SIXTEENTH YEAR

By the discovery of the bodies of two murdered children in the cellar of a house at 16 St. Vincent-street, yesterday afternoon the first definite facts were unearthed in a crime so startling in its nature that it forms a chapter unequalled in the criminal history of the world. The story of the "Babes in the Wood," related in the old Second Reader, bears some resemblance to it, but the wicked uncle in the tragedy so vividly related by Campbell removed but the two children, whereas in the present case the man who so ruthlessly slaughtered these babes is known to have previously killed at least four persons, and during his short life of 34 years has been guilty of every variety of crime, including burglary and decapitation, and the bodies procured from morgues and medical colleges.

The perpetrator of the murders, a man named H. H. Holmes, is at present an inmate of the Philadelphia jail, awaiting sentence on a charge of fraud. The case against him there will, however, doubtless now be abandoned and an attempt will be made in October to convict him of the murder of Pitezel. In the event of his discharge for this murder, and there is no evidence against him, he will be turned over to the Toronto authorities for trial.

A GRIEVING FIND

Actual Discovery in the Cellar of a St. Vincent-street Residence.

On Wednesday last The World published a lengthy article detailing the arrival here of Frank Geyer, a detective connected with the Philadelphia police, in the company of a detective who was the father of the two children named Edna Annie Pitezel, aged 13, and Nellie Pitezel, aged 11, the daughters of Benjamin Pitezel of Philadelphia. Detective Geyer, who had just arrived from Detroit, was accompanied by the father of the two children, who had been brutally murdered and their bodies cremated in this city by a man named H. H. Holmes, who is awaiting trial in Philadelphia. Detective Geyer, who is said to be a very experienced investigator, is said to be a very experienced investigator, and is said to be a very experienced investigator.

and they stopped digging and communicated with Inspector Starbuck. The inspector instructed the men to secure an undertaker, R. D. Humphrey of Yonge-street was called. In the presence of the detectives he continued the work of unearthing the remains and speedily unearthed the bodies of the two children. The search of Geyer was not without result. The features of the bodies were not visible—were calm and the soil had probably assisted to a certain extent in preserving the contour of decay, although both bodies were badly putrefied. There could be no doubt from the circumstances that the graves were dug by murderous hands from the recent dead.

"Lift them gently and steadily, poor things," said one of the officers. No need to tell them to be gentle. If these poor babes had been their own children dead or dying they could not have raised the helpless forms from the earth more tenderly or borne them more reverently and with more respect to the undertaker's wagon. There was no trace of violence. But for the suspicious signs of the secret interest which the bodies denote guilt, there was nothing to mark the case as one of assassination. How the children were killed is not yet developed as the result of the post-mortem which has been ordered by Coroner A. J. Johnson.

The hole in which the bodies were discovered was about four feet square and a half feet deep, allowing for the occupant. The younger child, Nellie, lay in a cramped position with its head to the north-west, and its little legs pointing almost north, while the elder child had evidently been carelessly thrown in on top of the other and was lying facing to the south-east and the legs parted. Both bodies were in a terribly decomposed state, the faces being almost unrecognizable. When a World reporter visited the cellar his eyes met a most ghastly sight. A yawning hole, about eight feet in diameter, was in a corner of the cellar, right at the foot of the seven small steps on which lay the bodies of the two murdered children. The larger child was lying face downward, her matted hair hanging over the right shoulder. The smaller child was lying on her right side and her plaited hair, which had fallen over her face, was lying around her. A few inches from her face, a hand lamp carried by Detective Cuddy cast a weird light over the horrible scene. The dreadful stench arising from the bodies was indistinguishable.

THE RENTAL OF THE HOUSE

Holmes' Actions at the Time Excited Suspicion Among Neighbors.

The owner of the premises in which the bodies were found is Mrs. F. Nudel, who resides at 24 Henry-street. She stated that she rented the house some time in October last to a man who gave his name as Howard at $10 per month. Howard came round some time in the middle of October, one Saturday afternoon, and he agreed to take the house at $10 a month for six months, and wished to pay the rent for the six months in advance. Mrs. Nudel, who was leading to the kitchen, the other house could conveniently see into the back yard of the other.

Mr. Nudel, who is a World reporter, was doing something about the house, and the children played about on the porch. The house was taken over by Mrs. Nudel, who is a widow, and she is said to be a very experienced investigator. THE PITEZEL MYSTERY SOLVED.

Bodies of the Two Children Found Buried in a St. Vincent-street Cellar.

The Ghoulish Discovery Made by Detectives Yesterday—Holmes, the Philadelphia Insurance Fiend, Was an Imitator of Burke and Hare, the Glasgow Murderers—Rented a House, Smothered the Babes Between a Mattress and Pillow, Dug Their Graves Beneath the Kitchen Floor and Buried Them—He Had Previously Killed the Father of the Children and a Brother in Detroit and Cremated the Latter in a Furnace—A Series of Crimes Unparalleled on the Continent Brought to Light.

neighbors of last fall were the persons who had net some friends who were connected with the Philadelphia Insurance Company and had spent the day in the city. This story has been investigated by Detective Geyer and Cuddy and proven to be a fabrication. The true explanation, had the man chosen to have his lessor, was that with the borrowed spade he had been digging the graves of the young innocents.

The following morning he called, as was his custom, at the Albion Hotel for the breakfast. What took place on that morning of entering the house on that morning is known only to Holmes, and can only be known by the evidence which Detective Geyer has accumulated against him. It is a story which will be related in the true story of the crime, the death of the children will never be definitely known.

tells of the crimes which Holmes is now known to have committed:

CHAPTER I.
This is the story of a man whose thirst for knowledge made him a criminal. It is the story of Herman W. Mudgett, alias H. H. Howard, alias H. H. Holmes. Until the Philadelphia detective came to Toronto and enlisted the services of the United States had been unable to fasten the crime of murder on the suave, self-contained man, who promptly on his arrest pleaded guilty to defrauding insurance companies, with a hope that he would be immediately sentenced for that crime and the officers would drop inquiry as to the mysterious disappearance of numerous people who had crossed his path during the past 10 or 12 years.

When counted by the marks of crime, it is a long road back to the days when Holmes, a ruddy-faced, middle-aged farmer boy up in the New Hampshire hills. He was born a short distance from London, N.H., and grew up into a strong, active lad, rather wild, but with a thirst for knowledge that was surprising in one so young. Notwithstanding the fact that he was something of a black sheep, he studied day and night, and through the small country schoolmaster who gave him his lessons. At the age of 16 he left the old farmhouse and began to teach school at Gilsum, in the same town where he had been born. He was rather saving in those days. Possibly even then he was dreaming of great achievements in the world. He had not a penny to his name, but he was not satisfied. He must have education, but first he must have money. He began to save. Dollar by dollar he hoarded away enough money to attend the State Normal School at Keene, N.H. Just about this time, however, he met a rosy-cheeked country girl, fell into a transient infatuation, and was married. He had not a penny to his name, but he was not satisfied. BURIED IN A PORTLAND CEMENT. Destruction of the Cibola Attended With Loss of Life.

William Hammond, the Third Engineer, Meets a Horrible Death - James Woodward, Second Engineer, Swims for His Life - Forty Sleepers Awakened in Time to Cross a Burning Gang-plank to Safety - Origin of the Fire a Mystery - Stories of the Two Watchmen Given at the Inquest - The Cibola's Hull Ashore at Youngstown - The Total Loss $100,000.

Visitors from Toronto, Buffalo, Hamilton and all adjacent places flocked to the scene of the catastrophe...

No Fire in Her All Day. The Cibola had been tied up at Lewiston all day Sunday...

The Gangplank Burned Under Them. There were 40 or more people sleeping on board the Cibola...

The Burned Steamer Cibola. Walsh and his wife and Miss Minnie Guy were sleeping on the first deck...

The Question of Salvage. Capt. Crangle believes that there is a salvage amounting to $100,000...

Inquest on the Remains. The remains of the third engineer, William Hammond, were found in a box...

Adrift and Afloat. A stiff breeze was blowing diagonally from the Canadian shore up the river...

Just before she floated off some surprising curiosity seeker chipped off with an ax the gilt railing that served as her fireproof and carried it off for a souvenir.

The indescribably swift spread of the flames is accounted for by the inflammable character of which the upper works of the vessel were composed.

Clifford Roberts, the steward, was killed when the remains of silver which he had left on board...

The Watchman's Story. Robert Kelly, the watchman who gave the alarm of fire, says that he had been on duty since 9 o'clock...

Various Theories of Cause. The Cibola burned soft coal, and it has been suggested that the cause of the fire was a spark from the boiler...

Among the Insurance Men. Yesterday afternoon a busy insurance man went over from Toronto to investigate the cause of the fire...

Woodward's Escape, Hammond's Fearful Fate. When the boat was 150 feet from the land a cry went up from the head of the boat...

Hammond's Antecedents. Hammond was an Irishman about 30 years of age and had been in Canada about 15 years...

The Cibola was lying with her bow up the river when she caught fire and burst out at right angles as her moorings swung
