that I asked this question of the Prime Minister last Wednesday, whether he can give us any more information as to whether such a conference will be held, or what consideration will be given to it?

Mr. Green: I think that question has been answered on several occasions within the last few weeks. I am not in a position to make any further statement with regard to it.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question and address it to the Minister of Labour. In view of the suggestion that he himself made in Gananoque several weeks ago about a conference among management, labour and government, and in view of this new request from Vancouver, will the Minister of Labour tell the house what the government proposes to do about it?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as usual the hon. member for Essex East is misrepresenting whatever statement was made.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister whether the government is relying for its investigation into the question of unemployment solely upon the initiative taken by the Liberal members in the other house?

Mr. Starr: I am not aware that the Liberal members in the other house proposed the resolution which set up that committee.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): An opportunity denied to us.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED SIGHTING OF SUBMARINES AND ACTIVITIES OF RUSSIAN TRAWLERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister comment on the presence of submarines sighted in Placentia bay, Newfoundland, and reported also to have been seen about five miles off the shore? Second, would the minister comment on the presence of Russian trawlers along the northeast coast of Newfoundland, and advise the house whether these fishing trawlers are fishing for more than fish?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Reports of sightings of submarines are received quite frequently. All such reports are investigated either by the Royal Canadian Navy or by the maritime command of the Royal Canadian Air Force. Reports of these investigations are then classified according to their degree of reliability. Regarding the fishing vessels, there is no proof that Russian trawlers operating off the coast of Newfoundland have been carrying out any operations other than legitimate fishing.

OIL

ARCTIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF U.S. CAPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. On May 18 I asked the minister whether the report that United States companies were withdrawing their financial support of Arctic oil exploration had any substance. The minister answered to the effect that the deadline for picking up these options was June 24. Is the minister now in a position to inform the house how many United States companies have taken up options and how many have let their applications go by default?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I cannot give the hon. member exact figures on the orders of the day, but I can tell the house that by four o'clock on Friday permits with respect to between 44 million and 45 million acres on the Arctic islands and the continental shelf had been taken out. The total number of applications for permits had involved 146 million acres. In the opinion of my department the number of permits taken out is very encouraging, because to have 45 million acres under exploration in the north is something which was not dreamed of two years ago.

Mr. Badanai: Would the minister deal with my question as to the number who have let their applications drop?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I cannot give an exact breakdown of the number of United States companies which did not take up their options. I know that one individual who had applications in for 42 million acres did not take up any. Of those applications which were taken up, between 75 and 80 per cent were by Canadian companies.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is it a fact that applications covering over 100 million acres, which have not been completed under the terms of exploration, will lapse?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is no question of lapsing; they were never taken out. To put it in another way, the areas in which these people who had priority were interested are now open to any company which complies with the regulations. Land in respect to which these applications were made will be made available to any person or any company at nine a.m. on July 4 or later.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I put a supplementary question so that we may understand the matter clearly. Does that mean that the previous applicants will have no preference with respect to these areas as compared with anybody else?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes; the priorities came to an end on June 24.

NATIONAL PARKS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED OFFER OF GARIBALDI PARK FOR OLYMPIC GAMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I wish to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources whether he has yet received any official communication from the premier of British Columbia saying that the province is prepared to turn over Garibaldi as a national park if the federal government will undertake the expenditure necessary in order to prepare for the winter games a few years hence.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The hon. member for Kootenay East approached me this morning and told me of his intention to ask a similar question, and perhaps I may answer both questions together.

Up to noon today the department had received no official suggestion from the premier of British Columbia that the area known as Garibaldi park should be made available to the federal government for the purpose of setting up a national park. Until I do receive some official indication in answer to my letter written over a year and a half ago saying that we would be willing to consider such a request, I can make no statement as to the government's intentions.

The second part of the question, and one which has been in the minds of some hon. members, concerns the winter Olympics. As I understand the position, the government does not decide where the Olympics are to be held; that is a decision made by the Olympic games committee. The government has received representations from various areas, among them Fernie, B.C.; Manning park; Banff and Lake Louise; Garibaldi, and so on. We receive these representations and carry out studies with regard to them before making all the information we have available to the Olympic games committee.

Mr. M. L. McFarlane (Kootenay East): With regard to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East, may I say that part of the question I had in mind is still not answered. I should like an assurance that no decision will be reached about preparing Garibaldi park for the Olympic games until the claims of all the other areas have been investigated by the Olympic games committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that a hypothetical question?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I can give no assurance of that kind, except that representations from all groups, including those from Fernie, will be made available to the Olympic games committee together with all the information the department can get together in order to help the committee to reach a proper decision.

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SECOND SITE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Perhaps I could take this opportunity to ask the minister whether he has yet received a communication from the premier of Nova Scotia asking for a second national park in that province?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): This question was raised in the house some time ago and the answer was that there was a request from the province of Nova Scotia some time ago with regard to a second national park in that province. However, if the hon. member is referring to a recent request, within the last few days, the answer is no.

JUDGES ACT

PROVISION FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES IN QUEBEC, FOR GRANTING ANNUITIES, ETC.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-78 to amend the Judges Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill received first reading on June 22 and, immediately prior to that, the resolution on which it was founded was before the committee of the house for discussion. At that time I gave a full explanation of the provisions of the legislation. I also answered some questions which were addressed to me in committee.

It is, therefore, I think, not necessary for me to delay the house by making any further statement on the principles of the bill at this time, because that question has been fully covered during the resolution stage. However, I shall be very glad indeed to answer any questions which may be asked when the house goes into committee on the bill itself. If hon. members have remarks to make at this stage

I will take note of them and, if necessary, will reply at the close of the debate on second reading.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): In view of the statement by the minister that he proposes to reply to any general comments that we may have to make on the bill, I do not quarrel with that procedure at this stage in view of our discussion the other night. What I have to say can well be related to the various clauses of the bill as they are reached.

I am assuming, of course, that when we reach clause 3, where I believe there is an important principle involved, it will be possible to have a fairly general discussion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, at the resolution stage the minister advised us that the government had acceded to the request of the government of Quebec to the extent of the appointment of four puisne judges out of seven judges asked for by that province. It was pointed out on this side at the time that as the matter of the constitution of the courts is something that comes within the competence of the provincial governments, the minister should explain why he had agreed to appoint only four instead of all that had been requested. I want now to ask the minister whether he has anything to add to what he has already said in this context. I would be grateful to the minister if he would explain to us the reasons which he gave to the province in turning down its request for a larger number than is actually provided for at the present time.

The minister mentioned, I believe, that this refusal on the part of the federal government, to appoint the full complement, was not unusual, that it had been exercised on other occasions by former governments. I noted what he had to say in that regard. Since the resolution stage, however, I have had an opportunity of looking up previous discussions in this house on this point, and I find that fairly comprehensive reasons were given by the minister's predecessors for the reluctance of the government of Canada to provide the full number requested. I think the committee is entitled to know the circumstances which warranted the minister in agreeing to appoint the number he has decided on, the circumstances of this fact and particularly the reasons why the federal government has not accepted the proposals made by the administration in Quebec, an administration which is no longer functus officio.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I explained briefly in the debate at the resolution stage on June 21 what was the situation in this regard, and my explanation may be found at page 5229 of Hansard for that date. I should like to make it clear that I cannot accept fully the words used by my friend the hon. member for Essex East in describing the situation. I have not refused to appoint the full number asked for. Rather, it was agreed in an amicable fashion between myself and the former administration of the province that it would be acceptable if we were only to appoint three judges in the Montreal district for the time being instead of the five which the provincial legislature has authorized.

There are a number of reasons for this that were in mind during the course of discussions, and perhaps I could mention two or three of them. The first is that while there is on my part a full acceptance of the statement made by the Quebec authorities that there is an extensive backlog of cases in the Montreal district, nevertheless there are, I think, other reasons that could be advanced to explain that situation besides the simple fact of lack of judges.

I speak in this area not as an expert, but I understand, for instance, that it was the intention of the previous provincial government to appoint a commission to review the civil code of procedure, and I do not know whether that commission has been appointed as yet. It has been suggested to me that one of the reasons why there are arrears of cases is that the civil code of procedure, which has not been reviewed or revised for many years, is what I might not disrespectfully describe as a complicated and technical matter, and that a great deal of the time of the judges in Quebec is taken up in hearing applications and motions which arise under the code of procedure. It was suggested to me that a revision of that code which would result in a simplification of the rules of procedure might have the result that some of the time of the judges formerly given to hearing this type of matter might be saved, because I suppose a good deal of that type of application might be heard by what we call in the common law provinces a master in chambers.

It would seem to me that if in fact we were on the eve of a review and revision of the code of procedure which might result in a saving of the time of the judges, it would be reasonable to suggest that instead of appointing the full five we appoint three and see, first, how they got along with the three extra judges and, second, how long it might take to bring in the report and also obtain some views as to whether in fact such a report might have the result I mentioned, namely the saving of the time of the judges. For those reasons it seemed a sensible and acceptable suggestion to the provincial administration that we appoint only three for the time being.

Another reason for acting deliberately in this matter instead of precipitately by appointing all five is, again, that I understand there is a serious problem of physical congestion in the court house in Montreal, that is with respect to rooms in which the judges may hold court. For this sort of reason and because, as I explained on the last occasion when the matter was before the committee of the whole house, the appointment of five additional judges all at one time is a very far-reaching step and one which if taken you cannot undo, it seemed to us for all those reasons it was a proper and sensible thing to suggest that instead of appointing the five at once we would appoint three as a first step and then have a look at the situation as it developed, see the extent to which these extra appointments might assist in enabling the courts to catch up with the backlog of cases, review the situation in a year's time or at the next session of parliament, and then make a final decision as to whether or not two additional judges should be appointed at that time.

I say again it is not a refusal to appoint. It is merely an agreed delay in making the full number of appointments.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister will not begrudge my entering this debate once again. The minister will remember that when the matter was up for discussion at the resolution stage, I think on Friday last, both the hon. member for Essex East and I took the position which we are now taking in connection with the appointment of the five additional judges for Montreal.

On the whole I do not think I could disagree very much with what the minister has said, but notwithstanding his statement there are one or two matters which I think should be brought to the minister's attention. It is a fact—and I think he is more familiar with it than I am—that there is a great shortage of judges in the city of Montreal. Whether or not the commission of which he speaks is established, it only emphasizes the demand for judges in that area.

Then again there is the question of the physical congestion in the court house to which he has referred. As between that on the one hand and the necessity, importance and urgency of having more judges on the other, I think it is the appointment of the additional judges which should take priority, and this might well be brought to the attention of those who are responsible for extending the quarters of the judges.

Mr. Chambers: The new court house was not in the 53 points.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry; I do not know what the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Lesage's 53 points did not contain that.

Mr. Chevrier: If my hon. friend wants to make a political interjection it is all right with me. I have no objection; I can reply to it in the same vein. I was discussing this purely from the judicial standpoint; that the approach ought to be made exclusively on that basis and not on any other basis at all.

I think it will be agreed by all the Montreal lawyers in the house that in view of the great number of cases, in view of the increase in population and in view of the backlog, as the minister himself has said, of cases in Montreal, it is important and urgent that these additional judges be appointed.

I am happy the minister has said that this is not a refusal, that it is merely a delay having regard to several circumstances. If the minister will recall, it was suggested at the resolution stage that during the period between the adoption of the resolution and the committee stage of the bill he might even find it advisable to appoint the additional judges and, of course, he could amend the bill accordingly or he could even do so before the house prorogued. I am sure he will give the proper consideration to the representations which have been made, not only by the province but I am sure by the chief justices of the various districts. With that in mind I simply ask the minister to see to it that every consideration is given to the requests that have been made for additional judges in Montreal.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one comment on this clause of the bill and perhaps ask the Minister of Justice a question. From what I have heard I judge that the province of Quebec is asking for the appointment of seven additional puisne judges, and that this bill provides for four additional judges for the Quebec superior courts. If the province of Quebec feels it necessary to ask for seven additional—

Mr. Fulton: May I point out that it is six, not seven. I was guilty of the error first. The first time I answered I said seven but actually it is six, five for Montreal and one for Three Rivers.

Mr. Winch: This bill authorizes the appointment of four. Before we pass this bill I should like the minister to comment on this aspect of the request. I believe that in the past two or three years we have had similar requests from other provinces. Will the minister comment on whether the request for additional judges is in line with the increased population of the provinces, in this case the increased population of Quebec, or whether there is an increase in criminality, and whether that is the major reason for the request for six for Quebec, although the bill authorizes four.

What is the minister's view of this matter? Is it an increase in the population or increase in criminality in the various provinces? Of course in this case we are dealing with one province. What action is being taken by the minister in regard to the situation? Does the increase in population require more judges to handle the cases, or is there actually an increase in criminality?

Mr. Chevrier: That would not have anything to do with it.

Mr. Fulton: Before I reply to the hon. member for Vancouver East may I deal with the last observation of the hon. member for Laurier. I assure him we will keep this matter under review and give consideration to the representations which have been made and further representations which may be made which, as he points out, come not only from the provincial authorities but also from members of the bar and of the bench, particularly in the Montreal district. That will be done between now and the next session, and we hope the experience that may be gathered in that time will afford us a satisfactory basis to answer the question as to whether or not two further appointments will be immediately necessary.

In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East, I regret that even with the best will in the world I cannot give a categorical answer as to why there is this fairly steady pressure for an increase in the number of judges; whether it is simply because of the increase in population or because of the increase in population accompanied by an increase in criminality. Of course an increase in population is inevitably one of the accompanying problems that are raised by the growth and development of the nation, and one of those accompanying factors is usually an increase in the amount of litigation. Also, as the national growth of a country increases, as that of Canada has been doing substantially and markedly over the past years, the amount and size, and if you like the importance of litigation also tends to increase and the cases become perhaps more difficult, more numerous and with weightier issues involved.

I am not suggesting for a moment that the importance of an issue is measured only in terms of the actual amount of money involved. What I am suggesting is that the type of dispute, the type of litigation that arises, does tend to become weightier with an increase in population accompanied as it has been by an increase in the national wealth of the country.

With respect to the question, or that aspect of it, dealing with criminality, the best assessment that I have been able to make is that there is not an absolute increase in criminality but that there is a proportionate increase, an increase keeping pace with the increase in population, yes, and also having a relation to the increased trend toward urbanization.

The other factor which is disturbing with regard to the increase in criminality is the increased tendency toward really shocking crimes, crimes involving the use of excessive violence. That, I think, is the disturbing element about the present figures of criminality, not so much any absolute increase in numbers as the emphasis on the particularly unpleasant types of crimes of violence. These disturbing elements are present. Certainly my hon. friend must have been aware of the concern expressed about this matter in the Montreal district in the press and elsewhere. However, in saying that I must point out that the courts for which we are providing extra judges are not exclusively courts of criminal jurisdiction. They are the superior courts of the province and have jurisdiction, therefore, in both civil and criminal matters. So that again the suggestion I make with regard to criminality and its influence on the increased work load of judges must be tempered by the fact that they are not exclusively judges of criminal jurisdiction.

Really all I can say in answer to the hon. member's question is that this request for extra judges is a trend we see all across Canada. There are frequent requests for an increase in the number of judges of superior courts and these naturally are of concern to the federal authority. It has been pointed out by hon. members opposite, and I agree, that generally speaking the federal government accepts the recommendations of the provincial government with regard to the organization of the courts because they are the governments having constitutional responsibility in that field. But I am satisfied from my review of the precedents and after discussions with my officials who also served previous administrations that my predecessors never felt their consent to such requests, should be automatic, and that they did feel that a reasonable discussion should take place between the two levels of government and that the federal approach should be, as it naturally is, to suggest a minimum increase. Quite often accommodations are reached, as is the case here, between the two governments. In this case five additional judges were asked for and authorized by the provincial legislature, but it has been agreed that it will be quite acceptable that a lesser number should be appointed, at least initially. I think that sort of attitude and exchange of views is one that has prevailed when other administrations have been in office as well as now.

Mr. Winch: Can the minister indicate whether this requirement has resulted primarily from an increase in criminal charges or has it arisen as the result of an increase in the number of civil cases? What is more important, has it resulted because of the need to relieve the backlog of cases so that persons charged can be dealt with promptly? People are not guilty until they are convicted and it is my understanding that too often accused persons have to wait many weeks or months before they are tried. Which reason applies or is it a combination of the three reasons that is responsible for this recommendation?

Mr. Fulton: The representations I have received from the provincial authorities and from the bar of Montreal as well as the bench are that the present situation has been building up over several years. It is not the case that a backlog has suddenly arisen overnight but rather that the number of cases awaiting trial was becoming increasingly greater so that the provincial government felt they had to ask the legislature of the province to authorize the appointment of more judges and that the matter could not be left any longer.

I know that associate chief justice Scott of the superior court, Montreal district, has made Herculean endeavours—I do not think that is really much of an exaggeration—and in them he has been assisted by the conscientious efforts of all the puisne judges of that court, to keep pace with the volume of litigation that comes before it. They have reported to me, however, as they reported to their own provincial government, that they could no longer keep pace and that not only were they not cleaning up the existing backlog but they were not keeping pace with the number of new cases arising and being set down for hearing. Therefore this was a cumulative difficulty which required to be dealt with by the appointment of extra judges.

With regard to the reason for the extra work load, with the best will in the world I cannot be more specific in ascribing causes than I have been in the answer I have already given, that it is a feature inevitably accompanying growth in population and an increase in national wealth.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee will be grateful to the minister for the reply he has made to the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver East, in his queries to the Minister of Justice, did not want to convey an inference of greater crime proportionately in the city of Montreal than elsewhere.

Mr. Winch: I did not.

Mr. Chevrier: I am glad the hon. member now says that he did not.

Mr. Winch: I said before that there have been inquiries across Canada of a similar nature. I asked my questions on that basis.

Mr. Chevrier: I did not understand the hon. member to say that. I simply rose to say at this time that it seems to me that the prevention of crime is not so much a matter of the appointment of judges as it is a matter of supervision by other groups of society such as police officers and the like. I am glad the hon. member for Vancouver East has made it unnecessary for me to go any further in this respect because I remember that during the sittings of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in connection with crime in this country an officer of Canadian National Railways, who had had experience in both the large cities of Montreal and Toronto, made it quite clear that so far as he was concerned there was no more crime, proportionately speaking, in the city of Montreal than elsewhere.

But I take it too that the appointment of these judges will in the majority of cases mean an increase in the number of judges dealing with civil cases because that is where the backlog has accumulated. The minister referred to associate chief justice Scott. I am sure he has had conversations or perhaps correspondence with the chief justice of the Quebec district and other judges of the Montreal district, all of whom I believe have the same feeling so far as the appointment of additional judges is concerned. My only purpose in rising was to say that it seemed to me an increase in criminality, whether in one part of Canada or another, cannot be stopped by the appointment of additional judges.

Mr. Ormiston: Does a lawyer have to be over a certain age before he can be appointed to the bench? Must he be a certain age?

Mr. Fulton: At the present time the main provision is that a judge must have been a member of the bar for 10 years. Under the new bill there will be certain factors bearing upon maximum age but perhaps discussion of that matter could be better left to the appropriate clause.

Mr. Ormiston: That would have reference to the circumstances regarding pensions and annuities, would it?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. I think it would be more appropriate to leave that discussion to clause 3 of the bill. That would be my suggestion.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise one more query. The minister made a statement three times, I believe, that rather intrigued me. He referred to an increase in population and also an increase in the national wealth. Do I understand it is his view that with an increase in the national wealth there will automatically be an increase in crime? The minister made that statement three times and he tied it in with the population.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman, may I explain at once that my hon. friend has misunderstood me. He asked me about the increase in litigation and then he asked me—

Mr. Winch: That is crime, is it not?

Mr. Fulton: No, not at all; litigation may be either civil or criminal. My hon. friend asked me how I accounted for the necessity for increasing the number of judges, was it due to an increase in the number of crimes? I said no, not exclusively to an increase in the number of crimes, but it is due to an increase in the amount of litigation; and litigation is both civil and criminal.

Then dealing with that part of it which is civil, I said that the kind of development which Canada has been going through in the last years inevitably produces more civil litigation, more complicated and weighty matters upon which to adjudicate, and weightier issues involved in that type of litigation. I was then dealing with the civil side of litigation. Then I came to the question of criminality, and I answered my hon. friend in that regard. I at no time suggested that an increase in natural wealth was inevitably accompanied by or created an increase in criminality. I suggested that the increase in criminality, if there be any, was entirely due to an increase in population. I did suggest that it was perhaps also due to an increased trend toward urbanization. The other feature of it that I mentioned was a matter which I regard as of serious concern, namely the trend toward an increase in the brutal type of crime involving violence. This was all I said with regard to criminality.

Clause agreed to.

79951-0—342½

Judges Act

On clause 2—Travelling allowances.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I believe this clause will commend itself to those who are familiar with the difficulty of having a uniform rate that will apply to judges in all parts of the country. Certainly, as the explanation in the bill says, it is impossible to apply a per diem rate that will be satisfactory throughout Canada. We all know of instances of judges who have to travel, particularly to large urban centres, being unable, out of the per diem allowance provided for in the existing section 21, to meet the expenses which confront them.

This clause is intriguing for a number of reasons, one of which I should like to mention for no other purpose than mentioning it, and to invite the minister's consideration and possible action at some other time. Subsection 2 of the present act provides, by implication, that a judge is required to have a legal residence, and of course he is not entitled to expenses when he is living in that legal residence. I feel that the Minister of Justice ought to look into this matter to see whether or not this subsection, to which this clause directs our attention, is being fully observed, whether judges do live in the place which, under the law, they are supposed to live. Judges ought to be the first to observe the requirements of the law and while no great injustice possibly may be directly the consequential result the fact is that in some instances of which I am aware the law in that particular is not being observed.

What I did rise to say, however, was by way of asking the minister what is meant by clause 2, paragraph (a), "his moving or transportation expenses". It is clear what transportation expenses are. Since a judge is going to be given expenses where he attends either as a district judge in admiralty, exchequer court, superior court or county court judge, at a place which is not his legal residence, and since the law provides for his receiving transportation expenses, why should it be necessary to provide for his moving expenses? He is not entitled to expenses while in the place in which he resides. Perhaps "moving" is only a descriptive phrase. Possibly if it said "his moving and transportation expenses," there would be even stronger cogency to what I am saying. I do not understand why the word "moving" should be used here.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I know that it is not a sufficient defence for the use of a phrase, that it has been there right along, but I would point out that this phrase has been in the Judges Act for some time. It is in the present act which we are amending by this bill. Section 21 (a) now entitles a judge to be paid as a travelling allowance his moving or transportation expenses. My hon. friend will appreciate that we are not changing that portion of the legislation in the amendment because we have retained that phrase exactly as it was in the former act.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What moving expenses could there be?

Mr. Fulton: I am just coming to that. A judge who is travelling to assizes must move from his place of residence to the place where he is going to hold the assizes. I do not mean that he moves his whole household, but he moves himself by one means of transportation or another. Therefore, in order to be abundantly cautious in describing the function which the judge must undertake to get there the phrase was used, "his moving and transportation expenses".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It says "moving or transportation expenses".

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, that is correct. He moves himself physically from the place where he resides to the place where he is going to hold the assizes. I think the reason for the use of these words is to make it sufficiently inclusive to make it clear that by whatever means of transportation he goes his expenses incurred in moving himself from one place to the other will be covered.

Then under subclause (b) of this clause he is also now entitled, instead of a per diem allowance which is presently described as follows "for each necessary day of travel going and returning and each day during which he so attends"; instead of that sort of per diem allowance he is going to get now reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by him in so attending. The reason the word "travel" is used again is as follows: Let us take the situation of a judge who goes to a large centre where the hotel is some distance from the court. The judge is then going to have to take taxis and incur taxi fares in getting to and from work. He is travelling while he is there, travelling by taxi. He also has his hotel bills, his meal expenses and so on. This is the reason for the words "reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by him in so attending".

It is our intention to cover the judge's travelling and living expenses while on circuit in his official duty. First of all, he is entitled to be paid as a travelling allowance (a) his moving or transportation expenses to get from his place of residence to the place where he holds court and returning to his place of residence, and (b) reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by him in so attending. This covers the hotel bill, his meals, his taxis and other incidental expenses while he is in the other place attending to his judicial duties. We believe that under these two headings we have now provided for the expenses to be covered.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In a matter involving legislation that is introduced by the Minister of Justice, and particularly legislation having to do with those who are going to interpret the law, I think we would be expected to give to our language a precision at least as great as we would give to any other enactment that we were considering in this house. That is particularly so when the new deputy minister of justice, for whom we all have the greatest admiration, has a reputation of being such an exact interpreter of the language which we employ in our statutes.

The minister has not impressed me with his arguments for retaining the phrase "moving or transportation expenses". As a matter of fact, as he spoke I became convinced that the whole of (a) was entirely unnecessary and I am grateful for the interjection of the hon. member for Ottawa East for that conviction which I acquired as the minister was speaking. There can be no justification for the use of the word "moving" in view of the proposition "or" in (a). I would suggest to him that the whole of (a) could be removed notwithstanding what the language in the past has been and that (b) would cover all of the expenses which a judge expects and will now be able to receive on a per diem basis. He would be entitled under (b) to reasonable travelling expenses, and that certainly includes all that is suggested in the words "moving or transportation expenses". If there should be any doubt, then the words "and other expenses" would take care of the situation.

I suggest to the Minister of Justice that we should not keep in any section any word that is unnecessary or any words which are not of practical or necessary value. We should seek to simplify the legislation as much as possible, without of course in any way distorting the meaning or intent. That being the case I would suggest that in the interest of clarity and of saying what we really mean we should do away with this surplus wording and leave (a) out altogether. The intent would be clear and adequately covered in (b).

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, may I say I am not asking for any explanation in the interests of clarity on the matter raised by the hon. member for Essex East with regard to the words "moving or transportation", but I do want to say that I am most intrigued by this section and I would like some explanation from the minister of it.

Personally, I agree completely that the present subsections (1) and (2) of section 21 of the act most certainly are not sufficient. I defy anyone at all, especially anyone in a position of responsibility and authority, to be able to go away from his home and be able to pay his hotel expenses and meals and other expenses on what ranges I think from $8 to $15 a day; it is without doubt completely impossible. But what does intrigue me is the wording of this section. We are substituting in (b) the words "reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by him in so attending", and I would want the minister to make clear what is the definition of the word "reasonable". I think that is a stupid thing to put in there, because what is the definition of reasonable? As a matter of fact, what is the definition of the Prime Minister's statement in the last campaign that there shall be no undue suffering in Canada? What is the definition of "undue suffering"?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): You are talking to the committee now.

Mr. Winch: Yes, I have been told that before. But what is the definition of reasonable? There will be some who would be most happy with a certain type of accommodation. There will be others who will want the tops. That applies to judges the same as to members of the House of Commons or members of royal commissions.

An hon. Member: That is why the word "reasonable" is used.

Mr. Winch: Yes; I have always been reasonable with regard to charges, but I have not had many opportunities to make any. I cannot understand what is meant by "reasonable travelling and other expenses". Why decides what is reasonable? It has to be decided according to the job and the person. Knowing some of the judges in the province of British Columbia there would be a big difference in the kind of bill they would put in for the accommodation and the meals they have. I would like some clarity, in all fairness to the taxpayers and the person concerned, of what is involved as a charge. I repeat that under the present act no judge can travel in that province without being out of pocket. At the same time if there is going to be any change we want to know what will be the basis of payment.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, to deal first with the comments of the hon. member for Essex East. I think the hon. member is really overlooking the fact that this is not a revision of the Judges Act, it is an amendment. As I said on previous occasions, it is my intention ultimately to make a revision of the Judges Act when I am able to make what I regard as certain important revisions in other arrangements with regard to the judiciary and the method by which our judges are paid and the circumstances surrounding the provision for their payment. Until that time we will not be revising the Judges Act, just amending it.

If we were revising it then it would be our intention to go through it from the point of view of seeing whether there were words, phrases or sections which could be deleted so that we could come up with an entirely new Judges Act. However, for the purpose of an amendment the intention of which is to substitute one method of payment for another, namely payment of reasonable expenses instead of a per diem allowance, I do not think we should be making changes as to the headings under which the judge is entitled to be paid.

The present heading is that he is entitled to be paid his moving or transportation expenses. We do not intend to make any change with respect to that heading; the judge is still entitled to be paid under the heading of moving or transportation expenses, and therefore we decided not to make any change although we might have made a change in that wording if we had been revising the act instead of amending it. The change we made was to change the method of calculation of the payments the judge is entitled to receive from a per diem method to reimbursement of his reasonable expenses actually incurred. One of the headings under which he incurs expenses is moving or transportation.

With regard to the use of the word "reasonable" and the matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East, may I put it to him this way. You would have to have some words to ascertain what is the amount of expenses. The only other word I could think of would be "actual"—"actual travelling and other expenses". May I point out to the hon. member that in fact we would be opening the door wider to abuse by using the word "actual" than by using the word "reasonable", if there be any possibility of abuse at all. If we put the word "actual" in the statute, then a judge might spend any amount he wanted, however extravagant or unreasonable, and he would be entitled to claim it because the statute would say he is entitled to his actual expenses.

The only word I think you can use and the word which is uniformly used in statutes making provision for the reimbursement of living expenses is the word "reasonable". The judge is entitled to be reimbursed his "reasonable travelling and other expenses incurred by him in so attending".

Then the hon. member asked what is the measure of the word "reasonable". I can only say that it means reasonable having regard to the status of the judge, the circumstances of the case, the town or city in which he is sitting and where a person having the status of a judge might properly be expected to take up his quarters—the type of hotel, and so on, that he might be expected to use. It is his reasonable travelling and other expenses. I do not think the judges will have any difficulty in assessing the position or in understanding or interpreting that word. After all, one of their functions as judges is frequently to interpret and instruct juries on the problem of what "reasonable" means. When it comes to applying it to travelling or other expenses, I do not think judges will have too much difficulty in determining exactly how this applies.

Mr. Winch: In British Columbia, one judge might go into one hotel and another might go to another hotel. There would be a big difference in the charge. Which would be reasonable?

Mr. Hanbidge: I have a couple of questions to put to the minister with regard to travelling expenses. In the case of a judge who owns his own car and has to travel, say a couple of hundred miles, does the travelling allowance for the use of the car vary according to the size of the vehicle?

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that this comes under the heading of transportation expenses. The practice has been to pay a standard mileage allowance where a judges uses his own car.

Mr. Hanbidge: There is another point I wish to raise. Suppose a judge hires a taxi. In Saskatchewan at the present time, for instance, where passenger train services have been discontinued, a judge is sometimes sent to another judicial district which may be several hundred miles from his residence. Is the judge entitled in those circumstances to hire a taxi and charge the account to the government?

Mr. Fulton: The use of taxis is not an uncommon occurrence. In a case like that the actual charge would be reimbursed.

Clause agreed to.

[Mr. Fulton.]

On clause 3—Grant of Annuities.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Clause 3 is in many respects one of the most important clauses in this bill and, as I said when the minister presented the measure today, I want to make a few remarks which I regard as important. There are objections which have already been stated by those of us in the Liberal opposition earlier, particularly when we were discussing what the minister referred to the other night when he said that the bill now before the committee was a companion measure to the address which this House of Commons has approved for presentation to the parliament of the United Kingdom in respect of certain matters having to do with the district courts, the superior courts and the question of compulsory retirement of judges.

As I indicated when I spoke of these matters, and as did the Leader of the Opposition and others in this party, we are in favour of the principle of the retirement of judges at the age of 75. However, with regard to judges who have already been appointed, we feel that such compulsory retirement involves a breach of contract with the judges concerned and also that it is an interference with the independence which under our system of law all of us are anxious to see our judiciary possess.

The Ontario bar association at its meeting in February of this year expressed the view that while judges should retire at 75 such retirement should not affect those now in office, and the association passed a resolution to that effect. I mention this action taken by the Ontario bar association because the minister did refer to other resolutions passed by various bar associations including the Canadian Bar Association, resolutions which I do not believe are in conflict with the one to which I have just directed the minister's attention.

I think this is a matter of very great importance. We are now taking a step with regard to pension arrangements for judges, both those now on the bench and those to be appointed. While we do not quarrel with regard to the annuity arrangements for those to be appointed we do feel that this is a serious step to take with regard to those who are now on the bench. We say this is a breach of contract, because when those judges were appointed none of them was appointed on the understanding that there would be any interference, beyond the existing statutory ones, with his period of tenure. Thus I say that we are in favour of the annuity arrangements to the extent we have indicated. A former president of the Canadian Bar Association, Mr. Arthur Kelly, said two years ago, we expect the judges of Canada to be independent of all pressures; we expect them to be free from any distraction which would take away their minds from onerous public duties which they have to perform, and we expect, and the public expects, that they shall maintain a standard of living which is dignified and representative of what we consider the bench represents in Canada.

In so far as the annuity arrangements are concerned I suspect that what the president of the Canadian Bar Association of that day said would be met by the provision which the minister has brought forward, but with regard to the principle of maintaining the independence of the judiciary I think by this clause we in this house are now violating a provision in a way which we should be the last ones to impose on those who by their office are called upon to adjudicate on behalf of citizens in matters affecting the law of contract. What we are doing by this measure is to ask Her Majesty to sanction a bill through her representative in this country, His Excellency the Governor General, which is in violation of a contract, though it is true the contract is not one which is enforceable in the courts but is an arrangement between the state and the appointed judges which has, nevertheless, all the elements of a contract and which otherwise would be enforceable.

We have good precedents for the position we take about this matter, and these precedents have already been mentioned. The committee has been reminded of the position taken in this regard by two former distinguished members of the bar in our country, one who later became a prime minister and the other a distinguished secretary of state. I refer to the late Lord Bennett and to Mr. Cahan both of whom vehemently opposed the initiative taken by the minister of justice in 1927 on the ground that it was an interference with the contractual arrangements, which were presumed to exist between the crown on the one hand and the judge appointed on the other. In 1930 the same minister of justice recognized the soundness of the position taken by Mr. Bennett, Mr. Cahan and others, and took steps by way of annuity arrangements to seek to meet the situation.

True the point arose again in 1933 when the arguments made by Mr. Bennett in particular were cited against the action taken by his solicitor general, Mr. Dupré. It was argued that to treat judges on the bench in the way that was contemplated and, in principle as we are doing today, was to violate a contract solemnly entered into in the only way that it is possible for the crown to enter into a contract with respect to its judges.

In the United Kingdom they were confronted with a situation in 1959. There they brought in a bill providing for larger pensions for the judges. It was known as the judicial pensions bill the text of which I have before me taken from an issue of the Times of November 15, 1959. By the judicial pensions bill there was a radical inroad made into the principle that no high court judge should be removed except on his own initiative by providing a compulsory retiring age of 75 with the qualification that it was to apply only to those to be appointed in the future. In other words the legislation in the United Kingdom took into account the very objection which I am making to this particular provision. I say that the annuity arrangements are satisfactory and should apply only to those who are to be appointed. The provision made for compulsory retirement of judges now on the bench should be on terms and conditions that will take into account this argument of breach of contract and also the desirability of maintaining the independence of the judiciary.

The bill passed in the United Kingdom applied, I find, to the offices of the lords of appeal, in ordinary, the lords chief justices, the master of the rolls, the president of the probate, divorce and admiralty division, the lords justices of appeal and to judges of corresponding rank in Scotland and Northern Ireland, but in every case the principle of the contractual right and the principle of maintaining the integrity and independence of the judiciary were observed.

I find it difficult to understand why the government in the face of that precedent and in the face of the attitude taken by so distinguished a right hon. gentleman of this house as Mr. Bennett, a former prime minister and president of the Canadian Bar Association and a distinguished lawyer, and others, persists in its attitude with regard to this measure in so far as existing judges are concerned. To follow the course I am suggesting, the course followed by the United Kingdom, would not add seriously to the financial obligations of the crown and I believe it would satisfy a principle which I regret is not now being observed. However, I have made this argument before and I do not want to press it except in re-stating it to indicate our concern in the matter.

While discussing this clause there are a number of other points that could be made. Before dealing with them, however, I should like to ask the minister when he replies to what I have said if he would explain precisely to us what was his reasoning with regard to all that is implied in clause 23 (1) (a) and particularly having in mind what I have said about the question of breach of contract. Clause 23 (1) (b) reads:

(b) a judge who has continued in judicial office for at least 15 years, if he resigns his office and in the opinion of the governor in council the resignation is conducive to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest.

I should like to ask the minister for more explanation about this clause. What precisely is meant by "conducive to the better administration of justice"? Is that a new phrase?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the minister. Does it deal with a judge who is not performing his functions satisfactorily? Exactly what is intended by those words? More particularly what is intended by the phrase "or is in the national interest"? I can surely understand that where a judge does not perform his judicial functions in a satisfactory manner his removal is in the national interest. In other words I can envisage a series of situations that could be characterized by the phrase "in the national interest" but since the minister is the author of this clause I think the committee may reasonably expect him to give a careful explanation of what is meant by "conducive to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest".

Clause 23 (1) (c) reads as follows:

(c) a judge who has become afflicted with some permanent infirmity disabling him from the due execution of his office, if he resigns his office or by reason of such infirmity is removed from office—

Then comes into operation the operational part of the clause. Suppose a judge was appointed at the age of 65 and at age of 66 became infirm to the point where he could no longer carry out the execution of his office and, on that account, because of such infirmity, had to resign. Would that judge receive two thirds of his annuity? Has the government given any consideration to a time limit with regard to this clause? One could make a strong case for not having a time limit but at the same time one can conceive of situations having in mind the age of the appointee where the indications of disability might not be as apparent. I have one such case in my mind at this very moment. Naturally I would not want to name the person or describe the situation. I believe that some further explanation about the lack of a time limit might be given by the minister or the hon. gentleman might be able to satisfy us clearly that a time limit in that clause would be wholly undesirable.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

We come then to the final lettered clause, 23 (1) (d) which reads as follows:

(d) a judge who ceases to hold office by reason of his having attained the age of 75 years, if he has held judicial office for at least 10 years or if he held judicial office on the day this section came into force.

It is clear, of course, from that clause that unless a judge has been on the bench for 10 years he cannot qualify for any kind of pension whatever. I can very well understand the concern of the minister in this regard but I am wondering if he has given consideration to a pension or annuity on a basis proportionate to the period of service. There are now on the bench one or two distinguished judges of whom I can readily think who will be affected by this provision.

The minister may possibly have had in mind when he recommended this particular clause that hereafter judicial appointments should be made of persons not older than 65 years. While one can make a strong argument for that practice, I am sure we all know of cases where the state would be robbed of useful service of individuals if we were to adhere to that practice strictly. If that is the case, is it fair for a man who has been practising, let us say, up until he was 66 years of age and has then been appointed to the bench and at the end of the compulsory period of retirement, at 75 years, finds himself not able to qualify for a pension?

It will be argued by some, of course, that a man who has been practising at the bar until he is 66 years of age is likely the kind of man who has sufficient resources so as not to become disturbed when he reaches the retirement age on the bench. But there are cases—and one hesitates to mention names for fear it would bring unfair attention—there is a case in British Columbia right now; I will not give the position of the judge or the place that he occupies on the bench but the minister and other members from British Columbia are familiar with the gentleman of whom I am speaking. In this case an eminent member of the bar went on the bench very late in life. His qualifications were very high. He is now serving with great distinction. I am told that his financial resources are definitely limited, but when he retires from the bench he will not qualify for a pension. I am not now arguing I am raising—

Mr. Fulton: Does my hon. friend mean under the provisions of the present legislation?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under the present amendment.

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid the hon. member has missed the last two lines which read:

—or if he held judicial office on the day this section came into force.

This amendment will only apply to superior court judges appointed in the future.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was going to come to that. If that is clearly the interpretation that my hon. friend puts on it, it would cover the case that I have in mind. After I have listened to the minister perhaps I might ask a few questions to satisfy my concern.

I have been looking at the return which the minister made to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on April 13. That hon. gentleman asked for the names, the addresses, the date of appointment, age at time of appointment, salary, date of retirement where applicable, and eventual pensions of persons appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, the supreme courts of the provinces, appeal courts, district and county courts, since June 1, 1957. I realize that there are exceptions to every rule, and a man might be appointed to the bench at the age of 70 who might have very high qualifications which should be put at the disposal of the state. But I am wondering whether a review of the ages at the time of appointment of so many of those who were appointed warrants the general conclusion that all of those appointees come within the reach of the exception which I say must be allowed.

There are a number who were appointed at the age of 68. I do not want to refer to particular names because these men are now on the bench but if hon. members will look at pages 3216 and 3217 of Hansard they will find the names of the parties to whom I have reference, judges appointed at the ages of 68, 66, 67, 70, and so on. There were five at 66 and a number at 68. It seems to me that where it is possible we should see to it that younger men are appointed so that their period of service on the bench can be extended and so that they can acquire additional experience and become the ornaments to the bench and to our system of law that we are all anxious to see in our judicial appointments.

I have raised a number of points, Mr. Chairman, and I would be grateful if the Minister of Justice would comment on them. I will come back to the one to which the minister has just directed my attention after I have heard him. I make one more appeal to the minister. This provision should not apply to judges now on the bench. It is a breach of contract. We are asking the crown to sanction something which these very judges in the course of their judicial administration are called upon to adjudicate as between one citizen and another. The authority which appoints those who administer justice in our country should not be guilty of the very violation which, if it attended an arrangement between two individuals, could be rectified by judicial action. We should not put ourselves in that position.

This parliament should not be placed in that position. We should follow the course they followed in the United Kingdom. We could do that, as I say, without any serious effect on the resources of this nation. We would thereby have taken a step which this particular series of amendments does not take. These amendments depart from a principle which was recognized at least on three occasions in this parliament. These amendments are not consistent with our declared view of the independence of the judiciary. We should not ourselves be placed in a position of promoting a breach of contract.

Mr. Winch: When the Minister of Justice replies to the previous speaker I should like him to deal at some length with this question of breach of contract. I make these remarks because I listened to the discussion at the resolution stage and to a similar statement coming from the official opposition. Quite bluntly, Mr. Chairman, in view of the term of the contract, in view of the amount of salary paid to judges, which I think is quite a reasonable one, I find it most difficult to understand why, under the terms of the present amending bill to the Judges Act, a person at the age of 75 shall receive two thirds of his salary not only for himself but also under conditions whereby there is something for the widow. This is something rather extraordinary when compared with the contract conditions of other civil servants and most certainly, Mr. Chairman, it does not apply to members of the House of Commons. Just why is there differentiation between those who make the law and those who interpret it? I find this difficult to understand. There is quite a differentiation between those who make the law and those who interpret it.

Although I may be slightly out of order, when we are saying that those who interpret the law should be retired at 75 I should like to know why those who make the law in the other place should not be placed in a similar position. I know I am out of order but I want to express that view because if you cannot interpret the law at 75 I wonder how you can go on making the law after that age in the other place. I should like to know the interpretation of the breaking of a contract. In looking at the bill I can only say that it is one of the most beneficient, benevolent and generous bills in taking care of people who have been appointed by or work under contract with the government of Canada. I should certainly like to hear from the Minister of Justice why he feels that at the age of 75 we should give a judge two thirds his salary and take care of his widow after he dies because I can assure him that we in this group do not feel that way.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Essex East asked me to reply to the points he made in dealing with clause 3 and I think I should reply to them. They were serious points and he addressed himself to each one of the subclauses of the first part of that clause. The hon. member for Vancouver East asked me to comment particularly upon the allegation that has been made and repeated that in the proposals we have made to the house for a retirement age of 75 without providing for a continuation of full salary there is somehow a breach of contract. Perhaps I should first deal with that point briefly because it was first raised.

I must ask your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, in doing so, because, of course, this bill does not provide for a retirement age at all. The bill only provides for the payment of annuities to judges who resign their office or cease to hold their office because they reach the age of 75. It was an earlier address that provided for the retirement age and I am afraid that a renewal of the discussion which took place in the debate on that address is really out of order because this bill does not provide a retirement age for judges. All the bill does is provide for an annuity to be payable to judges who will have reached what from now on will be the retirement age of 75 years. However, Mr. Chairman, you did not interrupt my hon. friend and I did not raise a point of order. I realize that the two are closely related and I am quite prepared to meet the arguments of my hon. friends in this respect.

However, I wish to point out one thing. I wish to correct something the hon. member for Essex East said, probably inadvertently. He said that this provision, referring to the provision of annuities of two thirds of their salary at age 75, should not apply to judges who will be retired. I think what he really meant was that the retirement age of 75 should not apply to judges at present holding office. Since, however, it does apply or will apply if the address passes I am quite sure my hon. friend would then want this provision now before us to apply because without it they would not be able to get any pension at all. Indeed, under the provision now before us those judges affected by the retirement age, whether they were appointed before or after the retirement age comes into effect, will have their pensions substantially increased over what they would have been without the bill now before us. They will get two thirds of their present salary instead of two thirds of the salary of which they were in receipt before 1955.

Therefore by this bill we are going a very considerable distance in the direction of taking care of any complaint that may be raised with respect to those judges previously appointed, namely that they suffer a financial loss. True they do not continue at full salary but they will retire on two-thirds of their present salary and I do not really think anyone should seriously suggest that is an unfair financial sacrifice, if it be one, to impose on judges.

Indeed I say that to make it possible for them to leave the bench at two thirds of their full salary is a very considerable improvement over what would be their position if we simply left them to retire when they felt like it or, alternatively, if they died while in office and their widows received a pension; because without what we are asking parliament to do today a judge would receive his pension or the widow her annuity based on the former salary and not on the present one.

However, to deal with the merits of the argument that there is a breach of contract in providing a retirement age applicable to judges who have been previously appointed, I do not want to deal at length with the matter but I should perhaps refer briefly to what I said about it before. I dealt with the question of breach of contract and I referred my hon. friends to the Reilly case which was a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in 1932, affirmed by the privy council in 1934, in which it was held that action somewhat similar to the action being taken here, taken by parliament to change the circumstances of an appointment, could not be said to involve a breach of contract.

It will be remembered that in that case the government through parliamentary action abolished an office to which somebody had been appointed. That person sued for damages for breach of contract and both the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council then held in effect that it would be strange indeed if parliament, the legislative body which had created the office and had the power to appoint to it, could not in effect change the conditions of appointment and provide that the appointment cease without being charged with breach of contract. Here we have a case where under the British North America Act it is provided that the federal government may appoint to the position of superior court judge. Jurisdiction in that field is vested by the British North America Act jointly in the dominion and provincial fields, the provincial legislature creating the position and the dominion authority having the power to appoint.

What we are doing now by agreement of these two legislatures, the dominion parliament and the provincial legislatures, is asking the United Kingdom parliament to amend the British North America Act so that in future the statutory provision will be that the office ceases or rather that the person ceases to hold that office when he reaches 75 so that automatically on reaching 75 there is a demission of office. This is exactly on all fours with the principle enunciated by the courts in the Reilly case. Where the legislature having competence causes to be enacted a change in the statute under which appointment is made, then, when the legislature does that there is no question whatever of a breach of contract.

May I point out that the Reilly case was decided after the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett made his criticism of the government in 1927. It is true that he alleged there was a breach of contract although he, I think, used words rather more precise than the words used by the hon. member for Essex East. But I point out to you, sir, that R. B. Bennett's criticism was voiced before the Supreme Court of Canada and the privy council had dealt with this question as they dealt with it conclusively in the Reilly case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit one question? To what he says about the Reilly case I have, of course, no answer. That was a judicial decision with regard to an appointment that was not judicial. Will the minister not recognize what I said, namely that the contract which I say exists between the state and the judge is not one enforceable at law? There is no doubt about that, as I have said, but it has all the attributes of a contract, and I ask the minister whether he does not agree that all that the Reilly case says is that such a contract is not enforceable at law. It does not say that it is not a contract.

Mr. Fulton: It went a little further than that because as I recall it, and I put the words on Hansard in the other debate, Lord Atkin in the privy council made the significant finding that under these circumstances there is not a breach of contract. He said that the contract is discharged, which he pointed out is a very different thing from a contract being breached. Whether the contract be real or implied, the situation is that the conditions are discharged by the decision of the legislature which created the power to appoint and under whose joint jurisdiction the position falls.

I pointed out further on the earlier occasion that at the present time the British North America Act, the statute under which our authority arises, says that judges may be removed from office at any time by joint address of both houses of parliament. What we have asked parliament to do, therefore, is to pass an address now saying, in effect, that at age 75 all judges shall cease to hold office, which parliament has the right to do at any time. I do not accept for a moment the suggestion that there is a breach of contract, whether the contract is said to be express or implied, because it lies within the terms of the legislative authority of this parliament, having in this case the consent of the provincial legislatures which have joint jurisdiction in this field, to do exactly what we are asking parliament to do.

May I point out that there have been numerous changes made in the conditions surrounding judicial office. My hon. friends talk about a contract, express or implied. They say that a judge is entitled to assume he will continue at the salary at which he was appointed. I never heard any objections from my hon. friends when unilateral action was taken to increase the salary of judges. No question was then raised as to a contract, and there were no arguments to the effect that a judge should be prepared to carry on at the salary which attached to his office at the time of his appointment. It would of course be an absurd argument. But if one takes my friend's argument and applies it by logical extension, or if he is going to be logical about the position he has taken, then he should say that at any time there is an increase in judicial salaries the increased salary should apply only to those who are appointed subsequently and not to those previously appointed. If his argument has any merit it means that when a judge accepted office there was an implied contract that he would continue in office at the salary attached to the office at the time he was appointed. My hon. friend has never raised that argument, and of course would not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is legalistic sophistry.

Mr. Fulton: No, but if it be that it is because it is applying the argument that my hon. friend has raised. What I am doing is demonstrating the sophistry of the argument he has raised. However, I reject this argument about breach of contract altogether.

So, Mr. Chairman, I suppose it is obvious that we are not going to arrive at an ad idem on this point. I am sorry that my friends will not accept the force of logic. If they will not, then I am afraid there is nothing I can do about it. I am satisfied, on the basis of the research we made, on the basis of consideration that we gave to it both before and after the discussion took place in this house, that what we are doing is eminently proper and is eminently fair. We have taken account of the financial position of those who were appointed to office before the address becomes effective by making a change with respect to the pensions on which they will retire from office.

I just conclude this section of my discussion by saying that it is my strong view there must be uniformity with respect to the provisions applying to judges' salaries, with respect to the provisions applying to judges' pensions, with respect to the provisions applying to judges during the time they hold office. It would, in my view be improper to bring in legislation now which would have the effect that one group of judges on the bench could continue in office until such time as they choose to retire, while another group of judges must retire at age 75 with the pension that parliament provides. I think it would be an entirely improper thing to create that kind of distinction between judges who are serving simultaneously on the same bench. If for no other reason, therefore, it seemed to us proper to make the retiring age universal and of immediate application and to make the change in pension policy also universal and of immediate application.

My hon. friend from Essex East dealt also with the wording of subclause (b) of this proposed clause. This provides that the governor in council may grant to a judge who has continued in judicial office for at least 15 years, if he resigns his office and in the opinion of the governor in council, the resignation is conducive to the better administration of justice or is in the national interest, an annuity not exceeding two thirds of his salary. My hon. friend asks me to explain what we mean by the words "in the national interest", and why that phrase is used. He also wants to know what we mean by the words "conducive to the better administration of justice". The reason for inserting the words "in the national interest" is based on experience with at least one case that has arisen since I assumed this portfolio, and other cases which I understand arose in the past.

At the present time the existing legislation contains a provision in section 23 for the payment of an annuity to a judge who retires or resigns from office. This provision, however, is qualified by section 30 of the present act which reads as follows:

> No annuity shall be granted under subsection (1) of section 23 or under section 25 unless the governor in council is of opinion that it is in the public interest that such judge should resign his office.

In other words, the only condition under which an annuity may now be paid to a judge who resigns other than by reason of sickness is, if in the opinion of the governor in council, the resignation is in the public interest. It has been my experience, and I believe that of my predecessors, that this provision is difficult of interpretation and application.

Let me refer to a hypothetical case in order to avoid identification, actual or potential. Let us suppose that a judge is appointed to a position, not by the federal authority but by some other authority, either public or private, and by whom it is then said to the federal government, we consider that the assumption by this judge of this alternative employment is very much in the public interest. This might be alleged and argued with considerable vehemence. It might be alleged and argued that the federal government which took the position this was not in the public interest, in the sense the words are used in the act, was being selfish and narrow.

But, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that when you are dealing with federal legislation and dealing with positions for which parliament provides the salaries and the annuities those words "in the public interest" should be interpreted as meaning the public interest in the sense of the national or federal aspect of the public interest. There have been cases, it is quite true, where former governments have appointed judges to offices within the disposition of the dominion government, such as ambassadors. I can think of at least one, if not more cases in this category. In those cases, the opinion was that the judge's resignation of his office in order to accept the appointment was in the public interest. It was represented in one or two cases that this was a higher or more important calling to which he was being appointed. I think there is no difficulty with the basis of that interpretation because it was an appointment by the national authority. The difficulty arises where you have the situation where the judge himself desires to go to another appointment or some other body wishes to obtain his services in some other capacity, and it is then represented that this resignation in order to enable the appointment to take place is in the public interest.

There has been misunderstanding and difficulty occasioned by this situation in the past. As I say, in my view the application to be given to the these words "is in the public interest", is in the field for which the federal government is responsible, and we are therefore changing the words of the statute in this case to make it clear, or as clear as we can make it, that the consideration to be borne in mind is the interest within the jurisdiction, authority and control of the federal government and parliament. That is the reason for the use of the words "is in the national interest". We are using the word "national" instead of the word "public".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Does the hon. minister think that he has dealt sufficiently with the phrases—

Mr. Fulton: No, I am coming to that now; it is another part of the problem which was raised.

The reason for the use of the words "is conducive to the better administration of justice" is closely related to the problem I have just been discussing. At the present time the only way in which an annuity can be paid to a judge who resigns his office under section 23 is either if infirmity or sickness disable him from discharging his office, or if he is resigning for some other reason, and in the opinion of the governor in council it is in the public interest that he should resign his office.

When you come to apply this to the case of a judge who has served 15 years or more and who may have reached the point really where his energy and ability on the bench have in fact been exhausted but you really cannot say he has such sickness or infirmity as to disable him from discharging his office, then it seems to us to be pretty harsh for the governor in council to have to say, "Yes, your resignation will be accepted and your annuity can be paid because it is in the public interest that you should resign".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I agree with that.

Mr. Fulton: The reason why we use the words "is conducive to the better administration of justice" is to cover exactly that type of case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about a judge whose conduct is in question?

Mr. Fulton: May I come to that in a moment; I will just complete what I was saying on this point.

In other words, this will furnish a way in which we can pay an annuity without having to go so far as to say, "It is in the public interest that you should resign your office", and actually make that as a finding of the governor in council. We can now simply say, "Yes, we agree, under all the circumstances that conditions are such that it would be conducive to the better administration of justice if you wish to resign"; and in that case an annuity can be paid.

It is perfectly true that this would also cover the case of a judge whose conduct was in question, although perhaps not misconduct of such magnitude as to warrant the submission of an address or the appointment of a commission of inquiry. Those two courses, after all, are both very far-reaching and rather terrible steps to have to take, and would only be taken in what I might call extreme cases. But there are lesser cases where a judge's conduct might have been called in question and it is perhaps his feeling that he himself has come to the conclusion that the administration of justice would be better served if he resigned. By the use of these words in the statute he could resign if he had served 15 years under circumstances where it was deemed to be conducive to the better administration of justice and he would be entitled to his full pension.

Where a judge had given faithful or valuable service for 15 or more years there is no reason why he should not be allowed to submit his resignation under such circumstances and receive his full annuity. Indeed, being practical about it, I think it is a sensible step to make this provision, because if you did not provide some such way in which he could resign and receive his annuity it would be extremely unlikely that you would get his resignation in any event. As I have said, it is rarely, if ever, that one would use the terrible provision I have mentioned which is the only other way that a judge can be removed from the bench.

The third provision which the hon. member asked me to discuss was that contained in clause 23 (1) (c), which reads:

> (c) a judge who has become afflicted with some permanent infirmity disabling him from the due execution of his office, if he resigns his office or by reason of such infirmity is removed from office—

In that case the governor in council may grant to such judge an annuity not exceeding two thirds of his salary.

The hon. member raised the question in that connection as to whether there should not be some provision providing for a minimum term of service before a judge who resigned his office by reason of sickness or infirmity still could receive full pension. May I point out to the hon. member that the present law provides exactly what we are providing here, namely section 23 (1) of the present Judges Act which is as follows:

> The governor in council may grant to a judge of a superior court who has continued in office as such for at least 15 years or is afflicted with some permanent infirmity disabling him from the due execution of his office . . . an annuity not exceeding two thirds of——his salary. We are making no change in this regard, and I think that is proper because I do not think a judge who in good faith makes all these changes and sacrifices required of him, disposes of his practice and office and who makes other far-reaching financial arrangements in order to accept an appointment to the bench, who is then stricken unexpectedly with some sickness disabling him from discharging his duties, should be deprived of his right to an annuity if he resigns on account of that disability.

The final provision which the hon. member asked me to comment on—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am satisfied with that now.

Mr. Fulton: —was with respect to (1) (d). The hon. member says he is now satisfied with that and I am glad to hear that. However, there is one aspect of it which I might point out, and that is that at the present time the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the exchequer court and the territorial courts in Canada have to serve a minimum of ten years before they are entitled to a pension. We are simply extending that in effect to judges of superior and county courts by providing that future appointees must have served ten years in order to be entitled to full pension on reaching the retirement age of 75.

I think the implications will be obvious and I think they are proper. If we are providing a retirement age universally of 75 years, then I think it is quite proper to provide in effect that you must not appoint anyone over 65 to that office if he is to receive the full pension. There is no prohibition against appointment; it is merely a provision that he must have served ten years in order to retire on full pension at 75, and the assumption is that there will not be very many appointments over the age of 65. That is already the case in the highest court in the land and we see no reason for not extending it to other courts.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of remarks to make on this. I am not a lawyer but I am quite interested in this matter.

About a year ago on the department's estimates I asked the minister whether the government was contemplating legislation along this line. The minister said he was working on it and hoped to make an agreement with the provinces shortly. He has worked very fast in one year in order to reach agreement with all the provinces.

I have made a few fast calculations with respect to the annuities proposed for judges of county and district courts. Those receiving a salary of $10,000 were formerly entitled to a pension of $5,333 which will now be increased to $7,000, an increase of 30 per cent. Puisne judges and judges of all provincial and federal courts formerly receiving a pension of, say, $9,600 will now receive $11,266, or an increase of 17 per cent. The percentages will vary, of course. I think this represents a very substantial increase in what might be called the over-all pay, or emoluments, of judges. When a vacancy occurs on the bench the minister of justice and his officials must, of course, look for the best person to fill that vacancy and the proposals which are now being put forward will serve as an extra inducement.

I should like the minister to comment on one point and tell us whether he thinks we are likely now to have a reservoir of trained judges who will be available to act on royal commissions and boards of inquiry thus leaving the serving judges free to do the work for which they were appointed, namely to take care of the courts. I think that perhaps the increase in the number of judges is not unconnected with the fact that some of our judges are doing too much outside work. It may be that because of the extra fees, the extra income, that such work has been regarded by the judges with a favourable eye. I think we should discourage this practice and try to keep our judges working on the job they were appointed to do. The present salaries are, in my opinion, adequate. They may not be anywhere near the sums which the judges were making when they were at the bar, but they are certainly adequate, particularly in the light of the changes made in this present bill. I think we can expect that our judges should stick to the bench and keep away from outside activity, no matter how financially rewarding such activities might be.

Mr. Hanbidge: What is the position of a judge who has retired in the past four or five years? Would he be entitled to a pension at the increased rate?

Mr. Fulton: That matter will be taken care of by clause 6. The answer is yes.

With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, it would certainly be my anticipation and hope that the provision of a uniform compulsory retirement age will, in effect, help establish a reserve of men who have previously been judges and who will be able to undertake work on these commissions and special inquiries to an increasing extent, thus easing the pressure now existing for the appointment of serving judges to such commissions and inquiries.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister care to say whether or not he feels that those who have been on the bench and who take other appointments in the service of the crown or elsewhere should continue to use the title "The Hon. Mr. Justice—"?

Mr. Fulton: I think the custom in that regard is that they should continue to use the title "The Hon." but not "The Hon. Mr. Justice". Once judges have resigned they may, by application and submission to Her Majesty, be authorized to continue using the designation "The Hon. so and so" but not "The Hon. Mr. Justice so and so".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is not in any way a reflection on the person concerned, because he has obviously very worth while qualities, but does that represent the practice with regard to the address of the chairman of the civil service commission?

Mr. Fulton: Certainly it does to the best of my knowledge. He asked for it only on the basis that the designation "The Hon." might be preserved as is the case with practically every judge who has resigned or retired since I assumed this portfolio.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With great respect to the minister, I wonder if that is the case. I think that where a judge resigns he is entitled to use the prefix "The Hon." only with the concurrence of the governor in council.

Mr. Fulton: No, it is with the consent of Her Majesty. In every case the official authority has been contained in permission from Her Majesty, and whenever the matter has been raised with me we have made the appropriate recommendation through His Excellency for authority to use that title. It does not carry the right or authority to continue to use the word "judge" or "justice".

Mr. Hanbidge: I should like to inquire of the minister what is the position of a judge's widow in cases when a judge dies in office and, second, when a judge dies a year or so after he becomes eligible for retirement pension.

Mr. Fulton: In both cases the widow would receive two ninths of the salary received by the judge at the time of his resignation or death as the case may be. The elective provision is no longer in effect and it has not been since 1955. If a judge retires or resigns, the annuity works out at two thirds of his salary—we are making a change and relating that to present salary, not the old salary —and after his death, whether it occurs while in office or after retirement, his widow receives two ninths of his salary; she receives one third of the pension which itself is two thirds of the salary.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Fulton moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO CONTRIBUTIONS, PENSIONABLE SERVICE, BENEFITS, ETC.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-76, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

He said: I think it is clear from the course of the discussion of this matter on the resolution stage on June 20 that it has won the support and favour of the house. I infer that there is no occasion for my attempting to discuss the bill now. I reviewed the principal features of the bill in making my statement on June 20 as reported at pages 5124-6 of Hansard on the resolution stage. Perhaps therefore I should simply say that the bill does provide important benefits which I believe have commended themselves to the judgment of the house and which have been welcomed outside the house.

Hon. members may, however, be interested in a word about the proposed procedure. In speaking on this matter on the resolution stage on June 20 as recorded at page 5126 I said:

> It is my intention to recommend that, after second reading, the bill be referred to a special committee where it will be possible to study the amendments and the changes in the basic benefit and contribution formulas in detail.

At that time it had been expected that one committee, namely a special committee, would be set up and that there would be referred to it not only the present bill but Bill No. C-77 to amend the Civil Service Act as well. Since that time by general agreement the house has decided that Bill No. C-77 should not be proceeded with at this session. The question arose then as to whether it was worth while to set up a special committee simply to deal with this one bill, Bill No. C-76. Requests, however, have been made by hon. members opposite that we should proceed as had been previously indicated to set up the special committee and accordingly when the bill is given second reading I shall be prepared then to offer a motion on which I understand there is general agreement. It is the motion of which I gave notice in Votes and Proceedings of June 16. It is to be found there immediately following page 664.

At that time the notice of motion contemplated the appointment of the special committee in order that both these measures might be referred to it. The only change in the form of the motion will be by elimination of any reference to the referral to that committee of the bill to amend the Civil Service Act.

There have been conferences already between the whips concerning the personnel of the committee. That personnel has been agreed upon and therefore we are in the happy position of being able to offer the motion today by consent and actually appoint the committee and establish its personnel. That has been agreed upon by the whips and therefore we are in a position to proceed in this matter and send it to the proposed standing committee swiftly.

Mr. McIlraith: Before the minister resumes his seat would he repeat the page reference with respect to Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is the page opposite page 664 of Votes and Proceedings of June 16. In other words, page 1 of the appendix to Votes and Proceedings of June 16.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house for second reading is undoubtedly a very important one. It is important for the effects it has on large numbers of employees in the public service and important in principle but when we examine it we find it deals with different isolated points in existing legislation which I think the house generally will agree is very good legislation. That being the nature of the bill before us it raises some question as to getting the best possible legislation out of this bill by debate at this stage.

It strikes me that if one were to seek to debate a great many questions of principle affecting the subject of the superannuation of public servants no valid result will be obtained. While it is technically possible to do so under the rules—the bill being in such language—in this particular instance it is probably not desirable to do so. I believe the points dealt with in the bill can be more adequately examined in the special committee to be set up for the purpose of dealing with this legislation to which committee the bill will be referred following second reading. In the committee questions can be directed to the minister and the appropriate officials of the department having to do with the administration of the fund. Questions may be put to the actuarial authorities in the minister's department and others who may want to be present. By following the procedure outlined by the minister of giving the bill second reading now and having it referred to the special committee, when it comes back into the house if there are any questions still unanswered there will be an opportunity in the committee of the whole to discuss the points on particular clauses. I think that is a desirable course to follow on the whole.

There is one point concerning which I should like some information from the minister. If he has it readily available he may give it to the house when he replies or, if not, it could be given in committee. I refer to the whole question raised by the amendment changing the rate of contribution. I have in my hand sessional paper No. 60-B entitled "Report on actuarial examination of the superannuation account in the consolidated revenue fund as at December 31, 1957" tabled in the house on Monday, June 20, 1960. Two paragraphs which squarely deal with this point are found on page 24 of that return. The first reads as follows:

> 1. The estimated deficit in the superannuation account as at December 31, 1957, was $137.7 million. It is recommended that this deficit, together with the "unamortized portion of actuarial deficiency in the superannuation account," amounting to $139 million, be liquidated as soon as may reasonably be possible. It is also recommended that, until liquidation of the deficit has been completed, interest be credited to the account in respect of the amount of deficit remaining from time to time, to keep it from growing with interest.

The second paragraph reads in part as follows:

> 2. The average contribution rate estimated to be required to pay for the benefits provided under the act is 12.4 per cent of salary for male contributors and 9.7 per cent of salary for female contributors.

And so on. I hope that at some point we can have information provided, if it is available, as to the account up to date and that it can be made clear that the increase in the contributions being sought in the bill now before us is intended to provided adequately for the amount required to provide the benefits under the legislation and any changes in benefits that may be involved and not to provide through the increased contributions the recovery of the deficit in the fund. That is a principle which at some stage should be made clear.

Then there is a reference in the public accounts, 1957, volume 1, at page 47, to the government's contributions with respect to the superannuation account. It indicates that the government contribution to the superannuation account was $72 million in 1956-57 compared with $31 million in 1955-56. It explains what brought about the increase, and then it goes on to say:

> In addition to the above contributions, $50 million was charged to budgetary expenditures as a reduction in the unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the superannuation account reducing the balance in the account to $139 million as at March 31, 1957.

If I recall correctly, I think there have been no further contributions charged to budgetary expenditures as a reduction in the unamortized portion of the actuarial deficiency in the superannuation account, and at some point there should be an adequate explanation of whether that was not done because it was not necessary or what is the prospect in that respect in the future? That should be made clear.

There is the very important question which was covered by some other legislation last year of the whole matter of the inadequacy of the pension being paid to persons already superannuated. This is an old problem, a very difficult and complex one. There was legislation dealing with it, but there are some matters that desire to be clarified. It is a combination of things having to do with the change in salary levels over a period of years and a continuous rise over a period of years which has made the difficulty so great for certain individual retired civil servants, not a great number of them, but it is a very great problem for the ones involved; in fact, it is a severe problem.

Then, I suppose, it would be quite possible to discuss under the bill before us certain special matters that arise by reason of the reference in the bill itself in clauses 2, 3 and 17(1) to certain other legislation, namely the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Canadian Forces Act and so on. There are other matters that could be discussed there. There are some real problems, particularly with reference to pensioners from the R.C.M.P., who were pensioned some years ago. There is a problem there that I think it is desirable to have something done about. These are all matters that, while they could be raised at this stage, do raise questions of principle and could be dealt with in the committee stage.

There is an amendment that involves a question of principle. I refer to the change in the provision for death benefits. In existing legislation there was some hardship by reason of the nature of the clause as it stood and a change is being made making provision for a lump sum in any event under certain circumstances. There are some other changes in the bill. I take it that the rest of the changes are mainly concerned with matters that have been shown as being required in the light of administrative experience.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Improvements in administration.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, mostly under administration.

Bearing in mind the nature of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I think we can obtain the detailed information at the committee stage. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming),—I make reference to him in a direct way—when we come back into the house at the committee stage will not be objecting too technically in his view of the rules should it be desired to get some information on some of these points at different times. I hope also that when the committee is set up it will be possible to arrange the actual sittings in such a way that they will not unnecessarily conflict with the other committees sitting dealing with legislation now before them. I have reference to such matters as the combines legislation now before the committee on banking and commerce. I hope that good judgment will prevail so that the committees will not be sitting at the same time. With the house sitting somewhat extended hours and the banking and commerce committee dealing with the combines legislation and having some very important witnesses before it I hope satisfactory arrangements can be made so that the committee sittings can be reconciled with each other in such a way that would enable all hon. members to give the bill a thorough examination.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief with my remarks but I do have a situation which should be drawn to the attention of the minister and the committee which will be considering the provisions of the bill in detail. The situation which I am concerned with may be covered by subclause (4) of clause 20 but it is somewhat doubtful. It has to do with a very important question of principle, namely the question of administrative errors and the consequent hardship imposed on a civil service employee falling under the provisions of the bill. The situation I have in mind is where an administrative error is made as a result of which a civil servant may be precluded from claiming back pensionable service with some other branch of the government, for instance, previous military service and the like. The situation perhaps may rarely arise but it has arisen in my riding on two occasions. Both of these cases have been brought to the attention of the department concerned and I believe also to the attention of the treasury board. Under the provisions of the act as it now reads, and the way I read the provisions of this bill, there appears to be no solution and no relief for the employees concerned.

Both the employees are employees of the Department of National Defence. One, Mr. C. L. Lawrence, became a contributor under the old act, the act now in existence, first in 1955. Then, of course, he was paying only 4 per cent to the retirement fund. When he was given the right to elect on July 1, 1958 he of course would pay 6 per cent. He had to make his choice with respect to claiming previous service and he had a penalty free election year until July 1, 1959. Form FA135, which provides for compilation of the estimated cost of the previous service was sent from Whitehorse to Edmonton on March 25, 1959, and then was mislaid by the district treasury office in Edmonton. It was not returned until April 12, 1960, over eight months past the penalty free date. As a result, Mr. Lawrence is denied the opportunity to elect because of this administrative error, and there is apparently under existing legislation no relief for him. Under the provisions of the amending bill, unless it can be found that there is something which covers this problem, there would still be no relief for people who find themselves in similar positions.

The other case concerns Mr. M. E. Erickson, also an employee of the Department of National Defence in the Yukon. He became a contributor under the act on November 1, 1958, and his penalty free election year ended on November 1, 1959. Form FA 135 was received by the chief personnel officer at Whitehorse and forwarded to Mr. Erickson on October 13, 1959. The letter containing form FA 135, that is, the estimate of cost of previous service, was forwarded to Mr. Erickson and addressed to box 84, Whitehorse instead of box 84, Watson Lake, where Mr. Erickson lived. Because of this clerical error Mr. Erickson did not receive form FA 135 in time to make his election before expiration of the penalty free period.

It appears that both of these people have no relief under the old legislation because, through the executive of the national defence employees association, both here and at Whitehorse, representations have been made to the department concerned and to treasury board and the association has been informed that there is nothing that can be done. As a matter of principle, Mr. Speaker, I feel that if the existing bill does not cover such situations perhaps the committee might give serious consideration to suggesting amendments which would provide for the rectification of such administrative or clerical errors so that hardship will not be worked on employees who find themselves in such circumstances.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly on behalf of this group in support of the principle and purpose of this very important and somewhat complicated and technical bill. After studying the bill we think it is a definite improvement and a step forward in remedying some of the difficulties created by the present pension arrangements. As the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) dealt quite fully with several questions that we in this group had noted and intended to raise there is no necessity for me to detain the house to repeat what he has said with respect to certain matters to which he thinks consideration should be given. I simply join with him in bringing these matters to the attention of the minister with this exception, that we do want to make certain that the bill protects all classes of civil servants but particularly those who have been retired for some time.

As the hon. member for Ottawa West mentioned, I presume a good many members of the house have encountered rather distressing cases involving civil servants who have been retired for quite a number of years. We are very concerned about those persons who have suffered so long from the results of inflation and we want to see the situation remedied. This type of bill, dealing with the superannuation plan, contributions and actuarial matters, is certainly a type of bill that requires careful study by a committee. When it comes to figures and money matters, particularly legislation of this type, I am one who always likes to see the matter go before a committee and receive careful consideration because it is not a question of simply using words loosely but rather of making certain that two and two make four today and tomorrow.

We were very glad to hear the minister say that he intends to move for the establishment of a select committee to study the bill. The committee will no doubt have the opportunity to hear the minister, his officials and other persons directly concerned with this legislation. With these brief remarks, Mr. Speaker, and leaving any further criticisms until the bill has been returned to the house with any further suggestions that may come to mind as a result of the study of the measure by the committee, I end what I have to say on the bill at this time.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say a few words on the bill to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act. In considering such matters I am always reminded of the fact that it is unfortunate we are losing so many valuable civil servants because they have reached the retirement age. While this matter does not come under the legislation before us, it is a good thing to call the attention of the house to the fact that we should look forward to the day when we will allow civil servants to remain in office longer, especially now that life expectancy is much greater. We need our good men and we should keep them as long as they can be useful to the government of the country.

I am, of course, in favour of the amendments to the act, especially the provision which makes it possible to base future pensions on the average salary received during the last six years of service rather than the last ten years. I congratulate the minister on bringing this amendment forward. It is a very popular move and I am going to take as much credit for it as I can. I can at least say that for the past 15 years I have at all times wanted to see retired civil servants receive adequate pensions. I am the son of a civil servant and if it had not been for my father's pension and what my mother received some 27 years ago when she had seven children to look after it would have been hard to educate my brothers and sisters. I am glad to see that the treatment to be accorded will be even more favourable under the new plan. True, there are some who will feel badly that they do not fall under the six-year plan and it is also true that there are many whose pensions are inadequate but I am still hopeful that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) will improve the legislation he brought in two years ago, I think—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): An item in the estimates was brought in two years ago and a statute last year.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): —and increase some of the pensions which are inadequate. With the introduction of this new amendment I imagine there will be a much greater call for the averaging of pensions of civil servants who retired some time ago. In any event, I welcome the fact that the bill will be sent to a special committee and I look forward to the opportunity to take part in passing this legislation.

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks with respect to clause 2, paragraph 2. I understand that postmasters and assistants in receipt of salaries of $900 or more enjoy the privileges of superannuation. When the minister replies perhaps he could tell me whether the amendments will affect their privileges in any way. There is one other point with reference to clause 20, page 17 of the bill. I am particularly interested in the expression "full time" as applied to any employee.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will have an opportunity to discuss the details of the bill when it comes before the committee if he is concerned with details only.

I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for the support they have indicated for second reading of this measure and for the proposal that has been made that it then be referred to the special committee as indicated in the notice of motion in Votes and Proceedings of June 16. I think I can deal very briefly with some of the points that have been raised. The house would not expect me, of course, to deal with individual clauses of the bill or with individual cases. That would not be proper in the debate on second reading. In any event, there will be ample opportunity at the committee stage, whether in special committee or in committee of the whole, to deal with the various questions that have been raised in regard to details of the bill.

So far as the position of postmasters is concerned, may I just say very briefly that because of their differing conditions of service and remuneration it has been difficult to prescribe the conditions under which postmasters or assistant postmasters in revenue post offices or clerks of works meet the requirements of the act for eligibility as contributors. This amendment will therefore call for designation, as such, by the governor in council. It is proposed that all of those in these categories who are now contributors will be protected in their status by a general designation.

The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) raised several questions arising out of the actuarial report, one of three which were tabled last week. He has drawn attention particularly to the two paragraphs appearing on page 24 under the heading "Summary and recommendations". Again speaking quite briefly may I say, as I indicated before, "the average contribution rate estimated"—I am quoting from the report now—"to be required to pay for the benefits prescribed under the act is 12.4 per cent of salary for male contributors and 9.7 per cent of salary for female contributors". That is the position as of August 21, 1959.

As the house is aware, the actual contributions amounted to 12 per cent of salary for male contributors and 10 per cent of salary for female contributors, with the government and the particular civil servant each making equal and matching contributions. Up to the present time, therefore, there has been a small deficiency in the male contributions as compared with the calls upon the fund, and the female contributions have been adequate to meet the calls in that behalf on the fund. This, of course, it the position prior to this current round of substantial increases in salaries. One cannot, of course, expect that this position would continue. The increases in salaries will have an effect which, no other action being taken, would increase the deficiency in respect of the male contributions and bring the female contributions closely into complete balance with female calls upon the fund.

The increased benefits that this measure provides, and they are substantial, will cost money and that is the reason why it has become necessary to propose increases in the contributions of male contributors to 13 per cent, with the government paying half. This, of course, will be in keeping with the scheme of the other two acts, one respecting the armed services and the other respecting the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. One cannot be absolutely precise, but the best estimate that is available from the actuaries is that with the increase in male contributions we will be fairly close to balance as between income and outgo of the fund, taking account of the increase in salaries and the substantial increases in benefits. There is no thought of using this increase in the male contributions to build up the fund or to provide a surplus. It is a matter simply of trying to equate the contributions as closely as is reasonably possible with the demands upon the fund.

The other point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West concerned whether the payments into the superannuation account were to meet the existing unamortized operations of the superannuation account or the estimated deficit in that account. The amount of the former is $139 million, and the amount of the latter is $137.7 million.

Mr. McIlraith: The figures mentioned by the minister now are as of March 31, 1957. Is there any subsequent change?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There have been no contributions authorized by parliament on account of either of these sums. I think all hon. members are aware that any contribution could only be made by authorization of parliament.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

I think, Mr. Speaker, these are the principal points that were raised, which it may be appropriate to mention in this debate on second reading. I am sure there will be points of detail to be raised in the committee. Two hon. members raised questions as to the position of civil servants who have hitherto retired on superannuation. This bill has no application to them. As I pointed out in the statement which I made at the resolution stage on June 20, their position has been dealt with and very substantially improved by, first of all, the item in the estimates that was introduced and passed two years ago and with the enactment of the Public Service Superannuation Adjustment Act which was passed by parliament one year ago and which brought substantial increases in the existing benefits to those who had retired prior to 1954.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): May I now ask the consent of the house to move the motion of which I gave notice as mentioned earlier in my remarks, in Votes and Proceedings of June 16, and which is found in the appendix opposite page 664. With the change which I mentioned in the notice when speaking on my motion for second reading, having regard to the fact that the committee now is to have referred to it only the present measure and not Bill No. C-77, an act respecting the civil service of Canada, if the house will give unanimous consent I now propose:

That a special committee be appointed to consider a bill to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable or necessary;

That the committee shall consist of 15 members to be designated by the house;

That the committee be empowered to sit during the sittings of the house;

That standing order 66 be suspended in relation thereto.

If that motion meets with the approval of the house, I have the names of the members of the committee.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF PERSONNEL

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the special committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act be composed of Mrs. Casselman and Messrs. Bell (Carleton), Campeau, Caron, Hicks, Keays, MacLellan, MacRae, McIlraith, More, Peters, Richard (Ottawa East), Rogers, Smith (Winnipeg North), and Tardif.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR REFERENCE OF BILL TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the committee having been appointed, may I now move that Bill No. C-76 be referred to the said committee.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to special committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PILOTS AND PILOTAGE

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, might I ask unanimous consent of the house to proceed now with the second reading of the measure which was given first reading in this house today, an act to amend the Canada Shipping Act?

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister consent of the house to proceed with second reading of Bill No. C-80?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hees moved the second reading of Bill C-80, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to implement an arrangement with the government of the United States to coordinate the control of marine pilotage on the great lakes in the interests of safety.

The existing part VI of the Canada Shipping Act governs marine pilotage in general. However, many of the provisions of this part are not suitable for application on the great lakes where ships must cross and recross the international boundary many times during the course of a voyage. Further, one of the main features of Part VI is that acceptance of pilotage services is optional, although in some districts the payment of pilotage dues is made compulsory whether or not a pilot is employed.

On the great lakes we have large bodies of water and connecting rivers which until the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway were cut off from the sea except for comparatively small vssels. Over the years a specialized practice of navigation has grown up in these waters. They have their own collision regulations which are different in some respects from the regulations for preventing collisions at sea. Again the operators of lake ships, both Canadian and United States, used a common language which facilitated communication by radiotelephone. In fact, the use of the radiotelephone became so common on the great lakes that practices were laid down by intergovernmental treaty and the use of voice communication between ships became an added safeguard in the avoidance of collision.

Before the opening of the seaway the number of ocean ships which entered the great lakes was comparatively small, as were the ships themselves. Their masters and officers were experienced and, where necessary, they employed local mariners to assist them. With the opening of the seaway large ocean ships entered the great lakes in considerable numbers and competent pilots were required to navigate them, particularly through the restricted portions of those waters. The need for some official control was evident and early in 1959 my department organized a staff of government employed pilots for assignment on request as pilots for the waters lying between Port Weller at the lake Ontario end of the Welland canal and Sarnia at the lake Huron end of the St. Clair river. The international portion of the St. Lawrence river from St. Regis or Cornwall to lake Ontario was already provided for, as far as the availability of pilots was concerned, by an existing pilotage district.

The Canadian attitude toward pilotage, as reflected in existing law, has been that the safety of the ship is the responsibility of the master of that ship. A prudent master invariably employs a pilot when pilots are available for the navigation of waters with which he himself is not familiar, but the responsibility is his to decide whether or not he requires a pilot. In the United States, on the other hand, the employment of pilots in ports and other restricted waters has been compulsory. This attitude was reflected in an earlier proposal from some United States sources to make pilotage compulsory in all the United States waters of the great lakes basin including the United States portions of the river St. Lawrence. In view of the congestion of traffic in the connecting waters of the great lakes, we recognized the desirability of departing from our traditional attitude and agreed to collaborate with the United States government in making pilotage compulsory in these waters. However, we did not feel that the employment of local pilots was essential from a safety point of view while the ships were on the open waters of the great lakes.

The United States administration has, as a result of our discussions with them and their own study, decided that the requirements of safety would be met if among the ships' officers there is one who has had some experience of the great lakes and has by examination established that he is familiar with the great lakes rules and has an adequate knowledge of the English language. Congress has passed legislation to give effect to this decision.

Our bill is intended to provide the machinery whereby we can complement, in the Canadian waters of the great lakes, the provisions of the new United States legislation and regulations which may be made thereunder. We propose to do this by a new part VI-A of the Canada Shipping Act which will deal only with great lakes pilotage. We are thus leaving undisturbed, except for one small item, the existing pilotage provisions of part VI. This one exception is an additional section 356A which will provide, pursuant to a reciprocal arrangement, that in the case of a pilotage district made under part VI and which forms part of the great lakes basin a United States pilot may act as such without violating Canadian law.

The proposed Part VI-A starts by defining the terms "designated waters", "great lakes basin" and "registered pilot". I would draw to your attention that the wholly Canadian part of the St. Lawrence river east of St. Regis on the south side of the river opposite Cornwall is not affected by this legislation.

Section 375B is what might be termed the operative section of this bill. I should add, in parentheses, at this point that both Canadian and United States lakers will be exempted from these pilotage requirements. This section provides that no vessel of 250 gross tons or over shall be operated:

(a) in designated waters unless it is being piloted by a registered pilot; or
(b) in undesignated waters of the great lakes basin unless there is on board a registered pilot or an officer having the qualifications prescribed by regulation.

In practice the "designated" waters will we expect, be the river St. Lawrence from St. Regis west, the Welland canal, the waters joining lake Erie and lake Huron and those joining lake Huron and lake Superior. However, it will be possible for the President of the United States to designate other waters on the United States side, including perhaps certain ports or other congested areas, and for the governor in council to do likewise on the Canadian side if experience shows such action to be desirable. The undesignated waters will, in general be the open waters of the great lakes. Here an ocean ship will be navigated by her own master and officers, but unless one of them possesses certain qualifications prescribed by order in council there must be on board and available for call a registered pilot.

As stated in an aide memoire which was tabled on February 23, 1960, the qualifications which will be required of the master or one of the officers of a ship which may navigate the open waters without a registered pilot being on board, as presently contemplated, will be:

(1) possession of a master's certificate of competency valid for voyages in any part of the world;
(2) experience of at least two round trips within the preceding two years in the open or undesignated waters where the vessel will be operating;
(3) a working knowledge, as evidenced by examination, of the great lakes rules of the road;
(4) proficiency in the English language sufficient to make effective use of the radiotelephone;
(5) a knowledge of the practice of following separate courses on the great lakes, giving due regard to the suitability of such courses for deep draft vessels.

I might say that the certificate of competency which I have just described we propose to designate as "Great lakes-open water navigation certificate".

Section 375B also contains a clause providing for the exemption by the Minister of Transport of any ships from the above requirements. This clause will make it possible for the Minister of Transport to exempt regular lake vessels, both United States and Canadian, which obviously have no need of this requirement. There is also a clause to ensure the possibility of continued movement of vessels without violation of law when no registered pilots are available or in extraordinary circumstances which make it necessary for the master to avail himself of the best assistance that can be found at the time.

Section 375C sets out the powers of the governor in council in making regulations under this part. These provisions will enable us to make adjustments as experience may dictate and as may become desirable during consultations with our United States counterparts. As will be seen, the power to make regulations includes the designation of the waters in which registered pilots will be required; prescribing qualifications of a Canadian registered pilot and those required by a ship's officer to enable his ship to proceed without a registered pilot in the open waters; and also the fixing of fees to be charged for examinations and for the services rendered by Canadian registered pilots.

Subsection 2 of this section provides that the Minister of Transport may fix the number of Canadian pilots that may ge registered under this part. This is necessary because United States pilots are entitled to a fair share of the work and both sides have agreed to control the number of pilots in this manner.

The remaining provisions cover penalties for violations and provide that the act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

All these provisions are expressed or implied in the United States bill which is necessarily longer than our bill because of their different legislative system. We believe that our proposed bill will enable us to work in co-operation with the United States authorities in establishing a safe, controlled and efficient pilotage system on the great lakes.

The United States bill will not come into force until four months after the issuance of regulations made pursuant to it. Before such regulations are made we expect that there will be further discussions between Canadian and United States officials so that the regulations on either side will have substantially the same effect.

Our bill will not be proclaimed until working regulations satisfactory to both sides have been formulated. The date of proclamation should coincide with the effective date on the United States side which is likely to be prior to the opening of the 1961 season of navigation.

Following my usual practice, I propose to refer this bill to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Chevrier: May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the measure which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) discussed prior to the adjournment at six o'clock is an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, which is of importance not only because of the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway but because of its effect on those in the great lakes area. It is also of importance to the house in general.

The main features of this legislation are somewhat different from those which were envisaged last year. At that time the minister brought before the house a bill which we on this side said we thought was premature in that an agreement had not then been reached between Canada and the United States concerning the matters that were then up for discussion between the two countries. As the minister stated earlier, there was no necessity for this kind of legislation prior to the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway but because of the seaway and for other reasons as well it became necessary to enter into discussions with the United States to ascertain if the minds of both countries were ad idem so far as pilotage is concerned. One important reason was the increase in the number of ships that moved inland between the lakes and Canadian ports—that is, domestic traffic—as well as ocean-going ships that moved from points on the continent of Europe and elsewhere to the inland waters of the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin.

As I have pointed out, it then became necessary to enter into discussions with the United States. When the matter was up for discussion last year I suggested to the minister and to the government that they should give consideration to the establishment of a committee on pilotage as was done with respect to the committee on tolls established for the seaway. In the case of the tolls, as the house knows, it was a matter which was quite successful. An international committee composed of I have forgotten how many Canadians and how many United States citizens—I think three on each side—after consultation with each other was able to establish a tariff of tolls and then, following consultation, had those tolls submitted to the public following hearings that took place in both Canada and the United States.

It seemed to me that if something akin thereto was followed by both countries in so far as pilotage was concerned it would be extremely helpful. While that may not have been followed to the letter I think there was a committee from the Department of Transport which dealt with an opposite committee in the United States composed of members of the coastguard and other such services.

I know that at one time the United States held very strong views with regard to pilotage because they had had some experience on the Panama canal. I think they would have liked Canada to follow the same practice on the Welland canal and in the great lakes area as was followed there. At the time the matter was up for discussion last year I made this statement which can be found at page 2337 of Hansard of April 7, 1959:

> It seems to me that we should not be asked to pass this kind of legislation until we know what the legislation in the United States congress is going to be. Last year there was a bill brought before congress; it did not go through. We know what the nature of that bill is; I have a copy of it here in my file. But the bill which is now before the United States congress, even if it does go through all of its stages, cannot possibly be passed until October or November of this year. So I ask the question: Are we being asked to pass this kind of legislation before we know what the concurrent legislation on the other side is likely to be? The minister a moment ago used the expression "reciprocal legislation". Well, this is not reciprocal legislation. It is unilateral legislation. It cannot be reciprocal legislation until the two parties have agreed to what they want in the legislation.

After a plea which I made at that time giving additional reasons why the bill should not be discussed at that time the minister very kindly decided to withdraw the bill and enter into discussions with the United States with a view to reaching an agreement. Therefore the objections which we on this side of the house might have had to the bill last year no longer exist at this time in so far as this is concerned. I take it now that in effect an agreement has been reached between Canada and the United States on the subject of pilotage on the great lakes and I presume we will have the benefit of the evidence before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to analyse what transpired during the course of these negotiations.

The part to which I had reference and which came before the United States congress last year and which had not been passed at that time, in fact which lapsed and died with the prorogation of the United States congress, has now been removed. I believe this year it has been approved or is about to pass the last stage of congress. Therefore, I repeat, the objections which were raised to this kind of legislation no longer obtain at this time.

There are two other matters that should be discussed. One is that the bill no longer contains those amendments to the Canada Shipping Act which were envisaged last year and which meant in effect the abolition of the pilotage districts of Montreal and Quebec. I commend the minister on having taken those clauses out of the bill. I think it would have been a mistake to abolish those districts which have been in existence now for close to 200 years, where pilots rely on navigation for their living and where over those many, many years the trade or profession of pilot has been handed down from father to son through many generations. I will not spend any time dealing with that but I think the government and the minister were well advised to withdraw those clauses which I thought at that time were objectionable.

We are now left with a part which deals exclusively with pilotage on the great lakes, and it is to known as part VI-A. It is rather difficult to comment upon the terms of this bill which, as Your Honour knows, appeared on the order paper for first reading the first time this morning and which we consented to allow to receive its second reading so that it could be discussed and then sent on to committee. It is rather difficult I say, to comment on the various clauses without having read the bill more carefully. It is not impossible but it is rather difficult to deal seriatim with the clauses which are before us. I have no intention of doing that.

During the dinner recess I had an opportunity to read the statement made by the minister earlier and I think I should like to leave the matter in this way. Since the bill will be sent to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, it will be possible there to hear the evidence of the departmental officers and I presume also the evidence of anyone else who may feel affected or aggrieved or, in fact, helped by this legislation. I do hope the minister will not call the meeting too soon so that it will be possible for those who are interested in the bill to make the representations they desire to make.

In the course of his remarks the minister said nothing about the attitude of the pilots toward this legislation. In his reply perhaps he would make some reference to that. What is the attitude of the pilots in the Montreal-Ottawa-Kingston area? What is the attitude of the pilots which were established by the department in order to meet a situation which was aggravated by certain circumstances which were discussed in the house last year? What is the attitude of the pilots who will be operating in the restricted area and the designated waters under the terms of authorization by appointment through the governor in council? There have been no indications of any attitude in so far as they are concerned.

I ask these questions because last year there was considerable agitation in all fields of navigation with respect to this legislation. There was agitation among pilots in the areas extending all the way from the lower St. Lawrence right up to the head of the lakes. Representations were made by the shipping federation of Canada and also by various other groups. That is why I think the minister is well advised to send this legislation to a committee. In the committee we should find out what are the views of those various associations. There we shall have an opportunity to study the bill more carefully. I also think we should get some indication of the effect of this legislation either from our own officers in the Department of Transport or from witnesses from other places.

I do not know whether the minister has given any consideration to calling witnesses from the United States to indicate the necessity for the first clause and a subsequent clause of the bill. I do not know that when the United States legislation was brought before congress Canadian witnesses gave evidence. In fact, I think it was Canada which was responsible to a large extent for getting the United States to change its attitude on this legislation. If I remember well, the state department, the St. Lawrence seaway corporation, the United States entity which built the United States share of the seaway, and the department of commerce were all favourable to the Canadian point of view. I think it was only the United States coastguard which held strongly to the view that the pilotage should apply to all of the great lakes areas, both restricted an open waters as well, and it was the Canadian group which was successful in getting the United States, in large part at least, to amend their views in that respect.

Perhaps I have said more than I intended to say at this time but I leave the matter with this final word. It seems to me that the first thing we should want to know about in committee and be apprised of in this house for further discussion when the bill comes up in committee of the whole is the kind of agreement which was reached with the United States.

I am pleased that the designated areas have been indicated already by the minister, so that we know now that those areas are in conformity with the views which were held by Canada during the time of the negotiations with the United States.

So, without saying more, I resume my seat confident that when we have the various witnesses before the committee we will then be able to get not only a better idea of this legislation but will also be able to ascertain what in effect will be its result upon pilotage in the great lakes-St. Lawrence basin.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, we will not keep the minister long. We know he is anxious to go out and get the good word from New Brunswick. When the bill was originally brought in a year ago we thought it was a bad bill and the evidence which was brought out in the Senate committee which investigated the matter last year was tending to substantiate this view when the minister, as a result of the request of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), which I would have made had I had the opportunity to make it, withdrew the bill. We now have a much simpler and more clear-cut bill. On the face of it we are for it and it only remains to be seen what the detailed information will be in the committee.

I think it is worth making one background statement, Mr. Speaker. The reason I originally became concerned about this matter was through the great lakes pilots association, a group which was in effect, in their terms anyway, locked out by the shipping federation of Canada. It was a type of union, although the classification of the great lakes pilots association as a union brought some disagreement. Two summers ago we had in effect a lockout or strike on the lakes and the great lakes pilots association took vigorous exception to the action of the Department of Transport in failing to back them up or to require the shipping federation of Canada to act in a certain way.

There were fears expressed, largely as a result of statements by the United States C.I.O. unions that control pilotage on the United States side, that pilotage on the great lakes was going to become a wonderful example of featherbedding. There were pictures of three pilots on a large foreign ship being paid at the rate of approximately $85 a day, and naturally shipping interests both in Canada and the United States became quite concerned about this. I might say that the Canadian pilots in the great lakes pilots association also became concerned about this picture of the kind of ramp that the Americans were planning.

Last year the government, in order to head off any difficulties, made the pilots temporary civil servants and now that the minister—I remind him again that he is a great socializer—has the Canadian pilots on the great lakes in the government service it looks as though this is going to become a permanent arrangement. The stumbling block with respect to legislation last year in relation to the Americans really lay with Admiral Richmond, the head of the United States coastguard service. Admiral Richmond was strongly against the Canadian arrangement because he thought it was not strict enough in its requirements as to competence and that giving Canadians the power to give a temporary licence to foreign masters who came to Montreal and were proceeding thence up the great lakes would open the United States parts of the lakes to grave dangers.

I have a copy of the report of the United States senate committee on interstate and foreign commerce with respect to bill S.3019 which is the United States counterpart of the bill before us. It was reported out of the committee several weeks ago and I think it is of interest to have a brief review from the report. It reads in part as follows:

> Opening of the St. Lawrence seaway in 1959 has greatly complicated vessel safety problems on the great lakes by making possible entry into the lakes of ocean vessels of higher tonnage and in far larger numbers than previously was the case. In addition to the 2,206 United States and Canadian vessels operating on the lakes exclusively or in large part, some 1,033 foreign commercial vessels and 61 vessels under U.S. registry made round voyages on the lakes in 1959. All indications are that this total, of foreign vessels particularly, will increase in the years ahead.

This is the interesting point in view of Admiral Richmond's objections of last year.

> The upsurge of foreign vessels navigating U.S. waters of the great lakes, and the entry of U.S. ocean vessels into the area, present a definite threat to safe navigation. There is presently statutory requirement for the use of qualified pilots on both U.S. and Canadian vessels navigating only on the lakes. However, operation of the ocean-going vessels, without skilled lake pilots, as evidenced by the reported accidents and near accidents during the first year's operation of the St. Lawrence seaway, presents a threat of considerable magnitude not only to the lake vessels, but also to the ocean vessels whose officers, in some cases, may not be sufficiently familiar with the great lakes rules of the road, the restricted waters, etc.

The report goes on to set out the reasons why the senate passed this bill, indicating, for example, that the shipping federation of Canada has approved it. I would construe that these paragraphs emphasizing the dangers of foreign shipping are really evidence that the Canadians, through the minister's department, must have made compromises with the Americans. It is very difficult for us to see the compromises because the bill is still in skeleton form. The interesting point that was made in both the senate and house of representatives committees in the United States was that the United States merchant marine institute and the United States pilots, as I understand it, asked that the powers as to establishing various areas and the requirement be left with congress rather than with the executive branch. This problem is examined in the report of the senate committee and it is felt that in order to have any kind of decent co-operation with the committee the executive must be in charge of the regulations in the United States.

Therefore we have a situation where the United States congress has in respect given over control in this particular matter to the executive, working through the commerce department which will handle the licensing of pilots, and the coastguard which will judge their competence. If we follow the congressional system, this is a concession on the part of congress and indicates that they are putting a great deal of faith in the negotiations and the arrangements to come with the Canadians.

But in the bill we have before us in this house we have very few details. I missed the minister's statement as to just what areas are going to be designated as restricted areas for pilotage but I am very curious and will expect details in the committee in order to know what the situation is going to be in the St. Mary's river, lakehead and Duluth areas because this bill, this report—I must not give the impression it is a bill—from the United States senate committee indicates that they expect the St. Mary's river will be a restricted area.

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member did not hear my statement I would be very glad to give him the information he is asking for.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Fisher: It was about the St. Mary's river.

Mr. Hees: I have it right here. The restricted areas are four: first of all, the St. Lawrence river between Cornwall and lake Ontario; second, the Welland canal; third, the connecting waters between lake Erie and lake Huron, the Detroit river, lake St. Clair and the St. Clair river; and, fourth, the St. Mary's river between lake Huron and lake Superior.

Mr. Fisher: That generally conforms with what the Americans expected. So it appears that the relationships after the passing of this bill, given the passing of it, depend completely so far as their amicable future is concerned upon negotiations between the Department of Transport and the United States department of commerce. We expect that this will not necessarily be easy because the Americans have an added pressure under which the minister's department does not operate.

The United States, as I pointed out to the minister before, believes in free enterprise and in trying to push it as far as possible. They are not creating a situation in which their pilots become civil servants, as the minister has done, because these pilots in the United States are organized in unions. Operating on this free enterprise basis they are always going to be, I would judge, pressing forward complaints about the ratio of pilotage as between Canadian pilots and United States pilots. As the minister knows, there have already been complaints from the New York and Ohio pilots. This indicates to me that we must expect to hear in committee what kind of continuing system is planned in order to keep this relationship balanced as fairly as possible. It would seem to me we need some kind of continuing small committee perhaps, composed of representatives from each side and a third party as a referee or arbitrator. I do not believe we should kid ourselves that this arrangement is going to work smoothly and automatically once it is passed.

At any rate, the point I wanted to make in connection with this bill which is still not crystal clear—here again we have to wait for the regulations—is what is going to be the position of the foreign masters? This is a sensitive point in so far as the United States pilots are concerned. I can only offer the minister the benefit of the experience we have had in our particular area as a result of talking to people on tugs around the elevators. They are in general agreement that the foreign "salties" as they are called are not nearly as capably handled as the lake ships. This is not because the foreign masters are not as good as the lake masters but because of exceptional difficulties within the great lakes system and the fact these ocean ships have a higher freeboard and do not have the handy winches and controls that the lake ships have. I would suggest to the minister that he make sure when the regulations are drawn up that very tight control is kept on the giving of licences of any kind to foreign masters.

I believe he needs especially, since the United States is not going to have this right to award licences which the minister's officials are going to have, to safeguard his responsibility to make sure that the licences of Canadian pilots are respected. I hope, for that reason, he will make sure that the level of competence required from foreign masters is of such a degree that it will not demean in any way the certificates or licences that Canadian pilots hold.

I would hope also that the minister will be prepared in committee to give us some idea as to whether he plans to make this pilotage service a permanent part of his department by bringing it fully under the requirements of the Civil Service Act. I believe this about sums up the points I wanted to make in connection with this particular bill. I reiterate that we support it. We hope to hear more about it and in general our views are quite compatible with those expressed by the hon. member for Laurier. We think it is a marked improvement over what the minister presented formerly.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): I do not intend to say very much at this time regarding this bill. However, I should like to say that I approve, in principle, the passage of such a measure. I am looking forward to having a good look at the bill and hearing it discussed in committee. I should like also to commend the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) for the manner in which he has moved into this problem of pilotage on the great lakes which two years ago was in quite a muddle. Last year he took the first step which was to put the pilots more or less under the civil service by having them paid by the department. I feel that was an excellent move.

When the bill was first considered I was of the opinion that perhaps pilots should be required all the way through the great lakes. However, I believe that the way the bill is presently framed whereby it will not be necessary to have first class pilots on the open lakes but certificates to be issued to navigators, solves the problem. I feel this provision will be reasonably satisfactory to the pilots themselves.

In so far as the pilots themselves are concerned, I think they will approve of the fact it is not going to be the policy of the government to require class B or second class pilots on the open waters; that was something that the pilots did not like. I believe this new set-up under which certificates will be issued will more or less solve the problem.

As I said at the beginning, there is not too much we can say about the bill now. I am certainly going to look forward to hearing the bill discussed in committee.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway has made changes in the shipping act imperative. With the advent of the St. Lawrence seaway we have had a demonstration of its value through the number of ships which have used this great highway of commerce during its first year of operation. The result has been that the lakehead port cities of Fort William and Port Arthur, for example, have been brought to second place in terms of tonnage. The port of Montreal shipped 17,985,975 tons; the lakehead shipped 12,900,000 tons; Vancouver gained third place with 11,845,810 tons; Hamilton was fourth with 7,488,850 tons and Toronto was fifth with only 4,798,435 tons.

I am advised that already this year 60 ocean freighters have docked at the lakehead which represents about half of last year's total. This augurs well for a substantial increase in shipping tonnage in 1960, and eventually the lakehead might overtake even the great port of Montreal. During the 1959 season there were 2,120 arrivals at the lakehead. It is, therefore, only reasonable to expect that the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur will request that the lakehead harbour be given the status of an ocean port. I ask the minister that the request of the joint transportation committee of the Fort William-Port Arthur chamber of commerce and the lakehead port association be given serious consideration.

We are pleased with the government's decision to proceed with the construction of the seaway terminal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, unfortunately this bill, as I understand it, relates exclusively to pilotage, and I hope the hon. member is coming to that subject.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, during the 1959 session of parliament, in anticipation that a change in the Canada Shipping Act was about to be considered by parliament, several organizations such as the St. Lawrence river pilots association and others submitted briefs, copies of which were furnished to hon. members, urging the government to consider the safety factor in the seaway in the light of greatly increased traffic advocating compulsory pilotage. These submissions have no doubt been studied and every suggestion considered carefully by the government. The reason for delaying any action at that time, according to the statement of the minister, was because similar legislation was being studied by the United States congress. Our government decided to wait and to introduce amendments to the act which would correspond to changes approved by the United States congress, and that is what appears to be the case now.

This concern over pilotage is shared by the board of marine underwriters. It appears now that a compromise has been adopted to the effect that a pilot is required to be on duty in the narrow channels, as outlined by the minister a moment ago, and in congested areas but not on the long stretches of open water.

With regard to foreign ships, there is an objection to the granting of a B licence to masters and officers of these ships, some of which may present a distinct hazard especially if there happens to be a language barrier. The United States have solved their pilotage problem. Their solution is to leave it to the president to decide what parts of the lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway within the territorial waters of the United States require the use of pilots on foreign ships. I am not suggesting that the minister should assume the power to make these decisions. As pilots would be required in the narrow waters and not on the open lakes, a special licence granted to a ship's captain certifying that he is familiar with the rules of navigation on the great lakes should be sufficient.

Suggestions have been made that Canada should enact legislation to govern the movement of trade within Canadian waters. This idea is a good one because British and United States ships move bulk and general cargo between one Canadian port to another. Canadian ships cannot go to the lakehead, pick up a cargo and deliver it to any other port in the United States, but a United States registered ship can go to the lakehead, pick up a cargo and deliver it to any port in Canada. If that is so, then I submit that there are other amendments to this act which would be quite in order.

It is generally conceded that the greater proportion of world commerce is still being carried by sea going ships. Notwithstanding all other means of modern transportation, nothing can touch them in efficiency, low costs and dependability. Canada owes a great deal to the power of the merchant marine in the development of natural resources, and our industries thrive and prosper because millions of tons of goods and materials move in and out of Canadian ports every year.

[Mr. Badanai.]

We are fortunate in having a few shipping companies operating under Canadian registry whose owners happily are men of patriotism, vision and faith and courage in the future of our country. These men were chiefly responsible for retaining for Canada a semblance of a national merchant marine. One of these companies is the Paterson Steamship Lines which was founded by Senator N. M. Paterson with its head office Fort William.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid the hon. member is getting away from the substance again. I am sorry to interrupt him but the subject before the house is not very broad and I think hon. members would prefer that we discuss it and that it be sent to the committee rather than our dealing with transportation problems generally.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling. It is not my intention to do anything but to accede to your wise counsel. I shall reserve the remarks I intended to make with regard to the future of our merchant marine to the appropriate time when we discuss the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are just two or three questions I would like to answer. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) asked when this matter would go before the committee. I have talked with the chairman of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines today and I told him I was proposing to the house that this bill should be referred to his committee. I understand from him that he will suggest to the steering committee and to the committee itself that this matter be brought before it a week from tomorrow. If that is satisfactory to the committee then that will be done, but as the house knows it is up to the committee.

The hon. member for Laurier also asked if I could give him some advice regarding the attitude of the pilots on this matter. I have not talked to them myself or to the pilots association, but it is my understanding from my officials that the pilots are reasonably satisfied with this measure. The hon. member also asked about the attitude of the United satisfied with our bill which is very close States government, and it is also my information from my officials that they are quite in intent to theirs.

The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) expressed concern that we would perhaps be giving fairly freely a pilotage certificate or licence to foreign masters. I am glad to assure him and the house that that is not the case. In my opening remarks on this matter when I introduced second reading just before the supper recess I mentioned that the certificates which would be given to those who might qualify on foreign ships to navigate them in the open waters of the great lakes would be known as great lakes—open water navigation certificates. The purpose of that designation is to make it very clear to our own registered pilots that this is not in any way a second class or B class pilotage certificate; it is simply a certificate which will enable that member of the staff of the foreign freighter to navigate the ship in the open waters of the great lakes. It is in no sense of the term a pilotage certificate.

The hon. member for Port Arthur also asked when we intended to bring all of our pilots into the civil service. As I think I have explained to the house on one or two occasions, we like the set-up which exists now between ourselves and the pilots on the great lakes where they are civil servants. I have indicated to all pilotage districts that at any time they wish to enter into that kind of relationship with the government we will be very glad to have them as civil servants. It is up to the pilots themselves to indicate to us when they would wish to change their present status and become civil servants of the government.

Mr. Speaker, I think they are the principal questions which were asked. As hon. members who have spoken have indicated, there will be plenty of opportunity in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines when it meets to ask any questions which they would like to ask. My officials will be there; they are well acquainted with all the details of this important matter and will be only too glad to answer any questions which may be put to them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

SUPPLY

Mr. Churchill: It is the understanding—and this is by agreement—that we should now proceed with a continuation of the study of the estimates of the Department of Transport.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

555. Departmental administration—further amount required, $68,350.

Mr. Badanai: A few moments ago I was trying to point out the importance of having a Canadian merchant marine. The Canadian great lakes shipping industry could provide the foundation upon which to build an international commercial fleet worthy of a major trading nation. During the war, Canada built training and fighting ships. Some of these were built at the Port Arthur shipbuilding yard which at present is not doing much. However, this yard has the experience in both management and personnel to build ships for any purpose. It is regrettable that many ships of Canadian registry were built in foreign shipyards and that many more are being built abroad. The federal government could bolster dwindling employment in Canadian shipyards by encouraging shipbuilding in every possible way.

The Canadian shipbuilding and ship repairing association in one of its letters had this to say, and I quote:

> Building ships or manufacturing goods in Canada benefits the national economy as a whole. A large percentage of the price of a ship, probably 40 per cent, finds its way into public treasuries as taxes on income, on profits, on real estate, on the sale of goods bought with the incomes created by the total operations in the building of a ship in Canada. In the case of a foreign-built ship, all such taxes go to another country.
> Other considerations which apply particularly to shipbuilding are:
> 1. Employment: Shipbuilding not only provides jobs for highly skilled men in the shipyards but also provides jobs for a great variety of types of labour in widely dispersed small communities and big cities of Canada where mines, mills, and manufacturing plants, producing ships' components and materials, are located.
> 2. Security: Ships are of vital importance to Canada. A country which lives on its ability to transport goods by water cannot afford to depend on other countries for ships. In emergencies they may not be available. Canada needs its own shipbuilding industry to maintain its economic independence and political sovereignty just as much as it needs its own defence forces. Indeed its navy could not operate in troubled times without Canadian shipyards.

I commend those sentiments to the minister and to the government. We are subsidizing wheat growers, hog producers, egg producers, coal mines, gold mines and railways; why not give a little help to the shipbuilding industry? Why not re-establish the Canadian merchant marine which was allowed to disappear so ingloriously a couple of years ago? Whatever the circumstances surrounding the disposal of those ships, the action taken at that time has not added to the stature of our nation. If a mistake was made—and I submit that the sale of those eight ships to Cuba was a mistake—let us admit it and renew our efforts with the vigour which is the characteristic of everything Canadian.

I realize that enthusiasm for the idea of a subsidized merchant fleet would probably be challenged on the ground that it would result in additional taxes, but I submit that the benefits resulting from a policy of assistance to shipbuilding and the development of a merchant fleet would more than offset the cost of such a program.

Not long ago I saw a report in a newspaper to the effect that Greece intends to spend more than $10 million to build a fleet of six freighters for the great lakes-Mediterranean trade. This means that the Hellenic lines will be entering the St. Lawrence seaway for the first time. These ships will bear cargoes to and from such ports as Naples, Istanbul and Beirut, and they are expected to be put into service by the summer of 1961.

Where will these freighters be built? Not in Canada. Our exports and imports will be carried through the great lakes by vessels of other countries.

Canada builds fewer ships than Finland. Our deep-sea fleet which ten years ago numbered some 200 vessels, is now less than a dozen and these are mainly oil tankers sailing between the United States and Canadian ports.

Our shores front on three great oceans, the Atlantic, the Pacific and the Arctic. I especially want to underline the reference to the Arctic ocean. If the Prime Minister's vision ever comes to fruition and we witness an increased development of the north the Arctic ocean will become a great sea lane. In addition we have the great lakes system which in itself could be classed as another ocean.

Despite all this other nations build ships for us. Other nations operate ships for us. All this is true because we say we cannot possibly afford to build and operate ships ourselves. Then we wonder why we have so many unemployed. The time has surely come to sound a clarion call for the reconstruction and expansion of a national merchant marine. I commend the suggestion to the minister and to the government. They have the power to initiate a movement to bring back our merchant marine and establish our nation in the forefront of seafaring nations of the world. We are the third largest trading nation of the world but so far as shipping is concerned our position is not much superior to that of Switzerland. I sincerely trust that the government will take action as quickly as possible.

I feel strongly about this, Mr. Chairman, because as Canadians we are often prone to boast of our national resources. We boast about what we have under the ground and above it but we say little about the exploitation of what we have in our own country for the benefit of Canadians and for the benefit of those who will come to our shores in the years ahead. I commend to the government consideration of this great challenge that faces us from coast to coast.

I know that objections will be raised. Some will say that this is all nonsense and that it would cost millions of dollars. It probably would represent a large expenditure but it would be worth it. It would be a Canadian enterprise of which we would be proud and in years to come we could look back upon it as something worth while. Let this 24th parliament take action.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to comment as to what is the attitude of the government toward the policies now being followed by the railroads with respect to curtailing important services at an exceedingly rapid rate and discharging in large numbers men who have had many years' service, thus causing untold hardship to employees of long standing. I should like to know what is the attitude of this government Is it one of saying that the railroads' business is their own, we do not concern ourselves with the policies of either of the railways, if they lay off men with 25 or 30 years of service and put them out on the street and these men are unable to obtain a pension it is no concern of ours; or does the government believe this is a serious matter? If so, what is the attitude of the minister and of the government in respect to this situation?

Already this session I have mentioned the lay-offs that took place at Moncton and those that took place at London because of the pending transfer of the Canadian National Railways car shops from that city. The minister and the government seemed to take the attitude that this is really no concern of the Department of Transport or the government, that it is purely a question of C.N.R. or C.P.R. policy. The minister and the government appear to take the position that they are above and aloof from these situations.

I have frequently travelled by railroad across Canada. I am absolutely appalled by the number of railway employees who have sat with me and told me the same story. Although they have had 20, 25 or 30 years' service they are in danger of being laid off. They tell me that some of their fellow workers in similar occupations have already been laid off and that there seems to be no concern for their future on the part of the minister, the government or the railway companies.

I believe in progress and I believe that railways must be run on a business like basis. At the same time I do not think profits should come so far above the question of the welfare and livelihood of people whose whole working lives have been devoted to railway service. The railroads today seem to be bent on a policy of curtailing many of the services provided in the past and this is being done as rapidly as possible. Not only are they hurting their own employees of long standing for whom they apparently have no concern whatever but in my opinion they are unduly curtailing services in many parts of Canada. They are curtailing passenger service on all but the main lines and this is being done even on some of the important lines. They appear determined to curtail passenger service even further. They are closing railway stations all across the country on a large scale. Every time a station is closed railway revenues fall off, the communities affected have fewer services and more communities are placed in a difficult position with respect to maintaining their normal operation.

Sectionmen are being laid off. Sections are being combined with fewer men. I am wondering if this does not contribute to the great increase of railway accidents? Perhaps a lack of proper maintenance help has contributed to the increased number of accidents.

The services I have mentioned are being curtailed all across Canada. Once a station has been closed for a few years the next move by the company is to remove the caretaker engaged to provide minimum services at that point.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to whether or not the Crowsnest pass rates are in jeopardy. I do not think they are. I do not think that all the propaganda that can be commanded by the C.N.R. or C.P.R. against the rates will result in moving any public minded person who has a knowledge both of this country and its railways or in moving this or any other government to dispense with the Crowsnest pass rates. If I had been making these remarks a week or so ago I would have said the same thing. In the light of recent political events in two provinces I am even more certain that this government will have nothing whatever to do with any abandonment of the Crowsnest pass rates.

I am pleased that I have that conviction because I think the Crowsnest pass rates in this country were part and parcel of an agreement of long standing. One part of the agreement had to do with these particular rates, but another part of the agreement gave very substantial advantages to the railways of this country. What I an wondering is whether there is some kind of back room agreement whereby the railway companies will not be allowed to get higher freight rates on grain but where, in return for having to accept the Crowsnest pass rates in the future, they will be given the green light for a further and an even more rapid curtailment of railway services. I think this is what is happening. I think that for all practical purposes today the board of transport commissioners have shut their eyes to the public demand that minimum services be maintained. For all practical purposes today the board of transport commissioners are acting purely and simply as agents of the railway companies of this country and are doing their bidding when it comes to curtailment of services, the closing of stations and the reduction of train services of all kinds.

This is being pushed even a step farther. Now we see a number of instances where the railway companies are applying to the board of transport commissioners for permission to abandon railway lines. Then they will be pulling up the tracks. As a matter of fact, they are already pulling up one set —that is, the C.P.R.—of the double tracks between Moose Jaw and Swift Current. They argue that the double trackage is not needed there. The railways are determined to pull up a large part of the railway branch lines in this country. I do not think it is confined to any one area, but certainly the railways are bent and determined on tearing up a very substantial mileage of trackage on the prairies and on the abandonment of a very large number of branch lines.

The people of this country have an economic interest in the maintenance of the Crowsnest pass rates. They need to watch that what is being saved on the one hand by the maintenance of the Crowsnest pass rates is not lost on the other by the abandonment of railway lines. I notice that the minister thinks this is all very amusing, but it is not amusing for the people to have their railway lines abandoned.

Mr. Hees: I do not find it amusing at all. I was not smiling at what the hon. member was saying; I was listening to what he was saying.

Mr. Argue: The minister was not; he was talking to his officials.

Mr. Hees: I happened to ask one of my officials a question. Something he said amused me. It was not what the hon. member was saying. I find these matters very serious, as he knows perfectly well, just as this government does. I feel just as keenly about these matters as he does.

Mr. Argue: If the minister feels as keenly as he now suggests, it is a strange thing that he pays no attention and that he giggles with his officials.

Mr. Pallett: That is a complete distortion and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. Hees: If I may say so, I was not giggling; I happened to smile. Perhaps the hon. member and his party do not know what such a thing is.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to pay some attention if he can.

Mr. Hees: I have paid plenty of attention; I am listening very attentively.

Mr. Argue: This is a very serious matter to the producers and to the communities that are being faced with an abandonment of their railway lines, perhaps the tearing up of railway lines and the complete disintegration of ther communities.

The producers of western Canada are very much concerned that the Crowsnest pass rates be maintained, but it will be of little advantage if in the maintenance of those rates the railway lines going to their marketing points in many instances are removed so that the saving, whatever it may be, of 10 cents or 15 cents a bushel that is brought about by the maintenance of the Crowsnest pass rates —and nobody knows what the saving is because nobody knows what the railways would get if the board of transport commissioners and the government decided that those rates were not to be maintained—is eaten up by a loss of the trackage to their local marketing points, and they are forced to haul their products a much longer distance. If a person who has been accustomed to hauling his grain a distance of six or eight miles is forced by the subsequent abandonment of railway lines to haul his grain 15 or 20 miles he will find there is a very substantial increase in his costs.

I would ask the minister to tell the committee what attention the government gives to the necessity of the maintenance of railway services in this country, and whether the government has given any thought whatsoever to the policies of the railway companies in endeavouring to have branch lines abandoned in the country. I would ask the minister also to tell the committee whether the government has given any consideration to the plight of the thousands of railway workers who are being displaced, and whether any study is going on in the department of the minister, or in the Department of Labour, on the plight of those people and what their job opportunities may be in the future. I do not think it is in keeping with a modern society that we should cast off on the labour market after 25 or 30 years of diligent service those people who have been employees of the railway companies and have provided excellent service to the people of this country without any consideration whatsoever for their future.

The firemen, because of a very strong union, have been able to make an agreement which to some extent at any rate has protected the livelihood of men in that occupation. As I understand it, the agreement they now have does not prevent modernization. It merely means that the people who are in that occupation at the present time cannot be summarily dismissed without any consideration for their future. I do not know that that is the kind of pattern that could or should be applied to other sections of the railways, but I do feel that the railways of this country have some obligation to employees who have invested their lives in the occupation of railroading. I think the government should tell this committee very frankly what consideration it has given to the very serious situation in which many railroaders now find themselves, and also what consideration the government is giving to the maintenance of a minimum railway service in this country.

As I now see it, in the headlong rush toward so-called modernization with the sole objective of making profits both the employees of the railway companies and the public as a whole are likely to suffer. Last night I was at the new Ottawa airport terminal building and as a Canadian I was exceedingly proud of this magnificent building. It has been placed there because governments of this country have believed it was a good investment. The air lines are able to make use of the services provided by this very substantial public investment.

The only reason I point this out is to say that in the field of transportation there must be a yardstick applied which is not purely the yardstick of profit. There must be a yardstick applied which takes into account the well-being and welfare of the employees and the welfare of and services available to the general public.

Mr. Hees: Could I answer the hon. member as we go along? I should like to answer some of the comments he has made. The hon. member for Assiniboia brought up the question of the relationship between the government and the management of the railway in the day to day management of the affairs of the railway. I should like to point out to him something which I feel sure he knows. Many years ago parliament decided that the management of the C.N.R. should be 100 per cent in the hands of the railway management. The act passed at that time specifically prohibited the government from interfering in the day to day management of the railway. That is the law.

As to the concern of the government with regard to the service provided by Canadian National Railways, I want to assure the hon. member that the government is very much interested in and concerned about the service that the C.N.R. provides to the people of Canada. It is a vital service and the government is very much concerned about it. It pays a great deal of attention to it and discusses it with the management.

This government and this ministry are also very vitally concerned about lay-offs, any lay-offs. As I have pointed out to the house on many occasions, I and the government are very much disturbed at even one lay-off. It is a dreadful thing when even one man has to be deprived of a job. We feel the situation very sincerely and acutely because not only is the man deprived of employment but there is also an effect on his morale and that of his family. We understand that. We have talked over this matter many times with the management of the C.N.R. They also feel the same way about it and they have assured me over and over and over again on the many occasions I have discussed the matter with them that they do everything possible to keep the employee on the job as long as he possibly can be employed, as long as there is work for him to do. But they have pointed out that because of changes in the nature of the work, because of technological improvements and things of that kind they simply cannot employ a man to do nothing when there is literally no work for him to do.

I feel sure the hon. member will agree that that it is sensible, undesirable though it is that the man should be without a job. When it becomes necessary to deprive men of work because there is no work for them to do the management have assured me that they take every possible step to see that these people are put in some other job in every possible case. I have discussed these matters on many occasions with the management and they have assured me, and I believe them, that this is so. The men concerned with management with whom I have talked are sincere men who mean what they say.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great care to what has been said by the hon. member for Fort William in his discussion of ship construction, navigation and a merchant marine for Canada, and I find myself in agreement with what he had to say. I have also listened carefully to what was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I must tell the Minister of Transport that I am sure that he, like all other members of the house, must of necessity feel badly when men employed by Canadian National Railways are laid off, and the Canadian Pacific railway too for that matter. But feeling badly about a situation does not remedy it. It is not enough for the minister to say what he has said this evening and has repeated on a number of other occasions, that he is convinced in his own mind that Canadian National Railways, and the Canadian Pacific railway for that matter, do not lay off men unless they are convinced there is no further work for them. That may be so but that does not help the situation.

Notwithstanding that, I understand the fact is that some 7,000 or 8,000 men have been laid off by Canadian National Railways. I have on my desk a letter that reached me during the course of last week from certain interests indicating that there are many lay-offs on the Canadian Pacific railway. While I know that the minister is not responsible for the Canadian Pacific railway, nevertheless I also know that he is interested in railway operations from one end of the country to the other, and today the operations of railways are perhaps more difficult not only in Canada but in the United States than they have been in many years.

While I find myself in general agreement with what was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia with respect to lay-offs on the railways, I must say that I cannot support his rather severe criticism of the board of transport commissioners. I do not believe that the board of transport commissioners is an instrument or tool of Canadian National Railways or any other railway. The board of transport commissioners was established by act of parliament and they put into effect the sections of the Railway Act under which the railways make applications. If we in this parliament want to meet the situation which the hon. member for Assiniboia has raised, and there is a great deal to be said for what he has advanced; if we want to change the position we must change the act because as the law now stands Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific railway have the right under the act to proceed as they do.

Mr. Argue: With the approval of the board.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member was not listening to me. He was talking to his friends.

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Chevrier: I said that the board of transport commissioners is bound by the Railway Act and must apply the Railway Act when an application is made, unfortunate as this may be. I know that when I held the position now held by the Minister of Transport a similar situation occurred in my own riding and there was absolutely nothing I could do about it except to explain the position to those affected thereby. I am talking now about the New York Central railway which ran from one end of my former riding of Stormont to the other. The board of transport commissioners was bound by the Railway Act. Let the hon. member not misunderstand me. I am sympathetic to those people who live along a railway line and find themselves deprived of railway services but I think the remedy perhaps lies in another direction by way of amendment to the act.

However, I did not rise for that purpose but for another. It may be that the minister may not like the purpose of this discussion, but nevertheless I hope he will listen to it because I intend to discuss this matter with the sole object of being constructive in the criticism I have to offer of the minister, his officials and those of the Department of Public Works.

I speak now of the joint team which has been established by the two departments in connection with port facilities along the St. Lawrence. The minister may find this annoying, but even if he does smile I will not be offended because I know that on occasions I have found myself in the same circumstances as the minister does.

I made a motion many weeks ago asking for the production in this house of documents which the minister had discussed, namely the 29 reports that were made on ports extending from the lower St. Lawrence in the province of Quebec to, I believe, within the metropolitan area of Toronto at Oshawa. This motion was defeated. The government, with its huge majority, voted it down. I want to deal with the manner in which that was done as compared with what was done in former years.

The minister, in the discussion in the house and in the committee, ridiculed the idea of an economic survey of the St. Lawrence seaway as I had suggested. I hold in my hand a document prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce, economic research division, in January, 1951 on the effect of the St. Lawrence seaway upon the Canadian economy. This is a very important and fairly lengthy document containing 144 pages and it deals, amongst other things, with the case for the St. Lawrence seaway; the case for the St. Lawrence power development; the potential water traffic upon the seaway; the minimum estimate of water benefits; the capital costs and carrying charges; and last, but not least, about 25 pages dealing with the effect upon regional and special economic interests of Canada, particularly the prairie provinces, Ontario, Quebec, Newfoundland, the maritimes and British Columbia, Canadian ports, Canadian railways, lake shipping and shipbuilding. This document is a public document which anyone can obtain and it was made public by the then minister of trade and commerce.

When I made the motion in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in 1958, I believe two years ago, asking that the St. Lawrence seaway authority undertake an economic survey of the effect of the seaway upon the various regions of Canada, I felt that there should be an up-to-date document similar to this which would indicate to the various regions of Canada the beneficial or adverse, if any, effects of this project upon the economy of our country. The committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines voted unanimously in its recommendation for the adoption of that economic survey. The minister saw fit not to accede to this recommendation and I believe in the course of his statement, either in the committee or in the house, he said he thought that it was ridiculous.

I want to say that I believe the team which the minister has set up may be a good thing in individual cases but it is not what is required when one must consider the overall position of the various ports. You cannot have a study of a local situation unless you know what the effect of this power and navigation project, both in Ontario and Quebec, is likely to be upon the rest of Canada. You cannot know that unless a statement of its effect, such as this one, is brought up to date or a new one, having regard to new circumstances, is prepared. It seemed to me at that time that that was essential, and I believe that what has happened since has proved that what I suggested to the committee was right.

The team which was established by the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport has taken officials in the Department of Transport and in the Department of Public Works to do what? They have considered a plan in each individual port, 29 of which have been mentioned, and the information upon which was refused to the House of Commons. Do you know what this team does? Notwithstanding the fact that it considers information from both departments, there is no one from the St. Lawrence seaway authority on this team of experts. How in the world, I ask the minister and the government, is this team going to do the kind of job that is expected of it if it does not get information from those who possess it, namely the St. Lawrence seaway authority who in turn have the information possessed by the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation of the United States? I said earlier that this information in the United States is being compiled. There should be a representative from the seaway authority on this team.

I hold in my hand now a study made by the New York Central railway system, showing industrial sites all along the United States side of the seaway from Rooseveltown, New York, to Oswego, New York. There is a map of each port; there is a description of the facilities; there is the cost and value of the land; there is the assessment, the taxation, the water rates, everything is contained in this study with respect to even the smallest of these sites. Has the Department of Transport or the Department of Public Works published anything of this nature? If they have, we have not been able to see it.

I think the government must begin now to try to find secondary industries which will establish themselves along both shores of the St. Lawrence seaway. I use that expression with regard to Canada and not with regard to the United States. By "both shores", I mean both the north and south shore of the lower St. Lawrence as well as the north shore of the upper St. Lawrence. I would be glad to send this document over to the minister so that he may see how well it has been prepared. Copies of this document have been sent to thousands of industrial plants not only in the United States but on the continent of Europe, with the result that secondary industry is establishing itself on the United States side of the line but not on the Canadian side.

Here at Rooseveltown in New York state and alongside of it there are two large industries which have established themselves there. One is Reynolds Aluminum and the other is Chevrolet branch of General Motors. I believe they employ about 7,000 people between them. It seems to me that some consideration should be given by the government to what has been done on the other side of the line.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is it not true that the two industries were built during the time when the hon. gentleman was president of the St. Lawrence seaway?

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know that that makes any difference.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): But is it true?

Mr. Chevrier: It is quite possible that they were established while I was the president. However, I can tell you why they were established.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Because the hon. gentleman was there.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank my friend for that compliment, but I do not believe it is the reason. I tell him, frankly, I think the reason was that the New York state power authority allocated blocks of power for development in the area, whereas Ontario hydro fed the power into a grid for central Ontario and southern Ontario leaving no blocks of power for the St. Lawrence and Ottawa valleys to develop secondary industries there. I think that is a serious mistake. I do not want to deal with it unduly, but I see the hon. member wants to rise again and ask a question, and if he wishes he may go ahead.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not disagree with the hon. member, but I want to make clear to the committee that he is the one who had the opportunity during a long period of time when he had responsibilities to do something about that which he is now discussing.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no. When I was in the seaway authority, the job of the authority was to build a channel 27 feet in depth from Montreal to the foot of lake Erie and to expropriate land for that purpose. The second job was to establish tolls, not to establish industry. That is not the job of the St. Lawrence seaway at all; that is the job of the government as a whole, and the government of this country is not doing a thing to establish secondary industry along the seaway.

But I do not want to get away from what I intended to say. I want to come now to another public document, a document prepared by Canadian National Railways dealing with the proposed St. Lawrence deep waterways project affecting the city of Cornwall and the surrounding country. Here in my hand is a report by Canadian National Railways which has also been made public. It contains a series of maps and some 70 or 80 pages of material on the area. The point I am trying to make is that these reports were made public to the municipality. We in this committee and those ports which are affected know all about these plans but we cannot find out a thing in so far as the plans of the Department of Public Works and the Department of Transport are concerned.

The other evening we discussed this matter in the house, and the purpose of my rising to discuss it now is that I think the ports of Seven Islands, Baie Comeau, the new port which is being established upstream from Seven Islands and Rimouski. Matane and all those ports in the province of Quebec not under the national harbours board; Cornwall, Brockville, and I believe Belleville, have all been studied, from Dorion right up to Oshawa. I think the committee should get some idea what the officials have in mind. The hon. member for Essex East mentioned Windsor and Sarnia and the other ports which were mentioned by the minister during the course of his discussions.

I do not think these men are able to tell us what is likely to happen in one particular area, for example Cornwall, unless there is an over-all plan and unless someone has studied the effect of this power and navigation project upon the various regions of Canada. Have they studied the McGill report on metropolitan Montreal? Have they studied the effect of the seaway upon grain, perhaps one of the finest reports which have been made on the subject by the Chicago board of trade in conjunction with the University of Indiana? Have they studied this report of Canadian National Railways to which I have referred and which deals with the whole international section but more particularly with Cornwall? If they have not, they should.

What have they come down with? They have come down with a report which involves an expenditure of $80,000 in the city of Cornwall. Let me tell the minister what this team actually did when they went to the city of Cornwall. They went to the city of Cornwall and they examined the west end and came to the conclusion that that is where the wharf facilities should go. It was suggested to them that they should look at the facilities that existed opposite the city of Cornwall and they said "No". This is what I want to bring to the attention of the minister. They said, "Oh, no, the water is too swift there; you could not think of establishing a wharf there because the velocity is about eight feet per second". These experts of the Departments of Transport and Public Works did not even know that the St. Lawrence seaway was carrying on works to broaden the cross-sectional area and reduce the velocity of the water from eight to less than four feet per second in order to establish the entrance to a canal, a future canal with 27-foot facilities on the Canadian side of the line.

It was not until after that had been pointed out to their attention that they went back there. And what did they do? They changed their plans from the west end of Cornwall and they went down to the east end and said, "Here is a place which we think is ideal". It is not hard to see when one looks at the map included in the Canadian National Railways report that the amount of water varies in depth all along the eastern front of Cornwall extending from Grays creek to Courtaulds on the west. The map indicates the water is at every point greater than 27 feet in depth. When you get close to this wharf which has been recommended by the team for extension you have 31 feet, 35 feet and 41 feet. So that a small extension only of the wharf will reach deep water.

I am not complaining about the decision. The decision is probably a good one but it should have been taken twelve months earlier. Furthermore the decision to spend $80,000 is not nearly enough. Far more than that is required in this particular instance, and I add—and I emphasize this to those who sit on the other side of the house—that if the government really wants to deal with the cyclical and the technological unemployment situation in Canada it must of necessity do something toward the establishment of secondary industry. This is the time because here you have in the first year of the seaway six million tons of traffic coming from overseas as compared with less than one million tons prior to the opening of the seaway last year.

Where is that six million tons going to go? It is the business and the duty not so much of this committee to ascertain that but of a committee which would study the effect upon Canada as a whole then allow the team that the minister speaks of with the information that it has in hand to come forward and deal with a particular and a local situation.

Then there is the tremendous amount of domestic traffic. Who would have thought four or five years ago that the traffic on the St. Lawrence canals would amount to 20 million tons and on the Welland canal to 27 million tons? The figures which the minister's department has published for 1960 up until May indicate now a new trend which is a trend away from the smaller ship in favour of the larger ship, which means that there should be greater and greater tonnage. That means tonnage not only for domestic traffic but also, I presume, for ocean traffic. That is why I think that a great deal more can be done for the establishment of secondary industry in this whole great lakes-St. Lawrence basin from the lower St. Lawrence right up to the head of the lakes than is being done now.

I said earlier that the United States is giving consideration to this, and I do not think we are doing enough. I am not saying that the team is incompetent. Certainly I would not make a statement such as that. But I do not think the team which the minister has set up is the kind of team required to do the job.

An hon. Member: How would the hon. gentleman change it?

Mr. Chevrier: I said earlier—if the hon. member had been here he would know—that the report made in 1951 by the economics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce should be brought up to date. That in effect was the recommendation I made in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines which was approved unanimously but which the minister thought should not be put into effect. I will not use the term which he used, because I do not want to be involved in an argument with the hon. gentleman so late in the evening. In any event, the minister could not find himself able to give favourable consideration to the recommendation. If a report of that kind which was made public in 1951, and which was an extremely well prepared document, were prepared with reference to the new situation—because when that report was drafted it was not possible to envisage the conditions as they were found in 1956 and 1957, and even today—if a report such as this was given to parliament, plus the work done by the team established by the Department of Transport and the Department of Public Works, I think you would have great co-ordination and liaison one with another. As it is, I do not think we have that, and I hope the minister will take these remarks which I have made in good part, because they are meant to be constructive and are not offered in any other way.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to deal with a subject which has been causing me and I am sure a number of other Canadians a great deal of concern, that is, the very inefficient transport system we have developed across the country. I am not saying this in criticism of the present minister. I think this is a situation which has developed from coast to coast largely without our being conscious of it. Year after year we have to subsidize our railway systems to an increasing extent. In addition to subsidizing the railways as such, we subsidize as individuals who have to travel on the railways; we subsidize fares because the fares have been increasing all the time, and we subsidize meals because the price of meals has been going up all the time until one has to pay about three times as much on a train as what a comparable or better meal would cost elsewhere. We subsidize freight, we subsidize express, we subsidize everything.

Not long ago I was going to visit my brother in the province of Quebec. I can recall that when I was a lad one of the big events of the day was going down to meet the train when it came through. I wanted to stop at Scotstown, but in order to meet this particular train my brother would have to go either to Megantic, 40 miles away, or to Sherbrooke, 40 miles in the other direction, because the train does not stop at Scotstown any longer. That, when I come to think of it, is another kind of subsidy. It is little wonder that more and more people are turning to air travel where one does not have to pay three times as much as a meal would normally cost; the meal is provided free, and it is served by an attractive hostess in the bargain. If people do not fly, they go back to the highways and drive, to avoid the inconvenience which they might otherwise encounter. This in turn means that trains are running empty and the subsidy has to be increased.

The railways have made every effort to economize. They have used every device of modern technique and automation to this end. They have even, in my opinion, carried this process to extremes, because as some hon. members have mentioned the length of track allotted to repair gangs has been increased, while the number of men at work has been cut down. More and more wrecks have resulted, but, thank heavens, there has been so far no great loss of life. Any of us who travel a great deal on the railways have noticed that the roads are getting rougher and rougher all the time; it has come to the point on some tracks where it is best to tie yourself in the bunk if you do not want to end up on the floor.

Because of considerations such as I have mentioned people are shipping their freight and express to an increasing extent by road transport. Road transportation is taking over much of the work which was formerly done by the railways. What do we do in this respect? Again we subsidize. We subsidize the transportation interests by building the roads over which their vehicles travel, whereas the railways have to build and maintain their own roads. Thus motor transport is increasing the difficulties of the railways and at the same time it is pounding our highways to pieces and increasing our highway costs; highways which would last for years if travelled only by private motor traffic are being broken up in a year or two by these huge vehicles.

With this increased traffic by both passenger and transport vehicles problems such as the question of safety at level crossings are bound to arise. We have reached the stage where all level crossings will have to be abolished. We seldom hear of a week end passing without one or more fatal accidents caused by a motor vehicle colliding with a train at a level crossing.

May I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the leader of the house intends to do tomorrow and for the rest of the week, if possible?

Mr. Churchill: For tomorrow we have three legislative items. We shall begin with Bill No. S-35, an act respecting the international boundary commission, followed by a resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport dealing with the Freight Rates Reduction Act. The third item is the resolution in the name of the Prime Minister concerning the setting up of a department of forestry.

It may be we shall complete those three items tomorrow, making similar progress to that we have made today. If so, I would ask the indulgence of the house to proceed with the estimates of the Department of Transport. On Wednesday, if the estimates of the department are not concluded, we shall carry on with those estimates. Then we have the estimates of the departments of justice and fisheries which by arrangement with hon. gentlemen opposite we can take in whatever order is satisfactory.

Friday being Dominion day I am not sure what the house will want to do on this occasion but last year the house met at eleven o'clock and rose at one. That may be what will be done this year as well. In any case on Friday we will start with the bill which the Prime Minister will introduce, an act for the recognition and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms and we will continue the debate on that subject matter the following week.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS

Second report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters—Mr. McQuillan.

MINING

REVISED REGULATIONS RESPECTING NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND LAND UNDER TERRITORIAL WATERS

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to announce the promulgation of revised mining regulations for the Northwest Territories, which are designed to ensure maximum benefit to Canadian interests and to make these regulations applicable to lands underlying territorial waters which are in federal jurisdiction.

The government's purpose in revising the Northwest Territories quartz mining regulations, which are now called the Canada mining regulations, is the same as in the case of the recently promulgated regulations applying to oil and gas. First, the revised regulations make provision for the disposition of mining exploration and development rights on federal land underlying territorial waters of Canada. Regulations covering lands not forming part of any province or territory have not existed in the past, presumably because the exploitation of offshore deposits has not been considered technically or economically feasible. Further, a convention adopted in Geneva in 1958 gave Canada the right to exploit the resources of its continental shelf. There are at the present time Canadian companies who want the right to explore on these lands. In this respect the present regulations do for minerals what the Canada oil and gas regulations do for the fossil fuels.

The second purpose of the revised regulations is to embody another step which the government is taking to ensure Canadians a full opportunity to participate in resource development. In the case of the oil and gas regulations the Canadian participation clauses become operative at the time an explorer for oil and gas converts a permit into a lease. This was the best time to apply this principle in the case of oil and gas, because in the permit stage a permit holder's rights are limited to the exploration and delineation of oil and gas resources. In order to exploit them he must have a lease.

However, in the case of minerals, the pattern of activity under the regulations which have been in force practically without change since 1932 allows not only exploration but also exploitation to be carried on before a lease is taken out. Under the regulations no one can acquire claims either by staking or assignment without holding a miner's licence. In order to be effective, therefore, the new Canadian participation clauses as applied to the present regulations must be applied from the outset as a requirement for obtaining a miner's licence. However, licences held by persons and corporations which cannot meet the Canadian participation requirement will remain valid until March 31, 1961.

I think I should make it clear that this requirement for Canadian participation at the exploration stage in mining is intended to be of interim application only. Officers of my department have for a considerable time been working on a general revision of the mining regulations with the objective of bringing them into line with modern prospecting and development techniques. During the next few months I will be holding conferences with representatives of the mining industry. Before the end of the present fiscal year I expect to formulate a completely new set of regulations suitable for modern times.

It is my intention to provide in the new regulations for a system similar to that now obtaining under the recently revised oil and gas regulations. This will make a clear distinction between the exploration and exploitation phases of mineral development, and will protect the right of Canadians to have an opportunity to participate at the ownership stage. Any person or corporation will be able to acquire a mining licence and to stake and develop mining claims. However, it will be necessary to take out a mining lease before a mine can be brought into production, and it is at this stage that the Canadian participation clauses will apply.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will have listened with interest to the minister's statement to the effect that new mining regulations have been promulgated. In due course, during the minister's estimates, we shall have an opportunity of questioning him on these regulations. Meanwhile, perhaps I may be permitted to say it is to be hoped that they are somewhat clearer than the oil and gas regulations were when they were first issued. I believe the minister himself indicated that they caused some confusion in his mind. I think he said that a good lawyer could drive a coach and four through them.

The minister has mentioned that these regulations will apply to land under offshore waters. This is a very important aspect of the regulations, especially as they extend the offshore waters out to the limit of the continental shelf. This is a matter that is of very great interest to the provinces, and I can only express the hope at this time that the provinces have been consulted in regard to this aspect of the regulations and accept this extension of the right of the federal government to the land under those waters.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the minister which in our view deals with a matter of the utmost importance to all of Canada, the development of resources on the continental shelf. On the basis of the statement of the minister it is most difficult to go into details at the moment, but we do want to say, so important is the matter and so great our interest in it, that we hope to go into it in more detail and have a full discussion when the minister's estimates are before us, after having had an opportunity to study the statement the minister has made.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to ask permission to clear up a possible misunderstanding arising out of a statement by the Leader of the Opposition, to the effect that this action will have a bearing on the provinces. These regulations only apply to lands under federal jurisdiction.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PLANS FOR DOMINION DAY—PROCEDURE RESPECTING BILL OF RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will be delighted to realize from the applause that his return is welcomed; perhaps I should add, Mr. Speaker, his return from Cutback. My question is, can he tell the house what are the plans with respect to parliament working on Dominion day?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first I must express my deep appreciation to the opposition for the applause. This is one of those occasions when parliament is at its best, one of those occasions when, since the Leader of the Opposition has said that the applause was meant for me, I can say that it was well justified.

Having said that, may I say that on Dominion day there will be, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, a public function for the purpose of underlining and emphasizing Canada's confederation. So far as the house is concerned, discussion will be held through the house leader concerning the actual proceedings for the day, but having regard to all the circumstances I would think that if it is generally acceptable we might sit in the morning, because in the afternoon there are those functions designed to make Canadians as a whole more cognizant of the tremendous contribution of the English, French and other races to Canada, which can be done most appropriately on Dominion day.

Mr. Pearson: Does the Prime Minister not agree that every opportunity should be given to all members of the house as Canadians to celebrate our national holiday? If it is planned to have the house meet only from eleven to one perhaps it would be better not to meet at all rather than for just a couple of hours, especially if during that short time very important legislation may be introduced concerning which other members might not have an opportunity to speak on the day of its introduction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I can think of no better day to bring about the preservation and maintenance—

Mr. Habel: Window dressing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —of fundamental freedoms within federal jurisdiction than July 1. The hon. gentleman will recall that at the time of confederation it was generally believed that never again would there be the possibility, certainly within the federal realm, of any invasion of parliamentary freedoms. I offer no criticism of any party in the house, but in the intervening years it has been found that the aspirations and anticipations of the fathers of confederation have not always been met in that regard.

I can assure the Leader of the Opposition, believing that this day is one upon which it would most be expected that a bill of rights should be introduced, that my remarks will be kept within that compass that will permit him and anyone else who chooses to speak on behalf of any group in the house the opportunity to have their views placed before the people at the same time, to the end that in a community of counsel, as it were, we shall do our part to assure the maintenance of those freedoms for generations to come.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I agree with the Prime Minister that July 1 is the appropriate occasion to begin strengthening human rights and fundamental freedoms in this country. I agree also that it is time that was done, and I hope this will be an important step taken in that direction.

What I wanted to ask the Prime Minister was whether he could tell us what are the government's intentions as to the procedure that will be followed with regard to the discussion and consideration of the bill of rights. We were told by the Prime Minister in this house last year and again earlier this year that it was the intention to send the bill to a committee, to have witnesses called and organizations given an opportunity to present briefs. I am just wondering if the Prime Minister could say whether it is the intention to rush this bill through in the dying days of the session, or will an opportunity be given to organizations to present their views before a committee?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not the government's intention to rush anything through. Hon. gentlemen will have every opportunity of voicing their views. I think it is very necessary that this question should receive the fullest consideration, and so far as the government are concerned we are prepared to stay here however long in order to properly discharge this responsibility in connection with a matter which, in my view, is one of the most important pieces of legislation to come before this house.

Mr. Argue: Can the Prime Minister say whether it is the intention of the government to have the bill referred to a committee? And could he explain why it is being brought in now when it could have been introduced earlier this session?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to get into a controversial mood this morning, but I would say to the hon. gentleman that the legislation is being introduced almost as soon as it would have been possible to introduce it. If the hon. gentleman would speak to some of those who, to some extent, acknowledge his leadership, he might be able to bring about extra time that could be made available for discussion. In any event, whatever course is followed in that connection, we have lots of time. There is going to be no rush, and full opportunity will be assured so that when this measure does go on the statute books it will represent the consensus, within of course the limitations of the constitution.

In so far as a committee is concerned, there has been no change from what was expressed earlier.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the bill will be sent to a committee, and in view of the desirability of giving all those in the country who have strong views on the inadequacy of this particular measure an opportunity to be heard, will the Prime Minister use his good offices to see that the committee is set up as quickly as possible after the general debate in this house, so these people outside parliament may be given adequate notice in order that they may, during this holiday period, attend here to express their views with regard to this measure?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, naturally the government is anxious to have an expression of view from all those organizations which have a particular interest in this measure. I am glad to note from the words used by the hon. gentleman that it is those outside the house who believe the bill will be inadequate, because I seem to recall during the years that when any reference was made to a bill of rights for Canada, some of the hon. gentlemen opposite were among those who said we did not need it at all. Now that the measure is coming before parliament it is the people outside who say it does not go far enough.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since the Prime Minister observes so carefully the rules of parliament, does he not recall that the complaints were registered against the inadequate measure that he is introducing and not the more substantive measure?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a matter of debate. I think a reading of what has been said not only in this house but outside of it would indicate that I am maintaining the traditions of parliament, and would not substantiate the hon. gentlemen's suggestion.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. When he was unavoidably absent yesterday, we had a discussion on the motion with reference to additional sittings of the house. As reported at page 5408 of

Hansard the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Green) stated as follows:

> I am advised that by the end of the week most of the committees of the house will either have finished their actual sittings or be winding them up. Of course some of them may not have brought in final reports, but the sittings of some will be concluded although there are four or five which will have to carry on next week and perhaps some of them until the end of the session.

In view of that statement the question that arises is this. Does the Prime Minister think that the kind of consideration which should be given to the important legislation on civil rights which he intends to discuss on Friday is possible in the light of the statement made by his colleague?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The statement to which the hon. gentleman alluded was this:

> I am advised that by the end of the week most of the committees of the house will either have finished their actual sittings or be winding them up. Of course some of them may not have brought in final reports, but the sittings of some will be concluded although there are four or five which will have to carry on next week and perhaps some of them until the end of the session.

I see nothing there inconsistent with the statement I made a moment ago that this matter will indeed be submitted to a committee which as yet has not been set up. Therefore the words of my colleague are adequate.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is now in a position to answer the question I asked last Wednesday, and to make any comment on the report that the Vancouver city council had asked him to convene a conference on unemployment?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will give an answer to that question tomorrow, and I think it will meet the needs of the hon. gentleman.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has he now received the request of the Ontario association of mayors and reeves asking for a full investigation by the federal government into the causes of and cure for unemployment in Canada? If so, what action does the minister intend to take with reference to it?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

CHIGNECTO CANAL—REQUEST FOR INTERIM REPORT ON FEASIBILITY STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he could give the house an interim progress report on the feasibility study of the Chignecto canal.

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): In due course, Mr. Speaker, we will do so. That is something which will be quite a departure from anything ever done by the previous government.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question. In view of the circumstances, does the minister not think that the federal government might be generous enough to pay the whole cost of this study?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking about a matter of policy.

MINING

YUKON—INQUIRY AS TO EFFECT OF NEW REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Concerning the announcement by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources as to the promulgation of the new Canadian mining regulations, can the minister give me his assurance that these regulations do not affect the provisions of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act and that those provisions will still apply to the staking of mineral claims in Yukon, and similarly with regard to the Yukon Placer Mining Act? Can the minister further give me his assurance that the regulations in fact do not apply in the Yukon Territory?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think that assurance can be given. The Canada mining regulations deal only with the Northwest Territories and the continental shelf off the shores of Canada.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO GUARANTEED LOANS TO SMALL BUSINESSES AND MUNICIPAL LOAN FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a statement reported to have been made by the president of the Retail Merchants Association of Canada, to the effect that the federal government would take steps to guarantee bank loans to small businesses. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the substance of the statement is correct? Is it also the government's intention to create a municipal loan fund from which municipalities may borrow money to finance essential municipal projects?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not intend to comment on a statement made outside the house. In any event, these matters are questions of government policy and will be announced in the house if and when it is decided to do so.

TELEVISION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON LICENSING POLICY IN SMALLER CITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the board of broadcast governors has completed its round of television licence hearings in the major Canadian cities, could the minister bring us up to date on the government's views regarding additional television station licensing in smaller cities which already have one station, such as Port Arthur, Sudbury or London?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I think that this is a matter for the board of broadcast governors. After the Department of Transport had considered from a technical point of view any applications which may be submitted to it, the board of broadcast governors would deal with them.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PATRONAGE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY HON. MEMBER FOR STORMONT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he has seen a statement made by one of his colleagues in the house while he was absent; a statement by a Progressive Conservative member of parliament in which a return was urged of the old-time political patronage under which members of parliament could appoint civil servants in their own constituencies.

This is a statement which was made by the distinguished member for Stormont (Mr. Campbell), who added that while the civil service commission makes appointments on the merit system, individual members of parliament are entitled to be consulted. My question is, has the Prime Minister any comment to make on this? Second, is this the policy of the government?

An hon. Member: He wants to go back to the Liberal days.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): May I say that my absence yesterday was noted by hon. gentlemen opposite—

An hon. Member: And in the gallery.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and by one of the hon. gentleman's friends. I was speaking to the conference of United States governors, one of the best opportunities that could come to a Canadian and the first to come to a prime minister of Canada, to place before the people of the United States the views of Canada respecting certain phases of United States-Canadian relations.

With respect to the question itself, I do not intend to make any observations on the statements alleged to have been made. I have not had the opportunity of looking into them. But I may say this; I can understand how shocked the hon. gentleman must be. I in no way approve of any such suggestion as apparently was made, if the quotation be correct, but I am sure that any such suggestion would have shocked the finer sensibilities of the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the Prime Minister did not want to reflect on me—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: —when he referred to his absence from the house in the earlier part of his reply, but I think all of us will be pleased to know that the Prime Minister goes to the United States from time to time and makes speeches about increasing the amount of goods that should be bought by the United States citizens from Canada—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege, or is he about to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Chevrier: I was exercising the same latitude as the Prime Minister, and I was coming to the supplementary question. I was simply going to say that those sentiments were expressed by Right Hon. C. D. Howe many years ago, and it is not at all new that the Prime Minister should express them.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But how ineffectively.

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly far more effectively than is happening at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member a question to ask supplementary to the one he originally asked? If he has, perhaps I may suggest that it is a question which is more properly one for debate than for the orders of the day.

Mr. Chevrier: It is a supplementary question, and I hope I shall be allowed to ask it. I have been interrupted continually.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will put his question—

Mr. Chevrier: Is the Prime Minister aware of the additional statement made by the hon. member for Stormont that the civil service commission are irresponsible—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but I must interrupt the hon. member. It is not in accordance with our practice to use the guise of a question in order to make a statement in the house. I am afraid it is not in order.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, have you not ruled on more than one occasion that while it is improper to use newspaper articles on orders of the day, this does not apply to statements made by members of our own house? That is the position I was taking. If it had been a statement by someone outside the house I know, of course, that I could not have put the question, but this is a statement by somebody within the house, and it seems to me that I am entitled in these circumstances to ask the supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I have not made myself clear. My point is this, that to quote someone for the purpose of putting his views before the house is only regular if out of that there arises a question of administrative responsibility. If it raises a matter of the minister's responsibility the question arising may be asked.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the statement by the Prime Minister that he is the first prime minister to be asked to address the United States governors' conference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To have spoken—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): To have spoken to the governors' conference. I am sure all of us in this house are pleased that the Prime Minister was extended this invitation, but is he not aware that the Leader of the Opposition, when secretary of state for external affairs several years ago, was invited to speak to the governors' conference, and did speak there and made a great impression?

[Mr. Speaker.]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED POSTPONEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Would it be possible for the minister to dispel the rumour which has been current since about 8 p.m. last evening that the federal-provincial conference is being indefinitely postponed?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): This rumour has not reached my ear. It must have started somewhere much closer to the ear of the hon. member, apparently. As far as I am aware there has been no request from any party for the postponement of the conference, and I hope the hon. member is not going to sponsor, either directly or indirectly, a request for a postponement.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was asking, as I properly should, not for the intention of someone else but for the intention of the government. Can the minister assure us that the government has no intention of postponing the conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The government has invited the provinces to come to this proposed conference and there is no thought in the mind of the government other than to proceed with it. I pointed out that the provinces had accepted the invitation, and I am quite sure we are going to have a very useful conference.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of this assurance by the Minister of Finance, perhaps on his trip to Newfoundland tomorrow he might wish to call in at Fredericton and see his namesake and perhaps speak to him about the situation—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and generally make an impression and seek to impress upon him—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member may have had a legitimate question somewhere in the back of his mind, but he was coming to it rather slowly. I should like to remind the house that all the provincial elections of which I know are now over.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

"CLOSE UP"—REQUEST OF ONTARIO ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR NAME OF PARTICIPANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of National Revenue in his capacity as reporter to the house on broadcasting whether he has received a request from the attorney general of Ontario to divulge the name of the person who appeared as a professional corespondent on the C.B.C. program "Close Up".

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from the attorney general of Ontario on that matter, asking that we give the information requested. I turned the letter over to the corporation. I have not been in touch with the president in the last few days because he has been attending meetings, but he assured me the information would be sent on to the attorney general.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION

LEGISLATION RESPECTING INTERPRETATION, POWERS, ETC.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-35, respecting the international boundary commission.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a short bill respecting the international boundary commission. It was introduced in the other place and there was given very careful consideration in a committee which proved to be unanimous. I do not intend to go back beyond the international boundary treaty of 1908, but those hon. members who are interested in the story of the various treaties under which the boundary between Canada and the United States was established will find the speech made in the other place by Senator Blois extremely informative and interesting.

The international boundary treaty of 1908 established the international boundary commission which is composed of two sections, a Canadian section and a United States section. By a further treaty in 1925, described as being to "define and complete the international boundary between Canada and the United States", the commissioners appointed under the 1908 treaty are responsible for continuous maintenance of the international boundary line, the boundary monuments and a cleared sky line vista along the line. The vista which of course is easily noticed when it runs through wooded areas is a strip 20 feet wide made up of 10 feet on the Canadian side of the boundary line and 10 feet on the United States side. Probably most hon. members will have seen portions of this boundary line in one part of Canada or another.

As hon. members are aware, treaties to which the United States is signatory are submitted to the United States Senate, and when passed they become self-implementing; that is to say, they become the law of the land. In Canada the situation is different. Here, specific legislation is required if necessary in order to implement the treaty. This is the reason the present bill has been introduced. It will ensure that Canada is fully able to implement the 1925 treaty.

Hon. members may ask why it is necessary now, 35 years after Canada signed the international treaty, for it to receive implementing legislation. The fact is that during this period the Canadian international boundary commissioner has been able to carry out the 1925 treaty obligations because permission was asked before entering private land in the immediate boundary area, and because Canadian land owners were prepared to co-operate with him in carrying out his functions.

I should like to say at this point that the Canadian international boundary commissioner is an official of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. The annual expenses which represent Canada's share of the maintenance of the international boundary are included in the annual estimates of that department.

The increasing development and use of land near the international boundary from coast to coast has led with increasing frequency to proposed encroachments upon the boundary area by buildings and other structures. For example, the Great Northern railway proposed in 1954 that they would build a station right on the boundary line between White Rock, British Columbia, and Blaine, Washington, with half of the station on the Canadian side and half on the United States side. This proposal was objected to by the departments concerned at that time and nothing was done about it. Last autumn, however, there was a renewal of the suggestion that this station should be built straddling the boundary line.

The legislation now before the house seeks in no way to expropriate or remove buildings and structures now existing within 10 feet of the boundary line. There are some buildings already up which do stand on this 10 feet. On the contrary, this legislation seeks only to prevent enlargements of existing buildings and structures, and to avoid having new buildings and structures erected in the future.

We believe that this legislation is desirable in order that Canada may fulfill her treaty obligations, and also to provide adequate protection for the system of monuments. The commissioner is responsible for repairing and replacing monuments. For example, if the bank of a river were to fall in and carry a monument with it, replacement would be the responsibility of the commissioner. The legislation is also necessary in order to give the boundary commissioner legal access to the boundary area; to prevent unauthorized encroachments in this boundary area, and to facilitate the application of customs regulations. I am sure the Minister of Finance will be pleased to know that the bill involves no additional financial obligations.

That is a brief summary of the bill. We believe that under present day conditions it is essential that the Canadian member of the international boundary commission be given the powers which are set out in the bill.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is a short, straightforward and, I think, non-contentious bill, and we on this side intend to support it. The bill itself and the remarks just made by the minister remind us that it deals with the boundary between Canada and the United States, the boundary to which it is essential to refer in every after-dinner speech as an undefended boundary; undefended, of course, in the sense that there are no fortifications on the border, but certainly not undefended when you try to get across it if you are evading customs, immigration or security regulations.

It reminds us, Mr. Speaker, that in the bad old days relations between the two countries were such that there was fear and hostility on the boundary and which in those days twice resulted in war. We Canadians with, of course, help from the mother country were more successful in defending our boundary in war than we have been successful since in defending it in peacetime against arrangements, agreements and arbitrations made by the mother country which at that time had responsibility for our foreign policy. In some cases the result of those arbitrations—and I do not know whether we could have done any better ourselves if we had been independent—so far as the boundary is concerned is obvious, if you take one glance at the map. It is obvious in British Columbia; it is obvious in New Brunswick and Quebec.

The boundary has been established by three major treaties; the treaty of Paris, which I think was made in 1784 and which brought to an end the war with the colonies; the treaty of 1818, which extended the boundary of that day to the Lake of the Woods, and the treaty of 1846 which I think completed the process of boundary delineation in a major sense to the Pacific ocean. But in addition to these three major treaties there have been a good many other treaty arrangements, as the minister pointed out. They were dealt with in a very interesting way in a debate on this matter in the other house. It was shown in that debate, as indeed it is clear from our reading of history, that in subsequent arrangements and arbitrations, especially the arbitration referred to the emperor of Germany in connection with Pacific boundary matters, I think in the early part of this century that Canada did not come out very well. The Alaska boundary award of 1903 is one example in our history of an unfortunate boundary dispute with the United States; because, as hon. members I am sure will recall, that arbitration and the award from it which established the present boundary between Alaska and British Columbia was very much at the expense of Canada. As the records also make clear, if that award had not been accepted by the negotiators on the Canadian and British side, the president of the United States in those days, the redoubtable Theodore Roosevelt, was going to establish his own boundary. Perhaps if that contingency had arisen he would have been a little more reasonable, but it does remind us that we have not always been too successful in our boundary negotiations with the United States.

Perhaps the Panhandle may one day be, if not returned to Canada, but surely one of those days we shall be able to get access to the Pacific coast through it. As I understand it there is now no complaint between the two countries in respect of major boundary matters. For many years now there have been only minor differences, and they have all been settled peacefully. Indeed no question arises in our country as it might indeed have arisen in other countries in other parts of the world, of a terra uredenta.

This bill will facilitate the work of the international boundary commission and that, of course, is all to the good. Sometimes we forget—indeed we should remember—that while there have been complications as there has been work required in marking the land boundary between the two countries, a great deal of our boundary is through the middle of streams or lakes. That has its own difficulty and has brought about its own complications in our relations with the United States. There is no better illustration of that than in the negotiations leading up to the building of the St. Lawrence seaway. Hon. members know that in some parts of the country the boundary goes down the middle of a stream. That has had a very important effect on how the St. Lawrence seaway had to be built.

A good many Canadians—indeed, I have heard the statement made in this house, and I heard it made on television the other night by a professor of history and a great authority on United States-Canadian relations—have said that it would have been much better if Canada had built the seaway alone, and that it was too bad we were not able to do so. The reason that could not be done without the approval of the United States lies in the nature of the boundary at that spot because the boundary runs right down the middle of the St. Lawrence. Because of that boundary line it would have been quite impossible to have built a purely Canadian seaway which included a power dam, because you could not very well have built a power dam half way across. The location of the boundary, quite apart from the effect of the treaty of 1908, made it impossible to build a seaway by ourselves alone, if the United States objected to it, as a national seaway by Canada, even without power development, if that work had any effect on the boundary water levels. Therefore, because of the nature of our boundary, it would have been impossible to build a St. Lawrence seaway alone if it had any serious effect on the boundary waters or if we wished to have a power development at the same time.

The minister has indicated that the boundary commission has been working since 1925, and indeed since 1908, without the necessity for this kind of legislation, and I think working very effectively. Perhaps I may pay my tribute to the work done on both sides by the commission. The United States side and the Canadian side have worked quite effectively together and have not for that purpose required legislation. But the nature of developments on the boundary, as the commission has pointed out, certainly makes it desirable now to facilitate that work, to make it easier and indeed in some cases I think perhaps to make it possible by establishing a legislative basis for it, by even at this late date, implementing the treaty of 1925. We on this side are very glad to support the bill for these reasons.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say first of all that I think the practice which has been established recently of introducing bills of this type in the other place is a good one. This is the type of legislation that the other place can discuss and deal with possibly to greater advantage than we can, and I think the minister is quite correct in referring, and wisely perhaps, in this house to the speeches made in the other place when this bill was under discussion. The information that one can gather from a reading of those speeches is such that he will obtain an historical background of the international boundary commission.

This is a strictly non-contentious bill as we see it in this group. It simply provides for administrative procedures on the part of the Canadian section of the international boundary commission.

The international boundary, particularly in the mountains, has always been an interesting subject to me. In the mountains one can see the 20-foot strip running up and down the hills, and I have followed the international boundary over one peak after the other in British Columbia. I have also read with great interest all the material I could get on the question of establishing the boundary as decided by the Oregon treaty of 1846.

Some years ago a very interesting thing happened in my constituency. A trunk was opened in a bank in Rossland. The trunk had been left there for 50 years, and in it were found copies of the original maps made by the surveyor who surveyed the international boundary according to the treaty of 1846. Apparently the other copies had been sent to the colonial office in Great Britain. Someone had left the trunk in the bank at Rossland in the early days of this century, and it was stored by the son of the original surveyor who did the work after 1846. Although the maps in question were quite correctly and properly sent to the archives of British Columbia, I was able to obtain photostatic copies. When one reads the notes in connection with the surveys made at that time it is a very interesting story indeed. I recommend it to anyone who wants a little relaxation from, shall I say, the whirlpool of the present. I am quite sure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs on occasion would find relaxation in literature of that type.

In listening to the minister I understood him to say that up to the present the commission has experienced quite satisfactory co-operation with the owners of property within the 20 feet along the international boundary from the point of view of administration for the purposes of the commission, and that this legislation provides for leaving present properties in place. There will be no removal of structures now in place, but the commission will have the authority to prevent any further encroachment or building on the Canadian side of the 20-foot strip which provides for the protection of the markers and monuments already erected and under the care of the commission. I am not quite clear whether the minister said that the legislation also provides for certain administrative practices in connection with customs.

Mr. Green: No; the work of the department will be facilitated. For example, if somebody is trying to cross the line a mile away the officers will be able to see him because the trees will be cut down and the 20-foot strip will be clear.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his explanation. I was not quite clear on that point. I can well understand the necessity for that in mountainous and forested country. I know that on occasions even very law-abiding constituents of mine are inclined to go back and forth across the line. I have heard a very prominent Liberal express his sympathy with that practice, so I can well understand why the customs officials want to be able to look in every direction at certain points. Generally speaking, however, the arrangements are very satisfactory, and certain local inconveniences resulting from the geographical nature of the constituency I have the honour to represent are recognized by the Department of National Revenue which co-operates with the local people so as to prevent any unnecessary hardship or inconvenience.

Before taking my seat, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I think it is a very good practice on the part of the international boundary commission to establish plaques or markers on roads at the point where they cross the international boundary. All I can suggest in that respect is that I hope the practice is continued and even extended, and that in some cases the plaques or markers may be of such a type as to be more easily noticed and recognized. I find that people are very interested in that sort of thing. I have travelled the road that enters the United States south of Rossland and on occasion I have noticed a dozen cars stopped because people wished to read the plaque near the boundary monument. These plaques or markers are of interest to both United States and Canadian citizens and to others, and I hope the practice is not only continued but extended. With these few remarks I will resume my seat.

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to me to see this legislation come before the house today for the purpose of putting in statutory form provisions respecting the work carried on in connection with the international boundary between Canada and the United States since the year 1908. It seems to me it is rather unusual that we should have delayed until the present time the enacting of formal provisions respecting the activities of the international boundary commission, but I heartily endorse the procedure that is being followed in presenting this legislation this morning.

This is an occasion when we could indulge in speeches such as we often hear regarding the unique position of the Canada-United States international boundary. Because of the nature of the relationships that have existed between the two countries down through the years there have been many interesting expressions with respect to those relationships and developments along the international boundary. I am delighted to see that arrangements are made in the bill to preserve the monuments and sites already established along the border.

In my own constituency a unique development took place in the 1920's which was spontaneously supported by people on both sides of the border, and has resulted today in a rather outstanding example of international co-operation. During the 1920's members of the national gardeners' association of the United States prompted by Dr. Henry Moore of Islington, Ontario, began to discuss the possibility of making use of the international boundary to emphasize the desire for peace that was felt so strongly following world war I. A decision was made to establish on the international border an international peace garden dedicated to the ideals felt so strongly at that time. In 1932, on the Manitoba-North Dakota boundary, the official opening took place of what has become known today as the international peace garden.

Very substantial areas of land in the Turtle mountain region were set aside in perpetuity by the Canadian government, the United States government and the state and provincial governments concerned, and the area has been marked by a monument suitably inscribed with these words:

> We two nations dedicate this garden and pledge ourselves that as long as men shall live we will not take up arms against one another.

This is the kind of development, springing spontaneously from the hearts of the people themselves, which indicates that the work of the international boundary commission had sooner or later to become embodied in formal legislative form. Since 1932 there have been developments of many kinds on this significant site, which is strategically located. From the geographical standpoint it stands halfway between the Atlantic and the Pacific. It is also almost directly on the geographic centre of the North American continent.

Since 1932, in addition to the original cairn erected to commemorate the desire and striving for peace, a formalized botanical garden has been developed. A park area has been established with a very interesting arboretum. At the present time there is activity on foot to establish a peace chapel which will be erected on the highest point of the Turtle mountain area. It is reassuring to note that all these developments will be protected and preserved in the future by the passage of this legislation.

The government of Canada has expressed its interest in this development by financial support, as has the United States government, but I want to underline the fact that this support is incidental to the development of the gardens; because the chief support, both financial and in personal interest, has arisen largely from the voluntary efforts of organizations on both sides of the border. In recent years the daughters of the empire, service clubs on both sides of the border, women's institutes, the homemakers of America and others have all taken an interest in this development. During the past three years considerable cultural activity has emerged on the site of the international peace gardens, and it promises in the immediate future to develop into another school for fine arts located on the border. We have an international music camp, for example, that meets there every summer. Various international organizations are tending to concentrate their activities there, such as conventions and so on. We have a very fine international student discussion group which conducts a student seminar each fall on some aspect of international problems.

This is a subject on which I could spend some time this morning but I thought, Mr. Speaker, that the occasion of the introduction of this legislation in respect to the international boundary commission provided an opportunity to bring to the attention of the members of this house, as well as the people of Canada, the sort of work that has been going on spontaneously and voluntarily for two years and is now being recognized in this formalized way.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Commission's powers.

Mr. Pearson: Clause 3 deals with the powers of the commission. I take it that these are all powers that the commission has been exercising under the treaty. There are no new powers?

Mr. Green: The commission has never been given the legal power to do these acts. Under the treaty there are certain obligations undertaken such as, for example, to keep boundary vistas open; to move boundary monuments to new sites, and to maintain at all times an effective boundary line between Canada and the United States and between Canada and Alaska. This work has been carried on without having any legislative sanction in so far as Canada is concerned. I understand that under United States law the very fact that the United States implements a treaty means that the power to carry out what the treaty calls for is given. However, this is not the case in Canada. This clause 3, therefore, is designed to give the commission the power to carry out the acts which, under the treaty, it is set up to carry out.

Mr. Herridge: Could the minister tell us who are the present Canadian commissioners?

Mr. Green: There is only one commissioner, Mr. Lambert. I should like to join in the tribute paid by the Leader of the Opposition to the commissioners who have carried out the work under this treaty, both the present commissioner and his predecessors, as well as their staffs. The very fact that there has been no friction or trouble arising between the two countries as a result of the work being done speaks volumes for the efficient way in which this commission has carried out its work.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Permission required to construct or enlarge work near boundary.

Mr. Pearson: This clause establishes certain offences and provides for penalties. May I ask the minister how the commission operated from 1925 to the present without these prohibitions and penalties? What happened under the earlier arrangements if these things were done?

Mr. Green: I presume the commission has been able to work by persuasion rather than being in a position to impose a decision on anyone. The Leader of the Opposition will have noticed that the bill is not made retroactive, and the restrictions do not apply to any buildings which have been erected at the time the bill becomes law. They apply only, for example, to a building which will be erected after the bill becomes law.

Mr. Pearson: I take it what is happening now is that, in addition to persuasion, which has been effective in the past, we now have a $500 fine or six months' imprisonment.

Mr. Green: Yes, that is right. I pointed out, Mr. Chairman, one case which could be very worrisome; that is the proposal of the Great Northern railway to erect a station straddling the border. It might be a little more difficult to persuade the railway company without having a law which would give the commission the power to prevent such action.

Mr. Pearson: It might be difficult to put them in jail, too.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 to 8, inclusive, agreed to.

International Boundary Commission

On clause 9—Claims in tort against Canadian commissioner.

Mr. Herridge: For the benefit of a layman like me, will the minister explain exactly what this clause means?

Mr. Green: This clause is designed to protect the commissioner against damage suits. In other words he would not have to meet a judgment for any trespass committed or any damage done of a similar nature. It really puts the crown behind the acts the commissioner may do.

Mr. Chevrier: While I think the clause is perhaps a good one and should go in for the protection of the servant of the crown, the situation as it appears at the moment is this. I have no recollection of having seen this provision in any other statute, although it may be in other acts. I am thinking now only of the acts for which I had some responsibility in years gone by, and in them I never saw a similar clause. Does it not follow by the ordinary common law and, I take it, by the civil law also, that if a servant of the crown commits a tort while in the performance of his duty, the legal responsibility is with the crown if he is a crown employee? My question is this. Why has it been found necessary to put this clause in the act?

Mr. Green: I have not gone into that particular question myself. I would have thought the situation was as the hon. member for Laurier has suggested. Perhaps I had better get the officials down here on the floor and get that information from them.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Mr. Chevrier: Just a minute, please.

Mr. Green: Perhaps the clause could stand.

Mr. Pearson: I think the matter is somewhat important. Perhaps we ought to have this information. We are now creating new offences for which a penalty can be inflicted. A commissioner has these new offences to face in coming years. I am not criticizing in any way the introduction of the legislation, because the minister has shown that conditions have now changed and that it is required. Nevertheless it is an important change to create offences which did not exist before this legislation was passed. We therefore perhaps ought to have this information.

Mr. Green: Of course this particular clause does not create any new offences.

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Green: It is merely protecting the commissioner. It is the other clauses which deal with offences.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate that fact. I am not a lawyer, and perhaps I should not be talking about this matter, but does the fact that we have created new offences now make it necessary to give additional protection to the commissioner? I do not know.

Mr. Green: May that clause stand, and may we take clause 10?

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 9 stands.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 9—Claims in tort against Canadian commissioner.

Mr. Green: Apparently the need for this clause arises out of the fact that it is not necessary for the commissioner to be a civil servant. For that reason this protection must be provided. Of course there would be few similar situations. My officers cannot tell me at the moment of any provision of this type in any other legislation. However, that is the purpose of this legislation.

Mr. Chevrier: It looks as though this is a new clause and this is one of the first times, if not the first, that it has been included in any legislation. I am therefore prompted to ask this question. At the present time are there any commissioners who are not servants of the crown?

Mr. Green: There is another complication, namely that a civil servant may be appointed as a commissioner in addition to his ordinary duties and may not receive any pay for doing the work as commissioner. In a case of that kind he would not be protected against damage suits.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not answer my question, which was this. Are there now any commissioners who are not servants of the crown?

Mr. Green: I do not know of any.

Mr. Chevrier: Are these commissioners not appointed by the minister or by the governor in council? Are they so numerous that the information is not available? That is the point.

Mr. Green: No. The commissioner under the treaty would be appointed by order in council. In many cases commissioners do not have executive functions—for example, the members of the international joint commission—so that this problem would not arise in their case.

I understand that the clause in question has been drafted by the Department of Justice, or that it originates with them. As the hon. member knows, that is practically always the case. I do not think he needs to worry about this clause giving protection where there is not a need for protection. The most likely situation would be for example, where someone in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys happened to be appointed a commissioner under this treaty but would receive his pay for his job in the department. Under those conditions he would not be protected against a damage suit unless there was a provision of this kind.

Mr. Chevrier: In the case of a commissioner who is not a civil servant, or who is a perfect outsider, does not the common law in most of the provinces and the civil law in the province of Quebec apply to protect him while he is acting within the scope of his employment in pursuance of instructions received from his employer? Is he not protected from liability notwithstanding the inclusion of this clause?

Mr. Green: Evidently the law officers of the crown considered that protection was not adequate in this case.

FREIGHT RATES REDUCTION ACT

EXTENSION OF PERIOD OF APPLICATION OF REVISED RATES

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act to extend for not more than nine months the period during which the revised rates under the said act shall be applicable and to increase the authorized expenditure under the act by an additional fifteen million dollars.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister make a statement on this?

Mr. Hees: The Freight Rates Reduction Act was passed last year, as hon. members will recall. Its purpose was to alleviate the burden of the 17 per cent freight rate increase that had been authorized in November, 1958. The act made provision for the board of transport commissioners to require reductions, during a period not exceeding one year, in the class and commodity rates, other than competitive rates, that were in effect and taking the 17 per cent increase when the act came into force on July 8, 1959. It also made provision for payments to the companies not to exceed in the aggregate $20 million, as reimbursement for the resulting reductions in their revenues.

The committee will be interested to know what reductions in freight rates were accomplished under the legislation. The board required the companies to reduce, effective August 1, 1959, the 17 per cent freight rate increase by seven percentage points, that is to make it 10 per cent instead of 17 per cent on the rates affected. As figures of traffic actually carried during the year became known, the board determined that it could make a further reduction of two percentage points, bringing the 17 per cent down to 8 per cent, and this reduction was made effective on May 6 on traffic carried thereafter.

The freight rate reductions will expire on July 31 next, unless provision is made to continue them; and as the royal commission is still engaged in its inquiry respecting the railway situation the government has concluded that the benefits of the Freight Rates Reduction Act should be continued for a further period not exceeding nine months from July 31 next. The proposed amendments are for that purpose.

As the committee knows, last year's bill was considered very fully by parliament and was examined thoroughly by the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines of this house and also by the standing committee on transport and communications of the Senate. The proposed amendments will, as I said, extend the benefits of the act for a further period beyond July 31 next.

Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of the debate on second reading of this bill I propose to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for examination. Certain members of the committee have intimated to me that they would like this to be done, and I have concurred in their request.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): My remarks on this resolution will be brief. The minister will remember that last year we on this side supported the bill which was submitted to parliament, the Freight Rates Reduction Act, and there is no reason why we should not give this measure also our fullest support. That we intend to do.

As the minister has stated, this provides for a reduction in freight rates over a period of nine months. The resolution reads:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act to extend for not more than nine months the period during which the revised rates under the said act shall be applicable and to increase the authorized expenditure under the act by an additional fifteen million dollars.

The two questions which come to my mind on reading this resolution are, first of all, why there should be this period of nine months and, next, why the sum of $15 million. I presume the $15 million is the proportionate part of the $20 million which would be required for the full 12 months.

Then there is another question which arises. This other question is that by virtue of the statement made by both the Prime Minister and Minister of Transport, freight rates have now become frozen in this country. I think the present position of the application for a general increase in freight rates made by the railway association of Canada is as follows, and if I am incorrect I take it the minister will correct me. The order of the board of transport commissioners was, I believe, dated January 13, 1959 setting a date for the hearing for final relief requested in the application of the association, which application was dated September 16, 1958. The date of the hearing was set by order for May 19, 1959, and April 10, 1959 was the date set for filing the supplement to the application specifying the amount of increase sought by way of final relief.

On April 8, 1959 the railway association, in compliance with the above order of the board, filed a supplement to their application seeking authority for a general increase of 12 per cent in the level of freight rates and 20 cents per ton on coal and coke. The railway association on April 10 applied for postponement of the hearing of the supplementary application and the board postponed the hearing sine die.

The question which arises is this. Does the statement made by both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport with reference to the freezing of freight rates apply to the application which was made for an additional general increase of 12 per cent? I think it would be important for us to know what the position is in that respect. If it does, does it apply during the period of nine months only?

Mr. Hees: May I answer that question now? The answer is yes.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you. The other question that comes to mind is that of the royal commission on transportation. The minister should give us some information when he replies or on second reading, if it is not available now, on the progress that is being made by the royal commission on transportation. I believe this can be done without discussing a matter that is sub judice. It is not my intention nor have I any right to go into matters that are under discussion by the royal commission on transportation headed, I believe, by Mr. MacPherson, but the committee would be happy to have an idea of the work that is being done.

When the Freight Rates Reduction Act was discussed last year the Prime Minister was under the impression that within less than a year the royal commission could report. Of course I questioned that because of the experience I had had with the Turgeon commission, which certainly took more than two years to report upon a matter of this scope and importance.

I believe the committee is entitled to know (1) what the commission has done thus far; (2) where the commission has held its public hearings; (3) whether any additional hearings of a public nature will be held, and (4) when it is expected that the commission will hand down its report. I do not think I should go any further than that. Certainly I cannot discuss the briefs that were submitted to the commission on a number of matters that are important to all of us who deal with these questions, and I have no intention of so doing.

The order of the board No. 98424 which came into effect on July 10, 1959 referred to the statute, chapter 27, 7-8 Elizabeth II, an act to make provision for the reduction of certain class and commodity rates on freight traffic. It made operative the terms of the statute. By virtue of this order it then became possible for the railways to file amended tariffs with respect to which the act came into effect.

The question that comes to my mind now is this. Will this bill, when it is passed, become effective in the same way as did the bill last year under chapter 27, 7-8 Elizabeth II? Will the board of transport commissioners be required to pass a similar order to put this into effect?

Of course the main questions that come to mind are these. How has the act operated during the 12 months? What has been the effect of it? The minister has given one effect, where the reduction has been down to 8 per cent, which is all to the good and, I am sure, helpful all across Canada. I believe we should be given additional information as to how the act has operated in general. What has been the effect of these reductions on class and commodity rates? As the committee knows, there is no reduction whatever in so far as competitive rates are concerned. What has been the effect on the uniformity of the reductions? I believe the minister was well advised to tell us that in due course he will move that this matter be referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines so that we can obtain this information.

The minister was occupied with the whip and could not pay attention when I asked several questions earlier. I will simply repeat them quickly at this time. Why the nine months in the resolution, and why the $15 million? Again I say we are in full support of this legislation. We think it is good legislation, and that it will substantially assist those who are moving goods across Canada.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could be permitted to answer the hon. member at this time.

Mr. Argue: I do not wish to be rude to the minister, but he is a member of long standing and knows it is the practice to wait until all opposition members have spoken before replying. I want to be helpful to the hon. gentleman so we can get along with the business.

This resolution is made necessary because the royal commission has not yet reported on its inquiry into the freight rate structure and the question of equalization. Although the resolution will lead to the expenditure of another $15 million it will not mean any gain for the public by way of lower freight rates. It will merely mean that the present freight rate structure will be maintained for a nine-month period, presumably in the expectation that the royal commission will have reported by that time. Because this will prevent any increase in freight rates at this time we are pleased to support the motion.

This government has a varying record with respect to freight rates. It came into office on the definite commitment that under this administration freight rates would not be increased but would be equalized. I say that because of the repeated statements made by the Prime Minister and because of the action of the government before the 1958 election in disallowing a general 3.6 per cent increase in freight rates.

This resolution will continue the reduction by approximately 50 per cent in the last 17 per cent horizontal increase in freight rates. Even under the policy of this administration there has been an increase in freight rates. I have examined the result of general increases in freight rates since the end of the war, and have calculated that there has been a general increase of some 157 per cent.

Mr. Brunsden: Which bureau did you use?

Mr. Argue: I did not use the Martin bureau. I find the dominion bureau of statistics the most accurate. Failing that I would much rather rely on my own simple arithmetic.

Mr. Brunsden: Simple minded?

Mr. Argue: I would rather do that than take a chance on relying on the distinguished hon. member for Essex East. Since the Minister of Transport is himself a good mathematician and has the further advantage of learned advice from important officials, I am sure he will correct me if my figures are too modest or if I have forgotten to take into account one of the many increases that have occurred over the years.

This resolution maintains the status quo with respect to freight rates, and presumably will enable the commission to make its report before any change in rates occurs. The people on the prairies and I think also those in the maritimes are fed up with so many horizontal increases in freight rates. They have spoken out very strongly in favour of equalization and in support of all legislation which will prevent further increases in freight rates.

A royal commission has been set up to inquire into the freight rate structure of this country. After this royal commission completes its work I believe the government should consider an inquiry into the railway services that are being provided in this country. Only time will tell whether railway freight rates in this country will in fact be equalized or at least made more nearly equal than they are now. If we as a parliament do everything we can by way of legislation, by way of a royal commission, by way of subsequent prevention of freight rate increases, and at the same time allow railway services to deteriorate, we may find that we have railway rates equalized or frozen and are in fact losing the railway services so essential to the country.

This may or may not, Mr. Chairman, be the most appropriate place to make this statement, but I feel the time has now come when there should be an exhaustive inquiry into railway services in this country with the object of maintaining services essential for the growth and development of this nation. As I see it today, railway services are getting into a terrible mess. Services are being curtailed at an alarming rate.

While it is exceedingly necessary to take this kind of action, which we in the C.C.F. support, we feel that other action to maintain the services of the railways is now urgently required. I would hope that when he replies the minister will be able to give the committee some indication of when the royal commission will be making its report. I should like him to tell the committee if he can what the royal commission is doing at the moment. Has it adjourned? Are its hearings being continued at this time? Can he give the committee some rather firm indication—I know this is always subject to further experience—of when, within what period, parliament can expect to receive this long awaited and much needed report?

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, there are a few brief remarks I should like to make on this resolution. First of all I should like to point out to the hon. member that the 157 per cent increase was the figure given by one of the associations in our committee a year ago. There were a number of us who did not accept the figure because of the way it had been calculated.

Mr. Argue: It was my own figure.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): In any case, one of the associations had the same figure. They arrived at it by taking one of the figures as zero, and I did not think they worked it out equitably.

I want to commend the minister, as do those of us who live in western Canada and who are dependent upon the freight rate structure of this country, on his action in this regard. We are dependent upon the freight rate structure for all the goods we use; we in the agricultural industry and in the basic industries of the west are dependent on it. We appreciate the fact that this is the first time any government in Canada has done something about freight rates. We were very pleased when in May last a further reduction was made, after last year's legislation, lowering by a further 2 per cent the class and commodity rates. We hope this legislation will enable the board of transport commissioners to maintain the same rate for the remaining nine months period.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia stated—and I agree with him—transportation is of vital importance to us in western Canada, and we are watching with a great deal of interest the proceedings of the royal commission. We have great hopes in western Canada from the results of that commission.

When we speak of subsidies on freight rates generally, we in the west sometimes get the impression that a great many people in Canada feel that any subsidy paid to the railways is paid on behalf of the western Canadian farmers. We in the Conservative party from the west do not accept this premise at all. There is just as much reason for a subsidy to be paid on behalf of western farmers as for a subsidy to be paid on account of competitive rates in central Canada. We feel that any subsidy such as this one is of benefit to all Canadians, to the manufacturers in eastern Canada and in central Canada, to the people who are in business on both our coasts, to material and grain going east, and to the products of Canada's economy generally. We feel very strongly on this matter. We feel that any such subsidy should not be considered as a subsidy to the farmer of western Canada.

Unfortunately, as far as I can see this was the position of the hon. member for Laurier a year ago when we discussed this matter quite fully in committee. While he expressed some pious hopes that the Crowsnest pass rates would not be affected, he felt that the objective could be attained by a subsidy of some kind or another. We do not accept this at all. We do not accept the premise that a subsidy is paid on our behalf alone.

The other important thing about the reduction in the class and commodity rates is the beneficial effect it will have on our pulp and paper industry, on our feed grain going east and on a great amount of material coming out to western Canada. Certainly at a time when we are trying to do everything we can to meet the cost-price squeeze of the western farmer this is going to help along that line. It will also help to prevent the machinery companies from having any further excuse to raise their prices because of freight rates.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, prior to one o'clock I had been trying to emphasize the importance of freight rates and transportation generally in western Canada. Perhaps one of the better examples of how freight rates affect us is the recent disappointing decision of the board of transport commissioners with regard to rapeseed. We hope that the appeal to the supreme court will be successful or, if not, that the cabinet will reverse the decision. Certainly here is an instance where the agricultural economy of western Canada can be diversified if we can have reasonable freight rates on the particular product. When a country like Canada is importing over $100 million worth of oilseeds yearly it behooves us to consider this problem very seriously.

Finally I should like to make one or two remarks about the railways themselves. It seems to me that they do themselves no credit if the only way they can economize is by discontinuing services. They are going into the trucking industry, and before they go into it they are determined to give away any business they did have. I refer to the recent action of the Northern Alberta Railways, which discontinued services that were important to the people there and failed to supply an alternative service. I am talking about cream cans and mail going into the Peace river country, and into my home area. The railways tell us they are going into the trucking business and, as I say, they seem intent on giving away express and other business before they get into the trucking business.

I think the management of both major railways should have a very close look at some of the policies they are now following. With all their potential and the money they have behind them, they should certainly be able to find other ways of increasing their efficiency and economizing, if necessary, rather than just throwing up their hands and discontinuing services to people in various parts of the country. Again, sir, may I say we are very happy that the government is bringing in this measure to maintain the present freight rates which are so important to the people of Alberta and the rest of western Canada.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting patiently for the opportunity to speak on freight rates in general and freight charges on rapeseed in particular. I do not have anything to add to what I have said already on the subject, but I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport the fact that the situation has deteriorated much more and is worse than it was a few months ago.

Within the last month the board of transport commissioners found it wise, for reasons best known to themselves, to not classify rapeseed as a grain. The best authorities on agriculture and the best scientists having to do with grain and cereal plants testified at the hearing that rapeseed is a grain. However, the situation being what it is, the rapeseed industry of the west is faced with a serious problem. This year more than ever the rapeseed grower will be faced with unfair freight charges of 80 cents per hundredweight while his counterparts, the producers of other grains, will have to pay only 22 cents or 23 cents per hundredweight.

This year we will see the rapeseed crop increased from half a million to a million or a million and a half acres because of the fact that the farmers could not harvest their crops last fall and had to wait until spring to harvest them before planting new crops. The farmers were very late in harvesting their crops, and the only thing they could plant at that time was rapeseed, because it only takes about 60 to 70 days for the crop to mature. As I stated before, all indications are that we will be faced with a million or a million and a half acres of rapeseed.

I should like to emphasize most emphatically that unless the government undertakes measures to alleviate the situation, this young industry may suffer a blow from which it will never recover. Since this is the second time that the board of transport commissioners has refused to classify rapeseed as a grain, the only hope this young industry now has is that the Minister of Transport and the government will reverse the decision or will implement other measures whereby higher freight rates will not be charged on rapeseed than are charged on wheat, oats or barley. As the spokesman for a constituency in which half of all the rapeseed grown in Saskatchewan is produced. I should like to bring this point to the minister's attention again and appeal on behalf of the growers that action be taken to alleviate this serious situation.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, we are strongly in favour of the bill. I want to take this opportunity to speak in order to correct the record. As the result of remarks on this issue that I made previously this session I have been accused by several union representatives of advocating compulsory arbitration in labour matters, because of my suggestion that ultimately the stage is going to be reached when a new formula will have to be found in order to take the railway wage problem out of the present jackpot in which it seems to be. In many people's minds, I think certainly in the minds of the western farmers, the reason for the Freight Rate Assistance Act and the problems that brought it about, was the result of the wage negotiations, the wage increase given to railway employees. This attitude is an understandable one in an economy such as ours, where groups tend to recognize their own interests and be critical of others.

This situation is very apparent, Mr. Chairman, in the negotiations that are now under way between the railways and the unions, with no one having any clear-cut idea how to solve the problem of this particular type of collective bargaining. I think it is going to be a long time coming, but sooner or later we must find a formula that will enable railway workers to have their legitimate bargain struck and at the same time put both the railways and the users of the railways in some position of understanding and appreciating just how much leeway should be given to railway management in making concessions to the unions in the bargaining process. I believe this situation will be a long time in coming, but we certainly need some kind of formula or standard.

There have been arguments in the past, Mr. Chairman, that the wage set-up in the white goods industry should be the standard; that has been the suggestion put forward quite often by dominion representatives. Recently the argument has been put forward by the company that there should be a completely new basis. Sooner or later, because of the interest that the government and the very large government railroad have in this matter, and the way freight rates touch upon so many political, regional and industrial considerations, we have to find a way out of this dilemma.

The royal commission on transportation, as I have said before, needs our sympathies. I do not know what kind of recommendations it is going to make. This measure is a stopgap to give them a bit more time, which I know they need from being at some of their hearings and from reading reports. I suggest to the minister that he and his officials should be very much concerned with adumbrating now in their own minds a policy for the railways even before the royal commission report is in their hands, because it strikes me that the royal commission is quite limited in the scope of the recommendations it can make. The royal commission, in itself, is an interim measure. What we need is a long range or long term solution to this whole question of the position of the railways and their relationship to the treasury.

It is said that transport expenditures are beginning to shift more and more markedly in volume to the air rather than the rail field. We seem to have quite a bit of tidying up to do in the railway transportation field. We have a very large government railway with a substantial debt, and interest is not paid on that debt except in years in which the railway has a surplus. However, it does not appear as though that particular railway is going to reach a surplus position for some time. It seems to me it is the government's responsibility to arrive at a transportation policy that will enable the railways to go ahead. I cannot see how the royal commission is going to be able to do much more than make recommendations in so far as the Crowsnest pass rates are concerned.

I do not know whether the minister has noticed that the counsel for Manitoba, Mr. Morrow, has been going about to farm union groups and other groups on the prairies foreshadowing the solution to be arrived at by the royal commission. This seems to be that the Crowsnest pass rates will remain as they are but that the railways will be given a much freer hand in so far as the abandonment of lines may be concerned. There is a suggestion also that the railways should be given more scope in abandoning passenger services and other losing services of that nature. This procedure may commend itself to many members, just as the bill does, as a short-run solution to the problem, but it seems to me we have to arrive at something more substantial. In so far as abandonment is concerned, we have to consider the plight of the people who are living along the lines that are to be abandoned.

The other question that is fundamental to the railway problem, and again it is tied up with this Freight Rate Assistance Act because here is where much of the pressures generate, is automation and the capitalization for mechanical improvements on the railways. Then there is the whole question of unemployment created by the railways because of these modern methods. The problem needs a bit of a Solomon, and I do not know whether the minister is that Solomon or whether his officials can be. Certainly a very great responsibility rests upon the cabinet in connection with this matter. The royal commission and this particular measure we are about to pass are both, by their very nature, interim measures for the railways.

It is apparent from the hearings that have been held by the royal commission and the number of considerations being taken into account that this problem affects every part of the country in some way or another. I only hope the minister is not taking it easy, hoping for the royal commission report to enable the government to make its next moves in this field. It certainly seems to me this is one field in which we need the very best contributions we can get from management, from labour and from the agricultural industry in particular, which finds railway transportation still so fundamental in bringing its goods to market.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, during the debate so far we have had very good contributions and a number of questions have been asked. I shall answer them as best I can. The hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Assiniboia asked some questions about the operations of the royal commission. One question was, what is the commission doing at the present time? The answer is that there is an interval between public hearings. The commission is continuing its investigations, separate and apart from public hearings, and is considering the very voluminous submissions and opinions which have been received to date. Approximately 110 briefs have been received.

Another question was what further hearings, if any, are scheduled by the commission, and where will they be held? The answer is that the commission has held hearings covering 80 days at Fredericton, Charlottetown, Halifax, St. John's, Newfoundland, Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton, Victoria, Vancouver, Port Arthur, Quebec city, Toronto and Ottawa. The commission will hold further hearings at Montreal commencing on July 7 and at Ottawa commencing on September 12. Hearings will be held thereafter as may be necessary, but the Ottawa hearings are intended to be the final hearings.

The third question was, when does the royal commission expect to complete its work and make its report to the government? The answer is that the commission has not indicated to me how soon it expects to complete its work and make its report. I do know it is carrying on its investigations just as quickly as it can, and I hope there will be no cause for any undue delay in the completion of the investigation. It is my hope the work of the commission may be completed by the end of the year, and that I may receive a report very soon after that.

The hon. member for Laurier asked how the act has operated during the 12-month period which will end on July 31. Between August 1, 1959 and March 31, 1960, the first eight months of operation under the act, $11,349,362 was expended. If operations in the remaining four months were the same as the first eight months, that would require a further expenditure of $5,674,684 or a total of $17,024,044.

It became evident to the board of transport commissioners several months ago that the $20 million was not being used up at the rate that had been anticipated because of the fall off in freight traffic, and that a further reduction in the 17 per cent freight rate increase could be made for the last four months of the term. Hence this is how the money is expected to be spent during the last four months of operation. The overlap of July payments into August at the reduced rates, that is shipments made in July not reaching their destination until August, is expected to use up $900,000. The increase in reduction from 7 per cent to 9 per cent from May 1 to July 31 is expected to use up $1,277,400; and the addition of lake and rail traffic, that is the payments to steamship lines which all occur from April 1 to July 31, is expected to use up another $300,000, for a total of $2,477,400. This will leave a balance of approximately half a million dollars, it is expected, at the end of the 12-month period.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question there?

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: While the board cannot go beyond the $20 million, apparently from what the minister says they can spend less than the $20 million. Is there a carry-over of the half million dollars he has mentioned?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I believe that amount can be carried over into the following year. As I think I indicated earlier, the board is intending to carry on the reduction at 9 per cent rather than the original 7 per cent for several months after July 31; for just how many months is something that will remain to be seen, depending on the volume of freight traffic.

The hon. member for Laurier asked why this bill covers a term of nine months instead of twelve months. The answer is that we hope the commission will have completed its hearings by the end of the year, that the report will be received by the government shortly after that time, and that the government will have been able to formulate a plan for the future before April 1.

The hon. member for Laurier asked why the amount was $15 million instead of $20 million. I think the answer is obvious. The amount mentioned last year was $20 million for twelve months. At the same rate it would be $15 for nine months.

The hon. member for Jasper-Edson and the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort made useful contributions pointing out the position of those who grow rapeseed. I am pleased to tell them that I have taken careful note of the useful contributions they made in this debate.

I think I have answered the questions that have been asked. I want to thank the hon. members who have spoken for the useful contributions they have made.

If I may do so, I should now like to make the following suggestion to the committee. As I have indicated, I propose to move that this bill, after receiving second reading, should go to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, where it will be thoroughly discussed. My officials and the officials of the board of transport commissioners will be there to answer detailed questions. Inasmuch as the bill, both in French and in English, is available at the present time, I wonder whether hon. members would agree to give unanimous consent to second reading to the bill and then to refer the matter to the standing committee in order that we might expedite the business of the house. I am in the hands of the committee; it is for hon. members to say just whatever they wish to do.

Mr. Chevrier: We on this side of the chamber have no objection to that procedure, on condition that the meeting of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines be not called until one week from today so that those groups, associations or individuals who want to make representations may have plenty of time in which to do so.

Mr. Hees: I can assure the committee that will be the case. As I indicated yesterday, the chairman of the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines will be asking his steering committee and the full committee to meet, if they consider it desirable to do so, a week from today in order to consider the amendments to the shipping act. This bill could not be considered until after that business had been disposed of. I do not know whether the business before the committee will permit this bill to be heard on that date, but it would not be heard before that date. However, I am sure it will be heard as soon as possible.

Mr. Argue: I expect the bill will be a simple one along the lines of the one a year ago, and in keeping with the resolution and the statement made by the minister. That being the case we are quite agreeable to going along with second reading of the bill today after it has been introduced. In keeping with the kind of co-operation the minister is now receiving from opposition parties, I hope he will be prepared to make one or two comments in reply to a couple of questions that I should like to put to him.

The royal commission has full authority to inquire into every aspect of railway operation affected by freight rates, and it has authority to inquire into the Crowsnest rates and how, if in any way, these rates have adversely the railway income. As far as I know, I think it is fair to say that the opposition of every political party in this chamber is that the Crowsnest rates should not be tampered with and that, no matter what the report may be, the producers who today receive the advantages of the Crowsnest rates shall not be adversely affected.

There may or may not be some alternative method decided upon to relieve any burden the royal commission may find flows from the Crowsnest rates. I am not suggesting in any way that the Crowsnest rates are a burden. I do not believe they are a burden. But this government is on record in the past as being not only fully in support of the Crowsnest rates but determined, as a matter of government policy, that these rates shall not be tampered with. Every time a railway company goes before the royal commission and attacks the Crowsnest rates there is a feeling of uneasiness on the prairies; and this bogey of interference with the Crowsnest rates is raised from time to time.

I think the minister would be doing a real service to Canadians in general and to the people of western Canada in particular if he were prepared at this time to reaffirm the policy and attitude of the government as far as the Crowsnest rates are concerned. I am not endeavouring in any way to imply that the government's position in this regard is weakening, or that the position of the government is not clear. But because of these persistent and consistent attacks in the press by railway companies and by others who have their own axes to grind with regard to the Crowsnest rates I think it would be a service to parliament if the minister would reaffirm the government's position in connection with these rates.

There is a second question I should like to ask the minister, and that has to do with the recent decision of the board of transport commissioners with regard to rapeseed. I agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson in his reference to the way the railway companies have been allowed to reduce services with very little thought, in his opinion and also in mine, to the loss of revenue to the railway companies themselves and certainly without any consideration for the communities involved. We feel that the board of transport commissioners has been somewhat lax in allowing this wholesale reduction of railway services.

With regard to the freight rates affecting rapeseed, it has been contended, and I think rightly so, that rape should be considered a grain for the purpose of freight rates. This has not been agreed to by the board of transport commissioners. In other words the board has made an adverse decision on this point. As has already been stated, the government has it within its power to set aside, alter or change in any way any ruling of the board. I believe that power is contained in section 53 of the Railway Act. I would ask the minister whether the government is in fact considering the possibility of making any change in the ruling, either by setting it aside or by amending it. This government—and I give it full credit—has on at least one occasion found it desirable to set aside a ruling of the board of transport commissioners. That precedent is at hand. I hope it will be followed in connection with rapeseed so that producers of rapeseed may be on the same basis as producers of other grains in the province.

I have, then, two questions to ask the minister; first, whether he will reaffirm the government's position with regard to the Crowsnest rate, and second, whether or not the government has under consideration this decision of the board of transport commissioners concerning rapeseed, and when an announcement may be made as to whether the government is upholding this decision or taking action to set it aside.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question? Was the hon. member in the house some weeks ago when the Prime Minister made a declaration with respect to the Crowsnest rates, in the course of which he said that those rates would be held inviolate? Perhaps if the hon. member was not in the house he has read the statement in Hansard.

Mr. Hees: I think that very well answers the question. That was the answer I was about to give. I believe that when this bill was introduced last year the Prime Minister was asked the very same question. He gave the house an assurance that the Crowsnest pass rates would not be tampered with, and when the Prime Minister gives an assurance that assurance stands.

Mr. Argue: This session?

Mr. Hees: When the Prime Minister gives an assurance that assurance stands.

Mr. Argue: It did not with regard to the introduction of the bill of rights.

Mr. Chevrier: What about unemployment?

An hon. Member: "No one will suffer".

Mr. Hees: I think I have made myself clear. The Prime Minister said no one would suffer, and no one has—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I asked two questions. I think the minister sidestepped the first.

Mr. Hees: I got decoyed.

Mr. Chevrier: You certainly were decoyed, all right.

Mr. Argue: I am certainly disappointed that the hon. gentleman did not make a definite statement at this time to the effect that it was the government's attitude that the Crowsnest rates would not be interfered with. Instead, he has taken the course of saying that the Prime Minister had stated at one time that it was the government's policy that they should not be interfered with, and letting the matter go.

My second question was whether the government had under consideration the decision of the board of transport commissioners with regard to rapeseed, and whether there is any possibility that producers of rape may have the same freight rates applied to their product as producers of other grains.

Mr. Hees: To come back to the first question, I think the hon member for Assiniboia is just trying not to understand what I said. I said that a year ago the Prime Minister stated in this house that the Crowsnest rates would not be tampered with, and when the leader of this party makes a statement, that statement stands.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not correct.

Mr. Hees: That is exactly the way the situation stands at the present time. The Prime Minister said they will not be tampered with, and they will not be tampered with.

Mr. Argue: That is a little better.

Mr. Hees: Regarding the question of rapeseed, I have listened very carefully on numerous occasions to constructive views put forward to me by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort. I listened this afternoon to the views put forward by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson and other hon. members who have brought this matter to my attention, and I can assure the hon. member for Assiniboia that I have the matter under careful consideration.

Mr. Argue: My question was, has the government under consideration the decision of the board excepting rapeseed from the benefits of the Crowsnest pass agreement? It was not whether the government has under consideration the whole general question of rape and the freight rate structure.

Mr. Hees: I think I have given a clear answer. I have said that the question which has been brought to my attention by hon. members who have spoken in the house is under my consideration at the present time. I cannot make it much clearer than that.

Mr. Argue: Since I take it from the minister's statement that the government has under consideration the setting aside of this order —and that must be what the answer means, because the question I asked was in those terms—may I further ask, if the government has under consideration this question of whether or not the decision is to be set aside, whether the minister can say when a decision may be reached in this regard?

Mr. Hees: I am also advised that this rapeseed case is at the present time on appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister state whether the government has the setting aside of this order under consideration?

Mr. Hees: I have made the position very clear, I believe. I have stated that we have this whole question under consideration at the present time as put forward to me by a number of hon. members. I am giving it consideration. I do not think I can make it much clearer than that.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister said in answer to a question by the hon. member for Assiniboia that the matter was under consideration. How can it be under consideration when it is under appeal from the board to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Hees: I said that the question as put forward to me and put forward so well by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, the hon. member for Jasper-Edson and other people has for some time been under consideration by myself as Minister of Transport, the responsible minister.

Mr. Chevrier: What can the minister do with a matter, even if he considers it for a week or a month or more if it is on appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, before the ruling is handed down by the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Hees: Would the hon. member mind explaining to me if there is any law against any minister giving consideration and study to an important matter? We on this side of the house in this government are constantly studying all important matters that affect the welfare of Canadians. I do not know whether the government of which the hon. member for Laurier was a member did so, but I doubt it, judging from the way it acted. I can assure the hon. member that the present government gives study and careful consideration to all important matters at all times.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, the minister has asked me a question and I think he is entitled to a reply. Yes, I will tell the minister how I think a matter can be considered. A matter like this can be considered under section 52 of the Railway Act. Under that section an appeal may be made to the governor in council. I take it that that has not been done. The other manner of handling it is by appeal from the board of transport commissioners to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The minister, after having said he has given it consideration, rose and announced that an appeal was pending before the Supreme Court of Canada. For the life of me I do not see how both appeals could have been launched at the same time. One is a judicial matter.

Mr. Hees: Perhaps I can clarify this in the mind of the hon. member for Laurier. You see, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal more closeness between our members of parliament and our members of the cabinet. Our members of parliament come to us very often and put propositions to us and explain situations in their ridings to which we give a great deal of careful study. It is a very simple procedure. The hon. member sits down in a chair and explains the situation. You sit across from him in your chair and listen very carefully to what he has to say. Then we give his proposal a lot of study, both by ourselves and with our officials, and do the very best job we can in terms of solving his problem. That is how this government works, and I believe that is the way any government should work. That is what I am doing in this case.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a weak answer to my question.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Argue: The hon. member for Laurier referred to section 52 of the Railway Act. I do not wish to disagree with him, but I believe he had section 53 in mind. I have the revised statutes before me. Section 53 has to do with the powers of the governor in council. As I read the section the governor in council may act upon a petition, but one is not necessary if he wishes to act on his own motion. Section 53 reads as follows:

> 53. (1) The governor in council may at any time, in his discretion either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary, or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the board, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order that the governor in council may make with respect thereto is binding upon the board and upon all parties.

I asked if the government was considering setting aside this ruling. The minister may or may not argue that it cannot be done because there is an appeal to the supreme court.

I want to make my position clear. The government should act under this section. It should set aside what in my opinion was a wrong decision of the board of transport commissioners. The people who grow rapeseed are perfectly justified in asking this government to take appropriate steps to place them on the same basis as other producers of grain. I do not use the general phrases that have been used by others who have spoken in this debate. I do not ask the minister for general consideration, for his benevolent smile or pat on the back. I ask for action to correct what in my opinion is a serious wrong now being done to the growers of rapeseed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hees thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-81, to amend the Freight Rates Reduction Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR CREATION OF NEW DEPARTMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to constitute a Department of Forestry which shall be presided over by a Minister of Forestry to be appointed under the Great Seal of Canada, to authorize the appointment of a deputy minister by the governor in council and the necessary officers, clerks and employees in the manner authorized by law, and to provide for the transfer of certain officers and employees of the Departments of Agriculture and of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the new department; that it is also expedient to bring in a consequential amendment to the Salaries Act to provide a salary for the Minister.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is preliminary to the introduction of a bill to set up a department of government. Possibly I might begin by referring particularly to the report of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters. I think this report deserves study on the part of all hon. members. It represents the results of a very intensive consideration of the problem of our forests, and is indicative of the favourable results which can be secured through the medium of committees which give to the consideration of the problems they have placed before them that care, acumen and attention which marked the investigation, hearing of evidence and recommendations of this committee.

I refer particularly to two of the recommendations in the third report to the house dated July 4, 1959. In paragraph 57 at page 1175 of the committee proceedings the following appears:

> Your committee strongly recommends consideration of steps which would widen the scope of the forestry branch, increasing its status in such a way that a deputy minister would be in direct charge. The fact that such a status, comparable to that of a department does not exist now reflects a lack of appreciation of the importance of the forest industries to Canada, in the past, now, and in the future. Other departments of government are considered essential to serve industries or aspects of our national economy which are of much lesser economic consequence.

Then at page 1176 we find the following:

> Your committee recommends that the entomological and plant pathology research relating to trees and forests, now under the Department of Agriculture, be transferred to and co-ordinated directly with the recommended and expanded forestry department.

Again, at page 1177 we find the following in paragraph 70:

> Your committee feels that Canada cannot afford to ignore a potential so great for lumber and pulp sales as is offered in the Orient and, therefore, it recommends that these markets be approached on an open minded basis. Study should be made of our changing share of traditional markets in the United Kingdom and the United States of America. A marketing section should be created within the proposed department of forestry to aid the Department of Trade and Commerce in the merchandising of our wood products.

These were several of the recommendations which at least formed the basis for the introduction of this resolution, following the passage of which the bill in question will be introduced.

While all the recommendations cannot necessarily be accepted at this time, and while in no way suggesting that the Department of Trade and Commerce has not carried out fully its responsibilities in connection with the marketing of lumber and such products, I thought I should place these various recommendations before the committee so that the comprehensive consideration given by the committee to this matter would be within the knowledge of hon. members.

The present function of the federal government with respect to forestry consists of providing for good management of the forests under its direct control, the extending of financial assistance to enable the provinces to intensify their efforts in specified phases of forest management, and the conduct of research relating to forest management and the utilization of forest products. During past years and at the present time research activities relating to forestry have been divided between two departments. The forestry branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is responsible for all aspects of forest management research except forest entomology and forest pathology, which are the responsibility of the research branch of the Department of Agriculture.

I might digress for a moment to say that this afternoon, by reason of my position, I am introducing this resolution, but the discussion and consideration thereof will be placed mainly upon the shoulders of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources under whose department this matter has been administered in the past.

A major reason for the establishment of the proposed new department is to bring together the research activities now conducted by two departments and thus to provide for better integrated and more effective research programs. In the past three years several of the provinces and many organizations representing various branches of the wood using industries have made urgent representations to the effect that the support being given to forestry and forest products research by the dominion government has not been commensurate with the significance of the forest industries to the national economy. When I mention the last three years I also know as a fact that similar representations were made prior thereto. From these representations and from other sources of information available to it, the government has concluded that the time has come when the dominion interests in forestry should be brought together in the hands of one minister.

I think I might commence by placing before the committee in summary form a few pertinent facts regarding the importance of the forest industry to Canada. More than 40 per cent of the land area of the 10 provinces consists of productive forest land. This area, by way of comparison, is almost four times as great as the area devoted to agriculture, which in capsule form reveals the extent of our forest resources. The pulp and paper industry is Canada's largest manufacturing industry; the lumber industry still stands high on the list. These industries are distributed throughout the country from coast to coast, and in addition to producing products of great value they are among the major sources of employment. External trade in wood, wood products and paper yields a balance in Canada's favour far larger than that contributed by any of the other major commodity groups recognized in national statistics form. Furthermore, a very large proportion of that favourable balance becomes available in United States funds.

In the past two or three years there have been studies of the demands for paper products and various other products in general which have been projected for a period of from 10 to 15 years and beyond. These projections and forecasts indicate radical increases within the period of time mentioned. Further expansion of Canada's forest industry is certainly possible. We have the raw material resources, and given a sufficiently good standard of forest management, the expansion can be maintained on a continuing basis. However, if the drain on the forest is to be radically increased and, at the same time, forest devastation is to be avoided, there are serious problems in forest management and forest protection which must be overcome. All of this emphasizes the increasing need for research the aim of which would be the improvement in management and utilization of forest products. Such programs must be accompanied by more economic research in order to help ensure that Canadian products can be placed on world markets at acceptable costs.

The conduct of forest and forest products research has been for many years a function of the dominion government, which now has unusually well developed research facilities in this field, by a wide margin the strongest of those facilities. The research function is not the exclusive prerogative of the federal government but is shared by some of the provinces, the university forestry schools and the industry itself. I hope the new department will be able not only to intensify the efficiency of federal forest research but also help to bring about co-ordination of research programs conducted by other agencies. I believe this objective is necessary if Canada is to meet the challenge which expanding world markets for forest products will present in the coming years.

I might point out that in September, 1959, the food and agriculture organization brought out a report dealing with paper and paper products which stated in summary form that while world demand for paper and paper products in 1955 amounted to 56 million metric tons, in 1965 it will amount to 88 million metric tons and by 1975 to 134 million metric tons. At the present time Canada supplies about 16 per cent of the world market. If we are to maintain this percentage it will be necessary to supply 14 million metric tons by 1965 or a 50 per cent increase over the basic year 1955. By 1975 Canada will have to supply 21 million metric tons or a 123 per cent increase over the basic year. Even though there is some unused capacity at present in this country there would seem to be good prospects for the Canadian paper industry to more than double its present production in 15 years.

I am not going to go into details as to the net value of the products of the forest and forest industries. I simply point to the general position of these industries as outlined in my remarks earlier. I think it will be generally agreed that these are industries which have inherent in them the possibility of vast developments over their situation today.

We now come to the question of responsibility. In no way is the government, having at all times stood solidly behind the need of preserving the constitution in its entirety, desirous of interfering nor would it for a moment countenance any interference or invasion of the constitutional responsibility of the provinces in this connection or in any other. We believe it is the duty of the federal government to provide for the best practical management of forests under its direct control, but the greater part of Canada's forests are administered by the governments of the provinces in which they are located. Section 92, subsection 5 of the British North America Act provides that the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws respecting "the management and sale of the public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon". As I said a moment ago, this in effect gives to each province the exclusive right to manage publicly owned forests within its boundaries as it sees fit, and I reiterate and make it explicitly clear that the new department will in no way infringe upon or impinge on any of the rights and jurisdiction of provincial governments.

On the other hand, those federal activities relating to forest and forest products research and the financial assistance offered to the provinces to help to improve the management of their forests are carried on primarily for the benefit of the provinces themselves and to help the forest industries. More specifically, research findings of the dominion government are made available to provincial forest administrators and industrial forest operators so that they may make such use thereof as they deem fit and proper.

The proposal to establish a department of forestry reflects the realization of the importance of the forest industries and the resource on which they depend for raw materials. It will provide for more effective use of the resources available for promoting better forest protection and management and better use of the wood that the forests grow, without in any way affecting the right and jurisdiction of the individual provinces to administer their own forests in whatever manner they deem fit.

So far as the bill is concerned, I, of course, am denied the opportunity to go into any particulars now, but I would say in summary that the purpose the government has in mind in introducing this resolution on which the bill will be founded is to provide for the conduct of research relating to the protection, management and utilization of the forest resources of Canada and the better utilization of forest products. To that end it will require the establishment and maintenance of laboratories and other necessary facilities for the attainment of these purposes.

We believe too that the federal government will thereby be able to undertake to promote and recommend measures for the encouragement of public co-operation in the protection and wise use of forest resources. We believe that provision should also be made so that the federal government may enter into agreements with the government of any province or with any person for forest protection and management or forest utilization and also for the conduct of research relating thereto, or for forestry publicity or education.

We believe too that there is a field for the federal government in the making of forestry surveys and providing advice relating to the protection and management of forests on lands administered by any department or agency of the government of Canada. Also, where any province desires the co-operation of the federal authorities and requests it, agreements may be arrived at for the protection and management of any of our forests in so far as research is concerned to the end that in co-operation we will be able to provide new opportunities for private enterprise to develop and expand, with the government assuming its responsibility to provide the opportunity through research to bring about utilization in the most beneficial manner and to the maximum extent of these resources which constitute for our country one of its basic strengths and which, if properly conserved in a scientific manner, will permit and assure the perpetuation of this resource for all time to come.

That in summary is the basis upon which I present to the committee, and I trust it will be acceptable, a measure which I feel sure will enable a greater and more diverse use and utilization of these resources which are of such importance to the national economy and to the standard of living of our country.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, with some of the things that the Prime Minister has just stated I find myself in complete agreement. With respect to others I will have to reserve my opinion until such time as I have seen the bill. When one looks at the resolution—perhaps I had better put it on Hansard since it is relatively short—one finds that it says:

> That it is expedient to present a bill to constitute a department of forestry which shall be presided over by a minister of forestry to be appointed under the Great Seal of Canada, to authorize the appointment of a deputy minister by the governor in council and the necessary officers, clerks and employees in the manner authorized by law, and to provide for the transfer of certain officers and employees of the Departments of Agriculture and of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the new department; that it is also expedient to bring in a consequential amendment to the Salaries Act to provide a salary for the minister.

What I think are the governing words in this resolution, as the Prime Minister himself has indicated because of the stress which he has laid upon them in the early part of his remarks, are that this new department is to provide for the transfer of certain responsibilities now in the Department of Agriculture and in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the new department.

Before I discuss that, there are one or two things that come to my mind. The Prime Minister stated that this resolution is the result of a recommendation that came out of a standing committee of the house, which I believe was mines, forests and waters. He took advantage of the opportunity to speak in highly favourable terms of the work of that and other committees. While I am not a member of the committee in question, and while I cannot speak with authority about it, I must bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the fact that his over-all statement does not apply in any way to all the committees of this house. While all of the committees of this house have received work from here, either by way of bills or other matters, I do not believe it can safely be said that the idea which the Prime Minister has always had that committees could do a great deal of the work of parliament has worked out to the end which he had in mind when he made the statement earlier.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him, I did not say do a great deal of the work of parliament, but do a great deal of the work of investigations to assist the work of parliament.

Mr. Chevrier: If the Prime Minister wants it that way, I have no objection. The point I am making is that when most of the work or a large portion of the work is assigned to these committees in the dying days of the session it is impossible to carry out what the Prime Minister had in mind, as has been the case and as is the case now. Here we have been sitting now for approximately three weeks since eleven o'clock in the morning and beginning next week we will be sitting practically continuously from 11 in the morning until 11 at night, with an hour's adjournment at lunch, and I say this is not the time nor are these the circumstances under which the work which the Prime Minister and many of us on this side of the house had in mind can be properly conducted. However, that was not the purpose of my rising, that was by way of an aside.

Mr. Fulton: And out of order, too.

Mr. Chevrier: When my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, says I was out of order, let me remind him that the Prime Minister was also out of order because he discussed this in the opening part of his speech. I felt I could make some reply to it.

The matter that is being discussed now is whether or not it is advisable for this house to consider the setting up of a new department. As I said at the outset, I am not rising to approve of the legislation, neither am I rising to oppose it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: You must be in a very awkward position, then.

Mr. Chevrier: My friends laugh; they are accustomed to laughing at everything that is said from this side of the house. They have laughed about a number of things that have happened elsewhere in this country, but now they are laughing on the other side of their faces.

Let me go on. As I said earlier, we would like to reserve our position until such time as we see the bill. When we have seen the bill the Leader of the Opposition will make our position known on second reading. There is nothing the matter with that position. Our friends have followed that procedure when they were on this side of the house, why should they laugh at me when I make that statement?

Mr. Pearson: They were not around then.

Mr. Chevrier: Of course they were not. They are so numerous now that they think themselves infallible in making the statements that they make. It seems to me I should suggest to my hon. friends, with all the emphasis I am able to muster, that it would be much better for them if they gave those of us who rise on this side of the house to deal with matters of this nature an opportunity to be heard.

There are some questions that come to my mind in the course of the discussion concerning this new department. One of them is this: Why is it necessary to set up a new department for this purpose? I have looked at the division of the Department of Agriculture which deals with forest biology, and it does not seem to be a very large section of the Department of Agriculture. I have before me a listing of the division of forestry within the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and that division does not seem to be a very large one, either. It would strike me, at first blush, that there may be a better method—perhaps there is not—of bringing these two important branches of two departments within either the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources or some other department without establishing a new department.

I agree, as I said earlier, with what the Prime Minister has said with respect to the importance of the forest products industry. There is no one on this side of the house or, I believe, in any other part of the house, who will not be willing to admit that here is an industry which has taken on more and more importance as the years have passed. While it is desirable, I believe, and while we support the unification of such services as are to be found in the Department of Agriculture, represented by forest biology, and in the department of northern affairs, represented by the forestry branch, and that this will facilitate more effective co-ordination and prevent undue duplication, I wonder about the forest products division in the Department of Trade and Commerce. Has any consideration been given to taking that branch of trade and commerce and putting it within the new service in order to unify and strengthen them without, for that matter, establishing a department?

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say to you here that it is extremely difficult for me to carry on under these circumstances when on my left is a continual mumbling and bumbling. I do not know what the hon. member is saying, but if he wants to ask a question, let him do so. It is extremely difficult for me to carry on under these circumstances.

Mr. Ricard: To whom is the hon. member referring?

Mr. Chevrier: I am referring to the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

Mr. Ricard: Pardon me, I have not said anything.

Mr. Chevrier: You have not said anything but you have been mumbling and bumbling during the whole course of my remarks.

Mr. Ricard: I have not done any mumbling or bumbling.

Mr. Chevrier: I call upon you, Mr. Chairman, to have the rules of this committee upheld under the circumstances.

Mr. Ricard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have never opened my mouth all afternoon. I have been listening to the hon. gentleman. I have said nothing at all. I apologize to the hon. member, but I have said nothing at all.

Mr. Fulton: He is confused with the mumbling and bumbling coming from his own mouth.

Mr. Chevrier: We get some from the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fulton: Don't lose your temper.

The Chairman: May I ask for the co-operation of all hon. members in order to give the hon. member who has the floor a chance to say what he wishes to say.

Mr. Chevrier: I have stated that we felt that consideration should also be given to the inclusion of the forest products division in the Department of Agriculture. We also support the idea of giving to forestry and forest products more prominence in the federal set-up in order to attract more attention to the forest industries which are so vital to Canadian prosperity and development.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but he is following an interesting line and I should like to ask him to explain just what he meant by that last sentence.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the Prime Minister for the interruption and I shall be glad to do as he asks. I was going on to say that in this connection I thought the government should do much more than it has been doing recently with reference to the marketing of our forest products abroad. That consideration leads me to the point that I had arrived at, namely, as the Prime Minister has said, that the forest products industry area has extended tremendously, that the pulp and paper industry is one of Canada's largest industries, and that the timber industry is taking on greater and greater importance. There could be no greater agreement with the Prime Minister on that statement.

However, it seems to me that these forest products industries which have to export their products are in a difficult position having regard to what is happening on the continent of Europe. I refer, of course, to the great regional areas like the common market, the outer seven, the soviet bloc and the others that are being established there with a view to bringing about lower tariffs within their own confines where services, persons and capital can move as if there were no international boundary at all, with the danger—perhaps not clear-cut at the moment but to be foreseen in the future—of a tariff being established against those who live outside the boundaries of those areas.

The point I am trying to make is that everything should be done in that respect to assist that industry. I said—and I repeat it with deference—that I did not think enough was being done. For instance, what has been done by the Minister of Finance and announced in the House of Commons here on one occasion at least, if not more than one, with reference to liaison being established between Canada and the United States and these groups is not enough. It seems to me that is not enough. I think that a great deal more must be done. Particular proof that it is not enough lies in the fact that the attempt to bring the outer seven and the common market closer together in recent weeks has not been too successful.

We are opposed, however, to any move by the federal government designed to take over the jurisdiction the provinces have in this field according to our constitutional provisions. In that connection the Prime Minister has made the position, in so far as the government is concerned, quite clear, I believe. After having referred to the section of the British North America Act which gives to the provinces legislative authority with reference to public lands and the sale of timber thereon, the Prime Minister stated that there was no intention to countenance any invasion of the constitutional responsibility of the provinces. Those are the words he used, as I have taken them down. Again, at a later point he said that the new department will in no way impinge upon the rights of provincial governments.

That statement, of course, is a welcome and timely one, and it leads me to ask this question. Notwithstanding the statement made by the Prime Minister, has there been any discussion with the provinces in connection with this matter? It may be that the government, before introducing this legislation, should have waited to ascertain the outcome of the federal-provincial conference on natural resources. The Prime Minister said nothing in respect of that matter. When he closes the debate perhaps he would be good enough to deal with that problem. It seems to me that the government would then have been in a much better position to see what it could conveniently and properly do in this field in conjunction with the provinces.

The department, of course, will be an important one, because it will deal with one of the basic problems of the Canadian economy. However, it is bound to be a relatively small one if it does not invade the jurisdiction of the provinces; and the Prime Minister has indicated, of course, that there was no intention in that respect. It is for that reason that we are wondering whether it would not be better, more profitable or more practical to bring this new research service together with a similar one under the authority of only one minister. Under the circumstances which the Prime Minister has explained, that this department will have to do with a great deal of research, is it wise to establish a new department? Would it not be better to bring under one minister these three various elements which have to do with the problem?

I am sure that I will offend no one when I say that we have the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, for instance, which is an important department in its own right. Would that not be the logical place in which to bring together all these research facilities and all of these various divisions which are being taken from other departments? It might well be that the department could be called the department of mines, forests and technical surveys. This suggestion may not be agreeable to the government but it seems to me that it is something which is logical. It is certainly something which could be indicative of the saving of large sums of money. I say that subject, of course, to what is contained in the bill which I have not yet seen, but if there is a logical place for all these forestry division to go, that would appear to me to be an excellent solution.

May I say to the Prime Minister that it appears to me that the number of ministers is already too high. In that connection a redistribution of functions and responsibilities between these departments would be highly desirable, and that would be met by the suggestion which I have just made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the hon. gentleman, with the wide experience he has had as a minister, tell the committee what would be the proper size? He says there are already too many ministers. It would be interesting to hear someone of his experience give the committee the benefit of his views in that respect, because we have not increased the size up to this time.

Mr. Chevrier: The Prime Minister has stated that he intends to set up a new department. I have said that I believe there are too many departments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Too many ministers.

Mr. Chevrier: Too many ministers at the present time. Could that be met by the suggestion which I made earlier that these two services, which are going to be small divisions of this department, should be brought within the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys giving that department the responsibility for the research that you have in mind?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection to this kind of interruption; I welcome it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —but the opinions of a former minister can be very helpful. We have not increased the number of ministers up to now, and the hon. gentleman, who sat from 1945 until his appointment to the St. Lawrence seaway authority and who, after the conclusion of his services to that authority was again a minister, might perhaps be able to tell the committee to what degree and in what number there are too many ministers, because he is speaking of his experience when the number was the same as it is today.

Mr. Chevrier: It is obvious that all the ministers in existence today are not needed. I say that to the Prime Minister with deference, because it has been stated here by our members on this side, and in other places; and I do not want to reflect on any private individual; that is why I am very hesitant about replying to the Prime Minister, other than to deal with the question in a general way and say that surely the right hon. gentleman knows there are ministers who are not charged with sufficient duties or sufficient responsibilities. I do not want to go further than that. I do not want to offend any individual.

However, if this situation exists, I ask the question: why add another minister? I have put forward a suggestion for a solution. The Prime Minister may perhaps want to place these divisions under some other department, but it would strike me that mines, forests and technical surveys would be an ideal place, because if a new ministry is to be established I doubt whether there is sufficient work in that context to justify the appointment of a new minister. If that is the case, why not expand within the department, within the department of northern affairs, if that would be thought advisable, within the Department of Agriculture, if that be thought advisable, or along the lines that I suggested earlier?

The Prime Minister said that the purpose of the bill is to provide for the conduct of research relating to the production and management of the various projects, including agreements with the provinces, for research relating thereto, and also for various surveys. All that is important, and I do not think anyone on this side would criticize the importance of those duties, responsibilities and purposes. What is, I think, the subject of criticism is the fact that a new ministry is considered necessary for these purposes. Everything is contained within one or two or three ministries at most to centralize this research in connection with forests, lumber and other products. Those were the ideas I had in mind to express when I rose to discuss the resolution.

Again, I say it is difficult until the bill is before us to know exactly what is contained in it and to deal positively with it. With that end in mind, as I said earlier, the views of the opposition will be made known upon second reading of the bill when we have had an opportunity to consider it. What I have said is indicative of what we feel at the moment and can be summed up in a few words: there is unquestionably a necessity for greater expansion in the field of research, but I doubt very much whether there is a necessity to establish a new portfolio with that end in view, and it would strike me that the solution is to add the services which exist in other departments to those of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and call it the department of mines, forests and technical surveys.

Mr. Herridge: I listened with interest to the statement made on this resolution by the Prime Minister, and I was also interested to note that for the first time for some weeks there are ten or eleven cabinet ministers in the house in addition to the Prime Minister. So I judge that this matter is considered to be of great importance.

I listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier and I must say that I was somewhat disappointed in his negative approach to this question and his waffling around, shall I say, with the federal-provincial rights question. Also, I think the hon. member lost a tremendous opportunity to score for his own province. Here is a department being established—a new department of forestry—in which his own province is greatly interested. This is of great concern to the province of Quebec. Here is a new minister to be appointed, yet I judge from the remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier that he is willing to lock the door, according to his remarks, to the opportunity to get annother cabinet minister from Quebec into this government.

I was surprised, also, to hear the hon. gentleman rise and say that at this stage of the proceedings he and his supporters were neither for the measure nor against it. One of the functions of parliament in my opinion is to convert the forest fires of ideas and discontent into a central heating unit of effective legislation. We in this group have supported for years the idea of the establishment of a department of forestry.

Mr. Bigg: There were too many clinkers around.

Mr. Herridge: There has been considerable discontent among some employers and employees in the forest industry that this important segment of the Canadian economy was not recognized by a separate department in the federal government with a minister in charge. Therefore we view this measure as a legislative heating unit to which we give whole-hearted support.

For years various organizations and persons representing the industry have urged the necessity for a federal-provincial conference to establish a national policy with respect to principles for the administration of our forests and the need for a federal department. This was stressed by the Canadian forestry association in representations to the government, at conferences and so on. It was strongly and unitedly urged by representatives of the British Columbia forest industry. I expect we will hear from the hon. member for Comox-Alberni on this subject. The hon. gentleman is eminently qualified to speak about the forest industry with knowledge and experience. It has been urged by universities and I have read many editorials across Canada urging this proposal. Last year the report of the committee on mines, forests and waters included the recommendation to which the Prime Minister drew attention. I must say if there is one place I feel at home it is on this subject and I will probably get lost in the woods for 20 minutes.

Mr. Hees: Oh, no.

Mr. Herridge: I love being lost in the woods at times. I was a student of forestry in 1909. Although very young I owned a timber holding which I still own. I am proud to say I have more timber on the same land than I had 50 years ago with an average rate of growth of 500 board feet per acre.

Mr. Bigg: You are a capitalist.

Mr. Herridge: I say this because when I rise to speak hon. members on the other side sometimes look at me as though I did not know what I was talking about. However, I speak with confidence on this resolution. I have been interested in this subject since I was a young man. In my own way I have always done what I could, as have all hon. members of this group, to urge upon the federal and provincial governments the need for the policy I have mentioned.

There have been many resolutions from organizations across the country urging the very course indicated in this resolution. We were pleased to hear the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources announce a federal-provincial conference on resources for tomorrow or for the future, whatever the term is.

The previous federal ministers concerned have hesitated to take action in this field because of fear of transgressing on provincial rights. From our point of view there was no necessity for this fear. We all recognize provincial rights in this field. What will be done under this legislation and as a result of a dominion-provincial conference will be done through agreement.

I will briefly outline the evolution of ideas in connection with the motion before us. Progress has been slow both in Canada and the United States. These ideas have been brought before the public only as the result of the action of a few devoted organizations and individuals. Here are the highlights. The former United States president Teddy Roosevelt sparked the development of conservation policies in that country. The first evidence of action was the establishment of a school of forestry at Yale in 1900. These growing interests developed in Canada. The first forestry congress was called in 1906 by the governor general of the day and the then prime minister the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In 1907 we saw the establishment of a school of forestry in Toronto. In 1907 there was established a royal commission on conservation the reports of which may be found in the library. The chairman was the Hon. Clifford Sifton. A member was the father of the present Minister of Justice, the Hon. Frederick Fulton, formerly commissioner of lands in British Columbia, if I remember correctly.

In 1949 we witnessed the introduction of the Canadian Forestry Act as the result of activity on the part of various organizations. Good work has been done under the act with respect to grants to the provinces for forest inventories which are essential and with respect to the approach to the insect pest question and so on. In 1954 a resources conference was held in Ottawa sponsored by the Canadian forestry association, the agricultural institute of Canada and other organizations. In 1955 the commonwealth conference on resources was held in Canada. Meetings were held in various places in the country and the operation of the industry in various provinces were visited. In 1956 a second resources conference sponsored by the Canadian forestry association and others was held in Winnipeg. In 1959 we had the announcement of the plan for a federal-provincial conference on resources for the future. Today we have before us a resolution to establish a department of forestry.

I hope I am not too boastful but I am proud of the part the people of British Columbia played in the development of public opinion and climate with respect to the value of our forests and the need for their conservation and development.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, could I interrupt the hon. member for just a moment. In outlining the history of the development of forestry in Canada the hon. gentleman neglected to mention the fact that the first forestry school in Canada was established at the University of New Brunswick in 1906.

Mr. Herridge: I apologize for that oversight. Now that the minister has drawn it to my attention I remember it. I drew up these notes rather hastily. I am not in the habit of thinking in terms of maritime history and I must apologize for my oversight. Anyway, in British Columbia we had the first royal commission established in Canada to examine into all aspects of the British Columbia forest industry. British Columbia was the first to establish a forest management and sustained yield policy. While we in this group differ with some aspects of the terms of tenure that are being given effect on a large scale in British Columbia, we do wholeheartedly support the sustained yield principle.

British Columbia was the first province to establish and hold an annual conference on natural resources, which was organized as a result of co-operation among the industry, universities, labour organizations, and the officials of the government department directly concerned. The industry in British Columbia was the first one in Canada by resolution to urge the necessity for a federal-provincial conference to establish a national policy for the conservation of natural resources and it was the first to make representations to the federal government urging the establishment of a department of forestry.

I am very happy to say that last year the first lady to graduate in forestry graduated from the University of British Columbia. I mention this just to indicate that the industry, employees and the people in British Columbia in general have taken a very progressive approach to this problem.

I cannot leave this question without saying that the party to which I belong has also taken a very active part in promoting those ideas and in promoting the general acceptance of the policies that I spoke about previously. From the time the C.C.F. elected members to the legislature in British Columbia—and the hon. member from Vancouver East can tell you all about that—one of the first major policies presented to the legislature on behalf of the C.C.F. was the need for a sustained management policy in the forests of British Columbia and that is our policy today. We all know also that the government of Saskatchewan has done a magnificent job in dealing with the forest resources of that province which, when they took office, were being depleted at a rate which would have meant the disappearance of the major forest resources within the foreseeable future.

Private industry in Canada has also played a very important part in the development of the ideas that are being put forward this afternoon and in the development of research, particularly the pulp and paper industry of this country, and other industry organizations.

For a moment I wish to draw to the attention of the committee the position of Canada in relation to the present world situation so far as the forests are concerned, and to indicate that this is a world problem, and we are dealing with a segment of it in a very intelligent way this afternoon. I intend to quote from a recent report of the food and agriculture organization which indicates how world-wide this problem is and what a responsibility we have not only to the people in Canada but to the world as a whole to conserve our forests. The dispatch is from Rome, dated June 5, 1960, and reads as follows:

> Mankind is felling the world's forests dangerously fast, according to the United Nations food and agriculture organization here.
> Sixty per cent of forests under exploitation, 3,620,000 acres, are being felled in such a way as to make the future of the world's present timber supply uncertain, declares the FAO's third world forest inventory. And, it adds, because man is not replacing what he takes from nature, the future of about 25 per cent of the forests in use today is in doubt.
> The probability of reaping a new crop of timber from a further 35 per cent of the forests now in use is "only reasonably favourable", the FAO says, adding that only 40 per cent of the world's forests under exploitation have an assured future through reafforestation.

I just quote from this dispatch to indicate that this is a serious problem for mankind as a whole. We in this group think that Canada is at the turning point. It requires action on the part of the government to give leadership, which I trust the establishment of this department will facilitate, and more co-operation between governments, between conservation minded organizations, between the industry and the people, including the young people in the universities and schools across this country.

In our opinion this new department will face vast and urgent tasks. It also faces a glorious opportunity to do something very substantial and concrete for this industry. It is going to take a dynamic and imaginative approach on the part of the minister who is concerned with the problem and dedication to the cause of the conservation of natural resources and the development of the forest industry.

I suggest there are four major tasks that the new minister will face in this new department. The first will be to promote a successful federal-provincial conference on resources for tomorrow. I think that is necessary in order to make this new department successful and, shall I say, show to the provinces that the result of this department's work will be brought about by co-operation with them without any transgression of their jurisdictions.

The second task is the promotion of the establishment of national principles and policies for the conservation of land, forest, water and other renewable natural resources.

I think the third task is going to be the expansion of research related to the forest industry. I might say at this point that, I was glad to hear that the research work being done by the Department of Agriculture for the forest branch will now be transferred from the Department of Agriculture and come under the jurisdiction of the new ministry. I pay every tribute to the good work being done under the science branch of the Department of Agriculture in this respect. However I and the members of this group for years have contended that it was a somewhat illogical division of responsibility, and we are quite pleased to see this work being brought under the jurisdiction of the new department.

We recognize the excellent work of the forest products laboratory on which I understand we spend approximately $1 million a year at the present time.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): About $2,500,000.

Mr. Herridge: About $2,500,000 a year while at the same time—and I am glad we do—we spend about $30 million a year on research in agriculture. We need the research in agriculture but I mention these figures to illustrate the gap between the amount spent on research in connection with these two fundamental industries. We recognize the good work being done in research on insect infestation and plant diseases that affect forests. What is required at the present time are more funds for the forest products laboratory to begin with because there is a need for expansion of research owing to the change in the types of equipment and in the type of logging and mechanical operations in the woods. This is the type of research that the forest products laboratory has not had the opportunity to go into to the extent required at the present time because of lack of funds.

In this connection I must mention to the committee that we should not consider ourselves right in the forefront in connection with research so far as the forest industry is concerned. We had a delegation which went to Russia in 1958. It consisted of persons interested in the forest industry and some officials of the forest branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. They had an opportunity to see the operations of the forest industry in the Soviet union with respect to logging operations, milling operations, manufacturing aspects and also with respect to research. I have in my hand a small booklet which was issued by the forest products laboratory of Canada in 1958. It is entitled, "A Canadian's Impressions of Russia's Forest Industries", and is written by J. H. Jenkins who is head of the forest products laboratory and whose good work we all recognize.

I am not going to read extracts from the booklet but it clearly indicates that the Russians are looking forward and are well up with us so far as manufacturing is concerned and possibly with regard to woods operations. However, I have also learned from other sources that they are far ahead of us with respect to the amount of money spent for research in connection with the forest industry. I am not quite sure what the figure is but I understand that they spend several times as many dollars per unit of production on research in the forest industry compared with the amount of money spent by us. I understand they spend close to ten times as much in relation to total production compared with the expenditure by the government of Canada.

In view of the present situation with respect to world markets and the developments in techniques of production I suggest it would be a very good investment for the federal government to spend much larger sums on research related to the forest industry. In addition to expansion of the forest products laboratories we believe there is need for even greater expansion in several very important fields related to forest management into which fields we have not entered to any great extent up to the present time. There should be greatly expanded research into forest management, tree seed production and collection, the development of strains of trees best suited to geographic climate and soil conditions, the suitability of species to site, plant ecology and methods of fire protection.

These are not just my ideas, they are a composite of ideas put forward to the committee by representatives of the forest industry in the various provinces and suggested by various authorities in the universities, by the Canadian forestry association and the Canadian institute of forestry. Therefore I want to stress the need of establishing a program for a great expansion of forest research that immediately envisages the doubling of the professional staff engaged in forest research within the next few years. We think that would be a good investment for the federal government on behalf of all the people of Canada.

Finally, we suggest there is a great opportunity for the federal department of forestry and the minister in charge of the department—a great deal depends on the activity of the minister and his interest in the matter—in the direction of education and publicity. An informed public opinion is required to support a policy of sound forest management. It is very necessary and to a great extent it is now lacking. There are probably few undertakings that have so many amateur advisers whose opinions are often based on sentiment without any knowledge and with little experience. We have got to get the truth and the facts before the Canadian people.

On the other hand, a public consciouness must be developed that the protection of the forests from fire is everyone's responsibility. In that respect I think that in some sections of Canada, particularly the urban areas, the understanding is far less than it should be. The federal government, through its own actions and through the subsidization of properly constituted public information organizations, can help to correct this apparent lack of appreciation on the part of the public of the need for sound, economic management of the forest resource and of the great hazards of forest fires.

In concluding my remarks at this stage I say that co-operation and co-ordination in the development of educational and publicity programs between the federal government, the provincial governments, industry, interested organizations and the schools is one of the tasks that the new minister and department should undertake. Let us mobilize all the people, all the governments, all the agencies, all the organizations that are interested in this problem in support of a national forest policy for Canada, for as the old scripture writer said in Deuteronomy, chapter 20, verse 19, "The tree of the field is man's life".

Mr. McQuillan: Mr. Chairman, it is not too often that I find myself on the same side of a question as the hon. member for Kootenay West, but I certainly appreciate the fact that he is supporting the resolution. There is an old saying that birds of a feather flock together and there is a certain similarity between our feathers. He said something a few moments ago about the wonderful sustained yield operation he had in the Kootenays involving 500 board feet per acre per year natural increment. I added this up and I think he has quite a few thousand acres. It comes to quite a tidy little sum and I think the hon. member has a very nice little interest in forestry.

To use British Columbia coastal logging parlance, I am sure glad to hear that the Prime Minister is going to open another side. This step is one that has been advocated for many years by the forest industry and by those who appreciate the present and future economic potential of our forests. I must say that when the hon. member for Laurier was speaking I began to realize why there was so much frustration and disappointment among those connected with the forest industry at their failure to be able to impress the federal government for so many years with the importance of their industry and the need for attention to their problems. But after listening to him this afternoon I began to understand why we made no progress in the industry over those many years.

Considering the importance to Canada of its heritage of forests and productive forest land, it is a sad reflection that in forestry research and forest management we lag far behind many of the countries with which we have to compete for world markets. This sad situation can probably be attributed to the fact that, except for a small section of the prairie provinces and the barren lands, our country is a forested area. Many take the attitude that we have plenty of trees so why worry? This has probably been the reason why we have been so slow in approaching the problem in its proper light. It is probably the reason for the lethargy that has been displayed by the general public and, in some cases, by senior levels of government toward facing the reality that there is a challenge in the field of forest conservation and in preserving the economic solvency of one of our greatest revenue producing basic industries.

Torrents of words are spoken in this house each session about matters that are of infinitesimal importance compared to forestry problems. If one looks through the Hansard for previous years he finds few references to our forest resources and their problems. Agriculture seems to be the predominant interest at all times, and yet the two resources have many common problems and are closely comparative in their economic importance. Canadians seem to be a race of farmers at heart. Certainly one cannot help but come to this conclusion if our parliamentarians represent the thoughts and interests of the people.

I was looking through the proceedings of the 1959 committee of the other place on land use, and it is informative to note that one meeting only was devoted to land use for forestry purposes, despite the fact that for every acre of land in Canada suitable for agriculture there are many acres that could be used for forest production.

I should like to suggest now a few fields to which I feel the new department should give its attention immediately. First among these is the need for greater efforts toward forest fire prevention and control. This is a problem with which we will always be faced. Great efforts and great strides have been made by both provincial and federal forest fire prevention agencies, but there is much to be done yet. Of course, forest fire prevention is largely a matter of public education so far as man-made fires are concerned. However, as long as we have man he will be responsible for a number of forest fires. In addition, of course, we will always have the problem of lightning fires. These often occur in the remote and inaccessible areas and have been responsible for terrific losses. Two years ago we had a terrific loss in the northern part of British Columbia in a very inaccessible area. It was almost impossible to get men and materials in there to control that fire.

The greatest hope for controlling and extinguishing forest fires seems to be in the development and use of aircraft fire control techniques and, perhaps, the development of chemical aids. Much promising technical information is already available, but the cost of experimenting to adapt this information to a practical use is often too high for individual companies and, in many cases, for provinces.

Department of Forestry

A number of companies recently banded together in British Columbia to purchase surplus Mars flying boats for use in forest fire fighting. It is an interesting experiment and is being closely watched by everyone all over the world interested in forest fire prevention. These aircraft are capable of carrying several thousand gallons of water and have been equipped for fast reloading. The project is an expensive one, and the companies involved are to be commended for embarking on this venture. Of course, the companies concerned are going to give priority to their own forest holdings. However, if the experiment is successful or shows merit, I suggest that a national aerial forest fire fighting force, adequately equipped and with highly trained personnel, should be an objective of this new department. Such a force could be of material help to the provinces in attaining an objective of a minimum of forest losses through fire.

Emergency fire danger conditions, as a rule, do not extend through all provinces at the same time, and the cost of equipping and maintaining an efficient aerial fire protection unit is beyond the means of most provinces. The federal government derives large amounts of revenue from our forests. It is only right that they should accept a fair share of the cost of their protection.

There is also the question of insect infestation, an ever present threat to our forests. Efforts toward the control of this threat have thus far been directed toward meeting emergency situations only. As a rule a dangerous situation is allowed to build up and become a real emergency before concerted efforts are made to control the threat. I think prevention, in this case, is the sensible course to pursue and I say that should be the policy of this new department. Of course we all know of the work that has been going on for many, many years in the forest products research laboratory, which has made tremendous contributions in the field of forest products design and production.

I believe that one of the primary fields and the field that offers the greatest promise for this department is the field of forestry silvacultural research. We spend annually many millions of dollars on our agricultural experimental stations across Canada. Of course this is as it should be. However, a comparison between these expenditures and those made in forest research is, to say the least, discouraging to anyone who recognizes the importance of the forest industry to our economy.

I think I can best sum up the need for forestry research with a few quotations from eminent authorities. I am going to read a paragraph from the 1959 annual report of Resources for the Future, Inc., which is a United States organization. Many of the resource problems in the United States are similar to our problems. This report states:

By 2000 our forest lands—

They are referring of course to United States forest lands.

—might well be producing double their present output. New strains of trees can be selected or bred, just as new varieties of crops have been bred, which will be much more productive than the usual "wild" strains. Quicker replanting, to obtain a full stand of trees when natural reseeding methods fail or are slow, will speed up output. All sorts of cultural measures are possible; fertilization of forest lands may well become feasible at some future date. Adequate road systems, continuously maintained, will facilitate not only fire control but also disease and insect control. The possibilities of intensive forestry have scarcely begun to be tapped.

Then again in the final report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects reference was made to the same subject. I should like to read a bit of it. Speaking of forestry research, they say:

The logical starting point for such research activities is at the source of the raw material and comes under the heading of "forest management". Stated most simply, it is the object of such management to increase yields in the best and most accessible locations, thus to make possible more intensive operations without impairment of—indeed with improvements to—the preferred stands. The advantages are obvious: reduction of the onerous transportation costs associated with long hauls, and reduction of high labour costs associated with high labour turnover and low productivity. Year-round logging from permanent campsites or townsites and increased mechanization are the means toward these ends. Control and reduction of forest losses, already referred to, are also a vital part of the management function. Encouragement should be given to tree farming. The farm woodlot generally has the advantages of good location and in addition has a ready labour supply in the farmers themselves. We are not yet at the stage in Canada where we can say simply, "All our forests should be brought under management". The areas involved are too large and much of the area is too remote; the cost burden too high. In order to obtain ample returns for the costs involved, intensive management should be concentrated on the proximate forest areas; in the more remote areas, the emphasis should be on protection with preservation as the primary objective.

There were further references by witnesses before the mines, forests and waters committee in 1958 and Mr. Mahood from British Columbia explained the importance of this type of research. It was also stressed by Professor Love, associate professor of forestry of the University of Toronto at the mines, forests and waters committee meeting last year.

I think this is a most important field of endeavour and one on which the new department should lay the greatest possible emphasis because I think our ability to maintain our position in world markets in the sale of our forest products will depend to a great extent on forestry research.

Once again may I offer my congratulations to the Prime Minister for the introduction of this motion and assure him that to date I have heard only one person question the advisability of setting up the new department of forestry and that was in the house this afternoon.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Unlike the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Kootenay West, I cannot speak on this resolution with the degree of expert knowledge they possess. I speak in the light of the important place that the forest industry occupies in the economy of my own riding and that of the province of British Columbia as a whole. It was only necessary to hear the delegation that came before the standing committee on mines, forests and waters last year to realize the pre-eminent position the forest industry holds in the economic life of Canada. It is inherent in this resolution that the government recognizes that place and is prepared to take action that will be of benefit to an industry that sustains so much of the economy of the country and that provides a livelihood for so many Canadians.

Because of the large contribution the forest industry makes to the welfare of the Canadian people I was astonished at the extraordinarily indecisive approach of the hon. member for Laurier this afternoon. I could not help feeling that by taking that indecisive point of view and perhaps, in speaking for his party he had failed to recognize to what degree so much of Canada is entirely dependent on a prosperous and developing forest industry.

In British Columbia there is no need to remind any citizen of his debt to the forest industries or of how much he is dependent on them. If anyone has any doubts he need only refer back to the testimony the British Columbia forest industry gave to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters last year. In the final report of the committee, in paragraph 55, there is an extract from the representations made by the forest industry which, in order to emphasize its case for increased federal government action, states four points:

(1) The production of forest products is, by a wide margin, Canada's largest industry.

(2) It is an export industry vital to the national welfare which must meet highly competitive conditions in price and quality on the world market.

(3) As a natural resource industry it is an industry in which government policies have a decisive role.

(4) It is an industry with a high employment potential, capable of substantial expansion.

Of those four points there are two in particular which emphasize the importance of the establishment of a department of forestry in the federal government. First, it is a national resource industry in which government policies have a decisive role. This is not just an observation made by somebody who has come in off the street. It is an observation made by some of the most qualified and highly competent men in the forest industry in Canada.

Second, it is an industry with a high employment potential. In view of the debates that have taken place in the House of Commons during this session and in view of the interest which the hon. member for Laurier and others have taken in this subject of unemployment, here is a justification for the federal government's decision that this industry requires and deserves a department of government to create policies and to give leadership for the development and benefit of an industry with a high employment potential. Not only is it now employing one in every twelve Canadians employed in the production of goods, but there is a further potential that can be exploited. This matter is of the greatest consequence to Canada at the present time. The information I am using is available in the minutes of the mines, forests and waters committee of last year. All of it is available to members of the House of Commons. But my own particular interest lies in the fact that of the forest production in my own riding, and in so many ridings surrounding it, 70 to 75 per cent of it goes into the export market, very largely to the United States. This is a very high proportion of the production of any single industry to be going into the export market and it is a very high proportion of our people who are dependent on the health of our export position for their livelihood. Therefore, when the Prime Minister in his opening remarks mentioned the emphasis of the committee on the requirement for a marketing section, I realize what value could be derived from the creation of this department by the section of the country which I represent and where the export market is of such immense value to an industry that is sustaining a large proportion of the population.

It was also impressive to me to recall that in the testimony before the committee on mines, forests and waters last year submissions of the British Columbia forest industry indicated that Canada's share of the export market had been declining. They pointed out that while the physical volume of sales, particularly in pulp and paper, have been increasing and that the physical volume of sales proportionately in lumber have been increasing, our percentage share of the available market had decreased.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed with the consideration of private and public bills in pursuance of section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Mr. McCleave: I think there is agreement among the parties that second reading be given to certain divorce bills, with the exception of one standing for second reading on which there has been an amendment, and that the house then would be agreeable to resuming the debate on this resolution. The only point that arises—and I have just found out about it—is that it is possible that the debate on the resolution will conclude before six o'clock and that the Minister of Transport would not be ready to proceed with his estimates until eight o'clock, so that it may be necessary to return to divorce bills.

Mr. Churchill: He will be ready.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give its consent to the proposed proceedings which are to deal only in this appointed hour with the divorce bills standing for second reading, excluding Bill No. SD-320? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCleave: I move that the bills all be considered en bloc. I refer to order No. 434 to No. 447 inclusive.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that all the said bills be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR CREATION OF NEW DEPARTMENT

The house resumed consideration of the following resolution—Mr. Diefenbaker—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to present a bill to constitute a department of forestry which shall be presided over by a minister of forestry to be appointed under the Great Seal of Canada, to authorize the appointment of a deputy minister by the governor in council and the necessary officers, clerks and employees in the manner authorized by law, and to provide for the transfer of certain officers and employees of the Departments of Agriculture and of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the new department; that it is also expedient to bring in a consequential amendment to the Salaries Act to provide a salary for the minister.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): To resume the comments I was making, may I point out that the percentage of the Canadian share of the world market has been declining despite the increase in the physical volume of exports, and that this decline has been taking place as world markets have been increasing. We are losing our position, not through a decline in the volume of exports but through a decline in the percentage of the market we have retained.

If such a situation as this exists, and if measures are to be found to assist the industry in Canada to overcome the present difficulties, then a department of government charged with responsibility in this connection seems to me to be the logical and best method of achieving the result desired. I gather that over the years, beyond my experience in this house, requests for government intervention have been made, requests for leadership in the adoption of policies which would provide the Canadian forest industry with an ever-increasing opportunity of expansion and an ever increasing opportunity to make greater employment available so that these greater opportunities might contribute to the general economic welfare of the country.

The contributions made by, among others, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Kootenay West fully recognize the value of the step which the government proposes to take. This is something which has long been needed. If this department is created, if there is imaginative leadership, and if it can bring about the co-ordination of the best work that is being done in the provinces and in industry to contribute to the general welfare of the forest industries of Canada, the benefits which will finally accrue to the people of Canada will be beyond measure.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, there are only two measures which have been introduced by the government this session which in my opinion have been completely acceptable. One is the measure by which they managed to reach agreement to bring grants to the universities of Quebec, and the other is this present measure. I approve of them both from the party and from a personal point of view.

My constituency probably creates more revenue from forestry than any in Canada since from its watershed come products enough to keep 11 pulp and paper mills going, almost all of whose production goes to the United States market. I know from my own experience of forestry that the industry has looked forward for a long while to a move of this kind in the hope that it may lead to a consolidation and invigoration of our policies in this field.

The qualification mentioned by the previous speaker with regard to imaginative leadership raises one of the most important questions. We all know that cabinet ministers vary in the impact that they make, and I can only appeal to the Prime Minister, since it is within his province to lead in making the selection, that he should give this new department to a minister who can make a real impact upon the industry and upon the country as a whole, including the trade side, the marketing side, the research work and the relationship with the provincial authorities. We need a diplomat; we need a hard driver; we need someone who knows something about the industry, or, if he does not, a man who can get on top of the job in a short time.

I think this is probably going to be one of the fundamental departments in the next decade. If hon. members will look at the report of the royal commission on Canada's production prospects, or at other publications or books on the Canadian economy, they will see that the fundamental factor in our whole future is the forest industry. For that reason I think the government is to be commended on the move it proposes.

I do not want to go on any further into the nature of the bill. I will just say this; that in so far as the administration of the department is concerned I suggest to the minister, whoever takes over this portfolio, that he will very quickly need to establish at the head of his civil service a number of young, aggressive people. I say this in no criticism of the members of the present forestry branch, but in general they are not too far away from retirement in so far as both the forestry branch and the forest products laboratory are concerned. I hope this will be one of the young and interesting departments to be in, and I hope that some one will go out and recruit staff if necessary outside the present service to make sure that we have a young, go-ahead group at the head of affairs.

I should also like to suggest that the sooner this department is set up the better, in view of the conservation conference we are holding next year. I think that conference will give the first opportunity for us to judge what the calibre of this department is going to be and what conception this government has of its operations, because if the conference is to be as wide-ranging as has been suggested by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, then the federal department must play a very large part. That conference, it seems to me, will be a proving ground, and I hope by the time it meets next year we shall have a vigorous and, I hope, a young minister in charge of the department and that there will be a relatively new and dedicated civil service leadership.

We are very happy about the bill, and we hope it presages great things for the forest industry in Canada.

Mr. Brunsden: Those of us who live on the Alberta prairies are supposed to know very little about trees, but we do know that if we wish to raise a tree on the prairie we have to carry water to it. Those of us who have been here since 1958 as new members have gained some appreciation of the importance of the timber industry in Canada through our association with hon. members from other provinces, and on that basis it seems to me that the introduction of this resolution is most commendable and that the Prime Minister is to be congratulated.

It is not my intention to take the time of the committee except to express one thought —that trees and water, as I indicated in my introductory remarks, are very closely related. We who live in Alberta know something about the east slope of the Rockies and the waters that come from that east slope. We know of the inter-relationship between forestry and irrigation, and between domestic water supplies and power development; we know of the problems of irrigation extension, which go back to water, and I would hope that in the next few years—not initially, perhaps, but in the next few years—there may be a widening of the work of the committee of the house in which the new minister will be particularly interested until it becomes what I might term a conservation committee rather than a forestry committee. Although I admit the predominant position of forestry, and the importance of the industry, I feel there could be interrelated in this department the questions of land use, water development, power development, irrigation extension, and so on.

The hon. member for Laurier this afternoon expressed criticism of this resolution. The hon. gentleman expressed the view that he was for it and that he was against it. As a signature tune he concluded on the note that this could be worked into the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Chevrier: No, I suggested that it could be worked into the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Brunsden: I understood the hon. member to say something about agriculture. In any event let me say this. This nation is emerging as one of the leading powers of the world. Our greatest assets are our national resources and our people. It seems to me that a department without the pressures of executive work each day, considering dispassionately the development and expansion of our resources including our forests and waters and taking into account the growth of our populous areas will have a tremendous task before it.

My only thought in rising was to commend the government for introducing this resolution. I heartily endorse it. On behalf of those who come from the prairie provinces I express the hope that the field of service of this department may widen in the very near future.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, politics is a weird and wonderful thing. This has been demonstrated in the past few weeks in the provincial elections held in Saskatchewan, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Politics bears some relationship to the last heavyweight championship bout in that you can never tell what is going to happen. You may be elected once or many times.

I am very happy to be a member of this committee today and present in this chamber to witness the introduction of this resolution to establish a department of forestry. This is one of the happiest days I have had during the 27 years in which I have been an elected member. I say that as one coming from British Columbia, to the economy of which province forestry means a great deal and where vast difficulties are being faced. I believe had a department been established heretofore some of those difficulties might have been averted.

I have spent 20 years in British Columbia and could speak at considerable length on this subject but I will not do so. In the operation of the department many difficulties will be encountered with respect to jurisdiction, jurisprudence and administration.

I have severely criticized this government in many fields but this resolution in my opinion represents one of the finest forward steps ever taken by a federal government. I welcome the establishment of this new department and wish it every success.

Mr. Payne: Mr. Chairman, I rise to express my hearty approval of the resolution before the committee at this time. I do not propose to speak in detail because many hon. members have already done so and, frankly, I took advantage of the throne speech debate earlier this year to discuss in detail and substance the question of forestry.

It is with a certain amount of regret that I draw to the attention of the committee the fact that so few hon. members from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario have participated in this debate. With so many hon. members from the west coast addressing themselves to this question the impression could be created that this department will serve primarily, if not solely, the needs and requirements of the forest industry of British Columbia. Nothing could be further from the truth. This industry is first in terms of employment in the whole of our national economy. It represents the greatest volume of export dollars to the nation and has for many years. The well being of forestry generally depends on complete co-operation and understanding between all levels of government and certainly requires, on the federal level, a department which can undertake many programs such as those of a long range scientific research nature which cannot be undertaken by the industry or the provinces at this time.

In stating the importance of this industry to the nations economy I wish to impress most strongly upon hon. members that, while the contribution of the forests to the economy of British Columbia is greater in percentage terms than the contribution our forests make to the economy of the other provinces, it nevertheless represents the greatest earning and employment factor in the economies of Ontario and Quebec as well.

The need for this department is amply demonstrated by the dependence of our lumber markets today on exports to the United States. Many Canadians are not aware of the standards now established by our neighbour to the south with respect to federal housing authority requirements in relation to the standardization of lumber. No agency exists today in Canada which can, in a co-operative way, establish in the Canadian industry national standards which will meet those demanded by our great southern neighbour. Should anything happen to that export potential Canada will dearly suffer.

I was somewhat appalled to hear the distinguished hon. member for Laurier suggest that the forest industry, which is Canada's greatest single employer and export dollar earner, should be dependent upon a federal department such as mines and technical surveys. In saying this I am not in any way being critical of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. For the last three sessions I have had the honour to serve on the committee of mines, forests and waters along with many of my colleagues from British Columbia. It is a self-evident fact that the hon. member for Laurier did not serve on this committee for had he, he would not overlook so many basic requirements of the forestry industry.

It is a fact that forestry operations are far different from mining operations. In the one case you have Canada's greatest recurring, renewable resource. The forests, if forestry is properly practised, with proper scientific guidance, the resource will renew itself. With mining you have an intrinsically different problem. In mining you are extracting a depreciating resource. The basic, fundamental thinking in the operation of the mines department is completely and utterly divorced from the thinking required for the function of a properly constituted forestry department.

I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister on this most worth while measure. I will further say that so far as the economy of this dominion of ours is concerned, if during the term of office of this government no other measure is brought forward, this measure alone will justify the accolade and the support for years to come of the people of Canada.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I, too, am very pleased and wish to congratulate the government upon the setting up of this forestry department. However, I should like to express a fear that I have. I hope that this department will do more for forestry than the mines branch has done for mining. If it does not, I think probably we should leave it the way it is.

The forest industry is different from other industries. Hon. members from the west have raised one problem. We in the east have a different problem entirely. We are not so concerned with the renewal of our forests. I keep thinking of the years that I spent in that industry where we were continually told how much reforestation was being done by the companies that were doing the reforestation. Yet as you went through the country you were continually faced with the problem of mills closing down and mills with only a life span of another five or ten years, and no more trees to replace those that had been cut down.

I was very surprised in negotiating with management of particular companies in the white pine industry to find out during the negotiations that they were not particularly interested even in continuing their operations at that time because they said that in another five years they would no longer be operating their mill anyway; that their limits were completely exhausted. I, being naive, as the Canadian people are in many instances, suggested that it only meant starting back where they had originally cut on the old part of their limits. I said that since they had been on the limits for 40 or 50 years the trees in the old areas would have grown up and be ready for cutting. I was informed that it would be 90 or 100 years before there were any trees of commercial value on those limits.

Therefore, I have some doubts when I hear people in this house tell us that reforestation has taken place, or reforestation is being done at a satisfactory rate. That may be true in some sections of the industry but it is certainly not true in the Ottawa valley and in the upper Ottawa. I keep thinking of the Swedish scientist who came out here many years ago. He looked at the white pine industry in the Ottawa valley. He travelled throughout the valley and inspected the industry. When he returned to Sweden he told his people that there was no point in their continuing their lumbering operations; there was no point in their continuing to build toward the future in the lumbering field and in the field of wood products because in Canada we had enough timber to supply the needs of the world in perpetuity.

Well, Mr. Chairman, on the Ontario side of the Ottawa river at the present time you can count the white pine trees growing naturally in the Ottawa valley. Any reforestation that has taken place has been done in the main in areas where one would not expect to see any reforestation at all. The Ottawa valley is denuded completely of the white pine industry which gave to Ontario and to all of Canada the early impetus and assisted in the growth that has taken place in this area. The industries that are now in existence are not cutting white pine logs; they are operating mostly in provincial parks or in Quebec where the rate of cut has not been as great as it has been on the Ontario side of the river.

This department can assist in setting up reforestation. It is all well and good to say that regeneration takes place naturally. These things can be accepted but when you go out into the forests you find that many of the species which are supposed to regenerate themselves do not do so. In Ontario, and particularly in northern Ontario, you can check this at any time. You will fly over vast areas, mile after mile after mile, where there is no green foliage at all and where a tree does not exist.

We shall have to give consideration to the policies which have been in vogue in the last 50 years in relation to our forestry industry. I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister on making this division in the department and setting up this new forestry branch because it has a role to play in Ontario as it has in other parts of Canada. It has a role to play which can only be played if we get started and do something to solve the problems connected with forestry.

In the main, in northern Ontario no reforestation is taking place. Some of the companies do spasmodic replanting, but this is only of recent date. So far as I know, even a company the size of Abitibi does such little reforestation that you can count on your fingers all the trees that they planted 20 years ago. I know of only one small piece of reforestation on the Abitibi limits. There may be more; I may be wrong in saying there are not. To my knowledge the only reforestation is taking place behind a small mill of Abitibi. There is an island behind the mill and 40 or 50 years ago reforestation was practised there as a hobby, and a number of trees of fairly good size are growing, and some are ready for cutting. In the main, mile after mile after mile of the area of Abitibi, an area as large as the British isles, is in this position.

For years and years they cut the trees and did no worrying about the future generations who were to depend on those areas. Over 50 years ago, and probably a few years before that, when the early lumbering industry, the early sawmills and loggers, went into Timiskaming, the area was covered with white pine, and beautiful stands of timber they were. Because this was a profitable enterprise, because it had something that the west did not, you could go into northern Ontario and homestead for the first years. You cut the trees, you sold the lumber off the land, you sold the pulpwood, and you as a homesteader were able to make a living in those areas by utilizing the trees in that way. Many homesteaders did that. They cut all through northern Ontario; they cut over land that had been logged by large logging operators previously. They cut the lumber and they cut the pulpwood that had been left and they were able to open up the land and to clear a great deal of the area.

This operation was carried out in years gone by, especially north of Cochrane and up through the great clay belt of that area. It was found afterwards that much of the land that had been cleared, after they had taken off the first few crops, was not suitable for agriculture and should not have been turned into agricultural land. Now areas such as these lie abandoned. No trees are growing on them except tag alders and willows. It has no commercial value and no value as agricultural land. In a small way the Ontario government has gone into that area and established a survey group to ascertain what should be done with the land. It would seem to me that they will probably finally decide to put it back into forest by planting the type of trees that were originally there and that we will grow trees like we grow grain and other products. At the end of the year we will know how much we have for the years to come and how much reforestation must be done to take care of the growing markets we will have.

Only last week end we had a flash flood in Timiskaming. I am informed that creeks and farm lands were flooded where there is never any water except in the spring. Some of these little creeks, which are completely dry all summer and have hay growing in them that is used for pasture purposes, had seven to eight feet of water in them. I understand that the water crossed the road in front of my house and took out a six foot culvert. It cut a 20-foot path through the roadway and carried a steel culvert, not corrugated iron, over a wire fence and down the creek. Flash floods of this type usually do not bother us. I do not remember such flood conditions even in the spring.

This department is going to have to give consideration to the problems that have been caused by the elimination of the forests. In lake Timiskaming and the Ottawa river not only in my area but right outside the parliament buildings we are continually having flood problems and later in the year there is not enough water power to operate our industrial and hydro installations. It seems to me that one thing this department must concern itself with is reforestation in order to protect the watersheds because we depend on the water being available for commercial, hydro and pleasure uses.

The provincial governments have done something along this line, as have the municipalities, but so far the federal government has done very little. I was surprised to find there is a survey team in the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I had the opportunity of flying to the maritimes with one of the officials and he told me about the work that is being done in the maritimes with respect to assessing the potentialities of the watersheds in that area. I think the Canadian people generally should be told that this service is available and it is time that people like those I represent in northern Ontario found out what the potentiality is, what reforestation is necessary to protect the watersheds and how we can overcome some of the problems we have created for ourselves by eliminating forests completely, particularly in those areas where we have no trees and have not been able to make any use of the land.

Reforestation in order to serve the purpose will have to be planned to meet the needs of the particular area. I am sure that these needs will be assessed and leadership will be given by this department. In my opinion the reforestation that has taken place on the provincial level has been spasmodic. I have seen better reforestation that has been done by some of the old municipalities that decided 20, 30 or 40 years ago to plant trees on land that had been repossessed for non-payment of taxes. Around Kemptville and in Dufferin, Wellington and other communities you can see much better reforestation programs than anywhere in northern Ontario where it is natural for the people to assume that reforestation is an industry and not just a pastime.

I am told that reforestation will pay off if governments go into it and that there are municipalities adjacent to New York where the citizens live free of taxes because of the revenue received through reforestation done on a continuous basis over the years. I think the Canadian people want to leave their children, not with the heritage in the forest industry that was left to us but with the same situation that prevailed when our grandfathers and great-grandfathers came to this country. The forests are a renewable resource. They are not like mines where the natural resource is taken out of the ground and can never be replaced. If we use common sense we can have more trees and a bigger forest industry in Canada in the future than we have today.

I think this department will give great leadership with respect to a problem that also plagues us in relationship to pollution and other ills suffered, not only because of waste dumped into waters by sawmills and paper companies but other pollution. I think this matter will certainly have some relationship to the department of forestry if it is going to be successful and fulfil the needs of the Canadian people.

In setting up the department I hope the government also has in mind the problem of research into the forest industry and the marketing problem. I have represented for a number of years workers in the lumber industry and I am well aware of the problems facing the workers and those that face the industry with relation to markets over which they have no control. We in Canada have a limited opportunity to expand our markets beyond those that are traditional. When our traditional markets in England and on the continent were affected by stiff competition from Russia we were forced to send our products to eastern Canada and to the south. They entered markets that were highly competitive and in many cases we were not able to compete. We also found great difficulty when western producers undertook a crash program whereby they shipped lumber billed to Chapleau, for example, and other points in northern Ontario without any sales having been made. They shipped this lumber in bankrupt lots and it had to be cleared out at any price to meet the demurrage costs at the distribution point. Eastern producers had to compete with this bankrupt stock and this in turn created havoc in our traditional markets in eastern Canada.

The western producers are not to be blamed to any extent because they were faced with a difficult problem in the face of imports from Japan and other countries that were competing on a basis that we could not meet. They had the ability and the research knowledge to develop veneers 10 to 20 times as effective as ours. They had the methods and the machinery to cut veneers 10 to 20 times as thin as ours. They were able to import not only from other countries but from Canada the logs they required, particularly birdseye maple, and to return the veneers to Canada at a price with which our producers were not able to complete.

Therefore I hope the department will give serious consideration to doing research on an industry-wide basis so that all segments of the industry will be able to take advantage of the latest developments in technology. Many of our small mills and plants are not able to compete because of the advances in technology today and they are going to have to have assistance to modernize their mills and to develop procedures and methods of production which they are not now capable of undertaking.

In closing, I should like to point out that many of our mills are operating at a very low rate of efficiency. They are operating on an efficiency of 35 per cent to 40 per cent. These mills are in competition with mills in countries like Sweden and Norway which are operating on an efficiency of 80 per cent or 90 per cent. While many of our mills are only taking the choice cuts from sawmill logs and the choice grades of lumber, the mills in these other countries are bringing in the whole tree and processing everything but the leaves. We are operating in a manner that leaves waste wood in the forest and have not been taking full advantage of the abundant growth we have had in this natural resource.

I believe this is a very opportune time for this government to set up the new department. I feel that a great deal of co-operation can be obtained from labour, from management and from conservationists throughout the country to the end that every year Canada will become richer in these various products and our forest industry will contribute more and more to our general economy.

Mr. Murphy: I wish to make a few observations on this resolution, inasmuch as I happened to have the honour of chairing the committee which brought in the report about which we have heard so much today. We have heard representations from many hon. members of that particular committee who contributed a great deal to the preparation of the final report and who knew a great deal more about the problems of the forest industry than the chairman. I was very pleased today to hear the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay West and others in his party who are supporting this resolution. I am going to have something to say before I close about the remarks made by one of the Liberal speakers who did not happen to be a member of that committee.

I do appreciate—and I am sure the members who were on that committee and who contributed so much to the final report must be gratified—the commendation that has been given the work of this particular committee. I do not recall, during my experience in this house even as an opposition member, when a resolution received so much commendation on such a high level. It is not often that the setting up of a new department of government receives the support that this move has received today. It does involve the necessary expenditures connected with a new department and its staff.

I believe, that as chairman of that particular committee I am expressing the opinion of every member of the committee when I commend the government for taking action so quickly, less than eight months after the report was submitted. I am sure that the reaction throughout the country will be most favourable to the government because of the importance of the forest industry to the economy of Canada. I should like to say to hon. members who were not members of that committee that all they need to do to become impressed with the work of the committee is, for instance, to read the list of witnesses who appeared before the committee. It is no wonder that those who were members of the committee spoke so effectively. We did not take one glance at the problems of the forest industry. We had some 40 or 50 representations made to the committee and the various witnesses were given all the time they required to make those representations. In the main, they were all sound and very effective.

I do not intend to repeat what has been said today by other speakers on this resolution. Needless to say, this is one of the most important industries in the Dominion of Canada, and I think it will continue to be so in spite of the increased demand for our oil and gas. It is a renewable industry. It is not like mining. In 1958 the total exports of wood products were close to $1.5 billion or about 29.36 per cent of our exports in that year. The thing that amazed me was that the previous government, with all their administrative staffs of technicians and advisers, did not realize the importance of the forest industry to this country. The industry was allowed to wobble along like a lame duck for many years without proper guidance. In my opinion the press of this country will react favourably to the establishment of a forestry department because of the importance of this industry. There are other matters which I believe could be incorporated within this department, but I will not deal with those at the moment.

As I said a moment ago, I do not intend to repeat what was said earlier. Many of the briefs presented to the committee came from British Columbia because the forest industry is of great importance to that particular province. We did receive some representations from Quebec and Ontario as well as other parts of Canada. I should like now to quote from page 1175 of the committee report where it states:

> Your committee strongly recommends consideration of steps which would widen the scope of the forestry branch, increasing its status in such a way that a deputy minister would be in direct charge. The fact that such a status, comparable to that of a department does not exist now reflects a lack of appreciation of the importance of the forest industries to Canada, in the past, now, and in the future.

I suggest that is a very important conclusion to be drawn by any committee. When we made this report we made it in the way we thought it should be made. We were given an assignment and this is the report that was tabled in this house. The report contains other recommendations to which I could refer, but I shall not do so at this time.

I must say, in conclusion, that this particular industry is so important to our economy, and will continue to be so important that I am highly appreciative of the government's move to establish a separate administration to take care of the forest industry in this country. As I recall, there were 27 Conservatives on that committee, seven Liberals and one C.C.F. The C.C.F. member made an excellent contribution without any doubt. When we made our report it was unanimously adopted. In view of the fact that many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee suggested that a new department of forestry should be established, and in view of the fact that every member of the committee wanted the forestry branch to have a higher status, I was amazed this afternoon to hear a most distinguished Liberal member, one who is recognized all over this country—I refer to the hon. member for Laurier—

Mr. Hodgson: Oh, he does not know anything about the lumber business or about forestry either.

Mr. Murphy: He did not happen to be on our committee, unfortunately, although I would have welcomed him. However, without any hesitation he seems to disagree with the Liberals on the committee. We had a good representation of Liberals on that committee and they were unanimous in the report. I wonder where the logic comes in when the hon. member for Laurier seems to hesitate about the need for or the requirements of this new department. Just because the previous government, of which he was a member, did not see fit to have a new department or even to have a deputy minister in charge of this important industry is no reason why today he could not revise his thinking and at least agree with the members of his own party on that particular matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Mr. Chevrier: Is the Prime Minister going to reply to some of the questions?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I really see nothing to reply to, except to thank hon. members for the contributions they have made. It has been a helpful discussion which has been marked by contributions by hon. members who knew what they were talking about from personal experience. They placed their views before the committee and gave it the benefit of them. As to the hon. member for Laurier, he has asked for an opportunity of seeing the bill. After the bill had been seen and, when we come to second reading, I think there may be a discussion on these matters that have arisen.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely.

Mr. Chevrier: Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the new department will take over all of the forestry and forest products activities now under the other departments of government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think that question had better be answered in the manner in which the hon. gentleman approached the whole situation. He said, "I want to see the bill". When he sees the bill, he will have an answer to all the questions he has raised.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Diefenbaker thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-82, to constitute a department of forestry.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the consent given earlier today the house will now resolve itself into committee of supply.

SUPPLY

House again in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

555. Departmental administration—further amount required, $68,350.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 8 of the supplementary estimates for 1960-61, the details on page 19.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): It appears that I am always able to get the floor about five minutes prior to the time for adjournment. With that consideration in mind, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could call it six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

Supply—Transport

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): When the committee rose last night I was just warming up in my description of the mess we had got ourselves into on a national basis with regard to our transportation, a position where we are subsidizing our railways in almost every way possible while at the same time subsidizing transport on our highway.

A further point we must take into consideration is the terrific loss of life we experience on our railroad crossings. I realize that efforts have been made to overcome this danger, particularly in the past number of years, and that millions of dollars have been spent recently in an effort to eliminate some of the hazards which present themselves in connection with railroad crossings over our highways. Unfortunately as fast as we eliminate some of these dangerous crossings our efforts are offset by the increase in road traffic and we find that the situation is no better than it was in spite of the millions of dollars which have been spent.

Another thing we have to take into account is the terrific loss of life caused by the presence of big transports on our highways cluttering our roads. Any motorist who has had the experience of driving over roads where these big boxcars block the traffic, travelling at high speeds downhill and at very slow speeds uphill, will understand what I have in mind. A frustrated driver in a desperate effort to get by takes a chance, pulls out and another fatal accident occurs. This is no criticism of the drivers of the transports because I think that but for the ability and courtesy of transport drivers in general the toll of human life would be greater than it is. However, the present situation emphasizes the fact that our highways are no place for boxcars.

Today we see another situation developing. The railway companies are getting into this field of transport. They are buying out the transport companies and then they find themselves in the fortunate position of being able to make a profit on their road operations and obtain a subsidy with respect to their railroads. As I pointed out the other day, the only reason why they can make a profit on their transport undertakings is because we are subsidizing transport also by building the roads for them.

It is no use hon. members who support the government pointing out, as they have done before, what a wonderful example of private enterprise the C.P.R. represents and comparing it favourably with the C.N.R. Looking back at the history we find that the story does not stand up to examination because the Canadian taxpayers have subsidized the C.P.R. in the way of grants, land grants and so on far more than they have subsidized the C.N.R.

What we need in this country, and what we need more urgently every day is an overall transport policy, something we have not had up to the present time. We must have some leadership from the federal government in order that we may be able to make the best use of our railways and our air and road services.

Today we find that men are being laid off by the railways by the thousand after having 30 or 35 years of experience. They have no training which would fit them for any other job but despite this they are just being turned out on the labour market. Many of these men are in no position to afford to train themselves for other jobs because they have to look after families and cannot spare the money necessary to train themselves to take up other occupations. They find that after 20, 25 or 30 years of service there is no more use for their skills and they have no qualifications to take other jobs.

We have proof in the past that the government can do a job. At the end of the last war hundreds of thousands of ex-servicemen were trained to fit themselves into society on their return from the services. But hon. members must realize that some provision was made for the families of these men, if they had families, so they themselves could obtain the training which was necessary before they could become re-adapted to the needs of society. The result was that not only did they benefit by equipping themselves with new skills but the country as a whole benefited by the training they had received.

I suggest that the time has come when the government should take a close look to determine whether it should not take over both the transcontinental railroads and whether it might not be in the interest of all concerned for them to find out in which areas it is most economical to use rail and which areas it might be more successful and more economical to tear up those tracks and turn them into transport roads, thus taking the heavy transport vehicles off our highways. There is one thing that should be kept in mind: if the government should begin such a program it must accept its responsibility for training people to make the necessary change, and avoid the dislodgement which is occurring today across the country from coast to coast. Let us think for one moment of the savings which could be made in connection with the upkeep and maintenance of our highways once these big transports have been taken off the road and put on a road which they maintain and look after themselves.

I recall talking not too long ago to an old foreman from the town of Foleyet which at one time was a railway centre of considerable importance. As time went on and automation took over the job this man had was discontinued, but he had enough seniority; he was able to bump into another job. He bumped right up to yard foreman, and then they abolished the yard, and after 32 years he was turned out on the street with a very small pittance of a pension. After 32 years he was considered of no use in the line of work which he had carried on all his life.

If this over-all transport policy is undertaken and put into effect it may not mean the dislodgement that some people fear it would mean. The car shops could be converted into transport garages. The express and freight people could transfer to handling the freight and express now handled by the railways. There would be no need for a change in the personnel we have in this field. This is something the government should take into consideration. It is time for bold leadership in this field. The government should take the lead in studying this field and implementing policies that would lead to greater efficiency and economies. The government could create order out of the chaos that now exists. Perhaps most important of all it could give those employed in this field some idea of what is ahead and not leave them waiting as they are now from day to day to see when the axe is going to fall.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Broome: Oh, no, not again. Lay off, old boy.

Mr. Argue: I see that the hon. member for Vancouver South is interrupting. I thought I would have had the pleasure of hearing from him at this time. I heard it rumoured that his name was on the list. Since it is not, I am forced to speak on this item because my remarks would probably be out of order on a detailed item.

I do not intend to cover the ground I covered last night but I wish to elaborate on what I said last evening.

For all practical purposes the railway companies have become a law unto themselves in their operations and in their abandonment and curtailment of essential services. I said last night that the board of transport commissioners have shut their eyes to the needs of the public and are passing in a wholesale manner the applications of the railways for reductions of service. Our railway facilities are in great danger of being torn down by the very people who are managing the companies. It is a shame that thousands of railway employees are being summarily dismissed after 25 or 30 years of service with no visible means of support. The minister may not consider this a serious matter. I do not think he does. The hon. gentleman has done nothing to relieve the situation. I feel it is a blot on the record of our country that thousands of employees are being put out on the street after a lifetime of service in their occupations.

We have asked the government to take action but the minister pleads that he is powerless, that the management of the C.N.R. is beyond his control or influence. The minister alleges that he has consideration for the hardship that results to these employees but states that after having discussed the question with the C.N.R. nothing has happened. The hon. gentleman alleges, too, that the C.N.R. management is sympathetic to the situation of these employees. They have a strange way of showing sympathy. I think the management has one object in mind and that is to curtail services, bring about so-called modernization as rapidly as possible and to look solely at the balance sheet of the company without any thought whatever to the welfare and suffering of the people who worked for the railway company.

If the minister did not agree with the policy he would change the management of the C.N.R. If the minister disagrees with the policy that is what should be done. The minister, of course, agrees with the policy. The president of the C.P.R., the president of the C.N.R. and the minister are co-operating in what is taking place.

Earlier this day we took steps to continue the freeze on freight rates. This is interference with the railways and the way in which they receive part of their revenue. The government has gone so far in its interference with the railway companies that it has announced a policy to the effect that there will be no further increases in freight rates pending the report of the royal commission. When it comes to a question of freight rates the government interferes directly but when it comes to the welfare of the employees the government refuses to interfere and allows this deplorable condition to continue. The minister and the government take a cruel and callous attitude toward the employees of the railway companies.

I suggest to the minister that for a period of time there should be a freeze in the staff of the railways. There should be a halt to the dismissals now taking place. I believe there are good arguments for putting this forward at this time. We have decided as a parliament that there shall be a freeze on freight rates pending the report of the royal commission inquiring into this question. I suggest there is need now for a royal commission to inquire into the operations of the railway companies as they affect the livelihood and welfare of their employees. The present royal commission investigating freight rates could be reconstituted on completion of its task and be instructed to inquire into the operations of the railway companies as they affect their employees and the public services. We are witnessing wholesale dismissals of employees and a sharp curtailment of services. The public have a right to a full inquiry into what is being done.

Rumour has had it—and the rumour has found its way into the public press—that there is likely to be a curtailment in the present transcontinental passenger service of the two major railways. This kind of rumour going around further demoralizes the employees. This kind of rumour does nothing to build passenger confidence in those railway services. If the railway companies of this country had embarked on a deliberate policy of curtailing and discontinuing further passenger service in this country, then they would have been following their policy very successfully in recent years because apparently this must be what is in their minds when they talk of the discontinuance of those main transcontinental passenger runs.

With all these problems it is important that a halt be called to any further curtailment of service and any further dismissal of employees. In the light of the current unemployment situation in Canada I say it is of no help to our nation to dismiss countless employees of railway companies merely to have them added to the unemployed rolls in our nation. Until such time as this whole situation is clarified I feel that such a freeze in employment levels on the railways is a just thing. I would ask the minister to give consideration to this proposal; I would ask him to make some comment on it and say whether the government would consider the suggestions that I have put forward, to consider a royal commission or some other appropriate study into the policy being followed by the railway companies in this country with particular emphasis on the need to maintain essential railway services for the public and to protect the welfare of company employees.

With respect to a freeze as far as the present personnel of the railways is concerned, I do not have in mind an arbitrary rule that would force the railway companies to maintain their employment levels at the current rate. Such an order, in my opinion, should allow for normal retirement of employees and, therefore, for a normal or a regular reduction in staff at this rate if this seems desirable from the standpoint of the railway companies. This would be a brake on the wholesale dismissal of employees.

Every few days members of parliament get communications from sections of railway workers across this country, telegraph operators, workers in the car shops, whether they be in Winnipeg, Montreal, London or in some other part of the nation, complaining that their jobs are in jeopardy, that there have been wholesale dismissals and that they are in a very uncertain state of employment because they do not know from one day to the next when their jobs may end. I ask the minister to make some further comment on this question and to hold out, if he can, some hope to the railway employees of this country that these wholesale dismissals will not be continued, and that the type of agreement which has given some stability of employment to the firemen for a period of time may be considered for other sections of railway employees.

Some members may argue that what I am saying would increase or maintain the cost of railway operations, therefore it is a disservice to the users. I do not think we need to play one off against the other. Parliament has acted to protect the public against further increases in freight rates at this time. I think that parliamentary action to protect employees who have spent their lives working for those companies would be an appropriate parallel action at this time.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, when the committee was discussing this vote on Friday, June 10, I spoke of the injury which had been inflicted on my home town of Cornwall through the closing of the Cornwall canal, and the hon. member for Laurier immediately rose to reply to me and directed his reply almost entirely to the question of pollution. His reply contained a number of errors and I feel I must rise again to offer my reply to him. He cited certain legislation and certain treaties which I have subsequently taken a hard, long look at, and I wish to inform the committee at the outset that it is not for any personal reason that I rise on this occasion but because, as I shall presently show, expenditures of large sums of money without any justification in either substance or law were made at that time.

First, let me refer to another matter which I should like to correct. Last night the minister commented, I believe, that the report of January, 1951, of the St. Lawrence seaway authority on the economic prospects was laid before the house by Mr. Howe. I can find no evidence of that report having been made public. In fact, Mr. T. M. Bell filed a notice of motion for the production of this report on June 2, 1954, and as far as I can determine, that was refused.

To get back to the other matter of legislation, may I call the attention of the committee to two sentences in the speech by the hon. member for Laurier. He said, and I quote from page 4785 of Hansard of June 10:

> In 1951 an application was made by the government of Canada and the government of the United States to the international joint commission for the development of power in the international section at Cornwall. At that time the Canadian government agreed to build all the canals on the Canadian side of the line.

Now those applications to the international joint commission were not made in 1951; they were made on June 30, 1952. It is important to get that date correct. The hon. member for Laurier should remember it quite well. He was the minister of transport at that time, and he went down to Washington in order to be present at the signing of that application and also at the signing of the note of the Canadian government by the Canadian ambassador to the United States, Mr. Hume Wrong, to the United States government on the very same day.

The Deputy Chairman: I wonder whether we might have a little quiet in the committee so that hon. members will be able to hear the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): The hon. member for Laurier may have had some share in the completion of those negotiations which led to the signing of those Canadian documents, I do not know, I was not there. He has never told the house a single word about those negotiations; he has never offered any explanation of the extraordinary character of this Canadian note. A few moments later the hon. member for Laurier went on to say:

> At that time there was an agreement—

By which he obviously meant July and August, 1954. I continue:

> —between Canada and the province of Ontario whereby Ontario was to build and maintain 14-foot navigation facilities. When this agreement was brought about there was, therefore,—

He is speaking here of an agreement between Canada and the United States dated August, 1954. I continue:

> —no longer any obligation on the part of the province of Ontario to fulfil that covenant.

The hon. member for Laurier is also a member of the legal profession and perhaps for this reason I should be very careful to refer to him as the hon. and learned member for Laurier. I have always understood it to be a most binding obligation on the part of members of the legal profession when making reference to a statute to make such reference complete and accurate.

What did the hon. and learned member for Laurier do? He referred to the Canada-Ontario agreement of December 3, 1951, and here again I emphasize the date. That agreement related to the development of the power in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river. That agreement was ratified by the International Rapids Power Development Act which was passed and made law before the end of the same month, December 1951, and the full text of that agreement is appended as a schedule to the provisions of this act. The hon. and learned member for Laurier should be well acquainted with the terms of both the agreement and the act because as minister of transport at that time he introduced the bill and piloted it through this house. I shall now read article II of that agreement, omitting some incidental words. It reads:

> Canada will do all in its power ... to obtain the approval of the international joint commission ... of works to develop the power resources of the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence river to be undertaken by Ontario concurrently with the undertaking of complementary works by an appropriate authority in the United States of America, in accordance with the plan known as the "Controlled Single Stage Project ...", containing the features described in the annex to this agreement with such modifications as may be agreed upon herein or by Canada and Ontario.

Now I come to the annex of the agreement in which the main features of the project for power development are recited. I find as feature number (7) the following:

> The necessary works to permit the continuance of 14-foot navigation on the Canadian side around the control dam and from the pool above the Long Sault dam to connect with the existing Cornwall canal.

Thus far the hon. and learned member for Laurier and I are in complete agreement, I trust. I am especially grateful to him for his acknowledgement in his speech of June 10 which I have just quoted that this obligation on the part of Ontario to make provision for the continuance of 14-foot navigation was still binding upon Ontario in August, 1954.

Now let me go further into the Canada-Ontario agreement of December 1951, much further than the hon. and learned member for Laurier went. In article XI of the agreement, which is quite a lengthy article, Ontario undertook to give all necessary assistance to the government of Canada toward the construction of a deep waterway on the Canadian side of the international rapids section. Article XII of the agreement I must, however, quote in full.

> If the construction by Canada of the locks and works mentioned in article XI—

That is to say, the locks and works of a deep waterway on the Canadian side of the river.

—renders unnecessary the construction by Ontario of the works required to permit the continuance of 14-foot navigation as described in paragraph seven of the annex to this agreement, Ontario will pay to Canada a part of the cost of such locks and works equivalent to the cost of the works that would have been required to be constructed by Ontario to permit the continuance of such 14-foot navigation.

Upon the basis of the unit cost levels of December 1950, the cost of new provision for the continuance of 14-foot navigation around the control dam at Iroquois would be about $1 million, and the cost of similar provision at Cornwall of about $16 million, a sum total of a little more than $17 million in all.

Now I come to a point about which I am considerably perplexed. Section 2 of the International Rapids Power Development Act, 1951, reads as follows:

The agreement dated the 3rd day of December, 1951, between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario is approved on behalf of and is binding on the government of Canada and all things to be done by virtue thereof are approved and authorized.

Section 5 reads:

This act shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

The necessary proclamation to bring the act into force was not in fact issued until May 18, 1953, and it brought the act into force on May 20, 1953.

Can we say, then, that the act was in force on that most important day to which I have already called attention, June 30, 1952, the day of signature of the Canadian application to the international joint commission and of a Canadian note to the United States government, the day of one of the felicitous visits to Washington of the minister of transport? I find it hard to say whether the act was in force at that time. Yet since it had never been amended before it was proclaimed I find it even harder, very much harder, to say that it was not.

Now I come to the documents that were signed on June 30, 1952, four in all, two by the government of Canada and two by the government of the United States. Two of these documents were applications to the international joint commission by the two governments, on behalf of their power developing entities, for permission to develop the power of the international rapids section in accordance with the controlled single stage project. The Canadian application further declared that the government of Canada would construct, maintain and operate all such works as might be necessary to provide and maintain a deep waterway between the port of Montreal and lake Erie, and that such a deep waterway would be provided as nearly as possible concurrently with the completion of the power development works. The application from the government of the United States declared that it was filed with the understanding on the part of the United States that the government of Canada would engage in this work.

Here we have, then, an undertaking by Canada and an understanding by the United States that the deep waterway would be carried through the international rapids section on the Canadian side. And upon that undertaking and that understanding, the recital in each application of the main features of the work included the following provision:

(g) Navigation facilities—provision will be made for the continuance of 14-foot navigation throughout the international rapids section during the construction period.

That is to say, that upon the completion of a 27-foot deep waterway on the Canadian side, this provision of 14-foot navigation would cease. That would seem sensible enough. I think the hon. and learned member for Laurier will agree with me in this. Then, under the terms of the Canada-Ontario agreement of December 3, 1951, which the hon. and learned member for Laurier in his then incapacity as minister of transport helped to negotiate, the provision of article XII, which pledged Ontario to pay to the government of Canada the sum of $17 million dollars or more, would come into effect. That is what the agreement, which was ratified by acts both of parliament and of the legislature of Ontario would seem to require as a simple, straightforward matter of law.

Now I come to the substance, the astonishing substance, of the note that was signed on behalf of the government of Canada in Washington on June 30, 1952, and was presented to the government of the United States on the very same day. The note first stated that it appeared impossible to obtain congressional approval in the near future for United States participation in the construction of deepwater navigation facilities in the international rapids section and that, in consequence, the Canadian government has, with parliamentary approval, committed itself to provide and maintain whatever additional works may be required to allow uninterrupted 27-foot navigation between lake Erie and the port of Montreal. It then proceeded to inform the United States government of two points on which, so it stated, the Canadian government is now prepared to agree. These are points of such cardinal importance that, for the sake of the record, I find myself compelled to quote them in full. They read:

(a) that the amount to be paid to Canada, as specified in the agreement of December 3, 1951, between Canada and Ontario, in lieu of the construction by the power developing entities of facilities required for the continuance of 14-foot navigation, be excluded from the total cost of the power project to be divided between the Canadian and the United States power developing entities, in consideration of the fact that the actual replacement of 14-foot navigation facilities will be rendered unnecessary by reason of the concurrent construction of the deep waterway in Canada, and

(b) that the authority to be established pursuant to the provisions of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, chapter 24 of the Statutes of Canada, 1951 (second session), contribute $15 million towards the cost of the channel enlargement which the power developing entities must undertake in the St. Lawrence river, as set out in paragraph 4 of the annex to the Canada-Ontario agreement of December 3, 1951, and in section 8 of the applications to the international joint commission, in consideration of the benefits which will accrue to navigation through such channel enlargement.

In short, the Canadian government, by these two concessions, surrendered an asset, an obligation due to it, of at least $17 million and accepted an obligation of $15 million. This was a sacrifice without any authorization or justification, of a sum of more than $28 million, a sum that would be more than sufficient to erect two new government printing bureaus on top of the one that is already there.

A note in reply, signed by the secretary of state of the United States and delivered to the Canadian ambassador in Washington on June 30, stated, first, that, and I quote:

My government approves the arrangement set forth in your note—

That is to say, Canadian construction of the deep waterway on the Canadian side of the international rapids section, and agreed to the two financial concessions offered in the Canadian note, repeating them in the identical words which I have read. According to the significant word in the International Rapids Power Development Act, 1951, an agreement between Canada and Ontario was already in effect and was binding on the government of Canada, and all things to be done by virtue thereof are approved and authorized. Upon a reading of the act, the national government was bound by that very law to hold Ontario to its obligation of payment. Since the act did not, perhaps, take effect in any way until it had been proclaimed, it might be argued that the national government was still free in June, 1952 to come to any terms with the United States government that it might like. The act was, as I mentioned before, proclaimed in force on May 18, 1953.

It would, of course, have been possible for the government to regularize this agreement with the United States either before or after the date of proclamation by the passage of an appropriate amendment to the act. But nothing of the sort was ever done and, accordingly, I submit to the committee that the obligation of Ontario to provide for the continuance of 14-foot navigation through the dikes at Cornwall and to pay the cost of construction of a lock for 14-foot navigation at Iroquois is still in force. The legislation creating this obligation has never been rescinded or modified.

I would go even further than this, by reminding the committee that there exists a common law public right of navigation of the waters of the St. Lawrence river and, by the Department of Transport Act, a statutory right of navigation of the Cornwall canal, with a specific duty laid upon the Minister of Transport to make provision for the exercise of that right.

I come now to the other obligation that Canada assumed, the obligation to be carried by the seaway authority to pay $15 million to the power developing entities as a contribution to the costs of channel enlargement. First let me call attention to the exact words of the undertaking. They are that the authority shall contribute $15 million toward the cost of channel enlargement which the power developing entities must undertake. It is not a payment for any additional channel enlargements, it is a payment for some part of the work that would have to be done anyway to ensure the development of power, no matter whether the deep waterway would be built or not.

I know it may be argued that in spite of the wording of this second Canadian concession the provision of deep water navigation would in fact necessitate some additional channel enlargement at additional expense. I propose, therefore, to meet this argument in advance. The international joint commission held hearings on the Canadian and United States applications in various places. At the hearing in Albany, New York, on September 3, 1952 a representative of the United States corps of engineers presented an estimate for the cost of the channel enlargements required for a development for power alone, without any provision for deep-water navigation, at $71,867,000. This was on the basis of unit cost levels of December, 1950. A corresponding Canadian estimate put the cost of the appropriate channel enlargements at the still higher figure of over $82 million. I challenge anyone who is acquainted with the details of the estimates for the cost of an all-Canadian seaway to put the costs of the necessary channel enlargements in the international rapids section at any higher figure than that.

Thus far I have tried to show just this, that the first of these two concessions by Canada was a contravention of a national law, and the second unwarranted in fact. But what should be said about them as obligations binding upon Canada in relation to the United States? The Canada of June 30, 1952, informed the United States of its intention to proceed to the construction of the deep waterway all by itself, and the reply of the United States declared its agreement with that intention. As I said before, there was a Canadian undertaking and a United States understanding, and both the Canadian concessions rested upon this reciprocal proffer and acceptance. In fact, however, Canada has not by itself constructed an all-Canadian seaway. In consequence these two concessions, as formal commitments to the United States, simply fall to the ground. It is possible, since Canada did build one lock in the international rapids section at Iroquois that some alternative concessions to the United States, on a very much smaller scale, might be negotiated instead. Certainly, for my own part, I see not the slightest reason even for this.

The hon. and learned member for Laurier seems to take some pride in the fact that a concrete structure has been inserted in the line of dikes at Cornwall in preparation, as he put it, for future 27-foot facilities on the Canadian side. I have described that structure as a concrete wall 80 feet high. This is exactly what it is. I think the hon. and learned member for Laurier, who seems anxious to claim at least a share of the credit for it, should actually feel nothing but shame. In fact, he is entitled to all the credit for it. He was born and brought up in Cornwall. He has been trained as a lawyer; he has practised in Cornwall and surely he, of all people in this house, should be most keenly aware of the statutory right of navigation through the Cornwall canal. He, of all members in this house, should be the very last to procure the destruction of that right by even thoroughly legal means, yet he, in fact, of all people has deliberately approved of such destruction and that by wrongful means.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. gentleman from Stormont a question?

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask him if he is correctly quoted in the Globe and Mail of June 27 as having said during a panel discussion at Manotick, Ontario—

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): This is not the subject matter with which I was dealing.

[Mr. Campbell (Stormont).]

Mr. Chevrier: You have allowed me to ask you a question. Did he state, "There is insufficient liaison between cabinet ministers and the backbenchers"?

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): And also insufficient liaison between members and their constituents. If the hon. member wishes to ask a question regarding the matter I have already brought up, I will be pleased to do what I can to discuss it with him.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not intend to delay the estimates, but after this harangue that we have had from the hon. member for Stormont I think it is quite clear that the statement which he made in Manotick is accurate. It is evident from the manner in which his constituents have been treated and the manner in which his constituents are suffering that there is not the slightest liaison beween the cabinet and the backbencher that he is. Proof of that lies in the statement which he has just made to this committee. Apparently he is not conversant with many of the things that he has affirmed in the statement which he has just—

An hon. Member: Read.

Mr. Chevrier: Read, yes.

Mr. Lambert: What about your own speeches?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says, what about my own speeches? Let me say this to him, most of my own speeches are not read in this house. All he has to do is sit in the house from time to time and he will discover that.

Mr. Lambert: Watch the big typewriter.

Mr. Chevrier: Again in answer to the hon. and learned parliamentary secretary who rises at times to interrupt, let me draw his attention to the fact that many ministers as it is their right, very often read at great length from statements in the house.

Mr. Martineau: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, of course.

Mr. Martineau: I just want to know whether the hon. member is asking a question or making a speech.

Mr. Chevrier: I was answering the parliamentary secretary. But since I have been interrupted by the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister perhaps I can ask him a question to which he refused to reply not so very long ago.

Mr. Martineau: I should like the hon. member to answer my question.

Mr. Chevrier: It is in connection with a matter that affects the St. Lawrence seaway indirectly in which he advocated at great length the deepening of the Ottawa river as a project which would connect with the St. Lawrence seaway. My question is this: Does he think that with locks at the Carillon dam of nine feet depth that will provide navigation facilities that will look after 14-foot ships on the Ottawa river?

Mr. Lambert: That is no worse than your provision for the Welland canal.

Mr. Chevrier: Apparently my hon. friend is not answering the question so I will now return—

Mr. Martineau: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I asked the hon. member a question and he has not replied in a satisfactory manner.

An hon. Member: Not satisfactory to you.

Mr. Martineau: I am not engaged in a debate. I think we should get back to the order of business before the committee, namely the estimates of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Winch: I rise on a point of order Mr. Chairman, and it is this. After this quarrel between the three hon. members, may we now get back to the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Transport?

Mr. Martineau: I agree.

Mr. Chevrier: Not before I have had an opportunity of making some comment on the nonsense which has been given to the committee by the hon. member for Stormont who knows very little about the circumstances surrounding the power development and the navigation facilities in his own section of the river.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): I was not there at the time.

Mr. Chevrier: It is evident he was not there at the time, and it is evident that he is not there now; because if he were there he would deal with the subject in a far more enlightened manner than that in which he dealt with it during the course of his remarks.

I wish to say just one or two things. The first is that the negotiations are covered by agreement between the two countries. They are there for anyone to see, and I put them on record the other evening. Next, there is an agreement between the province of Ontario and the federal government which, I repeat, in so far as the maintenance of 14-foot navigation is concerned, has lapsed because of the fact that it was impossible for Ontario Hydro to abide by the terms of that covenant at that time. Instead of that, they built a structure in the dike. That structure in the dike, as the premier of the province of Ontario has said on more than one occasion —and he has taken credit on more than one occasion for its construction—will provide for future 27-foot navigation facilities on the Canadian side of the line.

However, my hon. friend, in many of his statements, has been attacking not only the Ontario government but also Ontario Hydro. In that respect I do not imagine he can expect many favours from that body, particularly in the constituency from which he comes, when he takes issue with Ontario Hydro as he has done from time to time. But there is one other thing of which my hon. friend apparently is not aware and it is this. All you have to do is to look at a map of the international section in order to see that right in front of the city of Cornwall there are 27-foot navigation facilities. If my hon. friend does not want to look at the map and if he insists that these facilities are not there, then all I need to say is that it is hard to make to see those who will not see.

However, he has had confirmation of that fact by the application which was made by his own constituents the other day to the Minister of Public Works to extend the dike at the east end of the city of Cornwall a few hundred feet—I believe it is for 500 feet—into deep water, something which indicates that deep water facilities are right at the door of his constituency. If he had only taken the trouble to look not so much at the agreement as at what is being done by the federal government—and I refer to the previous government as well as the present government—he would see that 27-foot facilities lie right at the door of the city of Cornwall. The industrial development body which has been established—the official corporate name of which I forget at the moment—deserves a tremendous amount of credit and should be commended for, and congratulated upon the efforts they have made with regard to extending this wharf to deep water. My only hope is that the Minister of Public Works will go far beyond what he has already done in an effort to give these people the port facilities that are required for industrial development in that area.

Mr. Winch: We have in the House of Commons a simultaneous translation system. On my desk I have a switch. I want to say that no matter how I worked that switch I could not understand what was being said by the hon. member for Stormont either in English or in French.

Mr. Pickersgill: You are not unique.

Mr. Winch: Nor can I understand the incensed remarks of the hon. member for Laurier.

An hon. Member: You are in a bad way.

Mr. Winch: If I might be given the privilege of doing so, I should like to come back to the item under discussion, namely the matter of item No. 1 of the estimates of the minister and briefly ask him whether he can give me an explanation as to what is the policy of his department having regard to statements made by those in control of harbours. Under date of June 17 I understand the Minister of Transport received a telegram from the Canadian director, E. C. Sims, with regard to a stoppage of box car deliveries of grain to the port of Vancouver.

I asked a question on that matter and I want to thank the Minister of Transport for his co-operation. He asked me to see him in his office to discuss the matter and he made an appointment for me with the chairman of the board of transport commissioners. I want to say that the co-operation I have received on this most important matter from the minister and from the board of transport commissioners is something for which I am grateful. It is the greatest co-operation I have ever received during any of my time here in Ottawa. Of course, as you know, Mr. Chairman, the best way in which to get things done is to give compliment where compliment is due. I want to say that I have received from the minister and from the chairman of the board of transport commissioners the finest of co-operation. I understand that everything is now functioning very well and that grain is now going through the port of Vancouver.

However, the point I want to raise is this. This entire story is an intriguing one in that it appears that there was a stoppage in the shipping of grain to Vancouver because of reports that there was an impending strike in Vancouver. All my information shows that there could not have been an impending strike in Vancouver because the two unions concerned had gone to federal conciliation. To the best of my knowledge no federal conciliation award has yet been made. Therefore up to the present moment under the law both federally and provincially there is no impending strike.

The point I want to raise with the Minister of Transport is this: I have here a photostatic copy of a column published in the Vancouver Sun on June 8. The Minister of Transport did not know of this situation until he received a wire on June 17, and I know, because of the courtesy granted to me by the chairman of the board of transport commissioners, that they did not know about that on June 21, and yet I read in this photostatic copy from the Vancouver Sun the headline: "Strike Threatens Grain Shipments. Port Manager says danger of Losses through Labour Tied Up." And then the report goes on to say:

> Threat of strikes by two waterfront unions is causing concern in the continuing drop off in grain shipments through British Columbia ports, Vancouver port manager Captain B. D. L. Johnson said today.

Then there are a number of statements which are not in quotation marks. I want to draw the attention of the minister to the last paragraph in this report from the Vancouver Sun which says:

> Captain B. D. L. Johnson summed up the situation this way: "There can be no doubt that the threat of a labour tie-up along the Vancouver waterfront and at other British Columbia ports is having the effect of diverting grain to eastern ports for overseas shipment.
> Nobody wants to store grain here that they may not be able to sell or remove.

Mr. Chairman, I say through you to the Minister of Transport that that is in the Vancouver Sun of June 8 a statement in quotation marks by the manager of the port of Vancouver. Yet the minister himself I know to my own knowledge was not aware of any trouble until he received a wire on June 17, and the board of transport did not know anything about it until the hon. gentleman made an appointment for me to see the chairman on June 21. As I have said, I want to thank the Minister of Transport for the co-operation he showed me. I also want to thank the chairman of the board of transport commissioners for the co-operation he extended to me. I want, further, to thank the board for the speed with which they got results. Grain is moving to Vancouver.

However, I do want to ask the minister in view of what I have said—and I would be glad to give him the entire file—to tell the committee what is the policy and what are the orders of his department when we read that on June 8 the Vancouver port manager issues a press release in quotes saying there is going to be a tie-up of grain because of a threatened strike in Vancouver when there is in fact no strike in Vancouver and no threatened strike in Vancouver because the conciliation awards have not yet come down for consideration.

Mr. Hees: In answer to the hon. member for Vancouver East may I say I have been very interested to hear what the hon. member said about this telegram. I am not aware of the telegram or of the press release which the gentleman in question is said to have made and if the hon. member will send the file over to me I can assure him I will look into it thoroughly and right away.

With regard to the question which was put to me by the hon. member for Assiniboia, I have listened very carefully to what he has suggested and I will give the matter serious consideration. I am afraid I cannot give him a more definite reply than that, though he would probably like one. But I can assure him I will give this matter serious attention.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister very much for his answer and I am sure railway employees will be glad to note that the minister has undertaken to give this difficult subject his earnest consideration. They will also look forward to the results of that consideration.

I wonder if the minister could tell the committee whether or not the Department of Labour in co-operation with the Department of Transport has looked into this problem at all? As I see it it is a very serious problem, and I hope that if some kind of special study is not yet under way, some such study, either in the minister's department or in the Department of Labour, will be undertaken prior to opening the kind of thorough inquiry of which I have spoken.

Mr. Hees: I feel sure that the Department of Labour has given consideration to this matter, but I shall be glad to discuss it with my colleague the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Chevrier: It seems to me that it is the disposition of the committee to get on with this item which has been pending for some time, and since the minister is in such a good mood I, too, would like to thank him in anticipation of what I am going to ask him now. It is this: I have raised on a number of occasions during consideration of the estimates, both of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys and of the Minister of Transport, the question of the Autair Helicopter Services and I have no intention of repeating what I said on those occasions. But since the minister is in such a good frame of mind I wonder if, having regard to what has already been put on record in Hansard and having regard to the fact that when I did raise the question the minister did not have the opportunity to reply, the hon. minister would not consent to ask the air transport board to make an investigation into, not only the complaints and the charges which were made in so far as the Department of Transport is concerned but also in so far as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is concerned. If the hon. gentleman accedes to that request I will be the first to thank him.

Mr. Hees: I shall be very glad to look into the question which the hon. member for Laurier has brought up. We shall be very glad to look into these matters.

Mr. Chevrier: I want to thank the minister for that reply.

Mr. Winch: Can I ask the minister if he is now in a position to give an answer to the question I raised as to whether or not the national harbours board designs its structures according to local building bylaws? I heard unofficially that the minister took the matter very seriously and sent someone to Vancouver to investigate and explain the situation to the authorities in Vancouver. Could the minister give an answer?

Mr. Hees: I shall be glad to, Mr. Chairman. The answer is that the national harbours board designs the structures for the various harbours according to the latest national codes and standards and, in most cases, local building bylaws conform to these codes. In a few cases the local building bylaws might not agree with the national standards and, in such cases, if the local authorities present objections these are thoroughly investigated and if they appear reasonable steps are taken to conform to the local bylaws.

The designs used by the national harbours board are more or less standard and have been developed by the board's engineers from many years of experience on harbour works from coast to coast. On all important works there is a qualified resident engineer and inspection of materials is usually carried out by private inspection companies.

It is the board's practice to have all services installed to the satisfaction of the local authorities and as an example of this the following clauses were contained in the specification covering the construction of transit shed No. 2, centennial pier, Vancouver harbour:

> Workmanship (re plumbing). The workmanship and method of installation shall conform to the best standard practice, to the entire approval of the engineer and shall be in accordance with local plumbing bylaws.
> Inspection and Testing. All work included in the sprinkler system layout throughout the transit shed will be inspected and tested by and shall meet with the approval of the British Columbia underwriters association in all respects.

I trust that answers the hon. gentleman's query.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I shall read a resolution sent to me by the Trail chamber of commerce and ask one question. The resolution reads:

> Whereas the federal government has stated as one of its policies the development of the northern part of Canada and the construction of a railway, and
> Whereas the Hon. E. D. Fulton has recently reiterated the government's promise of such a railroad, and

Whereas the construction of such a railroad would speed the development of the northern part of Canada and add a substantial direct and indirect increase in the gross national product of Canada by the development of the vast lead-zinc deposits at Pine Point, together with other natural resource developments in the Northwest Territories.

Therefore be it resolved that the Trail chamber of commerce urge the federal government to make an immediate start on the promised construction of a northern development railroad to connect Pine Point in the Northwest Territories with a presently constructed railway system, and

Be it further resolved that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, Prime Minister; the Hon. E. D. Fulton, the Hon. George Hees and Mr. H. W. Herridge, M.P.

In view of this understandable concern will the minister indicate what the government proposes to do?

Mr. Hees: Perhaps the hon. member was not in the house approximately two days ago when the Prime Minister was asked a question by, I believe, the hon. member for Mackenzie River. The Prime Minister replied that he had not as yet received the report from the royal commission investigating the routes. The hon. member for Kootenay West will of course realize that until the report of the royal commission is received by the Prime Minister no study can be made and no decision taken. The hon. gentleman will realize that the Prime Minister works on these reports very rapidly once they are received. When the report is received it will be given serious study by the government and as soon as possible a decision will be made. I can well understand the hon. member's interest in and anxiety about this and the interest and anxiety of those he represents. I can assure him that no time will be lost in giving this matter serious study as soon as the report is received from the royal commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister give us an assurance that the promise made by the Prime Minister in St. John's, Newfoundland, in 1957 that there would be a standard gauge railway across that province will be implemented in 1961?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I was not there. I did not hear the promise nor have I heard that such a promise was made but I can assure the committee, and as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows very well, that when the present Prime Minister of Canada gives a promise he keeps that promise.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will be happy to send the minister clippings from several newspapers. At least the newspapermen who were with the Prime Minister thought he gave that promise and the minister surely should have studied it by this time.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, as always when I receive anything from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I will give it close and serious study.

Mr. Argue: In answer to the question posed by the hon. member for Kootenay West the minister mentioned a question I asked the Prime Minister the other day to which I received an answer. I am wondering if there is any possibility that the Minister of Transport has received the recommendations of the commission studying the routes?

Mr. Hees: The answer is, no.

Mr. Hardie: I am also wondering whether or not the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Trail, British Columbia, has made recent representations to him concerning the building of this railroad?

Mr. Hees: The answer again is no.

411. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $2,844,830.

Mr. Howard: On page 521 of the details there is shown a total sum of money for construction or acquisition of buildings, works, lands and equipment. Would the minister consider in the preparation of this and similar items relating to airport construction and other things including a more complete break-down as it done in the case of the estimates of the Department of Public Works?

Mr. Hees: The answer is no, because the items are too small and too numerous. This year we have commenced tabling the items of $100,000 and more and giving details with respect to the larger items.

Mr. Howard: I do not ask for complete details of every project but for a break-down on major undertakings in the preparation of future estimates.

Mr. Hees: As I mentioned, we have given much greater detail this year than formerly and we shall be very glad to discuss this possibility with treasury board, and if it can be agreed with them to have a further break-down of those items in the future we shall endeavour to do so. We have considerable detail here and if the hon. member wishes to come over—I have the books here showing a great deal of detail regarding the particular area with which he is concerned—I shall be very glad to show him all the information we have. If there is anything that he wants information about that we have not in the books at this table I shall be glad to give it to him tomorrow.

Mr. Howard: I appreciate the minister's offer. I have not had any difficulty in the past in obtaining such information from the department or from the minister about specific items. I was thinking about a further explanation and clarification of some of these things for the general public and for other hon. members who may obtain these estimates, so that they could use the information to better advantage. The minister might take this under consideration and if he could give us some more detail it would be advantageous to everybody.

Mr. Hees: I should be very glad to look into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this item passes may I make an appeal to the minister to have a look at the rock outside Wesleyville harbour and see if a light could not be put on it.

Mr. Hees: Yes, I shall be glad to, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

412. Nautical services including Canada's share of the cost of the North Atlantic ice patrol; grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates; rewards for saving life from vessels in distress; subsidy to a salvage company; and the payment of expenses, including excepted expenses, incurred in respect of Canadian distressed seamen as defined in section 306 of the Canada Shipping Act, $604,524.

Mr. Winch: I do not wish to hold up the estimates but this is the only item that I can think of on which I can ask the minister what is the policy of the government as regards a coastguard service in British Columbia. This is, I think, one of the most intriguing and important points on our entire coast. It means very much to the fishermen and the entire services on that coast. Can the minister give us a complete picture of its status?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We have appointed two co-ordinators, one on the west coast and one on the east coast, and we are in the process of appointing a co-ordinator for the central region of Canada. The co-ordinator has been appointed on the west coast and has taken office. He is now in the process of interviewing various groups on the west coast, the purpose of which is to find out how all of the marine services in that area at the present time can be best co-ordinated and used in the same way as the coastguard is used in the United States. We believe that with the equipment that is available, the ships and planes that are available, the main thing is now to have training and co-ordination. The working of all those groups in operation will, we feel sure, produce the equivalent of the United States coastguard.

I quite agree with the hon. member and with other hon. members who have brought this matter up in the house and have talked with me personally that there is tremendous need for such a co-ordinated service in our waters, whether they be coastal or inland.

Mr. Chevrier: May I say one word in connection with this and a brief one at that. I have read the press release issued by the Minister of Transport in connection with the coastguard service and the appointment of Captain Brand as director of marine operations. I think that was an excellent appointment but the minister will not mind my saying that I do not think a great deal has been added to the co-ordination as it existed prior to his press release. I say that because the significant point in the release is that there seems to have been no co-ordination in the Canadian coastal marine services of any vessels other than those operated by the Department of Transport. In other words, no new elements have been added. All that seems to have happened is a change in the name. It is a step in the right direction, of course, to co-ordinate the establishments of the Department of Transport; but if there is to be a proper rescue service and coastguard operation from one end of the country to the other, particularly on both coasts, this should be co-ordinated with the Canadian coastal marine services.

The minister will probably recall that the hon. member for Oxford was very keen about this from time to time and repeatedly complained that there was no suitable service on the great lakes. From the press release it did appear to me that there was really not much of a change in the search and rescue operations on both coasts. However, I may be mistaken here. I bring it to the attention of the minister because I think proper co-ordination should take place not only within the department but also outside of it.

Mr. Winch: I know the minister realizes how important this is to us on the west coast. He said that a co-ordinator had been appointed on each coast. He also said he thinks there will be on the coast of British Columbia a service similar to and as good as the coastguard service of the United States. What is the authority of the co-ordinator? If you are to have a coastguard service on the coast you must gave co-ordination and the co-operation of fishing boats, of the navy, of the R.C.A.F., of all weather, radio and other stations. What is the authority of the co-ordinator to bring them all together? Who has the say?

Mr. Hees: Under our direction the co-ordinator will have the authority to co-ordinate those various groups in search and rescue efforts. His job at the present time is to make a survey of the situation and report to us what he considers is needed and then we will proceed to work on plans for training and co-ordinating the various vessels, government vessels and private vessels, so that they can be used in search and rescue work, which is the main objective of this exercise.

Mr. Howard: I have one small question I would like to ask the minister. It relates to the information in the details on page 523 under "nautical services". On this page are listed grants and contributions to mariners' or seamen's institutions, such as the navy league of Canada, Sydney, Nova Scotia, the seamen's mission society, Saint John, New Brunswick, and so on. Can the minister indicate what is the basis for these grants and what these particular missions, sailors' clubs or institutions do in so far as their assistance, if that is the proper name to give it, to seamen is concerned?

Then, there is an item "British Columbia towboat owners' association", toward which a grant is not required this year. The sum of $15,000 was granted to this association last year. Can the minister indicate what the $15,000 was for, and also what is the $75,000 item which is called a salvage subsidy to Foundation Maritime Limited, Montreal, Quebec? These amounts all come under the same item.

Mr. Hees: I am advised that the grants to institutions are for welfare work with sailors and maintaining hostels and things in ports where these sailors can go to. The $15,000 is to pay an adviser, one of the representatives of the tugboat owners, who co-ordinated certain rescue operations last year; and the $75,000 is to maintain a stand-by salvage tug in the gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic waters area.

Mr. Howard: Just one other point. I understood the minister to say with respect to the $15,000 to the British Columbia towboat owners' association that this was a payment to a member or someone within that association who co-ordinated with or did some co-ordination work on search and rescue operations. Did he do somewhat similar work as will now be performed by the person the hon. minister referred to a while ago who will be appointed as co-ordinator?

Mr. Hees: In a much more limited field; only in regard to his own association.

Mr. Howard: Could the minister indicate what the results of this co-ordination were? Was the $15,000 well spent; did we get value for our money; and did anything concrete come out of it so far as sea rescue is concerned?

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Hees: I am advised that the work done by the person was quite helpful but we considered it was not enough. That is why we have gone in for our own co-ordinator and embarked on this new plan.

Mr. Winch: I understand that money is paid for a standby tug for sea rescue work on the Atlantic coast, but there is no stand-by tug on the Pacific coast; is that correct?

Mr. Hees: It is a salvage tug on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. Winch: But not on the Pacific coast?

Mr. Hees: We did pay a similar subsidy for a salvage tug on the west coast, but I am advised that this was discontinued because there are a large number of salvage tugs on the west coast who perform this same function.

Item agreed to.

415. Steamship inspection service including the carrying out of the provisions of the conventions for the safety of life at sea and load lines, and contributions as detailed in the estimates, $1,099,578.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask what is the present position of the conference on the safety of life at sea and load lines. I understand there are meetings from time to time outside of Canada and that the department sends representatives. If I may say just another word about it, how much of this vote is assigned for that purpose and what is the present position of the convention? Is there any intention of amending it and bringing it before parliament at a future date?

Mr. Hees: I am advised that the convention is over. Our representatives have just returned and we have not yet received their report, so I am afraid I cannot answer that.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, while dealing with the steamship inspection service I wonder if I could ask the minister what has been the experience of this service in inspecting ships of Northland Navigation Company on the west coast? Are any of the ships of Northland Navigation Company restricted from entering into certain waters, or are they sufficiently well built and in sufficiently good shape to travel to any point on the west coast? Are there any restrictions against any of the ships, and, if so, which ones?

Mr. Hees: I am afraid this is a question which calls for a little more detail than we have available, but I will be glad to get the answer for the hon. member and give it to him as soon as possible. I would be glad to give it to him tomorrow.

Mr. Howard: If I may be permitted to clear this up, there are some ships which are not able to travel to certain parts of the coast of British Columbia. If such is the case—I do not know whether it is or not—under a subsequent vote, namely the Canadian maritime commission vote for subventions, depending of course upon the information which I receive from the minister, perhaps I could relate this to the subventions which are paid. In that case I would not ask that this particular vote stand, but if we do get to the Canadian maritime commission vote before the hour of ten o'clock, I wonder if at that time the minister might allow that particular vote to stand?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, much as I would like to get to the maritime commission vote before ten o'clock, I am afraid there is not one chance in a thousand that we will. If we did, I would certainly hold it up, but I can assure the hon. member I will get the information for him and I will answer the question when the maritime commission vote comes up.

418. Contract dredging including acquisition of land for ship channel improvements, $3,272,903.

Mr. Villeneuve: Mr. Chairman, I will not be very long. The year 1908 was when the last survey was made of the Ottawa river for navigation purposes, and the associated boards of trade in eastern Ontario are very much interested in this question. First of all it is necessary to have the survey completed, and in the face of that survey being made and the economics of the situation, I wonder if this could possibly be done. As the minister is well aware, the Carillon power development dam is building a lock, as I understand it, in the face of the dam and one of the first essentials is to see that it is of the proper dimensions to meet present day demands.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, just on this item, I think the hon. member for Laurier asked a question concerning that and, as I recall it, when I mentioned this in the house some time ago he was the first member to congratulate me on the project.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am advised by my officials that the key to this whole plan is the bridge at Ste. Anne. I am advised that there is no object in devising a plan for changing the lock until there is a plan for changing this bridge. But the lock is designed so that it can be enlarged.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister this question. But first, has the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott finished?

Mr. Villeneuve: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: What I was going to ask the minister was this, and it was apropos of the interruption I received from the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister when he referred to his speech in connection with the development of the Ottawa waterway. I think that is a very commendable project, but at the time it was not known what the depth of the locks over the sills would be. I put a question on the order paper, which I have here some place, and the answer given was that the depth over the sills would be nine feet. This means that the navigation depth is nine feet.

I do not see how the project of the hon. member, laudable as it might be and which I would be quite willing to support to the fullest extent, would be practical if ships of nine-foot draft only could be moved up and down the Ottawa river.

Mr. Hees: The nine-foot sill is correct, but the lock is constructed so that it can be deepened.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I should like to say a word or two in relation to this matter. I agree with the minister that the bridge at Ste. Anne's is the key to the whole situation. I would hope that resulting from the discussions, which will have to take place between the government of Canada and the government of Quebec in connection with a new bridge which will leave the west end of the island of Montreal, there would be assurance that the bridge would be a high level bridge to make it possible for the Ottawa deep waterway to be constructed. I think it would be most unfortunate if we were to permit a new low level bridge to be built at the west end of the island of Montreal which would in any way prevent the future development of the waterway.

My understanding of what has taken place at Carillon in respect to the present construction is that while there are presently nine-foot sills to be put in, none the less the plans do call for the eventual deepening of these to 14 feet, and that there is no problem in relation to that being done under the existing plans, and that in the present power development there is by no means foreclosure of the eventual, and I hope fairly soon, achievement of the Ottawa deep waterway.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to add one comment. I am glad the hon. member for Carleton did make the interjection which he has. I have seen the plans on two occasions, and they are extremely interesting and intricate. Following the viewing of these plans and discussions of them with certain engineers I put a question on the order paper for the Minister of Public Works which, unfortunately, I have not got with me now.

However, the plans as they now stand provide for nine-foot navigation. It may be that in the future it will be possible to deepen the sills to 14 feet, but at increased cost because if there is to be 14-foot navigation the plans should be drawn now for that purpose. The plans are complete for the elevation of the bridges from the Ottawa-Hull area right down to the outflow of the Ottawa river into the St. Lawrence at Cascades. There can be no doubt from what I have seen that unless these plans are altered they provide at the moment for nine-foot navigation. Let me tell my hon. friend that in his anxiety to see the Ottawa waterway developed he will find support for it from this side of the house because I think it will be all to the good if there is an additional 14-foot waterway which flows into the St. Lawrence. But if that is to be done the plans will have to be altered.

Mr. Hees: Before the item carries I should like to assure the hon. member for Carleton that I agree with him in principle. If a new bridge is to be built, it should be a high level bridge.

Railway and steamship services—

419. Repairs and expenses in connection with the operation and maintenance of official railway cars under the jurisdiction of the department, $59,800.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not rising at this time to complain about the railway cars. This would be the last thing in the world which I would do, notwithstanding the fact that the minister's colleague, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, used to complain repeatedly about these amounts and once voted to remove one of these cars. Be that as it may, I am perfectly happy with this arrangement and I think it should remain as it is.

I rise to inquire about the Pelee island ferry service which comes under the steamship services. I asked this question on the supplementary estimates at the beginning of a session and the Minister of Finance, when he was dealing with the supplementaries, replied as follows, as reported at page 2114 of Hansard for 1959:

> This is the way the operation was carried on previously. The ship had been operated before under just such an arrangement in the hon. gentleman's time when he was minister of transport.

I have since learned that statement is entirely inaccurate. The ship that is now being operated in the Pelee island service is not being operated by way of subsidy. This is a new ship and a departure has been made from the ordinary contract and policy of the department whereby instead of paying a steamship subvention a new ship is being purchased and turned over under certain terms and conditions to the company. Furthermore there has been a curtailment of the service. Whereas, in the first place, the S.S. Pelee operated not only between the mainland and Pelee island but also made daily calls at Sandusky, Ohio, in the United States, the United States portion of the trip has been cancelled. This was, I understand, the profitable part, the operation into the United States, and the other part was unprofitable.

I should like to say at once that nothing I have said is to be construed as criticism of the charming sponsor of the ship who I note, according to a press release, was the spouse of the hon. member for Essex South.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am advised, and I remember it well now because I think it was the first item I dealt with in the department when I took over in 1957, that the decision to build this ship was taken by the previous administration. It was to replace a ship that had worn out which, I believe, had been built in 1912 and had been classed as unsafe. It had been decided by the previous administration to build a new ship and that decision was carried out by this administration. The ship was for island-mainland service only and not for the United States and that decision, I am advised, was taken by the former administration and was carried out by this administration.

Mr. Chevrier: Was the decision made earlier for the new ship as well?

Mr. Hees: Yes, it was made in 1956.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not contesting the minister's statement, but I should like to look into it. Perhaps I will have more to say when we come to the item of the maritime commission.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Howard: I just followed what the hon. member for Laurier had to say about these official railway cars. Undoubtedly an explanation has been given a number of times in the past, perhaps by the present minister, as to what these official railway cars are for and who uses them.

Mr. Hees: Two of these cars are used by the Governor General and three are for general use by the government, including ministers and the board of transport commissioners. The number in use has been decreased by two from the number previously in use when this government took office. At the present time I am considering making a study to see if one more of these cars can be eliminated.

Mr. Howard: It seems to me that perhaps there should be a reduction in the number of railway cars. From what I can gather they are not used very often and consequently sit there perhaps as museum pieces more than anything else. With the advent of air transportation and it being increasingly more available to society and also to the cabinet perhaps in the near future we might not have such an item listed in the estimates.

Mr. Hees: The Governor General uses his two cars a great deal. The board of transport commissioners use one of the three remaining cars a great deal. As I say, I am now studying the possibility of eliminating another of the cars at present in use. As I mentioned earlier, we have reduced by two the number of cars that were previously in use.

I now have the answer to the question asked a few moments ago by the hon. member for Skeena. The answer is this. All ships of the Northland Navigation Company have been certified for service on the west coast as requested by the owner, with the exception of one passenger conveying vessel which was restricted to the number of passengers permitted on the certificate because its subdivision—that is the number of transfer bulkheads fitted—is below regulation standards.

Mr. Howard: That is for service on the west coast?

Mr. Hees: Yes; coastal waters.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to argue with the minister but my recollection is that when I held the position which the minister now holds there were five private cars and no more, namely two used by His Excellency the Governor General which were in constant use; one to the board of transport commissioners; one which was assigned to the minister of transport and one which was assigned to all the other ministers. That is the recollection I have. I may be in error.

Mr. Hees: I am glad the hon. member for Laurier has corrected me. We have eliminated not two cars but one car and at present are studying the elimination of another.

Item agreed to.

420. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals, $2,299,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister tell us something about the Prince Edward Island car ferry and what the present situation is?

Mr. Hees: Yes. We are at present building a new car ferry to supplement the three at present in use. We are marking time on further consideration pending the decision on the Prince Edward Island causeway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister give us any confirmation as to when that progress report will be turned into an actual report on the causeway?

Mr. Hees: No. I am afraid I cannot do that. However, I know my colleague the Minister of Public Works is working night and day on the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is he working on it personally?

Mr. Hees: I am sure he is doing so because all of the ministers in this government work on these problems personally.

Mr. Pickersgill: That answer does not give me much hope.

Mr. Howard: I have just one question to pose to the hard working minister on item 420, although I think perhaps I shall be obliged to make reference, for the sake of comparison, to one of the other items, namely item 427. I notice that on page 75, item 427 relates to an amount of $209,000 and it is listed as "deficit, 1960". However, in the details of the estimates both item 420 and item 421 are listed as deficits but not so on the first page. I wonder what this means? Why is this listed as a deficit?

Mr. Hees: This represents an operating loss on the service.

Mr. Howard: Apart from that matter I have some other thoughts to express on this item. It seems that there is a total—and this is only rough figuring—of some $15 million represented in a number of votes for car ferries and terminals, strait of Canso transportation improvements and facilities and so on, all of which relate to the east coast. I wonder whether the minister could explain the reason for these amounts being listed here under the federal department. Is it because they relate in some cases to interprovincial travel? Why are the provincial governments—or in this instance Prince Edward Island particularly—not involved in building terminals or car ferries?

I ask this question as a result of comparing the situation with that in British Columbia where we also have ferry systems in operation between the mainland and Vancouver island and in some cases between points on the mainland. In so far as I know, all of them are operated under provincial government auspices. I wonder what the reason is for the difference there. Can the minister explain that matter to me?

Mr. Hees: Yes. These subsidies result from either the terms of union or confederation agreements between ourselves and these different provinces. They are of long standing, with the exception of the agreement with Newfoundland which of course extends back only about 10 years. These services are operated on our behalf by Canadian National Railways.

Mr. McQuillan: Are all these votes in accordance with the terms of confederation? Are they all interprovincial services or are not some of them just within the province itself? I notice one or two here that are within a particular province. It is not often that I agree with the hon. member for Skeena but one thing that puzzles me is why the Department of Transport will provide certain services in the maritimes or the eastern provinces and will not provide them in the west.

Mr. Hees: These ferries are all the result of confederation terms with the exception of the Yarmouth-Bar Harbor ferry.

Mr. McQuillan: There is one with respect to Pelee island. Is that one of the terms of confederation?

Mr. Hees: Will the hon. member tell me what item he was talking about? I thought he was referring to the Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland ferry service.

Mr. McQuillan: I was speaking generally of these items, but I saw it some place. As a matter of fact, every time I look through these items I get a little bit annoyed; it is not that I am not in favour of their having these services down in the maritimes and in the east, but as a matter of comparison, the situation annoys me. I saw an item some place with regard to a ferry to Pelee island. Is that an interprovincial ferry?

Mr. Hees: This new Pelee island ferry was an arrangement entered into in 1956 by the previous administration and carried on by this government.

The Chairman: Shall vote 420 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps we might call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Churchill: Could we not go on for a few minutes?

Mr. Pickersgill: What item are we on?

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to continuing after ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: I think we should call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, could you tell us what item we are on?

The Chairman: Item 420.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house if we can take it for granted that during the next three days we shall be considering estimates and if so will he tell us what those estimates will be?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow being Wednesday we shall begin with the Department of Fisheries followed by the Department of Justice, and if those estimates are completed we will, I hope, complete those of the Department of Transport. I announced the business for Friday the other night.

It being four minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

ELEVENTH AND TWELFTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN TWELFTH REPORT

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron) presented the eleventh and twelfth reports of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the twelfth report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH INSURANCE

YUKON—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the house that I have today signed an agreement with the commissioner of the Yukon under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. This is the eleventh such agreement to be completed, and will permit the commencement of operations on July 1, 1960. By assuring residents of the territories access to hospital and diagnostic services on the same basis as other Canadians, the program should be of tremendous value to the Yukon in achieving full partnership in the nation's progress.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if he will take notice of the announcement by the premier-designate of Quebec that he proposes not to delay action in this matter? I hope the federal government will likewise be ready to meet him and discuss the matter without delay.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I should like to point out that the federal government has been most co-operative with all provinces ever since the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was enacted.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this is a welcome announcement which demonstrates that very soon all Canadians will have the advantages of the provisions of the national hospitalization act. Now that this agreement has been completed I hope the government will lose no time in expanding its health benefits in the direction of a full national health insurance program by providing legislation, in co-operation with the provinces, for prepaid medical care for all citizens.

STARRED QUESTIONS

CHLORATHIOZIDE DRUG PURCHASES

Question No. 165—Mr. Howard:

1. Since January 1, 1958, has any medical doctor attached to, or working under the jurisdiction of, any department of government made a special request that the Department of Veterans Affairs purchase a pharmaceutical known as chlorathiozide from Merck Sharpe and Dohme?

2. If so, what is (a) the name of each such doctor; (b) the reasons for each such request; (c) the date upon which each such request was made; (d) the amounts for each such pharmaceutical purchased upon such request?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the hon. member is not present. The answer to this question has entailed a lot of extra work and correspondence, and I apologize to the hon. member for having taken so long in obtaining the information. I might also point out that the answer is quite detailed and of considerable length. Therefore I feel I should request permission to hand it in and have it appear in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to have the answer appear in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The answer referred to above is as follows:]

1. Yes, under the trade name "Diuril".

2. (a) All drugs of this nature are requisitioned by the various chiefs of service, medicine, in each departmental district. Chiefs of service, medicine, are: Newfoundland, Roberts, Dr. J. B.; Halifax, MacDonald, Dr. R. M.; Saint John, Tonning, Dr. H. O.; Quebec, Morin, Dr. J. Eus.; Montreal, Halpenny, Dr. G. W.; Ottawa, Mirsky, Dr. S.; Kingston subdistrict, Brown, Dr. Malcolm; Toronto, Macdonald, Dr. R. I.; Hamilton, Peacock, Dr. H. A.; London, Lewis, Dr. J. A.; Winnipeg, Kilgour, Dr. J. M.; Regina, Rodger, Dr. D. E; Saskatoon, Hilliard, Dr. I. M.; Calgary, Tuttle, Dr. M. J.; Edmonton, Hamilton, Dr. K. A.; Vancouver, Baird, Dr. M. M.; Victoria, Kenning, Dr. S. G.

(b) Chiefs of service, medicine, of this department have the responsibility of requisitioning the particular drugs which in their medical judgment are required for the treatment of departmental patients under their medical control. This is the reason that these doctors requisitioned diuril.

(c) Since January 1, 1958 there have been 100 such requests. Of these, there were 71 made during the year 1958 and 29 during the year 1959. During the first five months of 1960 no such requests have been made.

(d) The total quantities purchased as a result of the above requests since January 1, 1958 have been 815,400 tablets, of which 541,400 tablets were purchased during 1958 and 274,000 during 1959. There were, as previously mentioned, no purchases during the first five months of 1960.

Note: Until December, 1958, chlorothiazide was manufactured only by Merck, Sharpe and Dohme under the trade name of diuril. Since then other firms have manufactured chlorothiazide and, following a period of trial during which these other products were proved to be satisfactory, this drug has been purchased by tender under its generic name.

IVANHOE LAKE, ONT., DAM

Question No. 188—Mr. Godin:

1. Did the federal government assist financially in the construction of the dam on Ivanhoe lake near Foleyet, Ontario in 1931? If so, to what extent?
2. Was permission required under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for the construction of the dam? If so, did the Department of Public Works satisfy itself that the structure was safe?
3. Has the federal government received any request for assistance in replacing the dam? If so, what reply has been made to such request?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Nickel Belt the answer to the first question is yes. At the request of the Ontario government the federal government contributed one third of the cost, which was divided among the provincial government, the Acme Lumber Company Limited and the federal government, each on a one third basis. The federal share was not to exceed $13,300, approximately.

The answer to the second question is yes. It is assumed the Department of Public Works was satisfied with the design of the structure, because of the federal contribution.

The answer to the third question is no.

SALE OF HUNTING AND FISHING LICENCES, CUSTOMS OFFICES, B.C.

Question No. 189—Mr. Macnaughton:

1. Are employees of the customs offices in British Columbia authorized to sell provincial hunting and fishing licences?
2. If so, has any arrangement been worked out between the federal and provincial governments by which federal employees are engaged and remunerated for providing this service?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answers are as follows:

1. Yes.

2. My department, at the request of the department of recreation and conservation, province of British Columbia, has for several years permitted the sale by customs officers at several ports of entry in that province of provincial hunting and fishing licences, for which service these officers are paid on a commission basis.

MEETING WITH WESTERN FARM LIAISON COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the necessity of an early meeting between the government and the western farm liaison committee.

Mr. Speaker: The urgent matter of public importance, for which the hon. member for Essex East asks leave to move the adjournment of the house so that it may be discussed, is the necessity of an early meeting between the government and the western farm liaison committee. I recall that references to such meetings have been made from time to time in the house, and before exercising the duty which is mine initially I would appreciate it if there were some representative views expressed as to whether this subject is one on which the rule can be invoked at this time. I will hear the hon. member who makes the motion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Your Honour is correct in saying that you have heard some references to this matter in this house during the course of the present session. It is true that questions have been put by hon. members to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the possibility of such a meeting. Your Honour will recall that the replies given to those questions were always of an indefinite character, and indicated no definite arrangement in so far as the declared policy of the government is concerned.

It cannot be argued that there is any other procedure open to us in order to urge the government to arrange a meeting with the farmers of western Canada, because the agriculture estimates have been disposed of. It is true that while those estimates were before the house I took advantage of the opportunity to raise this matter, but the replies of the Minister of Agriculture were of the same order as the replies given to the members of this house by the Prime Minister to questions put on the orders of the day. The matter cannot be dealt with on the next supply motion, because a supply motion dealing with agriculture has already been disposed of this session. This matter, therefore, that is now well over a year and a half old and that has not been finally dealt with, surely should be discussed in this house at this time, particularly when we are about to prorogue.

Your Honour will recall that this matter arose a year ago last May, when a delegation of some 1,000 farmers from western Canada came to see the government concerning a solution which they proposed for the distressed agricultural situation. The government, after carefully listening to the representations that were made by those farmers, said the matter would receive careful consideration. We were told, indeed, by the Prime Minister several days before the conclusion of the last session of parliament that the matter was still engaging the attention of the government, and that before the session terminated we would receive a definite indication of government policy.

Mr. Speaker: May I ask a question of the hon. member in order to bring my problem into clear focus. Reference is made to a western farm liaison committee. I should like to know whether that is an ascertainable group. I would also suggest to the hon. member that he confine his remarks to the urgency arising since the last time this matter was discussed in the house, because any events prior to the supply motion to which the hon. member referred, if they dealt with this subject—and I presume they did—would in my view not be relevant to the point.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps Your Honour would consider it relevant only because I was seeking to establish an answer to the very question which Your Honour put to me a moment ago, as to the identification of the western farm liaison committee. It was after this meeting with this group that the western farm liaison committee was established, and the results I have indicated attended questions put to the government in this matter by hon. members in this house, the same response that was received to the main representations made by the larger group. We have persisted in trying to get some indication as to when the government would meet with this western farm liaison committee. I have before me the Leader-Post of June—

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I rise at this point, Mr. Speaker, and say that usually the courtesy is shown of giving a copy of any such motion to the leader of the government or to one of the ministers. That has not been done in this instance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the Prime Minister for what he has said. I thought a copy of the motion had gone over to him. I am sorry that it had not.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, surely. Thank you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the Prime Minister feels that he has been in any way aggrieved I shall be glad to take a moment off in order to allow him to read it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Lack of courtesy has been shown.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister speaks of courtesy. I have said that I regretted that it was not sent over to him. I want the Prime Minister to know that if we are to have lessons in courtesy, I am not going to take them from the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: You have to learn from somebody.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have before me a statement which appears in the Regina Leader-Post of June 23 and which I think points up the urgency of the matter. This is a Canadian Press story which reads as follows:

> Roy Atkinson, vice president of the Saskatchewan farmers' union said Tuesday that Prime Minister Diefenbaker and his government are "stalling an early meeting with the western farm liaison committee" to discuss farm problems. He told the S.F.U. district 13 meeting here that stalling seemed to have become the Prime Minister's favourite dodge in the last two years.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member realizes that he should not debate the matter which would be under debate if the motion were allowed. I think he has satisfied the point which I raised, and I should like to hear any contrary opinion, if there is any.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You were asking about urgency, Mr. Speaker, and I am pointing out the statement made—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know hon. gentlemen do not like it when we champion the cause of the farmers.

Mr. Speaker: In my view the hon. member has dealt with the point which it is necessary to have dealt with for a decision to be reached, and that other discussion would simply be anticipation of debate. I would ask him to allow me to hear some contrary view on this matter. I will hear the Minister of Justice.

Government Meeting with Western Farmers

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I think there are three grounds upon which the propriety of the motion can be questioned. The first two relate to the matter of urgency, that is to say whether it is of that urgency which entitles it to be moved at this time as a matter requiring immediate debate.

In that connection I should like to point out the first of the two grounds on which I suggest it is not urgent, namely that it could be discussed on a supply motion. I understand that there have been some discussions with regard to the final supply motion that remains to be introduced. I also understand that it was indicated that that motion would be called on Monday if desired. That being the case, if my hon. friend wished we could discuss this matter on Monday on a supply motion.

In that connection I will just refer Your Honour to page 90 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, where paragraph 4 reads as follows:

(4) A motion to adjourn the house under standing order 26, for the purpose of discussing "the serious situation in which farmers of Manitoba are at the present time, on account of lack of feed for cattle and seed grain and no satisfactory result can be obtained from the government for relief", was ruled out of order, because the subject matter thereof could be discussed either on the motion for the house to go into committee of supply or on a certain bill then on the order paper—

The second of those grounds does not apply here, but the first does apply.

This matter could also be discussed on a motion for the house to go into committee of supply, which I understand will be coming up on Monday. If hon. members wish it to be discussed then, they could indicate that they wish to change the plans for dealing with the supply motion and this matter could be discussed on Monday. Therefore I submit that the urgency of debate is not of sufficient measure to warrant setting aside the present day's appointed business to debate this matter, since it could be debated on Monday.

Second, on this question of urgency, I would like to stress what Your Honour has already pointed out, namely that the matter has been discussed on a number of occasions during this session. There was opportunity for discussion on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture and nothing has been said yet, I submit, which indicates that it has acquired that sufficient extra degree of urgency since it was last discussed which would warrant an interruption of the business appointed for this day. So on those two grounds I submit that the motion does not meet the requirements of urgency of debate which is a prerequisite for the allowing of the motion.

The third ground is one which I raise with some reservations, but I think it should be put forward although in my submission the first two grounds are adequate. The third ground is the question of whether the matter raised by this motion in the form in which it has been presented is within the administrative responsibility of the government. As I recall the motion it simply said "to discuss the urgent matter of the desirability of meeting with the members of the farm liaison committee". It makes no suggestion as to what action within its administrative responsibility the government should take. It seems to me that in order to meet this requirement of the rules it should make some recommendation or suggestion or criticism with respect to what the government should do as a matter of administrative responsibility within one or other of the departments that are empowered to deal with farm problems. I raise as a very real question whether the mere arranging of a meeting with a group which is not of a governmental nature and which is not made up of members of the government or of any government can be said to fall within the administrative responsibility of the government in the sense in which those words are used in paragraph 100 on page 89 of Beauchesne's fourth edition.

For those three grounds, but as I say primarily on the first two grounds relating to urgency, I submit that this motion is not in order at the present time.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I say a few words in reply to the points of order raised by the Minister of Justice. I agree with the Minister of Justice that the motion would have been strengthened by the inclusion therein of a subject matter such as deficiency payments or acreage payments. In that case it would clearly be within the administrative purview of the government. However, I do feel that this motion which has been presented by the hon. member for Essex East is one that clearly comes within the rules of the house.

I feel that this question has taken on a good deal of urgency in recent days. Many negotiations have been taking place between farm leaders and the government as to a possible meeting, but the farm organizations have now come to the conclusion that the government is giving them an evasive reply. They have issued a statement under date of June 27 in the Manitoba farmers' union news letter which bears on the question of urgency, and I wish to read from it only one sentence:

We are receiving a lot of double talk, evasive actions, excuses, delays (five months) since the federal government and farm leaders had a meeting)—

These are the words to which I wish to draw particular attention—

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should not proceed to advance the arguments which would be made if this question were allowed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before you make a ruling, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I am not making a ruling.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not wish to interrupt, Mr. Speaker, but before you make a ruling I should like to have an opportunity to reply to these extraneous matters.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will give the Prime Minister an opportunity, and perhaps the Leader of the Opposition may wish to say something too. I do urge hon. members not to get into the subject matter which would be discussed if this motion were allowed. The objections to the motion were clearly put by the Minister of Justice. If there are facts that bear on recent and new urgency I would be interested to hear them, but I must say the course the hon. member for Assiniboia is following is not really that. It is rather to press the argument which would be made if this motion were allowed.

Mr. Argue: I wish to point out that I had not completed that sentence. There is a statement which I feel has a bearing on this very matter. The house should extend me the courtesy of allowing me to finish the statement.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: The sentence reads—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I hear hon. members calling order. I have not made any pronouncement on this particular quotation except to indicate that it seemed to me to be tending in the direction of an argument.

Mr. Fulton: Why does not the hon. member hand it up to Your Honour to see whether it is in order?

Mr. Speaker: I want the hon. member, if he wishes to continue, to direct his remarks to the impossibility of having a meeting. That is the only thing that would suggest any urgency.

Mr. Argue: I want to complete the sentence.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: The sentence reads:

—and now arbitrary rules of procedure from the federal government.

What we are discussing now are the rules of procedure; that is why I wished to complete the sentence. I submit there is urgency because of the temper of the farm organizations at this moment. That has not been the position up until this time. Because we are in the concluding days of this session I think it is essential that this meeting be held so parliament could receive from the government a clear announcement of government policy. I believe this is necessary because the producers of western Canada have had good reason to expect an announcement from the government. They have had reason to expect it both from statements of the cabinet and of hon. members of the government party. For these reasons I feel that this matter urgently requires debate and discussion by parliament.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should hear the Prime Minister who has said that he wishes to speak.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal only with the questions raised by the Minister of Justice in regard to the administrative responsibility of the government in this matter and to what he called the extra degree of urgency, if any, which attaches to it.

So far as the minister's doubts about the administrative responsibility of the government to deal with this matter are concerned, that is a very strange argument indeed for the minister to advance in view of the fact that his colleague the Minister of Agriculture, instead of taking responsibility himself on behalf of the government, asked this liaison committee to produce ideas and make proposals. Perhaps this is a denial of administrative responsibility in one sense but it is certainly an admission that this committee has a special interest in the matter and that the government would like to hear from it in regard to it.

In so far as urgency is concerned, the minister said there is no extra degree of urgency since the matter was last discussed. It is because of the delay of the government in doing anything about it that the extra degree of urgency has developed. When the minister says that we can have a supply motion next Monday, on which occasion this could be discussed, perhaps he does not know that the business of the house so far as we have been informed has been determined and a supply motion could not be introduced next Monday. However, if one were introduced next Monday under which we could discuss this matter, no doubt the minister would be the very first to rise in his place and say we were out of order in introducing this subject because on February 22 last a supply motion which dealt with agricultural policy was introduced and debated.

We therefore would not have recourse to that particular method of discussion. On these two counts—the administrative responsibility of the government to do something about this, and the extra degree of urgency which has developed from the fact that the government has done nothing about it—I submit that the motion is in order and should be discussed at this time.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want first to join in support of the contention of the Minister of Justice that this is not a matter of particular urgency within the rules. I am not discussing extraneous matters when I say that. Under the rules this is not a matter of urgency. Every opportunity has been given for the discussion of this matter throughout the months. Indeed, it has been a subject of continual discussion, and nothing has been advanced that would in any way indicate any extra urgency at the moment.

However, it was not in connection with that point that I intended to rise. Your Honour allowed a very wide field of discussion and statements quite, I submit, beyond what normally would take place on the discussion of a motion such as this. In fairness I must point out the facts. Reference was made by the hon. member for Essex East to some statement made by a vice president of a farm union in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Of course that was done designedly, not for the purpose of advancing any argument in favour of the motion on a procedural basis, but simply in order to place on the record the expression "stalling". The hon. member for Assiniboia followed a like course of plagiarizing a statement made by some other person.

Let me make this clear and definite. The hon. member for Essex East pointed out that the farm delegation had seen the government in March of 1959, I believe. Subsequently, some months ago, it was made very clear that the request of the liaison committee of the farm organizations for deficiency payments was not one that could be accepted. It was then made clear to the liaison committee that if it had an alternative to offer, the government would give it immediate consideration. That alternative has not been placed before the government. All that the government has received is a repetition of the arguments in favour of deficiency payments. We asked those organizations to bring their alternative, not alternatives, to the attention of the government. As soon as they can agree among themselves as to what the alternative is, and it is submitted by this committee, composed as it is of representatives from various farm organizations, the government will immediately meet the committee without one minute's delay.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I can say a word about the point raised by the Prime Minister, that there has been no suggestion of any extra urgency. Those were the words the Prime Minister used. I think, sir, I can satisfy you out of the mouth of the Minister of Agriculture that there is extra urgency; because on June 14 the hon. member for Assiniboia raised a question about the government receiving this delegation. I do not intend to read all of the exchange. He raised the question with the Prime Minister who left it to the Minister of Agriculture to answer. At page 4883 of Hansard the hon. member for Assiniboia said:

> Can the minister say whether negotiations are taking place for a meeting at an early date, as indicated by the Prime Minister on June 9?
> Mr. Harkness: No negotiations are taking place. Several of the separate member organizations of the western liaison committee have written asking for this meeting. A date has not yet been set for it.
>
> Mr. Argue: I have a further supplementary question. Is the government prepared to meet the liaison committee?
>
> Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—
>
> Mr. Speaker: In view of the previous answer it seems to me that the question becomes hypothetical.
>
> Mr. Argue: There is no information in the minister's answer as to whether the government is prepared to meet the delegation, and the Prime Minister said this was the case.
>
> Mr. Harkness: I think it has been made clear in this house on several occasions in the past, Mr. Speaker, that the government is willing to meet organizations of this sort at any appropriate time when the matter can be arranged and any useful discussion can be held.

Mr. Churchill: Very good.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the Prime Minister also said that this organization was asked to provide the government with a policy, which it did not have itself—

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: It seems to me that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is completely untrue.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is getting into a debate on policy. That is not the issue before the Chair. I have allowed the hon. member wide latitude, and perhaps I have gone too far, to find out whether there was any new circumstance in connection with the matter between the government and this committee which might be a matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what I was coming to. I was going to say that this committee has been asked to make proposals to the government respecting the policy of this country. We in the opposition feel that we are entitled to have those proposals made before the session ends so there will be an opportunity to debate this matter during the current session. Since we know the session is nearing an end, it makes a condition of extra urgency.

Mr. Speaker: I see the hon. member for Stormont on his feet.

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, the urgency mentioned in the rule has nothing to do with the matter before us. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, citation 100 (3), reads:

"Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

As the Minister of Justice clearly stated, the opposition obviously will have an opportunity on Monday on the motion to go into supply to discuss this matter further. I think this is an effort on the part of the official opposition to force legislation upon the government, and I think—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I have heard sufficient to make my ruling. I must say that when the hon. member proposed this motion he made a point which I feel has substance to it and deserves the consideration of the house. I refer to the difficulty of initiating new matter at this stage of the session for limited debate. However, the method he has chosen—I am not going to discuss the other methods which are open to him; I express my sympathy with the view that there is difficulty—is under rule 26. Whatever other opportunities may be open to him, my duty is to interpret rule 26 as it reads and as it has been put into operation in the past. It calls for the interruption of the business of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance.

The matter proposed is the necessity of an early meeting between the government and the western farm organizations' liaison committee. It was because of the indefiniteness of that proposal that I perhaps asked for more argument than would be warranted, because I was not clear on what the hon. member wished the house to debate. It is obviously not the fact of a meeting, because that has no significance in itself. It is a meeting with respect to farm policy, I assume, that would give this motion any urgency.

In fairness to the hon. member I have tried to see some change in the relationship of the farm organizations toward this house and the government, and it is the government in this case that is referred to, which would warrant our taking the matter up again as a matter of urgency of debate.

Regard must be had to the substantial amount of time that has been spent in dealing with farm policy in the course of this session, whether it be deficiency payments or any other item of farm policy which might be discussed at the meeting which hon. members wish to urge on the government. Whatever the policy for discussion, it is a broad problem which, like the unemployment problem, cannot be the subject of a motion of this kind, in my view, unless there is some specific change, happening or event which has arisen since the general discussion in the house. There have been ample discussions in the house on farm policy, and I assume there will be further discussion in the house.

On those grounds which have been put forward and debated, I think, very fully, it seems to me the rule is not satisfied.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION—SASKATCHEWAN TEACHERS' REPRESENTATIONS

Motion No. 121—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all telegrams, correspondence, resolutions and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the Saskatchewan teachers' federation concerning federal aid to education, since January 1, 1959.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S. AGAINST INCREASED DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government has made any representations, and if so in what form to the United States government against the proposals now before the United States congress to increase the duty on Canadian lead and zinc.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question arose two or three days ago, and instructions have been given to the Canadian ambassador in Washington to make protests there.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Would the minister inform the house at a later date of any developments with respect to this matter, which is of serious concern to the lead and zinc producing areas?

Mr. Green: The government is very conscious of the importance of the move made in Washington, and I will be very glad to keep the house informed of any developments.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

WALPOLE ISLAND RESERVE—REPORTED ARRESTS BY MICHIGAN STATE TROOPERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to reports that persons on the Walpole island Indian reserve allege that Michigan state troopers came into Canada to arrest certain persons belonging to that reserve, and whether he has any comment to make.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are making inquiries, which are actually under way at the present time. There are several departments involved, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration because these persons are Indians, and the Department of Public Works which has charge of the actual undertaking.

I am not yet in a position to say what the facts are in this case. If it should be established that the two Indians were arrested on the United States side of the boundary for an infraction of United States law, it would appear that there would then be no occasion to make representations. If, however, it should appear that the apprehension of these two Canadians took place in Canadian waters then representations will be made, of course, through whatever channels are most appropriate and expeditious.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON REPORTED REQUEST FOR CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on June 22 the hon. member for Vancouver East asked me the following question:

> Can the Prime Minister make any comment on the report that the Vancouver city council has requested him to convene immediately a conference of federal, provincial, municipal, employer and union leaders to consider the present serious unemployment situation in British Columbia?

[Mr. Green.]

To which question I replied as follows:

> I will examine the record to see whether or not representations have been made, and then give the hon. gentleman a reply.

As a matter of fact he was two days ahead. It was not until June 24 that a message to that effect was received by me in the late afternoon. So far as the answer is concerned to the several matters arising in consequence of this representation by the city council of Vancouver, the Minister of Labour will make the reply.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister received a request from the Vancouver city council to call a conference on unemployment in British Columbia. Certainly the advice and suggestions of provincial, municipal and labour leaders is always welcomed in the matter of finding jobs for Canadians and in maintaining employment.

Provincial authorities particularly are in an advantageous position, as they are more familiar with the situation in a particular province and possibly are aware of developing circumstances in that province which may alter or improve the situation. In this instance I might point out that at least one province has acknowledged its responsibility in this matter; that is the province of Quebec.

The federal government called a conference in July, 1958 dealing with the question of seasonal unemployment. That conference was attended by provincial, municipal and industrial representatives, including those of labour. As a result the federal government put into effect a municipal winter works plan which was responsible last winter for stimulating needed municipal works in the amount of $75 million, and in two winters provided more than 90,000 jobs on site.

At the present time the causes leading to manpower surplus in an expanding economy are under investigation in the other place, and the services of an outstanding economist have been engaged. Dr. Deutsch and his staff will continue to amass information during the recess in order that the committee of the other place may carry on its deliberations in the light of all the facts. Certainly the situation in each province will come under careful scrutiny. A number of organizations will be asked to submit information and suggestions to this committee, and some of them certainly will be from British Columbia.

In the Department of Labour studies are being carried on dealing with the effects of automation in industry. That department's research branch is keeping a close watch on the manpower situation across Canada.

Certainly the government is in close touch with what is going on, and such policies as may be invoked to deal with the situation will be announced at the proper time. Meanwhile all suggestions are welcomed, from whatever quarter they may come.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the investigation in the other place referred to by the Minister of Labour is the same kind of investigation requested in this house and turned down by the government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer, of course, is in the negative. The other place is a part of parliament, and the actions taken in the other place in this regard are in keeping with the assumption of a responsibility on the part of the Senate which indeed is theirs, but which in the past, particularly under the last administration, was never exercised.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In view of what he has just said, which is at variance with what the Minister of Labour said earlier, will the Prime Minister agree to the setting up of a committee of this house either to work on its own or in conjunction with the committee of the other place so that the elected representatives of the people, as well as the members of the other place, may have an opportunity to discuss and study unemployment with the aim of arriving at a solution to this serious problem that confronts Canada at the present time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I hear so many complaints from the other side of the house with regard to setting up committees. Indeed, there has been one continual objection raised. We must always take into consideration their opposition to anything in the nature of committees.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: You were not here the other day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Pretty cheap.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the hon. member for Ottawa West something to say? I just looked up his record on committees. In the case of one committee which had three sittings he had a good record, and in the case of the other two committees of which he was a member he attended about 10 per cent of the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, surely it is not within the right of any member of the house, including the Prime Minister—

Mr. McIlraith: To misstate the facts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to comment on the conduct of the hon. member, inasmuch as there is no more devoted member than the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Speaker: A point of order has been raised and, of course, the record now bears the statement objected to. I agree that the Prime Minister went beyond answering the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was interrupted.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in view of what the Prime Minister has just said, may I ask whether he is not aware that a request was made in the house last February that a committee be set up to study unemployment, and that request was turned down by the government?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am aware that from time to time that question has been brought before the house. I am also aware of something which I am very happy to have learned, that the premier-designate of Quebec has stated that the responsibility for unemployment rests on the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question? Does that mean that he now repudiates the statement of the Minister of Labour to the effect that the federal government is responsible exclusively for the solution of the problem of unemployment?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the statement alleged to have been made was, of course, never made.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Labour can speak for himself in that regard, but I am glad to have support for the stand taken by the Minister of Labour in the position taken by the new premier-designate of Quebec, who throughout the campaign, made it absolutely clear that the responsibility for unemployment rested on the provincial administration.

Mr. Pearson: Would the Prime Minister not give some members of the house who did not hear him the opportunity of hearing him confirm the statement he has just made, that the federal government has no responsibility for unemployment?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said no such thing.

Mr. Starr: Since my name has been brought into this discussion may I say that, on several occasions, I have said on behalf of the government that we have a responsibility in the matter of unemployment. We do not shirk it. But at the same time I have said, time and time again, that in order to carry out the responsibility and in order to solve the problem of unemployment co-operation is needed from provincial, municipal and, yes, even labour bodies and other interested organizations in this country.

An hon. Member: And a little help from the opposition.

Mr. Starr: The statement made by the hon. member for Essex East is, as usual, irresponsible.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Labour has suggested that my statement is irresponsible and I leave that to him, but I also want to point out that his statement is wholly inaccurate.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a question of privilege, if I may.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, I will hear the hon. member's question of privilege.

Mr. Starr: I said that the hon. member's statement was irresponsible, and I want to refer you to Hansard—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is about to justify his statement, that would not be a question of privilege. I thought perhaps he had taken offence at what the hon. member for Essex East had said.

Mr. Starr: I did.

Mr. Speaker: Then perhaps the hon. minister will state his question of privilege.

Mr. Starr: I said that the statement was inaccurate and irresponsible, and I want to bring out what he said as reported in Hansard for May 23; it is also misleading.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The minister rose on a question of privilege, but it appears that what he wishes to do is make a debating statement and that would be out of order.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I may ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Now that he has reflected on the Senate, on a member of this house and on the premier-designate of Quebec, could he answer the question as to whether there will be a joint committee of both houses of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): As usual you ignore the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I did not hear the hon. member, but I heard enough to realize that he was not asking a question nor was he referring to the question of privilege. I trust hon. members will observe the proprieties of the house.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege. The question I was asking was, would the Prime Minister say whether the government would agree to a joint committee of the two houses to study unemployment.

Mr. Grafftey: You never asked that question.

Mr. Speaker: This question has been put on previous occasions and has been repeated in various forms today.

Mr. Pickersgill: And not answered.

ELLIOT LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the serious unemployment situation, could the Minister of Trade and Commerce inform the house when the committee set up on May 9 to inquire into methods of assisting the uranium community is likely to report to the house?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The committee will report in due course.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give the house any assurance that the committee will report before the end of this session?

Mr. Churchill: I am not able to predict the date of the end of the session.

URANIUM—TRANSFER OF STANLEIGH CONTRACTS TO RIO TINTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the government has given the approval necessary for the Rio Tinto Corporation to take over the uranium contracts of the Stanleigh corporation?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): That has been done, Mr. Speaker, and the Stanleigh mine will, according to the newspaper report, cease operations soon under an orderly method of reducing employment there and, alternatively, the Milliken and Panel mines will be remaining open.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether, in the last two months, there have been any meetings between federal representatives and the government of Ontario to discuss assistance to the uranium communities in this province?

Mr. Churchill: There have been consultations on several occasions between representatives of the two governments.

IMMIGRATION

GERMAN IMMIGRANTS—INQUIRY AS TO REASONS FOR LEAVING CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Apart from unemployment conditions in Canada, can the minister inform the house whether any other reasons are responsible for so many German immigrants leaving Canada, as reported in this morning's Globe and Mail?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are not aware of German immigrants leaving Canada. My department does not keep records of those immigrants who leave.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Can the minister ascertain and inform the house—I am sure she would not have the figures right now—how many able-bodied immigrants are at the present time receiving assistance from her department?

Mrs. Fairclough: I would be glad to do that, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the hon. member might put the question on the order paper, but I will have the information compiled.

FLOODS

FOLEYET, ONT.—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN REPAIRING DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the answer he gave earlier to my starred question, that the federal government paid one third of the cost of construction of the Ivanhoe dam near Foleyet where the flood damage occurred, would he advise the house whether his department could make an investigation of the damages there and possibly find ways and means of assisting in repairing the damage occasioned by the breaking of the dam constructed partly by the federal government?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): I would be glad to look into the matter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ODE TO THE GOVERNMENT—WITH SIMULTANEOUS TRANSLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware of the fact that one of our colleagues in the house has written a song about the government, and has had it recorded with a simultaneous translation.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that we have reached the popular song stage of debate and think we should proceed with orders of the day.

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): If the Prime Minister does not know about that song I should like the privilege of sending him a record of it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have many opportunities of presenting the song privately.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC MISSILE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister care to comment on the latest developments relative to the Bomarc program?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yes. If the recommendations of the joint committee are accepted and approved, then the weapons for the two Bomarc stations which are designed for Canada will become available. As soon as these stations are established they will add materially to the strengthening of the deterrent against war, thereby helping to preserve peace in the world.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of National Defence not regret that the United States congress, under pressure, restored these votes to the detriment of some higher priority projects in respect of our mutual defence?

Mr. Pearkes: I know of no pressure being placed from Canada on the United States congress.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISARMAMENT—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN APPROVAL OF U.S. PROPOSAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has any comment to make on the statement made yesterday in Geneva by Mr. Eaton, that the latest United States proposal which was to have been discussed prior to the walkout by the Soviet union, had been approved by the United Kingdom and by France. Will the minister say whether or not the Canadian government expressed its approval?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member for Essex East saw that report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In yesterday's New York Times.

Mr. Green: It escaped my notice, but I do not believe it is an accurate report. The Canadian reaction to the Russian proposal of June 2 was similar to the United States plan. As yet there has not been a final western plan drawn up, although there are discussions under way with that as an objective. The hon. member will have noticed that representatives of the five western nations met yesterday and representatives of the five eastern nations failed to appear. After a statement by Mr. Moch representing France, the meetings of the committee have been adjourned. I expect further steps will be taken shortly. Just as soon as I am in a position to do so I shall report to the house.

In the meantime perhaps I could have permission to have printed as an appendix to today's Hansard the speech which was made by the Canadian delegate, General Burns, at the meeting which was held last Friday. I referred to that speech in my answer to a question by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) on Monday, June 27. I believe it would be helpful if this speech, which was in effect the last important speech made during the meetings, could be printed in today's Hansard.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the minister a supplementary question, and it is this. Has the government considered initiating a proposal by which the full United Nations disarmament commission might now be summoned to meet in New York to discuss the sabotage by the Russians of the committee work in Geneva?

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to make a statement on that question at the present time, Mr. Speaker. If I were to do so I think I might do more harm than good.

Mr. Speaker: Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs leave of the house to have General Burns' speech printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of speech referred to above, see appendix.]

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Flynn in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

128. Departmental administration, $411,500.

The Chairman: This item will be found on page 29 of the blue book, the details at page 195.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, in the hope of expediting the work of this committee, as in previous years I shall attempt to summarize for the committee the highlights of the fishery and the work of the department for the year 1959-60, the fiscal year just ended. I know you will realize that in order to achieve brevity I must leave out much of importance to particular areas; also, I shall be obliged to make generalized statements which may not always apply in particular cases.

First, I think the committee should recall the extraordinary hazards faced by our fishermen and the tragic loss of life experienced in so many families in the Northumberland strait area of New Brunswick last June. Earlier in the year there was the loss in Newfoundland of the trawler Blue Wave with all its crew. This spring severe storms off Nova Scotia have added to the toll. This list is not complete, but it brings home the hardships associated with reaping the harvests of the sea.

From a production point of view, 1959 was generally a good year, although of course not all areas showed increases over 1958. For the Atlantic region, dominated by the groundfish and lobster fisheries, the total value of the landings was the highest ever recorded. The preliminary total of $59.1 million was 16 per cent over 1958 and a 10 per cent increase over the five-year average of 1955-59.

The Newfoundland inshore fishermen who experienced a very short catch in 1958 enjoyed an exceptionally good year in 1959 in almost all areas. The draggers operating in the gulf and the deep sea vessels fishing out of ports in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland also had a very successful season. On the other hand the small line fishing boats had a poor year, particularly along the Gaspe coast and elsewhere in the gulf of St. Lawrence.

The situation as to markets for the products of the groundfish fishery was somewhat unusual last year. It was the salted fish branch of the industry which experienced a strong demand, while the frozen fish trade was less buoyant. Salted fish production was substantially higher than in 1958, but a low stock position at the beginning of the marketing year, together with—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister would mind my interrupting and just suggesting to him that if he came forward and sat opposite the other microphone he would be a good deal easier to hear. He is between two microphones.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I thank the hon. member very much for his suggestion, and I will adopt it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We really want to hear this minister.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): When I was interrupted I was saying that salt fish production was substantially higher than in 1958, but that the low stock position at the beginning of the marketing year, together with some relaxation of trade restrictions in important markets, resulted in higher prices for the increased supply.

In the case of frozen fish, on the other hand, the relatively strong market of 1958 encouraged increased production and pressure of supplies on the United States market, with the result that inventories increased and prices declined. However, the situation has eased somewhat in recent months and the long term prospects are considered good.

The lobster fishery, only slightly less important than the groundfish fishery to the Atlantic coast, was late in starting in 1959 but was generally productive throughout the summer and fall, and on the average prices were somewhat higher than in 1958. In spite of heavy gear losses and a slight decline in price, the winter and spring seasons have been the best for many years.

The fisheries of British Columbia failed to repeat the record year of 1958. This was anticipated, as 1958 had included the high cycle year for sockeye salmon on the Fraser river. As a result the total pack of canned salmon was slightly less than 1.1 million cases as compared with 1.9 million cases in the 1958 season.

The market for frozen as well as canned products of the salmon fishery remained strong throughout the year, and prices were high. A productive season has been forecast for the 1959 winter herring fishery in British Columbia, and from a start in early October until the Christmas layover catches were running well ahead of those for the same period the year before. The rapid expansion of fish meal production, particularly in Peru, resulted in a sharp decline in world prices for this product. This problem with its serious effect on herring and whaling operations is of major concern to and study by this department as well as by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

In 1959 the catch in the halibut fishery was a little higher than that of the preceding year, although prices were slightly lower. As the result of this development the total value of landings in British Columbia declined from $52.5 million in 1958 to $35.4 million in 1959. However, the 1959 figure was only slightly below the five-year average of $36.7 million.

Looking to the future, I think we may be confident that the long term prospects for the salmon and halibut fisheries are bright. There are problems in these fisheries, particularly with respect to production costs and conservation measures, but the market demand for a limited or gradually expanding production should continue strong.

Discussion of the Canadian fresh water fisheries in general terms is especially difficult because of the vast extent of the region included, stretching from Great Slave lake to the St. Lawrence. Within this territory over 600 lakes are fished commercially. In some areas there are distinct summer and winter fisheries, but for the region as a whole these tend to merge one into the other.

In the spring of 1959 an unusually late break-up delayed the start of the summer fishery in most areas until the middle of June. Catches thereafter were reported to be better than average everywhere except in Ontario, where a fall in the catch of pickerel and in the price of perch reduced the total value of landings quite seriously as compared with previous years.

Winter fishing operations got under way toward the end of November, and results were generally satisfactory. A declining trend in fishing intensity on Great Slave lake, evident for several years past, continued. It is attributed to the difficulty of recruiting crews for the arduous work of winter fishing and to other factors tending to raise production costs. On the other hand, for the first time an experimental winter fishery with trawl gear for smelts was conducted on lake Erie. In general, with rising prices at the turn of the year the outlook for the fresh water fisheries in 1959-60 improved, and total returns to fishermen close to the annual average of approximately $13 million were indicated.

The success or failure of the fisheries in a particular year is, of course, the result of a wide range of factors. Many of these factors are beyond the control of the fisherman. The role of the various services of the department is generally speaking to maintain and where possible expand the resource, and to encourage fishermen to take the greatest possible advantage of the opportunities available to them. In the field of conservation and improvement of the productive capacity of the fisheries we cannot guarantee increased runs every year. Indeed, it is necessary in some instances to restrict the catch today for the benefit of tomorrow.

In the maritimes our chief worry is the lobster fishery. We continue to be confronted with the activity of the small minority who refuse to accept the necessity of regulation, but I am glad to say that it would seem that more and more the fishermen engaged in the lobster industry are realizing that the regulations under which they must operate are based on sound conservation principles and that it is to their own benefit to observe them. Co-operation in this regard has always been high, and I am glad to say that the exceptions are, I believe, becoming less and less. In any case we are continuing our efforts toward achieving complete support for sound conservation of this most important branch of the industry.

The department's information service is continuing its educational program among the lobster fishermen in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. Well attended meetings have been held in a number of fishing communities, with special speakers and films. Radio is also being used in this program.

In British Columbia, as I have indicated, the year 1959 was one in which the low cycle for most species of salmon occurred. Under strict management practices, however, escapement to the spawning areas was generally good. We were particularly encouraged by the apparent building up of certain runs of fall fish.

Fish culture, designed to overcome the effect of advancing civilization and industrialization, is one of the important phases of conservation. The year 1959 was important in this respect.

In the maritimes the transfer of 10,000 barrels of disease-resistant oysters from Prince Edward Island to stricken areas of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia was completed. To date the results have been good. The transplants have shown only normal mortality, and normal mortality is 7 per cent or 8 per cent or less. These oysters have grown well and have spawned, and it looks as if they will be a continuing race in this new environment in which they have been placed. We were also fortunate in having a year of very heavy oyster spatting, in Prince Edward Island especially. Our collectors produced over 600 barrels of small oysters, and this represents a tremendous amount of seed oysters which will be used to the greatest benefit of the industry when they become available for distribution.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

We continue to be pressed with problems from hydroelectric power developments, yet it is good to be able to report solutions in most cases. In Newfoundland, for example, the transfer of Atlantic salmon continued successfully from Little Rattling brook, blocked by a power dam, to Great Rattling brook. We are opening up the exploits system with new fishways, and we are continuing to check other developments and clear rivers of man-made and natural obstructions.

In the fisheries in the western part of the country the problems are manifold. We can, however, report success in the fishway at the Whitehorse dam in the Yukon, the removal of the rock slide on the Skeena river, and new fishways at Indian Falls. A study at Meziadin Falls on the Naas river has indicated how a natural obstruction may be overcome. Meanwhile the many fishways already installed continue to function well. Gradually the rivers are being opened up to more efficient migration.

During the year we had the opportunity, with more experienced staff, to turn our attention to other methods and wider applications. Construction of a 2,500 foot controlled flow spawning channel at Robertson creek, Vancouver island, gives us a chance to increase salmon spawning efficiency. Associated with this is a test flume which will be used by the department to test water intake fish deflector devices and by the fisheries research board to continue long term studies on salmon behaviour. Experimental rearing ponds have also been built to study problems of this nature associated with multiple water use projects. In addition we are developing a lake spawning beach.

A major item in the 1959-60 estimates covered the acquisition of a new large patrol vessel to replace the M. V. Cygnus which has operated in the maritime area for several years. The new Cygnus was commissioned late last year. The estimates before you contain a substantial item to provide for a similar vessel to be delivered in 1962 which will operate in Newfoundland waters.

The fisheries research board continued its nation-wide research activities throughout the year. This organization is being pressed more and more for information on fundamental problems and answers to current practical questions. The first full year's operations of the board's deep sea research vessel, the A. T. Cameron, fully demonstrated the value of this vessel as a tool for biological and oceanographic studies on the Atlantic banks and adjacent waters. One of its important cruises covered Davis strait and Baffin bay and into Canada's Arctic waters. Much of the work of the A. T. Cameron, as well as that carried out at the biological stations at St. John's, Newfoundland and St. Andrews, New Brunswick, has been directed to the groundfish investigations required by the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries.

On the Pacific coast a major effort is being put into salmon and herring studies by the board's station at Nanaimo, in response to recommendations by the internatonal north Pacific fisheries commission. Among other activities in this area was an extensive tagging and recovery program on pink salmon migrating through Johnstone strait, carried out in co-operation with the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission and workers from the state of Washington.

A new and important field of investigation by the board was a "blitz" survey of the fish resources of the larger lakes of the barren grounds in the districts of Mackenzie and Keewatin. This investigation was carried out by teams of researchers operating under the direction of the board's Arctic unit operating out of Montreal.

To complete this hasty sweep of the board's activities from coast to coast, I should also mention its activities in the great lakes region. Here the board is acting as the Canadian agent of the international great lakes fishery commission in carrying out experiments on lamprey control under contract from that commission. The board has also initiated biological studies of the fisheries of lake Superior.

Another highlight in the expansion of the board's facilities for research was the opening of the new technological laboratory on the campus of the University of British Columbia in Vancouver. These improved facilities will undoubtedly enable the board to make an even greater contribution in this phase of its activities to all branches of the industry.

Significant progress has been made during the past year in the field of fisheries industrial development. Important achievements in this connection have resulted from the increasing degree of co-operation among the department, the provincial administrations, the fishing industry itself and many private industrial concerns, seeking a potential outlet for their products in the modernizing of the fishing industry. The recent addition of industrial engineers and fishing gear specialists to the department's industrial development service has added greatly to the advice and assistance that can be made available to the industry right across the country.

The department's fish processing experimental plant at Valleyfield, Newfoundland, has been directing its main effort to problems associated with the salt fish industry, and has succeeded in developing a new salt fish product which shows promise. Samples have been sent to many parts of the world, and the first reactions are most favourable. New fish splitting machinery has been acquired and modified to meet specific Canadian requirements, and new techniques for curing, handling and drying fish have been developed in order to improve the product and reduce processing and handling costs.

The introduction and demonstration of new fish catching equipment and methods to areas where they were previously unknown is having significant and advantageous effects on fishing operations in many parts of Canada. The short term hiring of fishermen who are highly specialized in the use of specific types of fishing gear has been introduced with considerable success, with a view to accelerating the introduction and demonstration of catching equipment in areas where it has not been in use.

Work on the design and development of improved types of fishing craft is going forward at an encouraging pace and the first vessel, featuring a multi-purpose function, has been built in co-operation with the government of Nova Scotia and already launched.

In the field of inspection the highlight of the year was the "Canada Inspected" program which began on April 1, 1959. Under this program any plant processing fresh or frozen fish can be granted continuous inspection of its products by departmental officers, provided that the plant meets rigid requirements in respect of construction, equipment, sanitation and operation. Similarly, comprehensive standards were developed for the product. All frozen fish meeting these standards, which have to do with freshness, workmanship and freedom from defects, may be marked with a maple leaf design containing the words "Canada Inspected", while fresh fish may bear a similar design containing the words "Processed under government supervision". I might say that the products which bear these labels have a considerable advantage as far as the marketing of fish products is concerned, because it increases very considerably their acceptability to the consumer of food products.

By the end of February, 1960 a total of over 30 plants had been approved under this program. Limited advertising on the part of the department has met with very good consumer response.

In order to ensure that the fish processing industry benefits from the latest advances in quality control, new equipment and the findings of biological and technological research, the department convened courses for fish plant foremen at Halifax and St. John's, with courses being planned for other centres.

During the year the inspection service also assumed inspection responsibilities in the province of Quebec, and a new administrative area was established to discharge these responsibilities. Most of the personnel involved were taken into the federal civil service from the former inspection service of the province of Quebec, and I must say it speaks very highly for their qualifications to say that the transfer was carried out with a minimum of difficulty and delay.

Despite difficulties in recruiting qualified home economists there was a considerable increase in the amount of television and radio work by the consumer service during the year, as well as the regular demonstrations that are carried on by these specialists for women's groups, schools, institutions, restaurant associations and so forth. The consumer service together with the information and education service issued a new fish cook book which has won critical acclaim from food editors as well as from house wives. The first run consisted of 10,000 copies in English and 3,000 in French. The book sells for $1. The first issue has been completely sold out and a second run is now on order with the Queen's printer. The rerun will consist of 10,000 copies in English and 5,000 in French. The department is continuing its general consumer advertising and will also enter into a limited campaign in grocery magazines with particular emphasis on the availability of government inspected products, which is an excellent selling point.

The economics service continues to study economic problems that are brought before the department affecting the Canadian fishing industry and fish trade. In recent years, for example, many difficult problems of management have arisen in the salmon and halibut fisheries of the Pacific coast. In response to requests from representatives of fishermen and fish buyers the economics service has carried out an intensive investigation into these problems. Field work of the investigation, under the charge of a consultant from the University of Manitoba, was completed some time ago. In preparation for an investigation into the lobster fishery of the Atlantic coast, where a similar management problem exists, the economics service in 1958-59 carried out a survey of all primary fishing enterprises in the maritime provinces to obtain background data for a detailed study of such questions as the interdependence of lobstering and other fishing operations, of lobstering and farming, etc. The study will be initiated in this current fiscal year.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

The economic service has concerned itself with the improvement of statistical services and the solution of problems of industrial development or modernization. A number of projects in these fields are still in hand, and among the reports released in 1959 was one on costs and earnings in assisted fishing enterprises and one on production costs in mechanized fish curing operations. The major current project, however, is a study of the economy of the Canadian fresh water fisheries production and distribution.

As I indicated in my opening remarks, the market situation throughout 1959 was generally satisfactory; but I said also in my opening remarks, of course, that this is a generalization. There are exceptions. In only a few cases were we requested to investigate the possible use of price support legislation, and in no case was such action necessary.

The rebate of 50 per cent on the cost of salt to fishermen was continued and is again continuing in the estimates before you. The program of building 20 community stages in Newfoundland, initiated as a constructive income supplement following the catch failure of 1958, has now been largely completed by the Department of Public Works. At the same time the bait service carried on by the department in Newfoundland has been expanded and its efficiency improved. The vessel insurance plan continues to grow and provides more and more protection to small boat owners. At the end of March of this year more than 5,400 vessels valued at over $16 million were covered under this plan.

In the course of these remarks I have had occasion to mention several of the seven international fisheries commissions on which Canada is represented. Members of the committee are familiar with them, so there is no need of my outlining them now. The results to date show clearly that international co-operation and co-ordination in the field of fisheries conservation are a prime requisite to offset the deleterious effects of increasing range and efficiency of fishing fleets. As time goes on and world population increases it is inevitable that the fishing pressure on the living resources of the sea and of inland waters will increase proportionately or even at a greater rate.

While the estimates before the committee today, of course, are confined to those of the Department of Fisheries, I might point out in passing that there are activities carried on by a number of other departments of government which directly affect the fishing industry. I will not attempt to list them all, of course. I should like to acknowledge that the department does service a great deal of useful assistance from other department of government.

A major contribution is made to the fishing industry by the Department of Public Works in the construction of wharves, dredging, harbour development, breakwaters, and so forth. Similarly, the marine service of the Department of Transport is of vital significance to the fishing industry. As another example, the Department of Finance administers the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and the Department of Labour, of course, administers unemployment insurance as it applies to fishermen and also co-operates in technical training programs in co-operation with provincial governments. The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources also co-operates with us fully, especially in questions of water resources and Arctic development generally as far as the fishing industry is concerned. The very heavy dependence of our industry on export trade brings us in close contact with the Department of Trade and Commerce, particularly the trade commissioner service, and there are many others; but I will not bore the committee by listing them further as they are not directly concerned with these estimates. I think, Mr. Chairman, I probably would be out of order in discussing them, strictly speaking, but I wanted to make this explanation because these are matters that are frequently brought up on the fisheries estimates by hon. members of the committee.

Members of the committee will note that there is a slight reduction in the estimates of the department of this year, a reduction of $1,393,277, to be exact. This has been achieved without any reduction of essential services. This may sound contradictory on its face, but that is not so. The reduction has been achieved chiefly by three sets of circumstances. There have been instances where increased efficiency has been achieved and correspondingly a saving in money. There are other instances where relatively new programs have been developed recently, and this year it has been possible more accurately to forecast costs in regard to them owing to the experience that has been gained over the last couple of years. Then, perhaps I mill not say the largest but one of the largest items of saving is this. Several large construction programs have been nearing completion, and the annual costs in some of them have been greatly reduced as a result.

On the other side of the balance sheet, of course, there are increases in expenditures such as increases in wages, especially with regard to crews on vessels, and the annual automatic increases in pay of civil service employees, and so forth.

I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the committee, but I feel that perhaps a general review of this sort may form a basis on which orderly discussion can take place. I shall be pleased to try to answer as accurately and as concisely as I can any questions hon. members may have, and I will listen with great interest to any suggestions hon. members may make as to ways in which benefit can be created for the fishing industry of this country.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to begin by thanking the minister for his very comprehensive review of his department and of conditions that obtained in the fishing industry during the past year. In particular I should like to thank him for the human touch in his reference to the hazards which fishermen have to contend with, as was exemplified by the disaster in the Northumberland strait and by the loss of the Blue Wave which, incidentally, touched my own riding very much because the entire crew of that vessel was from the riding which I represent.

I do not suppose there is any department of government which is of such great interest to the Atlantic region as that under the minister's administration; and particularly, of course, to my own province which, perhaps more than any other province, is dependent upon the resources in our coastal waters. The references which the minister made to the work of the research vessel A. T. Cameron, to the biological laboratory at St. John's, Newfoundland, to the work being done at Valleyfield and the problems which are being overcome in connection with the successful transfer of salmon up river systems are all of intense interest to my own province.

I am only going to take time to deal with three or four points mentioned by the minister. He ended his remarks by stating that there had been a slight reduction in the estimates but that this would not result in any reduction of essential services. I say at once that I know of no one who has any complaints to offer about the minister's department and the way it is administered. I think we are all very happy with the work the minister is doing, the capability of his staff and the intense interest and sympathetic co-operation which I am sure everybody experiences with regard to problems they put before the department.

However, perhaps I might correct the minister's figures slightly. He said that the estimates were down by $1,393,000, but the situation is not quite that bad; because I think he left out the figures in the supplementary estimates. When they are taken into account we find that the actual estimates for this year total $20,344,090, which is a little less than $1 million below the figure of $21,332,867 for last year.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must express my own disappointment that this reduction has taken place, because on examining the estimates I see that the bulk of the reduction has been made in two very important items. There has been a decrease of $604,180 in the industrial development item and a reduction of $107,160 in the Newfoundland bait service item.

In his closing remarks the minister referred to the completion of the community stage program and I gathered from what he said that 20 stages have now been completed.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): No, the program is not really complete. There still are three, I believe, to be completed.

Mr. Carter: What concerned me was that when the minister spoke his words seemed to indicate that when these 20 stages were completed that would be the end of the community stage program. I sincerely hope this is not going to be the case, because I think the community stage program is one of the best innovations that have been brought into existence since the minister took office. It is certainly a very beneficial program and one that I feel should be not only continued but expanded. In Newfoundland it is of special importance in the efforts we are making to concentrate the fishermen in larger settlements and to get them to use joint facilities instead of each person having his own stage, thereby establishing conditions under which a better quality product can be produced.

There is still another reason why the community stage program should be continued. It affords the fishermen of my province a safeguard against price control. The fresh fish plants do not always compete as to price for the fisherman's product, and the existence of a community stage affords him protection in that he always has the choice of selling his fish fresh or selling it salted. This has two results. It ensures that the fresh fish price will not go below what the fisherman might realize if he salted his fish, and it also provides another safeguard in that very often when the school is at its peak and the catches are extremely large, the fresh fish plants cannot handle all the fish and unless the fishermen had facilities for salting they would be obliged to sell their fish for meal.

The minister's remarks today indicate that the prospects for meal prices going up in the future are not very good. We all know what has happened since Peru entered the market, and we know the effects on our herring industry and on the whaling industry. I think it would be a serious hardship to many of our Newfoundland fishermen if they could not salt the excess catch which the plants are not able to absorb. I hope the minister will reconsider any idea he may have of discontinuing this program.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at one o'clock I had reached the point where I was urging the minister to reconsider the continuation of the community stage program. I had pointed out that it is very essential to the welfare of the fishermen of my province that this program should not only be continued but should be expanded. The community stage program has so much merit that I think it should not be confined to the province of Newfoundland but should be a general program which would embrace any part of Canada that was in a position to take advantage of it.

In urging the minister to continue the program I will say that I think there is room for improvement in the policy which governed the program which is about to be completed. I do not know what the position is at the moment, but I do know that last year there was a time when we had three different kinds of programs in connection with community stages. There was one which was provincially inspired and financed. There was one which was totally federal, to which the fishermen made no contribution at all. Then there was another one which was financed partly by the federal government and partly by the donation of labour by the fishermen themselves. I feel from these three different programs it should be possible to develop one single program to be made applicable to all of Canada.

I drew the minister's attention to the fact that the industrial development vote had been reduced by $604,000 from last year. While we appreciate the necessity of paring expenses and doing everything to balance the budget, it could be false economy when that saving is achieved at the expense of the development of our resources. I do hope that next year we will see this industrial development item not only restored to its former size but greatly expanded to take in all phases of a larger program of industrial development for the fishing industry.

I was very much interested in the minister's remarks concerning the pressure on our fisheries which is resulting from the intensification of fishing and by an increase in the number of countries that are sending fishing fleets to our fishing grounds and particularly to the Grand Banks. There was a time when the fisheries of the Grand Banks were held to be inexhaustible. I do not believe any thinking person could hold that view any longer. Certainly it is most urgent that steps be taken before too late to make sure that our fisheries resources are not depleted. I realize that provisions governing areas outside of territorial waters require international agreement, and international agreements are not easy to come by; I realize also that international committees are working on this problem but progress seems to be very slow and unless results are speeded up it may well be that action will be taken too late.

It is my own opinion that the method of catching fish by draggers is a wasteful one and steps should be taken to find less wasteful methods to substitute for it. The draggers which tow these huge nets along the bottom of the ocean destroy a tremendous amount of young fish which are killed in the process of being hauled to the surface, just as small children are very often killed and trampled on in a mob. The pressure created by the tremendous weight of fish over them when the fish are being hauled in destroys a lot of young fish which are not of commercial size. Some fall out of the net before they get into the boat, while others that are taken into the boat are thrown overboard because they have no commercial value. I believe if agreement could be worked out under which all the nations would agree to use a different method of fishing, perhaps even going back to the hook and line method, as much fish as should be caught under the circumstances would be caught. Certainly this method would prevent large numbers of fish from being destroyed and wasted.

This problem of conservation is closely related to the limits of our territorial waters. I think it was a tragedy when the United Nations law of the sea conference at Geneva failed to reach agreement on this problem by a single vote. At the present time there is nothing but chaos. There is no accepted law of the sea either as to the extent of territorial waters or as to the extent of the coastal waters which any country can claim as a preserve and monopoly of its own fishing fleet. I think we have now reached the point where it is possible for Canada and the United States to reach an agreement as far as the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards are concerned and work out a joint agreement fixing the limit of 12 miles for our own territorial waters. If agreement cannot be reached, then I think Canada would be well justified in taking unilateral action and proclaiming her own limit which would extend the control of the fisheries to 12 miles offshore.

These problems of conservation of our fisheries and the extension of our territorial waters are related also to our patrol service. I am glad to learn from the minister that a new boat has been built to replace the old Cygnus and that these estimates contain provision for a new boat for the patrolling of Newfoundland waters. But if we are going to have an effective patrol service we need many more boats than we have at the present time.

Most of my fishermen are complaining—and this is the situation not only on the south coast which I represent but on the northeast coast as well—that at night huge concentrations of foreign trawlers are gathered together in such great numbers that they look like a floating city. We must have a sufficient number of boats to be able to patrol these areas at all times. You cannot rush one small boat, however fast she is, from one spot to another spot three or four hundred miles away. There is need for at least three boats on our coasts in order to do an efficient patrol service on our coastal waters.

This encroachment on our inshore fishing grounds is proving to be a tremendous handicap and a hardship to our own inshore fishermen. The fishery on the east coast of Newfoundland this year is very poor and some fishermen think that one of the reasons is that these grounds have been dragged over by foreign draggers. I hope the minister next year will be able to provide for at least two more patrol boats in increased estimates. If we had more of these patrol boats they could also be used as rescue boats in the winter time for the coastal service and for those ships that are engaged in the winter fishery.

The other matter to which I wish to refer is the bait service. I have already noted that this year there is a decrease of $107,000 in that item. I realize how difficult it is to administer the bait service. I realize all the problems that are connected with it and I realize that the problems are made perhaps more difficult by the fact that this particular service is confined to the province of Newfoundland as part of the terms of union. However, I think it is possible for the federal government to work out a bait program which could be applicable to other provinces as well. I do not understand what the need of this service is on the Pacific coast. However, there must be communities on the Atlantic coast which could benefit from a similar service although from personal experience, I know that the need is not so great as it is in Newfoundland.

This year I think we are providing for five units. From a rough calculation which I have made I would think there is at present a need for about 50 of these small portable bait units which have proved to be so successful during the past few years. But if we supply these units at the rate of only five a year it means that it is going to take ten years at least before the needs of the fishermen are supplied; and by that time some of the earlier ones will need replacement. I believe that the time has come when we can perhaps take another look at our bait service policies and can work out something a little bit different from what we have at the present time.

I should like to see worked out an arrangement whereby the fishermen themselves would be able to own and control these small portable bait units. When I say that I am thinking not only of fishermen in my own province but of fishermen in other provinces as well. I understand that these units cost about $6,000 at the rate at which they are supplied, which is about ten or 12 a year. Fifty of these units would cost about $300,000. If they were purchased in quantity or were manufactured in quantity the price perhaps would be considerably less than that. But taking the total value at, say, $300,000, I think that would supply all the bait requirements we have at the present time in Newfoundland.

The provincial government of Newfoundland has a fund which it is holding in trust for the fishermen. If the federal government were prepared to make an offer of providing these units at half price it might be possible to work out an agreement whereby the provincial government would place at the disposal of the Newfoundland fisheries federation some of this money which could be put out on loan to fisheries locals and small co-operative groups of fishermen who would be able to purchase their own units and repay over a period of perhaps ten years. It would not be a very big sum if they had to pay say $3,000 over a period of five years or ten years. They would then have the benefit of being able to administer the small units themselves and to work out whatever particular scheme is most suitable to the conditions under which they are obliged to operate.

I would think, though, that the federal government also should supply technicians to train the operators to look after these units and also perhaps maintenance men to keep them in order. If that could be done then the federal government's role would be mainly the maintenance of central depots from which the smaller depots could be supplied and I think that would be a proper federal responsibility. In addition, of course, there would also need to be some bait carriers for the purpose of carrying the bait from the central depot to the smaller ones.

This is only a brief outline of an idea which I have had. I think it is feasible and I also think that where there is a will, there is a way. If everybody concerned would put the interests of the fishermen first, it should be possible to work out a system which would remove a great many of the disadvantages and difficulties with which the federal department is now obliged to contend and which would at the same time improve the service to the fishermen.

I was disappointed on one count in the minister's presentation this morning.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry but I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Winch: I am sure we all listened with a great deal of interest to the résumé of the minister on the operations of his department during this past year, and also his views on the state of the fishing industry at the present time. I want to say that I was most disappointed at the brevity of the remarks of the minister regarding the state of the industry in British Columbia, particularly the herring industry and the whaling industry. As the minister knows—as a matter of fact he commented on it—the British Columbia whaling industry is perhaps the most recent casualty of the fishing industry.

I have noted that the fisheries association of British Columbia, in putting forward the reasons why there is no whaling industry in British Columbia, point out three factors. They are (a) the whales which are available off the British Columbia coast are much thinner than those found in other whaling areas, and consequently the unit yield per whale is lower; (b) they state that the distance of British Columbia from principal market areas creates a substantial freight cost as a handicap; and (c) the fisheries association stated that the level of all production costs was high in British Columbia compared with competing sources of whale products, namely Japan, Russia, Norway, Holland and Great Britain.

I would point out that these conditions are outlined by the fisheries association of British Columbia have always obtained and they most certainly have obtained in the past ten years when the British Columbia Packers Limited have been persisting in their endeavours to operate a continuous annual whaling industry.

So it is with a great deal of regret that circumstances have brought about the situation where there is no whaling industry in British Columbia this year, and that is having an impact on British Columbia. Because it must be recognized that the whaling operation now closed means a loss, I understand, of approximately $600,000 annually in wages and hundreds of thousands of dollars lost to such supply and service industries as petroleum companies, the shipyards, rope works, vessel outfitters and so on. So this is a serious matter to the fishing industry of British Columbia and I had hoped that the minister would have had more to say other than just to comment upon the fact that these industries had closed, that it was of serious concern to his department and that studies were being made of the situation.

Hand in hand with the closure of the whaling industry in British Columbia we have the closing of the herring industry which affects a great many more people than does the whaling industry. As was mentioned by the minister, there was a very good catch in the ten weeks preceding Christmas when I understand there was a record catch of some 166,000 tons. Yet around Christmastime there was a closure of that industry and according to the newspapers it is being continued this year. The fishing companies in British Columbia point out that one of the reasons why they have had to shut down operation is the fact that in 1958 the price for herring meal was $2.70 a unit and nine cents a pound for herring oil, but now these prices have declined to $1.48 a unit for herring meal and six and one half cents a pound for herring oil.

They also point out that there are other reasons which have brought about this situation, and one is the appearance of large new producers in South Africa, Angola and, above all Peru. We have heard a great deal about the entrance of Peru into the herring market. There is a unique point here of which I think some mention should be made, and it is that at the same time the fisheries association of British Columbia have put a closure on herring on account of the low prices for meal and oil, and because they say they cannot stand the competition from Peru, the largest of the fishing associations of British Columbia, out of its profits made along the coast of British Columbia, has established itself in Peru and is using its past and present profits from British Columbia to build up this industry in Peru, as I say supplied by British Columbia capital, about which condition the associations of British Columbia complain and maintain they cannot meet. I think that is not only a paradoxical situation but one which requires some very considerable attention.

I also note, that the fisheries companies in British Columbia point out that one reason for the closing of the herring and whaling industries fishing off the Pacific coast is the competition they are now facing from edible oils. They state that the Canadian industry has encountered severe competition in the Canadian market because of the greatly increased production of animal and vegetable oils, and they name soybean, sunflower and rapeseed.

This brings up another question. It is a serious one and I believe one upon which we should have some comment from the minister. The whaling and herring industries are shut down in British Columbia because they cannot meet the increased competition in Canada of the edible oils which are available at lower prices for the manufacture of shortening and of margarine. Yet it is a fact that the very producers who have brought about this situation are those which are subsidized by the federal government. I know that last year we had the subsidy to the soybean growers. Last week we had an announcement from the Minister of Agriculture that the subsidy to the soybean growers is going to be continued in the next 12 months. So we have that peculiar situation of a lowering of prices and where the herring meal or whaling meal or the marine oils can no longer compete because the price has been forced down by subsidized agriculture in Canada.

We know that help has to be given to agriculture, but we have the situation, which I think all should note, that a government subsidy on the one hand has killed an industry on the other. That gives an idea of the sort of thinking and planning which has to be applied to our economy. I think I should point out that if certain phases of agriculture get into difficulties the government and parliament come through with subsidies. If the railroads are in difficulties we come through with subsidies. If coal mining is in difficulties we help them. But if fishing in British Columbia is in difficulties and certain phases of it are being closed down there is no help whatsoever. At least I do not know of any except that the matter is of serious concern to the government and a deep study is being made of it.

I think that is rank discrimination. Financial help is given to industries of varying kinds across Canada yet we have not seen any action taken to help those two important phases of the fishing industry in British Columbia which are not just in difficult times but are completely shut down, affecting, I believe, some 225 to 250 employees in the whaling industry and I believe between 1,200 and 1,500 in the herring industry.

I admit it is not enough to raise these matters and point out what I am sure is already known to the minister, the impact this is having on the fishing industry in general and the economy of British Columbia in particular. I feel that under this item we are entitled to have from the minister more than a comment to the effect that the situation exists, is of deep concern to him and his department and studies are going on. We are entitled to know what type of study is being conducted and what approach the departmental officials are taking to this serious problem.

I was interested in reading that South Africa also feeling the impact of Peruvian competition sent a delegation to Peru to see if it were possible to work out a marketing, pricing and production agreement. I presume they were not successful but at least an effort was made. Does the department have any such idea? Has the minister heard the results obtained by the South African delegation sent to Peru?

I was also interested in learning that the fishing industries of the United States, the United Kingdom and South Africa asked their governments to convene a meeting of all nations interested in fish meal protein to study the problems that have arisen. I am advised by the fisheries association of British Columbia that they asked the government of Canada to participate if such a conference were convened. Has the minister been in touch with other countries that have a concern similar to that of Canada to discuss the possibilities of there being convened a conference of the major countries concerned with fishing for the purpose of resolving existing problems? If no action has been taken yet will the government take the initiative in this respect? If the government cannot take the initiative in attempting to bring together representatives from the nations concerned conditions will get worse. The situation will worsen if corrective action is not speedily taken.

Before the item carries I sincerely hope the minister will take us more fully into his confidence with respect to the situation in the whaling and herring industries and concerning the studies now being carried on, and will tell us when he thinks it might be possible to make constructive, progressive and corrective announcements.

Will the minister also say something more about Canada's position regarding the 12-mile limit in relation to fishing. This is of keen interest to the maritime provinces and British Columbia. I believe it was the view of the government that it would have liked to see a general agreement on the 12-mile limit. The government was unsuccessful in presenting that view or in achieving a compromise at the meeting held in Geneva because of the lack of one vote.

I know that the fishermen and the fishing industry and unions on the west coast are concerned about the question of territorial rights and authority in relation to offshore fishing. Would the minister speak about the Canadian position concerned the three, six or 12-mile limit? With respect to the three-mile limit will he explain if it is from headland to headland? That makes a great deal of difference on the coastline of British Columbia as the hon. gentleman knows.

I hope I have said enough to indicate the seriousness of the situation as outlined. I trust that the minister will give us some hope that in the near future the whaling and herring industry in British Columbia will resume operations.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Chairman, I should like to join with other hon. members in commending the minister on the excellent attention he has given to the fisheries in all parts of Canada. I should like to make a few observations and suggestions in the interest of the fisheries of the great lakes area. In doing so, I fully realize the fact that the Ontario provincial government has jurisdiction over these waters with the exception of international problems but I consider the restoration of suitable commercial fish to the lakes an international problem.

Our federal fisheries department is making a determined effort toward the betterment of fishing through the efforts of the great lakes fishery commission in lamprey destruction; however, to date only lake Superior has received any attention in this respect. Lamprey are numerous in all the lakes. Therefore their destruction is a tremendous undertaking and scientists and others in charge of this work feel best results can be obtained by concentrating on a specific area for a certain time. Even providing the program works out to expectations there is not much hope of completely exterminating the lamprey and, furthermore, much time and money will be expended in the effort. However, I feel it is a worthy project but it seems to me that other angles should be considered and some action taken.

We know the lake trout have almost become extinct and the population of rough fish in the lakes has increased at a rapid rate. Most of these fish are maintained on the same food as that needed for trout production. Therefore I would recommend that necessary funds be made available for the removal of as many as possible of these fish from our lakes so that lake trout and other desirable fish are given the best possible opportunity to re-establish themselves when the lamprey menace is to some extent removed.

Such a program would provide a livelihood for quite a number of the idle fishermen, and with the exception of Georgian bay could be institutd on a co-operative basis with the United States. A market could be established for certain varieties of these fish and I believe sufficiently large quantities of such fish are available to produce enough revenue to take care of at least one-third of the cost of the program.

When I spoke during the 1959 session in the interest of the great lakes fisheries I suggested the introduction of sockeye and spring salmon into these waters. This idea met with the approval of many people, especially the fishermen. However, according to press releases appearing at intervals since our scientists left the impression that such a program would not be feasible, but their reasoning was not too convincing.

In support of my suggestion I will take as an example our experience with the rainbow trout which were introduced into the great lakes from the Pacific coast. Their increase in numbers has not been phenomenal. However, a satisfactory steady growth in their population has justified the soundness of their introduction. This past spring rainbow trout were observed going up every suitable stream flowing into Georgian bay to spawn and in the largest numbers since their introduction into the great lakes.

They are now supplying our sportsmen with very good fishing. Some excellent catches have been made during the past few weeks, with individual fish weighing up to 12 pounds. The rainbow trout is not considered a commercial fish. However, they are making a worthy contribution to the rebuilding of tourism which at one time was attracted to our district by lake trout.

Worthy of mention is the fact that very few rainbow were carrying scars from lamprey attack. With this apparent resistance to lamprey, the rainbow trout provides a promising future for sportsmen and tourism.

To support my claim that Pacific salmon do hold some promise for commercial fishing in the great lakes, I relate the incident of the taking of three salmon at three different locations in lake Superior late last summer. The fishermen were unable to identify these fish but the fisheries research office of the Minnesota division of game and fish identified them as pink or humpback salmon and they were mature fish. It appeared a mystery for a time as to how these fish came to be in lake Superior. Some time later it was established that in 1956 a few small fish escaped from a hatchery at Fort William where they had been incubated from eggs from the west coast. The establishment of a salmon run in the rivers of Hudson bay was the purpose of this experiment. However, it now appears that there was a greater survival from the few that escaped into lake Superior than from the 200,000 fingerlings that were planted in Goose creek, a tributary to Hudson bay, as there is no record of any survival there. Consequently it would be logical to presume that others of those escapees into lake Superior also survived and continue to thrive in the fresh waters.

This incident bears out the claims made by Tasmania fisheries and the department of fisheries of New Zealand that they successfully transplanted spring and sockeye salmon to their inland lakes and a satisfactory cycle has beeen achieved. Furthermore, the sockeye salmon which became isolated in British Columbia inland lakes have established themselves there and have continued to reproduce. I believe the coast salmon have an advantage over lake trout from the standpoint of survival, considering present day conditions in the great lakes. We have not only the lamprey menace but the smelt which many fishermen feel may be a greater enemy of our desirable fish than is the lamprey.

They are a small fish and much of their diet is very small fish and the spawn of larger fish. Consequently I would suggest that fish such as rainbow, sockeye and other coastal salmon that spawn in the headwaters of our streams would have a very decided advantage in respect of survival. The lake trout and splake which deposit their spawn on the shoals where the smelts and suckers are frequently swarming are constantly losing their reproduction to these predators.

Thus when one essential condition of environment has reached a limiting level which prevents a species from flourishing but still allows survival, a very minor deterioration in this condition will suddenly decimate the population. Conversely, a slight improvement in this condition of environment will be followed by an upsurge in population. Therefore the removal from the lake of as many of these predators as possible could influence a favourable balance for lake trout production.

Second, the introduction of a new species of fish, such as the sockeye or other suitable commercial salmon, which would spawn in the headwaters of our streams, could result in a successful production which would satisfy our needs should our efforts to re-establish lake trout or splake fail.

The introduction of splake, a cross between lake trout and speckled trout, into the Georgian bay has been given much publicity. According to figures released, almost 300,000 fingerlings have been planted in this area since 1956 with some apparent success. Evidence of any production could not be expected so soon. However, splake weighing up to four pounds have been taken by the fishermen and their reproduction cycle can start at the third year.

Some fabulous claims have been made as to the possibilities of the splake but I am doubtful as to how long this crossbred fish can continue to reproduce its kind when it is placed in the environment of the lake trout. My thought is that more and more of the splake eggs will be fertilized by lake trout and that the production will soon revert to lake trout.

It seems to me that if we are to create the best possible conditions for the establishment of a splake population, or the re-establishment of a lake trout population, a closed season for at least two or three years should be imposed. Splake are being fished continually and in 1959, 11,000 pounds of lake trout were taken in lake Huron and Georgian bay. If we are ever to stock our lakes it is essential that these meagre remnants of the species must be retained as breeding stock.

Worthy of mention at this point in my remarks is the recent success of the Japanese fisheries in crossing Pacific salmon with trout from their inland lakes. Their scientists hope to mass produce this new fish in their lakes.

In conclusion, I would suggest that if we are to provide ideal conditions in our waters for fish propagation some immediate action should be taken to curb the constantly increasing pollution of our lakes by industry, shipping, lake bottom oil drilling and other harmful sewage.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to say how much I enjoyed listening to the minister's report on the activities of himself and his department. Second, I should like to say that I looked forward to hearing him and I moved up to the front benches to make sure that I heard him and I stayed here to make sure that he would hear me.

As often as I can, as the committee knows, I talk about the fisheries of Newfoundland and in fact the fisheries of eastern Canada because I believe that the fisheries are growing in importance as our population increases and as the need for more work, for more industry, for more people grows, so grows the importance of our oldest industry.

If I may repeat something I have said before, no nation, no matter how many new industries it develops, can afford to neglect an old industry because in a properly expanding economy all industries are necessary if the nation is to be prosperous. But today, instead of launching out and talking about what we need and the extras that we want, I should like to pause briefly and talk about some of the things which have been accomplished.

[Mr. Noble.]

For many years the fisheries in Newfoundland were conducted in the same way as they were shortly after John Cabot discovered Canada and returned to England with the story that the waters around the new found island were full of fish. For many years the fishery was conducted, using the same type of gear, the same type of boat, in other words the same type of equipment, with very few changes. That was not so bad during the years when progress was comparatively slow and when the industrial revolution had not been heard of; but when modern times came and practically every other industry became modernized, the lag in the development of the fisheries became very serious indeed.

During the first decade before Newfoundland entered confederation—and I am speaking just of Newfoundland now—changes began to take place. It was then that the fresh fish business began to grow. After we had entered confederation all of our economy got a very great boost and fishery development was speeded up. New fresh fish plants in addition to those already existing began to be built and older ones began to be enlarged. It was recognized at that time that the fisheries of Newfoundland needed several things. Production had to be increased and the method of curing had to be improved.

By and large over the years much improvement has occurred in the fishing industry. There is a much greater degree of industrialization today than there was 10 years ago. Artificial drying has reached a stage that we would have been very happy to have had ten years ago. At this point I should like to refer to the report of the Newfoundland fisheries development committee, known as the Walsh report, which was issued in 1953 and which makes excellent and informative reading even today. Only seven years ago it was stated in that report:

> Along that coast development should, in the view of the committee, be by centralization of the salt fish industry at a number of plants located at suitable places in large areas of production in the inshore fishery and near grounds on which long-lining can be successfully carried on. The operations in these plants would be as fully mechanized as possible and the aim should be ultimately to produce light salted fish by mechanical drying.

That was seven years ago and I am very happy to say that since that time much improvement has been made and mechanical drying has to a marked degree—I was going to say to a large degree—supplanted the old expensive method of sun curing and the handling of the fish by the fisherman and his family for which they received very little. Their labour was practically free.

Production and the means of production have been improved as well. The establishment of experimental stations has been of tremendous value. I should like to comment in this regard that I think it is a pity that the public know so little about the great work being done quietly by the experimental and research stations. Their work probably is not of a type that commands headlines or is surrounded by glamour but it is very vital work and has a great and important bearing upon the future of the fisheries. Its importance will make itself felt in more dollars and cents in the pockets of the fishermen which after all is the purpose. The department can be proud of the work it is doing and I should like to see it intensified and broadened. These are some of the things which have been done; industrialization, mechanization and the development of the means of production.

Many of these things were incorporated in the report issued by the government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland in 1953. The program since then has been by and large a broad and beneficial one but I think that time shows up the weaknesses in any line of endeavour and is probably showing now where the gaps in the program are. Without pretending to be an expert on the matter, I should like to mention several gaps which seem to me to be obvious. First, I think more attention should be given to the Labrador fisheries. I believe that with industrialization is coming a greater demand for fish and this at a time when there are probably fewer fishermen than there were in 1953.

I have no figures for Nova Scotia but I have reason to believe that the fish plants of that province depend largely upon Newfoundland fish for their raw material. Industrialization has brought about a greater demand for fish and the result is that more and more attention is being focused on Labrador by people in the fishing industry. I should like to see the resumption of the Labrador fisheries, not necessarily the old floaters which, although they served a good purpose in their time, were not the most economical method of producing fish, but a Labrador fishery tailored to meet the needs of the times and designed to fill the need which is beginning to exist already and will certainly exist to a greater degree within the next few years.

Before the Labrador fishery can be improved as it should be something must be done to help those fishermen living on the Labrador coast already and who throughout the years after the floater fishery failed continued the fishery on the Labrador coast. It is their product which is more and more in demand. Like many other small businessmen regardless of their line of endeavour one of their great needs is capital. They may have all the knowledge in the world as to how to catch fish but unless they have proper boats and good gear they are not going to be able to catch the amount of fish they should. It is evident that the fishermen need better equipment in order that they may prosecute the fishery off the Labrador coast. Therefore I should like to ask the minister to keep in mind the need for some means by which fishermen can get small loans in order to replace and repair equipment, some means by which the federal government can assist the fishermen directly to replace fishing gear and property lost from time to time by storms. I believe that once this property is replaced, once they have the gear, they will be able to operate on their own, but they need help in order to get started. I would ask the government to look into that matter.

I would also ask the Minister of Fisheries to consider carefully the possibility of increasing the bounty on boats and broadening the whole scheme so that small fishing boats will come within the limits of the bounty and fishermen who wish to build small trap skiffs will be able to obtain some assistance from the government in the form of bounties on small boats.

The minister mentioned bait, and here there is another hole in the program which must be plugged. I am very glad to say that improvement in the bait service is already evident but nevertheless this is one instance where the improvements of today are still not sufficient. In most places along the Newfoundland coast there is a perennial shortage of bait and thousands and thousands of quintals of fish which should be caught and sold to the benefit of the fishermen and the people of Canada are left in the water because the fishermen have no bait. Therefore I would ask the minister to continue and enlarge the bait program.

Whereas bait depots are good things and holding plants to supplement the bait depot service are perhaps a better thing, I agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, that small holding plants or freezing units should be available to the fishermen. I think these could perhaps be provided in connection with community stages better than in any other way but even where the fisherman has his own property a method should be found by which he will be able to buy freezers for his bait.

May I enlarge for a moment upon the bait situation. I should like to go back to what I mentioned before—this is something for the minister's research department—and that is the possibility of developing artificial bait.

I maintain that if as much attention were given to the development of artificial lures for codfish as there is to the development of lures for trout we might be able, to a large extent, to do without frozen bait. For instance, squid is undoubtedly the best form of bait that the fisherman finds. It is certainly not the shape of the bait which attracts the codfish because the squid are cut up in shapeless chunks and put on the hook. Then the fish go for it. I do not know whether it is the taste or the smell that attracts them. I was wondering if a liquid could be devised which tasted or smelled like squid—what I might call essence of squid—and put in drums. These drums could be shipped around to the fishermen who could bait their hooks with a piece of sponge or something like that soaked in this liquid which would carry all the aroma and taste of squid. Then the fishermen's bait problem might be solved. I should like the minister to ask his officials to look into the possibility of developing artificial bait in a form which could be shipped around in cans. Then instead of making one big jump ahead into frozen bait, we might make one big step back into the canning age and see if we cannot can this essence of squid.

I believe that if the program which has been followed for some time, were rounded out so that the small fisherman who operates independently with a small boat and with a limited amount of gear could be helped to get his boat and his gear into condition so that he could fish effectively, then we would have taken a long step forward.

I would refer the minister to the report of the Newfoundland fisheries development committee of 1953. I believe this report served an excellent purpose and was used as the basis of much that has been done. This is a good thing because so many reports, once they have been printed, seem to be put to one side and are forgotten. Then later another royal commission is appointed which produces another report. I would suggest that this report, which obviously has not been forgotten, be looked at again very carefully. It is eight years old and an effort might be made to bring it up to date. Certainly there must be some weaknesses in the forecasts. After all, the commission that made the report had to make it on the basis of the knowledge they had at that time. If the report were gone over carefully today it could be revised on important points and used as the basis for a more up to date and more complete program. I should like to see that done. Undoubtedly the minister has read the report, and I should like him to consider the possibility of having it revised. I am sure that if he does he will see that his program, good as it is, can be enlarged and, in some cases, speeded up.

Canada produces only about 10 per cent of the world's production of salty codfish. I feel it is a shame that we who have the best fishing grounds in the world should be catching so little. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo mentioned territorial waters. I should like to endorse what he said. The waters around Canada are being exploited regularly by the ships of foreign nations. Not too long ago a whole mess of trouble was stirred up because a plane flew across the territory of another country. Foreign ships operate regularly off the coasts of Canada and when the minister mentioned he was having a new boat constructed I was tempted to suggest that she be so equipped that she can drive off these poachers.

In so far as community stages are concerned, I have said in this house before that the community stage program was a wise and enlightened one. I hope it is continued and I hope that it is extended so that some community stages will be built in Labrador. If I may refer to Labrador for a minute, I would say that more ships are fishing there now than heretofore. I believe it was sometime around 1840 when the fishermen from Conception and Trinity bays in Newfoundland began to fish the Labrador coast. They found the European fishermen were there ahead of them. We find they are still there today. There seems to be a tendency for the fish to move northward, and if that is so then we must depend more and more on Labrador for the fish to keep the fish plants of the Atlantic provinces in operation.

Not only do we want the Labrador fisherman equipped so that he can be an efficient fisherman, not only do we need community stages, but we badly need communications so that the fishermen can communicate with one another along the coast and with the rest of the world. Communications are essential to the proper development of the fisheries. I was very glad to hear the minister refer to the work being done at Rattling Brook and the Exploits river and the fish ladders there. I was pleased to note that such progress has been made and I hope it is continued because I do think there is a very great spawning ground there for salmon.

In conclusion, I should like to again stress the necessity for increasing salt fish production and fresh fish production. I do hope that the fishermen themselves will share more in the profits of the industry. The fresh fish business seems to be in a healthy condition and it is my hope that the fishermen will share in the profits of that industry. In so far as salt fish are concerned, we are going to have that industry with us for a long time. Mankind has been using this stable product since time immemorial. I should like to see more salt fish plants in northern Newfoundland and Labrador. Certainly the cod fishery can be increased. It is pretty well known, I believe, that the fish are there and that more of them can be caught without jeopardizing a constant supply. One of the best ways in which we can assure that there is increased fish production in Canada is to see that the fishermen themselves are able to catch fish, have the means to catch it and the places in which to work once they have done so.

As to the minister and his department, may I say this, and of course any remarks I make are divorced from any, shall I say, political position which the minister may have. But in so far as he is the Queen's minister of fisheries and in his work as he guides the Department of Fisheries which is one of the most important departments in the government of Canada may I say: more power to your elbow.

Mr. Crouse: I welcome this opportunity to speak briefly on the fisheries estimates that are before the committee at the present time. I should first like to commend the minister on the detailed report he has given of the work that has been undertaken by his department. I might say that it is a report which clearly indicates the concern of the government over the problems at present faced by fishermen. I was most interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador when he spoke of the need for perfecting an artificial lure. I might add that there is one available at present. It was perfected in Norway and it is called the Norwegian jig. It is approximately eight inches long, is shaped somewhat in the form of a spoon and is most effective when used in catching cod, haddock or any other groundfish.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question.

Mr. Crouse: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman come up and join the rest of us near the centre of the chamber—as it is permissible to sit anywhere in committee—in order that we can hear him. We are interested in what he has to say.

Mr. Crouse: I think I can speak loudly enough. I have a few notes here. I will speak a little bit more loudly so that hon. gentlemen can hear me.

During the Easter recess and at a recent special event in Nova Scotia I had an opportunity to speak to many of the fishermen and also to the executives of fishing companies in my riding. These discussions brought a number of points forcefully to my attention and I should like to mention them for I believe they are worthy of consideration by the minister.

At the present time it would appear that the problem causing most concern among the fishermen on the east coast is the age of the existing ships in the deep-sea fishing fleet and the fact that these ships are not being replaced with modern up-to-date fishing trawlers. The average age of these wooden trawlers is approximately 12 years. Some of these trawlers are already obsolete when compared with new trawlers that are built by other nations. Accommodation for the captain and the crew falls far short of the comforts provided fishermen on new trawlers built by other countries. But aside from this point, there is among fishermen a growing fear that when the present ships are worn out or require expensive repairs in order to keep them operating they will be unemployed because of the lack of provision by the industry for the replacement of these existing ships. In the event this should happen we must ask the question: how important is the fishing industry to Canada?

The annual report of the Department of Fisheries for 1958-59 answers that question for it begins with this statement and I quote:

> With an annual catch of all species of fish and shellfish amounting to nearly two billion pounds, worth about $116 million to approximately 80,000 men engaged in commercial fishing, Canada ranks as a leading producer and exporter of the world's fishery products.

To me that sounds like quite an important industry. The export value of the 1958 catch was $155 million, about two thirds of which came from the United States and most of the remainder from the United Kingdom, continental Europe and the Caribbean countries. In my opinion the fishing industry makes a great contribution to correct our imbalance in trade, especially with the United States. It is an industry that has for years stood upon its own feet without too much assistance from government. But today it can no longer absorb the increased cost of production while selling its products in competition with state subsidized producers.

I was pleased to note in this year's estimates that continued assistance will be provided groups of fishermen desirous of constructing small draggers or long-liners up to 65 feet in length. However recent studies would indicate the assisted fleet at present accounts for about 20 per cent of the total groundfish landings on the east coast, with the company-owned deep-sea and the inshore boats providing the remaining 80 per cent.

This modernization program carried out by the fisheries deparment has contributed substantially to the replacement of small boats, and has provided greater opportunity, more security and a higher scale of living for the inshore fishermen. However, the industry as a whole depends on the larger trawlers and draggers for a constant supply of fish, and it is this type of ship, 100 feet in length or larger, that provides steady employment on shore in the fish plants and afloat for the fishermen, especially during the months from November through to April when the weather is inclement and the inshore boats cannot operate or operate only sporadically.

Ultimately therefore the burden of modernization, replacement and expansion will fall on the company-owned fleet of deep-sea fishing trawlers. Money for this replacement cannot be secured by raising prices, for two thirds of the industry's sales dollar-wise are to foreign markets, in competition with fishery products from nations with a lower cost structure. At the present time many of the materials and much of the equipment used by the industry are admitted either free of duty or at a low rate of duty, and within certain limits trawlers can be purchased outside this country. Perhaps this problem is of more direct interest to the shipyards than to the fishing industry.

However, most Canadian deep-sea fishing captains and their crews prefer wood to steel in a trawler or dragger 100 feet in length or even up to 125 feet in length. This is owing to the greater buoyancy of the wooden ship. Something needs to be done if our shipyards are to provide and be in a position to undertake even necessary refit work. Increased depreciation allowances to existing operators would encourage more venture capital in the industry and I would suggest that the government give serious consideration to this problem. It is a problem calling for bold, imaginative steps; and unless building costs of fishing trawlers in Canada can be reduced, or investment in this highly venturesome industry can be made more attractive, we will shortly have a fleet of obsolete ships incapable of providing steady employment or maintaining our position in world markets. For the benefit of the committeee, I might say that recently the President of the United States—it was on June 12—signed the fisheries assistance act of 1959. The bill provides: (1) a fishing vessel subsidy of up to one third the cost of construction, if built in a U.S. shipyard under approval of the department of defence.

I should like to point out there that what our friends to the south of us are doing apparently is that they are co-operating through their defence and fisheries departments and are building ships that would be suitable in time of war.

The federal subsidy shall be $2.5 million per year for three years; eligible are those building vessels operated in a fishery for which escape clause relief had been recommended by the tariff commission but denied under the trade agreements assistance act and to certain fisheries found by the secretary of the interior to be injured by increased imports of fish or shellfish products.

I am not advocating that we take that type of action but I would point out the action which has been taken by the nation to the south.

In what other way can we help our fishermen? I believe we should give serious consideration to repealing the law which discriminates against our east coast fishermen who are competing with foreign vessels. At the present time we have a 12-mile limit, and other speakers this afternoon have mentioned this problem. This does not mean 12 miles of protected ocean for our Canadian fishermen; on the contrary it means nine miles of protected fishing rights for all other nations except Canada. Our fishermen using ships up to 65 feet in length can fish with all foreign fishermen up to three miles of our coast, but any Canadian fishermen in ships larger than 65 feet are unable to start fishing operations until they are 12 miles off shore.

This three-mile limit apparently came into general use around 1793 when it was adopted by the United States as the limit of its jurisdiction for neutrality purposes. During the nineteenth century many maritime states, inspired by British and United States practices, came to use the same limits, but it never won enough universal acceptance to become a rule of international law. In the absence of any uniform practice with respect to the width of territorial waters modern international law can be said to lay down no rule except that every state is entitled to claim at least three nautical miles.

After world war II the international law commission, organized under the auspices of the United Nations general assembly, selected in 1949 the question of the territorial sea as one of its topics for study and report. The commission's deliberations on this subject disclosed, however, that many of the difficulties encountered in 1930, when the question of territorial waters was discussed under the leagues of nations at The Hague, still presented major obstacles to any agreement. The claim to a 12-mile limit has met with such widespread opposition from other countries that it will probably never be universally accepted, for we have seen this proposal again rejected this year at the conference called in April at Geneva.

A recent incident points out the absurdity of the present situation. The Canadian fishing trawler Sea Hawk was fishing in North bay near cape St. Lawrence in company with a fleet of some 15 or more Spanish and Portuguese trawlers. They were fishing approximately seven miles off the tip of Cape Breton and the operation of the draggers was so extensive in that area that the Canadian fisheries patrol boat Cygnus had to thread her way through this foreign fleet in order to get to the Canadian trawler and bring her to port, where the captain and owners were fined $50 and costs for fishing inside the 12-mile limit.

In my opinion there was no doubt a time when we were trying to build up a case for a 12-mile territorial coastal belt that this action made some sense. However, since the failure at the Geneva conference for the second time in two years to reach international agreement on the law of the sea there is no sound argument left for continuing this law and I would suggest that it be repealed. Canadian fishermen as taxpayers help provide wharves, harbour facilities and deep water channels for the convenience of foreign draggers and trawlers. In my opinion these Canadian fishermen are entitled to equal fishing rights with deep-sea fishermen from all other countries.

At the present time the most vigorously expanding shell fishery in the maritime provinces is that of the sea scallop. During the past year combined landings of scallop meats from Canadian and United States fishermen amounted to 23 million pounds. Of this total United States landings accounted for 18.7 million pounds and Canada produced 4.3 million pounds. Percentagewise the United States landings were up 25 per cent while the Canadian landings increased to 54 per cent over 1958. The increase in landings was the result of increased efforts by offshore boats fishing the Georges bank off the Maine coast and brought to the fishermen of the maritimes earnings in excess of $1,600,000.

At the request of the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries joint experiments are being carried out with a large mesh scallop drag in an effort to find a way to reduce the numbers of small, unmarketable scallops which are damaged and wasted by handling on board fishing vessels. The government is to be commended for its action in this regard.

However at the present time there is very little knowledge available about the manner in which scallops breed and multiply. I would suggest the fisheries department give consideration to studying this problem with special attention given to studying the early free swimming larval stages. This information is vitally important when endeavouring to determine the densities of future scallop populations, and this information would of course be most useful to the fishermen presently engaged in this industry.

There is some indication at the present time that the size of the scallops landed represent a particular year class. The current high production will no doubt deplete these stocks of older scallops and could result in a levelling off and lower production due to smaller scallops being landed in 1961 and 1962. Because of these facts and the economic importance of this industry I hope the fisheries department will give further study to the items I have mentioned.

I would like at this time to commend the minister and his staff for the gratifying progress that has been made in overcoming problems which for many years have beset the oyster industry in the maritime provinces and to mention in particular the results in curbing the epidemic which by the end of 1958 had ravaged almost all the main oyster beds in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The 3,200 barrels of disease resistant oysters from Prince Edward Island transplanted in 1959 and the balance of the program of transplanting 10,000 barrels this year will go a long way toward re-establishing this profitable and worth while inshore fishery. It is also gratifying to note that in all areas examined the transplanted oysters have suffered only normal mortality or less and continued good growth has been demonstrated.

At the present time the fishing industry is beset by many problems. During the past year the production of fresh and frozen groundfish products, chiefly fillets and fish blocks, was considerably above that of the previous year. However, demand for these products had begun to weaken, resulting in a downward pressure on prices at both the primary and secondary stages of production. The deterioration of the Canadian fish trade position in the United States market, where some 85 per cent of the total production is sold, has been attributed to the increase in imports from Iceland and other European countries. At the same time there is evidence that total supplies have tended to exceed export requirements over the past ten or 15 years and this has acted as a continuous depressant on the market. This price structure has been further aggravated by the action taken by Peru in glutting the fish meal market, a by-product which helped maintain the groundfish price for Canadian fishermen. As a matter of record, production of fish meal in Peru last year amounted to a figure between 300,000 and 400,000 tons. While this has had an effect on our east coast fishermen I know from the comments made by hon. members from British Columbia that it completely crippled the herring and whaling industries on Canada's west coast.

However, despite these setbacks the fishing industry can still look to the future with optimism. Canada has the sea at her front door on both coasts capable of supplying large quantities of highly edible protein seafood. We have, for instance, our great lobster fishery which though late in starting last year was generally productive throughout the summer and fall. Although there were some losses in equipment the season was considered the most successful for many years.

In the maritimes and Quebec our total fisheries products were valued at approximately $33 million with lobsters making up over $14 million of the total. I have already mentioned our scallop industry and its great potential in the maritimes. At the present time efforts are being made to include scallops on the menus for the personnel of our armed forces and if approved by the joint services food and nutrition committee this should add greatly to our marketing of this delectable sea food. I checked with the Department of National Defence and ascertained that over a recent 12-month period according to the information provided by the armed forces there has been procured for issue to units in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island a total of 85,788 pounds of fresh frozen halibut, haddock, sole and scallops as compared with 53,714 pounds of fresh frozen salmon. Some 400 pounds of scallops were purchased at the special request of the United States air force personnel in the area.

I submit to the committee that if scallops are good enough for the United States services they are good enough for our Canadian armed forces personnel. The joint services food and nutritional committee has been requested to add scallops to food lists provided that the price is not excessive in relation to other similar commodities. I would hope they will be found acceptable and that this will provide a new outlet for our scallops.

Our oyster beds have been restocked and are improving and there is still a good market in the United States for our swordfish, a branch of the fishing industry that has grown to great proportions in the last ten years and annually provides increased income for our east coast fishermen. I might add that swordfishing is practically a by-product of the department's efforts to improve the lot of the inhore fishermen by subsidizing long-liners. It is a very profitable industry for long-liners during the months of June, July, August and part of September when ground fishing is not too profitable. These long-liners are equipped with a stand containing a pulpit that protrudes some 20 feet in front of the boat. A high mast and steering equipment are arranged. These long-liners geared for swordfishing range the coast from the banks of Maine to Sable island and off the coast of Cape Breton. The catch is almost entirely sold in the United States markets and it adds greatly to the earnings of our east coast fishermen.

Marketing problems still must be resolved but the work carried out by the department's home economists throughout Canada in preparing recipes and in promoting the use of fish with women's groups, church groups, hotel and restaurant associations and institutes has helped considerably to make Canadians aware of the value of fish.

The second phase that has been helpful is the amount of direct advertising carried out in connection with the consumer work of the home economists. The advertisements placed in daily and weekly newspapers and in mass circulation magazines plus the work of the consumer branch has been most helpful in increasing the consumption of fish in Canada. However, in my opinion most Canadians seem to be pretty well fed and our job is to replace other food with fish. Here I must throw out a word of caution to the Department of Agriculture and point out the desirability of putting an end to artificial price supports which cause over-production in the competitive food field. For example, recent offerings of canned pork on the domestic market at less than cost have the effect of encouraging consumers to buy the subsidized product while the fishing industry must sell its products on the basis of quality and nutritional value.

Although the problems I have mentioned require continuous study by the Department of Fisheries and the industry I believe that the present diversification of our fishing industry plus the vast markets opened up by new methods of transportation and refrigeration offer greater opportunity than ever before to Canada's fishermen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that the hon. member for Gloucester has not yet returned from a rather successful fishing expedition on which I understand he has been engaged for some days—

An hon. Member: I thought he was a coal miner.

Mr. Pickersgill: —because if he had been here I would not be speaking at this stage of the debate. It is perhaps unfortunate that all the speakers from the Liberal party at this time should be from Newfoundland but perhaps that is symbolic of what might be described, in the light of recent events, as a wave of the future.

I listened with a great deal of interest and, I must say, in most cases with approval to what was said by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, and I do not always approve of everything that hon. gentleman says. Of course, it does not affect us in Newfoundland but I believe that what he said about the application of the 12-mile limit to Canadian trawlers when under the existing state of the international law we apparently—and I underline that word—cannot apply it to foreign trawlers is, to put it mildly, antiquated and absurd. I certainly would join my voice with that of the hon. member in the appeal to have this law changed. Perhaps the hon. member who no doubt has more influence with the Prime Minister than I have might suggest to the Prime Minister that he make an amendment to the bill of rights and include this in the bill so that Canadian fishermen will have the right to fish off the Canadian coasts where foreigners have the right to fish.

I must say I was interested and intrigued by the new vision given to us today by the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador. I am sure that a government which had lots of vision three years ago but which is apparently in need of a new vision now will be interested indeed in promoting "essence of squid" because it is quite obvious that this government needs a new lure today. Speaking seriously, Mr. Chairman, I was interested in what the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg said about what the Norwegians have been able to accomplish in this field and I endorse what the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador said about the desirability of research into this field of artificial bait.

I was very appreciative of the references the minister made to the work being done at the experimental station at Valleyfield in my constituency. I have a great deal of pleasure at least once each year and often two or three times in visiting that establishment and in seeing the really remarkable enthusiasm which is shown by the staff there for trying new things. I know that some of the things they have tried have been of very real help to the fisheries and even now they are just scratching the surface. Everything we can do in this field and also in the field of market research is of the utmost importance.

There is one comment I have made only in the committee and which I should like to make now in this chamber.

We have a considerable number of Canadians, and people who are well on the way to becoming Canadians, who come from the same country that the original discoverer of Canada came from—I mean Italy—and those people in their home country are consumers of salt codfish. I am afraid they are being lured into eating subsidized canned pork and other products of that kind in Toronto, Montreal and in the other places where they settle. It does seem to me that the department, in conjunction with the industry and perhaps with the Department of Trade and Commerce, might give consideration to promoting some experiments in the sale of salt codfish in Toronto, Montreal and Hamilton, to taking advantage of the Italian language press and of shops that are run by Italian Canadians with a view to selling this product to Canadians who are better off in the main than any other customers we have for salt codfish, and where we might develop, maintain and increase a good and productive market. I know there will be some difficulties about doing this but I do urge this idea very strongly upon the government.

I do not think there was anything more important said in the debate—and I must say this is almost a love feast, as the estimates of the Department of Fisheries nearly always are—than what was said by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg about fishing vessels. I am not going to recommend to the government any particular method; I am going to draw to the minister's attention—I do not need to draw it to his attention but I am going to do it so that it will be on the record—a resolution which was passed unanimously at the last meeting of the fisheries council of Canada in Vancouver in May on the importation of fishing vessels, which reads:

> Whereas some processors of fish are suffering severely from lack of suitable fishing vessels; and
> Whereas the federal government restricts the acquisition of the desired craft in the foreign markets through:
>
> (a) The necessity of having to secure permission from the Department of Transport to import a vessel—a restriction which we do not believe exists in the case of instruments of production in any other Canadian primary industry;
> (b) Heavy duties levied on vessels up to 100 feet in length when imported from most favoured nation countries; and
> Whereas experience has shown that larger vessels are going to play a more important part in production in future years;
> Therefore be it resolved that the fisheries council of Canada request the federal government to remove these hindrances to the adequate building up of the Canadian fishing fleet.

I do not think these are the only hindrances. I think the hon. member and some other hon. members who have spoken have put their fingers on other things.

In this parliament we have established a new agricultural bank to provide credit. It is true it is a successor to the old farm loan board, but it has a wider scope and at least it is supposed to do the job much better than the farm loan board did. In the fisheries improvement loans legislation we have the equivalent of the farm improvement loans legislation but we have nothing to compare with the agricultural development bank. I think we should have a fisheries development bank. I do not say it should be set up as a separate institution. Perhaps we should make it a branch of the agricultural development bank, because I do not want to see a whole lot more money spent in overhead; but there is no more reason why the people of Canada should subscribe the capital for loans to farmers than there is that they should subscribe it for fishermen. Indeed, both these primary industries, and the fishery even more than many branches of agriculture, have to compete on world markets at world prices, as hon. members have pointed out, largely without any kind of support, and the fishermen have to buy everything they buy in a largely protected market.

As the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg pointed out, this does create a real disability because the fisherman cannot raise his prices. He cannot raise his prices because the price is the price in the world, and if we were to try to raise our prices for our salt fish or our fresh frozen fish, or anything else we produce, somebody else is willing to sell it and we lose the market. We can make the industry as efficient as possible, and that is very important, but we also are faced in almost every branch of the fisheries in the world today, and this is particularly true of salt fish, with subsidies of one form and another to every one of our competitors in the world.

For example, the hon. member referred to the most recent legislation in the United States having to do with assistance in building vessels. I do think that our whole bounty program needs to be looked at again and looked at again in the light of world conditions and of the balance between the fishing industry and other industries. To my way of thinking the whole business of bounties, the whole business of loans of all kinds on fishing craft, small craft as well as larger craft, needs to be looked at.

The other thing is that at the end of the war this country removed all the taxes on agricultural implements so that agricultural implements could be bought at world prices. Surely if we can do that for the agricultural industry we should do it for the fishing industry, and get rid of all the red tape that has existed in the acquisition of vessels in the past.

I do urge the government to take a bold step. The minister may perhaps have to knock the Minister of Transport on the head a few times, but he ought to have help from the Minister of National Revenue who ought to know something about this and who, as a matter of fact, collects some of those imposts that ought not to be there at all. I do hope that something quite serious will be done in this field.

There is another field—and here I speak more of Newfoundland perhaps than of any other part of Canada—in which something could be done. What is very desperately needed in Newfoundland, and what is going to be very hard to get except with the spread of rural electrification, and that is taking place, is some imaginative assistance in the establishment of local cold storage facilities which would not be used merely for the storage of fish but could also be used for the storage of vegetables and other foodstuffs sort of on a community basis, perhaps on a rather smaller scale than under the Cold Storage Act for agriculture. There is no doubt whatever that one thing that could be done that would vastly improve the standard of living in those fishing settlements would be to establish facilities for preserving food, for refrigeration, so that all food except fish itself would not be so costly and so that fish itself could be preserved in the community in a way which would make it palatable for the greater part of the year. I believe that an immensely greater amount of fish could be consumed in the fishing areas of Canada and all through the maritime provinces. I had occasion to visit Nova Scotia not so long ago —I do not recall this with any particular satisfaction although I had a very good time —and it was remarked to me there what we know to be true in Newfoundland and what I have found to be true in nearly all those fishing settlements, that if you want to go out to buy a fish to eat it is often a major operation. There really does need to be a lot more done than is being done now to get the people right around the places where the fish are caught to enjoy what is as good food as any food produced in this country.

In that context I should also like to say that I was very pleased to hear the minister say that the department had produced a new cook book, that the first edition was already sold out and that he is producing a second edition. But in order to create a real interest right here near at home I suggest that the minister send a complimentary copy to every member of the house when the second run comes out with a little note that we take them to our wives with his compliments, or those of us who have not got wives, like the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, could perhaps find someone that they might attract in this way. It might be a lure.

I think one of the big problems in getting the consumption of fish in this country up to the level it has reached in almost every other country is that most people do not know how to cook fish and how to make it attractive. It is something that has to be learned like everything else. I shall never forget the story, which I am sure was not true, about those charitable Nova Scotians who during the depths of the depression in the thirties sent a carload of salt codfish to Saskatchewan to help the farmers who, as a result of a combination of all the dreadful circumstances there were then, were having a very thin time indeed. Some time afterward the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix published a recipe for cooking this codfish and this was the recipe: Nail the codfish to a board, boil for three hours, throw away the codfish and eat the board.

That story does no credit to Saskatchewan because there is nothing better than salt codfish as a food if you know how to treat it. But that is not the way to treat it and it should never be treated that way. That is why I say it is most important to carry on this work of promotion. The fishing industry, as all of us know, is in many ways a marginal industry. It is marginal because it is carried on on the coasts. It is marginal because on the whole the staple product of the fishery is, unfortunately, sold in low price markets. It is marginal because the mark-up is small. It is marginal because in the main the product is not processed by great combines in the way that canned pork and some other things are. Therefore, in order to be put on an equal level with some of our other industries it does need perhaps a little more careful assistance, not as a permanent crutch but in order to stimulate the market because, as the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has said and as we who represent fishing communities all desire, we want the industry to be strong and self-supporting.

We know from all the evidence around us that in the next few years we are going to have, because of the very rapid growth in our population, a large number of young people coming on the labour market every year, and we need to conserve and stimulate and build up in every way possible in order to employ our people productively. The last thing we want to see is a decline in this the oldest historic industry of our country. But unless some of the things are done that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg have already suggested today, this is not going to happen. It is not just going to happen of itself. I say that what we very much need for this industry is a new initiative, a new vigour. I do not think that the lines on which it is operating are wrong but there needs to be a little more push behind it than there seems to have been in the last few years.

I am only doing what the minister did and I will not transgress on the time of the committee long, but I wish to appeal to the minister to keep on the tail of the Minister of Trade and Commerce all the time, because we know that this year is a very critical one for our markets. The GATT negotiations that are going to take place in the autumn and the proposed new tariff for the common market which could be disastrous for the entire fishery are both matters that are on the carpet, and I trust that the government will be more successful in this field than it was at the Geneva conference on the law of the sea.

I recognize that the minister's position in this field is only marginal, but I do suggest that he urge upon his colleagues that they give earliest possible consideration to trying to get those countries that were willing to sign the agreement at Geneva to agree as a common effort to the putting in of the six-mile limit plus an extra six miles for the fishery inasmuch as they were willing to agree to that. If we cannot do that, we know that the Norwegians are now going to act unilaterally as the Icelanders already have. I would hope we would not have to go to that extreme, but this is an urgent problem and for the fishing industry one that comes pretty close to its survival. If we are going to have every country in the world fishing up to within three miles of our shores we are just not going to have the fishery to which we are historically and in every other way properly entitled. I do appeal to the minister to use all his weight and influence and to make a thorough nuisance of himself with the Secretary of State for External Affairs and his other colleagues in order to see that something definite is done about this matter in the next 12 months.

I should like to say a couple of other things of a more strictly local character. I am very glad that the salt rebate is being continued. It has certainly been of help and it is well justified. I echo what has been said by my colleagues from Newfoundland about community stages, and I hope this program was not just a one-shot affair. I can assure the minister it is going to be just as badly needed for employment in the next 12 months as it was when it was initiated and that there are still many places in Newfoundland where community stages would make a real contribution to the efficiency of the fishery, would add something to the income of the fishermen and would also provide that measure of insurance that the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo so nicely illustrated when you give a man two chances of selling instead of just one.

Undoubtedly the small portable bait holding depots have been very popular where they have been established but they are needed in quite a few more places. The west coast of New World island in my constituency is one of them. The minister is putting one at Herring Neck for which we are very grateful but at the other end of the island there is unfortunately no place near at hand where fishermen can get their bait without going to Twillingate. If the minister has ever gone to Twillingate on a really stormy day, as I did once when his friends called an election at an inconvenient season of the year, he would realize that it is quite an impediment to the fishery not to have a holding unit somewhere in one of these settlements on the west side of New World island, perhaps at Bridgeport or Cottle's island. Bridgeport is perhaps the biggest fishing settlement there and it might be the most suitable place. There are certain other places where holding units would also be very helpful.

Finally, I want to say again it does seem to me that if the minister really wants to make a name for himself—I know he does—he should do his utmost to concentrate, perhaps more than anything else, on this problem of fishing vessels, of getting taxes off them and getting costs down generally so that our fishermen can be equipped with modern vessels so that they can hold their own in the fishery on our own coast.

Mr. Nielsen: About a week ago I rose in the house to bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that, for the first time since 1902, an assessment was being made here of the agricultural industry in the Yukon. I rise with the same purpose in mind today and to say again that since the time when a Yukon member was seated in this house no one appears to have made any assessment whatever of the possibility of establishing a commercial fishing industry in the Yukon. I should, at the outset, like to compliment the minister and his officials for their foresightedness in establishing a fisheries officer in Whitehorse. I understand this was done some 18 months ago. As a result of the work of this one officer, Mr. Elliott, much has been discovered about the potential of the fishery in the Yukon. Having regard to the fact that Mr. Elliott has a large territory to cover in connection with his job, I am sure that his reports have convinced the department that the work cannot possibly be accomplished by one man's efforts, excellent as they are. He needs an assistant, and it is my hope the department will see fit to send him one.

The pioneers in the development of fisheries in the Yukon and in the conservation of that resource have been for many years in the past the Yukon fish and game association. This association has done excellent work along these lines. I am sure that the work the association has done in past years has assisted Mr. Elliott very greatly. This department still has a great part to play in the development of Canada's north, and particularly in the Yukon Territory. There is a very good potential for the establishment of commercial fishing in the Yukon, especially in the fields of lake trout, whitefish and particularly the possibility for the establishment of rainbow trout farms. The economic possibilities in all these fisheries are good. As to their feasibility I am sure that the work done by Mr. Elliott—I hope with another assistant granted to him—will prove decisive in convincing the government of that fact.

One of the results of the establishment of commercial fisheries in the Yukon which could be a great help in the development of the north would be in the retention of the great potential of the native labour pool. I am speaking here of the Indian people. This year, through the good offices of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the chief of the Indian affairs branch, a co-operative society was established for the Teslin Indian people for the purpose of hunting big game as an industry. I have no doubt that once established and going well, this industry will aid the economy of these people very greatly. The same sort of potential exists in that area, particularly in the Teslin, Kluane and other areas of the Yukon, for the establishment of commercial fishing which would aid the economy of the Indian people. A by-product of the establishment of such an industry would be the retention there of a considerable native labour force. It is this labour force upon which much of our future development could depend.

Before going further into the possibilities for the establishment of a commercial fishing industry in the Yukon, may I draw the attention of the minister and his officials to the established whitefish industry in the Northwest Territories? I understand that this industry is operating very well and that whitefish are shipped from the Northwest Territories to a good portion of the United States market. May I also note here the existence of rainbow trout farms in the United States, which have become very profitable operations down there. I dare say that much of our rainbow trout comes from these farms, perhaps even the rainbow trout we have in the parliamentary restaurant. The same remarks would apply with respect to the Winnipeg goldeye. The rainbow trout is native to North America and the establishment of a farm for the production of these particular fish in the Yukon would, I suggest, deserve the department's closest scrutiny. I would suggest that the minister and his officials consult with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the chief of the Indian affairs division and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in connection with all these suggestions I am making. These two departments know the needs of the area and I am sure would be of great assistance to the minister and his officials in considering the feasibility of my proposals.

The establishment of any industry in the north, however, depends largely on transportation. The whitefish industry of the Northwest Territories to which I referred depends almost entirely on air transportation. The Yukon is more fortunate, and has become more fortunate in recent years, in that access to southern markets has been provided by road. Transportation costs must be kept down, of course, in order for the fisheries products which might be produced in the Yukon to compete in markets in Canada or in other countries. There is no need, for instance, to dismiss the possibility of the establishment of a rainbow trout farm in the Yukon which could compete with other similar industries in North America. However, as I have said, this all depends on reasonable transportation costs.

One of the largest single impediments to economic transportation in the north now it appears is the imposition of certain load limitations on vehicular traffic on both the Alaska highway and territorial roads. The imposition of these load limits which would bear directly on the possibility of establishing any economic fishing industry in the Yukon was the work of one man, the commissioner of the Yukon who, without consulting the elected representatives of the people or the legislative council, and without consulting his minister and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources imposed these load limits. The recent imposition of this additional limitation on vehicular traffic loads will have no other effect than to increase the costs of transportation of all Yukon products. In my view the imposition of these restrictive regulations is the greatest single retarding step in the development of the Yukon since the drop in the price of gold. They should be removed. Indeed I submit that they must be removed before any consideration can be given to the feasibility of establishing any sort of an economic fishing industry in the Yukon. These decreased load limits have no place in the developing north. To say they are merely for the purpose of extending bureaucratic traffic control over the movement of industrial and other traffic of the Yukon is no justification for the imposition of these additional limitations.

I know it will probably be said by those who might read in Hansard the remarks I am now making that the regulations provide for the issuance of permits so that fisheries and other products could move over the roads without retarding development. My answer to that argument is simply this. If the regulations that are now imposed are to be bypassed by the issuance of permits, then the more permits that are issued the more apparent it becomes that the regulations are a needless extension of bureaucratic controls.

The other point I wished to raise is with regard to the recruitment of capable and desirable personnel to serve with the Department of Fisheries in the north. This recruitment depends directly or to a great degree on the establishment of the allowances that other civil servants in other departments working in the north obtain in order to induce them to go there and to take up their work on behalf of the government. I refer to the isolated post allowances. I am not certain whether the minister and his department have representation on the interdepartmental committee on isolated post regulations which makes recommendations to the treasury board in so far as the setting of these allowances is concerned. However, whether or not any of his officials have representation on that committee, I urge the minister to consult with his colleagues concerning the recent reduction in those allowances.

According to the recommendation of the interdepartmental committee on isolated post allowances the reduction is based on the fact that the price index as to the cost of food as between Yukon and Edmonton and Vancouver has been reduced. The cost of living allowance was thereby cut and similarly the supplementary cost of living allowance was cut. Without reasonable and adequate isolated post allowances you simply will not get qualified personnel in the fisheries field to go to the Yukon. The same consideration applies with regard to all other departmental employees who are now serving the government in the north.

The idea that one can arbitrarily cut these allowances without having reference to the true facts, without making any accurate survey in the north, or without having any regard to the hidden factors which come to bear on the increased cost of living in the north is completely unacceptable. If such a trend continues I am afraid the recruitment of the type or calibre of person that we all want to attract to the north for the development of that part of the country will be seriously retarded.

One of the factors, of course, which bears directly on the cost of living in the north is transportation. It costs more to transport goods into the north; it costs more to transport goods out of the north. If we are to establish any industry up there, including a commercial fishing industry, those costs must be pared to just as low a point as they possibly can be pared. The imposition of additional load limitations on our territorial roads certainly is not helping to pare those costs.

I was informed, for instance, with regard to the mining industry, that the imposition of the load limitations, if they were enforced, would increase the cost of transportation of the product of Cassiar Mining Company by $200,000 a year. Similarly, if the regulations were enforced they would increase the cost of transportation of the product of United Keno Hill mines by $300,000 a year. We can see immediately the effect which these increased costs would have on the establishment of any commercial fishing industry in the Yukon. If an industry were established there the cost of the product would be simply uncompetitive with other fisheries products in the markets to the south. I think the load limitations are seriously retarding our development in the north and I urge the minister to consult with his colleagues in an effort to have them removed. They can be removed simply by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources giving instructions to his commissioner in the Yukon to revoke the regulations.

The other matter I wanted to raise in connection with the establishment of commercial fishing in the north is that perhaps some assistance could be given by the minister and his department to the establishment of commercial fisheries in the far northern areas of Yukon around Old Crow, Aklavik and other remoter northern areas. Perhaps these areas could also be taken under consideration by the minister and his department. I am not sufficiently expert on the subject of fisheries to be able even to suggest that these areas offer any commercial possibilities. However, I am of the firm belief that a good commercial fishing potential exists in the more southerly area, particularly in the Yukon around, as I say, the communities of Kluane lake and Teslin. I am sure that if Mr. Elliott gets the required assistance, he will be enabled to submit reports which bear out that belief. I would also urge that the minister and perhaps one or two of his officials travel to the Yukon in order to have a look for themselves. I do not know whether any of them have been there previously, but it would certainly help if they had first hand knowledge of at least how much water there was in the Yukon that had fish life in it.

Before concluding, I wish once again to urge the minister to consult with his colleagues and to do as much as he can to convince them that these two matters which I have raised, namely the reduction in the cost of living allowance and the supplementary cost of living allowance in certain areas in the north among the civil servants there and the imposition of load limits are matters urgently deserving of the greatest consideration by the government. To state the position again in summary, the reduction in the allowances to which I have referred is not going to help the minister or any other department in the government to attract that kind of individual that is so much required for northern development; and the continued existence of the load limitations which have been placed on our roads in the north are extremely damaging to the economy of the Yukon. I think if the limitations were enforced you may as well not consider the establishment of a fishing industry there at all because transportation costs would be such as would place the cost of the product produced there completely out of the selling markets of southern Canada.

In my view the maximum permissible loadings and their effect on the problem of transportation are most important in developing a primary industry there. We must sell the products that we produce in the Yukon at competitive world prices despite the inherent cost of their production. In the north of Canada our highways are the counterpart of the railroads which serve industry in the most densely populated areas. We must regard them with equal importance to our economy. I would be most grateful for anything the minister could do to remove these suffocating and needless regulations.

The question of isolated post allowances could be cured, I am sure posthaste, if the true facts were known to those who have the authority of making these recommendations to treasury board, and I refer again to the interdepartmental committee on isolated post regulations. If these people would make an accurate survey of the true cost of living there instead of working on supposition, guesswork and arbitrary estimations, they would find that the reductions which have been imposed are completely unjustified.

So before any commercial fishing industry in the Yukon is even considered these two things have to be looked at first. It is my hope that any efforts made by the minister to alleviate these two situations will bring about a favourable consideration of the problems I have mentioned with regard to the establishment of a commercial fishing industry in the north, and I hope that these proposals will bear fruit.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, may I make a comment or two on this particular item. Perhaps first of all I may be allowed to express my feelings with regard to one of the officials of the department who will shortly be retiring, namely Mr. Whitmore who is the director of fisheries in the Pacific area. Mr. Whitmore has been in the department for some 40 years now or a bit longer, having held various positions, and as an indication of the degree of respect and admiration which exists for him throughout the entire fishing industry perhaps I should make this slight reference to the words of praise and commendation which have been made of Mr. Whitmore by various organizations interested in the fishing industry on the west coast.

The fisheries association of British Columbia honoured Mr. Whitmore not too long ago, as did the united fishermen and allied workers union and the native brotherhood of British Columbia; and also more recently the department itself made a presentation to Mr. Whitmore for his long years of dedicated service. The fisheries association and the united fishermen's union I would say in normal events disagree with each other, because one represents the industry and one is a union; but this is indicative of the respect that Mr. Whitmore has generated over the years so far as his attitude and his administration of fisheries on the coast is concerned. I would hope that even after his retirement he will remain in a position where the department will feel free to call upon him for any advice, and that he will remain a member of the international salmon fisheries commission so that his years of experience will not be lost entirely to the department and to the agencies and commissions which function within the department.

I would also like to make a brief comment with respect to the Fraser river and the salmon industry on the coast. The Fraser river, of course, is the most important salmon river which exists either in British Columbia or anywhere in the world and its value to the economy of the province is well known by everyone in British Columbia and to the departmental officials. Some thought has been expressed, mostly by those people in our economy who are more concerned with hydroelectric power than they are with the fishing industry and the products derived therefrom, about attempts to build hydroelectric and flood control dams on the Fraser river. Some of the dams which have beeen proposed range up to 700 or 800 feet in height, and I think it almost goes without saying that even although a tremendous amount of research work has been undertaken in recent years in an attempt to overcome the bad effect of dams on fish and to make sure the fish maintain themselves and that the river is not destroyed, this attempt is only effective to a slight degree. If dams like the Moran dam, which stands some 700 feet, were built it would completely destroy the Fraser river as a fish river. The minister need look no further than the Columbia river, which runs partly in Canada and partly in the United States, where hydroelectric storage dams have been built. Regardless of the $150 million odd which has been spent in the United States, I understand, in an attempt to retain the Columbia as a fish river, the efforts have been practically ineffectual so far as the fish are concerned.

One of the very fine things in this regard for the fisheries interests are the discussions which are presently taking place between the Canadian government, the British Columbia government, and the United States so far as further development for hydroelectric purposes on the Columbia river are concerned. This, coupled with the possibility of a hydroelectric development further north on the Peace river, has already gone a great deal of the way toward diminishing the demands and the insistance of the hydroelectric interests to build dams on the Fraser river. I hope that by the time nuclear energy becomes economically competitive or even less costly than hydro development, by the time we reach that age of nuclear power we shall have developed sufficient non-fish rivers for hydroelectric purposes and that we will no longer need to worry about the Fraser river being ruined as a fish river. That is my hope and I am sure it is the hope of the Department of Fisheries. This needs re-emphasis and reinforcement from time to time by the people interested. The Fraser river and other fish rivers on the coast should be protected at all possible cost and the energies of the electric power people should be directed toward other means of producing electrical energy instead of ruining these great rivers and the contribution they make toward our economy.

This question of the Fraser river and multiple use of it was studied and is still being studied by an agency established by joint participation of the federal and provincial governments, upon which agency the Department of Fisheries have representation. I refer here to the Fraser river board. While this board is established under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources I think it still has some bearing on this particular department because the river with which it deals is a fish river and the interests of the department are involved one way or the other.

This may be the time to communicate to the minister, as has been done on other occasions, the need for him to press as hard as he can with his colleagues, especially the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, for some sort of flood control activity on the Fraser river. I refer to control that would not have a deleterious effect on the fishing industry on that river.

I have in my hand a report dealing with multiple uses of the Fraser river and the question of flood control by building a series of dams in the upper reaches of the Fraser and employing other methods of control in the lower reaches. I believe our efforts should be bent toward developing a diking system in the lower reaches of the Fraser rather than concentrating on building storage dams in the upper reaches where they will interfere with the spawning activities of the fish.

To illustrate the value of diking as opposed to building storage dams I will refer to the report. This approaches the question from the point of view of economy without reference to the fishery aspect. The report indicates that the building up of the present dikes in the lower reaches of the Fraser to the point needed to meet the flood level of 1894 which is the highest point of which they have knowledge would cost $17 million plus annual operating costs as compared with $520 million for the building of reservoirs and star storage dams. We are not dealing with the question of flood control specifically so I will not violate the rules by pursuing this subject.

I turn now to the conflict of interest that exists between the fisheries and forests. From time to time in the forests of Canada we have insect infestations. The forestry people wanting to ensure the continued growth of forests have embarked on programs of spraying the trees with insecticide the use of which results in killing not only the insects but fish because of the toxic effect of the insecticide. It washes down the hillsides with the soil and is carried into the streams containing fish. This problem has occupied the attention of the Department of Fisheries which has studied the question and attempted to find an innocuous insecticide that would not be harmful to fish. I am not aware that they have met with success in their research but I hope their efforts will continue.

There is a conflict of interest here. One must either choose between seeing damage to forests or damage to the fisheries or one must seek to strike a balance. Both the federal and provincial forestry people have sought to achieve a balance. I urge that there be a continuing intensive research program in this field.

In the supplementary estimates there is an item in the amount of $150,000 for the destruction of dogfish and other predators. This is the third year to my knowledge that there has been an item for this purpose. I appreciate that in the last couple of years many difficulties have been encountered in effectively implementing the program. I will not deal with the problem other than to say it has not been as successful as it might have been. The fishing industry on the west coast has been critical in several respects of the approach to the problem adopted by the department. I appreciate that it is difficult for the departmental officials to ask the treasury board for approval for further monetary provision in this field when all the moneys allotted have not been expended but I earnestly hope they will persevere in their efforts in years to come.

The attitude of the treasury board would be something like this. You were here two or three years ago and we gave you $250,000. You spent hardly any of it. Last year we gave you another $200,000 and you did not use that. Now you want some more money. How long is this going to continue? The treasury board will have to have results for any money allocated, and this is the thing we should look for if we do not embark on an effective dogfish killing program so that these predators are eliminated to the greatest possible extent.

I should like to make reference to another matter which involves the Department of Agriculture. I refer to the subsidies paid under the Cold Storage Act. As hon. members well know this is under the Department of Agriculture. Fish products cold storage warehouses are built from time to time and a subsidy is payable on those fish products warehouses by and through the Department of Agriculture. Two or three years ago the Department of Agriculture saw fit to place some limitations upon the amount of subsidy paid. The reason for doing that was that there was, as it were, a glut of cold storage warehouses in Canada and to continue to pay one-third of the cost as a subsidy without limitation on the total amount merely meant that the federal government would be paying money in the form of subsidies to build more and more cold storage warehouses at a time when there were too many of them already in existence. The arguments were that the bulk of cold storage warehouses in Canada are for agricultural products. This tends to work out to the advantage of the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural industry but it places the fishing industry at a disadvantage because it has its activities curtailed by the activities in the agricultural field.

We have asked a number of times for the transfer of jurisdiction so that subsidies payable for fish cold storage warehouses would be used to build cold storage warehouses under the jurisdiction of the Department of Fisheries. We feel that the Department of Fisheries are able to do a much better and a more efficient job in the building of those warehouses and in the paying of the subsidies than the Department of Agriculture. As I say, this has been dealt with a number of times in the past. We have asked questions of the Minister of Agriculture and of the Minister of Fisheries. The answers which we have received on each occasion in the past have been, "Well, we will consult about this". If I am not mistaken, I think the Minister of Fisheries said in the marine and fisheries committee when the estimates of the department were being considered that the suggestion I had made at that time sounded like a sensible one and he would give it sympathetic and earnest or some other type of consideration; that he would have a talk with his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, about it, to see if some arrangement could be worked out. I should like to have an indication from the minister of the results of those discussions. What plan, if any, has been worked out to bring this matter under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries in so far as fish products are concerned so that full and proper consideration can be given to any application for a subsidy for the erection of a fish products cold storage warehouse so that the fisheries industry will not be placed at a disadvantage because of the activities in the agricultural products field? This, I submit, is the situation at the moment.

I have one other point, and this again I think is something which in reality could more properly be dealt with by the Department of External Affairs. Nevertheless, it does concern the fishing industry and the Department of Fisheries because our offshore fishing rights are involved in the territorial limits of the country extending out into the ocean.

The so-called proposal for a 12-mile limit has been discussed at international conferences. It was discussed at the recent one, just a month or so ago; it was discussed at the United Nations general assembly and prior to that time at another conference on the law of the sea. There were suggestions from different countries as to what those territorial limits should be. So far we have come to no conclusion on them.

The latest proposal of Canada for a six and six arrangement was defeated, I understand, by one third of a vote or something like that, but it was just defeated and that was all. This would make one wonder whether there is any great sense in going further and further into international conferences on this particular question because I think Canada, in its desire to reach agreement on the question of our territorial limits, did depart from our original thought that there should be a 12-mile limit when it suggested six and six. I think Canada went a bit too far in that regard in an attempt to reach an agreement. I do not think it would be wise for us to go any further in that direction. Perhaps the most appropriate thing to do, so far as our general limits are concerned, is to take unilateral action and declare as Iceland has declared and as others are considering now, that our territorial limits for all purposes are 12 miles, and that is that.

This would overcome, of course, what I consider to be an extremely ridiculous situation on the east coast which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and other members from the Atlantic provinces will have more intimate personal knowledge of than I. I refer to difficulties which arise from having two sorts of limits, a three-mile limit and a 12-mile limit. This affects our fishermen. Some of them have to go out beyond our 12-mile limit in order to fish while foreign fishermen can come inside the 12-mile limit and fish. By unilateral action on our part, which I think is the only course necessary, we would overcome this problem without too much difficulty. Of course, in so doing we might create other difficulties such as impairing our relations with the United States. This is primarily why Canada has been weak-kneed and weak-hearted in this particular field. But none the less I think it is about time we did realize that it may be necessary to incur strained relations once in a while in order to reach that goal which is just and fair.

In this regard, I think, as I said, this is primarily an external affairs matter. Nevertheless, the fishery interests are involved and I think, taking everything into consideration, Canada should now say that our territorial waters extend to 12 miles beyond our shores. After all, if a small nation like Iceland, apparently reflecting a great deal of the courage of that government, courage which this government does not appear to have, can take such action, then surely Canada in the same light can take the same action to protect our interests.

Mr. McQuillan: First, I want to congratulate the minister on the steps his department has taken in the field of the conservation of the fisheries on the Pacific coast. In his opening remarks this morning he spoke of a project on Robertson creek near Great Central lake on Vancouver island. I think he might well have enlarged on that a bit because it appears to be a credit to the department and so far it has been very successful.

I should like to call to the minister's attention and ask him to comment later on the necessity for a somewhat similar and perhaps larger conservation project on the Big Qualicum river near Qualicum Beach, also on the island. I should also like to call his attention to the need for action on the Puntledge river near Courtenay. This river was adversely affected from the fish spawning point of view a few years ago by the enlargement of a hydro power project by the British Columbia power commission which at the time did not appear to give much regard to their responsibility with respect to fish conservation. In the same area there is need for further development on the Tsolum river which has been a very heavy spawning stream in years gone by, particularly for pinks. During the summer months and the early fall when the pinks go up the river there is often very low water and they cannot get up the river to spawn with the result that sometimes a pretty large crop is destroyed. I believe that the fisheries department is considering a storage dam at Wolf lake at the head of the river and I would ask that construction of the dam be expedited as quickly as possible.

There is another question I have already brought to the attention of the minister by letter and I should like to mention it again. I refer to the problem of the blackfish or killer whales interfering with the salmon fishing, especially in the gulf of Georgia and the inside waters along the east coast of Vancouver island. I know this is a difficult problem. Some interests that are concerned about it have suggested setting up machine gun posts but that would probably result in killing half the fishermen on the coast as well as visitors and sports fishermen. It is a very difficult problem. So far as I know, the department has no real answer to it yet but I hope they will keep working on it and perhaps come up with an answer.

We had quite a little excitement in the coastal area a few months ago when there was a suggestion that a licensing system would be set up for sports fishermen. I have talked to a good many fishermen and a number of resort operators along the coast and they are of the opinion that perhaps this is necessary in order that the department can plan proper conservation programs and keep some control over the catch of fish by sportsmen or at least know what they are catching. In general the thought is, and I also feel this way about the matter, that if such a licence is required the charge should be very nominal. The feeling is that these licences may be required in order to keep a record of fishing and keep control of sport fishing in the same way that provincial forest fire permits are issued. Those permits are issued free but in this case perhaps the charge might be sufficient to cover the cost of administration of the licensing system.

The preceding speaker, the hon. member for Skeena, spoke about the Fraser river board and opposed the adoption of system A as they term it in their report. I think he left, I trust unintentionally, a wrong impression in his comparison of costs. I do not have the exact figures with me but the figure he quoted of some $500 million, if that figure is correct, also included the cost of a considerable hydro power installation on the Clearwater river above any spawning areas. No spawning grounds would be affected by this development, so I wanted to correct any wrong impression that might have been left in that respect.

In the recently presented second report of the committee on mines, forests and waters, the committee after careful study of the Fraser river board report and after hearing from the representatives of the fisheries department on the board made the following recommendation:

> Your committee heard evidence from the two federal members of the Fraser river board concerning what is referred to in the board's preliminary report dated June, 1958, as system A. Since this proposed system A appears to offer the best possible chance of fulfilling the following objectives, (1) to provide flood control; (2) to be an integral part of a major power system; (3) to be compatible with fisheries; and (4) to be economically self-supporting through power production, your committee recommends that the further studies to establish the physical feasibility of projects in system A and the required additional biological studies relating to fisheries interests be actively pursued. This is in order that a final conclusion as to the merits of system A may be reached at the earliest possible date.

I think that is the proper way to approach the problem. I do not think we should come to any conclusions without proper evidence to support those conclusions.

I should also like to say a few words about the pending retirement of one of the senior officials of the fisheries department to whom the hon. member for Skeena also paid a compliment. We on the British Columbia coast have known Mr. Whitmore for many years. I believe he has served almost 45 years with the department and he certainly has been a credit to the department. We all hope that his successor will meet with the same support and be held in the same high esteem that Mr. Whitmore was.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw a few matters to the attention of the minister. First of all, I should like to take some exception to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni said with regard to the proposed licences for sport fishing in salt water. I feel that they accomplish no good purpose whatsoever. The amount of fish taken in salt water by sports fishermen is infinitesimal when compared with commercial catches. Grilse is the only fish of which any substantial number is caught and the department has a fair idea of what the take is at the present time. I cannot see sports fishermen filling out forms and sending them to the department. I do not know what the department can accomplish except to bring about more bureaucracy, and I am opposed to any such form of licensing with regard to sport fishing on the Pacific coast. So far as I have been able to ascertain, and I have inquired, there is no such licensing on the east coast, and I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. McQuillan: Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question? On what does he base his statement that the sport catch is infinitesimal? Nobody can possibly make a statement like that if they have examined the statistics.

Mr. Broome: Infinitesimal, I said, as compared with the commercial catch. Certainly there is a fairly large number of fish, but I do not think that it is of the order of importance that it is made out to be.

However, that is not really what I wanted to talk about. I do want to talk about the pollution of streams and the fact that I believe the Fisheries Act needs to be overhauled and more teeth put in it to give the minister and his officials more authority to do something in regard to the control of pollution of streams. I believe the fisheries department is doing an excellent job on the west coast, and undoubtedly in other areas in which they operate. I believe the staff is able and conscientious but is perhaps limited by the fact the budget is not large enough or by the lack of trained personnel.

I believe, however, there needs to be a change in the legislation in order to put more teeth in the act. I have made a few notes in this connection and I find that under section 33 of the Fisheries Act the minister is given wide powers to control and prevent the pollution of fishing waters. This control extends to ships which shall not throw overboard ballast, coal ashes or other prejudicial or deleterious substances in any river, harbour or roadstead or in any water where fishing is carried on. It extends to plants which may not discharge industrial waste which may be harmful to fish and it extends to lumbering, land clearing or any such activities in the way of preventing such activities from putting any slash, stumps or debris into water frequented by fish or into water which may flow into a place frequented by fish. A salmon stream can be ruined by a log jam, a river made poisonous to fish from industrial waste and city discharged sewage.

The penalties for infractions of section 33 bear no relationship to the harm that can be done by an infraction. The first offence carries a penalty of $20 and costs; the second offence not less than $40 and costs and not more than $80 and costs, and in addition a further penalty of not less than $10 and not more than $20 for every day during which such offence is continued. The third, or any subsequent offence, carries a penalty of not less than $100 and costs and also in addition a further penalty not exceeding $20 for every day during which such offence is continued.

These penalties are extremely inadequate to be a proper deterrent. Ignoring the fines which are quite modest, the daily penalty of $20 for continuous infraction of the law is something any industrial plant of any size would find quite easy to pay and indeed might prefer to pay rather than undergo the expense of diverting or treating their waste liquids so as to comply with the law. This penalty of $20 a day is, in fact, the maximum penalty which can be assessed against any farmer who does not maintain an approved fish grating at the intake of an irrigation ditch drawing water from a fish producing stream. The fish grating guards against the occasional fish being destroyed, but the waste from an industrial plant can poison a whole stream.

I suggest that the minister should review these penalties and adjust them upward to the point where they will prove a real deterrent. Perhaps this could be done by bringing the Fisheries Act into parliament for amendment, if necessary, or through the regulations. Perhaps it might be better to add proper fisheries pollution control regulations which could be amended by the minister himself on his own responsibility.

Second, there is the matter of pollution from ships either throwing ballast overboard, throwing garbage overboard or pumping bilges while actually in a river or within a harbour. The various harbour commissioners must guard against this, but the department has a responsibility as well. Finally, there is the effect on fish bearing streams of the discharge of sewage into them. It is well recognized, however, that this type of pollution is not as dangerous as industrial waste because of the way that industrial waste destroys the oxygen content in the water. Nevertheless, the pollution of streams from the discharge of sewage is an important factor and it is becoming an important factor on the Fraser river which, as the hon. member for Skeena has pointed out, is perhaps the greatest remaining salmon fishing stream in the world since the Columbia was destroyed as a salmon river. It is imperative that the fisheries department have authority and power to guard against the break-down of our fisheries or the diminution of our streams.

The submission to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects by the fisheries association of British Columbia pointed out that commercial fishing is the fourth largest primary industry of the province, preceded only by forestry, agriculture and mining. They pointed out also that this important industry provides employment for some 18,000 persons and they estimated that another 75,000 persons were indirectly dependent upon the industry for employment. The salmon fishery of British Columbia, according to this submission, could be at least doubled within the next 25 years. We do have an intimation, highlighted by the unions I believe, that there is too much gear in the water. There is one side of the equation. You can either have too much gear or too few fish. You can build up the fish so as to support the gear and the number of fishermen who are engaged in that activity. I suggest that the experience of the fisheries department at Jones Creek and Horsefly and other places that were mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has proved the admirable work the department has done. It is simply too bad that money cannot be provided to accelerate this program because there must be at least 20 or 30 other streams up and down the coast of British Columbia which could be prepared with artificial spawning beds, which could be stocked with pinks and thus build up the runs of fish which are not as valuable as sockeye. However, a very valuable fishery could be built up to fill in the offrun years.

[Mr. Broome.]

Again this report refers to the experiment at Jones Creek and it is stated that it has been proved now that (a) an artificial gravel bed can be built which will be as efficient or more so than the natural stream bed for the production of pink salmon fry and (b) pink salmon can be transplanted to a new area to provide runs of salmon in off years. Considering that the salmon fishery, not in the best years but in average years, is worth about $50 million; considering that by proper conservation methods the Adams river run was built up in 1958 to a run of 12 million fish when back 20 or 30 years ago it was down to a run of some 17,000 cases; considering that conservation measures can build up this resource and can provide a continuing source of God given wealth to this country and employment to the people of this country, I say that the fisheries department is perhaps one of the most important departments in the whole government. I sincerely trust that the minister will be able to secure the funds and the staff which will alow an acceleration in this program which, undoubtedly, his officials have ahead of them for the next 10 or 15 years.

In so far as the problem of dogfish is concerned, there is not much sense in adding to what has been said. However, I believe that if the subsidy is not used up I think it would be well for the government to take the initiative. Perhaps one of the reasons—this may be just an excuse that has been given to me—for the subsidy not being used up is the fact it has not been announced early enough so that the fishermen can fish for dogfish at a time when these predators congregate at the mouths of rivers when they are following runs of small herring and so on and where the fishermen could catch large numbers of them. I think the program for the control of dogfish should be announced early in the year. I believe there should be a conference between the department, the fishing companies and the fishermen and that, when agreement has been reached, the program should be set out well ahead of time so that if there is any delay in going after these predators, it can be laid right at the door of the fishermen.

I should like to make one last point and it is nothing that is under the jurisdiction of the minister. However, we will never have really effective fisheries on the west coast until labour and management learn to get together. In this particular instance the union it seems to me, is always spoiling for a fight with management and always looking for opportunities to create disturbances. As I say, this is one area in which the minister certainly has no jurisdiction. I wish he had jurisdiction. However, these are troubles that will pass away.

My point is that we should build up our fisheries by proper scientific methods, by the methods which are being used by the department now, and should build them up as fast as possible because this is an area in which every dollar spent will return scores of dollars to the people of Canada and also as revenue to the government.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I wish to take just a few moments to answer as briefly as possible some of the questions that have been asked and perhaps to correct some of the statements that might need slight correction.

The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo expressed his disappointment over what appeared to be a reduction in the bait service. This is true so far as the figure is concerned but as a matter of fact there has been no reduction; there has been a slight increase in the operation and maintenance of this service. The reduction is due to the fact that the item for the Bonavista bait depot, has no capital expenditures in this year's estimates but had in last year's.

Again, the item for industrial development is a bit deceptive because the apparent decrease is due to the fact that there was a larger number of community stages built last year and provision with respect to that program appears under this item.

The hon. member for Vancouver East raised a very important problem which is of great concern to the government but, as he rightly pointed out, it is an international problem because the products of the herring industry and the whaling industry go to export markets to a great extent, and it is very difficult for Canada alone to do anything. For example, if the Canadian government or anyone else were to start subsidizing these products to other countries, when they were exported they might immediately run into countervailing duties probably and make the situation worse. Most of the countries to which we export also produce fish meal. The United States and the United Kingdom are cases in point.

The time at present available does not allow me to do justice to this extremely important problem but I want to assure the hon. member that it is one that is causing great concern to the government and that everything possible is being done to explore the situation and to find a solution. On the official level, my department has been in close touch with other governments following the situation, both from the point of view of the trade itself generally and from the point of view of the possibility that some international conference on the matter might be brought about. As has already been said, if that conference does come about, this government will certainly be represented there.

A number of hon. members spoke of the problem of the territorial sea, a matter which in itself is one for the Department of External Affairs but which is of great concern to the fishing industry, of course, especially when the present law of the sea and section 55 of our Fisheries Act create a glaring anomaly under certain conditions. This is something that has been reviewed and will continue to be reviewed in the light of changing events. I might say that the situation is still fluid as far as the international problem is concerned. Although I cannot speak for the Department of External Affairs on this matter, I am hopeful with regard to reaching a measure of international agreement which, of course, will then determine what changes may be needed in our own laws.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Grey North in connection with the transplanting of various types of fish from one environment to another. A great deal of research has been done in this matter. It is something that will prove successful only under very special circumstances. He also spoke of the problem of pollution as did the hon. member for Vancouver South. This is a serious problem. I have listened with attention to the suggestions that were made with regard to reviewing the penalties provided in the Fisheries Act in connection with polluting streams and rivers. Pollution is something that it is extremely difficult to control in some cases, as for example in the cases where the pollution is caused just by the impact of civilization.

The hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador spoke of the problems of the Labrador fisheries. I might say that we are exploring the possibility of putting in Labrador one of the community stages that has not yet been allocated to a suitable place. I may say that I have a high regard for Canadians who find themselves in these isolated places and who complain little but contribute a great deal to the economy and welfare of the country. These people, who are really pioneers living in the more remote areas of our country, are often forgotten while people in the larger communities perhaps get to the point of thinking that maybe if there was a bus every 11 minutes instead of every 10 minutes, that is the greatest problem in the world. These people who are contributing a great deal to the welfare of our nation as a whole, producing and contributing in every way, I think should have special consideration. I have special concern for the fishermen and the industry in Labrador.

On the question of artificial bait lures, I may say that these are being used on an experimental and trial basis and have been available for a number of years. The research board has also done a considerable amount of research with regard to fish attractants and repellants from the point of view of possible bait usage and for the guidance of fish in their migration and other possible applications.

Several hon. members spoke of the matter of the equipment of ships and of a program which will allow the fishing industry to be modernized. This is a matter that is now being studied by an interdepartmental committee on an official level, and which I hope will be reporting to the government before long. I also hope that they will be able to come up with something really constructive that will help the fishing industry and also the shipbuilding industry at the same time. But as hon. members know it is a very knotty problem indeed.

Many interesting suggestions were made as to increasing the market for fish in Canada, and one suggestion was about the expanding market for salted cod in Toronto and various other areas. I might say that the maritime salted cod producers have been exploiting this market for quite some time and are shipping considerable quantities of salted fish to Toronto to cater to this particular market.

The hon. member for Yukon spoke of the need for additional staff in that area. I wish to report that an addition to the staff will take place very shortly in the area. We could still use more staff, and if we can arrange it perhaps in the future permission will be given for additional staff there. The importance of developing the industry in this area is well known and the hon. member's suggestions will be taken into consideration and given further study.

The hon. member for Skeena kindly made reference to Mr. Whitmore's retirement, as did the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. I appreciate the recognition they have given him in this regard and I must say that he is a very fine example of the excellent type of officials and scientists who are serving this department and who have served it with dedication over the years. I am delighted to see this recognition being made here on the floor of the house.

The hon. member for Skeena also mentioned the conflict in some cases between forests and fish and the need for spraying budworms in the forests to wipe out if possible these epidemics. I might say there is really no conflict because if the forests were destroyed there would be no fish in any case. We have been doing research in this regard and we are now hopeful that a spray has been devised of a concentration which will do the minimum damage to fish and yet be effective as far as budworms and other insects are concerned.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni wanted to know about the projects he referred to on Vancouver island. I might say that as far as Puntledge river is concerned negotiations are in progress with the British Columbia power commission. The department has proposed certain fishways and other fish protective measures, and these have been referred to the British Columbia energy board. My understanding is that the board has not reported on the problem yet. The Big Qualicum project is a comprehensive water control program which should increase very considerably the capacity of that watershed to produce salmon, and good progress is being made on it. The Tsolum river one is in the suggestion stage and proposals have been made that this would be a useful project, but up to this time it has not been evaluated. As far as sports fishing licences are concerned, I think hon. members can rest at ease for the present because no action has been taken to introduce licensing for salt water sports fishermen.

I shall be glad to answer other questions as we go along. I see that it is not quite six o'clock yet so perhaps it might be possible to get the first item passed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether any hon. member of any other party wants to speak on this item, but I think I could say for our part that we would not have any objection to the item going through as long as it were understood that the hon. member for Gloucester who is our spokesman on this subject and who expected to be here but just is not here would be given reasonable latitude on some other item.

Mr. Howard: Just before the item carries I would like to draw to the attention of the minister the activities taking place under the Cold Storage Act, and perhaps the minister could indicate if there have been any results to the discussions he has had with his colleague the Minister of Agriculture in this regard.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, there have been discussions between the departments in order to judge the practicability of the suggestions which were advanced by the hon. member for Skeena and others last year before the committee. It has not been found that there is any practical way of dividing the operation into two or to put it under two administrations. In any case, however, we are still open to suggestions. I think the only way it could be done practically would be to duplicate the Cold Storage Act as far as the Department of Fisheries is concerned.

Mr. Howard: I do not want to delay this unnecessarily but may I pose this problem. The Department of Agriculture deals primarily with agricultural products and the subsidies paid under that department, and under that department the interests of the fisheries is not given full consideration. If the only solution is duplication so that the fisheries department will have an establishment to deal with this sort of thing, I submit we must do that. As I understand the explanation given to me, this has been dealt with by the fisheries department anyway. If an application is made for a subsidy for fish cold storage warehouses I understand that the fisheries department is fully consulted on the matter as to whether a subsidy will be paid or not.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is true.

Mr. Howard: So you already have duplication except that you do not have duplication in paying the subsidy. That results in the fisheries interests being injured or restricted because of the predominance of agricultural problems in the Department of Agriculture which have resulted in the Department of Agriculture placing a $50,000 limit on subsidies.

I suggest the only solution appears to be one of duplication. Apparently the machinery already exists and perhaps it may require an act comparable to the Cold Storage Act but applying to fishery products. Perhaps if the minister could indicate now what some of the difficulties are which he has found in his discussions, then I would not be so adamant in my approach and perhaps the problem is not too difficult.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I would like to say that I think there might be exceptions, but generally speaking full weight has been given to the recommendation and the advice given to the department officials when grants were made under this act applying to fisheries. There is the question of the limitation, and I think this is the nub of the problem. A different act or any division in responsibility would not make any difference unless this limitation were raised or eliminated.

I think that is the crux of the problem which the hon. member has in mind because it might under certain circumstances bear unfairly upon a particular project. I believe I have an idea of what the hon. gentleman has in mind. This is due to the limitation in the act itself rather than the method of administration.

Mr. Howard: It is due to an order in council which put a ceiling of $50,000 on the subsidy. It is not due to the limitation in the act at all.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is correct. I should have said it is due to the regulations made under the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister agreeable to the suggestion I made?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

Resolution adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader if he could indicate the order in which estimates will be taken tomorrow and if there is anything definite he can say about Friday?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think the house will find it agreeable tomorrow to complete the estimates of the Department of Fisheries and then make a start on those of the Department of Justice. It is a question of the allocation of time. We will have available for discussion about 6½ hours tomorrow after orders of the day are reached.

Mr. Pickersgill: If another department was needed what would it be?

Mr. Churchill: The third item would be completion of the estimates of the Department of Transport in case the house moves rapidly.

For Friday the first item of business would be the bill of rights. The question of hours of sitting on Friday has not yet been determined by the house.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

2. If so, when did such investigation begin, for what period did it extend, and when was a report issued, if any?

3. What is the cost, or the estimated cost to the taxpayer of any such investigation, and the publication costs of any resultant report or reports?

4. (a) Was any prosecution conducted recently of Canadian Breweries Limited under the Combines Investigation Act, and, if so, were any costs incurred by the government in undertaking such a prosecution?

(b) Of any such costs incurred, what amounts were paid, or are payable, in respect of fees and disbursements for counsel; to whom, and in what amounts, in each case?

(c) Of any such costs incurred, what amounts, if any, were paid or are payable in respect of (a) fees and (b) disbursements for matters not covered in (b) above?

(d) What was the cost, or estimated cost, to the government in respect of persons associated with departments of the government in connection with such prosecution, having regard to the value of the time of such person, and the length of time each such person was employed in connection with such prosecution; the travelling and other expenses of such persons; the costs of preparation of material and documents; and all other items of expense in connection with such prosecutions?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. An inquiry was conducted under the Combines Investigation Act into certain aspects of the brewing industry.

2. The investigation began in June, 1951 and ended with the report of the restrictive trade practices commission dated May 16, 1955 and issued June 9, 1955.

Questions

TOURIST EXPENDITURES

Question No. 417—Mr. Broome:

According to Canadian government tourist office figures, what is the total spending of Canadians in other countries in each of the last five years as compared to total spending of visitors to Canada?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

The Canadian government travel bureau does not compile statistics on tourist spending. However, the following figures have been supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Year	Total spent by Canadians in other countries	Total spent by visitors to Canada
1955	$449,000,000.	$328,000,000.
1956	498,000,000.	337,000,000.
1957	525,000,000.	363,000,000.
1958	542,000,000.	349,000,000.
*1959	593,000,000.	393,000,000.

APPENDIX "A"

STATEMENT MADE IN THE CONFERENCE OF THE TEN-NATION DISARMAMENT COMMITTEE, JUNE 24, 1960, BY LIEUTENANT-GENERAL E. L. M. BURNS, DISARMAMENT ADVISER TO THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

In the speech he has just made the representative of Czechoslovakia said, I believe, that the socialist countries were trying to create favourable conditions for fruitful negotiation. I do not think, however, that his speech could be said to facilitate this endeavour—especially his attack on not only the position in the disarmament negotiations here but also on the world policy of one of the members of the committee.

What I have to say today seems quite apposite in view of some of the statements of the representative of Czechoslovakia, especially as regards the attitude of the western delegations here. The allegations which he has made are not at all new, they have been repeated many times, but they do not become true because they are repeated. They are not new and they are not true.

Mr. Nosek referred to a statement made by Mr. Howard Green, minister of external affairs of Canada. I shall be referring to that statement and explaining in greater detail the ideas behind it and how they apply to what the Canadian delegation hopes may be the course of our discussions here.

The Canadian delegation has for some time been concerned that the working methods of our committee have not resulted in concrete negotiations designed to reconcile opposing views on problems which are admittedly of common concern. Accordingly, it is my intention in this intervention to explain how this problem presents itself to the government of Canada, and I shall put forward suggestions the acceptance of which we believe could go far towards moving our discussions into the phase of effective negotiations.

I think it is hardly necessary to reaffirm the attachment of the Canadian government to the concept of general and complete disarmament. The repeated charges in this connection by eastern European representatives may arise from a misunderstanding of the reasons why the present western proposals do not envisage our reaching this goal by means of one all-inclusive agreement embracing every detail of the complete program to which all countries of the world must adhere before any disarmament can begin. Rather—as I and my colleagues have pointed out on a number of occasions—we foresee a comprehensive disarmament program coming about by stages beginning with engagements which would not require the adherence of any state which is not a member of this committee before it was sought to secure the agreement of all or even a majority of states not represented here to further measures.

At the same time, the Canadian delegation conceives the duties of this committee as including the drafting of more far-reaching measures of disarmament, the implementation of which would require the adherence of all militarily significant states and ultimately of most if not all states in the world. Furthermore, it has never been proposed that the working out of the various measures of general and complete disarmament should be broken down into separate compartments. That is to say, the process of negotiation should be continuous, moving from measures which can be given effect by agreement within this committee through measures requiring wider participation and finally to our ultimate goal.

Let me make it very plain, before I go any further, that it would be completely fallacious for my colleagues from the eastern delegations to interpret the remarks I have just made as implying that the western nations wish to bring about agreement on isolated measures only. That is far from being the case. We are in search of a balanced program of nuclear and conventional disarmament which would benefit all and give advantage to none. We also seek to start the process as soon as possible.

The expression of our sense of urgency may have contributed to the evident misunderstanding. Our proposals of March 16 state at the head of section II: "The following measures will be undertaken as rapidly as possible upon successful completion of relevant preparatory studies outlined in 1". It does not follow from this that we envisage separate agreements on each of the items contained in section II of our plan. We do not exclude the possibility, as I have said, that certain matters might by mutual agreement be regarded as suited to a separate instrument. However, our basic concept is one of balance.

It may be appropriate for me to present to the committee in this connection an extract from a statement made in the House of Commons on June 15 by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This is the same statement from which I quoted at our 41st meeting on June 17. The additional passage I wish to bring to the committee's attention is as follows:

> It is my view that the time has come, perhaps through an examination of equivalent features of new U.S.S.R. proposals and the western proposals, to begin a process of negotiation of balanced concessions. This was the sort of "package" approach to which I referred earlier in the house . . . I should like to emphasize, however, that by "package", I do not mean that the one side or the other should hold out for its present proposals on an all or nothing basis; the packages I have in mind, as I have tried to explain are smaller and would contain immediately negotiable provisions of equivalent significance to both sides. The goal would remain general and complete disarmament under effective international control, but it would be accomplished by a stage by stage process, throughout which concessions would be balanced in such a way that neither side would obtain a temporary military superiority.

The previous statement to which Mr. Green referred in the passage I have quoted was his report to the House of Commons on disarmament matters given on May 9 while we were in recess. He spoke then in part as follows:

> We suggested that an attempt might very well be made to work out package deals, that is, take one measure of disarmament in which the west was interested and one of equivalent importance in which the east was interested and try to make a package deal with regard to these two particular aspects of disarmament. For example, the west might offer to negotiate a controlled limitation on force levels and related conventional armaments if the U.S.S.R. side would agree to negotiate on the nuclear disarmament measures in stages one and two of the western plan. We believe this is a practical way to get this moving, and if package deals of that kind could be made in several instances the first thing we would know there would be a worth-while disarmament agreement.

As will be obvious, the example of an area for negotiations was selected before the U.S.S.R. proposals of June 2, and is therefore not precisely apposite. However, what is important and relevant in this latter quotation is the last sentence. It indicates clearly that the suggestion of "package deals" is addressed to the problem of getting negotiations going and is not intended to affect the nature of the agreement negotiated. Mr. Green has plainly indicated that several "deals" would be put together to comprise a worth-while agreement.

One point on which I am sure we will all agree in seeking a solution to this problem is that our method of work—as well as the results it achieves—should satisfy insofar as possible the guiding principles which are basic to any disarmament program. Three such principles which I believe we have all endorsed are the following:

(I) The disarmament should proceed by stages;

(II) That at no stage of disarmament should any state or group of states achieve a military advantage over other states;

(III) That disarmament measures should be balanced, as, for example, between measures of nuclear disarmament and measures of conventional disarmament.

In considering the method suggested in the statement of June 15 which I have quoted, two of the ideas put forward in it are worthy of special emphasis. The first is that in devising a series of measures on which the position of the two sides could be set up against one another, it will not be satisfactory for "one side or the other to hold out for its present proposals on an all or nothing basis". That is to say we must seek common ground between our two sides through patient and detailed negotiations. Second, concessions on each side should be accomplished in the course of a stage by stage process and should "be balanced in such a way that neither side would obtain a temporary military superiority". The reaffirmation of these essential conditions brings us back to the basic principles of disarmament which I mentioned a moment ago—balance among the various areas of disarmament; a willingness to move forward in stages; and a common effort to ensure that no side gains an advantage at any given stage. I think that if my colleagues can agree in principle that it will be worth while to adopt the method of work suggested, we will then be in a position to look more closely at those measures of disarmament which are best suited for immediate examination. This further consideration should involve a joint concentration of our efforts to discover proposals from each side which could be juxtaposed to preserve a balance of our two ways of approaching disarmament, and at the same time to seek proposals which would disclose a fundamental similarity of view on both sides, regardless of superficial differences of detail.

Mr. Green's speech of May 9 referred to one example of a possible area of negotiation where the proposals of each side ought to be balanced. I think that it will be obvious to members of the committee that others can be cited on which there is already some measure of agreement between our two views. In my first brief statement after the resumption of our meetings I referred to apparent advances in the U.S.S.R. plan in measures to deal with the prohibition of placing weapons of mass destruction in outer space, for a joint study of the cessation of production and destruction of stock piles of nuclear weapons, and for measures to set up international machinery to keep the peace in a disarmed world. There are, I believe, other features of the U.S.S.R. plan which have sufficient in common with proposals in the western plan to make it possible to devise a series of negotiating "packages" such as I have referred to above.

With respect to other, less easily removed differences between the positions of our two sides, I would suggest that we will have to make a further effort to find common features which could serve as the basis for further development of proposals which could be balanced against one another. I have emphasized the need to seek common ground, because if we should maintain rigidly defined or inflexible positions, on either side, it would of course be difficult if not impossible to achieve that degree of agreement between our two points of view that would permit us to achieve a balanced and graduated series of measures which would meet the interests of both sides. I have already suggested with respect to areas in which we appear to have reached some measure of agreement that one way of going about this task is to put into effect immediately joint studies which would assist us working out the details of measures on which we could agree. I think that it is obvious that this approach will be even more useful in areas where we do not as yet see eye to eye. It would enable us to understand each other's point of view more clearly, and in so doing to seek those common elements in them both which would lead to further progress towards a comprehensive series of disarmament measures. My colleagues from eastern Europe may now charge that the Canadian delegation has gone further than any others in advocating an approach through partial measures and that we are suggesting dealing with parts of parts. I trust that they will approach my observations today in a more constructive spirit. I should recall the efforts which my western colleagues and I were making before the recess to bring about discussions upon specific measures of disarmament. The suggestions I have put forward—that is to say the suggestions contained in the passages I have quoted from the two statements to the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—represent a constructive attempt to find the means for serious negotiation on specific measures.

The objections of our eastern European colleagues to any discussion of specific measures appear to have been connected to their assertions that the western powers are seeking agreement only on isolated measures. Perhaps the adoption of the method I have suggested would go some way to reassure them as to our intentions. In this way, we could jointly concentrate on proposals from each side which would be juxtaposed to preserve balance in the process of negotiations as well as in the results.

If we were to set our hands vigorously and without delay to our task in the manner I have indicated, that is by seeking to agree upon packages of proposals drawn from both sides, there is no real reason why we could not be in a position to make progress toward agreement.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 30, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONGO—EXPRESSION OF GOOD WISHES ON BECOMING SOVEREIGN STATE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the house is aware the Belgian Congo is to become a sovereign state today, and all members of the house will wish to join in extending best wishes to this new country on joining the family of independent nations. In keeping with the Congo's new status I wish to announce that the Canadian trade commissioner's office, which has been for some years maintained at Leopoldville, is to become a full consulate general. The change in status will constitute tangible evidence to the Congolese of Canada's interest in the future of their new state, and it will lend additional importance to commercial contacts with the new government.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED STATEMENT BY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has the minister seen the statement on unemployment made in Vancouver by the governor of the Bank of Canada, in which he states that it seems to be a symptom of specific economic problems in particular localities and activities? Has the minister any comment to make on this statement, and does the government propose any special program to deal with these specific problems referred to by the governor of the Bank of Canada?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article referred to; consequently I have no comment to make. However, I wish to assure the hon. member that the government is at all times looking into every aspect of the economy and endeavouring to bring about solutions to the ills.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister look at the statement made by the governor of the Bank of Canada, and will he comment on it tomorrow?

An hon. Member: Yes, if necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED REQUEST FOR FEDERAL INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour and ask him whether he has now seen the request made by the association of mayors and reeves of Ontario of the federal government asking for a full investigation by the government into the cause of and cure for unemployment. If so, what action does his department or the government intend to take?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have received no communication on that matter.

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker, that was not my question. My question was whether the minister had seen in the press the request made by the association of mayors and reeves for a full probe into the question of unemployment.

Mr. Starr: I have seen many requests written by other people expressing their views on this subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask a supplementary question. Did the minister not formerly belong to this association?

Mr. Starr: I was mayor of the city of Oshawa.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPORTED STATEMENT BY QUEBEC LIBERAL LEADER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Prime Minister stated that during the last provincial election campaign the premier-designate of Quebec made it absolutely clear that the responsibility for unemployment rests on the provincial administration. In view of the fact that I have seen no such statement as the one the Prime Minister attributed to Mr. Lesage—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: Take off your blinkers.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bourget: —would the right hon. gentleman be kind enough to give the source of his statement, the exact location, date and place on which it was used?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going into the particulars, but I am very happy to provide at least a portion of the information that the hon. gentleman has requested. I have here a copy of Le Devoir for May 10 showing a picture of unemployed persons. A translation of the words appearing there—providing my translation is correct—would be: "Let us get rid of Quebec's unemployment—" and there is a picture of a crowd waiting. Then it says, "The Liberal solution: consider unemployment a family problem and a provincial responsibility."

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I am rising on a question of privilege affecting every hon. member in this house. The Prime Minister made a very precise statement yesterday in which he attributed to a privy councillor of Canada a statement for which he has offered no substantiation whatever. He said that Mr. Lesage had made a statement, and he has produced no evidence whatever to that effect. He has produced his own translation of some words in an advertisement, and anyone who has seen some of the advertisements for which the right hon. gentleman was responsible—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member implies that there is a question of privilege in the exchange which has just taken place. I do not see how it affects any hon. member in the house. I think perhaps the privileges of this house are not involved.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I do with respect think it does involve a question of privilege, particularly in view of what the Prime Minister himself said at page 5535 of Hansard:

> I am also aware of something which I am very happy to have learned, that the premier-designate of Quebec has stated that the responsibility for unemployment rests on the provinces.

The premier-designate of the province of Quebec has made no such statement.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I should entertain argument about questions of fact. The question of privilege, I suppose, although it has not been stated, would arise out of misinformation. The right hon. Prime Minister has given a statement which he has read to the house, and it is for the members of the house to draw their conclusions as to whether or not it substantiates his earlier statement. It is not a question of privilege.

[Mr. Bourget.]

UNITED NATIONS

WORLD REFUGEE YEAR—SUCCESS OF CANADIAN PLAN—ADDITIONAL GIFT OF FLOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It rises out of the fact that at least technically this is the end of world refugee year. Can the minister bring the house up to date on the success of the Canadian plan to bring tubercular refugees and their families to Canada? Can the minister also say whether or not, in keeping I am sure with the desire of the Canadian people, even with the end of the year we could continue this humanitarian move?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The world refugee year ends today, but I would hope that all over the world there would be a continuation of the efforts which have been made to settle the refugee problem. I am not in a position today to make a statement with regard to the plan to bring tuberculous refugees to Canada. However, I shall try to get that material and give it to the house. The scheme is proceeding very well. The first of the second group will be coming to Canada within the next few weeks.

I had quite an important announcement to make with regard to world refugee year, but unfortunately it has not reached my desk. I may be obliged later to ask for leave to revert to motions. In substance it is to the effect that the government has decided to grant to UNRWA an additional amount of flour to the value of $1 million. This flour is being given as a special gift for world refugee year. We have already provided for $1½ million worth of flour and for a cash payment of $500,000. This will be an additional gift. It will be very beneficial, because it will mean that other sums will be available to UNRWA from the United States. It will also mean that the savings resulting from the gift of this flour will be used for the opening of two vocational schools in the areas where the refugees are now living. I am sure the whole house will approve of this action which is to be taken.

If I get my material before the orders of the day are over I will ask leave to revert to motions in order to make a proper speech about this question.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Since the hon. gentleman has already made what apparently is an improper speech on this subject, Mr. Speaker, perhaps he would permit a brief comment.

I think everyone in the house would agree that what he has suggested the government should do for these Arab refugees is a very helpful step in meeting a problem which is of utmost complexity and difficulty, as we all know. When the minister does make his formal statement I wonder if he or the Prime Minister would tell us whether the government has yet completed its conversations with the provincial governments about the representations of the welfare council with respect to the continuing welfare and health care of privately sponsored refugees. Surely by this time that question could have been settled.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I think the kind of announcement the minister has just made is a very proper one, whether or not it is technically according to our rules. We in the C.C.F. are very happy to support any program of this kind, because we believe that out of our abundance we should make at least part of it available to people who are suffering in various parts of the world.

I would just add this, Mr. Speaker. I hope that when the minister makes his comprehensive review of the government's experience in handling refugees coming into this country he will be able at that time to inform the house how this program can be carried forward.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question on this appropriate day and occasion. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a report in today's Gazette to the effect that a Toronto doctor and his wife say that their efforts to adopt a refugee Korean orphan had been blocked by Canadian immigration laws? In view of the objectives and purposes of world refugee year, which has the government's whole hearted support, as indicated again this morning by the minister, would the minister inform the house why this couple are denied the opportunity to respond to the appeals of the government and of the world refugee organization?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that that question was directed to me; I thought it was a supplementary question. In any event, the adoption of children from other countries is a matter for the consideration of provincial authorities. The adoption laws of the various provinces must be observed by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. Where the department is informed that the provincial authorities in charge of adoption have sanctioned the adoption of a specific child, no barrier is raised by my department to the admission of that child, but we cannot admit children for adoption if the provincial authorities will not sanction the adoption once the child is here.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Was the government represented the other day at the meeting held in Toronto concerning refugee year, and can the minister make any observation with regard to the suggestion that further attention be given to extending the term?

Mrs. Fairclough: I have not received any report from that meeting as yet, but I refer the hon. member to statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs some time ago and, I believe, by the Prime Minister, with reference to the extension of the provisions of world refugee year in so far as Canadian participation is concerned.

Mr. Crestohl: My question was really to inquire whether the government was represented at that meeting.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not remember specifically. It seems to me there was a meeting recently at which we were represented, and there is a meeting today at which the department is represented. If the department was invited to the meeting we would have been represented.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO FILL CURRENT VACANCIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the unusually large number of vacancies existing in almost every department of the government, which would suggest lack of co-ordination—

An hon. Member: Speak up.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question, please.

Mr. Badanai: Can the minister indicate to the house what steps are being made to correct this situation in view of the seemingly widespread unemployment?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I do not know to what situation the hon. member is referring. I missed the first part of his question, the preamble.

Mr. Badanai: I am referring to the number of vacancies which exist in the civil service, according to reports in the newspapers and also to the civil service reports. What efforts is the minister making to co-ordinate these vacancies with the unemployment situation?

Mr. Starr: The civil service does its own hiring.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO U.S. INTERFERENCE IN DISPOSAL OF CANADIAN GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce relating to unemployment and industrial activity, and I expect a Churchillian reply.

Can the minister inform the house whether any Canadian-owned or controlled companies or Canadian subsidiaries of United States companies have been prevented from selling any of their products within or outside Canada as the result of instructions or interference by United States companies, acting in compliance with United States law, within the last 12 months?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say that the question is a proper one for the order paper; perhaps the minister is prepared to answer it.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: I apologize for the violation of the rules in presenting my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but it was occasioned by mental fatigue caused by the circumstances under which we are working. Would I be correct in asking the minister the same question, only instead of saying "12 months" saying "recently"?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I was quite prepared to answer the question, although I agree with the ruling that it would be more appropriate for the order paper. We have no knowledge in the department, and none has been brought to my attention, of any restrictions such as those suggested by the hon. member's question.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT RESPECTING FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): In reply to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I am now informed that during the month of May 1,145 employable persons received financial assistance from immigration officials. This figure represents the total who received assistance, and is not to be considered as meaning that those persons were all receiving assistance at the same time. Most of them were assisted for very short periods. Of the group, only 287 had been on subsistence for a period in excess of two weeks.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the minister whether her department has any evidence that a considerable number of these people seeking assistance are also seeking to return to their country of origin, as was suggested in Der Courier according to an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail.

Mrs. Fairclough: The answer is no. Most of these people who received assistance did so in periods between employment or just after their arrival. The amounts expended were very small.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister think this article, which is obviously very harmful to our whole immigration policy, is completely unfounded?

Mrs. Fairclough: I would hesitate to comment on all the articles on immigration which appear in the newspapers.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Could the minister tell me whether any of these people who want to go back receive any help from the government?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am afraid I cannot give a short answer to that question. It would depend on the circumstances.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ATTENDANCE IN COMMITTEES BY MEMBER FOR OTTAWA WEST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that this morning the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) had to go successively to two committees of this house in order to establish quorums.

An hon. Member: Quite a change for him.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that it is the administrative responsibility of the Prime Minister to establish quorums in committees.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, sir, it seems to me that the Prime Minister yesterday proclaimed his administrative responsibility in this field in which he is an acknowledged expert.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Irresponsible.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's comment might have been appropriate yesterday.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SHERBROOKE, QUE.—REPORTED POLITICAL ACTIVITY OF RURAL MAIL DRIVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Recently the hon. member for Laurier asked me a question about a telegram which he claimed had been sent to me on June 9. He asked whether I had seen it and what my reaction was to it. At that time I had no information on it except that I had not seen it.

I should like to inform him that I have received confirmation in writing from both telegraph companies in Canada that no such message was sent on June 9; and since the so-called copy of the message the hon. member sent me was on the letterhead of a local provincial Liberal organization and a provincial election was in progress, I can understand why he asked the question.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, when the Postmaster General came across the floor of the house the other day to ask me for information in connection with this matter I gave him what information I had, and I also gave him the additional information that I personally had had no contact with the person who is alleged to have sent the telegram but that our chief whip had communicated with that person. To this day that person insists that this telegram was taken to the office of the local telegraph company in the area involved, and that it was sent. If it did not go it was through no fault of his; otherwise I would have said so to the house, so that in the circumstances I think I was perfectly in order in putting the question as I did. I have no confirmation other than the word of the chief whip, which I take and accept because I have confidence in his integrity.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I admit all the facts immediately which the hon. member for Laurier has introduced. I am sure that he would not under any circumstances have attempted to introduce this as an item in the provincial election.

SASKATCHEWAN

REPORTED MESSAGE OF CONGRATULATIONS TO WINNER IN PROVINCIAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the Prime Minister whether it is true that he has sent a message of congratulations to the winner of the deferred provincial election in his part of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

HEALTH INSURANCE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

According to the press, and in particular the June 29 issue of La Presse, as a result of talks between Dr. Jean Gregoire, Quebec deputy minister of health, Dr. Benoit Bundock, director of health services in the federal Department of National Health and Welfare, and the Hon. Jean Lesage, there is no serious obstacle to the implementation of a hospital insurance plan.

Could the Minister of National Health and Welfare tell the house whether he has been officially advised in this respect by provincial authorities? If so, is the minister in a position to say if the plan in question is to be drawn up by his department or by the member for Quebec West at the Quebec legislature, the Hon. Jean Lesage?

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first of all, of course, no formal request has been received from the province of Quebec as yet. However, I would point out that so long as the provincial plan comes within the overall context of the federal act, of course the federal government will be very pleased to participate in the hospital insurance scheme with the province of Quebec.

HOUSING

EFFECT OF REDUCED ACTIVITY ON LUMBER PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, based on several newspaper stories aannouncing cutbacks by lumber operators. In view of the fact that several lumber companies are cutting back production, and this is especially true in British Columbia; and since housing is the lumber industry's best customer, is the government planning any action to get the house building industry back on its feet this year?

Hon. D. J. Walker (Minister of Public Works): In reply to the hon. member, we have these matters under constant consideration; but just to give the house an idea of the different points of view, Mr. Campbell Holmes, president of the national house builders association has suggested, according to the Ottawa Journal of June 28, that the government should get out of the housing loan picture altogether. Therefore my hon. friend can appreciate that while we do give all these matters consideration it is not possible each day to answer inquiries from my hon. friend about something he reads in the newspapers.

AIRPORTS

SAULT STE. MARIE, ONT.—REQUEST FOR ACCELERATION OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. E. Nixon (Algoma West): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether he would have a very careful look at the progress being made on the airport at Sault Ste. Marie, with the view of hurrying up or expediting the work so that it may be ready for use this year rather than 1961?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I shall be very glad to look into the progress being made, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

129. Information and educational service, including grant of $3,000 to Nova Scotia fisheries exhibition, $202,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The house in committee of supply, Department of Fisheries, item 129; this item will be found on page 29 of the blue book and the details on page 196. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Just a minute; perhaps you could wait a second until we can hear what is going on. Will the minister tell us whether there have been any new developments since last year in the information and educational service?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, there is not any great change in policy or expenditures as far as the information service is concerned. It is no different this year from the past.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder whether hon. members would please quieten down so the committee can hear what the minister is saying.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There is an increase in the appropriation for advertising, one purpose of which is to promote the consumption of fish by Canadians. Yesterday I mentioned the fact that the information service has published a cook book which is being very well received. The preparation of that cook book was in progress for some time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to make a suggestion to the minister. I had the pleasure on one occasion of attending the Nova Scotia fisheries exhibition, and I cannot commend it too highly. It is an excellent exhibition, one of the finest of any trade or industry exhibition I have ever seen. In the last few years there has been a general industrial and economic exhibition, so to speak, in the new arena at St. John's, Newfoundland, in which there is a fisheries section. Would the minister's department have someone visit that exhibition this year to see if there is any way in which the department can help to expand its activities a little in what after all is the oldest fishing province and, as far as the Atlantic is concerned, still the most important one?

Mr. MacLean: I will make certain that a representative of the department will be there to look over the situation.

Item agreed to.

131. Industrial development service, $942,185.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this vote carries I should like to ask the minister if he could tell us very briefly what new projects that were not under way when we last considered the estimates are now being undertaken under the industrial development service vote.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is a bit difficult to be absolutely accurate as to what might have been under way a year ago, but a number of very useful activities have been carried on, most of them in co-operation with the provincal governments and their departments of fisheries or the equivalents. I should like to say at this point that in all cases the co-operation of the provincial governments has been of a very high order in every field having to do with fisheries, and co-operation has been especially close with regard to industrial development.

I believe I have mentioned already that a multipurpose vessel has been constructed in co-operation with the government of Nova Scotia. I believe I have also mentioned various methods of fishing with gear that is not commonly used in a particular area. For instance, we have carried on demonstrations of trawling for smelt in lake Erie. We have experimented with gill netting for herring and cod on the Atlantic coast. Many other programs have been under way, such as the use of a midwater trawl which was carried on to quite an extent in the gulf of St. Lawrence and in which program, as I recall, the government of New Brunswick co-operated. There have been demonstrations of mechanical clam digging machinery which has been developed by the fisheries research board in co-operation with the industrial development branch. These are some of the examples.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister about the trawling in lake Erie. As the minister knows, I was born practically on the shore of lake Erie. Is this experiment being carried on out of Port Dover?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, partially, and also out of Wheatley.

Mr. Pickersgill: Out of Wheatley in Kent county?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does it look promising? As the minister knows, there have been great difficulties in lake Erie recently.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, the ecology of the whole of lake Erie has changed considerably. The relative population of various species has changed very greatly over the last few years. This experimental work is proving to be very successful.

Mr. Granger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister to consider looking into the matter of improving the shipping of lobsters from Newfoundland. As the minister knows, there is a considerable lobster fishery in Notre Dame and Bonavista bays. There has always been a certain amount of difficulty in holding the lobsters so they could be shipped to the markets as needed. The lobster season is fairly short. They are caught in considerable quantity and sometimes have to be shipped too soon and in too great quantity, which has a tendency to reduce the price. If lobsters could be held for a longer period at Lewisporte, the central point for Notre Dame bay, and Gander, the central point for the other area, in a properly designed lobster pound—I think that is what it is called—with adequate cooling facilities, they could then be distributed as demand required. Consequently there would be a tendency for the price to be more favourable and as a result the fishermen would receive better prices.

This matter has been discussed locally for some time by lobster producers and distributors, and recently there has been quite a demand for a better system of holding lobsters for shipment to market. In that connection I might add that there seems to be some difficulty in getting refrigerated railway cars at Lewisporte when they are needed. Possibly this is not the time to speak about railway cars, but as they are needed for the shipping of lobsters perhaps I might be permitted to make that observation. There is some difficulty in getting refrigerated cars there when the lobsters are ready for shipment. I would appreciate it very much if the minister would look into the matter of lobster shipment and particularly the holding of lobsters for later shipment.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Many methods are already in use in various areas for holding lobsters in pounds for a period of time and supplying the market when the demand is there. I think it is a question for the industry to deal with. If the circumstances in an area are suitable for a pound, or if any segment of the industry wishes to embark on such a program, the department will be delighted to furnish any technical information and advice that may be necessary.

With regard to refrigerator cars, may I say that this is a matter for the C.N.R., but I will see that it is brought to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Transport so that he in turn can bring it to their attention.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word in support of what the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador has said, because at one or two places in my constituency, notably at Burnside and Comfort Cove, some efforts have been made to hold lobsters, and I know it would be appreciated very much if the department would give all the assistance possible with respect to this matter. There is no question but that if lobsters could be kept for a while after the end of the season and distributed to the market in a more even fashion there would be a bigger return to the fishermen.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask two questions of the minister. The first is, what is the actual position with respect to the mechanical drying of light salted codfish? Has the cost yet been reduced to a point where this is an economically profitable operation?

The second question is, can the minister say whether any further progress has been made with respect to the use of antibiotics for the preservation of fish? I forget the trade name, but there is a trade name for it.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The matter of the preservation of fish by the use of antibiotics such as aureomycin and other modern drugs has been under experimentation, and considerable success has been achieved. However, the question of the purity of the food is involved, and research is still being conducted.

The second question the hon. member asks concerns the mechanical drying of light salted fish, and whether or not that is economical. We have done a considerable amount of work in this connection, especially with regard to continuous operation. In the opinion of the department the operation appears to be economic, at least under certain circumstances. Certain segments of the industry have become interested in this matter and are using this process to some extent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before this item passes, in the light of the question asked by my hon. friend from Burin-Burgeo perhaps the committee would permit me to repeat an observation I have made once or twice before in connection with this whole problem of light salted fish. I know something about what is going on at Valleyfield and I think, as the minister says, what is being done there is very helpful indeed. At Bonavista they originally produced an excellent light salted fish, but it was not economic. It seems evident that these experiments have reached the point where this process is really going to work. However, it is going to take some years before a light salted fish is produced which will be acceptable in Italy and Spain. There is going to be a gap there which needs to be filled if we are to hold these markets.

I am sure the minister is worried, as I am, about what the effect of the establishment of the European common market may be on our market for fish in Italy. On the other hand, I believe that in Spain the prospects are brighter than they were if we have a product to take advantage of this market.

I do urge the minister to consider very carefully, first with his officials and with others in Newfoundland as well, whether or not a premium could be paid on light salted fish for a limited period as an experiment only. I do not mean mechanically cured fish but sun cured, and this would provide the fisherman with sufficient incentive to keep producing this product until it can be produced mechanically. The minister will recall that this is what was done with bacon before the war in order to fill the British market. I do urge the department, as I have been urging them for several years, to do something to meet what is really a crisis.

132. Field services administration, $862,940.
Field services—

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, if I am on the right item, conservation, I should like to take a minute to ask the minister whether he could answer the question I put to him yesterday concerning a revision of the Fisheries Act which would bring the penalties for violation of the pollution sections more into line with the actual damage which has been done. I suggested to him that instead of having a set fine, which is a nominal fine, the matter should be covered by regulation so that penalties could be set which would deter this practice. These penalties would also apply to vessels in harbours and offshore which discharge debris, oil and so on into the waters.

I believe this matter is important and is becoming more important all the time, and that a major modification of the Fisheries Act would not be needed to take care of it. I think action is required, and I should like to hear the minister's comments.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The Fisheries Act and all other acts which are administered by the Department of Fisheries are, of course, reviewed continuously to determine just how efficiently the responsibilities of the department are being carried out. The legislation in question quite naturally contains anomalies and weaknesses that come to light as time goes by. This provision has been in the Fisheries Act for a long time and, perhaps as a result of changed conditions which were not envisaged when the act was last amended, there are indications that there should be much greater flexibility with regard to penalties.

This is one of the many matters that are constantly being reviewed. We are fully aware of this situation, and when an opportunity arises to amend the Fisheries Act this will be one of the matters that will be definitely considered.

Mr. Howard: I do not have a copy of the Fisheries Act before me to which I can make specific reference, but I understand that a fisheries officer or patrolman finding a fisherman who is violating a boundary, let us say, or fishing during a closed season or in a closed area, can immediately confiscate the fish, the vessel and the gear or property of the fisherman. I am wondering if the minister could indicate under what authority the fisheries officer can confiscate the equipment and gear of a fisherman.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The act provides that in the case of an infraction the fisheries officer can confiscate on view, on the spot, the fisherman's gear. In so far as the fish themselves are concerned, the fish can be delivered to a plant or to an ordinary place of marketing so they will not go to waste, and the returns from the fish held until the case is dealt with.

Mr. Howard: Then my assumption is correct, that a fisheries officer can confiscate the gear on sight if he thinks an infraction of the regulations or the act has taken place. That is my understanding from what the minister has just said. I wonder if the minister could indicate to me how this particular provision in the act—and this is only one instance; I understand there are other authorities who can also take arbitrary action of that nature—and the activities of the fishery officers in this regard will square with the proposed Canadian bill of rights, if it is introduced and passed by this parliament, the provision there being that people have certain fundamental freedoms, namely the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and that things of the sort referred to will not take place. I wonder if the minister could indicate whether this provision of the Fisheries Act will not be in effect any longer, whether the bill of rights will supersede it, or whether this question has even been thought about.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): When the Fisheries Act was passed the fishery officers were given fairly wide powers, it is true, or fairly arbitrary powers, because it was envisaged that in many cases they would be operating in isolated areas and that sort of thing, and they still do so. As to the effect of the bill of rights when and if it becomes law, just at this stage that is—

Mr. Pickersgill: Hypothetical.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): —a hypothetical question, technically, in any case. I am not in a position to say, because I think this is a request for a legal opinion which I am not in a position to give. All I can say is that we endeavour constantly to make sure that there are as few anomalies and conflicts as possible between the various acts that we administer.

Mr. Carter: Is the minister's department carrying out any studies to determine what effects oil pollution around the coast of Newfoundland may have on the fisheries? The minister is quite aware of the fact that we have had a great problem here in recent years, and one which is getting worse. These large areas of water covered with oil may have some effect on bait which are surface fish, particularly capelin and squid. There is some question as to whether there might not be some adverse effect on the fisheries. Can the minister say whether anything has been done to determine what the effect is and what the findings are?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): With regard to oil pollution—and this is, of course, a general statement—I may say it is not so detrimental to fish life as it is to bird life and that sort of thing, because it floats, and does not actually contaminate the water, the medium in which fish live, to any great extent. In a concentrated condition it might have an effect on the oxygen supply in the water, or something of that sort, but it does not directly affect fish life to any great extent. The scientists of the fisheries research board and of the department are quite aware of the effects that various types of pollution may have on fish life in any particular area.

Mr. Carter: I was thinking more of the indirect effect it might have in connection with the movement of bait fish like squid and capelin. The fishery on the south coast is very good this year and has been very good, but I understand that on the north coast it is not so good. That condition could very well be attributed to the fact that the bait does not come to land on account of this oil pollution problem.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): We have no specific evidence to prove or disprove any direct relationship between the two conditions. All I can say is that oil pollution is undesirable on many grounds. There is no question with regard to how undesirable oil pollution is anywhere. The question is to prevent it, to prevent the dumping of oil by shipping or from any other cause.

Mr. Howard: I have been able to obtain a copy of the Fisheries Act in the revised statutes. I think it would be well to question at this stage whether fishery officers should have the authority and power they now have, and whether this is not in fact an abrogation of the rights of the individual, whether or not we have the so-called bill of rights introduced and passed by this parliament at some time in the future.

I should like to point out to the committee where I think some thought should perhaps be given to changing this authority. There are a number of sections in the act. I do not intend to read them in their entirety, but perhaps just a few words from them will give to the committee an indication of the sort of arbitrary authority that is given to fishery officers. Section 35 provides:

> 35. Any fishery officer or justice of the peace may, on view, convict any person committing any of the offences punishable under the provisions of this act—

And so on. We went into this matter previously. Another section provides as follows:

> 36. Any fishery officer or justice of the peace may search, break open and search, or grant a warrant to search, any house, vessel or place where he has reason to believe that any fish taken in violation of this act, or of any regulation, or anything used in violation thereof, is concealed.

Authority is given to search houses or vessels or to break into them and search or to give somebody a warrant to search a particular place. Again we find this provision:

37. Any fishery officer, fishery guardian or peace officer may arrest without warrant a person whom he, on reasonable and probable grounds, believes to have committed an offence—

40. —the fishery officer, may enter upon and pass through or over private property without being liable for trespass.

45. Any fishery officer . . . have and exercise the powers of a justice of the peace, without property qualification, and without taking any oath of office, in all the waters—

And so on. I do not know whether this means that any fishery officer may perform a marriage in any of these waters if he has the authority of a justice of the peace. This would probably be stretching it a bit; but from a quick and cursory reading, if a fishery officer is exercising the powers of a justice of the peace in all the waters, perhaps he has the authority to perform a marriage ceremony or to arrange for that at sea where people may be fishing.

But that is another matter. I merely read those three or four parts of the sections in order to point out that fishery officers and fishery guardians have all sorts of arbitrary authority and power to search places, to break into them, to arrest people, to convict people, to detain them and to confiscate gear and property without due process of law; whereas in the bill of rights it is provided that perhaps these things should not occur. While the minister has said that this is a legal question as to which one supersedes the other, if either does, I think it is a question that should be studied very carefully within the fisheries department, if and when this so-called bill of rights is passed by parliament, at least to determine first whether or not this authority should be maintained within the hands of fishery officers; and second, if the bill of rights is passed to determine which supersedes the other and whether it is necessary to make changes in the Fisheries Act in this regard.

There is just one other point I want to raise and, as the minister has indicated, it is something upon which he cannot give an opinion because it is perhaps asking a legal opinion as to whether one law supersedes the other. But there certainly appears to be a great deal of inconsistency between what the government on the one hand decides should be done as to giving arbitrary rights to individuals to arrest, detain and confiscate property and, on the other hand, to put in terms of a bill of rights which would protect an individual from just such actions as might be and have been taken by fishery officers under this act.

Mr. Pickersgill: When the minister replies perhaps he could reply to an observation I would like to make, too. The minister has perhaps had his attention called to representations made by the attorney general of Newfoundland in his capacity as member for one of the provincial constituencies in my federal constituency about an incident at Campbellton. I wonder if that was satisfactorily cleared up.

[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, Mr. Chairman. In reply to the observations made by the hon. member for Skeena, I must say that the Fisheries Act and the sections to which he referred have been on the statute books for a considerable length of time now. It has been my endeavour to administer the act in such a way that there would not be abuse of the power which parliament in the past has seen fit to place in the hands of fishery officers. I think the comments the hon. member has made are very much to the point, and as I said in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South this is a matter which will be carefully reviewed when the Fisheries Act is next amended.

Item agreed to.

135. Inspection and consumer service, $2,139,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister in his opening statement said something about this inspection service which was now being given in order to provide standards on which customers could rely. Could the minister say precisely what proportion of the industry is now taking advantage of this federal service?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There is a total of 32 plants at the present time, and they represent a high percentage of the actual production. I have not got the exact figure.

Special—

137. Canadian share of expenses of the international commissions detailed in the estimates, $895,210.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, part of this vote allows for a payment of $30,000 to the international north Pacific fisheries commission, in which Canada, the United States and Japan participate jointly in high seas fisheries. There has been a considerable amount of discussion in years past as to the effect of this commission and whether or not immature salmon of Canadian origin are being caught in certain areas of the north Pacific.

I am not as concerned at the moment with this particular conflict of opinion as to whether, conservationwise, the fisheries are being properly protected as I am with a matter which arose last year to which reference was made in this house and elsewhere. This matter concerned fishing boats of Russian origin which had been fishing in the same area. As I understand it they were fishing primarily for flatfish or bottom fish and were not engaged in salmon fishing, but I wonder whether since that time any additional surveys or investigations have been conducted or whether any additional knowledge is in the possession of the minister about other countries on the other side of the Pacific, notably China and Russia, engaging in any sort of fisheries themselves or any scientific survey work in that area so far as salmon are concerned?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, we have no evidence that as far as the Russians are concerned they have been engaging or even attempting to engage in the catching of salmon on the high seas on this side of the Pacific; their activities have been restricted to other types of fishing. As far as the Chinese are concerned, there is no activity which we know of on this side of the Pacific.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the minister could indicate, following the same line of reasoning, whether salmon of Russian origin from streams in Russia are in the same intermingling grounds as are Canadian, United States and Japanese salmon. I do not know exactly how big the area is, but it is a pretty broad area in the Pacific where they all intermingle, and I would like to know whether Russian salmon are also in this particular area.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): At roughly 175 degrees west longitude, and on each side of that line, there is a wide area where salmon from both continents intermingle. But there is no evidence that any salmon which originate in British Columbia travel that far west, and the Japanese do not fish east of that area. As far as Canadians are concerned, we do not fish for salmon on the high seas. Therefore as the matter stands now there is the very minimum, if any at all, of the catching by one nation of salmon has its origin in the other continent.

Mr. Howard: The minister has had no communication from the Soviet union as to the desirability of participating in the north Pacific salmon commission?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): None at all.

Mr. Howard: Would there be any bar to it if they so desired to participate?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This would have to be considered and would depend on the terms of any proposal which might be made.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the great lakes fisheries commission, which was set up principally to combat lamprey eels in the great lakes, I notice that Canada's share is down about $91,000 this year. I wonder if the minister could give us a résumé of the progress which has been made and why this cut in the estimates has been made. Is it because we are making a certain amount of progress in combating this problem with less expensive materials? I would appreciate some information from the minister at this stage as to the elimination of lamprey eels, for example in lake Superior, in lake Huron and in Georgian bay.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): With regard to the international great lakes fishery commission, the main activity of which at the present time is the control of lamprey, I might say that one reason there is a reduction in the vote is that it is now no longer necessary to install the very expensive electrical barriers on streams in which we can now poison lamprey with the fairly recently discovered lampreycide, a selective chemical which will destroy the lamprey in the larvae stage in streams without harming to any measurable extent any other form of life in the stream. This has resulted in a considerable saving, in the sense that the cost of controlling the lamprey in a given stream is considerably reduced.

I may say that good progress is being made with the use of lampreycides. Tests made in the pilot stage have produced extremely encouraging results and this year, in particular, there will be very greatly increased activity in the program of lamprey destruction.

Mr. Robinson: Has any extensive work been carried on in lake Huron this year?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Surveys are being made of the streams flowing into lake Huron on the Canadian side to determine which of them are lamprey hatching streams. Not all streams are suitable to the lamprey, and with a view to a further program next year this study has been undertaken. The commission has taken the attitude that the main attack on the lamprey should first of all be at the point of advance, so that the spread can be headed off. As the work progresses, the problem of exterminating lamprey in the areas where they have been present for some time will be pressed forward.

Mr. Nixon: Reference has been made to lake Huron. Can the minister say what progress has been made in lake Superior with regard to lamprey control, and whether there is any indication of the fish coming back? Is this work done in co-operation with the provincial government?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Lamprey control is carried out by an international commission, and the Canadian share of the work is done by the fisheries research board acting in this case as an agent of the commission. The province is represented on the commission by one of its senior officials.

Lake Superior has been one of the major scenes of activity by the international commission on the Canadian side in an effort to contain the spread of lamprey, and very considerable success is being achieved, or at least there is every appearance of success. A period of time will, of course, be required even after an area is clear of lamprey before a new cycle of life can either expand naturally or be rehabilitated by other means; I am referring, of course, to lake trout. But this will be done as quickly as possible. With regard to lake Superior, it would seem that if our success is as great as we hope, there are sufficient stocks of lake trout to re-establish themselves.

Mr. Nixon: Is there any indication now of that taking place.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is too early yet to say.

Mr. Noble: I should like to ask the minister whether the international great lakes fisheries commission is giving consideration to doing anything about stopping continuing infestation from the ocean. I see we have been spending about a million and a half dollars a year on controlling the lamprey, yet nothing has been done to stop the lamprey coming in.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The lamprey problem originated because the lamprey eels migrated into the great lakes after the building of the canals. In the lakes there are apparently no natural enemies to keep them under control as there are, for example, in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Under these conditions they multiply very rapidly.

The additional introduction of the odd lamprey through the canal system from the ocean is of relatively little significance once the place is infested with them. Nevertheless a study has been made of the question which the hon. member raised, and the canals are being watched. We hope that when the lakes can be cleaned up and controlled there will be no danger of reinfestation from that source. If we can succeed in controlling this situation, a new, small infestation would not be a catastrophe by any means.

Mr. Noble: In those circumstances it looks as though this program would have to be continued each year, becoming an annual affair. I do not think treating the streams and then leaving them alone will mean the end of the lamprey. I think they will continue to enter the great lakes and become a menace.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Further, I should like to ask the minister whether the commission has given any consideration to the destruction of fish other than lamprey, because they too are becoming a menace.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Under the present treaty the commission is responsible only as far as the lamprey problem is concerned. It is not concerned with this other problem, although it is an important one.

Mr. Carter: Before we leave this item I wonder if the minister could give us a brief progress report on the north Atlantic fisheries conference.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): As hon. members know, the annual meeting of ICNAF was held in Bergen, Norway. It was one of the most successful conferences yet held, and fine progress was made in reaching international agreement among the 12 nations concerned with regard to net sizes and other conservation measures which will tend to conserve resources generally on the high seas. Each member nation takes responsibility for the application of these regulations to its own nationals.

Mr. Noble: Owing to the fact that the great lakes fisheries commission has been set up for one purpose only, I should like to suggest to the minister that he take some initiative about these rough fish which are a menace in the great lakes.

Item agreed to.

138. Acquisition of land for the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission as required by article VIII of the convention, $6,000.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the minister could explain what land is to be acquired and where it is.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This refers to some land which was acquired a number of years ago, I believe, for the purpose of building a fishway. The land lies in an Indian reserve, and negotiations were carried on with the Indian band involved. They were agreeable to giving up this land, which is situated at Bridge River. It is only now that negotiations have been completed, and this item is to pay the Indian band for the land involved.

Mr. Howard: Did I understand the minister to say that the land was actually acquired some years ago but that we are just now getting around to paying for it?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This was a long process that was carried on through the Indian Affairs branch. The actual fishway was built before I became minister. Through some delay or neglect on the part of someone the actual payment was not made. I think it was something that was not neglect as such; it was a matter of slow legal procedures as far as title and transfer of title were concerned.

Mr. Howard: My question has not so much to do with delay; many other cases have come to our attention in which Indian bands, it seems to me, are put in a position where it takes an inordinately long time to get the money from the purchaser to the band itself. I ask about the time element, because this makes reference to the acquisition of land for the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission as required by article VIII of the convention, which is chapter 11 of the statutes of 1957, which is only a couple of years ago. Did the commission have any authority to make this purchase before 1957, or was this just a carryover from the original convention, or was there a slight alteration in it, or what?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is when the statute was amended.

Item agreed to.

139. Newfoundland bait service, $429,400.

Mr. Carter: I have two questions on this item, Mr. Chairman. First, can the minister say whether there are any funds in this item for the provision of those portable bait depots? Second, what plans are being made to replace the motor vessel Arctica, which is a bait carrier; how soon will provision be made for that?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): As far as the replacement of the Arctica is concerned, which I think is what the hon. member has in mind, this is in the plans of the vessel construction interdepartmental committee. It is under consideration to that extent, but we are not in the process of starting any definite plans, or construction plans, for replacement or for anything of that sort. It is not being neglected; it is being phased into the program for the future. There is nothing in this particular item to cover that matter.

As to the portable bait storage depots, we are making provision for eight additional ones in this item.

Mr. Batten: What sites are being selected for the eight which are being provided this year?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The locations for this year have not been as yet determined. As the hon. member knows, we get a far larger number of requests than we can possibly accommodate in any particular year, or probably ever will be able to accommodate, almost, because these are a very useful and acceptable solution to the bait problem in certain areas. But all applications coming either from members of parliament or directly from fishermen's associations or other groups will be carefully considered on their merits, with a view to placing the units where they will do the most good in each particular case.

Mr. Batten: Is the minister able to give any indication of how soon these units will be provided?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Well, the short answer would be that we will get started on them as soon as the item is passed, but it takes some time before the equipment is available. We got started during the course of the summer on some of them. I cannot recall offhand—I have been trying to do it —when we actually had the ones provided last year finally in operation. We will do it as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think we can let the minister get away with that short answer. He knows that the house with great dispatch and enthusiasm had voted interim supply so the minister can get on with those bait depots.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Let us not get into this argument, Mr. Chairman, but we feel much more confident in ordering these things and having them supplied if we have the whole item passed.

Mr. Carter: Can the minister be a little more definite with respect to the replacement of the motor vessel Arctica? I understand that she is rapidly approaching the stage where she will not be able to pass steamship inspection.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I think I can say that within the next two years progress will be made on the replacement of the Arctica. As far as I can see into the future an item will be provided for that purpose, but there is no money in this particular item for it.

Item agreed to.

141. Fisheries Prices Support Act administration, $60,000.

Mr. Howard: I have mentioned before that the Fisheries Prices Support Act and any operations thereunder have been confined by the statute itself or by practice to fisheries in the maritimes. Can the minister indicate what the circumstances are in that regard?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In actual fact the act does apply over the whole country, and in the past it has applied to the inland fisheries of the prairies, for example. There is no limitation on the geographical application of the act.

Mr. Howard: Can the minister indicate the possibilities of the herring industry on the west coast coming under this act?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): The fisheries prices support board have, I think, had this question under review. Many difficulties are involved. One is, as I said yesterday, that there is the very grave danger of countervailing duties on subsidized products. The position is such that Canada exports a very high percentage of her production of fish meal and fish oil. Our markets are found in countries which also produce fish meal, although not enough for their own purposes; therefore they import some. The result is that the situation is very sensitive to anything that might be considered to be undercutting home production as far as those chief markets of ours are concerned, namely European countries and the United States.

Mr. Howard: Because herring are used primarily for the production of meal and oil, has any thought been given to the reconstitution of the industry to the point where it may be able to engage in the production of herring for food consumption purposes? What snags have we run into in that regard?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): There is no technical problem involved with respect to the production of herring for food. Here again it is a matter of costs versus the prices that can be obtained in the possible markets. In other words it is a question of an economic market for the product. Certain types of herring are produced in small quantities as a luxury food, but this is only a relatively small percentage of the total potential supply and would only support a very small segment of the herring fishing industry. In order to have any real impact on the industry you would have to have a very large market for herring to be used as food, and there appears to be none in sight that would allow the industry to operate on an appreciably large scale in an economic way.

Mr. Howard: I am sorry I was not here during the full time this matter was discussed yesterday. Do soybeans have any detrimental competitive effect upon the herring meal and oil industry?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes. As a matter of fact all fish meals are used chiefly as a supplement for animal feeds because of their high protein content. There are many alternative sources for various types of proteins, and there are only a few types of animal feeds in which fish meal is desirable at a relatively high price. I am not an authority on this matter, but I understand that such feeds as chick starter would be an example where there is a greater desire to use fish meal than is the case with other types of animal feeds. With respect to most types of animal feeds, if fish meal is at a high price the mixer of the animal feed can substitute other protein sources.

Mr. Howard: Does the federal government subsidize the soybean industry?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am afraid this is not covered in my estimates, but there is price support of soybeans.

Mr. Howard: It seems very strange that one department of government should be subsidizing one industry, thus placing in a less competitive position another industry with respect to which there is no move to provide equal support. It seems a little odd. Perhaps the minister should consult with the Minister of Agriculture on this as well as on other matters.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am afraid that as one accepts responsibility one finds that life can be very complicated as far as the administration of a country is concerned, where you have such a divergent group of interests. The situation with regard to soybeans is different because of the fact that they are largely marketed in Canada and we do not export them to any extent. Their use as a substitute for fish meal is not their only use. As a matter of fact, soybean oil is used for many commercial purposes as well as food purposes.

Mr. Howard: The minister has just indicated the great necessity in this country of applying a little socialist philosophy and planning so that we would not get into these difficulties.

Item agreed to.

144. Assistance in the construction of bait freezing and storage facilities, subject to the regulations established by the governor in council, $30,000.

Mr. Granger: I should like the minister to explain briefly what form assistance in the construction of bait freezing and storage facilities takes. I am more interested in storage facilities. I have in mind that in northern Labrador in the Nain area there is quite a nice sea trout fishery. The sea trout are caught commercially and smoked, and they are delicious. Not too far south is Goose Bay airport, quite a populous area with a reasonably high level of income, which should provide a natural market for smoked sea trout. I am probably wandering beyond the scope of the department, but a motor vessel operated by the C.N.R. plies between Nain and Goose airport, and if a very small cold storage space were provided it would probably mean that the sea trout would bring a much higher price in Goose Bay than they do in their present market. I wonder whether that is possible under this bait storage vote.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am afraid this vote would have no application whatsoever to that problem. It applies to commercial bait storages provided by commercial firms. We give them a grant provided they fulfil certain commitments over a period of time to work off the grant. These bait storages are used in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and other provinces to quite an extent. Newfoundland is also involved, but the grants are not made use of as extensively there because of the Newfoundland bait service, which is directly competitive.

Fisheries research board of Canada—

146. Operation and maintenance including an amount of $53,000 for contributions towards fisheries research and for scholarships, and authority to make recoverable advances of amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amount of the share of the international great lakes fishery commission of the cost of work on lamprey control and lamprey research, $4,199,125.

Mr. Carter: I should like to ask the minister whether the fisheries research board is continuing its research into the herring schools of the north Atlantic. When the minister's estimates were before the committee last year we asked that question of Dr. Kask, and he said it was a long term program and that the main schools of herring had not yet been located. Is that work still continuing, and in what way?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): As the hon. member knows, over the last number of years the industrial development branch of the department, in co-operation with the fisheries research board, has done a great deal of work in trying to map the routes of migration of herring in the general area off the coast of the Atlantic provinces. This has been found a very difficult and unpredictable matter, but considerable knowledge has been gained. The programs still going on but not at quite as high a level as in the past. I do not mean that its importance has been reduced but that the expenditure required to carry on the program in its present phase is not quite as large as it was in the past.

Mr. Carter: The reason I asked the question was that the herring fishery has been of tremendous importance to my own riding. In recent years the herring fishery has been a failure when compared with former years, that is in relation to the catch of herring that comes to land and is caught in seines. There is a feeling, and certainly I am of the opinion, that a successful herring fishery could be the salvation of the south coast of Newfoundland providing we could locate the schools and catch them in deep water, as they do in other countries. That cannot be done until this experiment is completed. I would urge the minister to utilize more ships and more men on this project to try to complete it in a shorter space of time.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I want to assure the hon. member that the program is being pressed forward as rapidly as possible. In so far as new ships are concerned, this item includes provision—no, it is the next item—for a new vessel for the research board for pelagic fish research in the Atlantic, and that includes the problem of the location of herring.

Mr. Noble: Would the minister state the actual amount spent on scholarships?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It was $25,000.

Item agreed to.

147. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $552,100.

Mr. Granger: I should like to ask the minister if he would keep in mind, in connection with the erection of the new fisheries building at St. John's, which I understand has been considered for some time, the possibility of having it constructed in close proximity to the new university. I believe this would be beneficial to both.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, I have this very much in mind, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

521. Destruction of dogfish and other predators, $150,000.

Mr. Howard: I might require a few minutes on this item. The subject was mentioned on the administrative item, but it is rather a sore problem on the west coast and I suppose in other areas as well. This problem has plagued the fishing industry for some time and is becoming worse. These dogfish destroy quite a number of other fish.

I wonder if the minister would indicate what the plan is for this year. What is the formula for payment and the time when this program will be put into effect? What are the expectations for the success of the program this year as compared with the success or lack of success that was experienced during the last couple of years? Perhaps at the same time—this is something that should have been dealt with under the vote relating to the fisheries research board—the minister would indicate the progress being made in research on the use of dogfish.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Last year, Mr. Chairman, we had some success in connection with the destruction of dogfish but we hope more interest will be stimulated in the program on the part of the fishermen. We are increasing the rate for livers from 10 cents to 12 cents per pound, and we are hopeful that this will make it worth while.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if the minister would care to comment on the view I have heard expressed on the coast a number of times, that the program has been started too late in the season to be of much value. It is suggested that we start it earlier in the year, and then this system might have more effect and more attraction for the fishermen who engage in it.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): This may be true in certain areas, but the fact of the matter is that this activity of destroying dogfish is only of interest to fishermen when they are not engaged in the salmon or other fishery. We have continually appealed to fishermen's organizations and to everyone involved in the industry to try to come up with the most effective plan. This is not a criticism of anyone, but we have not met with as much success as we would have liked. However, this is not the result of a lack of consultation with the people involved. We hope these difficulties can be overcome and that we will have in the future a program that really works.

Mr. Carter: I should like a little more information on this program. We have a dogfish problem in our province as well. Is this amount specified for a particular region or is it applicable to any province? On what basis is it paid; on the pound of fish caught or the pound of livers, or what?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): It is a subsidy on the liver of the dogfish at the rate of 12 cents per pound. It is true that there are dogfish on the east coast, around Newfoundland and in other areas, but not in anything like the concentration in which they occur on the west coast. The difficulty on the west coast is that in certain types of fishing the dogfish attack the fish as soon as they are in the nets, causing a great deal of destruction both to the catch and the equipment. They are a real menace to the fisherman's gear, to a much greater extent than on the east coast.

Mr. Carter: This item is only for the west coast?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is right.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Fisheries.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, before you rise I should like to express my appreciation to the members of the committee for their interest in the items and the contribution they have made in the way of constructive criticism.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

151. Departmental administration including annual contribution of $200 to the conference of commissioners on uniformity of legislation in Canada, $872,484.

The Deputy Chairman: This item will be found on page 33 of the blue book, the details at page 217.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think it has not been customary for ministers of justice to make any statement on the first item, departmental administration, but rather to answer any questions that might be raised with regard to the administration of the department. I propose to follow that course. However, if it will be of assistance to hon. members who wish to discuss specific matters I propose to make a short statement when we reach item 161, having to do with the administration of the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries. I expect to be making a sort of brief progress report on correctional reform.

Mr. Roberge: First of all, in opening the discussion on the estimates of the Department of Justice, I should like to pay our respects and to offer our compliments to both Mr. Jackett and Mr. Favreau who we know are to leave the department. As far as I know, while they were there they did a magnificent job and discharged their duties in an able manner. We on this side of the chamber want to wish them well as they enter upon their new activities. We are sure they will have in their private practice of law as much success as they had when they were senior officials of the Department of Justice.

There is one matter to which I should now like to come, and my remarks are prompted by a discussion that was held in this chamber on Monday. I refer to a question that was asked by my friend the hon. member for Vancouver East of the Minister of Justice, namely whether the necessity to increase the number of judges in the superior court in the province of Quebec was owing to the increase in criminality in that province. I am now referring to page 5654 of the French text of Hansard of Monday last, and I quote the Minister of Justice in French:

(Translation):

In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East, I regret that even with the best will in the world I cannot give a categorical answer as to why there is this fairly steady pressure for an increase in the number of judges; whether it is simply because of the increase in population or because of the increase in population accompanied by an increase in criminality.

A little further on, the minister added this:

With respect to the question, or that aspect of it dealing with criminality, the best assessment that I have been able to make is that there is not an absolute increase in criminality but that there is a proportionate increase, an increase in keeping with the increase in population, yes, and also with the increased trend toward urbanization.

(Text):

Inasmuch as the population of Canada is increasing, Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt that criminality is increasing; but that surely was not the factor accounting for the increase in the number of judges in the province of Quebec. I want to say right away that I do not think for one moment that my friend the hon. member for Vancouver East was of the opinion that criminality was worse in Quebec than anywhere else in Canada, and I am sure that thought did not enter the mind of the Minister of Justice. However, I should like to make a few remarks on that matter and show that the increase in the number of judges in Quebec was necessitated by several other factors.

It might be useful to explain generally how the courts function in Quebec, inasmuch as possibly they are not functioning in the same way as are courts in some other provinces, because the judges do not have the same functions or the same jurisdiction. First the accused are brought before a justice of the peace, a magistrate or a justice of the court of sessions of the peace. There, of course, they have a preliminary inquiry when such an inquiry is indicated, or they have their trial before the judge sitting in what we usually call the court below. The main criminal cases in the province of Quebec are tried and decided before those courts. As is the situation anywhere else in Canada, only the major crimes come before the assizes. I know for a fact that in the district of Montreal the criminal assizes are presided over by a justice of the superior court, and more often than not it is Mr. Justice Lazure, who sits in assize four times a year. Every sitting extends for a month or a month and a half. So there is only one judge in Montreal occupied by criminal courts.

In Quebec city there are normally two terms of assizes, and even there they occupy only one judge. In what I might call the rural districts around Montreal and Quebec city there is only one term of assizes every year, normally in October. I know the old district of which I was a member, the district of Arthabaska, had two years in a row when there was no assize at all. In my own district, which was formed in 1956, there has not been one since that time, which perhaps speaks well for the honesty of the people in my riding.

The main reason for this recommendation for an increase in the number of judges is not due to criminality at all. If my memory serves me well, in 1867 there were 33 judges of the superior court in the province of Quebec. Now, as the result of legislation which was passed last Monday, there are 55, not quite twice as many. The population in 1867 was less than one million but now it is over five million. So there is no doubt that the more population there is in any province or in the whole country the more court sittings there are.

The judges of the superior court in Quebec deal mostly with civil litigation. The number of cases has increased tremendously. In my own district in 1956 there were over 160 cases on the roll at the beginning of the term and the judge sits only once a month over nine months. So there is no doubt that there cases are dragging on, and it takes at least two years to have a case heard by the court after inscription on the roll.

Those cases are not necessarily dealing with property or personal damages; it is mostly litigation concerning automobile accidents. According to statistics, although I have not the figures before me, at least half the cases tried before the superior courts in the province of Quebec arose from automobile accidents, and this might be the case in some of the other provinces too. Those cases take up half the time of the judges. The rest of the cases are the ordinary sort arising from the increase in population, the increase in business and especially the increase in book debts. The more we grow the more we have to sue people because they do not pay their debts. One or other of the opposing lawyers often seeks a delay, but these cases are apt to come before the courts and they do occupy the time of the judges.

Mr. Chairman, those are the preliminary remarks I wanted to make on this first item. I might have something more to say and some questions to ask as we go along. Before I resume my seat I would like to make a request of the Minister of Justice. One of my colleagues in the official opposition wanted to speak on this first item but is now engaged on some other business. Perhaps this item might stand until he returns, and perhaps we might carry on and return to it later.

Mr. Winch: I was very pleased to hear the statement by the Minister of Justice that it is his intention when we reach the penitentiary item to make a statement in regard to the penitentiaries. I presume it will relate mostly to the corrective procedures and policies which have been adopted under the new set up of the parole board. I hope when the minister speaks he will not necessarily make his remarks brief; I hope he will take time to go into some detail and outline the situation Canada is facing in the realm of criminology.

In the most recent report of the commissioner of penitentiaries there is some very disturbing and alarming information. According to the report, which covers a period of 12 months, of those who were committed to the penitentiaries in that period of time 82.88 per cent were guilty of general recidivism. So that of the penitentiary committals in the past 12 months, 82.88 per cent had previously been either in a reformatory, in a provincial jail or in a penitentiary.

That in itself gives evidence of a very serious situation, but it is even more alarming because we note from the report that of the committals to the penitentiaries in that 12-month period—

Mr. Fulton: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to suggest that it would be more convenient, I believe to him as well as to me, if his discussion of this problem and of penal problems generally could be deferred till we reach item 161, which is the general item referring to penitentiaries and correctional measures. The staff of the penitentiaries branch are not here; therefore I would not be able to reply to the hon. member as fully as I would want. I expect we will have a discussion of penitentiaries and correctional problems on that item, so I wonder if it would not suit the hon. member's purpose if he deferred his remarks on that aspect of my responsibility until that item is reached.

Mr. Winch: I understand the statement of the minister in this regard and I quite agree with him, but unfortunately with the meetings of committees and certain other matters there is a possibility that at that particular moment I might not be able to be here. It is for that reason that I make these few remarks on the first item of the minister's estimates in an effort to indicate some of the phases upon which I know many of us would like to hear the minister when we reach the item dealing with penitentiaries.

As I was saying, of the committals to the penitentiaries in this 12-month period, 46.41 per cent have been in the penitentiary before. So they are recidivists with penitentiary experience. I would like to draw the attention of the committee to this fact, that of the 2,922 persons who were committed as recidivists with penitentiary experience, 1,423 were in the penitentiary for the second time, 760 were in the penitentiary for the third time, 366 for the fourth time, and 373 were back in the penitentiary for the fifth time or more.

Those figures as given to us in the report of the commissioner of penitentiaries indicates the very serious nature of the problem, and I would most certainly like to have as full a statement as possible from the Minister of Justice as to how this problem is being tackled and what is the policy for dealing with it which he has in mind. It is quite obvious that we have a group who are strictly of criminal tendency and who will not learn.

I must admit that I cannot understand why a person who has been in a penitentiary should decide to go back. I am one of the fortunate few who can go to a penitentiary and get out again. I often visit penitentiaries and jails, and I cannot understand why a person who has won his freedom should, by committing some criminal act, render himself liable to go back to that kind of life.

I do want to say how much I appreciate the action of the minister in attempting something new as far as British Columbia is concerned, namely the inauguration of an institution which is to some extent an open prison. I refer to the installation at William Head, and I should like to place on record two quotations from the report of the commissioner dealing with that institution because I think they give an indication that the policy which has commended itself to the minister, and which he is endeavouring to extend, may be at least a partial answer to the problem I have outlined. I note that on page 130 of the report the commissioner has this to say:

> The William Head installation is an innovation, and the consensus of opinion to date is that it has been an unqualified success. The open type installation tends to release the tension in the better type of inmate, and the ones selected for transfer to William Head have the feeling that they are trusted, and up to the present time this trust has not been misplaced. The fact that there are no walls or bars on the windows adds to the inmate's feeling of confidence and feeling that the administration have confidence in him makes him more confident in himself when he is released.

Again, on page 131, we find the following statement still in relation to the William Head installation:

> Many such transfers have taken place without untoward incident. These achievements indicate that inmates do respond to humane, considerate treatment on the part of the authorities, and it is possible to maintain firm discipline without arousing the animosity of the individual, thus taking a long step towards successful reformation and rehabilitation.

We are very pleased to note that this has been the experience and that this is the view of the authorities in charge of this experiment, if such it is. Should this be the consensus we hope there may be a statement forthcoming from the Minister of Justice as to the extension of this system, not only on the basis of the present installation at William Head but also—I think there is one at Collins Bay—

Mr. Fulton: Valleyfield and Springhill.

Mr. Winch: Oh, yes; that is the one that is going to be opened this fall, at Springhill. We do hope such institutions as these may help to provide a solution to this very serious problem of recidivism.

May I add that one of the reasons we have this general recidivism is in my opinion because we have failed so far to pay sufficient attention to after-care services. It is significant, I think, that so far this year the money we have expended on such organizations as are named in the report has amounted to only $60,000. That, it seems to me, is a remarkably small sum in the light of the seriousness of this problem.

It will not do to anticipate that as soon as a person is discharged from prison he will, as a result of the work done by the training instructors, the ministers, the doctors, the psychiatrists and the psychologists, be able to walk out of a penitentiary having the desired social conscience. Society must follow up the effort which has been made. It must take an interest in where these people go, whom they resort with and whether or not they can find employment. It is difficult enough at the present time for people who possess a social conscience and who live by the law to obtain employment. It is far more difficult for a person who has broken the law to do so.

I have found out in discussions with many who have come out of prison, and many who have gone back, that because of their weakness they gave way to temptation when after a few weeks, or a month or so, they were unable to obtain employment. The very small amount, the picayune amount, of help which they are able to get from organizations which assist prisoners after their discharge is certainly not adequate. This is particularly true with regard to the problem of those who have been incarcerated as a result of drug addiction. Greater emphasis must be placed on after care service and the following up of cases in the period after discharge.

I hope the minister will devote great attention to following up the cases of those who are discharged from our penitentiaries and seeing that they are given every assistance possible in rehabilitating themselves. In my opinion it is foolish to spend the large sums of money which are required to maintain people in our jails and penitentiaries, not only to punish them but also to try to rehabilitate them, and then, for a matter of dollars, leave them on their own with the result that we are faced with these figures demonstrating such a high degree of recidivism. If no other plan is forthcoming I hope the minister will seriously consider a system under which they could at least draw unemployment insurance so as to help them keep on the straight and narrow path. Any money spent after sentence has been completed to keep these people in line as socially conscious individuals is money well invested and will undoubtedly save a great deal more to the taxpayers of the country in the long run.

That is all I have to say on this subject at the moment. I do hope the minister will also take note of one or two other questions, and perhaps comment on them when he replies. I understand that the Department of Justice and the Department of Health and Welfare have been working sincerely and conscienciously to evolve some approach to this problem of drug addiction. It is my understanding that these studies have practically reached a conclusion, and that the minister himself regrets it is not possible for him to introduce at this session certain changes he may have in mind, because of the necessity of receiving the complete co-operation of the provincial authorities. However, I hope the minister can at least give us some indication of the nature of his new approach to the question of drug addiction, both in terms of care and of punishment should that be necessary.

There can be no question at all but that we are going to continue to be faced with this problem in Canada until we do recognize drug addiction as an illness, as something that has to be treated; and we are not going to solve it by treating drug addicts strictly as criminals. I know the minister appreciates the problem we have in Canada and particularly in British Columbia. All the reports that I have received seem to indicate that we have somewhere in the neighbourhood of between 1,500 and 2,000 drug addicts in the city of Vancouver alone. The minimum figure I have ever noticed is 1,500.

From my study of this and from the reports of those who have made a lifetime study of it —and their recent conclusions indicate this— a drug addict has to have at least three capsules of heroin a day. According to the latest figures I have received from unofficial sources, a capsule of heroin costs $5 on the Vancouver market, and sometimes $7 or $9. Therefore a drug addict requires a minimum of $15 a day for three capsules. If we have 1,500 addicts in Vancouver we have some indication of the money being spent. Since the majority of those who are drug addicts are not of the wealthy class, it is almost axiomatic that they must resort to criminal activity to obtain the money necessary to buy the drugs.

Therefore we have the problem of the addicts resorting to crime, since they must obtain a great deal of money if they are to get sufficient to buy the necessary capsules. So the question of treatment is most important. I have ideas on this, and I have mentioned them almost every time I have spoken on this subject in the house. I am not going to repeat them now, because the minister is well aware of them and because representations on this subject were made to the Senate committee when they held their meetings in the city of Vancouver. I do hope the minister has been successful in evolving a plan of such a nature that he feels fairly confident it is one in which he can get the necessary co-operation from the provincial governments in order that as soon as possible a great step forward can be made in handling this problem of drug addiction.

There is another point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister before I sit down and ask him whether it is possible to do anything about it. Over the recent weeks in particular I have been receiving complaints about the operations of so-called collection agencies. These agencies are companies that buy up the bills that are owing to business concerns for anywhere from 10 cents to 50 cents on the dollar; then they go after those who owe them money and, in my opinion, they do it in a most vicious manner and under circumstances which, because the average person is honest and wants to pay his bills, cause a great deal of hardship to those concerned. As a matter of fact they resort to practices in trying to bleed those who have not the money to pay that it almost looks to me as though they are in contempt of the law. Because of the way in which they put out their dunning letters a person who is easily frightened or does not know very much about the law would almost think he was being served with a subpoena. If it is not a subpoena, they certainly think it is some sort of legal paper and that they had better find some way of paying up or they are in real trouble.

I have one file on them. Here is the type of communication that is sent out by the credit bureau of Vancouver. If you look at the paper you will see that it looks like a subpoena right off the bat. If you look at the wording you will realize that it scares people. This is how it reads:

[Mr. Winch.]

> We have now decided to give our solicitor instruction to go ahead with court action against you, but before doing so we write you this final letter to inform you:
>
> "That a judgment is good for 20 years and a warrant of execution may be directed to the sheriff at any time thereafter requiring him to make a seizure to satisfy the claim and all costs. A judgment debtor can be made to appear before the court for examination, and garnisheeing proceedings can be taken either before or after judgment attaching moneys in the bank, salary or wages, and moneys due from other source."
> We are allowing you another three days to think it over. Please bear in mind we do not want to have this summons served. We would much rather give you a receipt.

I think after all these years I know a little bit about law and procedure, but I did not know before that a judgment is good for 20 years and that a warrant of execution may be directed to the sheriff at any time thereafter requiring him to make a seizure, garnisheeing wages, taking goods and everything else. I say this is going too far and that some kind of control should be exercised over collection agencies. I am not certain whether this comes within the legislative jurisdiction of the federal government or whether it is something that has to be handled wholly and solely on the basis of provincial jurisdiction.

I did want to draw this to the attention of the minister. It is a most serious matter right today for many thousands of people in Canada, and I know it has affected a great many people in British Columbia and particularly in the city of Vancouver. I hope the Minister of Justice can make some comment on this and state whether it is possible for federal legislative action to be taken to control these people, or whether his department can exercise any sort of inspection over their actions.

These are three of the matters that I wanted to draw to the attention of the minister under the first item. I hope my duties on committees will not make it necessary for me to be absent when the minister gives details on other items. I know the interest of the minister in penitentiaries and in the problems of my colleagues. It will mean a great deal to this country and to all of us in this committee if at this time, when his estimates are going through, the minister can give us information that will mark a real advance forward in the handling of those problems.

Mr. Jung: Mr. Chairman, I also wish to say a few words about the problem of drug addiction. I do so for two reasons. First, out of some 3,400 addicts in Canada, half are found in British Columbia and more particularly in the city of Vancouver, and most of their activities appear to centre around a certain area in my riding of Vancouver Centre.

Second, Mr. Chairman, there appears to be a growing number of juvenile addicts. In 1957, for example, there were 25 teenagers in Canada who were drug addicts. In 1958 there were 47, and in 1959 the number had increased to 55. Of the 55, 17 were males and 38 were females. British Columbia has the dubious distinction of having the majority of those teenagers, because of the figure of 17 males and 38 females, 15 of the males and 31 of the females are to be found in that province.

While I am concerned with the drug problem as it affects all addicts, I feel a special sense of responsibility toward those teenagers who are addicts. The over-all number of addicts in Canada does not show any marked increase, whereas the number of addicts who are teenagers has indicated a rise. The over-all figures show the following numbers in the years 1954 to 1959 inclusive:

Year	Number
1954	3,212
1955	3,425
1956	3,421
1957	3,315
1958	3,412
1959	3,408

It would therefore appear that apart from teenage addicts there is some tendency toward stabilization in the number of addicts.

Prior to speaking on this subject I was faced with the problem of trying to justify in my own mind whatever sums of money the government intends to spend in advancing and implementing a program of treatment for addicts. I also had to learn something about the narcotic problem. Therefore during the Easter recess this year I visited Oakalla prison farm at Vancouver where I interviewed male and female drug addicts who were serving their sentences there. I spoke to the senior prison officials at Oakalla. I had discussions with the director of the narcotic foundation in Vancouver. I spoke to a number of addicts outside of Oakalla, and when I returned to Ottawa I discussed the problem with senior officials of the R.C.M.P. and the Department of National Health and Welfare. I have read the speech on the narcotic problem which the Minister of Justice delivered to the Canadian club in Vancouver on April 20, 1960, and I have also read a number of reports and papers on this subject.

I must admit, Mr. Chairman, that prior to my research I felt that if the government were to spend large sums of money on a comprehensive program to help some 3,000 to 4,000 people, that money might well be spent on a segment of the population which was more numerous and more deserving such as, for example, our old age pensioners. After all, addicts are only a very small part of our population and, far from contributing to society, society instead has to pay for their misdeeds. None the less, after seeing and speaking to addicts I realized that most of them were people in an age group who under normal circumstances would be wage earners engaged in bringing up families and who would therefore be making a useful contribution to society. I accordingly came to the conclusion that we would justify any measure which would help to restore these people to a useful role, because in so helping to rehabilitate these people we would have to come to grips with the more basic problem of crime, namely the reasons for delinquency.

If we do not do anything about the problem of drug addiction we lose not only the contribution which these addicts might have made to society; we also have to bear the loss to the community in terms of actual dollars and cents. As an example of the financial loss to the community, which was mentioned by the previous speaker, let me illustrate the case of an addict who is faced with the problem of gratifying his craving for drugs. Heroin, which is the most popular drug for Canadian addicts, sells for approximately $5 a capsule. It might cost more or less depending on market conditions. The Vancouver Sun on March 26 of this year reported a Vancouver drug squad detective as saying that as the result of a police seizure of 91 ounces of heroin worth $1 million, small-time peddlers were afraid to go into Vancouver streets for fear of being hijacked by addicts desperate for illegal narcotics. The same detective was quoted as saying that the price of a capsule would go up from $5 when supplies started to flow again, and that as a result of the seizure known addicts were seen wandering the streets and in cafes in a certain area of Vancouver suffering withdrawal symptoms. Incidentally, the person who was found to possess the 91 ounces of heroin was sentenced to serve 14 years.

The usual daily consumption of an addict using heroin runs between five and ten capsules. Female addicts appear to get by on the minimum dosage but male addicts seem to want more and to take all they can get. But basing my calculation on the minimum figures of five capsules, this would cost the addict $25 a day. Very few people can afford this kind of money. Multiplying $25 per day by 1,797, the number of known addicts in Vancouver, we have a figure of $44,925 per day. Addicts do not have steady employment, and even if they did their wages would not be sufficient to fulfil their craving for drugs. So where does the money come from? It comes from petty thievery, from prostitution and other forms of crime.

The sum of approximately $45,000 paid out each day for illegal drugs would be bad enough, but it is a known fact that stolen goods which are disposed of through a "fence" generally bring in only a third of their true worth. In order to get $25 an addict would therefore have to steal approximately $75 worth of goods. Multiply $75 by 1,797 again, we get the figure of $134,775 per day.

I would be the first to admit, Mr. Chairman, that these are hypothetical figures. The sums I have mentioned are probably overestimated for a number of reasons, but I did want to impress upon hon. members the potential loss in terms of money. To the figures which I have given must be added the cost of keeping addicts in a penal institution. There is another loss which in my opinion is even greater and which cannot be calculated in terms of dollars and cents. I refer to the break-up of homes and the resulting unhappiness and delinquency which invariably follow such disruption.

What are we going to do about this problem? I know there have been many reports and suggestions, but I was interested to hear from the addicts themselves that they wished to be treated as medical cases and as persons in need of psychiatric treatment rather than to be treated as criminals. After all, they argue, we do not treat alcoholics as criminals unless, of course, they commit a crime while their faculties are impaired, so why should addicts be considered criminals?

Here I wish to clear up a popular misconception, namely that all drug addicts while under the influence of drugs are bent on murder, mayhem or rape. Studies indicate that the users of heroin desire only to enjoy the pleasant effects of their favourite drug in a quiet relaxed and private way. The user is so relaxed while under the influence of heroin that he probably could not punch his way out of a paper bag, and in committing theft in order to get enough money to buy drugs the addict is doing so only because stealing has been a behaviour pattern even before he started to take drugs.

In stating that they wished to be treated as medical cases rather than as criminals, the addicts themselves have expressed to me the desire to be confined in an institution which would enable them to be apart from the usual criminals and where they could also receive psychiatric help. Many of the addicts do not themselves understand the true reasons for their addiction, and I was baffled in the beginning by some of the answers I received when I asked them why they took drugs. I remember asking one girl if there was anything in her family background which might have contributed to her desire for drugs, and she replied that she came from a wealthy family; that she had all the material things she wanted, and that she had been one of the debutantes who had been introduced to society at one of the balls held in the hotel Vancouver. She could give no reason except that she liked taking heroin. I asked one of the boys why he took drugs, and he replied that he did so because he found himself the centre of interest for the girls at his school; that by being known as a drug addict he could get a girl any time he wanted.

These answers, among others, indicated to me that drug addiction might be a result and not a cause of delinquency. Most of the reports I have read and the discussions I have had support this view, and that is why I can reconcile the spending of money to help solve this basic aspect of delinquency.

It may be an oversimplification of the situation, but I do think that if we were able to assist in preventing the break-up of families; if we were able to provide more recreational facilities for our young people, and if we were able to help those who are in great financial need, we would be going a long way toward solving the whole crime problem. Granted that every person is responsible for his own behaviour, we still cannot escape the final responsibility of society to those who need help, particularly in our own communities, whether such help be financial, spiritual or moral.

Having made some study of this problem, I was delighted to read the speech which the Minister of Justice delivered on April 20, 1960 to the Canadian club in Vancouver, and in which he presented the attitude of the government toward this problem. Not only is there a sympathetic attitude but there is also in that speech the announcement of a comprehensive plan to deal with this problem. From my reading of the statement of the Minister of Justice dated May 16, 1960 I am gratified to learn that the government is taking active steps to implement, in conjunction with the provincial authorities, a program of prevention and correction.

The plan as outlined by the minister contains many of the suggestions which I received from the addicts with whom I spoke. However, I would urge that both the federal government and the provincial governments give serious thought to providing even more comprehensive psychiatric treatment. This form of treatment is very expensive, but I think it is the key to the whole program of prevention and correction. In Ontario and British Columbia, where most of the addicts are found, it might be possible, notwithstanding the division between federal and provincial responsibilities, to establish some institutions administered jointly by the two levels of government to achieve this objective of providing treatment centres. Addicts could be sent to these two major centres of treatment, and the pressure on provincial and federal institutions for accommodation might be relieved.

Finally I should like to say a few words about the maximum sentence of 14 years which can be imposed on the trafficker. I know that it is extremely difficult to arrest and convict a key person in an organization formed to distribute illegal drugs but I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the form of treatment which was used in China at one time for opium addicts might not help to stamp out or at least drastically reduce the number of pushers and traffickers. This treatment consisted of extending clemency on the first and second occasions on which an addict was arrested. He would even be offered free medical treatment on these two occasions, but if he were caught a third time he was simply taken to Peking and placed against the wall of the temple of heaven and shot. I have no direct knowledge of the effectiveness either of the treatment or the mode of treatment, but I think until such a drastic punishment is provided to deter those who would traffic in drugs purely for monetary gain, we shall always have a problem on our hands.

Once again I should like to congratulate the Minister of Justice upon his announced intention of introducing a comprehensive plan to deal with the problem of drug addiction in Canada. With the federal government showing the way, I hope the provincial governments will find it possible to enter into an early agreement with the federal government on those matters which fall under provincial jurisdiction, so that we may get started on a program which has been long overdue.

Mr. Chevrier: I intend to make my remarks brief, but before mentioning the two matters I should like to discuss this afternoon I may say that the committee listened with interest to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as well as the hon. member for Vancouver East. These are problems which are complex and difficult, and I know that all of us sympathize with the minister and his department in their efforts to find a solution for a matter of this kind.

I rose to deal briefly, as I said, not with a specific matter such as the one to which reference has been made but a matter which is general in its nature. I remember that not so very long ago Bishop Fulton Sheen, in opening one of his telecasts which unfortunately are not seen any longer on the C.B.C., had this to say, that crime in the United States has attained alarming proportions. Did you know that every 40 minutes in that country there was a murder; that the crime of rape took place every 30 minutes; that a theft took place every 7 minutes; that armed robbery took place every 1 minute and that at every 2.4 seconds of the day an automobile was stolen? These are indeed revealing statistics. While I do not know what the statistics are for our own country, I presume that on a proportional basis there would be some resemblance to them.

What prompts me to rise now is this. What is there that can be done by those of us who sit in this house, by the Department of Justice and the officers of the department, to remedy a situation which is attaining alarming proportions in the country, particularly in the areas in which there is a concentration of population? Of course the main answer lies in education and in the development and building of character. For that I am sure the minister and this house have no responsibility.

What else can be done? It may be that the minister will be able to enlighten the committee in this respect, and knowing him as I do I am sure he will not deal with this subject other than in an objective way, which is the manner in which I propose to deal with it now. I have no answer to the problem which seems to be aggravating itself and which is not the sole responsibility of a department, let alone a minister. It is the result of a set of circumstances, of the world in which we live and of so many reasons that I would not be living up to the statement I made earlier that I intended to speak briefly if I were to go into all of those reasons.

I think now of the great metropolitan area of Montreal, and I come quickly to what I have in mind.

I wonder whether any consideration has been given by the department to removing to outlying areas a penitentiary which lies in that city. From the information that I have been able to obtain and from conversations I have had with members of the bar and of the judiciary, that factor seems to be perhaps one of the many reasons for the increase in crime. That consideration may apply elsewhere; I do not know. I do not even know that it applies in the city of Montreal. But from judges who sit on cases in the city of Montreal I have been told that when parole is granted to hardened criminals who have been in these institutions they find themselves coming out in the same environment as that in which they found themselves when they were convicted of a former crime; and the temptation is so great that they go on and commit similar offences again. Would it not be advisable and profitable for the state to build these institutions—about which I will have more to say on another vote—outside of these great centres? Perhaps the minister might deem it advisable to say something on that score later on.

The other matter I wanted to bring to his attention was this; and again I am sure he will take it, inasmuch as it is critical, with the good grace with which he generally takes other comments. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police of late have been making statements which in my opinion were not of a police or judicial nature.

Mr. Fulton: I wonder whether I could suggest to my hon. friend that I think it would be more to his interest and to mine if his discussion could be deferred until we reach the first item under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, at which time I will have the officers of the police here and will be able to reply more fully and directly to what the hon. member may say.

Mr. Chevrier: I have no objection to doing that, Mr. Chairman. However, I was just going to make one statement and resume my seat. As the minister knows, I have the right to deal with this matter on the first item and I am not going to be lengthy. The only point I was raising was this. I need not tell the minister that I have the greatest respect for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. However, in the matter of the Chinese immigration cases it seemed to me that perhaps the public statements which were made, particularly those on television, were not the kind that should be made by an independent body such as the R.C.M.P. I wonder whether, either on this general vote or when we come to the more particular vote, the minister would not give his comments on this matter and on the earlier matter which I raised.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, last year the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) introduced a resolution in this house for the purpose of defining section 150 of the Criminal Code, dealing with obscene publications. That bill had long been awaited by a great number of Canadians. The Minister of Justice is well acquainted with this problem, since he played an important part in the Senate investigation of 1952-53.

At this stage of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, allow me to quote an excerpt from the August 1959 issue of the publication Relations:

> Let us not assume that the new legislation will be a cure-all. It will prove an effective instrument for those judges who are anxious to improve social environment. This means a great deal. It will be left to them to decide whether the dominant characteristic of an incriminated publication is obscene, whether the author is unduly exploiting violence and sex. Obviously, their education and turn of mind will affect their judgments. So will the general attitude of the people. In this field, more than in any other perhaps, legislation no matter how well conceived, can be effective only with the courageous and continued support of high-minded people. Mr. Fulton is to be commended for his new legislation, and the firm and straightforward support he is getting from all the people.

The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) rightly said a moment ago that a wave of crime is now sweeping over the whole North American continent. This increase is probably due in great part to filthy publications. Therefore, I wish to denounce publicly and strongly certain most objectionable material that is being published, printed, and then distributed by a great many newsstands in the province of Quebec, and surely in some parts of Ontario too. The following list was issued by the national federation of the Holy Name society:

> 1. For the peace of their conscience, Christians must not sell, buy or read the following weeklies.
> 2. Municipalities must prohibit their sale within their jurisdiction.
> 3. Organizations must caution their members against them.
> 4. Those weeklies are objectionable because > of their pictures and writings on sex, S;
> of their crime stories, C;
> of their gossip, G.
> As the case may be, they are marked by the signs: "S" or "C" or "G".

Mr. Chairman, here is the list of those obscene publications, harmful to the morals of young people and of the population:

Allo Police; Bouffon; Chameau; L'Echo; Flash; Le Fou-rire; Hush; Ici Montréal; Jackie; Joker; Jour et Nuit; Midnight; Nouvelles et police judiciaire; La Pie; Rigolade; Le Trou de la serrure.

I denounce the publishers, printers and distributors who are responsible in great part for juvenile delinquency.

In the first list, issued in February 1958, there were 30 papers, nine of which no longer exist. In the second list, issued on May 23, 1958, there were 25 papers, thirteen of which are no longer published. The third list contains the 16 papers that I have just named, and I hope that all of them will cease publication. I strongly urge municipal authorities and police, Catholic and Protestant organizations, to join in denouncing those publications and in alerting the authorities concerned so that people responsible for this situation may be brought before the courts.

In conclusion, I wish to refer to papers of May 12, 1960 and especially to Le Devoir—

I know that La Presse mentioned it also—where Cardinal Leger is reported to have said to Holy Name societies:

> The fight against obscene publications must go on unremittingly.

It must be waged by all social classes, by all those who want morality to be respected and who want to eradicate obscene publications. And, after the hon. member for Laurier, I would remind you that a wave of criminality is now sweeping the North American continent, and I repeat, perhaps the main cause of it is that bad literature.

I wanted to take this opportunity to denounce bad literature and ask all honest and responsible people to see that people responsible for such a tragic situation are brought before the courts.

Mr. Paul: I would be remiss, Mr. Chairman, if I were to delay unduly the business of the house, but I believe this is the right opportunity to congratulate, first of all, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) for the excellent news he gave the Canadian people on or about June 15 of last year, when he informed us that his department would introduce a bill to modify the Bankruptcy Act which was enacted as far back as 1949.

The present Bankruptcy Act has become a disgrace for every businessman and the people in general. It is surprising to note the growing number of bankruptcies, but we may not stop to find out the main reasons for those business failures or why debtors are led to defraud—and I stress that word—to defraud their creditors.

Unfortunately, there are too many public trustees—and when I say that, I would like to exclude the public trustees of the judicial districts of Three Rivers or Joliette, with whom I have had many transactions with regard to the administration of the Bankruptcy Act—but unfortunately too many public trustees are seeking insolvent debtors, or people struggling with their creditors—and urging them to assign their property or chattels, often demanding up to a thousand dollars to free those debtors of all liability towards their creditors under the present provisions of the Bankruptcy Act.

I know, sir, that particular attention will be brought to the various recommendations that will be submitted to you by the various organizations, by the Canadian Bar Association, and by the various rural bar associations. However, may I suggest or, at least, call the attention of relevant officials in your department to the fact that there should be, first of all, a change in the definition now found in section 2, paragraph (n) of the Bankruptcy Act, where the legislator defines the expression: "insolvent person" as meaning someone who owes a thousand dollars or more. That provision, which was applicable and appropriate in 1949, has now become entirely unjustified, and I think that it would be much more fitting to impose more costly terms on those who, through dishonesty, fraud or otherwise, too often hide behind the provisions of the legislation now in effect to cheat with impunity creditors who had trusted them in their capacity of business or professional men.

I also would be remiss not to commend the minister for his attitude with regard to the numerous public trustees who lack honesty in the exercise of their profession. I know the appropriate officers of your department are continuing their investigation to halt this bankruptcy threat, this tremendous surge of debtors who today assign their property not in the interest of their creditors but to protect the possessions they have accumulated, and make use of the act to gratify their greed and demands.

I think an excellent suggestion might be to amend section 20 and require any debtor wishing to assign his property to appear before a proper judge, perhaps of the superior court, and state the reasons forcing him to assign his property. After an investigation which might be conducted by the judge, the judge alone would decide when and under what conditions the debtor could file a petition in bankruptcy. At that time, the judge, on the basis of his investigation and of the facts as ascertained by him, would be in a position either to refuse or grant to the debtor authorization to file a petition in bankruptcy.

Unfortunately, under the present provisions of the act—I would not want to appear in any way to be casting aspersions on the decisions our judges have rendered so far—judges are too generous, that is to say, they tend to be too soft in discharging debtors of their debts.

I think the provisions of section 130 should be amended to provide that no debtor can be discharged unless he has paid at least 50 per cent of what he owes his creditors.

Moreover, the Bankruptcy Act should contain a provision barring any debtor from being discharged of a debt arising out of a misdemeanour or a technical offence. Too often today—in the province of Quebec, for instance, and probably elsewhere—a debtor having to meet obligations arising out of a rather costly judgment for liability in an automobile accident, easily avoids his liability by filing a petition in bankruptcy and then obtaining his release, thus being dispensed from the necessity of abiding by the provisions of the judgment, and, too often, unfortunately, to the detriment of a widow or orphans.

I know, Mr. Minister, that in due course, you will introduce a bill to remedy such a situation, one which has lasted too long, so that honest people who, in the pursuit of their business, meet with difficulties that prevent them from honouring their obligations, may avail themselves of the provisions of that new bankruptcy act, but also in order that dishonest debtors who are taking advantage of the provisions of the present act to defraud their creditors, may not find an easy refuge to satisfy their greed and hang on to their property.

Furthermore, I think it would benefit the Canadian economy if the provisions of that act were amended so as to provide more rigorous restrictions designed to put an end to present abuses.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have three matters to raise briefly on this first item but I shall rise on three different occasions so that the subjects will not become merged in the minister's mind. First of all I want to express my appreciation at the courtesy and attention the minister has given to any question I have brought to his notice and for his promptness on all occasions.

Before proceeding with my few brief remarks I want to express my support for the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East and my admiration for the way he has carried on over a period of 25 years his work and interest, and his attention particularly to those unfortunate persons who use narcotics and those who require rehabilitation after imprisonment. In British Columbia the work he has done in that respect is recognized by members of all parties and I think it is only right to bring that to the attention of the committee now.

I am now bringing to the attention of the minister a question which has been brought to my attention by a number of persons, one person in particular through correspondence and others who have discussed the matter with me in my office who are concerned with the administration of justice. They charge that there is illegal confinement and treatment of prisoners in Bordeaux jail. I raise this on the minister's estimates because I understand that according to the revised statutes of 1952 the Governor General is held responsible for any injustice suffered by any person in Canada, and if that is correct then I presume there is a degree of responsibility on the part of the minister.

The great philosopher Justinian said that justice is the constant and perpetual wish to render to every man his due. Because I am fully confident that the minister agrees with that statement wholeheartedly I also raise a matter which has been discussed over the radio of Quebec, in television programs and elsewhere. On October 30 last there was a very interesting article in La Presse entitled: "The Minister of Health Promises to Correct the Abnormal Situation in One Year." That has to do with what is termed the scandal at Bordeaux. I just wish to quote briefly a paragraph or two from correspondence which I have received in order to bring the matter to the attention of the committee. This is from a letter which I received from a gentleman on November 10, 1959 of this year. He says:

> I am enclosing a clipping from La Presse of Friday, October 30. This is a story of another person whom they had incarcerated without a hearing in Bordeaux jail for a mental examination, and for three years certain persons who have become interested have been trying to get him out since he has never been properly examined by a psychiatrist, and no evidence has ever been given that he was unbalanced.

Then on May 30, the same person wrote to me as follows:

> About a month ago you wrote you were going to question the minister regarding this case of the man who had been in Bordeaux for five years without ever appearing in court. I was wondering what the result of the questioning was. Nothing has been done here since I last wrote.

I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and would like his comment with respect to the case. I have quite a voluminous correspondence in connection with this subject. Two or three other persons from Montreal have sent me letters in connection with it, and they feel very disturbed about it.

Finally, I have another case I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and to explain it I will just quote from a newspaper cutting dated January 15 which appeared in the Montreal Star. It is headed: "Court Frees Girl Held Three Weeks", and reads:

> A 16-year old girl was liberated yesterday by a sessions court judge of a charge of obstructing the course of justice, stemming from a shooting last October in a St. Antoine street rooming house.

Said Judge M. A. Blain in freeing the slight, pale-faced girl: "I have looked into the evidence carefully and I feel certain that no jury would convict on the evidence produced. You are liberated . . ."

When the preliminary hearing started Tuesday, defence lawyer Clair Barrette claimed the girl had been kept in jail since her arrest more than three weeks ago and had not been arraigned within the 24-hour delay prescribed by law.

Judge Blain ordered police prosecutors present to see to it that the law was observed to the letter in such matters. This was promised.

I simply put this on record so that the minister may be in possession of this information with respect to this girl who apparently did not receive justice according to the criminal law of this country. Then again there is the case of the incarceration in Bordeaux of the person I mentioned, and I may add that another person who spoke to me told me there were nine or ten similar cases.

That is all I have to say at this time, though I may rise again to deal with other matters in the course of the discussion.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of speaking on this matter, since it has already been dealt with, but in so doing, I think I shall be in order.

It seems that the minister has been informed of some happenings in one or many cases, at Bordeaux jail, not far from Montreal. Those cases were set out in detail in a book written by Jacques Hebert, in the bill of rights series, and entitled: "Scandal at Bordeaux".

In his book, the author has a word of approval for the minister.

I do not intend to speak at great length on this matter. However—

Mr. Valade: Ours is a sound policy.

Mr. Chevrier: However, I think it is in the common interest to know that an injustice was done to one individual, and perhaps to many others.

At the beginning of that book, which came out in 1959, appears the following:

A teenager has been rotting in prison for 924 days.

And the author repeats:

924 days,—924 days, without knowing why.

He is not serving a sentence, has never been sentenced. and has not even been brought before a judge.

The author goes on, describing conditions prevailing there.

He got in touch with the person concerned, whom I shall not name, and obtained the data for his book.

It therefore appears that, in Canada, an individual may spend a certain time in prison without his case being brought to court and without preliminary inquiry, and, moreover, without knowing why he is imprisoned.

Mr. Chairman, that is a rather unique situation, you will admit. I am not blaming the minister, for it was the author's design to draw his attention to that situation without reproaching him for it. Besides, I shall be reading, in a minute, his opinion of the minister.

On page 12 we find the following:

Even if that scandal were the only one—"But it is not the only one" . . .

. . . there are hundreds of them in the prisons and mental institutions of the province of Quebec. Human beings, sons of the Catholic Church, British subjects, Canadian citizens, they are brothers to all men who are being mocked, humiliated, persecuted and unjustly detained in the dungeons of Budapest, Madrid, Ciudad Trujillo or Vladivostok. And they are our own brothers, those who suffer most, those whom abbé Pierre insists must be served first.

The book goes on to recite facts which, astonishingly, are taking place here in Canada.

On page 142, there is a reference to the minister. I quote:

However, it seems obvious to me that one of the most acute problems, one which lies at the basis of several others, is the overcrowded condition of our penitentiaries in general and of Bordeaux jail in particular.

At the federal level, Hon. Davie Fulton himself has denounced the scandal and announced a rigorous program which, within two years, should put an end to it. At the provincial level the scandal is infinitely more spectacular, but government authorities remain inactive and consider the matter as taboo. And yet, a newspaper generally in sympathy with the present regime dared write, only a few months ago:

Then follows a description of a situation I would not like to record in Hansard, because it refers to the appalling conditions that exist there: Overcrowding, unsatisfactory hygienic conditions.

Those two points deserve the attention of the authorities. The minister has probably received a copy of the book and, on reading parts of it, must have realized what inhuman conditions are imposed upon the prisoners.

We know that the minister is sympathetic and is aware of the basic nature of the problem.

He is frequently in touch with the various attorneys general. We know that as Minister of Justice, he wants to heed the conclusions of the Fauteux report. In fact, so far he has followed many of its recommendations.

However, because of present conditions, may I be allowed to urge the minister and his officials not only to read the book again but especially to fully grasp the nature of the conditions to which prisoners are subjected at Bordeaux jail.

While it is true that since the book came out, and even before that, the governor of the jail introduced certain improvements, the fact remains that, in spite of those improvements, the situation is serious indeed, and to the extent where the minister can and must remedy that shocking situation, I urge him to do so.

Mr. Paul: Would the hon. member allow me—

(Text):

The Chairman: The hon. member for Stormont.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Laurier allow me a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Certainly.

Mr. Paul: Since the book in question refers to convictions and prison terms meted out without any trial, is any mention made by the author of the imprisonment in 1941, of the former mayor of Montreal, Camillien Houde, and of Adrien Arcand, and of a number of other Quebec citizens who were jailed without being brought to trial?

Mr. Valade: Under the Liberal administration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I am being asked a question and subjected to a speech at the same time, I hope you will not mind my answering along the same lines.

Mr. Pigeon: You cannot do it.

Mr. Chevrier: As to conditions prevailing in time of war, legislation had been enacted for the protection of the country—

An hon. Member: Apologize.

Mr. Valade: Democracy.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have no apologies to offer, especially not to the members who are questioning me at this time.

As to offences against laws adopted during the war, those laws were in force, and surely anyone who transgressed them must have expected to take the consequences.

But what I am referring to at this time is that for 924 days, a man has been kept in jail without any charge being laid, without knowing what it was all about, and without being allowed to have the services of a lawyer to take his defence. Therefore, I feel the circumstances are such that they should at least be drawn to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), so that he may launch an investigation.

(Text):

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, sir; the hon. gentleman has just made an accusation.

(Translation):

I shall now use French in addressing the hon. member who stated that this shocking situation existed in the province of Quebec.

Would the hon. member deny, or does he not know, that the attorney general of the province of Quebec, the Hon. Antoine Rivard—

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not see a point of order.

Mr. Valade: I want to make it clear because the solicitor general of the province of Quebec has denied in the newspapers the charges made by the hon. member for Laurier.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Stormont.

Mr. Chevrier: I was going to raise a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair will hear the point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: What my hon. friend has been bringing to the attention of the committee is not a point of order, and he has entirely misunderstood what I have been saying. I have been bringing to the attention of the minister what is contained in this document. I have not made these words mine and therefore the point of order raised by the hon. gentleman is entirely irregular. He is accusing me of making these statements. I am putting on the record what is contained in this volume and I am asking the Minister of Justice to take cognizance of it. That is what I am doing. If the facts are true and in accordance with what is contained here, certainly an investigation should be made.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a brief plea on behalf of judges' salaries but prior to doing that may I congratulate and commend the minister and his department on the improvements in the penal system which he has initiated and which will be of great benefit to this country and long remembered after he and every member in this house will have left for that country from which no man has ever returned.

I think it is very interesting that in England about 100 years ago, the country from which our common law is derived, at a time when doctors were in the same economic position and were considered to be in the class of barbers, judges, as soon as they were appointed, were immediately made law lords with all the prerogatives and privileges that were involved in that status. I think it is indisputable that since then both the doctors and the barbers have tended to inhabit the earth while the comparative status of judges, economically and socially, has progressively tended to decline. I think their condition has been deteriorating over a period of say 50 years and I think it is notoriously difficult today to get lawyers of the first order, leading lawyers, to become judges despite the honour involved, because there is a tremendous financial sacrifice connected with the position. In many instances they would be obliged to accept about one quarter, perhaps, of what they had been accustomed to in the way of income. It is obvious that the administration of law and order is the basis of any society; it is the whole basis of any civilized society and it is of the utmost importance that we have the finest and most able men available in the country on the bench. There is no job of greater importance than that of our judges.

When the ordinary citizen goes before the courts his respect and attitude toward law and order and toward government is largely determined by the fairness and the objectivity of the hearing that he gets from the judges at various levels. It is also commonplace that judges daily are called upon to adjudicate matters involving millions of dollars. If those same judges are preoccupied with maintaining their livelihood they cannot give the detachment that is required to their onerous duties.

There is also one other aspect which I mentioned at another time in the house. We tend to be living in a materialistic age where there appears to be a price tag on everything. Often a man's worth tends, unfortunately, inevitably, to be judged more on his income than on anything else. If that is so, and I think it is substantially true, it puts our judges in an unfair and untenable position.

I reiterate, it is essential that we have the best men available on the bench and we must offer sufficient inducement so they can be attracted to this most honourable position and, having attained this position, they should be relieved of the mundane cares and there should be nothing to deprive them of their integrity and objectivity.

As I have mentioned before, I think the same thing applies to members of parliament and members of government as to judges. Neither those on the bench nor those in this house, because of inadequacy of income, should ever degenerate into the position where the bench or this house would be a rich man's club or the refuge of the destitute.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make a few brief remarks on a number of subject matters in which I have interest, one of which, of course, is being discussed in the banking and commerce committee at the moment. Perhaps this will be to a degree restricted to the things that may be engaged in by the combines investigation branch.

I should like to make reference to the question of penal institutions, the attitude of the minister with respect to penitentiaries and penology, and to express appreciation of the forward looking view that the minister has on these questions. At one time not too many years ago the view held was that incarceration in a penitentiary was purely a method or form of punishment and nothing else. The view was that if a person committed a crime and was convicted what would accrue to him would be punishment and that was all, that punishment was an end in itself.

But there has been a change in this attitude over the years, a change that is still under way. I think more people are coming to the point of view that we should concern ourselves more with the after-effects of a penitentiary sentence rather than just thinking in terms of getting someone out of the way because he or she has committed a particular crime. The changing of our thinking toward rehabilitating people who have been convicted of crimes and the bending of our efforts toward reformation need to be strenghtened from time to time, and I think we continually have to work toward that goal.

The reformation and rehabilitation process takes place in two fields. One is while the inmate is in the penitentiary and the other is after the inmate is released on parole or under some other arrangement. In the latter case after-care agencies are involved whose aim is to ensure that the person gets back into the social structure and remains outside of the penitentiary for the rest of his life. However, there is an obstacle in the way of dealing effectively with the rehabilitative or reformative process and that obstacle lies in the penitentiaries themselves.

The minister has made the comment a number of times that he is thoroughly conversant and familiar with the overcrowding in our penitentiaries. He has visited them and seen the situation, as have other members.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. member whether he does not consider that discussion would be better served if matters having to do with penitentiaries and correctional reform were deferred until we reach item 161? I intend to make a general statement on our penal reform program and on the present situation in the penitentiaries on that item. I had hoped that we could confine the present item to a general discussion of the Department of Justice itself and have a general discussion of penitentiaries on item 161 and a general discussion of the R.C.M.P., if desired, on the first item under that heading.

Mr. Howard: Certainly I do not mind. The minister will appreciate that I was absent when discussion of these estimates started because the banking and commerce committee was meeting. I do not mind doing so at all. In fact, I think it would perhaps be a better way to approach the matter. We always look upon the administration item as one affording an opportunity for a far-ranging debate on all phases of the work of the department. I would be glad to defer my remarks about penitentiaries until we reach that item. In the light of past practice I had come to the conclusion that the minister, as other ministers are wont to do, had made general opening remarks covering the subject matter but if that is not the case perhaps it would be better for me to delay my remarks until I can relate them to what the minister has to say on the subject.

Mr. Fulton: It might be interesting to give the reason why I have suggested two or three times this afternoon that this pattern of discussion should be followed, namely that penitentiaries should be dealt with under item 161 and the R.C.M.P. under item 372. The position actually is that the department constituted under the Department of Justice Act has a deputy minister as the senior administrative officer and when the first item we are now on, 151, is called, the deputy minister and the departmental officials attend. The penitentiaries branch has as its senior administrative officer the commissioner of penitentiaries who actually has the status of a deputy minister, and when that item is reached it is the practice for the commissioner of penitentiaries to come here with other officials to assist me in the discussion. The senior official of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the commissioner whose position is created by statute and therefore the commissioner attends here with his officers when that item is reached.

In my recollection that has been the general pattern of discussion and it seems to me that the best way of enabling me to deal with the questions and comments made by hon. members is if they will raise them in that order. The hon. member for Vancouver East did point out that he wanted to make some remarks about penitentiaries because he had to leave the house and might not be back, but I think I will defer replying to his comments until we reach the penitentiaries item.

May I attempt to deal briefly with what has been said by hon. members who have spoken on this item. I can assure the hon. member for Megantic that I appreciate, as do the deputy minister and one of the assistant deputies who are leaving the department, his comments, with which I fully agree, our views and our regrets having already been expressed by the Prime Minister when he announced the resignations. Although I know he is going to be embarrassed and that one does not usually mention civil servants individually, I think under these circumstances I may be permitted to indulge in an exception which proves the rule and point out that it is perhaps appropriate that the last official act of my deputy minister is to be here on the floor of the house when the estimates of the Department of Justice are under consideration. I think it is appropriate and fitting somehow that on his last day of service with the department he should be in the House of Commons with the minister dealing with matters with which he is so familiar and in the shaping of which he has played such a large and valuable part.

The hon. member next dealt with the question of the reason for the increase in the number of judges in the Montreal district. I think he will agree with me that since there was a reasonably full discussion of that matter when the Judges Act amendments were before us it is not appropriate for me to go into any detail on that subject. I think the discussion has been full indeed. I appreciate the interest of the hon. member in raising the matter at this time, his concern being mainly to make the point that the increase in criminality in the province of Quebec is certainly no greater than anywhere else. That, of course, was recognized although I did point out that the increase in a certain type of crime, crimes of violence, is causing the greatest concern to the authorities in Montreal and properly so.

The hon. member for Vancouver East dealt with a number of items that mainly concern the penitentiaries branch but he did discuss the question of narcotics. He raised the question of what should be the general approach to the narcotic problem and asked me to outline the point we have reached in the shaping of a new policy, to which I have myself referred on a number of occasions. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre also discussed narcotics in a constructive and obviously well informed and thoughtful manner. Perhaps I could say a word or two about that subject at this time.

As I announced recently, we have now been able to advance our studies to the point where a new government policy for dealing with the problem of the criminal narcotic addict has been worked out. This policy has been approved by the cabinet and inasmuch as it involves, necessarily if it is to be fully implemented and serve the useful purpose which we hope it will serve, the co-operation of the provinces, the authority was also given to have the officials of my department communicate with the provincial officials for preliminary discussions. This has been done in the case of British Columbia recently when informal discussions were held with the deputy attorney general of that province. An outline of the approach and of the policy was left with him, and we expect and hope shortly to be hearing from British Columbia about arrangements for further positive and constructive discussions.

I expect shortly to be making arrangements for the initial approach to the other provinces mainly concerned, that is the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I outlined in a release accompanying the announcement of policy the broad terms of our approach. I think perhaps it would be appropriate for me to mention them here also.

It is our conclusion that although the number of criminal addicts in Canada is not in itself large, about 3,500, and although the number has been constant as was indicated by the figures put on the record by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, nevertheless this is one of the greatest single instances of social waste that one could imagine. My information is that of this number of addicts, at any one time about one third of them are in the process of going through our penal institutions, and although the number does not increase it is a sort of constantly revolving flow. This seems to prove two things, at least: first, that there is this situation, an unsupportable social waste, the details of which will be too obvious to need elaboration; second, and perhaps more important, that the methods we are now following in dealing with the problem, by punishing addicts and then releasing them at the end of their sentence to re-enter the stream, is completely useless when looked at from the point of view of whether we are curing the evil. Obviously, we are not even beginning to deal with it.

We came to the conclusion, therefore, that a new approach was necessary. Instructions were given to the officials of my department, together with those of welfare, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the penitentiaries branch, to work out a new approach which might have more hope of providing a constructive answer to this problem. The approach which they have now worked out, and which we have approved in principle in so far as the federal responsibility is concerned, is based on two main principles; first, on treatment while in custody and, second, on supervision after release.

In the past there has been, at least in federal institutions, no real attempt to treat the narcotic addict in so far as what might be described as his medical situation is concerned; no attempt to cure him of his addiction. There is, of course, withdrawal and complete separation from narcotics while in the penitentiary, but no real program of attempting to find the medical causes and cures, if any, for that tendency to addiction from which he suffers. This, therefore, will be one of the changed elements in the federal program for the treatment of narcotic offenders when that program is worked out.

First, there will be provision made for treatment while in custody and, second,—although this is perhaps not a startlingly new approach—there should be segregation in special type institutions while undergoing the treatment. This segregation of narcotic addicts from other types of criminals will have more than one advantage. It minimizes at least, indeed should end, the danger of contamination of non-addicts by criminal addicts, while at the same time providing a scientifically designed centre for the treatment of addicts in so far as they are capable of treatment in the medical and psychological sense.

I come then to the question of what should be done with the addicts after they have served their sentences. This brings me to the second main division of the new approach. It is my understanding that the weight of medical evidence shows that it is never safe to regard a narcotic addict as completely cured. This fact will of course not minimize the efforts we are going to make to treat him effectively while in custody.

It seems to us that one of the great weaknesses of the present method of handling this problem is that the criminal narcotic addict, sometimes a man with a long history of addiction, is discharged from the penitentiary and apart from the ordinary efforts that may be made by after-care agencies to assist him in finding employment, and so on, there is no special post-release supervision. It is our view that this is a definite lack, and as long as it continues there will be a gap in the program. If it is a fact that a narcotic addict can never be safely regarded as completely cured; he is always going to have a tendency to yield to temptation and return to his addiction. If we could, by a program of post-discharge supervision, both encourage the addict to go straight as well as supervise his habits, we could help him to keep away from narcotics.

It is our view, accordingly, that the law should make provision for a lengthy period of supervision after the termination of his sentence. This will have two effects. First, it will, I hope, give the man a sense that he is not alone; that he has not been discharged and left to his own resources to resist the temptation to return to addiction. There is somebody there to whom he can turn for help in resisting this tendency. Second, it will serve the obviously useful purpose of providing somebody to counsel and assist the man in finding suitable employment and also assist him in meeting some of the problems to which perhaps the narcotic addict is especially exposed, problems of a psychological as well as a physical nature.

These are the two main principles of the new approach, the new emphasis on treatment and segregation while in the institution and on supervision after release into society. There are a number of other minor and consequential changes which will follow. For instance, in line with the same sort of thinking as was expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, namely, that the drug trafficker should also have his sentence suit the circumstances of his crime, it would be our proposal to amend the act so that a life sentence might be imposed even for the first offence; I refer not to a mandatory life sentence but to a provision that there could be a sentence of imprisonment for life even on the first offence. That will depend, of course, on the circumstances and the nature of the crime.

I have mentioned our feeling that for the complete success of our narcotic program it is essential to have the full co-operation of the provinces. The reason for that is this. We can deal with the narcotic addict only when he is a criminal and after he has been convicted of a criminal offence. That is the only circumstance in which the federal authority has jurisdiction. We may be successful —and I certainly hope and believe that we shall be—in the new program when we have it implemented. Again I must caution that these things cannot be done over night. It is going to take time. We must provide new institutions or new types of institutions, for one thing. However, when we get it going it is our belief that we will be successful in dealing with the problem of the addict after he has become a criminal and with the problem of treating him and then giving him a chance to return and live a useful life in society.

But that will be dealing with only half the problem because it does not touch the problem of the person who is an addict without being a criminal; nor does it touch the problem of the person who is of that physical or psychological nature which makes him likely to be an addict; and it does not touch the problem of helping him not to become an addict. This problem can, in fact, be tackled only by the provincial authorities because they are the ones who have jurisdiction in cases of that type. We would therefore be dealing as a nation with only half of the problem if it is dealt with only on the basis of the approach to the criminal narcotic addict.

While the problem of the criminal narcotic addict is a grave one and, in so far as the individual is concerned, a terrible one, it is in a sense if not a part, perhaps an outgrowth of another and perhaps even larger problem, namely the problem of delinquency. Studies that have been made over the years have convinced my officials that it can safely be said of the generality of the criminal narcotic addicts that they are delinquents first and addicts second because in the vast majority of cases there is a history of delinquency, and usually juvenile delinquency, before there is a history of criminal narcotic addiction; that is to say, the history of one man shows that he was first a juvenile delinquent before he became a criminal narcotic addict.

This matter relates to the problem of increasing criminality mentioned by the hon. member for Laurier and upon which I might say a word or two in a moment. But we are now dealing with the special aspect of that problem related to delinquency. Again, the federal government does not acquire jurisdiction until some crime is committed. The authorities having the most immediate approach and opportunity are, of course, the home, the school and the church—they are the ones who first come into contact with young people—supplemented as they should be by the efforts of municipal and provincial governments to create moral and ethical training and physical environment which will go a long way toward preventing delinquency and, where it does not prevent it, then toward dealing with the problem of delinquency.

There is also the question of how to deal with the person who becomes an addict but has not yet been convicted of it and therefore is not what I call a criminal addict. As I have said, we do not get jurisdiction until he is convicted and is a criminal addict or a criminal and an addict. The only people who can deal with this problem again are the provinces. It is our view that there should be centres to which persons who are addicts but are not criminals may be committed for treatment. Again, only the provinces have the jurisdiction and the authority to provide these centres and to provide, by legislation or otherwise, the circumstances under which a person may be committed to those centres for treatment or assistance.

In summary, then, our approach is that we believe there should be a program in the federal jurisdiction of treatment in segregation and treatment in custody and supervision and care after release from custody. We believe that within the provincial field there should be a program of institutions to which a man may be committed for treatment even before he becomes a criminal and where he may be encouraged to end his addiction in order that he may have a better chance of leading a non-criminal life. Indeed, over and above that concrete type of program—I refer to the institutional types of programs—we believe there should be greater emphasis on those measures necessary to prevent and to deal with the problem of delinquency so as to prevent criminality before it is too late.

The Chairman: Shall vote 151 carry?

Mr. Fulton: I really had just concluded my statement dealing with narcotics. There were a number of other matters that were dealt with and I think I would be discourteous if I did not refer to them.

The hon. member for Laurier mentioned the problem of growing criminality generally. What I have said in connection with the problem of narcotics I think covers that field at least as fully as I am capable of covering it. It is partly a moral problem. It involves the ethics of all levels of society including the parent, the home, the school, the church, the educational institutions, the provincial institutions and what we can do by way of treatment, et cetera in criminal institutions. But federal jurisdiction arises only after the crime has been committed. In connection with the comment of the hon. member for Laurier that there was some concern lest the growing criminality in points like Montreal was owing to the fact that the penitentiary was in close proximity to the city, I must say that it does not seem to me to be well taken. Discharged criminals just like free persons will inevitably tend to go back to those places where they feel most at home; and even if we removed the penitentiary from Montreal, we are obliged to return a prisoner to the place from which he came, the place at which he was convicted or in special cases to some other place if he says that he wants to go some other place. I therefore do not think the removal of a penitentiary physically from Montreal would make any difference in that regard.

Then the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere dealt with the problem of bankruptcy administration generally and with one or two particular features of it. I should like to assure him at the outset that I appreciate greatly what he said and I think he put his finger squarely on the problem when he described the evil represented by the type of unethical trustee who will solicit estates, say, on this basis; you pay me $500 or $1,000 and I can get you discharged from all your debts; you will be scot-free from then on, and you can go back into business again. This, of course, is the root of the problem. I regret that we have a number of trustees who carry on in that way. It has taken us some time to isolate them. We were obliged to institute an inquiry within a reasonable time after 1957. This inquiry brought to light a number of very disturbing circumstances in connection with the administration of certain trustees.

We have now taken steps which I think represent an approach to dealing with the problem. First, we have a number of prosecutions under way. I am not able to say very much specifically because the cases have not yet been disposed of and it would be improper for me to make any comment or to draw any conclusions before the courts have said whether our charges are properly founded or not. But we have a number of prosecutions under way which I think is an indication of our intention to clear up this question.

Second, in addition to the prosecutions which are actually before the courts in which charges have been laid we have a really quite wide scale investigation under way into the activities of trustees generally.

Third, we have recently introduced a tightening up, if you like, of the investigation into the circumstances under which we appoint trustees and as to the qualifications of trustees.

Fourth, as I indicated in a speech I made in Winnipeg recently, we do intend at the first convenient time possible to undertake a general review of the Bankruptcy Act. Whilst at Winnipeg I took the advantage, when addressing the Canadian credit men's trust association, to ask for their recommendations as to how a number of these problems might be dealt with and as to how we might improve the administration of the Bankruptcy Act, as well as how we might possibly amend or revise the act itself.

I should say in conclusion here that we can only undertake so many reforms at one time, and while these are our intentions and while we have made some preliminary approaches which I have outlined, I want to sound a note of caution that I am not suggesting that the Bankruptcy Act is going to be revised tomorrow, because as I say these matters require a great deal of careful study before one is in a position to suggest complete revisions to parliament. But I think I may say that rather more than the preliminary steps have been taken and are under way leading toward an improvement in the situation.

One final matter in this field. I could not agree more than I do with the hon. member when he said, in effect, that he felt the judges should be more careful, more strict if you like, in dealing with applications for the discharge of bankrupts. I know the judges are very busy and that only certain judges perhaps are specialists in this field and therefore the burden on them is very great; but I can do no more than express the hope that our judges will also realize there have been abuses by unethical trustees and that they will do all they can to ensure when an application for discharge is made before them that not only all that can be done to satisfy the just claims of creditors has been done, but that the administration by the trustees has been proper and ethical in accordance with the terms of the Bankruptcy Act.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, whose comments I always appreciate and for which I wish to thank him, brought to my attention the case of a man who it was alleged had been committed to Bordeaux jail having, as I understood it, been charged with a criminal offence, who had then been committed to that jail as an insane person, and as a result had never been able to obtain a hearing either with respect to his insanity or to obtain a trial to deal with the criminal offence with which he was originally charged.

The hon. member also referred to the case of a girl, in I believe that same jail, with respect to whom there had been a very great delay in bringing her up for preliminary hearing in connection with the criminal charge against her.

I regret that all I can say with regard to both these cases is that the responsibility there is entirely provincial. I can do nothing more than bring the cases and these complaints to the attention of the provincial attorney general if I am provided with the details, and I will ask him or suggest to him that he might feel it proper to make an investigation.

This is because the administration of criminal law is the responsibility of provincial officials. It is true that our Criminal Code provides that no person can be held in custody for more than 24 hours, if my recollection is right, without a charge being laid or a remand being asked for which gives an opportunity for the person to be brought before the magistrate. There are various other provisions designed to safeguard the person, but the administration of all those provisions is the responsibility of provincial officials, as is also the administration of provincial jails such as Bordeaux. Indeed, by the constitution the management of provincial jails is specifically vested in the provincial governments, and again the provisions with regard to the circumstances under which people may be committed to institutions on grounds of mental illness are all controlled by provincial statute. We have no jurisdiction in that field.

Therefore I am necessarily confined to answering by saying that the investigation of the complaints made here would lie within the field of provincial responsibility, and all I can do is to bring such complaints as may be brought to my attention in turn to the attention of the attorney general of that province with the suggestion that he might feel it appropriate to investigate.

I am afraid the same general remarks must be made in reply to the hon. member for Laurier when he intervened the second time in the discussion this afternoon with specific reference to a book, which I believe was written by a Mr. Hebert, regarding the conditions in Bordeaux jail. I have had this book drawn to my attention, but again I can only say that the conditions in Bordeaux jail are exclusively the responsibility of the provincial government. Paragraph 6 of section 92 of the British North America Act is the provision in question here, and it provides that amongst those things coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province are the establishment, maintenance and management of public and reformatory prisons in and for the province.

So that while I appreciate the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier and accept them in the spirit in which he made them, with regard to his suggestion that, so far as it lay within my power, I might look into this matter and the allegations made in the book, I am nevertheless compelled to answer and must answer that it does not lie in any sense within my power. Indeed it lies completely outside my power except again that I can draw the attention of the provincial officials to the fact that the book has been written, the allegations have been made and that they might care to investigate.

I think it is also proper for me to suggest to the hon. member for Laurier that if, indeed, he feels it is incumbent upon somebody to make an investigation, then since it is not within my power may I remind him that those who I believe are much more friendly to him than was the former government of Quebec will, if I read the indications properly, or shortly will have responsibility in that province and he can bring his representations and his request for an investigation forward to them with much greater effect and with much more practicality than he would be showing when he suggests that I make an investigation into a provincial jail.

I think that covers pretty well all of that which was said by hon. members in this discussion so far, with the exception of the hon. member for Stormont whose comments on judges' salaries I must say in general I agree with.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the outline given by the minister of the problem of narcotic addiction and his views relative to it. I cannot agree more with the minister that as far as the federal jurisdiction is concerned, even if the federal authority does go ahead as the minister outlined with special institutions for treatment of narcotic addicts, it only touches half the problem and that the other half lies completely within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities.

What I would like to ask and to get clear in my mind is this. Has the minister made representations to the provincial authorities asking for the introduction of a policy that there should be the use of the same institutions, or similar institutions, in which narcotic addicts of a non-criminal nature could be handled in two ways? In other words, I should like to know if in the mind of the minister there is a policy that provincially the addict who is not a criminal can voluntarily submit himself for treatment. Does the minister feel, as I certainly do, that if a non-criminal addict declines to submit himself voluntarily he can be picked up and given the necessary treatment under provincial legislation to that end.

I am very serious in holding this view, because hon. members will remember that a few years ago in British Columbia tuberculosis was getting completely out of hand. Then a law was brought down that if a person who had active tuberculosis did not voluntarily submit himself for treatment he could be picked up and given the treatment. Today, as is well known, they are closing the tuberculosis hospitals in Vancouver and only about one-third of the available beds are being used in the one hospital that remains open. Some might take the view and, indeed, they would be right, that in legislation of this kind we are moving into the realm of civil rights. But in my opinion there is no infringing of the civil rights of an individual when it is being done not only for his own benefit but for the protection of the majority. I confidently hope that the provincial authorities will move in this direction and that treatment of addicts may proceed upon these dual lines.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to be able to say that in general the approach outlined by the hon. member coincides with that recommended by my officials to me and in turn to the cabinet and approved in principle by the cabinet. He will appreciate that what is done at the provincial level is entirely for their decision but it has been recommended to us that we discuss with them the possibility of working out together and implementing in our respective spheres an approach along those lines. It would be our thought that if we get agreement with the provinces along these lines then since we are bound to provide for a number of addicts in any event in our institution, we would hope, as soon as we can physically do it, to provide these special institutions, as I said earlier, and since we have to provide them in any event we would make them available under proper safeguards and on proper terms for the committal of addicts, if the provinces agree. Thus we would only need the one institution to treat addicts.

It is also our thought that if the legislation, federal, provincial or both, could be so framed as to provide for voluntary admission, or the admission of persons to come voluntarily for treatment in these institutions, it is certainly our hope that there will be provincial legislation complementary to the legislation which we shall ultimately introduce here to provide for the treatment of addicts who do not volunteer and who are, after proper inquiry, committed to these institutions.

It seems to me that in general the approach is somewhat similar to that with respect to mental illness. If it is believed that somebody is suffering from mental illness which may make him dangerous, most provincial legislatures have provided that after a proper inquiry, certification by properly qualified medical men, he may be committed for treatment in an institution. It seems to us that the same approach forms the basis of what we have in the narcotics field as well.

Mr. Jones: The question which I have in mind to address to the minister is one which could, perhaps, wait until the next item is reached, but if I raise it now the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to answer it in his introductory remarks.

It comes to me from the John Howard society in Saskatoon which, as the minister knows, is a society which has been in existence there for a number of years as well as in other parts of the country. They have been very pleased with the selections that have been made in connection with the national parole board and their representatives express the view that progress is being made as a result of the establishment of the national parole board. They say it is true that parole is a privilege and not a right. It is based not on any form of clemency or forgiveness, nor is it designed as a reward for good conduct in the institution. The emphasis is on rehabilitation. These people are told to serve the rest of their sentences in the community under the guidance of counsellors.

The society goes on to point out the savings to the taxpayer which can be made by using the provisions which have been set up. An example is given from the state of Pennsylvania where it was found that by the extension of a similar type of parole the net saving in 1958 amounted to $137,865 in respect to 137 prisoners, or a gain of over $1,000 per person.

I say this to state the basis for the societies concerned that the program should be properly understood by the public at large. The society feels it is necessary to do an educational job so that the public may understand that this is not a soft policy which is being introduced but a scheme which in the long run will give them greater protection and enable a larger number of those discharged from prison to come back to society and become self-supporting.

The society concerned with an educational program is, I think, one that will present itself to the minister. I hope that in dealing with the item he will be able to tell us what steps are being taken to provide information along these lines to the general public and also to the various societies such as the John Howard society in order that they may carry on educational programs on their own in this connection.

Mr. Herridge: I rise at the request of a number of supporters of the present government to bring a matter to the attention of the minister. I refer to the question of the appointment of Queen's counsel. I understand it is usual that a majority of those appointments is made by the lieutenant governor in council for each province concerned. However, while this is the normal and usual practice, owing to the vicissitudes of political life and the vicissitudes of parties it does leave some very competent and capable persons out in the wilderness for years. I have been asked to raise this question in the house and I agreed to do so.

There are, I know, very competent members of the legal profession, pioneers in my district, who have had long experience and a successful practice, who have served their community in a number of spheres most commendably and are recognized as leading members of the legal profession in the district. As I said before, owing to the vicissitudes of political life, to date they have not been recognized by the bestowal of the honour of Queen's counsel and in one or two cases they told me they did not think the future looked any too bright so far as British Columbia was concerned, and that they might be dead before they had the opportunity to take this honour. On that account, these very worthy people are in a sense overlooked and forgotten.

I am looking at the Canadian law list, and I am a bit at sea when I get into law, but this was handed to me. In this booklet there is a list of Queen's counsel. I notice that up to April 20, 1957, 36 had been appointed by the governor general in council which would be, I presume, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice and his colleagues. The first one appointed was the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, and he was appointed on March 14, 1914. Then I see the Hon. Ralph O. Campney, of Vancouver, British Columbia, who was appointed February 28, 1940. There are other prominent persons throughout Canada.

I think there is some reason in the argument put forward by persons who say they think there should be on occasion a greater number of Queen's counsel appointed by the governor general in council because of the circumstances I have mentioned. It does mean that on occasions very eminent and highly thought of members of the profession go through life entirely unrecognized because of what I understand is the unfortunate habit of attorneys general in the provinces generally to recommend to the lieutenant governor in council people of their own political stripe, and it is on this ground that the situation arises. I think there is some merit in the argument and I think that if, when certain cases are brought to the minister's attention, appointments could be made—I am not saying that there should be too many of them—by the governor in council and a Q.C. awarded, it would adjust to some extent what appears to be a measure of injustice occasioned by the vicissitudes of political life in Canada.

When the minister replies I should like him to say what can be done in that direction because I have discussed the matter with members of his party, and I like to represent all my constituents whatever their political stripe. I promised this gentleman without fail that I would bring this matter up on the floor of the house and see what the minister had to say in reply.

Mr. Spencer: Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring to the attention of the committee and again to the attention of the minister a matter concerning which I have spoken to him. I do so with the hope and expectation that it will receive serious consideration and that at the first opportunity a remedy will be provided. I have reference to what I consider to be a needed amendment to the present section 170 of the Criminal Code. I think I should put the section on the record as it now reads:

(1) For the purpose of proceedings under this part, a place that is found to be equipped with a slot machine shall be conclusively presumed to be a common gaming house.

(2) In this section "slot machine" means any automatic machine or slot machine

(a) that is used or intended to be used for any purpose other than vending merchandise or services; or

(b) that is used or intended to be used for the purpose of vending merchandise or services if

(i) the result of one of any number of operations of the machine is a matter of chance or uncertainty to the operator,

(ii) as a result of a given number of successive operations by the operator the machine produces different results, or

(iii) on any operation of the machine it discharges or emits a slug or token.

I think I should also refer to section 176 of the code. I do so because I want to point out that what may be considered to be a somewhat minor or trivial matter does carry severe consequences. Section 176 reads:

(1) Every one who keeps a common gaming house or common betting house is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the first point I want to make very clearly is that I hold no brief whatsoever for gambling. That is not at all the object of my comments. In that connection I think I cannot better express my own views in so far as gambling is concerned than to quote the opinion of a justice in the United States who had this to say in his closing remarks on a case of this kind, after stating that he too was opposed to gambling:

However, the condemnation of gambling, or any other evil for that matter, should not be so loosely applied that it strikes down perfectly legitimate and innocuous pastimes. Many bridge players play for money but this would not justify the outlawing of bridge. Golf players sometimes make their game a little more dramatic by betting on the score but who would outlaw this healthful diversion because of a dollar or two which might change hands at the 18th hole? There is never a world series but that baseball enthusiasts wager on the results, but to condemn and outlaw the world series because fans bet on the scores, runs, hits, strike-outs and home runs emerging from any particular game or all of them would provoke millions of Americans to their feet crying injustice.

We know, of course, that the Criminal Code received consideration by a committee some few years ago, but in so far as this section is concerned I am satisfied that there was no intention and no belief on the part of those who introduced the codification of the Criminal Code at that time that there should be any change in the law in respect of slot machines. My view in that respect is borne out by a reference to Bill No. 7 as it was presented in the House of Commons at that time. Opposite section 170 there is merely the notation "Section 986 (4)", indicating that the new section was precisely the same as the old section but differently numbered.

If my view needs to be further strengthened may I refer to the debates of the House of Commons. I refer to page 2410 of Hansard of February 24, 1954, where the minister of justice at that time, Mr. Garson, had this to say:

But I would not admit for a moment that the law we are now considering is inadequate, because in substance it is a re-enactment of an existing section which had been in the code for a great many years.

Later, at page 2411, Mr. Brown, the hon. member for Brantford, asked this question of the minister:

Would the minister indicate whether there has been a change in the existing law?

The reply of the minister of justice of that time was:

Has my hon. friend read section 986 (4) of the Criminal Code?

Mr. Brown answered yes and Mr. Garson then replied:

I think if my friend will examine that—

Referring to section 986 (4).

—he will find that the substance is substantially the same as that of the present clause. I think it is put in a more intelligible form and in somewhat shorter compass.

I think that anyone who examines the two sections will agree, without reference to any judicial decisions which have been applied to the sections, that there has been a substantial change made in the law and that change relates to the application of those provisions of the old code which at that time were applicable only to machines which vended merchandise. The change made those provisions not only to those machines but also to machines vending only services which at that time and since have been held to include machines for amusement. That view was expressed in the recent judgment of Mr. Justice Ford. I will revert to that judgment a little later, but I wish to quote this portion of it to point out that there has been a change judicially established by this codification of the Criminal Code. After quoting section 170 he said:

I do not think it is necessary to quote the former subsection 986 (4). It is enough to point out that 170 (2) (a) of the present code . . . renders machines used or intended to be used for any purpose other than vending merchandise or services unlawful, as did subsection 986 (4), but in other respects the present subsection 170 (2) does not differ from the former subsection 986 (4) except that the re-enacted provisions are extended to apply also to a machine that is used or intended to be used for the purpose of vending services as well as one used or intended to be used for vending merchandise to which type of machine only the former subsection 986 (4) applied.

It strikes me it is a shocking situation that legislation should be enacted in the belief that no change is being made in the law when in reality a substantial change has been made. Just as an indication of the change that has been made in the law I should like to refer to a leading case on the subject, the case of Isseman v. the Queen, with which I am sure the Minister of Justice is quite familiar. This was a case that was carried up to the Supreme Court of Canada by the crown. The judgment to which I wish to refer is that of Mr. Justice Rand and the portion to which I wish to direct the attention of the committee is found on page 353 of Criminal Reports, volume 24. That portion reads as follows:

But the machine comes also within the language of paragraph (ii).

That is the paragraph that reads as follows:

(ii) as a result of any given number of successive operations by the operator the machine produces different results.

The judgment continues:

The results are the scores and different results are different scores. The contention faintly advanced was that "different results" are in relation to their nature and not mere dimensions in the same nature; that, for example, different results must exhibit, say, scores, prizes and goods as against differences in scores and that the paragraph does not apply. But I see nothing to support that contention. The scores are the objects aimed at and accomplished and in ordinary parlance they are as fully capable of exhibiting differences as other results provided by these or similar machines.

May I say that I only have reference to those machines which are generally known as amusement machines. I have no brief for and I am not making any argument on behalf of those machines which are used for gambling. I am only speaking of the innocent, innocuous machines such as those which you and I have played many times and which are not, in any sense, gambling machines. Perhaps I should refer to some significant words in this provision and they are that a place equipped with this type of machine shall be conclusively presumed to be a common gaming house.

I have always thought that under our British system of criminal jurisprudence a man was always presumed to be innocent until he was proven guilty. There may be some exceptions which have crept into our law because of the apparent wickedness of certain commodities, per se, such as narcotics. Perhaps I should say that I cannot see the resemblance but we also put liquor in that category. In those cases, where possession of these things are considered to have some element of wickedness, the onus shifts, but it is always open to the accused to prove his innocence. There is no irrebuttable presumption against him.

Here we have a statute dealing with such innocuous things as amusement machines, such as those with which you and I have played many times, and we find that even though the machines are not used for gambling in any sense whatever—it may even be admitted by the crown that the machines are not used for gambling—nevertheless, because this statute says so, a magistrate has no option in the matter but to find the person guilty of something of which he is obviously not guilty. I say that any law on the statute books that convicts a person of an offence of which he is admittedly not guilty is a law that has no place in a British country, and certainly has no place in our Criminal Code.

We should not place those people who are found to be in possession of these innocuous machines under the stigma of being in the same category as the keeper of a disorderly house or a common bawdy house, which terms, of course, are analogous to a common gaming house. Such a person should not be subjected to a penalty as severe as two years in prison. I certainly do not want to keep the committee any longer than necessary, but I should like to make one further point.

The law, as it stands at the present time, I am informed, is not being enforced uniformly across this country. It does receive the approval, as I understand it, of certain attorneys general, but it does not receive the approval of others. I recognize that the Minister of Justice should have regard for the views of attorneys general, but I do not believe we should keep on our statute books, regardless of the views of attorneys general, a law which we in our wisdom believe should not be there. I strongly urge that this is a law in that category; that there should be amendments introduced which would exclude from its operation the machines to which I have made reference. I presume that those attorneys general who favour the retention of this law are naturally thinking of the enforcement problem in so far as gambling is concerned.

However, the fact that this law is not being uniformly enforced across the country does place in the hands of chiefs of police the right to put their finger upon one of these operators and possibly have him sent to prison. I am not going to refer to any particular community, but I can say that there are communities in which the chiefs of police have taken action against the owners and keepers of these amusement machines, and they have been convicted of keeping a common gaming house. However, one of these chiefs of police has this kind of thing being displayed right in his own community: "Win $1,000 on home bingo". Can you think of anything that is more indicative of gambling than that kind of advertisement? Yet in that same community some individual keeping a game for amusement—a machine which could not be used for gambling and the most that could be won would be a free game—that person could be classed as a common criminal carrying on a common gaming house.

I say it is time that the hypocrisy ended. Either the law is good and serves a useful purpose or it should not be on the statute books. It should not be left to the whims and fancies of individuals to enforce it or not to enforce it, as they see fit. If we are opposed to gambling, let us be opposed to it in all its aspects. Let us not condone it in one situation and condemn it in another. There may be some who say, well it was not just because of gambling, I took this action because children may have been involved. This statute does not distinguish between adults and children. I did not read the other section which deals with those who play the games, but under that section you or I may be convicted of being frequenters of a common gaming house merely because we were playing a game of amusement.

There is a great deal more I could say and a great deal more I should like to say. I am not one who is in favour of any machines that are used for gambling. Perhaps I should mention this further point. Despite this decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, I think there is considerable doubt as to whether or not that judgment applies to all these types of machines. I have read the judgment of Mr. Justice Rand and I believe it is so extensive that it covers all types of automatic machines. Certainly there have been convictions on the basis of its covering all types of machines and not all the convictions have been appealed.

I am happy to note that there is one case that went to the supreme court of Alberta. The judgment of Mr. Justice Ford to which I made reference a moment ago was a dissenting judgment. I believe in that case the course divided two and two and, as a result, the dismissal of the case by the magistrate stood. The magistrate perhaps looked at the case a little bit less from the standpoint of the law and more from the standpoint of common justice and dismissed it; but strictly on the basis of law he may be wrong. Nevertheless he did acquit. There has been a decision by the crown to appeal. I understand that the crown—that is to say, the attorney general—is not satisfied and that the case is coming to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Naturally the courts must determine the intention of parliament on the basis of the language that is used in the statute. It is not open to the court to look at what was said in the House of Commons. As far as the House of Commons is concerned, it is perfectly clear that the House of Commons never intended to change the law. That is something that has been made completely manifest. However, the court cannot look at that. They can look at the language we have used and the language we have used does not carry out the obvious intention of parliament. I think that is one matter that should receive the attention of the Minister of Justice and that some amendment should be made of this section. I believe the amendment which I have supplied to the minister eliminates only those machines that are not gambling machines and, in my opinion, are not capable of being used as gambling machines. It is those machines that I feel should be taken out of this category completely by an amendment, and I think that should be done at the earliest possible time.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks with regard to firearms.

The Minister of Justice is certainly aware that, very often, even every week, it is reported in our newspapers that our judges in criminal courts, and police court magistrates are protesting against the fact that today practically anybody, even teenagers, can secure firearms. This country's press, English or French speaking, has often stressed such complaints by our judges, and I think that public opinion also wants something to be done to restrict the possession of firearms and make the delivery of permits much more difficult.

Even if delivery of those permits is under the jurisdiction of the attorney general in each province, since the offence is provided for in the Criminal Code, and is therefore under federal jurisdiction, I think that the Minister of Justice might, on the occasion of some discussion with the various provincial attorneys general come to an agreement, so that, throughout the country, permits for the possession of firearms be delivered only in extreme cases, and that permits now valid which are given out to practically everybody, be cancelled, and thus heavily reduce the number of firearms in circulation today.

Moreover, I believe that the article in the Criminal Code regulating the carrying of arms should be amended. I know from experience that our police courts impose a minimum penalty on individuals found to be in possession of firearms without a permit. I submit that in such cases, we should amend the law so as to provide that anyone with a police record, and found in possession of a firearm, should be sentenced to prison without the alternative of a fine. Thus, we would, as I said, meet the wishes of our trial judges and of our police court magistrates.

Public opinion is aroused because today people carry weapons on the street, either with a permit or without one—which makes it even worse—because it is known that if you are caught, all you have to do is pay a few dollars, but there is no jail term. If public opinion demands that the law be made more strict in that respect—I think we should be guided by public opinion and should not ignore it—I would ask the Minister of Justice, who surely is aware of the problem, whether he expects to place before the house, in the near future, an amendment to the Criminal Code with a view to providing stiffer penalties in such cases. Moreover, I submit that the present penalty is not heavy enough, and that the situation should be looked into as soon as possible.

The Minister of Justice surely knows that on certain election days, hundreds of armed individuals walk our streets without permits.

This is a situation that must be brought to an end. When such abuse takes place, it is our duty to make the required changes in the legislation.

Therefore, I would ask the minister to tell us whether he intends to introduce amendments of this kind in the house, and if it is not his intention, I should like to know why.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: I rise to bring to the attention of the minister the third and last matter that I have been asked to bring to his attention. This is a question that concerns three groups of people, namely those that are interested in civil rights and fundamental freedoms, those that are interested in the tourist trade and those that are interested in health and comfort as far as clothing is concerned.

My question is: What legal authority have civic authorities to make bylaws to determine the style or length of Canadians' clothing? I mention this because the body of opinion which is protesting the action of town councils and village councils is a substantial body of opinion in Canada. I want to make quite clear that I am raising this complaint as a member of parliament who has promised to bring it to the attention of the minister and as one who is quite neutral whether shorts should be two inches below the knees or two inches above.

There have been several articles in newspapers throughout Canada as well as letters in papers across this country, and I should like to quote an article from the Montreal Gazette of June 24 in which I see the question is of some concern to eastern townships. The article is entitled "Magog agog over 'short' rule", and I want to quote one or two paragraphs to indicate to the minister the concern over this matter, similar to the sort of concern which has been expressed in other places. The article says:

> Visitors to this eastern township vacation centre are warned: The city fathers have passed what has been described as a "shortsighted" bylaw.
> If any female resident or tourist is seen wearing "short shorts" in the streets, she is liable to a severe lecture from a passing policeman. The definition of "short," according to the lawmakers, is shorter than two inches above the knees.

Then the article goes on to deal with the various penalties and concludes:

> But the bylaw remains in effect and Police Chief Telesphore Lavoie's men have their orders. No tape measures have been issued to the constables, so they will have to make up their own minds.
> The worst offenders? According to past police experience, they're the elderly visitors.

I have been asked to ask the minister these two questions. Under what legal authority are these bylaws passed by town councils and village councils and other civic authorities with respect to the length of clothing; and are they in transgression of civil rights and fundamental freedoms? People want to know whether they should direct their complaints to the provincial authorities or to the municipal or civic authorities in question. They want to know what basic right civic authorities have to determine the length of Canadian ladies' leg coverings.

I hope that when the minister replies his reply will contain the information that various people are seeking. They will know the facts so far as the legal position is concerned, and after the minister has given his answer they will know where to direct their representations, whether to the province or to the municipalities. Mind you, some persons may think this is a trivial matter, but it is of some concern to persons operating tourist resorts, persons who cater to tourists and that sort of thing in various parts of Canada.

It is on behalf of these three groups particularly interested, namely those interested in civil rights and fundamental freedoms, those interested in the various industries and those interested in health and comfort, that I raise this matter this afternoon.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased you recognized me directly following the hon. member for Kootenay West, because if you had not I intended getting the floor on a question of privilege. This is something which I have some interest in, not from the point of view of the subject matter itself but because the hon. member for Kootenay West on another occasion dealt with a subject matter which came under the jurisdiction of the Department of Health and Welfare and referred to lipstick. He went on to mention that he was too old to engage in osculatory exercises and was not immediately concerned.

Unfortunately from my point of view, on that occasion a newspaper reporter, I think in one of the columns of an Ottawa newspaper, attributed that remark to me, that is to say the remark about osculatory exercises, and of course such was not the case for even in my wildest moments I would not make such a comment. However, in this case I hope that the same newspaper man or other newspaper men will not attribute those comments just made by the hon. member for Kootenay West to myself.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I deal with the matters raised in the order in which hon. members spoke.

The hon. member for Kootenay West raised the matter of dominion Q.C.'s and suggested, in effect, that the federal right to recommend the appointment of dominion Q.C.'s should be used to fill in gaps left in the provinces because of the fact that sometimes, as he put it—I did not make the charge—governments tend to appoint as Q.C.'s only those who are persona grata to that government.

I am not going to enter into any particular defence or criticism of any provincial government, but while what the hon. member said may have some foundation in fact and perhaps be a subject of criticism of provincial governments, it is also a fact that a study of the situation shows that provincial governments, at least in recent years, while they have perhaps not been as broadminded in this field as the hon. member would like to see them, or perhaps even as I would like to see them, have nevertheless been in the habit of appointing as Q.C.'s members of political persuasions other than that of the government of the day.

I know that to be the case in British Columbia where I am happy to say they are now following a policy of a very limited number of appointments to Q.C. Indeed I think this is much to be encouraged because most members of the bar, when they think about the matter seriously, agree that to some extent Q.C.'s are handed out altogether too freely and frequently to members who are not really qualified. I do not mean they are not qualified politically but members of the bar who do not go into courts and whose work really is not opinion work, and that sort of thing. So I think British Columbia is following an admirable course in very severely restricting the number of Q.C.'s which annually are appointed.

Mr. Hellyer: Is that the case in the province of Ontario?

Mr. Fulton: That is a matter which the hon. member might take up with the appropriate provincial authorities. I do not know what the situation is in other provinces but I had a quick chance to discuss it with members from New Brunswick and Ontario, and certainly in those provinces, and also I am told in others, the award is not confined to those of the political persuasion of the government of the day. I mention that because it is a reason why I should not appoint as dominion Q.C. persons who are simply not appointed by the provinces.

There is another and I think better reason, and that is that it is my view that the appointment of a dominion Q.C. should be confined to those persons whose work at the bar is of a nature where the dominion government has some proper interest in making the recommendation. That is, generally speaking, to persons in the civil service. Obviously in the past persons in the government itself have been recommended and received this appointment, and also perhaps members of boards and commissions constituted under the authority of the dominion parliament may be appointed.

I am very definitely of the view that appointment as dominion Q.C. should be confined to persons in those categories, and I think there is a very good reason for it. These persons would not normally be recommended for appointment by a provincial government because their work is not primarily in provincial courts or their service does not bring them to the attention of the provincial authorities. Therefore I think we should confine our appointments to those whose service is of a dominion or national nature or significance. I think it would be very dangerous for us to single out people in provinces who have not that sort of qualification I have mentioned and make them dominion Q.C.'s. That of course, as the hon. member realizes, carries the precedence and honour in all the provinces of the country, whereas the appointment of a provincial Q.C. applies only to the province in which it is made. So I regret I cannot accept the hon. member's recommendation in that field.

Coming to his last remarks about the legislative authority under which municipalities make bylaws with regard to women's dress, I can go a certain distance but no further in giving an answer. I am, of course, bound by the principle that the Minister of Justice does not give legal opinions on the floor of the House of Commons, especially on matters that are not within the administrative responsibility of the dominion government or the jurisdiction of the federal parliament. Subject to that, I can say that the authority for the municipality to pass a bylaw would, of course, be found in the provincial statute which sets up the municipality within the province and defines the areas within which it has the power to pass bylaws. Thus I think the hon. member and those who have consulted him should examine the municipal act of the province and seek to obtain their answer by an advice or opinion with respect to that act and the particular bylaw in question.

I do not think I can go further than that for the reason I have given, and also for the good reason that I am not aware of the particular problem in that particular area that may or may not be created by the length of women's dresses or by the habits of the ladies of that area with respect to their dresses or to the height of the seams from the ground. The hon. gentleman will have a much better knowledge than I as to whether that represents a danger to the peace and welfare of that particular community. I have not that knowledge, and therefore I cannot express an opinion as to whether it is desirable, let alone legal, that the length of women's dresses and shorts should be regulated.

With regard to what was said by the hon. member for Essex West on section 170 of the Criminal Code, I appreciate very fully the position taken by the hon. member in this regard and his deep convictions on the subject. Indeed, he has discussed it with me on more than one occasion and on each occasion when we have discussed it I have felt that to him it is improper that this provision should remain on the statute books, for the reasons he gave this afternoon.

My hon. friend advanced two main reasons, I think. First of all, he said that the change in the statute which brought about the present position was inadvertent and unintended. More than that, parliament was told at the time this change was made that the change was not, in fact, being made. Second, my hon. friend objects because persons who are not, as he puts it, actually gambling, may be convicted of being in a common gaming house. I regret that at least as the situation stands at the present time I am not able to recommend any change in the law.

I have pointed out to the hon. gentleman, and would like to point out to the committee, that this matter has been discussed with all the provincial attorneys general and that with one exception they have expressedly or by implication indicated that they were happy with the law as it now is and wanted it to remain that way. One area in which it has been indicated clearly that they would accept the change to the former position is the province of Ontario. In these circumstances I think it would be dangerous, if not improper for me to suggest amending the law as I am asked to do by the hon. member for Essex West. I think my position is that I must examine and take responsibility for the law as I found it when I assumed my appointment as Minister of Justice.

I think the position would have been different, and I would have been in a different and indeed, difficult position, had I been Minister of Justice at the time the change was made and had I given the assurance which was given then that no change was going to be made. I know—and I know also that the hon. member agrees with this—that the assurance which was given by the minister of justice at the time was made in good faith; it was only when the Supreme Court of Canada passed on the act that it was realized a change had been made. If I was in the position that I had given that assurance and then found that my assurance had not been correct and that, in fact, parliament had changed the law on my recommendation, I would be in a difficult position and I might then be under an obligation to recommend to parliament that the law should be changed back.

However, I am not in that position. I am assured by the majority of the provinces that this law as now passed enables them to do what they had on a number of occasions desired to do by provincial statute only to find that those statutes had been declared ultra vires. After consideration by the provincial attorneys general and by the commissioners on the uniformity of laws on at least two occasions, it has been the clear desire of the majority that there should be no change from the section as it presently stands. In considering whether or not I should recommend a change in the law I have to consider the public interest, and in doing that I have to be guided to a considerable extent by the views of those responsible for enforcing the Criminal Code. In these circumstances, where all the provinces but one clearly want the law to remain as it is, I think it is my responsibility to accept their views, which I do, and I accordingly regret that I am not able to recommend a change.

If, however, on reconsideration, and in the light of the arguments made by the hon. member or of any other considerations which may occur to them, either the provincial attorneys general or their representatives at the conference should wish to examine the matter again and come to a different conclusion I should be fully prepared to give immediate consideration to any different recommendation which they might make.

Mr. Spencer: Could I ask the minister a question? My information is that the act is not being enforced in all the provinces, including some where the attorneys general seem to want the act to remain as it is now. Will some inquiry be made as to whether this act is being enforced in all those provinces by the departments of the attorney general concerned and, if not, why not?

Mr. Fulton: This is a question which can be inquired into through the uniformity commissioners at which time they can re-examine the question of whether in fact the provincial authorities do really like the law as it is or whether they want to change it.

Mr. Deschatelets: Could the minister not answer the question which I asked him some time ago?

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I could deal with the hon. member's question in the minutes which remain before it is six o'clock. The hon. gentleman asked that I should use my influence with the provincial authorities to restrict the issuance of permits for small arms and further suggested that the Criminal Code should be amended so as to impose a mandatory jail sentence rather than a fine for the offence of carrying firearms illegally. This raises the whole question of that portion of the Criminal Code dealing with firearms. We are introducing this session an amendment to the code to deal with the Hornet rifle. That is the specific problem which we are dealing with now.

The problem of firearms generally is a large, important, urgent but very difficult problem, and I have given instructions to my department and to the R.C.M. Police to review this matter, to prepare papers on what amendments might be made to the Criminal Code that would be of assistance in dealing with the sort of situation about which people are concerned in Montreal, and to give me those papers, at which time I will study them and hope to make a reference to the conference of commissioners on uniformity, and have their consideration this fall, and after consideration report back to the house again at the next session.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Roberge: Before item 151 carries, I think this is the appropriate time for me to ask one question about the royal prerogative. Can the minister advise the committee how many inmates or prisoners were freed under the royal prerogative?

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, but I do not have that figure. I will have it for the penitentiary item, if not before. My hon. friend means the last amnesty that was granted on the occasion of the royal visit?

Mr. Roberge: No, I mean the royal prerogative recommended by the Solicitor General to the cabinet.

(Translation):

How many pardons have been granted by the Solicitor General?

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: I take it the hon. member wishes to know how many pardons, conditional or absolute, were granted in the last fiscal year. I will get that figure and supply it.

Item agreed to.

152. Parole Act administration including $60,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, as may be approved by treasury board, $553,287.

Mr. Roberge: I have a similar question on this item. How many cases were reviewed by the Parole Act administration, how many paroles were granted and how many were not granted?

Mr. Fulton: The information I have is that the total number of cases considered during the period for which I am reporting was 4,828. I should perhaps remind the committee that the parole board commenced its operations under the authority of the Parole Act which came into force on February 15, 1959. The figures I am giving, therefore, are on the basis of a calendar year from January 1, 1959 to December 31, 1959, and they include a period of six weeks under which paroles were granted under authority of the former remission service. For the full calendar year 1959, the total number of cases considered were 4,828; paroles denied or deferred were 2,790; paroles granted, 2,038.

The figures up to the last week for which we have figures, June 24 of this year, that is from January 1, are paroles denied—this is not quite on the same basis as the figures I have just given—3,877; paroles granted, 3,044; and failures, by failures I mean the number of cases in which the persons out on parole had their parole revoked or forfeited, were 107; or a rate of failure of 7 per cent.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask if there is any difference in the principles that are applied by the parole board as compared with the principles applied by the former remission service?

Mr. Fulton: Not very great differences in the principles, Mr. Chairman, except that in the operation of the parole board we are endeavouring to avoid what used to be called a rule of thumb, namely that persons had to have served one half of their sentence before they were considered for parole. The Parole Act itself requires that the board review immediately the case of every person who enters the penitentiary and make an assessment of his or her situation with respect to the time at which a definitive review should be made with regard to parole, whether or not the man or woman has served half of his or her sentence.

In addition, the board is required to review the cases of all those who were presently serving penitentiary terms at the time the board began its operations. This review has been practically concluded, and will be concluded within a few weeks. Within those limits, the principles on which parole will be granted are, I am informed, much the same.

The present board has visited every penitentiary in Canada and interviewed a large number of inmates. The board has endeavoured to make it clear that the governing consideration on the basis of which parole will be granted is the attitude of the inmate; that there is no completely hard and fast rule. What the board wants to find out is whether the inmate's attitude toward his rehabilitation in society is constructive or otherwise; if he shows himself or she shows herself as being worthy of parole, then the board will consider that case for parole.

Mr. Chevrier: What is required by the board for the initiation of a case?

Mr. Fulton: The terms of the act, as I say, require on commitment an immediate review of every file. Then the files must be reviewed within six months, and then they are reviewed again within a year and every two years thereafter. There is, therefore, an automatic process for bringing files forward for review which commences immediately upon admittance of the inmate to the penitentiary.

Mr. Chevrier: Assuming there is a case where a person desires review within the two year period, how does he proceed?

Mr. Fulton: The inmate may submit an application form directly to the board requesting a review for parole.

Mr. Chevrier: How does the board proceed once the case is before it? Are the files only reviewed or are witnesses heard by the board?

Mr. Fulton: The penitentiary file is reviewed upon the basis of which committal was made. In addition, reviews are requested from the magistrate or judge who heard the case, from the welfare agency and in some cases from the John Howard or Elizabeth Fry society. A most complete review of that nature is conducted. The inmate is interviewed personally by the regional representative, but there is no rule that requires the hearing of witnesses.

Mr. Chevrier: If someone wants to be heard on behalf of an inmate, can he be heard by the board?

Mr. Fulton: The act says that the board is not obliged to hear witnesses, but I am advised that the board hears everyone who applies and in no case have they refused to hear a witness who has applied to be heard on behalf of an inmate.

Mr. Benidickson: What jurisdiction or discretion has the minister apart from or above and beyond the board?

Mr. Fulton: The minister has no discretion, Mr. Chairman. One of the important recommendations in this field of the Fauteux committee was that the discretion should be removed from the minister on the basis, as I recall the report, not that the minister had intervened or that politics had intervened, but that they might. The committee's recommendation was that there should be set up a national parole board which should have absolute and final authority to decide whether or not an inmate should be paroled. The act was passed on that basis and the authority of the board is final.

Mr. Winch: I have a question, but I must admit it is a most difficult one for me to ask. If a person is on good behaviour, then the parole board can come in. In a case where the parole board cannot move in, can the minister say what the situation is with regard to his powers? I know of some cases which disturb me a great deal, I admit. Two persons were sentenced to the penitentiary for long periods and their behaviour has been such that for years they have been kept in solitary confinement. I agree that this must be done because one is an absolutely uncontrollable sex pervert and the other is completely uncontrollable in connection with violence. In normal cases they might be allowed out on parole because of good behaviour, but they have to be kept in solitary confinement, and, as I say, I agree that this has to be done. Is there any basis at all—I do not know how to put it—on release for care or with some provision or do you as minister have to release them on the public? I have put the question rather confusedly but this is a most important matter.

Mr. Fulton: I think there is a mixture here. There is a question here that involves both the matter of the expiration of the sentence and the question of release on parole before the sentence has expired. In a case such as those which the hon. member has mentioned, taking the matter of parole first, the parole board would examine the file and interview persons to establish whether or not there has been a change of attitude on the part of the inmate; in other words, to establish whether this inmate's attitude now is such that he indicates he would make a good adjustment if he were released before his sentence had been completed. Even in these cases, if there were sufficient evidence that the attitude of the inmate had changed so that it would be a proper case for parole and the board were satisfied that it was a proper case where the safety of society would not be prejudiced, they might grant parole even before the expiration of the sentence.

Let us be realistic, however. I am not suggesting that this would be a likely eventuality in the case of the two inmates to which the hon. member has referred; but it is possible that if they themselves showed a change in their attitude they would then be considered for parole.

The other aspect or element of the question relates to the matter of their release at the expiration of their sentences. Suppose an inmate were sentenced to a 20-year term. Even suppose that by his behaviour he had not earned any automatic time off for good behaviour, or that his behaviour had been bad, still at the end of the 20-year sentence there is no authority for his further detention and the penitentiary authorities would have no alternative but to release him because he had served the sentence which the court had imposed. Therefore unless his conduct in the penitentiary itself had made him subject to another criminal charge upon which he had been convicted and sentenced to an additional term—as I say unless that had happened—he would have to be released at the end of the sentence for the offence for which the court had convicted him.

Mr. Winch: It is quite obvious that I have not got my point over yet, although I appreciate what the minister has said. The minister knows, as do all hon. members, of my interest in criminology and in getting men out on parole.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Winch: I think this is the first time I have ever spoken in the House of Commons when I raised the question of individual cases. I am saying "two men" without naming them or the penitentiary. Under their terms of sentence, for years the warden has had to keep them completely in solitary, one because he is completely uncontrollable as a homosexual and the other because he is completely uncontrollable as to violence. As a matter of fact, he almost killed a guard. They have been in solitary all this time. Are these men insane? They must be insane. Otherwise why have they been kept completely segregated from everyone else for years? I am now asking the minister this question. When their penitentiary sentence is up are these two men I have in mind going to be turned out of the penitentiary when the experience over the years is that they are insane, uncontrollable, one a homosexual and one having a record of violence? Why have they been kept in solitary—and I know it for a fact—all these years and not being declared insane and put under the proper supervision? Owing to the fact that they have not been so dealt with, although they have been in solitary for these years I understand, from what the minister has now said as soon as their penitentiary term is over they can be released on society. That is the point I am after.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. member takes my answer a bit beyond the terms in which I gave it. What I said was that at the end of their sentence the penitentiary would have no authority to keep them in custody in the penitentiary any longer. I agree with the hon. member that it is not desirable to identify particular cases but I know perfectly well the cases of which he is speaking. In that connection all I can say is this. It is true that these particular inmates have been kept under the circumstances which he has outlined, in general for the reasons he has given. Under the terms of the Penitentiary Act, if an inmate is found to be suffering from mental disease or, in other words, is found to be insane we apply to have him committed to a provincial mental institution. There have been cases in which the provincial authorities have refused to accept our finding that the man is insane, that he is a mental case rather than a penitentiary case. We have therefore kept those inmates during the period of their sentences and for the full extent of their sentences.

In a case such as that which is mentioned, all that could happen, and what would inevitably and undoubtedly happen, is that when the inmate reaches the end of his sentence a further examination of him will be held and subject of course to medical opinion at the time a finding as to his mental condition will be made; and, granted the circumstances which we have been discussing, my assumption is that he will again be certified as a mentally sick person or as an insane person. It will then be the responsibility of the provincial authorities to decide whether or not that finding is accepted and the inmate is committed to a mental institution or whether he should be released to society. But we will have no authority under which to detain him. Our recommendation will be clear but it will be the responsibility of the provincial authority to decide whether he is committed to a mental institution or released to society.

Mr. Winch: That is my very point. The Minister of Justice knows the cases that I am discussing.

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Winch: He knows that they have been kept in solitary now for a great length of time for the reasons I have outlined. Although they are in the penitentiary under charges and are admittedly insane, why is it that they have not been committed to an institution for the criminally insane?

Mr. Fulton: We are now discussing the penitentiary administration very clearly. I would prefer to answer this question under the penitentiary items. I think I know the answer but I want to give factually and legally correct answers and, if my hon. friend does not mind, I would prefer to continue this discussion under the penitentiaries items.

Mr. Winch: I do not want these men released on the general public.

Mr. Fulton: As far as parole is concerned, which is the item we are considering now, I think I am perfectly safe in saying that if they applied they would not be considered for parole unless they showed a change in attitude, and since it appears they have not done or are not likely to do so, they would not be seriously considered for parole.

Mr. Broome: There is one question I should like to ask the minister. It is with regard to the degree to which the parole board remits sentences or extends parole. There has been a sort of unwritten rule that every inmate must serve at least half of his sentence and that parole is not considered until after that period has elapsed. It is my understanding that there is nothing in the regulations governing the parole board in this regard and that parole can be considered at any time the parole board believes the inmate is ready to take his place again in society. I wonder whether the minister might comment on that matter?

Mr. Fulton: Yes; and at the same time I should like to deal with a question which was raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon at an earlier stage this afternoon. The regulations made under the Parole Act which came into effect recently—

Mr. Benidickson: On what date?

Mr. Fulton: I will give the date shortly. The regulations give effect to the policy of the parole board which has been evolved after lengthy discussions between the chairman of the board, myself, officers of the penitentiary branch and of the department as to the general principles which govern the board in granting parole. I should like to emphasize to this committee that these regulations give effect to the policy of the board which has been settled, amongst which are the following basic principles:

That the policy of the board is as far as possible to encourage inmates to become law abiding citizens and to assist them to do so by granting parole;

To treat the offender rather than the offence;

To deal with offenders as individuals not as members of a group;

To judge each case objectively according to its merits and circumstances;

To avoid the use of rigid arbitrary rules of practice;

To be practical, realistic and businesslike in dealing with offenders and to avoid any suggestion that parole involves mollycoddling of the inmates or the use of leniency or clemency;

To consider each case from the point of view of what the inmate is apt to do in the future as more significant than what he has done in the past and to provide adequate supervision;

To ensure protection of the public and assistance for parolees; and finally,

To emphasize correction and reform as the purposes of punishment rather than vengeance or retribution.

Within the ambit of that policy and under the authority of the regulations the board approaches each case on the basis of the attitude of the inmate and the likelihood of his profiting by his parole, and his ambition and intention to re-enter society as a law abiding and useful member thereof rather than giving effect to any lenient or clement or special circumstance which the inmate puts up on his own behalf.

As I said earlier, the case of every inmate is automatically reviewed within six months of his admission, and from that time on it comes up for further review within a year and every two years thereafter. But the policy of the board is that the qualifications of an inmate to be granted parole are looked at on the basis of his attitude and the likelihood of his living as a law abiding member of society rather than on any arbitrary assessment or report that may be made about him.

Mr. Winch: Or his length of service?

Mr. Fulton: I have indicated already the occasions on which his case is reviewed and I have made it quite clear that there is no arbitrary rule of thumb that he must have served a certain portion of his sentence, although the hon. member will appreciate, as will all hon. members of the committee, that there must be some general principles to guide the board with respect to matters of this kind. But the reviews are made at the periods I have indicated.

The hon. member for Saskatoon asked about the steps which are being taken to, I think he used the phrase, educate the public as to the purposes and advantages of parole, and I would like to draw his attention to the activities of the board members which have been carried on since they assumed their functions on February 15 last year.

There have been 26 television and radio interviews, four magazine articles and numerous press releases. Members of the board also had 35 meetings with prison inmate committees and made 37 speeches to magistrates' associations, to after-care agencies, university students, service clubs, and general public meetings in Canada. That was up till December 31 of last year. Since January 1 of this year addresses have been made on 26 separate occasions. There have been 15 television appearances, ten radio talks and further numerous press releases. Certainly I would judge, on the basis of the press comments which I have seen, that the efforts of the board, guided by its chairman in this respect, have been very successful indeed in creating a public acceptance of the work and objectives of the board, and also a public acceptance of the results of that work which, as I pointed out earlier, have had the effect that there were last year 2,038 paroles granted; that there have been up to the present day, June 24 this year, 3,044 paroles granted and a total of only 214 paroles forfeited or revoked. That is a total rate of failure of 7 per cent, which compares extremely favourably with the record of experience in other countries.

When hon. members stop to think that that means there were 3,044 paroles granted less 214 failures, or in other words 2,830 inmates would otherwise still be incarcerated who are now out on parole and successfully observing the conditions of their parole, thus better enabled to return to society as useful and law abiding members thereof—that is 2,830 people now in society as the result of these paroles within one year—then I think the decision of the government supported by parliament to set up a national parole board under the national parole act has been entirely vindicated.

Mr. Jones: I thank the minister for that information.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the minister's reply. The minister read from a red covered book. He did not say he was enunciating regulations because we have not yet got the date of the statute which might govern these matters. But I was interested as to what kind of unorthodoxy perhaps is practised by the board in exceptional cases, or do they have a standard practice, a principle, or whatever you call it, even apart from a regulation or a law?

I think that was the point the hon. member for Vancouver East was pursuing. In how many cases has the board ever deviated under a special circumstance, relating to an individual for whom special representations had been made, from orthodoxy, principle, law, or anything else? To what extent does it use discretion, humanity and other considerations with respect to an isolated individual? Or irrespective of regulations, irrespective of law, do they have some kind of a routine thing which says that under no circumstances have they ever reduced a sentence of a person lower than, say, 50 per cent of what was awarded by the court?

I think perhaps that is what the hon. member for Vancouver East was pursuing and this concerns me. I am concerned as to what humanity, what discretion, what personal judgment is used by this board in these matters.

Mr. Fulton: I think the extent to which the board exercises its prerogatives of discretion and mercy may be gathered from the fact that in 1958, the last year before the board commenced its operations, the total number of paroles granted amounted to 974. Again I can only repeat that for the calendar year in which the board became operative the number granted was 2,038. I hope that will impress the hon. member as being a complete answer to the question the hon. member asked as to whether the board is exercising the authority and discretion vested in it.

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think the minister has completely answered my question or, perhaps, that which was in the mind of the hon. member for Vancouver South. We are, of course, all impressed by any statement of the minister as to the number of people which have been dealt with by the board. Our concern was, I think, with regard to the extent such cases might indicate that the discretion was courageously used, that it deviated from the pattern which might say for instance: no one is to be allowed to serve less than 50 per cent of their sentences. I was interested not so much in the total number of paroles granted but in the extent to which the board has shown some individual discretion. Has the board deviated from a standard pattern or is it the prisoner of a standard pattern?

Mr. Fulton: The board is flexible, not rigid; the board is guided by the questions which it itself asks as to whether an inmate has shown by his attitude that he is ready for parole. However, the board is also guided by practical considerations—the good of society and the attitude and conduct of the inmate rather than any special compassionate feature. In other words, this board seeks to return to society on its own discretion and authority the greatest possible number of inmates who are ready to resume their places in society as constructive and useful members thereof.

These are the principles that guide the board. I have given the house figures to show that within these principles the board has been constructive and has rendered great service in the application of these principles to the cases that came before it. I am sure the hon. member would not expect me to go into details of individual cases nor do I intend to do so. What I have tried to do is to indicate, first of all statistically, the practical results of the board's operations, the encouraging results in terms of the low rate of failure, and then, in general to outline the policies by which the board is guided and which have brought about these satisfactory results.

Mr. Benidickson: I was more concerned about the percentage of paroles that might have been granted by the board which involved reducing a sentence to below one third, or below one half rather than in statistics of the kind the minister has mentioned. I was thinking of evidence to show that the parole board really looks at individuals and takes initiative, showing what I might call guts in cases of this kind.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. member could gather information of that kind from the figures I gave as to the number of applications denied and the number granted, but if he wants to assess the results on the basis of a comparison with the old half-time rule, I can give him these figures: of the number paroled, the percentage who served less than 35 per cent of their time was less than 2 per cent; the number who served between 35 per cent and 50 per cent was less than 13 per cent; the number who served between 50 per cent and 70 per cent was 67 per cent, and the number who served more than 70 per cent of their term was 18 per cent. So that the exceptions to the old half-time rule amount to 14.75 per cent.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the minister. That was the answer I wanted.

Mr. Roberge: I notice that the minister referred to inmates of penitentiaries when answering the hon. member for Laurier and that when he replied to the hon. member for Vancouver East he said cases were reviewed after 6 months, 12 months and 18 months. Are we to understand that the same rules apply in the case of inmates in common jails.

Mr. Fulton: No. The authority of the board under the act does not extend to the automatic review of the cases of inmates sentenced to terms in provincial jails. There has to be an application, and the rule the board has set itself is that these cases should be reviewed not later than four months of the time of receipt of the application.

Mr. Roberge: Is the board considering terms of sentence less than six months in length?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. The case of any inmate sentenced to whatever term who submits an application for review is then reviewed.

Mr. Roberge: Within four months?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, at the most.

Mr. Winch: I think this is one of the most interesting discussions on this subject we have had in the time I have been here, and I want to thank the minister and his aides for the information they have given. In view of what has been said about the success, or apparent success, of this system since the change was made; in view of the number who have been released from parole and the comparatively small percentage who have had to go back because they broke the law, may I ask the minister whether he has any intention of initiating a policy whereby the judge or the jury continues to find a person guilty, but a body outside the court, such as we now have, will determine the length of sentence? I think the minister is familiar with the principle upon which I am asking him to comment, and I should like him to give us an indication whether he is moving in that direction. The judge or the jury cannot have all the reports and all the background which are so helpful and necessary if a man is to be justly sentenced.

Mr. Fulton: I must say frankly that we do not contemplate such a system, certainly not at the present time. The hon. member will, I am sure, recall that the Fauteux committee did consider such a system but recommended against it. We do, however, have in mind taking all the steps we can to encourage judges, who have responsibility and will continue to have responsibility for sentencing, to visit institutions—and particularly when we have our new correctional reform program under way—in which sentences are served so that they may be—if I may put it this way without disrespect to the bench—better informed as to the type of training and rehabilitation program which is available for inmates and can determine the sentence, the length of sentence and perhaps the type of sentence, accordingly, on the basis of what this accused and guilty person needs. Does he need a long sentence to enable him to have a lengthy period of training reformation? Does he need only quick, exemplary punishment and quick results? Is that what he needs? Where is the institution where he can get what he needs? Therefore, what sentence should I impose accordingly?

This is a long term program and it will depend upon whether the judges are prepared to accept our invitation, which will be extended, to visit our institutions. I may say there are already some judges who take a personal as well as a judicial interest in the welfare and the history of persons whom they have sentenced and who do already follow up by visits to institutions. What we really hope to do is to extend that so that the sentence will come into the minds of the judges as a scientific and social matter. When I say "social" I mean in terms of what measure of reform, or training or rehabilitation or punishment the person before him requires.

Mr. Winch: Is it still the regulation and definite policy under the new system of parole that a person must serve half a sentence? If the board believes that a person is rehabilitated does it have authority to release him on parole before half the sentence has been served?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Unequivocally, I say the board is not bound by any rule of thumb to half time.

Mr. Benidickson: That was the point of my question.

Mr. Fulton: I had answered it three times already.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry to be taking up so much time but I have one more point. What is the relationship now between the new change which came in last year and the remission services in the provinces? I am not supposed to mention names but I am going to. I have had something to do with a number of cases and I am very proud to see Mr. MacLeod before the minister. I have felt that in certain circumstances remission should have been granted but it was impossible because it did not come under federal jurisdiction; it came under provincial jurisdiction. What is the situation now under the new relationship? Just how far do the federal board's powers extend? I think the federal board is more sympathetic toward the parole system than some of the provinces.

Mr. Fulton: The powers of the national parole board are set out in the Parole Act. The relationship between the national parole board and the provincial probation services is very good. The functions of the two are different and the authority is different. Probation services, as will be realized, are largely provincial and they relate to persons who may not be sentenced. A judge may put a man out on probation. We do not have any extensive probation services under the federal authority. These are provincial. They are officers of the court; but the parole board makes extensive use of the information, the knowledge and the skills of provincial probation services and their officers in obtaining assessments, reports and recommendations as to cases which come before our board for parole. The relationship between the two is very close. If we let a man out on parole we may in turn ask a provincial probation officer to be the supervisory officer with respect to that inmate's parole. In every way the relationship is very close but the statutory authority of the two, the parole board on the one hand and the provincial probation service on the other, is, of course, governed by the respective statutes under which they operate.

Mr. Winch: Does the parole system apply to persons who have been sentenced to jail for fewer than three years?

Mr. Fulton: I beg your pardon, I did not catch the question.

Mr. Winch: Does the parole system which is operated under federal legislation apply to provincial jails? I do not think so.

Mr. Fulton: The national parole board has jurisdiction over all persons who are serving sentences under the Criminal Code, whether they are serving those sentences in a federal penitentiary or in a provincial jail. They have that jurisdiction with respect to parole; they do not have jurisdiction with respect to persons who are serving sentences in provincial jails for offences against provincial statutes.

In addition, in Ontario and British Columbia there are provincial parole boards which do have jurisdiction over persons who are serving indeterminate sentences in provincial jails. The provincial parole board has jurisdiction over those.

Mr. Winch: That is one of the very points I had in mind. I am grateful to the minister for that answer. I think he will agree with me that this has caused a great deal of confusion. There is a conflict there in that the federal parole board has jurisdiction over those who are serving sentences in provincial jails if the sentence is one day under two years and if they have been convicted of a charge under the Criminal Code. If it is a charge under the provincial act, although the sentence may be exactly the same, the federal parole system cannot operate.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Mr. Winch: To my way of thinking this has caused a great deal of confusion in the past. As the minister knows, I have tried to handle a great number of cases, and sometimes I have been able to operate with success and in other times I have not. I have consulted with wardens—I am speaking now of the present situation—and I have been told at times that it did not come under our jurisdiction. Is this not a matter that should be clarified? Should not the matter of jurisdiction be made clear? I have always received complete co-operation and have been successful at the federal level, but I have not yet got an answer to a letter from the provincial parole board.

Mr. Fulton: I agree with the hon. member that there is here a separation of jurisdiction that I think follows necessarily from the provision of the constitution under which Canada operates.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The Fauteux commission made certain recommendations in this field with respect to certain changes which the provinces might make in the jurisdiction and operation of their boards. But, of course, we are not in any position to dictate what they should do. All I can say, therefore, is that there are limitations on our authority and jurisdiction and there are areas in which the provinces are entitled to operate under their own exclusive authority and jurisdiction. We are endeavouring, both at the departmental level and through direct contacts between the board and its officers and provincial parole and probation boards, to work out a satisfactory method of co-operation so as to avoid overlapping and particularly so as to avoid differences in policy and differences in approach to these problems.

Mr. Winch: Provincial jails are completely under provincial jurisdiction but if inmates are sentenced under the Criminal Code then the federal government does have jurisdiction with respect to parole?

Mr. Fulton: That is quite clear. The operation of the jail and the circumstances and conditions under which inmates serve their sentences in the jail, if it is a provincial jail, are, of course, within the authority of the provincial legislature and officials, but that relates to the operation of the jail. The authority of the parole board does not extend to the conditions under which a man will serve his sentence in a jail. Their authority only extends to the question of whether he shall be paroled before he has served his sentence. Our board does not have authority and does not attempt to assert any authority as to the conditions under which a man will serve his sentence while he is in the provincial jail. All they say is whether or not he should be released from custody prior to the expiration of his sentence, which is an entirely separate jurisdiction from that of actually running the institution itself.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, but I want to get it clear. The federal parole board has jurisdiction with respect to parole in the case of a person sentenced under the Criminal Code but has no jurisdiction if he is sentenced under an act of the legislature?

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Mr. Winch: How does that differentiation come about? It is a matter of parole, not administration of the jail.

Mr. Fulton: It comes about because under the constitution we have no jurisdiction to set up a parole board with authority over sentences which are imposed by courts under provincial statutes. Our authority in this field is confined to the Criminal Code which by the constitution is entrusted to the federal parliament, and since we have the authority to make criminal law we also have the authority to set up a parole board or the authority to parole persons who are convicted of criminal offences. But we have no authority to parole persons who are convicted of offences against provincial statutes and who are serving their sentences in provincial jails.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, following the interpretation just given by the Minister of Justice, which is probably right although it is a surprise to me, would it be possible to have the number of requests to the parole board for the parole of any inmate at the Bordeaux jail in Montreal in the past year?

Mr. Fulton: If I were asked a general question as to the number of files we have reviewed I could, I suppose, give an answer in total, but to ascertain how many applications for parole have been received from a particular prison would entail a review of a vast number of files. If I were asked a question with respect to a particular inmate and asked how many representations were made on his behalf, we might be able to isolate it but I would hesitate to give such an answer on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Deschatelets: If the minister will permit me, I will be satisfied if he can tell me that the parole board has received one request in the past year.

Mr. Fulton: I am given these figures for what is described here as the Montreal jail, which is Bordeaux. We denied 95 applications and granted 112.

159. Bankruptcy Act administration, $55,780.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, some remarks were made this afternoon with respect to the administration of the Bankruptcy Act by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere and I should like to make a few additional remarks with respect to this legislation. It has come to my knowledge that debtors may go from one place in a province to another place in the same province in order to make an assignment. For instance, a man from Gaspe may go to Montreal to make an assignment in the hands of a trustee. If I am right, each province constitutes a district and within a province the chief justice may make several divisions. Again if I am right, the act is not obligatory so that a debtor is obliged to make an assignment in his division. He may go to another division.

Since there possibly will be a new codification of the act I should like the government to introduce an amendment to provide that a debtor will be obliged to make the assignment in his division so that creditors will not have to go from one part of a province to another in order to look after their interests. As the situation is now, a debtor from Gaspe may make an assignment in Hull and if all the creditors are from Gaspe they and the inspectors have to travel a long distance to meetings. It may be that the act is not administered well in the several divisions but in any event I should like this matter to be cleared up by the introduction of a specific provision in the act.

Mr. Fulton: I think the point raised by the hon. member is one of those that we must take into careful consideration in the course of the review of the act that we will be making. I am told that at the moment the interpretation of the locality of a debtor, which means the principal place where the debtor has carried on business during the year immediately preceding his bankruptcy, etc., is a decision to be made by the official receiver in the case of an assignment. It may be that the act is not clear enough or that the safeguards against the practice to which my hon. friend has referred are not sufficient. That is one of the questions that we shall be looking at when we review the act because one of the things we are concerned about is whether the provisions of the act are sufficiently careful in their protection of the creditor or whether possibly they are not too lenient in the sense of looking after the debtor. That is one of the things we have to look at.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, since the minister has indicated that a review is to be made of the Bankruptcy Act there is one point I should like to draw to his attention for consideration. Following the decision of the supreme court to disallow bill No. 45 of the province of Alberta in 1959, which was a bill to provide for the orderly payment of debts and the consolidation of judgments and other debts and was patterned on legislation in force in Manitoba for 25 years and in Ontario for some 10 years, there now exists a certain void in the handling of debts for people who are really of very limited means. They are not corporations. Previously they had been dealt with in the province of Alberta by the debtors' assistance board. But this procedure is entirely voluntary. Unfortunately it has become the practice that certain creditors will attend a meeting where a debtor makes a composition or voluntary proposal. Then one of the creditors will find out where this man is working and garnishee his wages.

Under the Alberta legislation, for example, a married man is exempt from garnishee up to $120 per month. However, by becoming completely destitute and going on relief, a man can receive sums ranging from $130 to $150 per month and so is better off than he is under his statutory exemption. There are, unfortunately, large numbers of men who are driven to this procedure because they are being hounded by their creditors. I would suggest to the minister that consideration should be given, under the summary administration provisions, on application by a province under section 5, subsection 1 of the act, that a debtors' assistance board or some public board or commission be authorized to act as trustee for summary administration of these very small estates.

I think hon. members will realize that under the normal procedures of bankruptcy a trustee cannot work for nothing, and unless there is something in the estate he is somewhat reluctant to accept the estate. In addition, these small estates entail a good deal of administration and, frankly, for what there is in it it is not worth while for the trustee to take on these matters. These debtors' assistance boards, if you want to call them that, could be appointed trustees to handle summary administrations only, with a view to formulating proposals rather than simply discharging the estate. They could do all the work by reason of the fact they are paid by the provincial authorities.

My point is simply that through the provision of the summary administration section of the act relief can be given to the small salaried worker who is in difficulty with his creditors.

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the comments of the hon. member, and I am aware of the difficulties created in Alberta as a result of the supreme court decision. Beyond saying what I have said about that, I would not like to comment. I am aware of the difficulties, and one of the particular features of the Bankruptcy Act which will come under review will be this part of it which provides for summary administration. We are concerned about that section and some of the abuses to which I think it is open at the moment. The intention is good, but there are some abuses to which it seems to be exposed, and although I would not care to comment as to what direction we will make changes, if and when we make changes, certainly the point that my hon. friend has in mind will be one that will be under review.

Penitentiaries—

161. Administration of the office of the commissioner of penitentiaries including $90,000 for grants to recognized prisoners' aid societies, as may be approved by the treasury board, $641,516.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I should like to ask the minister a question on item 161. Reference is made to $90,000 for recognized prisoners' aid societies as may be approved by the treasury board. I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to set out the criteria upon which the treasury board makes an examination of these applications for aid to the different societies?

Mr. Fulton: It would be difficult for me to answer for the treasury board because the members of the treasury board alone could properly answer that. What I can answer for are the criteria which we observe in making our recommendations to the treasury board for what will be included in our estimates.

As the hon. member will appreciate, there are two headings under which we make grants to prisoners' aid societies or after-care agencies, as they are variously called, that is under the national parole board, formerly the remission service, under which the sum of $60,000 is provided this year, and under the penitentiaries branch for which $90,000 is provided this year, making a total of $150,000.

The measure of the assistance they receive is, generally speaking, the number of cases in which they undertook assistance. The parole board calls upon them for assistance with respect to persons who are out on parole, and then they make a calculation of the number of cases in which this supervision or assistance has been given. The assistance to be given during the current year is based on the experience of the past year.

In the same way, under the penitentiary authority when a man is approaching his discharge date notification may be given to one of the agencies which would be asked to come in and interview the inmate, and do what they can to assist him after his discharge with respect to finding a job or in connection with the other problems with which he will be confronted. Again, the number of cases thus handled by the agency is kept, tabulated and the grant for the following year is based in general on the record of assistance in the preceding year.

Mr. Howard: I thought the minister had indicated earlier that he would have an extensive submission or statement to make under this item with respect to penitentiaries. Perhaps we could start the item off with that statement by the minister.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is quite right. I am sorry, but possibly we made such progress that I did not keep up with the items. I did intend, and do intend, to make a statement on the progress to date in connection with our correctional and reform program, what has been done up to the moment, and a brief outline of what is planned for the future.

The various committees and other groups that over the years have made recommendations for improvement of the federal correctional system have invariably stressed the need for positive efforts to reform the offender through appropriate treatment and training in penal institutions and on parole. Since confederation the penitentiary system has usually lacked emphasis on reformative treatment. Some efforts in this latter direction have been made since world war II but they have been largely frustrated by continuing overcrowding in federal penitentiaries, lack of employment for inmates, an atmosphere of tension in the institution and, until last year, a lack of emphasis on parole as a rehabilitative measure for offenders.

As hon. members are aware, the responsibility of the government of Canada in so far as the operation of a prison system is concerned is to provide custody and reformative treatment for all persons who are sentenced under federal laws to imprisonment for two years or more. In 1952 the federal penitentiary inmate population was about 4,600. In the eight years since that time the inmate population has increased to over 6,300, an increase of almost 40 per cent. It is sobering to reflect that during that short period the number of young inmates—those under 21 years of age—increased from just short of 500 to slightly more than 900, an increase of about 80 per cent. In 1952 about 1,800 inmates were serving their second or subsequent penitentiary sentence. That number has now risen to about 3,000, an increase of 35 per cent or more.

These figures would seem to indicate that there is an increase in crime—at least in serious crime—in Canada and that the traditional methods of dealing with offenders by locking them up in prison and forgetting about them does not aid in solving the problem. Ninety-nine per cent of persons who are sentenced to penitentiaries sooner or later return to the community. Indeed over the last ten years some 23,000 inmates of federal penitentiaries have been released from custody, and their numbers alone indicate the necessity of ensuring that the prison experience should have a reformative effect upon the prisoner. Only thus can the public be protected when he is again at large.

Over the last year and a half the Department of Justice has made a substantial effort in the direction of reducing overcrowding in federal penitentiaries and also in providing more effective training for inmates confined in the penitentiaries. A new medium security institution designed to hold 450 inmates has been opened at Kingston, Ontario. A similar type of prison called the Leclerc Institution will be opened at St. Vincent de Paul near Montreal toward the end of this year.

A minimum security institution—that is a prison without walls, bars or guns—has been opened at William Head near Victoria, British Columbia. Another one has been opened at Valleyfield, Quebec and a third will be opened within a few months at Springhill, Nova Scotia. Each of these institutions is an example of the economical use of existing governmental facilities that can be adapted for prison purposes. The William Head installation was a Department of National Health and Welfare quarantine hospital that was surplus to the department's requirements. The Valleyfield installation was originally a small military camp. The Springhill institution has been developed for the most part by using available huts that were acquired from the Department of National Defence.

The result of these developments during the past year and a half is that whereas formerly federal penitentiary facilities consisted of maximum security institutions only, there are now to be found in the system examples of medium security institutions and minimum security institutions. In addition the department is now proceeding with plans for the development of correctional work camps. These will be camps for the custody, treatment and training of penitentiary inmates for whom maximum or medium security conditions of confinement are not necessary or appropriate. They will be designed to carry out improvement programs upon dominion or provincial crown lands such as the development of public parking areas or picnic grounds, reforestation programs, forest fire prevention programs, restoration of historical sites and reclamation of unused lands. The projects will be of a type that the governments concerned are not prepared to undertake with privately employed labour for say a period of approximately 10 years. Initially we would hope that this new type of camp, which will provide work and steady employment for about 75 inmates in each case, would be located in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Exploratory conversations are now being carried on in the province of Manitoba.

The development of these camps will enable the department to avoid the heavy expenditures by way of capital and maintenance costs that are involved in building maximum or medium security institutions and also the delay that is involved in planning and building institutions of that type.

Another significant development during the past year and a half has been the coming into force of the new Parole Act and the commencement of operations of the new parole board. We had a discussion on this matter on the item under which the parole board estimate is contained and therefore I think I need do no more than remind the committee that the work of the parole board is an essential part of the over-all approach to the new correctional program.

There have also been developments in connection with the problem of narcotic drug addiction which also were discussed in detail and at some length on an earlier occasion. I will therefore do no more here than mention them and ask the committee to keep it in proper perspective in assessing the full extent of the correctional program which we have envisaged and upon which we are embarking.

In addition to the review I have just made of what has been done with respect to new types of institutions and the new approach in the field of parole and narcotics we have also been concerned to make changes within existing institutions. Here, as I have said, we are confronted with the problem created by overcrowding and the difficulties which that situation imposes upon us with respect to instituting or maintaining in those institutions proper work programs, rehabilitation programs, vocational training and other programs for the inmates that are there. I am quite sure that hon. members will realize without my enlarging upon it the difficulty with which we are confronted when space which should be used and is essential if you are going to carry out a proper training program has instead to be devoted to the mere physical accommodation of the number of inmates that we have because of this overcrowding situation.

Notwithstanding the difficulties that overcrowding has caused in penitentiaries it has been possible, in the existing maximum security institutions, to introduce certain improvements in the fields of classification and segregation and to expand the types of vocational and other reformative training for inmates. For example, new dormitories have been established outside the wall of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary for 225 inmates. This action permits the segregation of this group of offenders from more hardened criminal elements who must be kept in custody behind the wall. It has been possible in Kingston penitentiary, which has a population of some 950 inmates, to provide accommodation and suitable reception and classification procedures for 50 inmates on a continuing basis. Similar reception facilities have been established at Saskatchewan penitentiary. At Manitoba penitentiary dormitory facilities have been established outside the wall to provide pre-release training for selected inmates who are approaching their day of discharge from custody.

New types of vocational training which involves the use of classroom techniques and on the job training, where the inmate learns a trade or occupation by actually working at it, have been introduced at most federal institutions. For example, training in electronics is now given at the federal training centre in Quebec and at British Columbia penitentiary. At several institutions new training courses in the welding and sheet metal trades have been started and the number of inmates receiving training in such trades as plumbing, carpentry and masonry has been increased. A commercial class in typing, shorthand and bookkeeping has been started at Dorchester penitentiary.

With regard to these work programs generally may I say that one of our programs has been to provide a useful day's work for an inmate so that he would have a feeling of self-respect, a feeling that he was doing something in which he could take some pride and also so that he might be accustomed or acclimatized, if you will, to the conditions which he would have to meet when he leaves the institution where he will be expected to do a full day's work for a full day's pay.

With this overcrowding condition with which we have been faced, with the concurrent problems I have outlined, we have found that the traditional prison day for a penitentiary inmate up to the present has generally found him locked in his cell before five o'clock in the afternoon and not released again until seven o'clock the following morning. It would seem that such an extended period of closed custody for an inmate every day, without an opportunity to associate with other human beings or to receive the benefit of training and counselling from staff members, is not calculated to prepare an inmate for the many problems that he has to face upon his return to free society.

Accordingly for the past half year an experiment has been conducted at Kingston penitentiary whereby substantial numbers of inmates, sometimes numbering as many as 200 or 250, are released from their cells during the early evening hours for educational and recreational purposes. These inmates play organized sports in the auditorium, watch educational movies and television programs or browse in the prison library. Thus far this experiment has demonstrated that it aids in the socialization of the inmate who in so many respects must live such an unnatural type of life in the institution and greatly promotes the lessening of tension which, if permitted to build up unduly, tends to lead to disturbances in the institution. It is certainly to be hoped that this form of evening training can be extended to other penitentiaries.

A program designed to help the inmate become aware of his responsibilities to the free community when he is released and also to help him achieve a better understanding of himself and his fundamental problems is carried on at Collin's Bay penitentiary in Ontario and also at British Columbia penitentiary. This program is proving to be successful and the intention is to extend it to all institutions.

In concluding my remarks in connection with this brief review of plans for the future and progress to date, I want to emphasize one thing, and that is that while my emphasis is, and I think must properly be, upon the changes we expect to make for the future, I would not want it to be overlooked that although we stress the shortcomings and the changes which should be made and ask parliament to support us in this expenditure we are asking for in order to make those changes, nevertheless credit must be given and never overlooked to the penitentiaries staff which have carried on so admirably in the past under the limited and difficult circumstances with which they have been faced. I think it is to the credit of the Canadian penitentiary system that our institutions have been run so free of trouble and by and large have done what could be done to turn an inmate out a better man than when he went in, and it has done that notwithstanding the limited resources with which it has had to work.

So I hope that the committee, in turning its face to the future and supporting us with respect to our program for the future, will not allow its concentration on future reforms —challenging and stimulating as they are— will not allow that emphasis on that aspect to overshadow altogether the debt of gratitude we owe to the staff who have served very faithfully in the past and at present.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the program outlined by the minister is already bringing good results, but what worries me is what happens when an inmate gets his freedom.

As the minister knows, because of the present situation with regard to unemployment it is very hard for a man who gets his freedom and enters civil life to find work. In this connection I should like to know whether we are making any efforts in this respect. Have we got rehabilitation officers assisting the inmate who has just got his freedom to find work? To what extent are we successful in this regard?

Mr. Fulton: There is a special placement section in the national employment service which, on notification that an inmate is within three months of his discharge date, sends a representative to interview him in the institution in order to analyse his past record of employment, assess his capabilities, and then the official returns and tries to find a job opportunity for him upon the inmate's discharge.

In addition to that, our parole officers across the country are available to serve not only inmates on parole but discharged inmates who may have problems in connection with employment. I should of course pay special tribute here to the work done by the voluntary after-care agencies such as the John Howard and Elizabeth Fry societies which do tremendous work in obtaining employment opportunities for inmates.

Although it will take a long time to develop, I am sure, we have in mind for the future an individual sponsorship program through the agencies of the voluntary organizations as well as through our own staff with the objective—this is an objective only; I am not giving a blueprint—that ultimately it might be possible for individual inmates to be sponsored by individuals or organizations even before they leave the penitentiary with a view to personal assistance in replacing them in society and particularly in placing them in jobs. We cannot place the onus exclusively on the individual or voluntary agency; we must accept a large part of the responsibility ourselves as the penitentiary branch, the parole service, and so on, but the objective is that every inmate who requires help in finding employment opportunities will receive personal assistance in doing so.

Mr. Broome: I should like to bring a couple of minor points to the attention of the minister. I spent a day with Warden Cummins in Westminster and I must say Mr. Cummins is one of the finest men I have ever met and I believe he must be of very great assistance to the department. But there are several rules which seem to be necessarily restrictive. For instance, when writing letters a prisoner is allowed one sheet of paper and he is limited to how many letters he can write. One particular prisoner wrote on both sides and wrote so finely that they said, "You can have two or three sheets of paper to write letters on".

Another point is with regard to visitors. This warden told me the regulations say that particularly female visitors have to be women of good repute and relatives; so he has more aunts of prisoners than really the prisoners have. As they say, they have to come in under the guise of being a relative. These prisoners need that contact with the outside world. He told me the story of one prisoner who said, "Warden, you know the sort of man I am and the life I have led; what decent self-respecting woman do you think would ever associate with me?"

In this effort of rehabilitation I think of these two considerations. I would think the penitentiary officials would want these men to do all the writing they possibly could. I was there last fall and maybe the regulations have been changed since then, but if they have not they certainly should be changed. In regard to visitors there should be a certain amount of reason exercised. I think there may be other regulations which have the same effect, but these two particular regulations I am talking about certainly are not conducive to helping a man keep in touch with the outside world and keeping him semi-prepared anyway for his re-entry into outside life.

As I said, I spent a day out there. I thought the penitentiary was exceedingly well run; the food was good. I do not suppose you could say the inmates looked happy, but they certainly looked contented, and I would like to pay tribute to Warden Cummins and the staff of British Columbia penitentiary.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support what has just been said by previous speakers. I know that we cannot under any circumstances mollycoddle those who have broken the law. If they break the law they have to accept the punishment for it. But I feel that the view of the Minister of Justice is that although there must be punishment and retribution, if you want to put it that way, the main aspect of the question is rehabilitation.

When one enters a penitentiary he goes into an entirely different world. I think it is about four weeks that you are in one section of the prison where you are questioned, where you are told the rules, where they try to understand you and then decide what you should do. After that, you are committed to the prison routine.

As I said this afternoon, I cannot understand a man wanting to go back to a life of that kind. Nor can I understand how a man can be placed in a position to rehabilitate himself when he is strictly limited in his contacts with the outside world. I agree with those who have said that there should be humanity with discipline and with punishment. To cut a person off from contact with those he knows and loves in the outside world is bad. Few things could be worse than the suppression of facilities for writing and receiving letters. Every letter, both in and out, is censored, so that the prison authorities know exactly what both the man and his correspondents are writing. Surely it is a good idea to keep these persons in contact with those they love and trust.

Mr. Chairman—or I should say, Madam Chairman. I am sorry; I was so interested in talking that I did not notice who had taken the chair—I believe the increase of these contacts is good, first because it helps toward rehabilitation and increases contact with the outside world and, second, because it provides a far better method of discipline than reliance on restriction and corporal punishment.

I am opposed to corporal punishment. I am opposed to severe discipline. I agree there has to be discipline, but this I know from years of visiting jails and penitentiaries; I have not met more than three inmates who would not prefer to take the lash or the paddle than to lose the privileges which they receive, whether they take the form of cigarettes, or reading matter, or radio, or the writing and receiving of letters. It is in the control over these privileges that the penitentiary authorities have the greatest power. That is the way in which the authorities can exercise discipline, by cutting out visitors and by cutting out the writing and the receiving of letters. I was very proud that one of my colleagues spoke earlier on this subject. I want to support what he said and ask that greater consideration be given to this phase of our subject.

There is one other matter that I wish to discuss, and the minister may perhaps be somewhat amazed that I should raise the question at the moment. The hon. gentleman spoke about the training which takes place at penitentiaries, training in masonry, carpentry and so forth. I know that in British Columbia at the present time we have a very serious unemployment problem, and there may be some who will misunderstand the proposal I am about to make. Over the years I have read with a great deal of interest what is being done in some of the states in the United States and what is being done in other countries in Europe where the authorities in charge of prisoners have sought to obtain the co-operation of employers and trade unions in this training work. I should like to ask the minister whether any approach along these lines has ever been made through the trade unions of Canada. I should like to know whether the trade unions have ever been asked to interest themselves in this problem of the rehabilitation of those who have broken the law. Have we ever asked the unions to co-operate and send into the institutions their experts in the fields of electronics, inside and outside wiring, carpentry, plumbing and so on as part of the educational process? It may be that when the inmates are released after completing their sentences they could continue in the work which they have learned as apprentices, improvers or journeymen. A certain number might be accepted in the trade union of the particular craft they have chosen and be sponsored by that particular trade union which would assist in their efforts to become rehabilitated.

I have read that in countries where this has been attempted it has proved very successful, and that co-operation between the trade unions, the employers and the prison authorities has worked out extremely well. I should like to ask the minister whether this approach has ever been tried in Canada and whether he thinks this is worth attempting.

I raise this question now at a time when a great many trade unionists are themselves out of work, but I am speaking on the principle, and I believe it would be well worth while to approach employers and trade unions on this matter of helping to instruct the inmates of our penitentiaries by means of lectures and so on and then invite them to co-operate to an extent as the prisoners come out and try to rehabilitate themselves. I think such an effort would be well worth while.

Mr. Fulton: To deal with the last mentioned subject first, I can assure the hon. member that we have had over the years extensive contacts and consultations with trade union organizations. I think particularly of Collin's Bay where trade union representatives came down and assisted us in setting up the training programs. They also attended the training graduation ceremonies of the inmates and took part in those celebrations. I am told they also donated a number of prizes for efficiency in the training programs that were carried on. We have close contacts with trade union organizations. I am not saying it could not be improved; probably indeed it could, as we bring more and more moves to bear and have more and more facilities for programs of vocational training. But we do have close relations with the trade union organizations.

Mr. Winch: Can the minister tell me of one trade union sponsored individual? I want it carried on.

Mr. Fulton: I cannot give the name at the moment but I am advised that certain trade unions have arranged for examinations of our inmates who have had their vocational training courses, and as a result of that examination they are given credit for their journeyman certificates which they complete when they go outside. That arrangement is not an unusual one to be made with respect to inmates and with respect to the relations with trade unions.

My hon. friend asked me about the contacts with the outside world. I am informed there are numerous channels of contact with the outside world for our inmates. There are, for instance, such associations as Alcoholics Anonymous for one. I am told that in some instances there are meetings of as large a number as 50 to 75 which take place through that organization. There are many other group visits and group discussions which are arranged between inmates and outside organizations.

In regard to mailing privileges, I can only say that the penitentiary regulations generally are being reviewed. But when my hon. friend refers to British Columbia he must realize that at the moment there we are running a maximum security institution, a non-segregated institution, where unfortunately we do have to apply the maximum security regulations with regard to censorship and so on. We do have some staff limitations, and it is those conditions that necessitate that institution having quite severe restrictions with regard to mailing privileges; but they do not necessarily have to be applied in other institutions across the country. The regulations are being reviewed to see whether and to what extent relaxation can be allowed.

Mr. Howard: When the minister was making his remarks I thought he would give us some indication with respect to the minimum security personnel at Joyceville, which has a population of 450. I did not get the name of the other institution to which the minister made reference.

Mr. Fulton: l'Institut Leclerc.

Mr. Howard: This is in the offing; this is something for the future?

Mr. Fulton: No; it will be opened this fall; construction is practically completed now.

Mr. Howard: Is it different from Joyceville?

Mr. Fulton: It is of the same general design as Joyceville; it will house approximately 450.

Mr. Howard: Can the minister give us some information on William Head, Valleyfield and Springhill?

Mr. Fulton: William Head, 100; Valleyfield, 100; Springhill, approximately 100.

Mr. Howard: Eleven hundred or 1,200, something of that nature?

Mr. Fulton: I think 1,200.

Mr. Howard: With respect to William Head, is it not possible to establish additional facilities there to take in more inmates? I understand this can be done.

Mr. Fulton: Of course, physically, we could expand; probably we could increase the number of inmates but I think we would have to look very carefully at whether it is desirable in a minimum security institution to have many more than 100 inmates because you might destroy the atmosphere. There is a limitation on the number you can have without increasing your staff, and perhaps we would increase the staff more than one would want to. We are trying to establish an atmosphere almost next door to discharge. It is a progression that the inmates make and I question whether any more than 100 would be desirable in that type of institution.

Mr. Howard: Very well. The rough estimate which was given by the minister earlier was to the effect that in 1952 we had an inmate population of 4,600. As I recall it, this was very close to the total number of available cells in the institutions at that time, so that probably in 1952 or 1953 we were close to having the penitentiaries completely filled, if not to some degree overcrowded. Since that time up to today we have added another 1,700 to the present penitentiaries, not counting the Joyceville institution and the other ones. Conditions are such today that even when you get such places as William Head, Valleyfield and Springhill into operation fully and completely you will be no better off than you were eight or 10 years ago. We will still not be able to tackle the question of rehabilitation and reformation to any extent within the institutions themselves.

We need a much more expanded and accelerated program, and additional institutions must be opened. In addition to the number in our penitentiaries there are 1,000 inmates who are convicted under the narcotics act. As I understood the minister, he said at any one time about one third the total number of addicts were being processed through the institutions. We need additional institutions to deal with the narcotic addicts and perhaps this would remove some of the overcrowding; but this is something for the future. It is not something that is going to occur tomorrow. As the minister said, there are certain limitations on the funds available, and so on.

In all probability, if the trends of the past are any indication of the future, with an increasing population in Canada, there is a possibility that we will continue to be in somewhat the same static position. The increasing facilities will not take care of the larger inmate population so that these institutions will be kept filled to the limit unless we can work effectively within the institutions on a program of reformation and rehabilitation.

I do not think it is possible to do this under the present program regardless of the high-mindedness of the people interested in this country. I asked the minister a number of questions about this last session and he was kind enough to give me a great deal of statistical information which appears on page 4984 of Hansard of June 19 of last year. I should like to make reference to this overcrowding in so far as it affects shop space or other space that is used within the institutions themselves for sleeping purposes.

The minister indicated here that shop space and corridors were being used for dormitory purposes in some institutions. I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver South noticed that in the institution that he visited some time ago. In Kingston shops that could be used for training and everything else are now used for dormitories. In Dorchester, for instance, in shop space and corridors there were facilities for 13 inmates. In St. Vincent de Paul there were temporary dormitories either in shop space or corridors for 122; in Kingston, 184; in Saskatchewan, 60; in British Columbia, 94; and at Collin's Bay, 80. Incidentally, Collin's Bay is not a penitentiary in the old maximum security sense; it is a training centre: there are shops there, and even in the Collin's Bay penitentiary they have shop space and corridors taken up for inmates. This is indicative of the overcrowding which existed last year, and this is going to continue and continue. Will you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member go on beyond ten o'clock? We could have called it ten o'clock before he finished what he was saying but did not do so. Can we not finish this department tonight? There are only two items left.

Mr. Winch: I also have something I want to raise.

Mr. Churchill: We could perhaps finish in ten minutes.

Mr. Howard: I think we should call it ten o'clock and follow the rules.

Mr. Fulton: I have only a few remarks to make in reply, but my hon. friends have made such a useful contribution already that I would have thought we could agree to conclude tonight.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, you will recall that we got into this same hassle last year at the same stage of the session. I can appreciate that at times there are circumstances in which it may be necessary to go on for a minute or two but I believe we establish an improper precedent by doing so. I have some further comments to make, the hon. member for Vancouver East has other comments and the minister himself indicated he has something he wishes to say. I am not trying to be difficult but I think we should stick to the rules unless they are altered by notice as they will be next week.

Mr. Chevrier: May I make a suggestion, that we allow the items on page 34 to pass and then allow the hon. member and any other hon. member who wants to discuss a matter concerning the minister's department to do so on the R.C.M.P. item which will be coming up later.

Mr. Fulton: There will be supplementary items too with respect to penitentiaries.

Mr. Chevrier: That is my suggestion for what it is worth.

Mr. Howard: I understand that there is perhaps also a desire to continue past ten o'clock so that the officials of the department can conclude their activities but if we are going to do what has been suggested by the hon. member for Laurier it will mean they will have to come back in any event.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business is for tomorrow and next week as well?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow it is the intention to suggest to the house that it rise at one o'clock in order that members may participate in the ceremonies on Dominion day. During the course of the two hours that the house is in session we will take up the bill of rights. With respect to next week and dealing with Monday first, following consultation with the parties on the other side of the house I am suggesting for consideration that in order to call the remaining three departments, privy council, Secretary of State and legislation, we commence with a motion to go into committee of supply but that we go into committee of supply without debate, call these items, that the committee then rise and report, and that with the Speaker back in the chair we continue the debate on the bill of rights. If that is agreeable to hon. members opposite they might so indicate now and then I will give the business for the rest of the week.

Mr. Chevrier: So far as we on this side of the house are concerned we are agreeable to waive our right to move an amendment of non-confidence on the motion to go into supply in accordance with the suggestion made by the house leader.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I think we are agreed as to this procedure but I wonder whether the leader of the house would care to have an order of the house made at this time that we rise at 1 p.m. tomorrow. I am wondering whether it is agreed by the three parties that we will rise at that time because I can say quite frankly that I have heard members of the opposition say that this is not going to be the case. I think we should have it clear tonight that we are in fact rising tomorrow at one o'clock, and if there is unanimous consent at this time an order should be made tonight changing the hours of sitting tomorrow so that in fact we will sit from eleven to one o'clock and will not get into a hassle with respect to whether we are coming back at 2.30.

Mr. Chevrier: That was not an answer to the question.

Mr. Churchill: Perhaps we could postpone that matter for a minute. I was wondering about the order of business for Monday which I suggested.

Mr. Argue: That is agreeable to us with respect to Monday.

Mr. Churchill: Then we can revert to the other matter with respect to whether or not the house will rise at 1 p.m. on Friday.

Mr. Speaker: May we deal first with the arrangement for Monday so that it will be definite? As I understand the proposal which hon. members are prepared to accept, it is that a supply motion will be moved on Monday but not debated.

Mr. Chevrier: That is right.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Churchill: Could we then have a decision with respect to the hours of sitting tomorrow, Dominion day?

Mr. Speaker: Is the house prepared to order that tomorrow's sitting be adjourned at one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. Churchill: With respect to the business for the other days of next week, Tuesday will be available for continuation of the debate on the bill of rights if so desired. If that should be completed, we have the department of forestry item on the order paper and there may be one or two other legislative items which will appear by that time. Wednesday, Thursday and Friday will be given over to the discussion of estimates in the following order: completion of the Department of Justice and the R.C.M.P., national revenue, transport, external affairs, northern affairs, labour and public works.

It being ten minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 1, 1960

The house met at 11 a.m.

DOMINION DAY

93RD ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on this the 93rd anniversary of confederation of our country I suggest that the house rise and sing O Canada and God Save the Queen.

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang O Canada and God Save the Queen.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF OFFICERS AND MEN FROM H.M.C.S. "CORNWALLIS"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether on this 93rd birthday of our country I might be allowed a momentary transgression of the rules of the house in order to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of 110 officers and men of the sunset guard, band and gun crews parading in this city from H.M.C.S. Cornwallis.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WARHEADS—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can inform the house whether the government is continuing to negotiate with the United States government over the acquisition of nuclear warheads for weapons for Canadian forces.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman did not give me notice on this matter, Mr. Speaker, and I would prefer to allow the question to stand until Monday so I could give an answer in the fullest detail. Any expurgated answer at this time which would result from failure to cover the entire situation might be misunderstood in its context.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I quite realize that I did not give the Prime Minister notice; my question was based on information which appeared only a few hours ago in the press. Does the Prime Minister not think it is desirable to remove at once the confusion which has been created by the different answers given on this subject by different ministers?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I at once refuse to accept the suggestion that any confusion has been created by the statements made. The interpretation of them may be confused, but the actual statements have been clear.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister not tell the house and the country whether negotiations are or are not going on now? Does the Prime Minister not know?

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—INQUIRY AS TO CANADIAN ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On this occasion of a further general reduction in tariffs among common market countries, and in view of the urgent consideration which is being given by the United Kingdom, according to reports, to associating itself in some way with the common market, can the minister say whether there is any likelihood of Canada being associated with either the outer seven or the inner six, and what consideration is being given to this very urgent trade problem?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this question arises from time to time in the house and answers have been given; this is a repetition of earlier questions.

I pointed out just a few days ago that negotiations are going on. Canadian officials have been in Europe, and they are still there, negotiating with members of the common market and outer seven groups. Later in the month of July there will be a meeting on the ministerial level which will be considering the problems raised by the question of the hon. member.

The situation is kept constantly under review, and Canada's position with regard to any proposed restrictions on trade has been repeatedly put before the members of the two regional trading groups in Europe. Later during the summer there may be a more comprehensive report available with regard to the whole situation.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would comment on the report and tell the house whether there have been Canadian government studies made; and would he comment on the statement that these studies reveal that the common market is likely to set its price for wheat 20 per cent above the world price in order to call forth increased production within the common market countries and displace a large part of Canada's exports to this area?

Mr. Churchill: Studies of the problem have been made and are continuing. As I reported last week, I think it was, representatives of Canada and of the United States, Australia, Argentina and the wheat exporting countries have been discussing agricultural policies with representatives of the common market. It is quite possible that there will be an increase in the production of wheat in Europe, and that increase in production, if confined to consumption within Europe, will have the effect of restricting imports of wheat. The imports of wheat which will be affected most seriously are those from Argentina, the United States and Australia, who are producers of soft wheat, which is the same type of wheat produced in Europe.

The same or an equal effect will not be felt by Canadian wheat exports, Canadian wheat being a hard wheat which is used in substantial quantities for mixing with the soft wheats which are grown in Europe. Over a period of several years it may well be that exports of Canadian hard wheat to Europe will be restricted, but that is something in the future. We are watching it very closely indeed, and it is because of that development that may occur within the course of the next five years or so that we are making very great efforts to expand our markets for wheat and flour in the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): A supplementary question. In the light of the announcement made this morning of tariff cuts, which now amount to 20 per cent in so far as the common market countries are concerned, and in the light of the answer the minister has given with regard to wheat exports, can the minister say what effect this reduction will have on Canadian exports generally to these countries?

Mr. Churchill: That will have to be examined. I was reading the press report today to which I assume the hon. member is referring, and I draw the attention of the house to the fact that despite the reduction in tariffs among the six nations in Europe their trade with the outside world increased by 8 per cent, which bears out what I have said on many occasions here in the house that Europe is one of the great trading areas of the world, just as dependent on exports for the maintenance of its economy as we are and just as interested in maintaining its position in world trade. The fact that its trade with the outside world has increased by 8 per cent is an indication of the outward-looking factors in so far as the European nations are concerned.

I think this is just another indication of the expansion of world trade. Canada's position has been very clearly put to the European trading nations. As I have repeatedly stated in the house, in conversations I have had with ministers of trade and commerce of nations of the Six and the Seven in Europe, each one has told me that his hope is for expanded trade with Canada and the other nations outside Europe.

Mr. Chevrier: It is true, as the minister has stated, that there has been an increase of 8 per cent in the trade of the six common market countries with the outside world. On the other hand there has been an increase of almost 30 per cent—29 per cent is the figure I have before me—in trade within the common market itself, and the question which comes to my mind is this. What measures is the government taking to protect our exports in the light of this declaration?

Mr. Churchill: All measures that are possible. I should like to examine the subject more fully when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce are before us for consideration, as they will be shortly.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REPORTED STATEMENT BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I have a question to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice. Was the parliamentary secretary expressing the views of the government when he said last Saturday that New Brunswick, and I quote "—must have the leadership of Hugh John Flemming if we are to get our just due at the federal-provincial fiscal conference in July"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not asking a question which comes within the administrative responsibility of the government. I would remind the house also, as I said the other day, that the matter to which the question relates no longer has any urgency.

COAL

CAPE BRETON—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO EFFICIENCY OF OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys in reference to a statement attributed to President Michael MacLean of Princess local, united mine workers of America, as reported in the Cape Breton Post of June 27, which reached me this morning. This report states:

> President MacLean asserted that in the face of reports of additional government financial assistance it would appear that the company is deliberately attempting to scuttle the coal industry in this district.

In view of this statement and others indicating that the actions of the company are causing alarm with respect to the future of the industry, would the minister consider having technicians from the dominion coal board go to the area in order to investigate the situation in the interests of the Canadian people and of the coal miners in particular?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): In answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, it would not seem advisable to send mining experts to the coal operations of Dosco just at this time, in view of the fact that I am informed that the Rand commission recently had an internationally recognized mining and management engineer spend several weeks covering all aspects of Dosco's operations. His findings will no doubt form an important part of the Rand commission report which is expected to be released soon. When this document is received the whole question of mining operations in the area can again be reviewed in the light of what is reported at that time. I know the hon. member will take up the matter with me again after the report is published, in the interests of his constituents, and I will be glad to talk to him then.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ELLIOT LAKE—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the report that the provincial government of Ontario is going to announce its program of assistance for Elliot Lake, has the federal government decided to make a similar announcement with regard to its program at the same time?
