Mr. Lapointe: The hon. member will remember that last year we amended the act to increase the ceilings and the rates, and in so doing we brought in additional veterans. It turned out that we had overestimated the number who might qualify for assistance from the fund. Furthermore, by raising the rates some people who might have applied for assistance under the fund did not do so.

In making our estimate this year we went by our experience last year, but from what has happened in April, May and June it would appear that we may have underestimated. As compared with the same months last year the number of applications received in April, May and June this year were 40 per cent higher.

As of March 31, 1956, there were 6,256 recipients who were receiving assistance from the fund, and of that number 3,070 represented new applications made during the year, the balance being carried over from the previous year. Of the 2,072 veterans receiving allowances on the basis of married rates, 1,574 received $10 per month or more. Out of a total of 272 widows, 232 received $10 per month or more. Of those two groups, 311 received single payments averaging $58 per year.

In the case of those on single rates, out of 1,501 veterans, 756 received $8 per month or more; out of 1,467 widows, 1,158 received $8 per month or more. In that group 560 received average single payments of $42. Out of a total of 2,348 married rate recipients, 2,117 received assistance at the rate of 85 per cent or more. Out of 2,968 recipients, 2,474 received assistance at the rate of 80 per cent or more.

Mr. Harkness: A rapid bit of mental arithmetic would indicate that the figures the minister has given indicate that the average payment was around $7 per month instead of $10. It would seem to me that as the amount involved here is almost negligible considering our general revenues, being $100,000 or something less than that, this is a case where the legislation and the regulations should be applied in the most liberal manner possible.

I see the minister nodding his head in agreement. I hope that in future years these people will be given the maximum amount the law allows, the $10 per month, without too much question being asked; because, as I say, the total amount of money involved is very small. For people who are getting say $60 per month total income plus the amount of this allowance, if they get $10 per month perhaps they can just get by, whereas if they get only $66 or $67 per month it may mean a terrific amount of hardship. It is a question of people on an extraordinarily low total income where every dollar makes a great deal of difference as to whether they merely exist or perhaps exist with one, two or three of the simple pleasures of life.

Mr. Lapointe: I think the hon. member will recall that in my opening statement I did mention that, basing ourselves on last year's experience, although the formula used for the assistance fund had been broadened last year, there were cases where we did not think it met the problem, and members of my department were looking into this to try to find a solution to those problems.

Mr. Thomas: I could ask this question either on item 508 or item 509. What will be the relationship between the new unemployment assistance act and the war veterans allowance and war veterans' assistance? Is there any agreement between the two departments as to which will look after the borderline cases? Has the Department of Veterans Affairs agreed more or less to look after the borderline cases of those who might be veterans, or will they be dealt with under the unemployment assistance act? Where are they going to draw the line?

Mr. Lapointe: I should not like to make any definite pronouncement on the matter. I should think that any assistance received under the new act would, as the present War Veterans Allowance Act stands, have to be considered as income for the purpose of this act. The problem has not arisen as yet, and I can assure my hon. friend that we shall study this situation.

Mr. Thomas: What worries me about this is the fact that it could be quite convenient for the Department of Veterans Affairs to disclaim any responsibility in many of these cases and put the onus on the unemployment assistance act, under which the cost would be shared by the provincial government.

Mr. Lapointe: At the present time, payments for unemployment under the Unemployment Insurance Act are considered as income under the War Veterans Allowance Act, and they have to be taken into consideration when computing the permissible income of the recipient of war veterans allowance. I should think that principle would apply to the new act but, as I said, the matter has not been studied as yet.

Mr. Thomas: It is not exactly a parallel comparison, because the new act, the unemployment assistance act, is drawn up in such a way as to supplement the Unemployment Insurance Act; and there would not be much overlap between the Unemployment Insurance Act and the war veterans allowance or assistance, but there might be between the unemployment assistance and the war veterans allowance. It appears to me that there might possibly be a tendency to take many of these borderline cases who are applying for war veterans allowance or war veterans assistance and place them under the unemployment assistance act, in which case the province would be responsible for carrying a part of the burden.

Mr. Lapointe: It will be looked into, but I might say that in the past the situation has been that where there are borderline cases we get them under the war veterans allowance.

Miscellaneous payments—

511. To provide for payments to the last post fund; for the payment under regulations of funeral and cemetery charges, including the perpetual care of graves where applicable; for the cost and erection of headstones in Canada; for the maintenance of departmental cemeteries; for the maintenance of Canadian battlefields memorials in France and Belgium and for Canada's share of the expenditures of the imperial war graves commission, $1,393,713.

Mr. Harkness: I note in the details on page 613 of the estimates that the grant to the imperial war graves commission is $467,000 this year, whereas it was $518,000 last year. Could the minister tell us the reason for that decrease? As I stated this afternoon, I was extraordinarily impressed with the work the war graves commission is doing and the care it is giving to the cemeteries where our Canadian war dead are buried in Europe. My understanding was that our payment to the imperial war graves commission was on a per capita basis; in other words, that we paid so much per grave. I wondered whether this decrease meant that we had decreased the amount we were paying per grave, which I should think, in view of what I saw in several score of cemeteries last summer, would not be a good move.

Mr. Lapointe: No, the amount we pay is set by the commission. It is on a pro rata basis on the number of Canadian graves in those cemeteries. At the present time the imperial war graves commission is completing the construction stage of its work in our cemeteries, and in many of them, as my hon. friend knows, their work consists in maintenance of the cemeteries. Hence their budget has gone down, and our share of that budget has decreased accordingly. However, the commission set the amount. They bill us for the work they do for Canadian graves over there.

512. Grant to army benevolent fund, $8,000.

Mr. Quelch: Could the minister say who administers the benevolent fund and just what veterans benefit under that fund?

Mr. Lapointe: The army benevolent fund, as my hon. friend knows, is set up under statute. It is administered by a board headed by General Murchie. The members of that board are: Lieutenant General Murchie, chairman; Brigadier Gauvreau, Montreal; Captain Peck, Vancouver; Lieutenant General Sansom, of Fredericton, I believe, but representing the Canadian Legion; and Major Wickens, representing the national council of veterans' associations. They do their work through the officers of provincial committees. There is a committee for each province of people who in a benevolent fashion do that work for the fund. They have a central office, and every year they make their annual report to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, and that report is tabled in the house.

Mr. Quelch: What kind of cases would be looked after?

Mr. Lapointe: They are all world war II veterans who can benefit from the fund, because it was made up of regimental funds, mess funds and so on accumulated in the second world war. Their work involves a welfare program, financial assistance and vocational training of children of veterans. They will endeavour as much as possible to help in the rehabilitation of veterans and in meeting major emergencies with which the veteran cannot cope because of the high financial cost that might be involved. They will also help in re-establishing a veteran who is in bad financial circumstances by advancing money, possibly getting agreement among his creditors to accept certain sums, and set him back on his feet.

Mr. Quelch: What is the total amount of the fund at this time?

Mr. Lapointe: The balance in the fund as of March 31, 1956, was $8,088,045. The program of expenditure is laid out in such a way as to endeavour to keep the fund going for 50 years from the date of the end of the war. That was the recommendation made by the veterans affairs committee when that statute was studied.

Mr. Quelch: Is it supposed to be in the form of a revolving fund?

Mr. Lapointe: Oh, no. The money is held as a special account in the consolidated revenue fund, and the expenditures are actually made out of the fund so that 50 years after the end of the war the fund will have been totally expended.

Mr. Thomas: Could the minister tell us what the expenditures were for each of the last five years, and how much was for administration?

Mr. Lapointe: The figures I have here show the total disbursements since the inception of the fund. The figures cover the last three years, and by figuring the difference between these amounts I would be able to tell how much was actually expended. In 1953-54 total disbursements had reached $2,354,473. In 1954-55 they had reached $2,901,984, and for 1955-56 that figure had reached $3,368,373. It works out, I think, that slightly over $400,000 a year is expended from the fund.

Mr. Thomas: Is there any way of telling what were the administrative expenses?

Mr. Lapointe: For the year ended March 31, 1956, the administrative expenses were $70,068.

Mr. Regier: Did I understand the minister to say that for an expenditure of some $400,000 odd the administrative costs were some $70,000 odd? I should like to be sure on that point.

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry; I did not quite catch the question.

Mr. Regier: Did I understand the minister correctly that last year for a total disbursement of $400,000 odd the costs of administration were $70,000 odd?

Mr. Lapointe: The actual amount spent by way of grants to veterans during the year was $465,155. However, the benevolent fund also does the service work for the army welfare fund, which is a national defence organization or project. The personnel of the army benevolent fund organization do that work for them, and in that particular field they made loans to servicemen amounting to $277,754 and grants to servicemen amounting to $100,573. In their yearly operation, therefore, they gave direct financial assistance totalling $843,482; that is, they had operations involving that amount. I find that the figure I gave as to the cost of operation was not correct. It was $67,793.

Item agreed to.

513. Grant to Canadian Legion, $9,000.

Mr. Regier: What is the annual income of the organization called the Canadian Legion to which we pay a grant of $9,000 a year? What I should like to know is how much is the annual income of the Canadian Legion, to which we pay a grant of $9,000.

Mr. Lapointe: The Canadian Legion, as my hon. friend knows, is definitely not a part of the Department of Veterans Affairs, and we have no way of knowing just what their financial statement is. It is given yearly to the members of the Legion and is studied at their conventions. I have seen it at times but I have just not got it. It is not part of my business to do so. The grant to the Legion is paid in order to help defray the cost of their service bureau, which was started some years ago. The original grant was $10,000, and it was reduced to $9,000 in the thirties. The purpose of the grant is to help the Legion to defray the cost of the service bureau where they do considerable work which otherwise might have to be done by the Department of Veterans Affairs. That part of their operation is audited by our department treasury officers, and I can assure my hon. friend that the expenses of the Canadian Legion service bureau are considerably higher than the grant which is made by the department.

Mr. Regier: I wonder whether the minister could give us some more details as to what services the service bureau offers. I listened carefully to the minister, and I am not exactly sure as to whether this grant should be $9,000, $900 or $900,000. If it is for a justifiable cause I am sure this house would be willing to endorse $900,000. I feel that the minister's explanation is a little inadequate. I do not know why the grant should be $9,000 rather than $900 or $900,000. Exactly what does the bureau offer?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Chairman, the service bureau of the Canadian Legion handles many cases of veterans before the pension commission, and before the war veterans allowance board; it also brings to our notice welfare cases which exist in the various regions of the country and of which they are aware but of which we might not be aware.

As to the specific amount of $9,000, as I mentioned earlier, it was originally $10,000. It was reduced to $9,000 and the Legion has never asked for more. We audit their books and find that the cost of operation of the service bureau is much higher than our grant. I would think possibly one of the reasons they do not want more is that they do not want to be too dependent on the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Canadian pension commission—

514. Administration expenses, $2,298,111.

Mr. Blair: I have some questions to ask of the minister with regard to this estimate. The first one applies to the Hong Kong veterans. It is not a very large group. I will go over these questions slowly so that the minister will have time to take them down. It will be recalled that this group had a rather, as I might describe it, different form of service and that they did suffer—if I might use the word—peculiar forms of disability in comparison with those suffered by other servicemen. We have been assured that this group was being closely watched with regard to eye trouble and various other disabilities. If the minister will jot these questions down as I go along, I should be obliged to him.

My first question is this, if the information is obtainable. How many of this group are pensioned at the present time? It is not a very large group. It was a brigade, so it should not be very difficult to get this information in a rough way. My second question will be this. How many of those formerly pensioned are now deceased? I am trying to get some idea of the mortality of that group. My third question will be—

Mr. Lapointe: I am sorry, but I did not hear my hon. friend's first question.

Mr. Blair: How many of those formerly pensioned are now deceased? My third question is this. How many of those at present living have had increases in their pensions? My fourth question is, how many have had their pensions decreased? While the minister is going over those questions, I have another one to ask. While it may not apply directly to the Department of Veterans Affairs, nevertheless I think some information could be derived which would be useful.

I refer to coronary disease. I am aware that coronary disease is not regarded as pensionable by the Canadian pension commission or by the British commission, though I think there is a pension for aggravation. If this information that I am trying to bring out were available, I think it should be made available to the medical people in general. Are there any statistics available on the number of veterans who have suffered this disability? In a rough way, what has been your experience with it as to the effect of long service or difficult service, undergoing the stress and strain of service, particularly in the first war where men had four years in the trenches under a rather arduous type of service? Has it been shown from the statistics of the Department of Veterans Affairs that this service had any effect on the percentage of coronary disease?

Probably that is not quite a fair question to throw at the minister. On the other hand, I think it would be valuable information to have. If it could be worked out even later it would be satisfactory. If a study could be made of the matter it might help out in an attempt to solve the problem of the effect of stress as far as this disease is concerned. If that latter information is not available, possibly the minister could give me information on the first four questions with respect to the Hong Kong group, so far as he is able to do so from the statistics at hand.

Mr. Lapointe: I very much regret to say this but I am afraid I cannot give any detailed information on this matter.

Mr. Blair: What has been the experience?

Mr. Lapointe: I refer to the Hong Kong veterans. We have not here any figures which would sort out the Hong Kong pensioners as compared with other veterans. I can tell my hon. friend that about 95 per cent of them are pensioned or have entitlement. Of that fact I am aware. Most of them are high disability pensioners. We have followed very closely that type of pensioner in our hospitals and treatment services. I refer to the Hong Kong veterans. Because of the particular maltreatment they underwent over there, a Hong Kong veteran will come into a hospital and it is understood he can be examined at any time for his condition. He receives what you might practically call special treatment because of the particular circumstances of the service performed. I shall endeavour to get those figures.

Mr. Blair: I thank the minister.

Mr. Lapointe: I shall be pleased to let my hon. friend have them. As to the other questions he asked, I think the matter would more properly come under treatment services. I know that at the present time some research work is being done on coronary disease in connection with veterans, particularly older veterans. I am afraid I am not an expert in the medical field, and I could not give any details about that matter. However, I shall certainly see to it that the hon. member is made familiar with any developments that we have found in that field.

Mr. Blair: I thank the minister.

Item agreed to.

515. Pensions for disability and death, including pensions granted under the authority of the civilian government employees (war) compensation order, P.C. 45/8848 of November 22, 1944, which shall be subject to the Pension Act; and including Newfoundland special awards, $132,769,300.

Mr. Harkness: So far the minister has not said anything with regard to the case of Stanley Hepworth to which I referred this afternoon. I think it is important, from two points of view, that something definite be done with regard to this case and others of the same nature. I think it is important first of all from the point of view of the reputation of the Department of Veterans Affairs itself, and second from the point of view of the general morale of the Canadian militia and the matter of getting recruits. When you have the situation of a man who served five years overseas and proved his mettle by winning the Military Medal; who served six years in the militia and had an extraordinarily good record; who obeyed the orders of his commanding officer to turn out on a parade and who, as a result of turning out on the parade, lost his life; and when really because of a technicality based on a mischance when he lost his life his widow has been turned down for pension, I think you have a situation which calls into question in the minds of a large number of people the claims which we have heard that our veterans' legislation is the best in the world. It also discourages people from joining the militia or continuing in the militia.

It seems to me it is just not good enough to leave the situation as it is. This one case which I have mentioned happens to illustrate the matter particularly well, but there have been other cases of the same kind. It is not good enough to leave the situation where it stands. I think the minister owes it to his own department and to the defence department as well as to this house to make some kind of statement in regard to this particular section 13 (2), I believe it is, of the Pension Act, as to what can be done in order to correct what I think is a very unfortunate state of affairs in regard to this particular case as well as cases generally along this line.

Mr. Lapointe: This case which my hon. friend mentioned, Mr. Chairman, is one which would come under section 13 (2) of the Pension Act. This is the section which makes provision in respect of military service in peacetime, whether in the regular service or in the militia. It differs in certain respects from service in wartime, but I do not think I need to go into that; he is quite familiar with it.

In the case which the hon. member mentioned this afternoon, I did have a few heated words with the hon. member for Prince Albert, but I think that was mostly the result of a misunderstanding on both our parts. The facts have to be put before the commission. Now, the facts as they were put before the members of the committee by the hon. member I would say were very well put forward. It is impossible for me to pass any judgment on the decision that was rendered without being able to see whether those facts were actually put before the commission. It does happen quite often that on the initial hearing all the facts which would justify the commission in making an award are not put forward. I take it from what my hon. friend said this afternoon that this was the first hearing.

Mr. Harkness: The second hearing is over.

Mr. Lapointe: At any rate, I think he will understand how difficult it is for me to pass any judgment on the case without being able to see the facts that were put forward. In any event, it would be out of order for me to make any remarks about a decision rendered by the pension commission, which is a completely autonomous body where the minister has no discretion whatever to interfere.

But it does present a problem. I have been informed by the commission that fortunately most of these cases that are brought forward are quite clear-cut. But there are some that are marginal cases, and it is very difficult for people to decide whether a man was or was not on duty. I know of a couple of such cases that have come to my knowledge. As a matter of fact in these cases, the services, particularly in the last year or two, have been most helpful. The chairman and members of the commission have explained to the services how they must protect the interests of their own men by making it clear whether or not the man was on duty. I have known of cases myself in which the adjutant general or the A.A.G., have come up and explained the circumstances of service under which the accident took place, and favourable decisions have been rendered.

Following the consideration of the estimates last year I looked into this particular section. I do not know how the section can be changed unless the principle which exists now is departed from altogether. I do not know how the mere wording of the section could be changed to achieve the purpose which my hon. friend has in mind, because it is a question of the interpretation of the facts by the commission. We may think at times they are wrongly interpreted. Of course one is free to form one's judgment on the matter, but the wording of the section is correct so far as I can see and does afford the protection it was intended to give to those serving members. I would think that the case which my hon. friend has mentioned is possibly a marginal case, and I think it would be very proper for the person concerned to appeal the case.

Mr. Harkness: I do not believe this is a case, as the minister has indicated, where the facts have not been put forward. I think the facts have been put forward. The difficulty is, as I said, that the decision has been made really on a technicality. It was founded on a mischance. In other words the army transport which was supposed to be provided for the members of this unit to go to this parade had a breakdown. As a result it did not appear and the senior officer on the spot gave instructions or orders that the men who were there would then go in private cars. There happened to be a sufficient number of private cars there owned by these people. They went in those private cars and this man was killed in a private car returning from the parade. Because it was a private car and not a military vehicle and was not on a per diem or mileage basis, the application for pension has been turned down. Really it amounts to that.

In other words, as I say, it is a technicality based on a mischance. I believe that is the sort of thing that it should be within our capability and within the capability of the department to overcome, to ensure that an injustice is not done. This unfortunate set of circumstances technically left the case outside the provisions of the Pension Act. Really all I am asking is that the minister and the government look into this and if it is necessary pass an order in council or do something else to overcome that particular difficulty.

Mr. Churchill: This is the section 13, subsection 2 which has been causing so much difficulty for a number of years. The answer the minister gives is that the pension commission is an independent body. We accept that. When an inquiry is made of the pension commission they say they have to conduct their proceedings and make their decisions in accordance with the act. The act can be changed only by parliament, and the person who should introduce such a change is the minister. Last year in the estimates committee he told us that this section 13 subsection 2 was under consideration. He has now reported that it has been considered and he sees no way in which it can be altered.

The hon. member for Calgary North has raised now a very good example of the weakness of the act as it is interpreted by the pension commission. It is only about four years ago that I raised in this house a somewhat similar case affecting a member of the regular forces who lost his life. Again it was section 13, subsection 2 under which the decision was rendered. When the hon. member for Calgary North was talking about this particular instance, naturally my mind went back to the McAulay case that I raised before the appeal board of the pension commission and spoke about in the House of Commons. The people who suffer under these decisions which the pension commission finds it has to make in accordance with the act are the widows and children. Surely that is not the intention of parliament or the Canadian people.

In both these instances, the one raised by the hon. member for Calgary North and the one I raised four years ago, the men had given first class service overseas. In the case to which I referred the man continued in the regular army back home, and in the case referred to by the hon. member for Calgary North the man continued in the militia. Both men gave continuous service in the interests of the Canadian armed forces. In both cases the widows are now left without assistance; in both cases the men were acting under orders, as we see it, and both the hon. member for Calgary North and I have had some military experience. In both cases the pension commission found that these accidents were not directly connected with military service. It just does not make sense to us.

I recall in the McAulay case I was informed by a member of the pension commission that the corporal who later was killed should have refused to obey the order of the sergeant who put in his possession the jeep which he drove. When the hon. member for Prince Albert was talking about the Hepworth case that was mentioned earlier I thought the answer might have been given by some member of the commission to the effect that the men should have refused to obey the order of the major, the second in command of the battalion; that they should have said to him, "Sir, we cannot travel to our destination in civilian cars because if we do that we will not be obeying the rules and regulations".

Subordinate ranks simply cannot take stands like that. They have to obey orders, whether the order is given by a sergeant to a corporal, by a major to a lieutenant or by men of other ranks. To people who have served it is just nonsense to suggest that junior ranks can resist orders given by people senior to them.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that section 13(2) will have to be reconsidered by the minister. As the hon. member for Prince Albert mentioned, the Department of Justice might very well be called in to give some advice on the matter, which is becoming a serious problem.

Last year in the estimates committee I asked the chairman of the pensions commission for some figures with regard to the number of applications to the pension commission by former members of the regular forces under section 13(2). He gave figures for a 5-year period from January, 1950, to March, 1955, and these appear at page 578 of the proceedings of the special committee on estimates of last year. In that 5-year period 6,952 cases came before the commission either on first or second hearing or on appeal, and 89 per cent were rejected. That is a very high rejection figure, and all those rejections were under section 13(2).

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that much more serious consideration must be given to this matter. It is intolerable that the burden of these accidental deaths should fall upon the completely innocent widows and children. It must be remembered that the wives permit their husbands to take part in these military activities, and the army and other service authorities urge the married women to permit their husbands to spend two or three nights a week in militia training of this sort. In the regular forces there is a considerable amount of encouragement given to the married women in order to have their husbands remain in the services.

There is quite a bit of attention paid to the attitude of the women in this connection until the husband is killed in what those of us who have served and others think is the course of his duty; then the Department of National Defence and the Department of Veterans Affairs say, "There is nothing we can do about it under section 13(2). This accident did not arise out of service". They say to the widow, "Although for several years your husband served his country gallantly in war and in peace, we are sorry but we cannot do anything for you now. You may have children. Well, that is not our responsibility, and you must go somewhere else."

I do not think we can much longer tolerate that state of affairs under legislation which is so frequently described here as the best veterans' charter in the world, and so on. If things of this nature continue to be permitted it must certainly be revised if it is to become the best in the world.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, the minister was in his seat when I spoke this afternoon, and I believe he gave his usual attention to what I had to say. I wonder if now that this particular item is before us he would care to comment on whether or not we can expect pensions to be awarded regardless of pre-enlistment disabilities?

I pointed out this afternoon that any cases I had taken up with the department showed that a substantial number of pension applications were turned down by reason of the department discovering that whatever was wrong was caused by a pre-enlistment condition. At the same time, when the veteran was recruited and joined the forces he was given an A-1 classification. I wish the minister would comment on that. I realize there has been some improvement in the act over the years, but I believe that when one is taken into the forces and given an A-1 classification it should stand for all time.

Perhaps when the minister speaks he will not be able to give us the statistical answer to this question, but I would like to add a question to those which have been asked by the hon. member for Lanark. How many pension applications, let us say during the last year, were turned down on account of a condition of pre-enlistment origin, and what percentage would that be of the total number of applications that were turned down?

Mr. Lapointe: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I could not give the hon. member at this time the exact number of applications that were turned down on that specific basis. The question of pre-enlistment condition is dealt with in section 13, subsection 1 (c) of the act. The principle is that no deduction is ever made in the award because of a pre-enlistment condition where there has been service in a theatre of war, unless prior to enlistment the condition was obvious or recorded on medical examination.

The meaning of the words "recorded on medical examination" appears in section 2, subsection (u) of the Pension Act. That is a definition that was inserted in 1948 at the suggestion of the members of the veterans affairs committee. In order to understand this section properly, one should read the definition of the words "recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment". Subsection (u) reads as follows:

> (u) "recorded on medical examination prior to enlistment" includes recorded symptoms or findings in,
> (i) medical proceedings for enlistment,
> (ii) official documentation covering any former period of service,
> (iii) the files of the department,
> (iv) compensation board or insurance company records, and > (v) the records of a hospital, private physician or other medical authority, > where such record refers to the injury or disease resulting in the disability in respect of which the application for pension is made;

As my hon. friend says, this covers considerable ground. It is quite true that some members of the forces—I understand that this occurred more often during the first war than during the second war—were accepted as being in good physical condition and after being discharged from the service developed certain conditions for which a claim for pension was made. When the commission goes back into the army records, it might be found that a man had been hospitalized in 1942 or 1943 for a certain condition. Then going back into hospital records, they might find that, on being questioned as to his medical history upon entering hospital, he had said that when 10 or 15 years of age he had been hospitalized for a certain condition. The commission might get in touch with the doctor who had looked after him at that particular time. The man might not be familiar with what had happened, but when the doctor was contacted it might be discovered that the condition for which the man was claiming was pre-enlistment. This information would not be withheld wilfully by the man when enlisting, as he might not be aware of this condition, but the commission would find that as part of his medical record, and under the statute it could do nothing but take it into consideration.

Mr. Hansell: Is the examination covered by the section to which the minister has referred the examination given on enlistment, or is that the examination given after it is discovered that something is wrong with the man? I cannot quite understand how that section could apply to an enlistment. A man might get a clean bill of health upon enlistment. As the minister has said, this is a pretty definite section. If the medical examiners followed the provisions of that section they would surely find that something was wrong.

Mr. Lapointe: I can assure my hon. friend that if the examinations made prior to enlistment were as thorough as we would like to believe they were, the commission would be saved a lot of trouble. The medical examination referred to is the one prior to enlistment. The man is examined before enlistment and is not enlisted until that examination has been held. As I mentioned, the definition in the act permits the commission to examine any medical records relating to the period before enlistment. If the commission does find evidence of a medical character which is related to the condition for which the man is applying for pension, then the commission is obliged to take that into consideration in rendering its decision.

Mr. Regier: Further to what the hon. member for Macleod has said, I should like to pursue this matter a little. I have in my hands the particulars of a case where a man claims that upon enlistment he was found to be in category A. After enlistment he was re-examined four times and always found to be in category A. The man enlisted on May 19, 1941, and left the service on June 3, 1942. He was discharged at that time for medical reasons but was denied full pension benefits because it was claimed that the medical reasons for his discharge had existed prior to enlistment.

I find this a little hard to swallow. We are willing to send a man over the hill, as it were, upon the basis of one medical examination, provided he is declared to be in category A. If we are willing to risk a man's life on the basis of one physical examination he should receive the proper consideration. Former students of mine lost their lives after having had only one medical examination, yet here is a case where a man was declared five times to be in category A.

I notice that in replying to the hon. member for Macleod the minister qualified his statement by saying that a pension decision was partly dependent upon where the service had been. I think that is a most despicable arrangement if such an arrangement exists. Once a man volunteers his life on behalf of the nation he should receive equal treatment regardless of the disposition that is made of that man by the armed forces.

I should like to read from the report of the pensions advocate concerning this man, as follows:

> Service documents record treatment for the above noted condition during service. During treatment he stated he had had many colds in his head and pleurisy at eight or nine years of age.

May I just interrupt here. I wonder if this man had asked for exemption from military service on the basis of having had this condition when eight or nine years of age how far he would have got. He would not have got to first base, especially after having five medical examinations which listed him as being in category A. I continue:

> According to specialist's report, on 14-4-42, man gave a history that he saw Dr. Campbell Brown in Vernon, B.C., because of frequent colds in chest with cough. On the record this condition existed pre-enlistment with some aggravation during service, but there is no evidence to show that such aggravation arose out of or was directly connected with military service.

I must interrupt to say again that this man was found to be in category A in five examinations. I continue with the report:

> The commission rules chronic bronchitis and bronchiectasis pre-enlistment condition, aggravated during service in Canada but not pensionable under section 11 (2) as the aggravation did not arise out of nor was it directly connected with military service.

I feel the minister must agree that this is a most niggardly attitude to take when we are willing to shove men over the hill upon the basis of one report which lists them in category A; yet when after five listings in A category these men are thrown out of the service, even against their will, and declared medically unfit and they apply for a pension, we say, "We have now discovered, because of the statement the man made in all honesty at the time of his enlistment, that he had a cold when he was a child, and we therefore find that the disability is of pre-enlistment origin." I think that is disgraceful.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I feel I must rise to join with others who are discussing the situation of veterans who, after entering military service and getting a clean bill of health, then have disabilities and find, perhaps after demobilization or discharge, that they are not eligible for pension. It is not my intention at this time to go fully into the case I have had before the department for some three years, but I feel that since other hon. members have spoken on this very issue, I too must make mention of it.

In the case of the veteran of whom I am speaking, he was examined by six specialists of the department on enlistment. He was a first war veteran, having served some three and a half years, and he enlisted for second war service. His category on enlistment for second war service was A1; he came out P5. He was not demobilized but discharged with the lowest possible category. As I understand it, the terms of the veterans' act are that a veteran is entitled on discharge to be boarded for a medical examination. This man was not boarded for a medical examination, and the determination of his disabilities was not made until 1949. When they were found it was established that he had a heart condition. I have a letter, which is before the department, confirming that he at least feels that his disability was due to service, and the symptoms were those he was boarded for health reasons during his service.

In spite of the fact that many of us bring veterans' cases before the department in which we obtain good consideration and fair and just settlements, it seems to me that in this particular case, where a veteran has served with distinction and has come out with such a low category and there is an establishment of a severe disability, it is up to the pension commission to grant such a veteran some reasonable pension. I want to say to the minister that I intend to fight this case until I get some pension for him that will be in conformity with his service and his disability.

I do not think we can be satisfied with a situation in which a man, having served his country for 10½ years, should be treated in such a way. He was not demobilized but was discharged. As a matter of fact this particular veteran was kept on the staff here in Ottawa for six months after demobilization because the department could not do without his services. To turn him out and to leave the onus of proof on him is completely incompatible with the act, I think, and certainly with simple justice. So I just want to inform the minister that I hope in the near future there will be an easement on the part of the pension commission so the veterans in these cases coming before them will not have the onus of proof put on their shoulders when they cannot establish the exact date when their disabilities occurred. If the veteran has five or six medicals on enlistment, comes out in a P5 category, and is discharged on that account, surely he should be entitled to a decent pension.

So I hope we members of the opposition will not have to get up again and plead with the minister of this department for an easement and an adjustment on behalf of these servicemen. I hope we shall have some justice and that they will receive pensions when they come out with such a low category.

Mr. Blair: I remember very well when the clause the minister read to the house was before the veterans committee, and I think I took some part on the debate on that clause. It was a very difficult thing to decide at that time on account of the medical records that were kept during the first world war. Even with the better records and conditions in the second world war, in so far as medical examinations were concerned, it is still a cause of worry in many cases. We have had two specimen cases described tonight.

There is another clause in the pensions act dealing with the benefit of the doubt. I wonder whether that clause would not apply to the case mentioned by the previous speaker. This states that the onus is not on the man to prove his condition; he is given the benefit of the doubt. I do not know anything about the case cited by the second last speaker, concerning the boy with colds.

Mr. Regier: He should be given the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Blair: It seems to me that it would be flimsy evidence for the board to accept, that at eight years of age he was subject to colds. Surely the man should receive the benefit of the doubt. I do not think any medical man could ascribe a condition where a man of say 21 was passed fit, as this man was four times, as the hon. member said, and then go away back into his childhood days and make a statement, as he made, that at eight years of age he was subject to colds. There must be something more than that. I would be most surprised if such a condition existed, and I would be further surprised if that situation existed, bearing in mind this clause of the act which was very carefully gone over by the veterans committee that wrote the veterans' charter. That committee did the very best it could with the matter of pre-enlistment disability.

Then there was the second clause brought in some time later, the clause which states that the man must receive the benefit of the doubt. I do not know anything about the case cited concerning the boy who got the colds, but I think the benefit of the doubt clause would apply. I do not see how the commission could arrive at their decision on evidence that the boy got a cold when he was eight years old; it is positively ridiculous.

What concerns me, having had some part in framing the first part of the legislation, is that that should be fitted in with the other clause in the Pension Act known as the benefit of the doubt clause. I think that should be carefully watched. There may be a tendency to go by that benefit of the doubt clause without looking properly into the history of the matter.

Mr. Regier: Might I assure the hon. member for Lanark that what I read was from the official record, and every word of it was taken from the official record, the report in which it was clearly stated that they accepted the man's statement he had made as to his condition when he was eight or nine years old. This was a man who enlisted in good faith as a result of some of our advertising.

Mr. Quelch: I suppose the question of disabilities of pre-enlistment origin has received more consideration by veterans committees in the past than any other single question, and various changes have been made. I recall that when we struck out the words "wilfully concealed" we hoped that would take care of many of the cases that had been disallowed. It has been emphasized time and again in veterans committees that the full benefit of the doubt should be given the veteran. I remember that the last time a change was made we were told that a very careful watch would be kept of all cases, and that if it were found that the amendments to the act were not giving general satisfaction consideration would then be given to further changes.

In view of the fact that the Legion is once again bringing up this question quite strongly, and in view of the cases they put before the committee two years ago, I think it was, it does look as though further consideration should be given to this question.

Personally I do not believe there will ever be general satisfaction until such time as the government recognizes that a soldier's condition as recorded on his medical sheet at the time of enlistment is his true condition, and that therefore any deterioration from that condition should be pensionable.

Soldier Settlement and Veterans' Land Act—

517. To provide for the cost of administration of Veterans' Land Act; soldier settlement and British family settlement, $4,852,880.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, I believe it was two years ago that the Minister of Veterans Affairs gave us quite a detailed report on the Veterans' Land Act, at which time he said that payments on loans to veterans under the act were going ahead very well, that there was very little delinquency, and that as a whole the act was working out very well. In view of the general decline in the position of farmers in the west and the decline in farm income over the last two or three years, I wonder whether the minister would give us a report on the condition of the accounts, whether or not there is any increase in delinquency with respect to those accounts, how many of the soldier settlers are in arrears, and the total amount of arrears. At the same time maybe he would check and let us know how many of the old soldier settler accounts are still outstanding and by how much, and how many have had to give up their land as the result of the debt.

Mr. Lapointe: With regard to my hon. friend's first question, I can assure him that the collection picture under the Veterans' Land Act continues to be very good indeed. As of July 1, 1956, out of 30,891 full-time farmers and commercial fishermen only 908 were in arrears of over $200, and out of 31,824 small holders settled under the Veterans' Land Act only 40 were in arrears of more than $100. Therefore the collection picture has continued to be very good indeed.

With regard to soldier settlers' accounts which have been subject to debt reduction the picture is as follows. As of October 31, 1948, there were 2,637 active soldier settler accounts with a total debt of $2,842,534.30. As of today there are 69 active accounts left with a total debt of $41,818.26, the average debt being $606.06. Of those 69 accounts 35 have not been adjusted at this date and the remainder are repaying the reduced indebtedness on a time basis.

Mr. Regier: How many accounts are there altogether?

Mr. Lapointe: There are 69 active accounts left. The first figure I gave was the number of active accounts when we started the debt reduction program in 1948. At that time there were 2,637 active accounts. Now there are only 69 left.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister say whether any full-time farmers under the Veterans' Land Act have had to give up their land on account of failure to repay?

Mr. Lapointe: There have been 140 full-time farmers and small holders who have given up their lands because of the impossibility of meeting payments, out of a total of 70,237 settled.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): There is a matter with regard to V.L.A. small holdings which I should like to take up. I have written to the minister about it in the past. I am speaking now of my own district on Vancouver island, and I refer to the position in which small holders find themselves due to the very rapid expansion of the urban areas of towns such as Nanaimo. At the close of the war quite a number of settlers were settled under the Veterans' Land Act on the outskirts of Nanaimo. Since that time the municipal boundaries have been extended and the provincial government has put a new highway through one area in which a number of these holdings are situated. In one instance I know that the provincial government in putting the new highway through expropriated part of the V.L.A. holding of one man, rendering it of no great value for the purpose for which it was originally intended, but as a matter of fact adding value to it for another purpose which would have been, if he had been able, to subdivide the property and sell it. He could have done very well out of it.

In another case I know of the man has no ambition at all to do that with his property, but he would like to move into the sort of low taxation area in which he had originally been established but which has now become a high taxation area; and with the rapid expansion there the element of taxation is going to be increasingly important. Many of these men are finding themselves on properties that are now assessed so high and taxed so high that they are moved out of the category of the original intent of the V.L.A. small holding.

I wonder whether the minister can tell us what provisions are being made by the department to enable men in such cases to dispose of their property or part of it, or turn it back to the department with a return of what they have invested and the retention of their rights to areas outside. There may have been some change in the administrative practice or the regulations. I should like the minister to tell me if he has had to do anything about these cases.

Mr. Lapointe: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We have had some of these cases, and where it has been possible we have permitted the veteran who was settled to sell his property and we have settled him again on another property in a lower taxation area. That has been done in my hon. friend's part of the country. If the settler has not earned his conditional grant already; that is, if he has not been on his property for 10 years, he cannot do it; of course, if he has been on the property for 10 years he has earned his conditional grant and can obtain title and sell out.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): Is it not true that if they sell they must be able to find a cash customer?

Mr. Lapointe: That is correct; they must find a cash customer. But if the property has really increased in value and is in an area where because of this increase in value, the taxation rate has become too high, our experience has been that the settler does not meet great difficulty in finding someone who will pay cash for the property.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo): I do not know that I agree with the minister, because the very fact that it has increased in value in many instances makes it more difficult to find a cash customer, whereas there are opportunities to sell it on terms.

Mr. Lapointe: As a rule the purchaser can finance. He will pay cash and, of course, he will have to finance with a mortgage of his own afterwards. That is easily arranged.

Mr. Regier: I am very pleased indeed to hear from the minister that the veterans are the most reliable credit customers we have in Canada. I think he would agree that in relation to the vast number concerned, almost all of them are meeting their commitments on the due dates. I believe he mentioned some 40 or so out of 31,000 who were in arrears. I think that is something really worthy of note in Canada and even in Canadian credit circles.

I also noticed that in reply to the hon. member for Acadia he mentioned that even today there were some veterans of the first world war who were owing money on their properties. I think 99·9 per cent of the people of Canada would be most happy to see the minister this year, not next year, introduce a bill into this House of Commons that would wipe out this balance owing by these senior citizens and senior veterans of our country. However, my main reason for rising at this time is to ask the minister whether any consideration has been given to raising the amount of the loan that it is permissible to be granted to the veterans of the recent world war on the purchase of small holdings.

In my riding the cost of small holdings consists mainly of the cost of the home. Whereas several years ago $8,400 may have supplied the veteran with an adequate home, that is not the situation today. I might at this time pay my compliments to the civil servants in this branch of the minister's department. I think many of the finest homes were built by veterans at that time for that money. However, has any consideration been given to the greatly increased cost of the land and also of the buildings since that time? I hate to see these two by four buildings going up. For $8,400 nowadays in my riding you cannot put up a home that is worthy of erection, one that will be a credit to Canada and that will be in line with what the veteran deserves. It costs us at least $10 a square foot to put up even the most modest of homes. I feel that we have had enough of these small homes built in Canada. Most of these veterans' families have now reached an age where they need larger homes.

I am wondering whether any consideration has been given, during the last year or so, to raising this ceiling from $8,400 to, say, $12,000, $13,000 or $14,000? If a veteran wants to take advantage of the veterans' legislation I see no reason why he should be obliged to build an $8,000 home when other Canadian citizens, taking advantage of the provisions of the National Housing Act guaranteed loans, can move into $13,000, $14,000 and $15,000 homes. Has any consideration been given to raising the ceiling?

Mr. Lapointe: The ceiling was raised last year when the act was amended, and part III was introduced to permit an additional loan which brought the figure to what my hon. friend has mentioned. That was done last session.

Mr. Regier: Might I ask the minister this question. Does that apply to the veteran in the urban areas? Is he now able to obtain a $12,000 loan for the building of a home?

Mr. Lapointe: I do not know where my hon. friend gets the figure of $12,000. There is no such figure under the Veterans' Land Act, either for full-time farming or for small holdings.

Mr. Regier: May I ask the minister what the ceiling now is for an urban veteran with respect to building a home?

Mr. Lapointe: If he builds under part I of the act, which has to do with settling on a small holding, and if he takes advantage of part III which was brought in last year and which gives him an additional loan, the amount is $8,100 all told. If he takes advantage of part II of the act, which was also introduced last year and which is to permit a veteran contractor to build his own house and finance through the facilities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the revolving fund which we hold, he must provide himself with a lot valued at $800 or more and then he can get up to $8,000 in the way of assistance.

Mr. Regier: In that case I was in error only on the wrong side of the fence. The maximum that the veteran can obtain apparently is $8,100. I must again emphasize the fact that in an urban area in British Columbia $8,100 is most inadequate and is most out of line with present day building costs, even though the lot were given to the veteran.

I feel it is high time that the veteran was able to take advantage of the veterans' legislation. In the lower mainland of British Columbia we have thousands of veterans who are buying N.H.A. guaranteed homes simply because they find themselves unable to build homes that meet their needs under the veterans' legislation. I feel that all veterans should receive some help out of this legislation, and that it should not be limited only to the rural veteran who wants to buy a farm.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

209. Departmental administration, $510,190.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Chairman, the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources includes five branches that deal with widely divergent subjects. The national parks branch administers the national parks of Canada, the national historic parks and historic sites, the Canadian wildlife service and the national museum. The water resources branch is responsible for the federal aspects of water resource questions in Canada. The northern administration and lands branch handles the administration of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory in all its aspects. It is responsible for the administration of Eskimo affairs and also for a great many land problems including the natural resources of the two territories. The forestry branch deals with forest research, forest products research, and forestry management, including agreements with the provinces on forest inventories and reforestation. The Canadian government travel bureau deals with travel promotion and the tourist industry in so far as they are of concern to the federal government.

With this great variety of operations I do not think it would be desirable for me to try to give a comprehensive survey of the work of the department in detail at this time. Such a survey was given when the estimates of my department were before the committee on estimates during last session, and many hon. members will be familiar with the discussion at that time. In all the circumstances I think it may be more satisfactory to deal with a few of the highlights of departmental operations as reflected in the estimates for the coming year. I would wish also to outline in some detail the policy of the department with regard to national parks. When each individual branch is under consideration I shall, of course, be very happy to deal in detail with particular aspects of the work in which any hon. members might be interested.

A principal point of interest in the estimates of any department is always the extent of and the reasons for any major changes from the preceding year. For 1956-57 the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources show an increase of $5,918,662 in the main estimates, plus an additional $3,084,078 in the supplementary estimates. This makes a total increase of $9,002,740. The increase, as a percentage of the estimates for 1955-56 is quite substantial, approximately 30 per cent. It is my hope that the house will feel that this increase is entirely justified, in fact I would venture to say more than justified, because of the reasons that lie behind the increases where they occur. The actual increases are in fact concentrated in a very few major aspects of operation, and these aspects reflect the places in which the government feels that substantial increases in activity are necessary.

The largest single increase is in the appropriation for the construction of trunk highways and bridges in the national parks. This increase amounts to $4,687,450, including the main and supplementary estimates. There are over 500 miles of main highways in the various national parks. This does not include those portions of the trans-Canada highway that are in the parks, nor does it include minor roads and trails.

These main highways include such important roads as the Banff-Jasper highway; the Banff-Windermere highway; the highways north and south through Prince Albert national park and Riding Mountain national park; the highway connecting with the provincial highways in Fundy national park; the Cabot trail in Cape Breton Highlands national park; and the Ocean View highway in Prince Edward Island national park.

The traffic on these roads has been increasing very markedly in the last few years. The extent and rate of the increase in traffic has now gone far beyond the standards to which most of these highways were built. In virtually all cases extensive or complete reconstruction is becoming necessary. I might also mention that we have found, particularly in the mountain parks, that it is very poor economy to build roads that are below the standard that is required for the wear and tear that the traffic imposes on them. The government, accordingly, has approved a six-year program for the reconstruction of the major park roads.

The total program over the six years will, it is presently estimated, amount to over $60 million. The increase in 1956-57 represents the first instalment of this new program. It includes major construction activity on the Banff-Windermere highway; the Banff-Jasper highway, the Cabot trail, and the Ocean View highway. The program in succeeding years will, on the average, be somewhat greater than the level indicated in this year's estimates.

Other capital items in the parks constitute an increase of $849,118. Accordingly, of the total departmental increase I have mentioned, no less than $5,529,568 is made up by construction and other capital items in the national parks.

The next largest item of increase also reflects an expansion of activity as a result of decisions of policy. This increase is in capital items in the north. One of the major requirements in the Northwest Territories is to provide the kind of educational facilities that will equip the Indian and Eskimo children there for the change that is now taking place at an increasingly rapid rate from their native hunting and trapping economy to an economy based on our way of life. This is not a change, at least in the rate it is taking place, that has been particularly sought or worked for at this time. I dealt in more detail with this matter in the statement on education policy that I made before the committee on estimates last year and I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to go into it at length now.

I might say, however, that the present change is a change that is inevitable because of two interrelated forces. One is the very great increase in economic, defence and other activity in the north that is bringing our way of life inevitably into contact with the native way of life. The other is the fact that the hunting and trapping economy is rapidly becoming less capable of supporting the increasing population. Unless a very serious human problem is to be faced in a few years, extensive education and training of the native people to face a new form of life is urgently required. The largest single increase in northern administration is to provide educational facilities, housing and related administrative facilities in the Northwest Territories. It amounts to $1,821,565, of which educational facilities alone form by far the largest part.

The other substantial aspect of increase in northern administration reflects the policy of the government to stimulate and encourage economic development in the north. The increase for the construction of roads and bridges amounts to $441,830. The increase in funds provided for the construction of the new Aklavik as a centre for administration, education, and welfare in the far north, amounts to $1,013,650. These three capital figures are subject to an adjustment downward of $1 million, which was the original estimate of likely short-fall in northern operations, and which has been partly restored in the supplementary estimates. The net result is that the increase of a capital character in our northern administration amounts in total, including the main and supplementary estimates, to $2,277,045.

As hon. members will see from what I have said, the total departmental increase is made up to the extent of $7,806,613 by capital items in the national parks and the two northern territories.

The other substantial increase in the departmental appropriations again reflects a capital item. For a number of years the government has been providing an annual grant to the pulp and paper research institute to assist in the financing of research that is of value to this very important part of the Canadian forest industry. As was announced some months ago, it has now been agreed with the institute that it would be preferable for the government to provide a building of the most modern and efficient character in which research can be carried on and to discontinue the annual grants. There is, therefore, in the estimates an amount of $1,075,000 for a new laboratory to be constructed in Montreal. The total costs of the lab with equipment, to be financed by the federal government, will amount to $2,250,000 over a two-year period.

I think the above summary sets forth virtually all the substantial increases in the appropriations that are now being sought. The capital figures I have mentioned account for increases of $8,881,613. There are minor increases and some decreases in other places which bring the total departmental increase to the figure I gave at the beginning of my remarks, $9,002,740.

There is one other highlight of departmental activity that I should like to mention. As hon. members are aware, water problems have for some time been of concern in the province of Manitoba. As a result of discussions with Premier Campbell, I signed an agreement with him on July 5 for the establishment of a lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba board. The board will consist of representatives of the province and of the federal government, and its duties will be to—and I quote from the agreement—

> . . . plan, supervise and carry out a study of lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba and the resources of water within Manitoba flowing into and from those lakes.

It is to report on:

> . . . what further developments and controls of these water resources in its judgment would appear to be physically practicable with particular reference to (a) flood control; and (b) hydroelectric power.

The federal government and the province are sharing equally in the cost of the survey and report.

Mr. Chairman, as I said at the beginning of my remarks I had intended to go on for some time in outlining the policy of the department regarding national parks, but since it is two minutes before ten o'clock I might call it ten o'clock at this time.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we are going to take agriculture tomorrow.

Mr. Fleming: Is the minister in a position to announce the program for Monday and Tuesday?

Mr. Harris: I thought I had it settled earlier today, sir, but I received indications late this afternoon that it might not be possible to follow the plans we had in mind.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL SEED GRAIN LIENS

Question No. 532—Mr. Wylie:

1. What is the total amount of principal and interest outstanding on the old dominion-provincial seed grain liens in each of the following provinces: Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba?

2. What is the amount of principal and interest, by provinces, that has been collected from November 1, 1935, to the present?

Answer by: Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. The amounts of principal and interest outstanding on June 29, 1956, are as follows:

Federal liens	Principal	Interest	Total
Manitoba	Nil	Nil	Nil
Saskatchewan	$202,668.17	$422,864.60	$625,532.77
Alberta	36,680.67	69,615.54	106,296.21
Total	$239,348.84	$492,480.14	$731,828.98

Federal share of joint provincial and federal liens

Manitoba	Nil	Nil	Nil
Saskatchewan	$263,980.96	$497,083.67	$ 761,064.63
Alberta	94,647.21	167,512.08	262,159.29
Total	358,628.17	$664,595.75	$1,023,223.92

2. The following amounts of principal and interest collected from November 1, 1935, to June 29, 1956, are as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 13, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—EFFECT OF REPORTED AGREEMENT BETWEEN RUSSIA AND CAMBODIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is ready to make a statement concerning developments in the political situation in French Indo-China and if those developments are such as arose out of an agreement signed by Soviet Russia and Cambodia and would be likely to have an effect in prolonging the stay there of the Canadian commission?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there have been no recent developments in Indo-China that I know of which would affect one way or another the stay of the commission in that country. I may be making a statement on the general position there when my estimates are under consideration. So far as the agreement between Russia and Cambodia is concerned, the information we have received is that no such agreement has been reached although as a result of the visit of a Cambodian representative to Moscow in the last few weeks it was agreed between the two countries to take steps to increase trade between them. There was no form of political agreement signed as far as we know.

Mr. Fleming: Did the trade agreement involve the acceptance of economic assistance by Cambodia from Soviet Russia?

Mr. Pearson: As far as we are informed, there was no formal agreement, but there were discussions with a view to increasing trade. I understand that in those discussions the Soviet union may have made offers of economic assistance to Cambodia, but I have no information that any such offers have been accepted.

ISRAEL—REQUEST FOR FAVOURABLE CONSIDERATION OF SHIPMENTS OF SABRE AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Having regard to the opinion expressed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the United States, Great Britain and France would not look unfavourably upon the delivery of fighter aircraft to Israel, and in view of the recognized unbalance created in that area by the delivery of arms from communist countries to Egypt, will the government now give favourable consideration to the request of the government of Israel for the delivery of fighter aircraft to that country?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are still conversations and discussions going on about the possibility of doing something that would not be an exclusively Canadian action in the supply of arms to Israel. These discussions are still in progress.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CREATION OF PRECEDENTS IN CONNECTION WITH ALLEGED VIOLATION OF RULES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to take the necessary action to prevent those violations of the rules of this house which occurred during the pipe-line debate from becoming precedents for similar actions in future parliaments of Canada?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I know of no violations of the rules that would require any action by the government. The rules of the house are usually dealt with by a committee appointed by the house because they are not rules made by the government but rules made by the house itself.

REPORTED ISSUANCE OF INSTRUCTIONS FOR GENERAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the information I have received, that returning officers in the various constituencies have been instructed to do the necessary preliminaries preparatory to an election and that urban enumerators are to be recommended by August 15, indicate that the government is about to comply with the request of the opposition for an early dissolution?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The information contained in the first part of the hon. gentleman's question is not to my knowledge. I have had no communication with the chief electoral officer and I know of no instructions that have been given to the effect mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I would ask the Prime Minister to communicate with him, because he has given those instructions.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF COVERAGE TO FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Can the Minister of Fisheries inform the house as to what progress is being made by the inter-departmental committee on the question of extending unemployment insurance benefits to fishermen?

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Whilst the Department of Fisheries is very much interested in this problem, it is primarily a question for the Minister of Labour to answer.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): That subject has been receiving consideration for quite a long time. The question is now before the government. At the moment I am not in a position to make any further comment than that which I have made in recent months.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF CANADA COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister care to comment on the statement in a speech yesterday in St. Catharines by Mr. John C. Parkin, president of the Canadian arts council, as reported by the Canadian Press, when he said there are many able men ready to help the federal government set up a body to encourage the arts in Canada and that the Prime Minister made an incorrect appraisal when he said recently in the House of Commons that suitable men to head such an organization are not easily found?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope the statement of the gentleman who spoke in St. Catharines will be borne out by the facts. This matter is still receiving consideration, and we shall be very happy when we can bring a recommendation to parliament to feel assured that we shall have no difficulty in manning the council.

Mr. Hees: Might I ask a supplementary question? Has the Prime Minister been in touch with the president of the Canadian arts council to find out whom they would suggest as a suitable person to act on such a body?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, there has been no communication with that gentleman since the speech in question.

Mr. Hees: Has there been any communication with that gentleman before the speech in question to find out whom he would suggest?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Not from me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Has anybody in the government communicated with him?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Then might I ask the Prime Minister whether the only people that are asked are Liberals?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): No, Mr. Speaker.

ATOMIC ENERGY

COMPARATIVE COSTS OF PRODUCTION OF ELECTRIC POWER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I do so more by way of notice than otherwise, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the very dramatic information given by the British representatives at the fifth world power conference at Vienna to the effect that the cost of an atomic power station in relation to the power it produces is now little more than that for a modern steam station, will the government review the situation in the light of that information and consider the possibility of a plan which would make electric power from this source available to parts of Canada that are not served by hydroelectric energy?

Right Hon. L. S. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, I will take this as notice. However, I can say immediately that the government will do everything possible to further the research that is now being carried out in connection with this power plant that is being established here in Canada. If we can ascertain data that will support the optimistic view that power can be produced from that energy at, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, about half of what it costs to produce power from steam otherwise, it will be a very happy development and will certainly stimulate the progress of the industrial development that is taking place in Canada and make it easier to have it more widespread throughout the country.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, without in any way attempting to enter into a debate on the subject, I would point out that the statement was accompanied by the declaration that in Britain, as a result of the developments that have taken place there, they are greatly expanding their construction of atomic generated electricity plants. I would hope that with this declaration by official representatives to that effect the government will give consideration to the possibility of the application of the same considerations to our plans in this country in those areas that would be benefited.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The government of the United Kingdom and its officials are in constant communication with our government and our officials in respect to all these projects, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that we will be very happy to take full advantage of what can be demonstrated by the work that is now being done in the United Kingdom towards the setting up of electric plants based on atomic energy.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CROWN CORPORATION—APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL MANAGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce but in his absence perhaps I might put it to the Prime Minister. Is the government aware that Mr. Victor G. Bartram of Montreal, who a few days ago was named general manager of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, was at that time a director of certain companies related by share ownership to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited? Does the Prime Minister know whether Mr. Bartram has resigned any of these directorates? If not, does the government think it appropriate to have as general manager of a crown corporation a gentleman who is interested in the affairs of the private corporation with which the crown corporation will have to deal?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): As the hon. gentleman has suggested, what he has stated this morning will receive consideration from the government.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—APPLICATION OF METLAKATLA BAND TO BECOME ENFRANCHISED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. What is the present situation with regard to the application of the Metlakatla Indians to become enfranchised? Has any report been received from Mr. Justice Wilson, and is it a fact that the Indians have now expressed the desire not to be enfranchised?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Some little time ago I appointed, as I have a right to do under the Indian Act, a committee headed by Mr. Justice Wilson of the Supreme Court of British Columbia to examine this request for enfranchisement which had come from the council of the Metlakatla band some considerable time ago. The committee is still in existence and up to now had made no report.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED DELAY IN APPOINTMENT OF JUDGE FOR BRUCE COUNTY, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I wish to direct a question to the house leader, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. First, what is the reason for the delay in appointing a judge for Bruce county? Second, does he need any assistance in arriving at the appointment of somebody from the local district?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall draw the hon. member's question to the attention of the Minister of Justice for an answer.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration service—

1. Departmental administration (including advisory committee on agricultural services), $670,015.

The Chairman: House again in committee of supply, resolution No. 1, Department of Agriculture. This vote is found at page 4 of the blue book of estimates and the details commence at page 87. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, I make no apology for making a few remarks on this first item after listening to the Minister of Agriculture in the last five or ten minutes of his speech the last day these estimates were before the house. I cannot leave those remarks unanswered without being challenged, although they were challenged by the hon. member for Wentworth on the day they were made. I regret very much that the minister is not more accurate as to the expenditures of his department now in relation to previous years. I just want to quote what he said as reported in Hansard of May 11 at page 3830:

The suggestion that has been made by quite a number that we should be doing something for agriculture is answered by the fact that in the last 20 years we have spent very considerably more on agriculture than was ever spent in any previous 20 years. As a matter of fact we are and have been for a considerable length of time spending ten times as much as was ever spent by any other government, either Liberal or Conservative.

Then a little bit further down the page after an interruption by the hon. member for Wentworth:

In view of the fact that we have been spending that much we are at least attempting to do something for agriculture.

Then further down the page again:

When the Conservatives were in power they did not spend very much on agriculture.

Then in the next column:

Down here in the low left corner of the chart is where the farm income was when the Conservatives were in power, and ever since the Liberals have been in power it has gone constantly right up and up to the top right hand corner of the chart.

Mr. Chairman, I have here some figures in the form of a chart which I should like the consent of the house to place on Hansard. They are bureau of statistics figures; they are authentic, I can assure you; and they are the relative expenditures by the Department of Agriculture in comparison with the revenues over the last 25 years. Have I the consent of the committee to place this chart on Hansard?

The Chairman: Has the hon. member indicated the source of the table?

Mr. Charlton: The bureau of statistics.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member leave to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Charlton: The table is as follows:

[1] Estimated.

Just to make a few comments before placing it on the record, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say this. With the exception of one year—and that is the year 1935,—the Conservative government in power from 1930 to 1935 spent better than two per cent of the gross revenue of the government on agriculture. In view of the circumstances during that five-year period I think that is a very good record in comparison with the record since that time. On the other hand, in 1941, which is an all time low in that 25-year period, this government only spent 1·5 per cent of the total national revenue of Canada on agriculture. In 1952, which was considered one of the best agricultural years we have ever had so far as revenue is concerned, this government only spent 1·6 per cent.

Now, as I said before, in the poorest year from 1930 to 1935 inclusive, the Conservative government spent 1·9 per cent. In all other cases it ranges from 2·1 per cent to 3 per cent of the total revenue. Therefore, when the minister says his government has spent more than any other government, it is not true and I hope that the members opposite will take cognizance of this fact and not be misled by the minister's assertion on that day. More than that, Mr. Chairman, these figures include the ordinary expenditures of the Department of Agriculture, the special expenditures and the war expenditures. In 1951, I want to be fair, it increased to 4 per cent but included in that 4 per cent was $92,959,000 or practically $93 million that was of a special nature. I might say that probably if the minister spent as much time on the administrative matters of his department as he does on politics he would be more conversant with the facts regarding the case.

I have a resolution dealing with the feed situation passed by the Simcoe county council and endorsed by the Brant county council which I should like to read to the house. This is a serious situation, and one which will be more serious this year than it has been in past years. The resolution reads:

Whereas because of the unfavourable seeding conditions in the spring of 1956 there is likely to be a heavy demand for western feed grains to supply Ontario farmers this fall;

And whereas the action of the wheat board in filling the bay port and lakehead elevators with export wheat and malting barley in the fall of 1955 seriously disrupted the movement of feed grains by limiting the amount of storage available;

And whereas this action on the part of the wheat board increased the cost of feed grain to Ontario farmers by making it necessary to use rail transported grain;

Be it therefore resolved that the agriculture committee of Simcoe county council respectfully request the dominion government to take any action necessary to ensure that sufficient feed grain is stored in bay port elevators before the close of navigation in the fall of 1956 to adequately supply the requirements of Ontario farmers until the opening of navigation in 1957.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, anyone who has travelled anywhere in eastern Canada in the last two months must realize the seriousness of this situation, where field after field of spring grain was flooded out, the fields worked up again and sown to other crops. I hope the government does recognize this fact and take suitable action.

Now, I am sure that the turkey growers of Canada would want me to say that they appreciate the action the government finally took after many long years in changing the tariff regulations in order to protect the turkey growers of this country. It was long overdue. They would wish me to show their appreciation of the government for finally taking this action.

There are two other things, Mr. Chairman, that have not been acted upon as yet. It follows upon sessional paper 141-H, dated May 15, and has to do with grading regulations and packaging regulations affecting turkeys coming into Canada. According to the answer I received, grading regulations affecting turkeys imported into Canada are the Canadian regulations and they must adhere to those regulations. I am informed by reliable sources that in all cases that is not the fact. Imported turkeys are sold in Canada under grade; that is, the grades do not conform with our Canadian grades standard and there is some laxity in checking those turkeys as they cross the border to make sure that they are up to the Canadian grades standard. I hope the government will check on this matter and see that they do conform to the Canadian grades.

With regard to packaging, packaging comes under the Food and Drugs Act. I am told by reliable sources that on some of those turkeys imported into Canada there is a cellophane bag that practically covers the whole breast of the turkey, with colouring on the outside of the bag. As I understand it, that is against Canadian regulations. I have not seen one of those turkeys myself, but I am reliably informed that was the case last year. I hope the government will take suitable steps to stop this practice.

In his speech on May 11, as recorded at page 3819 of Hansard, the minister brought to our attention a project to sell milk in schools. I would like the minister to state further actually what that project was and whether it has been brought to the attention of the provinces, and whether the plan would be taken to the provinces instead of waiting for the provinces to suggest it to the government. If the provinces knew that such a project was to be undertaken by the federal government, I am sure that many of them would take up the suggestion and act upon it.

Another matter that I should like to bring to the attention of the government has to do with the setup of the Department of Agriculture. Several years ago the Canadian veterinary medical association sent a resolution to the minister regarding the setup of the production service. I know the minister is aware of this fact. The resolution was brought to his attention in 1949. Something has been done since in the way of moving the animal pathology and research division from the science service to production service. That is a step in the right direction and is appreciated by the association, but their request went farther than that. Their request was that the animal pathology and research division and the health of animals division be placed in one separate branch under the direction of a veterinarian. This in no way has anything to do with the personnel of the branch; it is in no way critical of the personnel. I do not want to be misrepresented as suggesting that. They have had very good co-operation from the director of the production service. They appreciate what was done, but the feeling among veterinarians across Canada and among members of the association across Canada is that the veterinarians in the government service could do a better job for Canada if this were under one branch of the department. I think the minister will agree with me on that. The fact that there are many in the department who are members of the organization to which I refer does add force to this resolution that they ask be given consideration.

I believe since 1949 the minister has had several letters. I understand that there was a period when it was not desirable to do this and the minister knows about it, but I think the situation has resolved itself. If the minister would give consideration to this it would be appreciated by the Canadian association.

3. Contributions to commonwealth agricultural bureaux in a total amount of £34,928, notwithstanding that payments may exceed or fall short of the equivalent in Canadian dollars, estimated as of December, 1955, which is, $97,799.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Would the minister indicate how this vote is used and for what purposes?

Mr. Gardiner: These contributions are made to commonwealth bureaux which are set up in commonwealth countries to deal with research. Our contribution is indicated in this item.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Has it anything to do with marketing, export and import of agricultural products?

[Mr. Charlton.]

Mr. Gardiner: It is purely scientific; it has nothing to do with marketing.

Mr. Montgomery: Is the research carried on in different countries or is it centralized?

Mr. Gardiner: There is one set up here in Ottawa and another in England.

4. Operation and maintenance, including an amount of $134,025 for grants in aid of agricultural research in universities and other scientific organizations in Canada, $863,569.

Mr. Nowlan: This item includes an amount of $134,000 for grants in aid of agricultural research in universities. Would that be paid to universities apart from the agricultural colleges themselves which are operated by the provincial governments? To what universities have these grants been made and in what amounts? Without too much detail, could we have a breakdown?

Mr. Gardiner: Generally speaking, this research is carried on in the parts of universities associated with agricultural activity. Some universities have agricultural colleges on their campuses. This is true of universities in western Canada. The work being carried on by way of research is aided under this vote.

Mr. Nowlan: Could the minister give us the names of some of the universities without going into minute details?

Mr. Gardiner: The list here shows the University of Ottawa, Ottawa; Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph—even though it has that separate campus at Guelph it is still done through this school—the school at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Quebec; University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon; University of Manitoba, Winnipeg; University of Alberta, Edmonton; University of Saskatchewan; University of Manitoba; Ontario Agricultural College; Macdonald College; University of Alberta; University of British Columbia; University of New Brunswick, Fredericton; University of British Columbia, Vancouver; McGill University, Montreal; University of Alberta; McGill University; University of Saskatchewan; Macdonald College; Hamilton College, McMaster University, Hamilton; University of British Columbia, Vancouver; University of British Columbia.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): That list does not include the science service laboratory at Western university, London. Does that come under a separate item?

Mr. Gardiner: We operate that one directly.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Is any progress being made in developing a variety of wheat which is rust resistant? It will be remembered that two years ago our wheat, particularly in Alberta, was practically ruined by rust.

Mr. Gardiner: Work is being carried on all the time at the laboratory in Winnipeg and efforts are being made to keep ahead of rust attacks. There is an improved variety of Selkirk which is not yet ready for distribution.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): How soon may we expect this new variety of Selkirk wheat to be available for seed purposes?

Mr. Gardiner: It is still in the testing stage and it will take two or three years to bring it to the point where it can be distributed. As all hon. members from the west know, there must be a multiplication period after it has been determined that a variety is resistant. That is handled by sending seed to California to double the speed in getting quantities available for distribution, but will take two or three years after the tests are complete.

Mr. Blackmore: Is any progress being made in finding a rust-resistant sunflower? The minister will remember that there was considerable damage to the sunflower industry in Manitoba through rust.

Mr. Gardiner: A rust-resistant sunflower has been developed and is being utilized in the Morden area of Manitoba.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): What studies are being carried on at the science service laboratory at Western University?

Mr. Gardiner: Studies are being made of the utilization of new chemicals in the development of plant life. That is the main investigation being carried on.

6. Bacteriology, $242,748.

Mr. Charlton: What research is being carried on in relation to butter held in storage and how much butter in storage has been down-graded upon leaving storage?

Mr. Gardiner: I have not the exact figure of the amount that has been graded down, but it is less than 5 per cent. Of course, the grading is done by our professional graders, who grade the butter in and grade it out of plants. They use the same practice in grading it out as they use in grading it in. All the tests that are made to determine whether or not the butter is grade A1 are used in both cases.

Mr. Charlton: What happens to the butter that is graded down and that does not come up to the grade A standard?

Mr. Gardiner: Whatever is sold out is sold at whatever grades it is graded to. The only butter of which we take delivery under the plan is grade 1. Then, when anyone purchases butter, it is delivered as grade 1. But, if there is grade 2 butter there or if there is butter that is not fit for human consumption, it is sold just as what it is.

Mr. Charlton: I hope that butter of grade 2 or lower does not find itself in the retail market to be sold as butter, because there is nothing that would destroy the butter market quicker than to have the low grade butter placed in stores and sold. I hope that matter is very closely watched and dealt with by the government, because it could be very serious.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the grade 2 butter is only sold by the board to manufacturers who utilize it in making candy and things like that.

Mr. Nowlan: How long does the butter stay at grade 1 after it has been sold? I am thinking of some experiences a client of mine had who bought grade 1 butter from storage in one province and had it sent to a plant in Nova Scotia. When it arrived there and was graded it was found to be substantially below grade 1. There was a question as to how long it had been in storage and as to what adjustment might be made by the board. What is the procedure with respect to that?

Mr. Gardiner: I have no information with regard to that case, of course, but it is very difficult to determine just how long butter is held after it is purchased. I think I said here once before, after making inquiries, that it will keep at least as long as a year and a half if it has been properly made in the first place. There might be mistakes in grading when it comes in which result in butter going bad, or there might be conditions in the storage that result in its going bad, but, as has already been said, the full quantity is less than 5 per cent over the period in which we have been handling it. So not very much of it has gone bad.

Mr. Nowlan: What does the board do as far as adjustments are concerned in such cases when butter has been sold as grade 1 and the inspector refuses to take it? Have you had any difficulty in getting adjustments from the vendor of that butter?

Mr. Gardiner: The responsibility there is on the person who purchased the butter and held it in the meantime. If it is ten days later, something may have happened to it. We do not take responsibility for that.

Mr. Nowlan: In the case I was speaking of, you did not hold it at all; it was bought and delivered, and before it was taken out of the car the departmental inspector inspected it and refused to pass it at the grade at which it had been bought in another province. He did not take delivery of it.

Mr. Gardiner: It depends on whether he bought it directly from us or from a dealer. If he bought it from a dealer and it was butter that had been in storage before, it would be a matter between him and the dealer. If he got it directly from us, I presume that until it was delivered it was not his butter and he would then get it at whatever it graded.

Mr. Philpott: If the minister is considering any changes next year in the arrangements about the subsidized butter that goes to the charitable institutions, I might say I have had very warm letters of approval of the government's policy in that regard and I certainly hope the arrangements are continued, notwithstanding the apparent lack of success in convincing the governments in some of the provinces that they should quit using margarine and use the subsidized butter.

Mr. Gardiner: I should like to correct an impression that might have gone out as a result of the statement I made some time ago before all the information was available, to the effect that the increase in consumption had not been high but had been comparatively low. I have some doubts as to whether that is a correct indication of what happened. The annual report which is now being prepared indicates that there was an increase of about 9 per cent in the amount of butter consumed under this plan, which some people might consider to be worth while. I may say I have had similar letters from institutions indicating that they were very much concerned that the plan should be continued, and up until now it is being continued.

Mr. Montgomery: I wonder whether the minister would tell us this. When the butter is purchased from the trade and taken off the market, where is it stored? Is it stored in a government warehouse or in various places around the country in the trade's warehouses?

Mr. Gardiner: The greater part of it remains stored right where it is when the butter comes from the market. We have a standing offer of 58 cents. If the butter comes to us because no one else will buy it at 58 cents, then it is put into storage that is satisfactory to us. We have no storage in which to put it. Sometimes, when we realize that the butter will be utilized in some other part of Canada than where it was produced, we may ask to have it stored in that other part of Canada.

Mr. Montgomery: Is it marked in any way by the department's inspectors when it is taken over?

Mr. Gardiner: It is all branded with the date of manufacture, the plant that manufactured it and so on, but the butter is held by the government.

Mr. Stanton: It is rather late this year, minister whether boys' and girls' camps throughout the dominion qualify to receive the butter at the lower price.

Mr. Gardiner: I am not certain whether they would qualify but I understand they have not purchased any butter under the plan.

Mr. Stanton: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. What is the minimum amount of butter that the board will issue under that plan?

Mr. Gardiner: We have not set a minimum. We have simply set the type of institution to which we will sell the butter at the low rate, and I presume that the institutions using the butter buy all their butter from us at that rate rather than pay the extra 20 cents. I should say that they buy it from the regular supplier. We are notified as to the amount and we make the payments to the dealer.

Mr. Stanton: It is rather late this year, but if the plan is carried on for another year would the minister consider allowing boys' and girls' camps across the dominion to avail themselves of the opportunity of obtaining that butter?

Mr. Gardiner: There is no doubt that if they made application it would be considered. I am not in a position to state whether or not it would be agreed that that is the kind of institution that it is intended should be covered.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister tell us what portion of this money under item 6 is being spent in the four western provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: That is item No. 6?

Mr. Blackmore: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand there is very little of it being spent. Most of it is being spent here in Ottawa.

Mr. Blackmore: Could the minister outline to the committee the general branches of bacteriology which are being studied?

Mr. Gardiner: The activities of the division may be divided into three categories, namely, research, direct service, and regulatory control work. Research, the chief function of the division, is carried on chiefly in co-operation with the experimental farm service and other divisions of science service along the following lines: Dairy bacteriology, food microbiology, soil microbiology, general microbiology. Direct service involves the analysis of samples, legume seed inoculants and control of central experimental farm diary operation. The regulatory control work is concerned with official quality control of various products coming within the scope of acts and regulations administered by the Department of Agriculture and to note conformity with standards. The products included are legume inoculants, edible gelatine, canned tomato products, frozen and dehydrated vegetables and fruits, powdered and frozen eggs, pasteurized honey and powdered milk.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I should like to support the request made by the member for Vancouver South in connection with the policy of selling butter to institutions. I have received various representations from institutions in my county which are very anxious to hear from the minister and the government that this policy will be continued.

7. Botany and plant pathology, $1,474,719.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell me whether anything new has been discovered to stop loose smut in wheat? The old method was pretty cumbersome and I understand there have been some changes and that there are some new fungicides. What is the latest development in that regard?

Mr. Gardiner: The old treatment, of course, was the bluestone treatment which was quite general, but control of smuts of the cereal grains can be done by seed treatment. The hot water treatment is the only one that will control the loose smuts of wheat and barley, but on account of the special equipment required for this treatment and the necessity of controlling the water temperature accurately the application of the treatment is restricted to relatively small lots of high quality seed intended for increase.

A recent development that has taken place, as yet on a small scale, in both eastern and western Canada is the provision in certain localities of special equipment for treating farmers' seed with hot water. The plant pathological laboratory at Edmonton has experimented with considerable success with a simplified chemical treatment and a cold water soap treatment for the control of loose smut of barley. The Saskatoon laboratory has recently developed an embryo test to detect smut of barley that promises to give more reliable results than the present method of field inspection.

Then there is formaldehyde, which is a treatment that has been used for a long period. The treatment continued to be the common treatment for the control of bunt of wheat, loose and covered smuts of oats and covered and false loose smut of barley. When properly applied it is effective but it has the disadvantage that it frequently results in seed injury. Recent advances in seed treatment materials have resulted in the general use of organic mercury compounds applied to the seed as a dust, a liquid or in a concentrated paste usually referred to as a slurry. The organic mercury compounds used for seed treatment in Canada are Ceresan dust, Laytosan dust, Ceresan M applied as a slurry and Panogen applied as a liquid. I find as much difficulty with these terms as the Minister of Trade and Commerce did with his.

Mr. Charlton: Is there not another one, Spergon, used for loose smut? I understand they are using a very low concentration and soaking it in water at room temperature.

Mr. Gardiner: They are experimenting with a lot of others, including Spergon, and I do not know when the department will be prepared to make a recommendation.

Mr. Charlton: You have no definite recommendation on that one yet?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I understand not.

Mr. Nowlan: As the minister knows, item 7 deals with one phase of our agricultural economy which is of great interest in the apple industry, the pathological studies that are made in that regard. I was wondering just what the breakdown of this item would be. Actually the experimental farm at Kentville has been specializing largely in the last few years and under the recent management in dealing with problems of pathology, botany and fungicides, everything that has to do with the apple industry, rather than operating as a general experimental farm, although it does have some livestock and some poultry. Is there a separate allocation under this item? Can the minister tell us how much of the study of botany and plant pathology at the experimental farm at Kentville is done under this item or is it included in the experimental farm service votes? If it is a separate item, I should like the minister to give us a breakdown and indicate how much of the vote of $1,474,000 is to be spent on the work in the Annapolis valley having to do with the fruit industry of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Gardiner: It is not easily available but we will get that and bring it back after lunch.

Mr. Nowlan: I suspect a lot of it may be in the experimental farms vote.

Mr. Gardiner: I think probably it is but there is an amount under this item which is spent there.

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister check on that?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Quelch: Can the minister say whether any work is being done to develop a suitable type of barley for export to Japan? I understand there is quite a possibility of expanding our sales of barley to that country but that they prefer a white barley.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. There are three different places where experiments are being carried on, one at Lethbridge, one at Lacombe and one at Winnipeg. No particular variety has yet been announced as being particularly suitable for that but work is being done on it.

Mr. Argue: Just on that point may I say that I am hopeful that the department will expedite the breeding to which the minister has referred. Since there has been a tremendous falling off in the Japanese market for Canadian barley, because we have been informed that the Japanese prefer a barley with the white hull rather than the barley that we have in quantity with a brown or green hull, I am wondering whether the minister can say whether there is any hope for the early release of a variety that will give us some hope of getting back into what in very recent years has been an extremely important market for Canadian barley?

Mr. Gardiner: The effort, of course, is being made to get that matter dealt with as soon as possible. I understand it is the weathering effect upon the barley which creates the colour which they do not wish to have. An effort is being made to overcome that difficulty. I cannot say how soon they will be successful in doing it, but they are working diligently on the problem.

Mr. Argue: As I understand it, it is the end product, after the cooking process, with which we are concerned. The Japanese like barley that, after it is cooked, turns out as near the colour of rice as possible. Can the minister say whether a variety, even in the small quantities with which the breeders have to deal, has yet been discovered, or is only the breeding process itself still going on, or are they to the point of multiplying a variety that has some promise?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Gardiner: No. I understand the variety has not yet been uncovered that will permit that distribution.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Along that same line, may I ask this question? Would it not be possible to import some foundation stock that would be suitable so that too much time would not be lost?

Mr. Gardiner: We have imported varieties from Australia and from wherever we feel there is any variety that might be developed suitably. However, up to now we have not been able to recommend any particular one.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I understand that most of the research work in weed control is closely allied with the botany division in discovering the life cycles or growing cycles of weeds. I am wondering whether in the department any recent developments have taken place which would indicate that controls for such extremely bad weeds as toad flax are appearing and what activities the department is undertaking in order to control this weed. Further, I should like to know whether the work, with the co-operation which the department has had from entomology, in developing a selected parasite to control toad flax is proceeding at as rapid a pace as is hoped?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that it is proceeding as rapidly as can be expected under the circumstances. Every effort is being made to improve upon what is already being done.

Mr. Quelch: While we are on the question of weeds, may I say that one of the worst ones with which we are plagued on heavy land is wild oats. I know that many farmers "sowed wild oats" in their younger days; but since then they have been having a great deal of trouble in eradicating them from their land. I was wondering whether the minister could tell us about any procedure for eradicating them. I understand that there is a form of spray that can be used on wild oats, but it seems to be very hard to spray wild oats without killing the other types of grains.

Mr. Gardiner: There is being developed a chemical spray which it is hoped will deal with wild oats. But so far as we know up to the present time there is only one way to deal with wild oats and that is by good farming. The chief way of successfully treating wild oats out in the west that I know of is in the sowing of rye. Rye sown by August 10 on summer fallow will get rid of wild oats in just one round. I know that. Hon. members may shake heads all they like. I farm out there. Most of the people who farm out west sow their fall rye on stubble. But if one wants to get rid of wild oats, one can get rid of four crops in one year by summer fallowing to August 10; by sowing your fall rye on August 10 thus getting two crops of wild oats and that way you get two more crops before you take the rye off. Four crops in fall and spring will clean them out. If anyone has not tried it, he had better do so. It is more successful than any spray yet found.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): As the minister knows, the viability of a wild oat seed will persist up to fifty years.

Mr. Gardiner: It will if you do not sprout it. But if you farm so as to sprout it, four crops will clean your land.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Just to get off this wild oats question for a moment may I ask a question about another matter. From studying the minister's report I notice that at page 53 they mention the increased use of newer herbicides for weed control, and they mention the use of these herbicides to control quack grass, buckwheat, wild oats and so on. However, I have not yet been able to find any information at all as to whether investigations are being carried on to control the spread of toadflax in western Alberta. If that information is available, I should certainly like to get my hands on it. I know that in my part of the province of Alberta the toadflax menace is rapidly growing. There is acre after acre of land that is now of absolutely no use at all.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to agree with the Minister of Agriculture with regard to wild oats. Any person who knows anything about farming knows that you do not have to put up with wild oats for very long if you farm properly. If farmers are careless or negligent, they will grow wild oats.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I believe considerable work has been done in developing rust-resistant varieties of Durum wheat that would be suitable for the market. As the minister knows, better varieties of Durum wheat are at present relatively susceptible to rust, and the whole Manitoba area and the area of eastern Saskatchewan which normally grow a great deal of Durum wheat, to a large extent have been obliged to abandon that crop because of the rust menace. The growing of Durum wheat has moved to western Saskatchewan and Alberta to a considerable extent. I wonder whether the minister can describe to us some of the work in that regard and tell us when some of these new varieties may be released in quantity.

Mr. Gardiner: There are two varieties of rust-resistant Durum wheat which have been imported from North Dakota, and we are multiplying those now for distribution. Just as soon as they are multiplied sufficiently they will be distributed in the west. The work is at the seed-growing stage now. Some of the seed is out among the seed growers who are multiplying it.

8. Chemistry, $754,679.

Mr. Quelch: I wonder whether the minister can say what research has been done in regard to the chemical control of wheat that is infested with red mites. The farmers have continued to be warned to check their wheat in order to see whether their wheat is infested or not. Then the recommendation is made that if it is infested the wheat should be turned from one bin to another. When the bins are all full of wheat, it is not always easy to change wheat over from one bin to another. I have seen advertisements recommending certain kinds of chemicals that can be used to treat wheat whilst it is still in the bin. In addition, warnings have been issued that if these chemicals are used, the wheat may be affected in such a way that it will not be suitable for human consumption. I was wondering whether the minister can say whether or not there is any safe treatment for wheat that has become infested.

Mr. Gardiner: We have no information here on that, but I know what my hon. friend is speaking about. He refers to the mites that get in bins. We have been accustomed to saying that they get into the spots where the pipe has been running grain into the bin, the dust gathers there and mites form and destroy the grain in the bin. We will have that information looked up.

Mr. Quelch: I know of one farmer who used gas to destroy the mites and afterwards the wheat was condemned as not being suitable, so apparently one has to be careful about the treatment one uses.

9. Entomology, including a grant of $40,000 to the international congress of entomology to assist in defraying the cost of the tenth international congress of entomology to be held in Canada in 1956, $2,210,475.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Has the minister or his department had any word from southwestern Ontario as to the possibility of an infestation of army worms this season? The reason I ask that question is that there were two different representations while I was home last week end that there were quite a number of them showing up in some fields. When the minister is replying, has he any information on materials being readily available in case the infestation should become worse?

Mr. Gardiner: The army worm which was so widespread and caused serious loss in 1954 occurred in only a few very local areas in 1955. Practically no losses occurred in those areas and the army worm disappeared early in the season. Now, that is the only record which we have of them. I did not hear that there was any serious infestation in Ontario. Of course, that is looked after primarily by the provincial agricultural authorities, but as the army worms do not pay any attention to boundary lines we do try to keep records and assist in every way possible, but most of that kind of work is done by the provincial people.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): What is the latest information you have on the best method of control?

Mr. Gardiner: I am sorry, but the official who is in charge of that is not here at the moment. I shall get him and have this information available later.

Mr. Weir: I notice that in this item there is a reference to the tenth international congress on entomology to be held in Canada in 1956. I wonder if the minister could inform the house where that is going to be held and when?

Mr. Gardiner: It is to be held in Montreal in August. The delegates will visit the Ottawa farm here and make an excursion into other parts of Canada.

Mr. Knight: My hon. friend has just asked the question I was going to ask, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bryson: In connection with this infestation of army worms, I wonder what has been the result of the experiment in the northern United States whereby they drop horseflies out of aircraft. As a matter of fact, I saw this done last year in Wisconsin, and I am just wondering if there is any information available or if consideration of this proposition has been given?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know whether I was listening carefully enough, but I thought my hon. friend said it was horseflies they were dropping. I understand it is an insect which resembles the horsefly but it is not the horsefly. The treatment is the same as that used in connection with the cutworm. A little insect is distributed in considerable numbers and it goes around stinging the cutworm. It lays an egg in the cutworm which develops into another little worm which eats the cutworm. The plan is the same in connection with the army worm, but it is a different insect that is utilized.

Mr. Bryson: It is quite an amusing thing, but as a matter of fact everyone called them horseflies and the minister's explanation seems to cover it. There is one other thing I should like to ask the minister. Certain mites or other similar animals have been causing a great deal of concern in northern Saskatchewan in connection with some types of clothing. A United States flying service came into that part of the country and brought in lady bugs. They had a specially equipped plane and exhausted these lady bugs out of the plane. This had a good effect, and I am wondering if there has been any experimentation along that line?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know the history of lady bugs or that kind of thing. For many years we have been not only conducting experiments but doing work in assisting in the distribution of parasites. This matter has been discussed I think in almost every session during the 20 years I have been here. We have had considerable success in breeding these insects and seeing that they are distributed.

The reason I mentioned the cutworm in particular is that I have watched the results of the experiments conducted on the prairies. It has often been said that the cutworm is difficult to destroy as long as the field remains dry. The cutworm works underground and when it rains it has to come up on top in order to get air. If you go over a summer fallow field or a wheat field that is infested with cutworms, you will find that after a rain the soil is broken and the worm has come up on top. It is then that the parasite gets busy and goes around stinging these cutworms, killing them by thousands. The breeding of these parasites is carried on by the department and we distribute them. They fly about killing cutworms, army worms and different parasites that infest our crops.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): On that same point, I wish the minister would use his influence to ensure the continuation of an experiment which was carried on in connection with the control of toadflax. The entomology department discovered a species of beetle, which was bred for the purpose of destroying the toadflax they had in Ontario. They took this same beetle to western Canada and found it was selective enough in its diet that it only ate the toadflax. Unfortunately, the experiment stopped there, and I think it is very important that they continue the experiment in the control of toadflax. I think it is a very important trend in the control of toadflax and I wish the authorities would ensure the continuation of the experiment because it might have very beneficial consequences.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the work is still going on. There is a little difficulty in getting sufficient numbers of the insect in order to have them multiply as fast as we require.

Mr. Cardiff: Has the minister any knowledge of the fly, bug, or whatever it is, called the heel fly, that is infesting cattle? We have a great deal of trouble in our county. They just drive a bunch of cattle almost crazy.

Mr. Gardiner: We have been carrying on activities in connection with that at Lethbridge particularly. It is what is known as the warble fly, I think, that stings cattle. Sprays have been used in connection with them. We are now carrying on activities on the Guelph farm in Ontario.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I should like to touch on the question brought up by the hon. member for Middlesex East in connection with army worms. The time may arrive when the infestation will be a calamity to farmers. Have any plans been laid down by the department, in conjunction with the provincial governments, to combat this pest? What makes me ask the question is that a couple of years ago in some instances in Bruce the infestation of army worms was getting very alarming. I had occasion to wire the ministers of agriculture of Ontario and of Canada. The reply I received from the federal Minister of Agriculture was that it was strictly a provincial responsibility. I understand that at times spraying and dusting has been done to good advantage in connection with army worms. I should like to have some information. If this infestation should reach such a stage—and I hope it never will—that it becomes alarming, have any plans been made in connection with getting machines to do the dusting and spraying, or has anything been done along that line?

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member said, Mr. Chairman, the present position is, and has been over the years, that that kind of work is carried on by the provincial departments. They have been fighting grasshoppers in the west and it is the provincial departments that put on that program. In the other provinces, when any difficulty of that kind arises, it is the provincial governments that carry on. The authorities in the provincial departments come to Ottawa for advice on the technical sides of it, and on any knowledge that we have on the methods that are used in other countries or in other places. We gather all the information that we can on these kinds of things through these bureaux that are established here and there and that we support. We give them all the information we can. Then, too, on the matter of the movement, that is, the movement of grasshoppers, which is a little different from the other insects, but nevertheless they do move across the country. When a movement of that kind starts down in the United States and moves toward Canada we keep the provincial authorities informed as much as we can on what we know of it; but the actual putting on of a program in order to combat it within a province is carried on by the provincial governments.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Does the federal government take any interest in the matter or pay anything toward the work that is done in connection with dusting and spraying, or is that done strictly by the provincial governments or by the companies?

Mr. Gardiner: We do cover some of the costs in connection with research. As a matter of fact, we carry on the work but in the actual battling of it the work is done and financed by the provinces.

Mr. Patterson: While we are discussing worms and bugs I should like to refer to the situation that existed in British Columbia last year with reference to the corn ear worm. I brought to the attention of the minister and the department the fact that corn infected with corn ear worm was being imported from the United States, and growers in British Columbia were afraid that it would become an established problem as far as their crops were concerned. If I remember the correspondence aright, I was advised that corn ear worm had already established itself in the crops in British Columbia and I was wondering just to what extent that is so? What information has the department on that particular matter?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the only information we have is that it has been investigated in British Columbia and been established that the worm has been there for some time. It is not just being imported now in corn that is being brought in. Apparently, it has been up and down the coast.

Mr. Patterson: Is it established to any great extent or is it on a comparatively small scale?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, I understand it is comparatively small because, as you know, British Columbia is not a large producer of corn.

They grow garden corn and other kinds of corn. It is more prevalent in the states to the south than it is in British Columbia.

Mr. Patterson: Will the minister and the department keep a check on it this year? I am speaking now with reference to the importation of such corn. Will the department see that nothing further in that line is imported into the country?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, we shall certainly keep a check on it. I am not too certain as to whether we have all the authority that is necessary in order to prevent somebody in British Columbia from buying it across the line in the state of Washington and bringing it in. We might have difficulties, but nevertheless we do keep a check on it and try to prevent the spread of it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, last spring there was a serious outbreak of scrapies in some of the sheep flocks in western Canada. At that time it was reported that the federal veterinarians were taking brain samples and blood samples of those sheep in order to get a better idea of the cause of this disease. Has the minister any report to make to the committee in connection with any findings that have resulted from the investigations made?

Mr. Gardiner: I can give only general statements with regard to it at the moment. I wonder whether my hon. friend would leave it until we reach item No. 20?

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I had thought of doing that, Mr. Chairman, but it has to do with the science service.

Mr. Gardiner: No; it has to do with health of animals.

Item agreed to.

10. Forest biology, $2,167,733.

Mr. Nowlan: I imagine this is one of the newer items within the lifetime and experience of the minister because it is growing every year. There was a time, I presume, when forest biology as such was a very minor matter so far as the federal Department of Agriculture was concerned. Today, and quite properly so, it is becoming more and more important as time goes on. I presume this work is now done in co-operation largely with the provinces, but certain scientific work is done in the minister's own laboratories. For instance, the province of New Brunswick conducted an extensive spraying operation in connection with budworm, I think it was. Is there some basis of co-operation between the two governments under which that is done? Incidentally, there have been reports, as the ministers knows, of bitter criticism from either pseudo or genuine fishermen who say that as a result of the spraying operations a great deal of damage has been done to the fish; that the spray is so efficient it not only kills the infestation on the trees but it also kills everything living in the waters, the brooks and the streams which run through the woods. I wonder if the minister has any comment to make on that and if he can indicate if there is any way in which this can be dealt with.

I also have a local problem to present to the minister which I presume would come under this item. A blight of some kind seems to be attacking birch trees in Nova Scotia and many of them appear burned as though from a forest fire. This is a recent occurrence in this area and I wonder if the department is co-operating with the province in that particular matter and, if so, what is being done about it? Would the minister give a general breakdown and what the distribution has been among the provinces?

Mr. Gardiner: As the hon. member has stated, this is something which has been going on for some considerable length of time, that is co-operation between the forestry branch of the department and the forestry branches of the provincial governments. The interest of the Department of Agriculture is associated with the fact that in this country we do not include forestry with our agriculture, as is the case in most countries where the growing of trees and the planting of trees on land is considered to be agriculture just as is the growing of wheat on land. It may be that, because our country was practically covered with forest to begin with and that natural resources are under the provinces, it was decided that they should carry on most of the work having to do with forestry.

The fact that we make a study of insects and all that kind of thing and the fact that we have the facilities to do a considerable part of the work which forestry branches might require to have done has indicated the need for co-operation between the forestry branches of the provinces and the branch of our department. Our branch produces different parasites in connection with the fighting of plant diseases and also studies diseases that attack trees such as the one just referred to. There is very close co-operation between the provinces and this branch of the department.

I have here an outline of the work which has been done in connection with the die-back of birch and the bronze birch borer. Heavy mortality of birch occurred in the maritime provinces and eastern Quebec in the period 1935-1947. Intensive studies showed that no single biological agent is primarily responsible for the disease; however, the bronze birch borer is almost invariably found in deteriorating trees and may be a contributory factor in their ultimate death. More recent studies of birch rootlets and mycorrhiza have indicated that these structures are sensitive to minor changes in soil temperature and moisture. Weather records indicate the prevalence of higher than normal temperature and reduced average precipitation during the period when trees were dying. Permanent sample plots have been established in western Quebec and Ontario to determine whether similar injury may occur in these areas.

Since 1947, definite recovery of surviving trees has been evident in the maritime provinces and eastern Quebec.

Detailed root-washing experiments have been undertaken in New Brunswick and Ontario. In trees showing recovery most of the rootlets were alive with an abundance of mycorrhiza. In the years when die-back was severe, affected trees had a higher percentage of their rootlets dead with a complete absence of associated mycorrhiza. It is possible, therefore, that the dying of tops of trees was preceded by an abnormal condition within the root system which may have arisen as the result of some unfavourable environmental factor.

Root-washing experiments will be continued to determine the rootlet and mycorrhizal conditions in birch trees. Controlled experiments on the temperature relationships of birch rootlets and the associated mycorrhiza will be continued. Ecological studies of birch in Quebec and Ontario will be continued. Studies of virus diseases of birch will be continued in the maritime provinces.

I might say in relation to that that over the radio this morning I heard someone explaining why some of the cedar hedges out at the farm are damaged.

Mr. Charlton: I think everyone appreciates the seriousness of the situation with regard to the spruce budworm. Last year I asked the minister if anything was being done about the pine shoot moth which had appeared in southwestern Ontario. I see by the item that there has been an increase of 47 in the staff of the forest biological division and an increase of some $200,000 in the vote. I think we will all agree that this is very important work.

What has been the result of the experimental work in connection with the spruce budworm apart from the killing of fish, or at least most of them, and also what have been the results in connection with the pine shoot moth? I understand that the only things that will kill this are certain sprays and that cold weather will destroy them as effectively as anything else.

Mr. Gardiner: The position with regard to the spruce budworm is this. In 1955, spruce budworm infestations again caused heavy defoliation in northern New Brunswick and in the Gaspe peninsula. Some tree mortality occurred in 1954 and 1955, in unsprayed areas and in others sprayed too late to be effective. In Ontario, heavy infestations persisted on Sibley peninsula and Black Bay peninsula, as well as between Lake Seul, Minnesota, and the Manitoba border, with extensions into eastern Manitoba. There was little change from 1954 in the infestation at Namew lake on the Manitoba-Saskatchewan border. Moderate to heavy infestations occurred in white spruce stands along the Mackenzie river for about 400 miles north of Fort Simpson in the Northwest Territories. In British Columbia, the infestations in the Harrison-lake-Lillooet river section of the lower Fraser drainage showed some enlargement, but a reduction in intensity.

The investigations carried out in New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia during recent years have yielded much information on the life history, habits, ecology, natural control, and epidemiology of the spruce budworm. A considerable proportion of the information has been published in scientific, professional and trade journals.

Studies of the effects of aerial sprays of DDT on budworm populations were continued in New Brunswick and in the Gaspe peninsula. The forest biology division worked closely with the provincial authorities and the forest industry in defining areas in which chemical control operations were required, assisted in some of the technical aspects of the spraying operations, and carried out biological studies and population counts in sprayed areas as well as in check areas reserved from spraying operations. Reports on the results of the spraying operations have been distributed.

(c) Work contemplated for 1956-57. The program of basic studies of the budworm problem will be continued in New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, and Alberta. Infestations not yet subjected to control operations will be kept under close surveillance. Biological studies of the effects of spraying operations in New Brunswick and Quebec will be continued.

Mr. Charlton: Has the minister anything about the pine shoot moth?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I understand we have nothing on it here.

Mr. Charlton: Has there been any work done on it? I understand that a considerable amount of work has been done on this in southwestern Ontario.

Mr. Gardiner: I think that work is largely being done by the Ontario government, but we can get information on it.

Mr. Charlton: Probably the minister's department is doing a considerable amount of work on it too.

Mr. Gardiner: We may be, but the work that is done on all these is really being done by the provincial government.

Mr. Charlton: The minister gave quite a good report on it last year. That is why I say he must have something about it. He can get the information on it later if he wishes.

Mr. Gardiner: If we can get the information here, we shall; if not, we can get it from the people who have it.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Can the minister report any progress in arresting the spread of the Dutch elm disease?

Mr. Nowlan: While the minister is checking that, I may say that I notice in the details under forest biology that we have provision for five cooks and one cookee. I was wondering how the one cookee was distributed among the five cooks. Who is the lucky cook who is going to get the cookee, and who are the ones that are going to be without?

Mr. Gardiner: Of course, the explanation of that is that probably in most of the camps where they have cooks the cook does all the work, but there is probably one camp that is so big that they need a cookee.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): The Minister has not yet answered my question about the Dutch elm disease.

Mr. Gardiner: We have just sent for the expert on that. I understand that that is being handled, as I said a moment ago, by the province and by the cities in general where they are dealing with the problem. Of course, we carry on research work and give any information we can with regard to those matters, but I understand it is primarily carried on by the provinces and by the cities.

Item agreed too.

11. Plant protection, $839,688.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister whether this has to do with weed control.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: It does not have to do with weed control. It has to do with the inspection of plants, insects and diseases that effect nursery stock coming in, as to what may be carried by that stock.

Mr. Cardiff: It has nothing to do with spraying and so on?

Mr. Gardiner: It is not the spraying; it is checking the plants that come in. When you come to the boundary line coming from the United States, if you have plants, sometimes you have difficulty in getting across and they insist on your destroying them before you come in. That is part of the protection against bringing in disease. We also inspect what is going out.

Mr. Charlton: I wonder whether the minister could give us some information regarding the importation of balled burlapped evergreens from Holland and the danger of nematode infestation, of which all nurserymen are so much afraid? I understand there is some reciprocal agreement with the government of Holland that they will not ship out anything that is infected. I wonder what this government has to do with that arrangement. Has there been any difficulty with the government of Holland regarding the importation of these balled burlapped evergreens?

Mr. Gardiner: That is true. We send inspectors to Holland at times to make inspections before the plants leave there to come here. We have reciprocal arrangements with a number of countries, Holland being one of them. For example, we get many bulbs from Holland. We have arrangements with countries from which we receive considerable numbers of plants so that we can make inspections there before the plants are sent here.

Mr. Charlton: It is a little different in the case of bulbs. I understand that this nematode is carried only when there is soil along with the plant; it is carried in the soil. I wonder whether there has been any trouble or whether any importations have been stopped because of nematodes found in the soil.

Mr. Gardiner: There have been cases where plants have been prevented from coming here on that account, but I have not the information here in regard to that. Of course, if it were not for the danger of infestation, we would not have started that at the time. The fact that we have the inspection results in some plants being prevented from coming.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Along that line, I might mention an experience I had. At the time of the coronation two English oaks were brought into my home village from England. They were from an area where there was infestation of the nematode, and the requirement was that all soil was to be washed from the roots, and then they were shipped out in a bag by air mail. The interesting part was that all the soil had to be removed.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms service—

12. Experimental farms service administration, $211,122.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister whether a spray has been discovered that will kill chicory, or blue devil as it is commonly called in my part of the country.

Mr. Gardiner: There is one under development at Lacombe, Alberta, that is giving hopeful signs, but it has not yet been proven and therefore it is not being recommended or distributed.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I should like to raise a point under item 12 which ties in with the science service. In many cases the science service and the experimental farms service follow parallel lines. The one aspect of that with which I am familiar is the very contentious one of weed control. We have, in the science service, personnel working on one aspect of weed control and in the experimental farms service individuals at the experimental farms who are carrying out limited projects within their own jurisdiction. I think this same principle is duplicated in many of the projects which are carried out. In addition, we find that both of the services, the science service and the experimental farms service, compete for technical personnel to carry on their projects. I wonder whether the minister has ever given serious consideration to a long run trend of amalgamating these two services and perhaps part of the economics division so that you would have an integrated service whereby you would carry out your technical surveys under the science service, investigate them through the experimental farms service and carry out the research work through the economics division. I think such a trend deserves very serious consideration and I would appreciate having the minister's comment on the suggestion.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that what my hon. friend has in mind is presumed to be already taken care of. There is an eastern committee and a western committee already set up. There are representatives representing the federal services and others representing the provincial services. They review all the representations that are made to them and determine whether a certain thing is to be given to the science service or is to be handled by the experimental farms. In other words, they designate where it can be best dealt with and it is there it is dealt with. This distribution to the services is made before the actual problem is dealt with either by the one or the other. I presume at times there will be co-operation between the two in dealing with a problem.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): I think we should go one step further and have one technical officer in charge of the three departments with a representative from the science service and from the experimental farms service. I believe we would have closer co-operation once projects are started. I agree, as the minister pointed out, that before a project is launched there is co-operation between the departments but once a project is launched difficulty arises, and I think that by closer mechanical co-ordination of the services we would have a more efficient organization. I wish the minister would give that serious consideration.

Mr. Gardiner: We will give it serious consideration. I will ask the officials to have a look at it and take what is in Hansard.

Mr. Stanton: In view of the fact that the central experimental farm cannot expand any farther on account of the building projects surrounding it, has the minister given any consideration to expanding the farm by way of an annex say 50 or 75 miles from the central farm?

Mr. Gardiner: This question, of course, as to what is going to become of the experimental farm in Ottawa comes up nearly every year. The department is of the opinion that it ought to remain just where it is. We do not think it is going to help agriculture or help anyone who comes here to get an idea of what is going on in Canada to have the experimental farm 20 miles away from Ottawa or even 10 miles away. We think one of the chief assets of our experimental farm system as well as one of the chief assets of the city of Ottawa and of Canada in general is the central experimental farm right where it is.

This question came up recently when the city wanted to take a piece of it to make a highway, and we insisted on its being just as small a piece as they could get along with and still have the highway. We intend to continue that policy. We are not making any preparations to take anything away from the present experimental farm and we hope the farm will always remain just where it is. It may be possible that at some time in the future we will have to have another location for some particular things that we cannot do right here in the centre of the city but we are not considering that at the moment.

Mr. Stanton: I did not have reference to discarding the farm in Ottawa. I was speaking about an annex. We know that as time goes on and the years go by we must expand in every department. There is no room for expansion of the farm in Ottawa and I had in mind what the department would do if it wanted to expand it. When I asked the question I also had in mind certain fruits, vegetables and so on with respect to which a much better job of experimenting could probably be done in a slightly warmer climate. I have in mind the region along the St. Lawrence river and naturally Leeds county and the fact that a slightly warmer climate would be helpful in the case of experiments with some small fruits and types of flowers. We know the climate is warmer along the St. Lawrence river than at Ottawa, and perhaps a better job of experimenting could be done if an annex were established there.

Mr. Bryce: Can the minister give a report to the committee on the latest information he has respecting the new breed of hog known as the Lacombe? I think you must have raised seven generations now and you should be able to tell us whether the outlook is as hopeful this year as it was last year when you reported on the experiment being made.

Mr. Gardiner: We had that same breed of hog at Ottawa when I came here 20 years ago and we had some very lively discussions in the house on it. I think most of the people who were interested in carrying the project still further were on this side of the house at that time, and we had to explain what had happened up to that time. Last year I took the trouble to go and look at the hogs at Lacombe myself and when I was there I asked the direct question: Is there any difference at all between this experiment and the one carried on at Ottawa 20 years ago? The answer was no. I had a look at the hogs and all I wish to say at this time is that it will probably be wise to distribute them some time, but I think there has got to be a lot of preparatory educational work done among the people whom we persuaded to put the long white hog all the way across this country. Breeders are established everywhere across the country. They have that type of hog, and in the face of that I do not think it should be the work of the department to go out and say that there is another one that is better until we have proven it to their satisfaction. I have grave doubts whether it is better. Hog breeders outside the service altogether to whom I have been talking do not think it is better yet, and until they do I would not be in favour of making any great distribution of the hogs.

Mr. Bryce: That is why I asked the question. I have great faith in the Yorkshire hog myself. However, I have an open mind on the matter, and if you can show me that by doing this experimental work you can produce a better hog than the Yorkshire hog and get a bacon hog that this country wants I would be all for it. I have another question while I am on my feet. Most hog feeders know that fishmeal is a valuable food. I think it is in Nova Scotia that they are producing fishmeal silage now. It is a wonderful thing when you are feeding hogs but the trouble is you have got to inform the hog feeder that he can only feed fishmeal up to a certain point. If you feed it right along you are going to destroy the business of the packing companies because you will have to put in the frying pan bacon that will taste fishy. You have got to be very careful about that. I think it should be a part of the work of the department to carry on an educational program. They should see that in every bag of such meal that goes out there should be information to the effect that if you feed it too long you will destroy the thing that everybody is trying to achieve, an ideal bacon hog producing bacon with a first class flavour.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Cardiff: Just when the committee rose for lunch I was going to ask the minister whether they were still experimenting with the scrub hogs they had out at the experimental farm a couple of years ago.

Mr. Gardiner: I have not seen the scrub hogs. They are experimenting with some very good ones.

Mr. Cardiff: It all depends on what you call "good". Anything that I saw was not good. Perhaps they had some good ones but I did not happen to see them. The ones I saw were anything but good. They were a cross or something with Chester Whites. I do not know what they were trying to do with them.

Mr. Gardiner: I think that might be something along the lines of the experiment we were talking about at Lacombe with Chester Whites, Berks and Yorks and by certain methods of crossing trying to develop a new strain.

Mr. Charlton: I understood that this Lacombe breed was all in the west. I understood that there was not any of that breed down here at all. Is that not true?

Mr. Gardiner: There are a few at the Ottawa farm with lopped ears hanging down over their eyes.

Mr. Charlton: They might just be the first cross. Are there any of the Lacombe breed here in Ottawa at the experimental farm?

Mr. Gardiner: The breed which was here 20 years ago is the same breed as is at Lacombe now. At least the experts tell me out there it is. I have been over at the Ottawa farm within the last two weeks and have seen some similar ones there, as my hon. friend from Huron has no doubt seen. I do not know just how they got there but they are there.

Mr. Charlton: If the ones out west are supposed to be the Lacombe breed, and as to which I understand they are trying to get registered now—there is an application before the government to have them registered —I sincerely suggest that if they are as bad as the ones out at the farm here, they had probably better disregard registration.

Mr. Gardiner: It has gone further than that. There has been an application for registration and I am not sure that arrangements have not been made to have them registered. They have asked me if they are to be distributed and I have not agreed. That is what I have been telling the committee.

Mr. Charlton: We shall let that matter drop for the moment. I want to add a word to what the hon. member for Leeds said about the experimental farm. I brought this matter up a couple of years ago, I think, when there was some discussion at that time, as there has been every year about moving the farm out of the city of Ottawa. I understand that there is now some discussion with regard to moving the barns and the housing for the animals out further from the city. That would split up the animal research division or the livestock division and the crops division. That is to say, the crop experimental work would be maintained here on the present farm but the animal experimentation work would be moved out of the city. I can see a certain amount of justification for such a move if the city by-law prohibited the keeping of animals within the city limits. In that case you might be obliged to move them out. I wonder whether there is any truth in the suggestion that such a move is to take place?

Mr. Gardiner: As I said before lunch, we have not agreed to any proposal to move any of the experimental farm out of Ottawa. So far as the department is concerned and so far as the government is concerned, the farm is to remain just as it is and where it is. I cannot say what will be the situation 25 years from now. My hon. friend might be in office by that time, I do not know.

Mr. Charlton: I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not suggesting that it be moved out of Ottawa. I am just wondering whether there has been any discussion taking place between the department and the city or whoever the discussion was with, with regard to the matter. I can see the one thing that might conflict and that is if the city by-law says—and I imagine that it does—provided that no animals be kept within its boundaries, referring to cows, horses or pigs. I suppose such animals as cats and dogs would not be affected. But in view of that possibility, there might have been some discussions at least. Have there been any discussions with the city of Ottawa?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a discussion about moving part or all of the experimental farm out every time they want to build a new public building in Ottawa. Somebody comes down here and says, "We would like to build it on the experimental farm". When they wanted a place to practise tennis they wanted it out there. We get those suggestions all the time. Discussion comes up every time somebody has a notion of that kind. The government has always taken the position that there is going to be no moving of the experimental farm.

Mr. Bryce: I should like to ask the minister whether the Lacombe hogs are being bred only in the one place. When I drive home from Ottawa is there some place to which I can go and see them or must I go to Lacombe to see them?

Mr. Gardiner: The only place I am sure I have seen them is at Lacombe. You can see hogs in different stages of the cross breeding which is taking place to produce what is known as the Lacombe hog. All I know is this; there are a few lop-eared hogs at the Ottawa farm. I did not go in and ask about them. I go out to the experimental farm here occasionally, and in driving through there within the last two or three weeks I have seen a few hogs that look very much like those I saw at Lacombe. I therefore would not deny that some of them are there. However, I would not say they are there officially.

Mr. Bryce: How many generations have been developed now by the gentlemen who run the minister's department?

Mr. Gardiner: I am not certain as to how many generations they have gone through but I think you will find out that they are at different stages with those hogs. There are hogs there that conform more to the Berks in appearance but they are white and there are hogs that conform more to the Chester White. In other words, I would think their work with the breeding system that is being followed has not been completed in order to produce a hog that I would want to accept as of established type.

Mr. Weir: On this item I should like to interject a remark or two. I myself made a special trip to the Lacombe farm last summer. While I did not have anyone show me around, I saw a number of pigs which I presume are this new strain of Lacombe hogs that are being produced by the experimental farm system. I have no remarks to make about that matter except to say that they looked like a rugged type of hog. Perhaps the one advantage of their having ears hanging down over their eyes was that they could not so conveniently squeeze through garden fences. I think the point that we would be mostly interested in with regard to this particular experiment is whether or not the experiment has been successful in fixing the type of a good, rugged, economically produced hog. I think that is the essential thing that we are all striving for. It will take time to determine whether or not that is an animal superior to the standard breeds of hogs that we have had in this country for a long time.

I should like just to go on and say another word or two in connection with this vote which I note is up $27,000 from last year. In any little opportunity I have to wander around the country, I am always glad of the chance of dropping in on an experimental farm. It has always been a pleasant experience and there is something there which one can pick up every time he goes there. I think our experimental farms throughout the country are a credit to those who have been responsible for their organization and administration. More than that, I think that agriculture as an industry deserves that type of governmental scientific assistance. I commend most warmly the foresight of those who developed this system and who have been in each instance attempting to carry on experimental work which they thought would be of value to the particular community in which those farms were located. Perhaps I might be forgiven if I digressed for a moment, but I think what I am going to refer to is sufficiently close to this problem to ensure that I will not be ruled out of order for so doing. A few weeks ago I had the pleasure and privilege of attending the fiftieth anniversary of the first agricultural college established in the three western provinces, namely the institution in the province of Manitoba.

May I digress to say that it was a very creditable jubilee celebration which brought together 1,200 or 1,500 students who had attended the old agricultural college over the past 50 years. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that the man who was given the privilege of lifting the first sod towards the construction of a new science building, to which the graduates of that institution are making quite a reasonable contribution, was also the man first to register at that institution in 1906. Later, I had the privilege of listening to the dean of our agricultural college, who happens to be a namesake of mine, make a splendid address. In passing I should like to refer to that, having in mind particularly what agriculture is facing up to in this very competitive industrial world today. I am one of those who firmly believe that, more and more, agriculture has to look to our scientifically trained men to give the leadership, not only in production, but also in marketing and all these other fields that pertain to an industry of the importance of agriculture in this country.

Whatever government can do through experimental farms, through their various science divisions and their universities, to train agriculturists in a manner to enable them to give that leadership, I think it will be money well spent in the interests of this country in the days to come. For that reason I am glad to see that this vote is being continued and somewhat increased. In our own province of Manitoba we have two institutions that are very well regarded. I am referring to the experimental farm at Brandon and the one at Morden. They are carrying on in somewhat different fields, but none the less they are looked to by the people in those communities as well as the people outside of those communities for guidance and for information on any particular problem that may be affecting any farmer who is interested in improving his position.

We have in addition to that, as everyone knows, in all communities men who are giving a great deal of attention to the advancement of agriculture in the matter of producing of select stock seed, improving varieties and expanding these things as well as developing new crops and testing them out. Every community has such people who are a very valuable addition to our background in trying to establish agriculture scientifically on a sounder basis. I am thinking for the moment, if I may, of another area, partly in my own constituency, where the conditions are quite different from those that might be associated with the farms at Brandon or at Morden. In this area there is a different type of soil and, to some extent, different climatic conditions. These people seem to feel that they should have some direction in the way of developing speciality crops, whether that be corn, grasses and clover or things of that nature, I do not know. Nevertheless, the feeling is there and they think—I am speaking now of the local board of trade, the farmers union organization and other groups of that kind—that something by way of an illustration or demonstration plot should be established where people could go by and see what could be done. It might be a useful instrument in giving a lead perhaps to a more stable type of agriculture in that community. I think the minister will recognize the area to which I am referring and he will recall having met with a group of people from the McCreary area a year or so ago. I am just putting that before him and I would be interested in knowing what progress might have been made, if any, towards reviewing the possibility of some development of that nature.

I would only add one other word. When I referred to agricultural graduates, and I was not confining that to Manitoba alone, when I met with my associates of former years at this celebration, I want to say to the minister that quite a number of them were associated with the experimental farm system in various parts of this country.

Mr. Gardiner: May I tell my hon. friend that surveys are now being made in connection with the McCreary proposal.

Mr. Wylie: I have only a few remarks to make on this item. I am very glad to see this increase which, as the hon. member who has just spoken said, is about $27,400. I only hope that the $27,400 is to be used to establish an experimental farm in the Medicine Hat area. As the minister knows, we now have irrigation right down to Medicine Hat. At the present time we have an experimental range station at Manyberries, which is 75 miles south of Medicine Hat. We have an experimental station at Lethbridge—

Mr. Blackmore: It is a farm.

Mr. Wylie: Perhaps you are right, but it is 100 miles from Medicine Hat. However, we do feel that, now that we have irrigation right at our doorstep, serious consideration should be given to the establishment of an experimental farm in the Medicine Hat area.

I am sure the minister has had some representations, not only from me but from others, with regard to the establishment of that station. I do hope that in the very near future consideration will be given to an experimental farm in the Medicine Hat area. I might also say this. We are in a very dry area which now has irrigation. These farmers really do not know how to handle the water that we have today. The peculiar thing is that then the water was turned into the ditches about the middle of last month, it started to rain and it has been raining ever since. We hope it keeps up. However, I think that what we should have in the Medicine Hat area is an experimental farm to which the farmers can go to see how the different crops are raised. There are many crops that can be raised in that area, as the minister knows. I think it is time consideration was given to that idea.

I want to ask the minister one question. Have any representations been made to him by the city, by the chamber of commerce or by anyone but me, from the Medicine Hat area, about the establishment of an experimental farm in that area.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not recall, Mr. Chairman, that there is any correspondence on the matter but I was in Medicine Hat not very long ago, as my hon. friend knows, and representations were made at that time by all those organizations. I explained to them, of course, that the Manyberries farm south of Medicine Hat is still operating, which has to do with the dry area rather than the irrigated area, and that we are also carrying on at Vauxhall what we look upon as more or less of a model in connection with irrigation. We have there a very considerable illustration station which is operated for exactly the purpose the hon. member has in mind. The whole project, however, is one that was laid out entirely by our engineers and those who have had great experience in irrigation work and the public does visit that place quite regularly because of the nature of it. I think it does perform much of the irrigation work which might be carried out if we had an experimental farm as such set up. I have some doubt as to whether there is necessity for going farther than that at the present time. Nevertheless, I am pleased to have the representations that were made, and we shall look into the whole matter.

Mr. Wylie: Mr. Chairman, may I take up a few more minutes of the time of the committee? I am sure everyone in the Medicine Hat area appreciates what the dominion government has done with the range experimental farm at Manyberries. Hobart Peters, who is in charge at the present time, has done a very good job, but it is more in the nature of the production of livestock. They have various cattle down there that they experiment with. They investigate the number of cattle that each quarter section or section will carry in that area. They have done a wonderful job and they are still doing a wonderful job. They had a range station day out there last week or the week before, and 1,200 people attended. It is a wonderful thing to go down into an area where there are no trees except around a few farm homes, and there are very few there now. At the dominion range station they have shown what can be done by the storage of water. I was going to speak on this on the P.F.R.A. item—perhaps I should when it is mentioned. I think we see the results of a good range experimental farm. We do not go out to Vauxhall because it is 60, 70 or 80 miles away from Medicine Hat. The people just do not go out there, that is all. What we would like to have in Medicine Hat is something the same as they have in Lethbridge, namely, a dominion experimental farm to which the citizens of Medicine Hat could go after a drive of about 10 minutes. That is our idea. We would like that not only for the people living in Medicine Hat but also for the farmers in that area.

Mr. Montgomery: I have a question I would like to ask the minister on this item. I am wondering whether he would like to bring us up to date on the disease-resisting project in Fredericton having to do with experiments into the disease of potatoes? I think they call it a potato breeding project. How are they coming along with their experiments in Keswick, Kathadin, Canso and Netted Gems? Could we have that information?

Mr. Gardiner: While the officials are looking into this question I might answer a question which was asked by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings before lunch. He asked about the cost of operating the Department of Agriculture units at Kentville, Nova Scotia. For 1955-56, experimental farm, $188,000; botany and plant pathology, $46,820; entomology, $90,480.

Then, there was a further question asked with regard to the pine shoot moth. An active research program is being maintained on this pest in Ontario. Chemical control is being tested and parasites are being imported this year from Europe in an effort to check the outbreak. Work is going forward at Belleville, Maple and Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario.

A question was asked with regard to grain mites. These were thoroughly investigated during the second world war and it was found that infestations arose mainly from storing grain when the moisture content was excessive or from leaking granaries that permitted damp spots to develop. Chemical control is effective.

In recent years emphasis has been on the rusty grain beetle which has been the principal pest in stored grain. Research is continuing to improve the effect of insecticides when used in large bins. This work is centred at Winnipeg.

Mr. Pommer: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the statements made by the hon. member for Portage-Neepawa regarding the splendid work done at the dominion experimental farm at Morden, Manitoba. This farm is in my constituency, and I know from first-hand knowledge the high calibre of people employed there and the splendid contribution they have made to agriculture and also to horticulture. They are to be commended for the splendid work they have done in horticultural research in that part of western Canada.

While I am on this point I wonder whether the minister can tell me the name of the man who has been appointed as the new superintendent for that farm?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, a selection has been indicated but it is before the appeal board at present, and a final decision has not been made as to who is to follow Mr. Leslie.

On the national potato breeding project at Fredericton, two varieties were released. Canso and Keswick were resistant to late blight, but new races of blight have attacked them. Breeding is continuing to try to deal with the new condition which has arisen. It is much the same in principle at the rust. There is a new one.

Mr. Montgomery: May I have some information on the Netted Gems?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. They have been grown mainly in the west up to now. They are a very high starch content potato and are being introduced into New Brunswick largely with the idea of providing a potato that is suitable for potato chips.

Mr. Fairey: While we are on this item may I say that the station at Summerland, British Columbia, is a very fine one of which we are very proud. At the station there is a dairy herd. I should like to call the minister's attention to the fact that Summerland is only about 7½ miles north of Penticton, which is the centre of the fruit-growing industry. The dairying activities are centred about 40 miles north between Kelowna and Vernon or even north of that again. I suggest therefore that this herd is not well placed. I understand that representations have been made to the department to have the herd moved from the station at Summerland to a more northerly position in the Vernon district. Has any examination of that situation occurred?

Mr. Gardiner: That is under consideration at the present time but it has not yet been determined what will take place.

Mr. Decore: I should like to commend the department and the minister for having set up an experimental station in the Vegreville constituency to deal with a particular soil problem. There are millions of acres of what is known as burnt-out or solonetz soil. This has always been a problem and nobody seems to have found the answer as to the best way to deal with this type of soil. A farmer may spend a lot of time, work and money trying to build up this soil and find his returns are not very good.

That was the purpose of setting up this experimental station and it has met with a lot of enthusiasm throughout Alberta and I think throughout Canada among soil specialists. I realize that they have a great job ahead of them in their efforts to find an answer to the best way to deal with this type of soil. I am sure that once an answer is found it will prove to be of great value to the people of Alberta as well as to the people of Canada.

Some work has been done this year and they are going to hold a field day on August 7. I have invited the minister to attend and I should like to see the deputy minister and other officials of the department as well as the parliamentary assistant there on that day. It would do the parliamentary assistant a lot of good to visit western Canada.

So far there has been no superintendent appointed at this farm. I understand that efforts are being made to find a top soil expert to work there. Also the program should be expanded. I shall not go into the details but I simply wanted to make these few comments.

Mr. Pommer: Could the minister give some information as to the progress being made in establishing an illustration station in the Crystal City-Clearwater area in Manitoba. I had some communication with the minister in regard to this matter and I am wondering how it is progressing.

Mr. Gardiner: No further progress has been made since we were discussing it before. We have not yet selected any place there for a demonstration station.

Mr. Bryson: Apparently everyone wants an experimental station in his area. A peculiar type of soil is found in the area around The Pas and across the border in the Carrot river area of Saskatchewan and I understand that at one time the government was considering establishing an experimental farm in The Pas area. Is the establishment of such a farm under consideration at the present time?

Mr. Gardiner: There are considerable developments taking place in the Carrot river area both on the Manitoba and Saskatchewan sides of the boundary. Beyond the work which is being carried on there, no undertaking has been given up to the present time to put in a special illustration station. There is always a possibility that with the conditions which will develop when the drainage and diking system which is being put in goes ahead there may be a necessity for it.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could give us any information in connection with any experimentation that has been undertaken with respect to the feeding of wheat to hogs? I understand that there is a method being used by which the wheat content of the feeding formula can be increased greatly. I think every farmer knows that ordinarily you cannot feed much more than one-third wheat.

Mr. Gardiner: The general experience is that you cannot use more than one-third wheat in the grain mix when the hog has reached a certain stage in development. As my hon. friend knows, wheat has been fed to hogs in western Canada for a long time and it has been an important part of the mix. But care must be taken in feeding it, particularly if the hogs are confined to pens and not able to get out and run around a little. They are more likely to stiffen up if they are fed more wheat when they cannot run around outside.

Experiments are being carried on at all experimental farms and stations, and I am sure that nearly every farmer, particularly those in the west, is carrying on experiments as well.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I do not know whether my information is authentic, but I have been told that some western hog feeders are feeding practically 100 per cent wheat successfully in the finishing of hogs. I was just wondering if that was the result of experiments by one of the branches of the department or by a private firm which has perhaps developed a supplement in order that a greater amount of wheat may be fed.

Mr. Gardiner: I cannot say that advice has been given that wheat alone could be fed under all circumstances and conditions. Frozen and rusted wheat and wheat of poor quality is being fed quite generally. I remember once driving into the yard of a man in the middle of Saskatchewan who had some of the finest pigs I have seen running around the yard. I asked him how he got his pigs in that shape and he said, "Come, I will show you." He had them eating whole wheat out of a trough filled to the top with water, the wheat being in the bottom. I went back to the agricultural department in Regina, that being the closest point, knowing they had a lot of good information, and I told them what I had seen. They asked me whether the hogs were running around the yard, and I told them they were. They told me that if those pigs had been closed up in a pen and fed like that they would probably have stiffened up and been unable to move. I find in our own experience in feeding hogs that you can feed more wheat to them if they are running outside than you can to hogs that are penned up. No doubt farmers in general find that out.

Mr. Charlton: In view of the remarks the minister made regarding the Lacombe breed of hogs, I wonder whether he would tell us who has made the application to have these hogs registered.

Mr. Gardiner: The people breeding them on farms. They want to get them up to standard and they think they have a considerable number of them up to a standard where the breed is stabilized so that if you carry on on that basis you will get the hogs bred back to similar types. Some of them advocating that have in mind crossing them with some other breed of hog such as a York. Some of them do not say that the breed is so well established that you can be absolutely certain that they will breed back in type, but they say that if you cross them in a certain way with another breed of hog you will get a more rugged type and a hog that will produce more what you desire. They are trying to get a big ham with small shoulders and keep a considerable length to the hog at the same time. In other words, they are trying to get a hog more like the Danish and Swedish hogs without having them exactly the same, one that is more suitable to this country.

Mr. Charlton: I take it that some of the breeders who are working on this are not agreed as to whether or not they should be registered. As I understand it, the minister is not sure he is agreed either. From what he has said, it is not likely at this time that he is going to accept them for registration.

Mr. Gardiner: The national livestock records people have the suggestion before them now, but even if they were recognized as a breed the department would have to come to a conclusion as to whether we would promote their distribution right across the country in competition with the white Yorks, we have already spread right across the country.

Mr. Charlton: I take it that the minister thinks further experimentation should be done before this is done.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Nicholson: The minister and I have had some differences of opinion on a number of occasions regarding the position of the farms. I wonder whether the minister would consider establishing an experimental farm in each province that would not be supported by public funds but merely so that someone under the minister's supervision could demonstrate in each province how easy it is to make a good living in producing the commodities which are produced in a particular area.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend had been listening last night, he would have found out that there are quite a number of them right across the country now. Last night questions were asked as to how returned men had got along paying for their farms. If I remember correctly, there were only 69 out of 2,637 who had not been able to take care of all their indebtedness in connection with their farms up to the present time since the war.

An hon. Member: Since the first world war?

Mr. Gardiner: Some of them since the second war and some of them since the first. But I should just like to point out that there are some people who make a success of farming under the conditions we have had and I do not think there are very many who would not agree that if they could not make a success of farming under these conditions they probably would not under any.

Mr. McLeod: I do not like to let this item pass without paying a tribute to the Minister of Agriculture and the officials of the experimental farms service. I happen to represent the area that has now become the leading dairying district of British Columbia, that is, the area from Vernon to Salmon Arm. Since coming down here, it has been my privilege to work in the interests of these dairy men in trying to have an experimental substation established in that area under the jurisdiction of Summerland. I must say that from Dr. Goulden, Dr. Woodward and Mr. Barrett I have had wonderful co-operation. I understand that at the present time Mr. Barrett is in that area looking over the situation and I trust that he will come back with a favourable report and that we shall have established in that area the kind of service to which we feel we are entitled and which his department seems to think is worthy of consideration.

Item agreed to.

Central experimental farm, including research and co-ordinating divisions for the experimental farms service—

13. Operation and maintenance, including a grant of $5,000 to the international congress of genetics to assist in defraying the costs of the tenth international congress of genetics to be held in Canada in 1958, $2,428,466.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like the minister to explain to us just what the International Congress of Genetics is.

Mr. Gardiner: They are the animal and plant breeders, as the term indicates.

Item agreed to.

Central experimental farm, including research and co-ordinating divisions for the experimental farms service—

14. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $306,000.

Mr. Nowlan: I have a question to ask with respect to the branch experimental farms. I noted that some of those questions were asked on item 12, but I waited until this particular item came up. I certainly wish to join with other hon. members who have referred to experimental farms in their own constituencies.

This afternoon the minister gave us a breakdown of the expenditure on the experimental farm at Kentville, which is largely dealing with the production of fruit. I can assure the minister—and he certainly needs no assurance—that the staff there is doing excellent work and the moneys being expended on the operation of that farm are doing a tremendous amount of good for the fruit industry and for agriculture generally in the province.

My question has to deal with one particular item. I think I raised it three years ago, at which time the minister said he would look into it. Apparently, when the farm first started many years ago, part of the land was bought by the provincial government. After some time the provincial government decided to vacate the field of experimental farms, and some working arrangement was entered into between the province of Nova Scotia and the federal government whereby the federal government would take over the farm. That continued until two years ago, and then, when the matter of municipal grants adjustments came into effect, the town of Kentville checked up to see how many federal buildings it had within its boundaries, and it found it had X dollars' worth. The matter was taken up with the Department of Finance, and as a result the town council received a grant under the municipal grants fund. Then a new administrator took over and apparently he was meticulous in checking the records. He went to Kentville and checked the deeds, and he found that the dominion government had built the new science laboratory on land that belonged to the provincial government, and not to the federal government, and that the federal government had no title to it.

At that time the late premier was having his own ideas about what moneys were owing to the provincial government by the federal government and he said that not only would he not deed the land to the federal government but that he would sell it unless they made an adjustment on what he thought was owed to the provincial government. So we had the situation then that the title to a substantial part of this farm, including the part on which the modern buildings had been built, vested in the provincial government rather than the federal.

The minister at that time said he would take the matter under consideration and see what could be done. Frankly I do not think much could have been done at that time because of the feud, shall we say, engaged in by the two governments over the amount which Nova Scotia claimed was owing to it by the federal government. I wonder whether the minister has had that matter straightened out as yet. I am told that it has been brought to the attention of the department year after year but it was taken as one of those friendly family arrangements over which no trouble would ensue, and finally it did. I think it is something which should be dealt with now. Where the federal government has constructed buildings it certainly should have title to the land on which the buildings are built; otherwise there may be another feud some day.

Mr. Gardiner: It is true that the property at one time belonged to the province and there was an arrangement made whereby the federal government took over the experimental farm. There was some difficulty about the title up until about two years ago, I think, but title to all the land is now in the federal government. There was one building which was built on land that belonged to the province. The title to that land has also been turned over to the federal government, so we have all the titles now as far as we know.

Item agreed to.

Branch experimental farms, substations and illustration stations—

16. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $2,122,000.

Mr. Pommer: Could the minister give us a breakdown as between provinces with respect to item No. 16, a vote of $2,122,000? Could we also have the amounts for Manitoba and where they are to be spent in Manitoba?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a considerable list. There are some small items and different amounts for construction and equipment. I wonder whether the committee would agree to this list being published rather than my having to read it all.

The Chairman: Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: The table is as follows:

Production service—

17. Production service administration, $78,515.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to speak for a few moments on a question that I am quite sure will appeal to the minister as a member of a Christian church and a practising Christian, except temporarily possibly at election time, and perhaps we are all sinners in that respect. Anyway, I hope the item I wish to mention will appeal to his Christian conscience and give him a further opportunity to practice those principles in which he believes.

The subject I wish to mention is the question of the humane slaughter of animals, a question which is receiving wider interest across the country every year. The reason most Canadians have not been interested in the matter is that they do not know the facts. They do not know about the cruelty that exists in our packing houses across the country and almost to the same extent in the United States.

The reason they are beginning to know is the good work done by various organizations and associations which have given some consideration to the question, studied methods of killing, written pamphlets and taken their time to acquaint their fellow citizens with the situation that exists in so-called Christian Canada. The matter has received a particular amount of attention in British Columbia, and on that account a committee of the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals went before the agriculture committee of the provincial legislature and made a very good case indeed. Their representations had a great effect on all members of the committee, regardless of party. They were so impressed and affected that when the representations had been completed the committee adopted the following paragraph in its report to the legislature, as found in a news letter of the humane slaughter association:

On February 29, 1956, following representations by the S.P.C.A. and our own association—

That is the humane slaughter association.

—the select standing committee on agriculture of the provincial legislature reported as follows:

"Your committee heard representations from the humane slaughter society, the society for the prevention of cruelty to animals and the Canadian association of packers with regard to the merits of humane slaughtering of food animals and the difficulties arising from such methods. After due consideration, your committee recommends as follows:

The committee expresses sympathy with the ideas expressed by the humane slaughter society and strongly recommends that the federal and provincial departments of agriculture make a thorough study of all aspects dealing with this question with the object of putting into effect the most humane methods possible in the killing of food animals."

This is a question that has received a great deal of attention in the United States and by a number of very prominent congressmen who are concerned about our present inhumane methods. Just to indicate the interest

I am going to quote from two or three news articles in this connection. The first is an editorial in the Detroit Free Press of June 5, 1956, in which I find the following:

> A measure of civilization's height is the degree to which it puts aside barbarism and cruelty in all their aspects. If means for slaughtering livestock are available which will stop any present suffering by the slaughtered animals, it seems to us that the civilized thing to do is require their employment.

Then we have the New York Daily Mirror of June 22, 1956. In an editorial it had this to say:

> Packers from Finland to Fiji have installed humane killing devices that make our slaughter houses look and sound like medieval dungeons. . . . Something deeper than a squeamish repugnance toward blood motivates those who would see swift reform. It is the abiding conviction that callous brutality has no place in our society.

Then I refer to another editorial in the Christian Science Monitor of March 16, 1956, containing these words:

> Bills are pending before the committees of both the Senate and the House of Representatives to require humane slaughtering in the United States.

In the issue of May 31, 1956, I find the following:

> Most Americans would be surprised to learn that the United States is a backward country, in one respect at least. It is 25 to 50 years behind many European countries in the development of humane methods of commercial animal slaughter.

The same applies to Canada at this time. I am not going to detain the committee longer. I have simply mentioned the matter and brought the facts to the minister's attention. I should like him to tell the committee what representations he has received and what his department intends to do to bring us at least up to the standard of the Fiji islanders in this respect.

Mr. Gardiner: There have been representations made to the department. The officials have been gathering information from countries like Sweden, Denmark, Britain, the United States and elsewhere as to what is being done in those countries, and they are accumulating as much information as possible before making any decision with regard to the matter.

Mr. Herridge: The matter is under serious consideration?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, and has been for the last six months.

Mr. Charlton: Is the minister going to comment on the matter I brought to his attention on the first item, regarding the administration of the production service and having the veterinary services under the production service? I see that well over $6 million, and it is well over, out of a total of $11,207,835 has to do with veterinary services, either research or disease work. I wonder whether the minister would give us some idea of his feelings in this regard, and tell us what is the policy of the government at this time.

Mr. Gardiner: The amalgamation of these two branches is to be made on the first of April next. It is now being worked out and will be brought to completion around that time. I refer to the health of animals and pathological divisions.

Mr. Charlton: As a separate branch?

Mr. Gardiner: They will still be under production services.

Mr. Charlton: I take it that animal disease research work and disease work are to come under one head but still under production service. I sincerely suggest that is not what the veterinary association has requested. I can see very little advantage in doing that. As I say, I do not want anybody to misinterpret my words as being directed personally to anybody in the department. However, it is the feeling of veterinarians across this country that they probably could be of better service to the nation if there were one separate branch of animal disease services or veterinary services or whatever you want to call it. They think it would be better if the two branches or divisions were in one separate branch, whereby the head of that branch would go directly to the deputy minister rather than having to go through a layman to get to the deputy minister.

That is the feeling among the veterinarians across the nation. I sincerely suggest that the minister give further consideration to the proposal, and that rather than just bring them in under the production services he make a separate branch of the department having to do with animal diseases or animal research and diseases.

Mr. Gardiner: When I came to the department over 20 years ago that is as it was, except that both these divisions were separate 20 years ago, as I recall it; it may have been less than that or it may have been a little more. These different branches reported directly to the minister or to the deputy minister. I reorganized the department to put it as it is now, in five divisions the head of each reports directly to the deputy or to myself. The two branches that are referred to are under production services; that is, they will be under production services under the new set-up.

We think it is the better way to have it and we do not think we should start to get back to where we were previously. There are many other divisions in this department which think they too should have the privilege of dealing direct. Whenever anything important comes up and they require to bring it to either the deputy or the minister, of course they are free to bring it. But when we get together groups to discuss what we are going to do by way of policy and so on, we deal directly with about half a dozen people instead of dealing with every branch in the department. It does not work in with the general organization of the department to have that particular section reporting directly through the veterinary director general. It does not suit the set-up of the department in general to have that made special.

I may say that I get requests from people outside of the department every once in a while that a certain person with whom they come in contact from time to time be put into the position of dealing directly with the minister or the deputy minister. On those occasions I have taken the position that the way in which the department is organized—and we think it is a better system of organization than was there previously—

Mr. Charlton: The position here is not quite the same as it is elsewhere. I would suggest that this is a little different, because you are dealing with one aspect of the livestock industry in this nation, namely the health of animals. I do not think the minister could mention another part of his department that is comparable, where you have two separate divisions. Now he says they are to be brought into one but still under another head, and it will be between the director of the two divisions and the deputy minister.

This is one of the most important branches of the whole department, I would suggest, because when the health of animals is to be considered it is a matter of great importance, as we all know after what we went throguh in 1952. The production service is an extremely important branch. As I said, I realize that quite a bit over half of that work now has directly to do with the health of the animal population of this country. Hence it is quite an arguing point to have a separate branch when there are other branches that spend very little more—no, not any more; there is one other branch that spends less, as a matter of fact, than the animal pathology branch and health of animals, compensation for animals—than does this branch. So I hope the minister will give further consideration to this suggestion. I am sure he will hear further from the Canadian veterinary association with regard to this matter.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I am not sure whether or not this is the right item under which to deal with this matter, but it is pertinent to the discussion. I should like to inquire of the minister whether he can tell us whether the test for reactors all over Canada is panning out satisfactorily and whether the percentages are coming down gradually. Can he give us a comparison with regard to T.B. reactors?

Mr. Gardiner: I wonder whether the hon. member would mind leaving that matter until we come down to item 21, "Compensation".

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): That will be fine.

Item agreed to.

Animal pathology—

18. Operation and maintenance, $715,074.

Mr. Charlton: There has been considerable controversy particularly over two diseases. One is rabies, with regard to which I want to commend the department for looking after us very well. The other is scrapie disease in sheep. A great many stories are going around. How much truth there is in them I should not like to say. In view of the fact that very little is known about the disease of scrapie in sheep, I think probably it is one of the most important things the health of animals branch has to deal with at the present time; also in view of the fact that there are still in the country many suspected sheep that have come from flocks that have since been destroyed. A great many of these sheep are scattered around various districts in Canada. They are not even all under surveillance. We assume, however, that most of them would be under surveillance.

In view of the fact that so little is known about the disease I would sincerely suggest that the department should be taking into serious consideration the setting up of some research, or else taking the results of the research of other countries such as England, for instance, where you would think they would know more about this disease inasmuch as they have had to deal with it much longer than have we, and co-operating closely with the department in England along that line.

The disease could be very costly to the sheep industry. I am not sure about this, but I understand that one entire flock was destroyed last year. If they pay as much for all sheep as was paid for that particular flock, I say that it could be very costly, because I understand the amount was up almost in the $100,000 bracket for some 600 head of sheep. I do not know where I would ever be able to find a flock of sheep, counting the lambs and all, that would average anywhere near that price. I wonder whether the minister could give us some assurance that all the stories we hear are not true, and whether he could tell us what the department is doing in this regard. As I say, it is a very serious matter and is looked upon as being a very serious matter by the sheep breeders across the country. As a matter of fact they do not know where they are going. They do not know how many sheep they can export or when they can export and when they cannot.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): The minister will recall that before the lunch hour, I brought this matter up and he suggested that I should wait until we reached item 21 before we discussed it. If it is quite in order to discuss it on this item I should like to continue with what I said this morning, namely that it seems that this sheep ailment called scrapie is a very serious disease.

In view of the fact that five or more flocks have been affected by this disease in the past few years, I think it is important to have as much information given to the sheep breeders throughout the country and to this committee as possible. My question this morning of the minister was whether or not any detailed findings had been made after the slaughter of the 500 purebred sheep of P. J. Rock and Son of Drumheller, Alberta, and whether or not the blood samples, which I understand were taken at the time, have revealed anything in respect to the cause of this disease or any method by which it could be controlled.

I have further questions to ask in respect of the compensation paid for these animals, but I wonder if the minister would be prepared now to comment on the questions I have put to him.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Before the minister answers, there was a question or two to ask along that same line. Have any sheep been slaughtered and transported to Hull for examination or experimental purposes during this past year, which were suspected of having this disease? Has any compensation been paid to any Ontario farmer for sheep so destroyed?

While I am on my feet, I neglected to say earlier that sometimes we are in a hurry and forget to pay tribute to those who are responsible for some of the things we now enjoy. I want to point out that back in 1886 Sir John Carling, who was then the member for London, was the man who inaugurated the experimental farm in Ottawa, and Mr. Saunders from London was the first director. Sir John Carling was the first minister of agriculture in the cabinet of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Before the minister replies to this question dealing with scrapie, may I point out that we in Alberta are very much concerned about the appearance of this disease amongst the sheep flocks of the province. I have in my hand an item taken from the Manitoba Co-operator which deals with the scrapie outbreak to some extent, and I should like to read a brief section of this article which is referring to Dr. Swales, who I believe was at one time associated with the Department of Agriculture as an animal pathologist:

> The incident Dr. Swales referred to was a purebred flock in the Ottawa valley of Ontario. About 1947 Scrapie was found in it and was traced to an imported ram. The flock was destroyed and compensation paid.

If that report is true, then this outbreak of scrapie that occurred in Alberta this year is not the first instance of scrapie in Canada. I mentioned that we in Alberta are concerned about this disease. We are particularly concerned about a number of rumours associated with the disposition of the flock of sheep which belonged to Mr. P. J. Rock. Before this question is closed I should like the minister to inform us as to the number of sheep which were slaughtered and for which the federal government paid compensation, and the amount of compensation paid.

I should like also to have the minister give the committee some assurance that the registrations of the purebred animals, which at this time were slaughtered, have been called in, because there is just the possibility that with a large herd like this being slaughtered some substitutions could be made. I certainly do not believe the minister would want this to happen. I want him to give us assurance that every care was taken to see that the animals paid for were the ones on the registration forms turned in.

Mr. Gardiner: As I think is generally known, Mr. Chairman, scrapie is a disease among sheep which has been known in Great Britain over a very long period, probably 200 years. We have not had a great deal of experience with it here, although we have available to us all the information which is available in Great Britain and elsewhere if they have had it.

In so far as the situation here is concerned, I think it is correct to say that there have been three outbreaks. There were three farmers concerned in the first one and there have been two others. In 1945-46 the number of animals slaughtered was 102. The farmer was Mr. Baldwin, and the amount paid was $2,131.33. Then in the outbreak in 1951-52, which was traceable to the same outbreak, there were 65 sheep belonging to Mr. Tisdale and $2,244 was paid. In 1952-53 there were some 11 sheep destroyed belonging to Mr. Charter and $525 was paid. Then in 1954-55 Mr. McQuay had 108 slaughtered and the compensation paid was $8,100. Mr. Rock in 1955-56 had 674 sheep slaughtered and they were all registered. There is not any question about them being slaughtered or of their being substitutions. The compensation paid was $100,050. The sheep that had been sold from the flock were all traced and it was proven that there was no scrapie carried along with them into any of the other flocks. I think, therefore, the matter has been pretty well cleared up for the present.

On the questions which were raised by the hon. member for Moose Mountain I think the answers are as follows. Sheep specimens collected in Alberta for the study of scrapie are part of the project to study causative agents of the disease, pathological changes, and the search for sero-aglutination blood tests which would indicate the presence of the disease prior to the establishment of clinical symptoms. The progress of this type of project is invariably slow, for the first thing that must be done is a thorough micropathological examination of the brain and spinal cords. This work is now being done. A search is also under way for a causative agent in the spleen, liver and kidneys, but no results are yet available from this work. Blood samples collected have been separated and the blood serum has been frozen for future use in the establishment of diagnostic tests.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I should like to ask the minister if he can explain the vast difference in prices paid by way of compensation for the sheep that have been slaughtered. For example, I find a rough calculation shows that for the 11 sheep slaughtered in 1952-53 the compensation was approximately $50 a head, while the compensation paid to Mr. Rock was over $100 per head. Why the tremendous spread? Sheep have not changed that much in price, and I take it they were all purebred.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the Rock flock is looked upon, or was looked upon, as one of the best flocks, if not the best flock, in the world in that breed. They were very highly pedigreed. The sheep were being sold not for the ordinary purposes of putting mutton on the market, or lambs on the market, but for breeding purposes at prices higher than the government agreed to pay. As a matter of fact there was considerable negotiating and inspection work done to determine whether this was a reasonable amount, and it was decided that it was.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): On my own responsibility I want to say that I feel there should be a ceiling on the amount of compensation paid to an individual. We should have reasonable compensation. It should meet as nearly as possible the justice of the situation. If a man has high quality stock that must be destroyed, then he should receive reasonable compensation. I wish to join with the hon. member who has just spoken and say that there does seem to be great discrimination in the amounts of payments made for various sheep that have to be slaughtered.

I also want to make a point which I think is borne out by the amount of compensation paid for purebred cattle in the various areas of Saskatchewan at the time of the outbreak of foot and mouth disease. I have heard it said that Mr. Rock is a well-known Liberal in the Drumheller area. Whether or not that has any implications I cannot say, but on my responsibility as a member I say I believe the compensation of $100,000 for 600 sheep perhaps is too large an amount. I think we need to have at least a limit on the amount of compensation paid to one individual. If we have such big operators they should stand a larger amount of the loss. I believe that our smaller operators or smaller farmers are the people who should be looked after and given a chance. If Mr. Rock had that sort of holding he should be in a position to take care of some of his losses.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, on the question which is apparently uppermost in my hon. friend's mind, I had not understood that Mr. Rock had always been a Liberal. If he has been a Liberal in recent years it must have been because he, like some other people, was converted to Liberalism. He does not live in Saskatchewan, so it has not concerned me particularly.

Mr. Rock has been one of the outstanding breeders in the province of Alberta, not only of sheep but of cattle. His flock of sheep has been very well known not only in this country and in the United States but also on the continent of Europe. There has been a lot of trading back and forth.

I am not going to argue the question as to whether the sheep were worth that much; I do not know of my own knowledge, but I would like to correct a figure I gave when I spoke on the matter. There were 674 of these sheep. If a person wishes to figure out the actual amount it comes to about $150 for each of them. That price for sheep that were going to be used for mutton, of course, would be a high price. There was not that type of sheep in this flock. It was a very well-bred and highly registered flock of sheep.

It is true there were some lambs. The lambs when they grew would be in the same class as the others. The very best of attention was given to the valuation, and I know that it was gone over very carefully. There was considerable time before an agreement was reached. The final agreement was reached and a settlement was made in accordance with those figures.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): How many lambs were in the flock?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know offhand; I have not the information with me. As a matter of fact, I was out there myself in connection with some of the investigations, and men from here were out there. I know that everything possible was done to make that settlement for the slaughter for this very fine flock of sheep as acceptable to everyone concerned as it could possibly be made.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I think the minister should be able to give us an approximate idea of the age of the sheep. How many were six months old or under; how many were one year old? That does make a tremendous difference. If you have a flock of 600 sheep and half of them are a year old and another half six months old and you are paying around $160 straight through, I would think that would be an outrageous price.

Mr. Gardiner: If my hon. friend will make that notice of question, the information can be made available. It is not here. I will have it brought down in the house on Monday, or just as soon as I can bring it down.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I do not think we need to make it an order for return or anything like that. The minister should bring the information down. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to speak on this matter. I have lived in the same district as Mr. Rock for many years. He is recognized as one of the outstanding breeders, as the minister has pointed out. P. J. Rock and the Grenville brothers are probably the outstanding sheep breeders of western Canada. While $100,000 does seem a very high price to pay in compensation, on the other hand one has to keep in mind the fact that many of Mr. Rock's sheep have been sold at sales for well over $1,000 a head. I remember that one ram sold for $3,000. I do not doubt for one minute that if the flock had been valued in terms of the prices he had received at the purebred stock sales the figure would probably have been considerably in excess of $100,000.

I understood that the number of sheep was in the neighbourhood of 500. I suppose that during the time the investigation was being made lambing time came around, and no doubt by the end of the consideration that was given to it the number had increased from 500 to 674, on account of the lambs. I believe that the figure that was worked out was worked out on the original basis of the 500 rather than on the 674.

Mr. Gardiner: I understand they were all valued individually.

Mr. Quelch: I thought they were figured out on a flock basis rather than on an individual basis. I just wanted to point out that I have been in close contact with both the Rocks and the Grenvilles. I do recognize that they are outstanding breeders, not only of sheep but of shorthorn cattle. They are also outstanding in the grain business.

The Rock farm is not merely a sheep farm; it is a private experimental farm. It has been a show place in western Canada. People come from hundreds of miles away to visit the farm and see the type of work that is being done there with stock. Therefore possibly the price of $100,000 is not out of the way.

As was mentioned, the question of compensation is a difficult one. If in one case a man is paid a very high price and in another case another man is paid a lower price, many people will feel that perhaps there is discrimination. I do not know how much loss an individual farmer is supposed to stand and how much the government is supposed to stand.

Perhaps the minister can explain that point. Is the compensation supposed to represent the actual value of the flock, or is the individual supposed to stand a certain amount of the loss and the government a certain amount? I agree with the minister that actually that flock was probably worth more than $100,000 in terms of the price that could have been received had they been sold at purebred stock shows. I am just wondering whether or not the government does feel that it should pay the full realizable value of the flock?

Mr. Gardiner: The valuation of the flock was made by independent valuators who were brought here from the United States to do the job. They valued the sheep at $160,000, and the amount paid was $100,000, which is $60,000 less than the sheep were valued at.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I would like to have some assurance from the minister before we end this discussion that the registrations of these purebred animals have been turned in to the department. Have they been turned over?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they were all turned in to the department.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I have just one comment to make before I sit down. I think the Minister of Agriculture is slipping if he did not visit Moran and find out that Mr. P. J. Rock is one of his supporters. I really believe he had better retire.

Mr. Charlton: The minister gave the amounts which have been paid, and they indicate that in the case of the first flock of sheep, or the first herd, as the minister refers to them, an average price of $20 was paid; in the case of the next herd the average price was $30; the next one was $40; then in 1952 the average was $80, and now we have $150.

I suggest that this is the only case where anywhere near the actual value has been paid for livestock. Thousands and thousands of animals are killed every year under the instructions of the department because they suffer from infectious diseases, and never before has anywhere near the actual value of the animals been paid. There is supposed to be a limit in the case of sheep under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and there is also a limit for hogs, for cattle, both purebred and grade animals.

Here we have a herd of some 600 sheep.

An hon. Member: A flock.

Mr. Charlton: The minister has referred to it as a herd, so we will go along with him on that. The minister does not know how many lambs there were, how many yearlings there were and how many adults there were, but an average price of $150 was paid. I have never seen a flock or herd of animals yet where there was not one animal in the herd which would warrant an extremely high price, say $30,000 or $40,000 in the case of a bull, but the average price for the herd would not be anywhere near that figure. The price for sheep under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act is low in comparison with the price for cattle, but I would say that never in the history of this country have we paid that much for a whole herd of cattle which have been slaughtered under the instructions of the department. I do not think $160 per head has ever been paid for cattle. I should like to know if the meat was used when these sheep were slaughtered, and who got the value of the meat.

Mr. Gardiner: They were all buried.

Mr. Charlton: That gets rid of that one then. In the case of cattle it is true that the man gets the value of the meat in the case of those not sent to the tank, but I do not think there has ever been a case where a herd of cattle, no matter how good they were, no matter whether they were registered animals, show animals, highly-bred animals, have brought that price as an average for the herd.

Mr. Gardiner: In the case of the foot-and-mouth disease the animals were paid for on the basis of the market value, and the price paid was more in the case of purebred herds than in the case of grade animals, but no one contended that it was less than they could have got for those animals otherwise.

Mr. Charlton: It is easy enough to bring someone in from the United States to put a valuation on the flock. We do not know who the men were. I do not know anything about Mr. Rock, although I understand he is very prominent and is well known in the United States, Great Britain and Canada for his success in the show ring and for the prices he has received for his animals. But I still say it is a tremendous price to pay for sheep.

If the price keeps going up the way it has over the last five years and the department makes it attractive to lose sheep infected with scrapie, they may find it more difficult to get rid of this disease. We had this experience with tuberculosis a few years ago, when people purposely had their cattle react because they could get a better price that way than any other. I suggest that the same thing is likely to happen in connection with scrapie, and it will be very hard for the department to trace these things. It has been suggested that there were some substitutions made in this flock before the date the animals were slaughtered and buried.

Mr. Gardiner: They had all been checked.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister stand up in this house and say that they were checked every time the departmental officials went out? Can he say that the ear tag numbers were taken on the first visit that was made to the flock, and that the ear tag numbers were checked with the ear tag numbers of the animals which were buried?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend will understand that I must depend upon my officials, and they tell me that they were all checked as soon as it had been established there was scrapie in the flock, and all those which had gone out before that were traced right through to their destination as far as that was possible in order to establish that there was no disease. Certainly there were no transfers after the scrapie was established. If sheep had gone to the United States with this disease or had carried it somewhere else, you had to go there and find it. They did go there. All these examinations were made and as nearly as it can be said by anyone, I am quite prepared to stand here and say that we take the responsibility in the department for saying that no such thing did happen.

Mr. Charlton: The minister is saying, then, that after the disease was diagnosed all ear tag numbers were taken, but I say to him that the disease was not diagnosed until many months and many years after it was suspected. What happened from the time it was suspected until the inspection was made? I suppose inspections were made to find out whether the disease had made any progress in the flock. Otherwise how would you know when to take out animals and send them to be slaughtered? If the flock was not inspected at intervals how would you know that there were any diseased animals? I understand the incubation period for this disease is two or three years, but very little is known about it.

The ear tag numbers may have been taken at the time of the first inspection of the flock, but what about sheep that had not yet been tagged? I admit that it would be an almost impossible job with 600 sheep. It would probably take days to check the ear tag numbers. I do not know how the inspections were made of this flock previous to the time the disease was suspected. This flock was brought to Toronto and shown at the winter fair just previous to the time the infected sheep was found, and the disease diagnosed as scrapie. So there are probably hundreds of sheep across the country now that have been in contact with sheep of this flock, and that is what makes it so alarming to the sheep breeders, especially in Ontario.

I do not know if all the sheep that were sold from this flock at the Royal winter fair last fall have been kept under surveillance and are being quarantined, whether any of them have been destroyed or what has happened to the sheep that came out of that flock. It should be known where every sheep is that was sold out of that flock in the last five years. I know how difficult it is for the officials, but I want to point out how serious it is. Perhaps the tags were removed. The minister knows as well as I do that things like that go on with registered livestock across this country, the switching of ear tags and so on. I am not suggesting it was done, but there are stories being circulated that some of these sheep that were supposed to have been destroyed and buried are still in the country. I think it is very important that we should know for sure whether it was done.

Mr. Gardiner: The men responsible for doing the job are sitting in front of me and they say it was done. That is all I can tell you. Every type of sheep you mention has been traced right through and is still being checked, and no scrapie has developed as a result of any of them. The hon. member speaks of there being sometimes hundreds and sometimes many more, all of which gives the impression that probably the thing could not have been done. But I am told by the officials that it was done, and that every sheep that came down to the exhibition at Toronto and was sold and delivered has been traced right into the flocks where it is, and none of them has scrapie or any sign of it.

Mr. Charlton: That was not my question.

Mr. Gardiner: As a veterinarian you can figure out all kinds of things, but there are as good veterinarians sitting here. They have gone all over it and checked it from every point of view, and they indicate to us that there is no possibility within reasonable limits of following these things up of scrapie having been carried from this flock elsewhere. The flock itself is all underground, buried.

Mr. Charlton: There are two questions the minister did not answer. One was, were the ear tag numbers taken on the first inspection of the flock? The second was, is every animal from that flock isolated, or are they being used for breeding purposes now in other flocks across the country? They might know where they are, but are they isolated from other flocks?

Mr. Gardiner: Right from the time the disease was diagnosed the ear tag numbers were taken. I venture to say that my hon. friend does not get all the tags on all the nursery stock he has sold, as to whether there was disease in the roots and so on. It has been done just as carefully as it can be done. There is, of course, the question as to whether too much was paid. That is a legitimate question to raise. We do not think too much was paid. We only paid what we thought ought to be paid. Outside of that I do not think anything could have been done that has not been done.

Mr. Charlton: I have tried to keep strictly away from personalities in this discussion and I do not appreciate the minister's remarks regarding nursery stock, although perhaps it is true. His department inspects it. I do not think we have had anything go out that has not passed inspection.

The minister still has not answered my first question. Apparently the ear tag numbers were not taken. I have to assume that there were no ear tag numbers taken previous to the time the disease was actually diagnosed as scrapie. I am not saying this is wrong and it should be done this way, but I am saying it is dangerous. What has been told might quite reasonably be true under those circumstances. I am not saying it is true, but the people who tell these stories know. That is all I am suggesting.

Mr. Gardiner: Bring them to the department.

Mr. Charlton: If the ear tag numbers were not taken prior to the diagnosis, then there was plenty of time from the time the disease was established until the disease was diagnosed for a good many things to happen.

Mr. Gardiner: The ear tag numbers are all here, as my hon. friend knows. Those sheep were all registered, and the ear tag numbers were all known here, no matter when they were sold. The transfers are all registered. There is no great difficulty about tracing sheep that were there even ten years before the scrapie was there. But to say that every one of those sheep will have to be traced right back to the time Rock started to set up his flock, I do not think that is expected.

Mr. Charlton: No one is suggesting that.

Mr. Gardiner: It might be said, "Perhaps you should know where all the sheep are that went out of that flock, say three months before the disease was in existence at all." That could probably be done and perhaps has been done. We can certainly find out where they went. Every flock that had any possibility of contamination through shipments of sheep from this flock has been checked. I know that rumours go around about things of that kind, but if one wants to follow up all the rumours there is no way of doing it. If any person mentions to any member of the house that he knows of these sheep, refer him to the department. It does not have to be a matter of publicity, but let him certainly come to the department and make known what he knows, and it will be checked right to the minute.

Mr. Charlton: There is still another question the minister did not answer, and I think it is very important; that is, whether or not all the sheep sold from the flock within the past two or three years, say, which we assume is the incubation period for the disease—as far as we know it is two or three years—have been isolated. Are there any of those sheep across the country today that are not isolated from other sheep, or are they being used for breeding purposes anywhere?

Mr. Gardiner: There would be nothing gained by isolating them. They have been in the flocks, and the flocks have been checked and they are still under observation.

Mr. Charlton: The entire flock?

Mr. Gardiner: The entire flock where the animal is. That is, if Rock sold an animal into some particular flock, that flock is still under observation.

Mr. Charlton: I am glad to hear that the whole flock is under observation. However, as this, we assume, is a hereditary disease, would it be good judgment or common sense to keep on using one of those rams, for instance, to breed ewes now after knowing it came from the Rock flock? Even though he were used for a year or only two months, would it be good common sense to keep on using him and have him breed several more ewes, knowing he is from the Rock flock?

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend is again assuming something with which I think no expert agrees. No one agrees it has been proven that the disease is hereditary.

Mr. Charlton: Not proven, but it is certainly the assumption by some authorities.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not known that it is hereditary. All these matters that are being referred to are naturally under consideration in the observation that is being made of the flocks. The disease has been in existence, as I said a few minutes ago, in Britain for at least 200 years. They do not know the answers to these questions now, and I do not know that they will know them after we are all through with the observations that are being made, but the observations are being made, and in so far as can be found there is no trace of it elsewhere.

Mr. Charlton: I suggest that it might be easier to get the answers now than it has been in the past 200 years.

Mr. Gardiner: It may take part of the next 100 years to get them through.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Chairman, usually the minister is able to answer any questions put to him about his department pretty explicitly. I find, though, that in the discussion of sheep most of his answers are quite woolly. I also think, as far as the compensation of $100,000 that has been paid is concerned, that the people of this country have been fleeced. I believe these terms are appropriate, and I also think that perhaps $100,000 is rather large compensation for any political support that may be forthcoming from this individual. The minister did not answer my question, and I was quite serious about it.

I understand there was an attempt made to diagnose the disease, scrapie, and that brain samples have been taken of the condemned animals. Can he tell the committee if any findings have been made which would lead to establishing the cause of the disease and a method to control it? That is my first question. My second question has to do with certain statements made by other members of the committee in which they have tried to indicate that sheep from this flock have gone throughout the country and apparently also have gone, according to certain press reports, to many parts of the world.

I have a press report here indicating that a flock of 502 Canadian sheep have been flown to the Dominican Republic to improve flock blood lines in that Caribbean country. It indicates that many of the sheep came from the flock of P. J. Rock of Calgary. Incidentally, the date of the press report is March 17, approximately the same date as the discussion that took place in the house with respect to the action taken by the government to destroy many of the sheep in Mr. Rock's flock. I would ask the minister if he has any report to make on the sheep that have been shipped to the Dominican Republic. With respect to the destruction of the condemned animals on Mr. Rock's farm, can the minister tell the committee whether the complete flock was destroyed? It would seem to me that the compensation is entirely out of line with what one might call simple justice.

I am a purebred breeder myself, and I think the minister will agree with the statement when I say that you cannot take the top sale price figure as representing a fair price for your complete herd. Often purebred breeders in the cattle business as well as those in sheep and other livestock businesses get a fairly good price at public auction, but you cannot say that would be a fair price for a complete herd of cattle or a complete flock of sheep. I think the price of approximately $670 per sheep is completely out of line—

Mr. Gardiner: No.

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): I should say 660 sheep at a price of approximately $166. Such a price is completely out of line with prices paid on former occasions. The hon. member to my right has indicated the various prices paid from 1952 until this recent incident. I think the minister should look into the matter and take to heart some of the arguments that have been put forward by members of the committee. I feel there has been an injustice done in this case, and that there should be some correction made.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Would the minister answer my question with respect to the findings?

Mr. Gardiner: To begin with, and to follow up the simile used at the commencement of my hon. friend's remarks, I might say that I am not one of those animals which goes around with wool in its teeth. That might answer the suggestion made in what the hon. member had to say. There may be some who do, but I am not looking for explanations of that kind. In any case, the answer has already been given to the question. I read it. Progress on this type of project is invariably slow, for the first thing that must be done is a thorough microbiological examination of all brains and spinal cords, and this work is now being done. A search is also under way for the causative agent in the spleens, livers and kidneys, but no results are yet available from this work.

In other words we have not been able to discover, any more than they have in Britain or elsewhere up to now, just what is the cause of the disease. I think that answers the question which was in the hon. member's mind when he wanted to know if the cause had been traced. It also answers the suggestion that the disease is hereditary. No one has been table to tell us that it is hereditary, and all the checks that could possibly be made have been made in connection with these sheep.

As to the price, I quite admit that I do not know very much about the price of sheep; but my hon. friend who lives near Mr. Rock says he did sell sheep for as much as $1,000. We certainly did not take that price to reckon what should be the value of these sheep. I stated some time ago that we did not take our own valuation at all. We had them valued by the best valuators that could be found, and we even went outside the country to get them.

So far as the Dominican Republic is concerned, I am told by the officials here that the news item which has just been read has been before the department, has been examined into, that the statements made there are not facts, and that there were no sheep in the Dominican Republic at that time that came from the Rock herd. There were sheep there that were bought in Canada and came from owners of flocks who had bought sheep from Rock at some time or other. That has all been followed up and the fact still is, as I stated it before, that so far as we know every sheep that left that flock and could have carried the disease has been followed to wherever it went, has been checked there, and there is no sign that any disease has been carried with them. As to the other question, the sheep that were there were slaughtered and put under ground.

Mr. Cardiff: Why was it necessary to bring in United States valuators to value the sheep?

Mr. Gardiner: For the very reason that has been made quite evident this afternoon. If I had gone and done it myself I know what would have been said in the house. If anyone associated with me in any way whatsoever throughout Canada had been taken there to do the job I know what would have been said about that too, and if it had been left entirely to the officials of my own department I know what would have been said about that. These valuators were men from the United States who know the value of sheep, and they made that valuation but we did not accept. We cut the amount down to $100,000 whereas they put it at $160,000.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They certainly were not rock bottom prices.

Mr. Charlton: Has it ever been done before?

Mr. Gardiner: It was done in connection with the foot-and-mouth disease. The price was higher than the individuals said they could sell them for on the market or anywhere else.

Mr. Charlton: That is not what I asked.

Mr. Gardiner: That is pretty nearly what you are asking. I do not know what you are asking if that is not it.

Mr. Charlton: If the minister would sit still for a moment and find out it might be better. Have you ever brought in adjusters before from outside the country to value herds?

Mr. Gardiner: When the foot-and-mouth disease was on in Saskatchewan we had many men from the department of agriculture of the United States—

Mr. Charlton: Where they adjusters?

Mr. Gardiner: —and we had their opinions about everything.

Item agreed to.

Health of animals—

20. Administration of Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and Meat and Canned Foods Act, $5,698,838.

Mr. Charlton: What information can the minister give us relative to the inoculation of cattle leaving Winnipeg yards for haemorrhagic septicemia? What has been the result? Has it been good? Have you had to pay much compensation for animals that have died as a result of that disease?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: For some years the department provided shipping fever anti-serum free to stockyards where feeder cattle were being assembled for shipment. A few years ago some doubt arose as to the actual efficiency of this anti-serum in preventing shipping fever, and extensive field tests were conducted by the department in the fall of 1954. These established that the anti-serum had in fact very limited beneficial effect in controlling shipping fever and the free distribution of that product was discontinued by the department last year.

The work which has been done on the matter indicates that other organisms are involved in the condition known as shipping fever, and that the most feasible control probably would be in the bacterin containing these various organisms. Various types of bacterin for this purpose were prepared last year by the department's animal pathology division and subjected to trials with experimental lots of animals at the department's own station. As a result of this one product was determined to have the most beneficial value, and it is proposed to use this on field trials during the coming fall.

The survey was commenced in October, 1954, and completed in December, 1954. During this period 2,093 animals were treated with bacterin and 4,062 treated with serum. Approximately 3,255 animals were identified as control animals, receiving neither serum nor bacterin. Bacterin was administered on the ranch, 10 days to six weeks in advance of the sales date, and serum at the shipping point, one to four days before shipment.

Immediately prior to treatment, blood samples were collected from approximately 10 per cent of the three groups. Blood tested animals were identified and a second sample collected after arrival on the purchasers' premises.

The purpose of blood tests was to measure by means of the complement fixation test any change in antibody level between the time of shipping in the west and arrival at destination in the east.

On arrival at destination in eastern Canada the animals were visited on the purchasers' premises at least twice, and where sick animals were encountered, departmental veterinarians provided treatment. Suitable specimens from animals which died were forwarded to the laboratory in Hull for study and, in particular, to determine the type or types of bacteria responsible for the disease.

Of the 9,410 animals shipped, 266 or 6·5 per cent of the 4,062 serum-treated animals were sick on arrival; 49 or 2·3 per cent of the 2,093 bacterin-treated animals were sick on arrival; and 177 or 5·4 per cent of the 3,255 untreated animals were sick on arrival. The mortality in these groups was 35 (0·86 per cent) in the serum group; 10 (0·47 per cent) in the bacterin group; and 30 (0·92 per cent) in the control group. This is shown in Table 1.

I think it would be well to have that table placed on the record. There are just a few figures as they appear here with respect to the bacterin, serum and control. The table just deals with the facts I have read. They are in the table. I think the table should be placed on Hansard.

The Chairman: Has the minister unanimous consent to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: The table is as follows:

Table I

	Animals Shipped	Sick on Arrival	Mortality
Bacterin	2,093	49 2·3%	10 (0·47)
Serum	4,062	266 6·5%	35 (0·86)
Control	3,255	177 5·4%	30 (0·92)

Of the 75 which died, specimens were obtained from 53, and 22 of these specimens came from animals which received no treatment. Pasteurella multocida was isolated in three cases; pasteurella hemolytica in three cases; and both types in 14 cases.

Mr. Charlton: From what the minister has said, I take it that the mixed bacterin seems to be the better of the two treatments, and that the results were quite a bit better than with the non-treated animals or checked animals. Am I right in assuming that the death rate and the number of sick animals was much lower with the mixed bacterin than it was with the other treatments, the serum treatment or the check?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand that the mixed bacterin has not been used. It is to be used in the field tests this fall. Therefore they have not the results of that.

Mr. Charlton: I thought the minister gave us the results indicating that of 4,062 animals that were treated, some thousands of the animals were treated with mixed bacterin.

Mr. Gardiner: Perhaps I did not make myself fully understood. The mixed bacterin which is being prepared by this department to use has not yet been tested out. This was a manufactured mixed bacterin that was imported.

Mr. Charlton: It was a trade mixed bacterin?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: From some drug house?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: And the department are trying to develop a better strain of mixed bacterin than the one they have used?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. That is to be tested out this fall.

Mr. Charlton: But that has not been tested out even in the field yet?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Charlton: But with the purchased mixed bacterin, were the results not better than with the serum?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, they were; that is right.

Mr. Charlton: On how many animals was compensation actually paid? I refer to those test animals that died. I believe the number was 75.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, 75.

Mr. Charlton: Was compensation paid on all those animals?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Was any compensation paid on animals which had been inoculated by the owners themselves in Winnipeg before they left?

Mr. Gardiner: No, I understand there was not.

Mr. Charlton: It is not compulsory to have them inoculated. I understand there is a charge now. Is there now a charge in the Winnipeg market to have them inoculated?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Charlton: It was done free for a year or two. Now a charge is made?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: But there is no compensation paid other than on those that were carried free by the department as experimental. Is that right?

Mr. Gardiner: That is right.

Mr. Cardiff: Are all animals that come from the west inoculated at any certain point, or before they leave there?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. I understood the question was this. Were all the animals that were tested, animals that came from the west. If that is the question, the answer is yes.

Mr. Cardiff: I was not referring to that particular group of animals. Are all animals inoculated before they leave the west, regardless of where they come from?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it is up to the owner.

Mr. Cardiff: I bought some cattle from the west. I do not know whether they are inoculated. I understood they were inoculated before they had left there for shipment east. Are they so inoculated?

Mr. Gardiner: My parliamentary assistant can give you a better answer than can I. He is shipping them continuously.

Mr. McCubbin: It is entirely up to the owner of the cattle in the west and yourself. If you put an order in for a load of cattle in western Canada, the owner can inoculate them before he ships them down to you. It is entirely up to the two of you. As for myself, I ask the owner of the cattle not to inoculate them. I would sooner have them come down uninoculated than inoculated, but that is just an idea of my own.

Mr. Cardiff: For what reason?

Mr. McCubbin: I feel they come through better.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not know anything more about it than the fact that I received a load here about a month ago. I did not have any difficulty. I do not know whether or not they were inoculated, but they went straight to the grass. I think the biggest difficulty with these cattle is that they come down in April and they are put in the stable. They are not used to being housed. Then if they pick up a cold it develops quickly. I lost two of them, and they died within two or three days. This particular load went straight out to grass and I had no trouble at all, no sickness or anything.

Mr. Charlton: Is it not marked on the bill of lading?

Mr. McCubbin: Yes, it is always marked on the bill of lading. Perhaps the hon. member for Huron has never looked at the bill of lading.

Mr. Charlton: It is $1 per head, is it not?

Mr. McCubbin: That is right.

Item agreed to.

21. Compensation for animals slaughtered, including compensation for eggs destroyed from infected premises under terms and conditions approved by the governor in council, $290,080.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I wonder if the minister could give us some idea of the success of our testing for T.B. reactors in cattle, and the progress of the testing throughout the different districts?

Mr. Gardiner: I understand the question is as to the percentage, after they have been tested?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I should like to know also if it looks as though the situation is improving down through the years?

Mr. Gardiner: Oh, yes, there is no question about that. This concerns the program of tuberculine testing and restricted area retesting. I have here the estimated number of cattle to be retested, the estimated percentage of tuberculosis and the estimated amount required for the payment of compensation for reactors slaughtered. This is for the year 1956-57, and it is based on our experience, of course. In Queens and Prince counties of Prince Edward Island there are 355,000 to be retested, and it is estimated that ·25 per cent will be reactors. The cost will be $6,576. In New Brunswick the estimate is the same in percentage, ·25 per cent reactors. The cost will be $1,008. In Quebec it is again ·25 per cent and the cost there is $14,400. The number of animals to be rechecked is 119,900.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Without going any further would the minister be able to tell me how that percentage compares with what it was five years ago? How long have they been under test in Queens and the other county, and is there some improvement?

Mr. Gardiner: The number tested right across Canada for 1949-50 was 2,089,000. The number of reactors was 30,521. The compensation paid was $1,261,771.60. If you remember, in 1949-50 it was 2,098,000 and in 1954-55 it was 2,079,000 that were tested. In 1949-50 there were 30,521 reactors and in 1954-55 there were 3,900, just a little more than one-tenth.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): You have not the percentage there, I take it.

Mr. Gardiner: You would find there were not more than one-ninth as many reactors last year as there were in 1949-50, and that is a six-year period. The amount paid this year will be $192,665 as against $1,261,000 before.

Mr. Charlton: The hon. member for Queens is unavoidably absent on committee work and I know he would like a question asked regarding a case of lungworm that has been found, or at least suspected, in Prince Edward Island. Apparently this is the only case of lungworm that has ever been diagnosed as such. Apparently the farm now occupied by this farmer was once either a substation or a farm used for experimental purposes in some way. Now, as this lungworm is apparently found solely within the animal—the egg is picked up off the ground and passes its entire life cycle in the animal; there is no intermediary host—it is just possible, although I am not saying it is true, that these eggs might have been lying there for some years from experimental work that was being carried on at the farm previously.

I think, although there has never been compensation paid for this, something should be done. Probably the cattle will take a long time to die. If they are not all slaughtered right now, they are in such poor condition when they do die that they are not worth anything for beef. It is a very debilitating disease, and they do lose a tremendous amount of weight. As this is the only case known in Canada, I think it would be only fair that this particular chap should receive compensation. Probably he has not been on the farm too long and has not too good a start, so probably could not afford to be put on the expense of losing his entire herd. Perhaps there is someway by which compensation could be paid and something learned from a study of the carcasses which was not known before. If they were slaughtered they might be worth something for experimental purposes.

Mr. Gardiner: The only thing I can say is that the existence of the disease, if you could call it that, has been reported to the department and investigations have been started. We have not yet any report on it. If it has not already been done I would suggest to the hon. member that he give us all the particulars of the case about which he is speaking. Then we could keep track of it and if there is any necessity for doing anything we could do it.

Mr. Charlton: I think the minister misunderstood me. The hon. member for Queens has spoken to me on this and he is unavoidably absent. I was mentioning it on his behalf.

Mr. Gardiner: You have the hon. member send us particulars.

Mr. Charlton: I think he was talking to the department, and presumably that is why the investigation is going ahead.

Mr. Gardiner: It is going ahead. On the question of whether the individual is to be paid compensation, I presume that particular disease is not named amongst those for which we do pay compensation, but that does not prevent something being done.

Mr. Charlton: It does not prevent an order in council being passed. I suggest that has been done in other cases and this is a case in which that might be done.

Item agreed to.

22. Livestock and poultry, $1,683,275.

Mr. Charlton: I have a question in connection with the sire loan policy. Can the minister give us any information as to where those sires were lent, what province they were in? I understand there was a considerable number, and that they were used in artificial insemination units across the dominion.

Mr. Gardiner: Prince Edward Island, 24 bulls; Nova Scotia and New Brunswick combined, 77; Quebec, 249; Ontario, 137; Manitoba, 214; Saskatchewan, 200; Alberta, 302; British Columbia, 89. In Nova Scotia there are 59 artificial insemination units and in British Columbia there are 36.

Mr. Charlton: Does the government purchase these bulls entirely at the cost of the Canadian government?

Mr. Gardiner: We buy them and put them out on loan to clubs.

Mr. Charlton: Do you take them back when they are disposed of?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, we move them around from time to time and buy others when it is necessary.

Item agreed to.

23. To provide for grants to fairs and exhibitions in accordance with regulations of the governor in council; for payments pursuant to agreements in force on March 31, 1956, with exhibition associations covering the construction of buildings and other major undertakings; and for a grant of $50,000 to the royal agricultural winter fair, Toronto, and freight assistance on livestock shipments for exhibition thereat, $926,500.

Mr. Wylie: In Medicine Hat, as you know, we have stampede exhibitions every year which last for three days. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture knows more about that than I do, but we have never received a grant from the federal government or the provincial government. What I am wondering is how to go about getting a grant for a three-day stampede and exhibition, such as we have.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows that we make grants to B fairs and A fairs, and they must qualify under the regulations to be designated as a B fair before they are entitled to any grant from here. The fairs below that category do have grants from provincial governments at different rates in the different provinces, but we establish the claim entirely on the basis as to whether they have paid out $5,000 over a period of years for an A fair and $3,000 for a B fair. If Medicine Hat has had a fair for three years and it has paid out $3,000 or more in prizes, then they have every right to apply here for a grant. The fact that they have not had one either indicates that they have not been paying out that much or they have not made application for it. There may be some other reasons that could be given for their not getting it, but I do not know of any at the moment.

Mr. Wylie: Mr. Chairman, I am looking for information. When I read the Medicine Hat News I find there are so many conflicting statements that I just wonder where they come from. One party says that the federal government will not do anything and another one says, yes, they will if you go about it the right way. I am looking for information and I must thank the minister for the information he has given me.

Mr. Nowlan: I notice some of these grants are for special fairs. What is included in that? There are class A fairs and class B fairs and then special fairs.

Mr. Gardiner: We have an arrangement that started with New Brunswick, but we have it now with Newfoundland also; just the two, Newfoundland and New Brunswick, under which we make payments and they make payments. It is a little different from the other provinces.

Mr. MacKenzie: It is the policy of the Department of Agriculture to pay fairly substantial grants to fairs that qualify as class A and class B. I am suggesting that possibly the class C fair should receive a grant for capital expenditures. I think that with respect to class A and class B fairs the department pays 25 per cent of the permanent capital expenditures. I would suggest that class C fairs could be treated along similar lines and be given a percentage of the capital expenditures they make at those fairs.

Mr. Gardiner: As I said a moment ago, class C fairs are considered to be fairs that are assisted by the provinces. I think during the relief period we did follow the plan which is now suggested and we did make grants to fairs in the C category for putting up certain buildings for the showing of their livestock and that kind of thing. But, as is known by hon. members, when the war started we stopped all those grants, and when we started them up again after the war and after the period in which relief was given we again confined them to the A and B fairs. We expect that the provinces are probably giving assistance to the others.

Mr. Pommer: Under item 23 freight assistance is paid on livestock shipments for exhibition at the Royal agricultural winter fair at Toronto. I realize this is not a very large item when compared with many other items in the estimates. Can the minister tell us what formula is used in granting this assistance?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. Gardiner: Well, the general policy is that the province pays the freight assistance on the livestock that is coming to the exhibition in all the provinces with the exception of Ontario. Nothing is paid there because it is close to the fair, I presume; at least, nothing is paid by the federal government. When we are billed for it we pay 75 per cent of the freight that has been paid by the provinces.

Mr. Pommer: In every province with the exception of Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: Excepting Ontario.

Item agreed to.

25. Plant products—seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, $1,484,618.

Mr. Charlton: Mr. Chairman, how many prosecutions have been laid under the Fertilizers Act because of not maintaining the standard of analysis in fertilizer? How many cases have been checked and how many prosecutions have been laid, or how many warnings have been given, or whatever they do when fertilizer is not up to the standard of the analysis printed on the bag?

Mr. Gardiner: There were no prosecutions in the year 1954-55. There were two detentions.

Mr. Charlton: Just what does the minister mean by "detentions"? Was the fertilizer held and not allowed to be sold?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, held for correction.

Mr. Charlton: Until it was correctly analysed?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: And the analysis brought up to standard?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes.

Mr. Charlton: Was there any indication that some fertilizer had been sold when the department officials caught it? There always has to be a period in which some is sold. Do they catch it when the batch comes off the mixer, or was some of the batch sold?

Mr. Gardiner: It is difficult to say from this, but perhaps the set-up will give some idea of what is done. Inspection visits and official samples taken during the fertilizer year ended June 30, 1955, by districts were: Maritimes, 255 inspections; official samples, 227. In Quebec 1,189 inspections were made and 320 official samples taken. In eastern Ontario 222 inspections were made and 58 official samples were taken. In western Ontario 474 inspections were made and 480 official samples taken. In Manitoba 77 inspections were made and 16 official samples were taken. In Saskatchewan 223 inspections were made and 6 official samples were taken. In Alberta 421 inspections were made and 25 official samples were taken. In British Columbia 625 inspections were made and 138 official samples were taken. Across Canada 3,486 inspections were made and 1,198 official samples were taken.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: It being five o'clock, shall I rise and report the resolutions, also report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or the next sitting of this house as the case may be?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it my understanding that items under public bills and orders shall stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The items under private and public bills having been exhausted, the house will resume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

25. Plant products—seeds, feeds, fertilizers, insecticides and fungicides control, $1,484,618.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Is the minister aware of the drastic increase in the cost of commercial fertilizers of the type used by farmers on the prairies which has occurred between 1946 and the present time and, if so, can he state whether the department has made any investigation into the causes of this increase in the cost of fertilizers? I am referring particularly to ammonium phosphate 11-48-0.

Mr. Gardiner: Taking the index of fertilizer prices for 1939 as 100·2, they advanced to 181·2 in 1955 and in January, 1956, they were 181·1. The index showed a slight drop in the last year but previous to that prices had been going up constantly. I suppose part of that increase would be due to the general increase in prices which has taken place over that period of time. In addition to the small decline in the index figure there has been a more significant change in connection with the plant food unit basis. The average ton of mixed fertilizer contained 26·2 units of plant food in 1954 and 27·4 units in 1955, an increase of 24 pounds per ton. On a plant food basis fertilizer prices in 1955 were about $3 per ton cheaper than in 1954. Further, there has been a slight increase for this year to which I just referred.

Freight rates are an element in the increased cost of fertilizers. The percentage increases in fertilizer freight rates since 1947 are as follows:

1948	121 per cent
1949	131 per cent
1950, as at March 23	140 per cent
as at June 16	145 per cent
1951	162 per cent
1952	170 per cent
1953, as at January 1	185 per cent
as at March 16	198 per cent

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Can the minister state whether there is just the one company in Canada producing the type of fertilizer used in the west?

Mr. Gardiner: I think that is right. During the war there was a plant at Calgary producing the ingredients, but that was taken over by the plant at Trail.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I have thought a great deal about this matter of fertilizers. I think much less has been done for the farmer than should have been done in connection with fertilizers. If there is one service which should be controlled by a crown corporation or some other agency not interested ultimately in making profits but which would be administered for the benefit of the farmer it is the manufacture of fertilizers. I think everyone will agree with that. I do not see much evidence of interest in the farmers' welfare in the matter of the production and sale of fertilizers.

I suggest to the minister that his department consider seriously doing something about this matter in order to cut down some part of the farmers' costs. I think the minister knows better than any of us in the house that farmers are fighting for their very existence. Everywhere the farmer looks he is met with mountains of opposition rising against him ready to overwhelm him in every direction. Whether he is going to survive will depend just how much good management is exercised by the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa together with other departments throughout Canada. Certainly the cost of several things could be cut, and one of those things is certainly fertilizer. We have any amount of the ingredients, and I believe fertilizers can be put together largely by machines so that we should be able to reduce the cost of production to an absolute minimum. I hope the minister will consider this most seriously, and he looks as though he intends to do that.

27. Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, in the amounts detailed in the estimates, $92,374.

Mr. Nowlan: There is a reduction in this vote of $1,927,400. I realize that the amount of this vote is dependent upon the construction that takes place from year to year, but I wonder if the minister can explain this large reduction.

Mr. Gardiner: As is known, we vote an amount each year and then items come back or there are supplementaries or otherwise which bring it up for the year to approximately the same figure.

Mr. Charlton: I take it that last year was a particularly high year because there were three large cold storages constructed in the western provinces, each costing over $1 million. Has the minister any idea as to what construction is going on? Would he give us the amounts actually spent each year for the past three or four years?

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know whether it is higher or not until I look at the figures. There were five in the west, not three. There was one at Regina, one at Saskatoon, one at Edmonton, one at Calgary, and one at Lethbridge, which were put in by one company. That was something over $1 million. There is an amount in the supplementaries, which are also before us of $1,623,000. It will make up for what we know is being undertaken for this year. There will be other amounts in the supplementaries as we go along dealing with them. You will find that on the first page of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Charlton: That will bring it up to almost what it was last year?

Mr. Gardiner: We expect it to get up to about the same each year.

Mr. Charlton: The list in the estimates book is nowhere near complete.

Mr. Gardiner: No, the list in the estimates book is what we knew at the time the estimates were made out that we required. We put this other amount in the supplementary estimates to take care of what has come up in the meantime.

Mr. Charlton: The applications are in for these?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, the ones we are bringing down are for individual cases not provided for in the estimates.

Mr. Charlton: Could the minister give us a list of which applications have been received for the $1,600,000 in the supplementary estimates?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Gardiner: I have the supplementary estimates here, and it could be read when we come to the supplementaries if that would be satisfactory.

The Chairman: Does the committee wish to take item 601 with item 27?

Mr. Charlton: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Wylie: I have one question I should like to ask on item 27. There has been a good deal of discussion lately in Medicine Hat, as the minister knows, about cold storage plants. We realize that in southern Alberta we can raise the best corn of any part of Canada. Perhaps we have more dry weather and more sunshine. However, by the time it leaves the field and gets to the city of Edmonton or the city of Calgary it is a little wetter, one might say. There have been discussions in Medicine Hat regarding the building of a cold storage plant.

I have noticed that other cities have had assistance from the government in that regard. I am wondering whether the city of Medicine Hat or the people of Medicine Hat can get assistance to build a cold storage plant so we can process our corn, put it in sacks and deliver it to many points, not only to Edmonton and Calgary but to Winnipeg, for instance, where they never have good corn. Medicine Hat is the one place where we raise good corn, and I think we should know how to go about building a cold storage plant so we can ship our corn out of Medicine Hat in first class condition.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member for Medicine Hat asked how people go about getting grants for cold storage plants. The act provides that if the conditions are met as set out in the act, the government pays a subsidy of 33⅓ per cent of the cost. They pay it all in the year when the plant is constructed. That requires, of course, that somebody else pay the other two-thirds, and that somebody else may be a co-operative or an individual concern that undertakes to put in cold storage. That assistance has been given now over quite a few years and it is available to Medicine Hat in common with other places.

Mr. Wylie: I realize that that assistance is available, and I am very glad to have the minister's answer so we shall know just what to expect from the government.

Mr. Montgomery: This item refers to cold storage plants. I should like to ask the minister whether under this item might be taken up the matter of frozen food plants. They are called by a different name, nevertheless they are for the processing of agricultural products in order to keep them in a fresh state for the market. In our province there is at least one firm that is considering seriously, and in fact is going ahead with such a plant. I know that the firm has been to Ottawa and discussed this with the departmental officials. Does that come under this item, and is there a possibility of their getting assistance from the department under these grants?

Mr. Gardiner: I believe there is an application from Saint John, New Brunswick, for cold storage of some type. There has been some question raised as to whether it conforms in all particulars with our legislation. I am not in a position to say whether or not that is the case; but freezer plants of a type come under the act; that is, the type of plant that puts in lockers. If it is a co-operative it comes under the act; if it is not a co-operative, it does not.

Then there is another type of freezing plant which has no lockers. The five plants that are spoken of in the west are of a new type of freezer different from what we have had, except for one plant at Vancouver. There are some others contemplated elsewhere. I think it depends somewhat on what my hon. friend means by freezer plants; but they have made application and the matter is being considered.

Mr. Montgomery: The minister speaks of a locker plant. We have a locker plant. That locker plant is privately owned, but it does not prepare foods like a frozen food plant. Up to the present time we have been importing into this country from the United States large amounts of frozen foods, even into our own province; strawberries, peas, beans, rhubarb and all sorts of things like that. I think there is room for the development of what we refer to as a frozen food products plant. I gather from what the minister has said that if it is a co-operative arrangement it comes within the act, but if it is not a co-operative arrangement it does not come within the act. Am I right?

Mr. Gardiner: You are right about the locker plants. If the locker plant is owned by a local butcher, for example, as it is in my own town in the west, he does not get a subsidy under this act; but if the people, either in the town or in the country round about, organize themselves into a co-operative and have a freezer plant, they do get 33⅓ per cent assistance.

On the other type of plant, the condition is that the plant must be open to the public. If an individual goes into the business of freezing food products, in the sense of taking them in, freezing them and selling them to the public, I doubt very much whether he comes under the act; but if a person simply has a freezer plant and allows the general public to bring products in to be frozen, and then the people sell them, I do not think there is much question about that. Nevertheless I would want to have the case referred to the justice department before saying definitely that it could meet the conditions under the act.

Mr. Montgomery: In the vicinity where I live and for miles around we grow fine vegetables, but we can grow a great many more than we can consume. If I understood the minister, the plant would have to be one that would be open for freezing and processing and I as a farmer could take vegetables and have them frozen and processed but it would be up to me to sell them. Is that what the minister means; or would it be the case that the plant would purchase the vegetables from the farmer, freeze them and then ship them to other parts of the province or outside the province? In other words it would become a local business. If they could get assistance under these arrangements, then what is the difference between a co-operative building a plant and 15 farmers or 15 businessmen getting together and building a plant? In the second place, if they can come under the provision, will they get assistance not only in the building of the plant but in the furnishing of the machinery and equipment?

Mr. Gardiner: It is very difficult to answer a question of that kind without knowing all the particulars in connection with it. Those are just the things that we are becoming acquainted with in connection with the application that has been made. In general terms the position is that if a man puts up a plant and then says that all his space is for rent; then somebody else buys the commodities from the farmers in the neighbourhood, puts them in there and then takes them out and sells them, and I think that is pretty generally done, we have paid the 33⅓ per cent. But if the individual who owns the plant goes right into the business himself and utilizes all the space, and there is no space for the general public at all, then I have no doubt about that case either. He does not come under the act.

There may be some place in between where the line would have to be drawn in a legal sense, but I should not like to try to define it here. There proper procedure is the one they are following of writing us, as they did. They will get a reply and we will have adjustments of ideas, because there has to be a certain percentage of the plant utilized for certain purposes. If a man has constructed a building and most of the space in it is occupied with something else, he would have difficulty in coming under the act.

Mr. Montgomery: I think this application came from an area quite near my home, and I know such a plant would be of great advantage to many of the farmers there who have been in trouble over potatoes. If we could get them to change to mixed farming, garden farming and one thing and another it might be of great benefit. I hope the minister and the department will give as generous construction to the act and assistance to these people as they possibly can.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, that will be met. We have already had communications, but up to now they have not actually made an application. They are asking for the kind of information the hon. member is seeking. They will get it, and if they submit an application it will be considered.

Mr. Campbell: Would the grant be available to a co-operative to buy a plant that is already in existence?

Mr. Gardiner: No, the regulation is quite definite on that point. If they even proceed to build a plant before they have been authorized by us to go ahead with it we do not pay. They must present their case and have it considered before they have a plant at all. Not even the buying of the property is consented to under the act.

Mr. Campbell: The minister did not get my point. I know of a case of locker facilities already in existence where the owner is gradually going bankrupt. If a co-operative in the district wanted to purchase that locker plant could they get a grant?

Mr. Gardiner: They had better get in touch with us before they do. If they define the case as it is they will probably get word back indicating that they can or cannot.

Mr. McLeod: I noted carefully the last few words of the minister, and I have had a problem placed before me by the Shuswap Okanagan dairy industries co-operative association of Vernon. Last year they made an application to the department for the subsidy in connection with the building of cold storage facilities for a branch which they were opening in Kamloops. Technical difficulties arose, and I must admit that the dairy did go ahead before final approval was given. Apparently the plant meets all the specifications of the department, and if it had not been for this technicality they would have been eligible for the subsidy.

However, when I took up the matter the other day I was advised that it might be reconsidered, but that since the main and supplementary estimates had already been prepared it was doubtful if anything could be done this year. I must say I was rather surprised when I looked at the top of page 118 to see an amount of $6,500 provided in this year's estimates with this designation: "Kamloops, Shuswap Okanagan dairy industries co-operative association." These two facts do not jibe, and possibly the minister could give us an explanation at this time.

Mr. Gardiner: The only explanation I can give is that when I was in that area, I think it was last fall, I had the pleasure of visiting the plant along with those who are on the board. There are some misunderstandings that have not been cleared up and unless they are cleared satisfactorily there will not be a grant, but I am not prepared to say at this moment whether there will or will not be a grant.

Mr. Nowlan: Before the item carries may I say that the comments of some hon. members are very reminiscent of problems that some of us have had in dealing with this item in the past. I was a little surprised to hear the minister say that the whole 33⅓ per cent is paid in one payment. I think the regulation in that respect must have been changed—

Mr. Gardiner: That is right; two years ago.

Mr. Nowlan: —because as I recall it was paid in three annual instalments and that used to provoke some difficulty. The minister also spoke of co-operatives as if this grant was only payable to co-operatives, but I think it is also payable to privately owned plants provided they make provision for public use of the cold storage facilities.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes. It is only in the case of locker plants that we only pay to co-operatives.

Mr. Nowlan: I want to add one thing further. I hope the minister and his departmental officials will give pretty careful consideration to the regulations. I have had quite a bit of experience with them. I certainly want to congratulate the department and the officers generally on the way in which they have administered this rather difficult problem, because I think every hon. member has pressure brought to bear on him with regard to installing a cold storage plant in an inadequate building. It seems to be felt that if the member has sufficient political pull he will be able to get a subsidy. This has created difficulties, but I think that on the whole the department has administered the plan very well.

In fact, I think it is perhaps a little bit too strict, and I want to give one illustration. I have in mind a cold storage plant in Nova Scotia owned by the United Fruit Company which met the specifications of the department. It was one on which a subsidy had been paid and it was as modern as most cold storage plants in Canada. The company proposed to put in a vegetable cold storage branch in connection with the fruit. There was to be separate construction. It was to be a part of the same building but an addition to it. I am sure that everything would have been of the most modern construction, that the most modern machinery would have been installed and all the rest of it. Yet because of some technical interpretation of the regulation—and I am not quarrelling with the administration, because I think it was interpreted fairly although strictly by the officials —that cold storage grant was refused on account of the particular wording of the regulation. I can assume also that in the relatively near future the minister will receive some requests.

I am looking for an item which is not here and which I cannot find in the supplementary estimates, but I will ask him about that matter later. For instance, he will be interested to know that the new apple marketing organization in the valley is meeting today for the first time. As to the possibilities of cold storage developments there, for instance I can imagine gas storage, perhaps in smaller units, being installed within the relatively near future. That development again is going to raise the question of installation in existing structures rather than perhaps the construction of entirely new ones.

I hope the minister will ask his officials responsible for this matter to consider these regulations very carefully so that the spirit will be observed as well as, we hope, the letter. I suggest that when adequate modern cold storage facilities are brought into being they be encouraged in every way possible rather than be perhaps denied encouragement because of a technical or I will say a strict interpretation of what is possibly an overly strict regulation.

Mr. Gardiner: We have paid subsidies on two plants—one in Quebec and one in Ontario—that have this gas system of cold storage.

28. Agricultural economics, $637,362.

Mr. Charlton: Can the minister tell me whether the economics branch here in the dominion department is co-operating with the department of economics at the provincial level with regard to these booklets that the department of economics at Guelph is putting out to help farmers in keeping their books and preparing their income tax returns? Is there any liaison between the two departments or is it made general? Are the people across Canada getting the benefit of the booklet the Ontario people have, or is it just in Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, we have had co-operative studies between our officials and the Ontario officials in preparing that booklet.

Mr. Charlton: Is it being printed by the dominion department and made available to farmers across Canada, or is it just made available in Ontario?

Mr. Gardiner: My information is that it is one of the publications of the province, that it is being printed by them. However, I assume that if we were going to put it in any of the other provinces probably we would have to have understandings with the provincial departments there as well.

Mr. Charlton: I suggest to the minister that it is a very good book and that it is very helpful to farmers in keeping their books and in making their income tax returns. I think it would be a good suggestion if the minister would look into the matter further and find out whether the other provincial governments would not co-operate with this department and see that it is made available to other farmers across the dominion.

29. Dairy products, $798,723.

Mr. Charlton: There has been a considerable amount of controversy lately about cheese production in that we do not know for sure how much cheese there is going to be for export. The home consumption has gone up quite a bit. I maintain that production is not keeping pace with the increasing domestic demand for cheese. I wonder what the department is doing to meet the situation.

As the minister knows, cheese is one of the products for which, in most years at least, we have been able to get a premium on the United Kingdom market. I think the situation now is that we could probably demand a premium of 2 cents or 3 cents in the United Kingdom market for cheese if we had it to export at this time. I wonder whether the minister can give us any information as to what is being done to aid the cheese producers to build up again this export market in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Gardiner: To begin with, we have an agreement with the Ontario cheese producers. They have a new name. They changed their name last week, I think it was. In any event, the hon. member knows whom I mean. I refer to the co-operative cheese producers in Ontario. We have an agreement with them under which we guarantee them at the bank for 22·5 cents a pound or 80 per cent of the average price of the last three years for any cheese they handle under the plan. Then, as I understand it, they go to the bank and raise enough money to make an advance to the farmer.

The Ontario government also provides them with a guarantee of 9 cents, I believe, which puts the guarantee up to 30 cents, approximately. That makes it possible for the board to guarantee to the farmer a certain return on his cheese. Then beyond that, the Department of Trade and Commerce and ourselves bring all the influence we can to bear on the British to set aside as much money as they will in order to take delivery of Canadian cheese. This year they have provided £1½ million. The British government have set aside that amount to buy cheese in Canada. That amount will buy approximately as much cheese as was bought here last year, when they bought about 10 million pounds. But they do not buy it from us; they buy it from the Ontario board. They will buy it from anyone who will sell them cheese from Canada that is satisfactory to them, but they bought most of it last year, I think all of it, from the Ontario board.

This year that same arrangement is being carried on. They are still prepared to buy cheese. We have the feeling, and we have expressed it many times to the cheese people, that all the cheese they are making at present can be sold within Canada, and we are encouraging them to do so. At the same time there is a possibility of selling some over in Britain under this plan that has been worked out.

Mr. Philpott: I want to say just a word about selling cheese in Canada. I know my wife complains that when she goes into these big super markets right here in Ottawa, about half the time she cannot get any good, plain, ordinary Canadian cheese. They have nothing but this Kraft stuff and other substitutes.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Charlton: No. I rather hesitate to go along with the minister's idea that all the cheese that is produced here in Canada could be sold here. It is working to that end, I will agree. I will say this for the chain stores; they have done a remarkable job of merchandising cheese. Why? Because they put it up in attractive packages that people like. They like to see what they are getting. The chain stores have done a remarkable job in increasing the consumption of cheese. It is true that much of it is soft cheese or processed cheese but there is a good deal of cheddar, both white and coloured.

I think it is a mistake to depend entirely on the domestic market. Even if we reduce the consumption in the domestic market and hold the product off the domestic market, I think the United Kingdom market should be maintained if that is at all possible. As I say—and I think I am correct in saying it—at the present time the United Kingdom is paying for Canadian cheese a premium of at least 2 cents over some of the other cheese. I think they are quite willing to pay it, at least I understand they are, for Canadian cheese. I believe that consideration is sufficient to warrant a little increase in the production of cheese, with enough set aside of our Canadian production, to maintain at least a quota in the United Kingdom market.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know that this is the time to discuss that particular point. However, I would point out that the British have always paid a premium for our cheese over and above New Zealand cheese, which is the big source of the supply that comes into the country. New Zealand sells to Britain far more than we sell, and has been doing so ever since the first war. During that time Britain gave us a premium of up to 3 cents over New Zealand cheese, but at the present time all Britain is buying from us is what they must have to serve a certain part of the trade.

Under that condition, up to this year they were buying our cheese from the board at 2 cents less than cheese was being sold in Ontario. I am not saying we were very enthusiastic about that, any more than some people were enthusiastic about our selling butter cheaper in some places. Nevertheless, under the circumstances under which they were doing that, probably it was the proper thing. It is their business.

What I mean by saying it can be sold in Canada is that we have great difficulty after we get west of Winnipeg in getting cheddar cheese. My friend says there is difficulty in getting it in Ottawa. If there is difficulty in getting it in Ottawa I would say there is 10 times as much difficulty in getting it after you get west of Winnipeg. We know from experience that the cheese that is now made can be sold there at a higher price than you have been selling it to Britain. I am not saying you should not sell any to Britain. They are selling it, and they are doing so in order to try to stay in that market. It is their business and they make their own decisions about it.

There is one other thing I should have said when I was speaking before. We, of course, pay a premium of 2 cents on 94 score cheese and we pay a premium of 1 cent on 93 score cheese. This is paid in addition to the other assistance which we give in connection with cheese.

Mr. Knight: I was tempted by the remark of my hon. friend from Vancouver South to ask the minister when cheese is not cheese. What I mean is, is there any regulation or any pure food law which would compel people putting up these packaged cheeses to state upon the package the contents? I know that a great many people who buy these packaged cheeses, so-called, are under the impression that they are buying cheese. Actually they are not buying it. My friend calls it a substitute, but I would call it a mixture of this and that. A great many people in the west are not too familiar with what good cheese is. They are under the impression that because they have these dairy factories in the east, they are getting good cheese when they buy that stuff.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not want to be critical of Kraft, for example, who put up a great deal of this cheese. Two years ago we had a discussion along this line and I made the rather definite statement that you could not buy cheddar cheese in the west. One check we made revealed that there was only one store in the west that had good cheddar cheese, and that was in Calgary. It was a special cheese store. Apparently the Kraft people paid more attention to the remark than anybody else, and since that time they have begun to cut up these big cheeses into half pound packages, and wrap them properly, and they have been selling them on the prairies at a very good price. I think it costs about 76 cents a pound when it gets out there in that form, so no one is losing any money on that particular sale.

The point I want to make is that while we were trying to encourage some people to become interested in selling this cheese out there by telling them where there was a market in which they could sell it, the Kraft people listened to us more than the people to whom we were trying to talk. They went out there and sold it, and you can get good cheddar cheese in the stores now.

Mr. Knight: I think there is a point that the people learn to eat cheese by eating cheese. So long as they eat some of the stuff they are eating at the moment I do not think they will ever learn what good cheese is. Therefore there will never be a demand created for good cheese. I have not mentioned any manufacturer's name, but I do not believe the minister has quite answered my question.

The point I want to get at is this. Is there a regulation or law which prohibits these people from selling anything as cheese which is not, in fact, cheese undiluted; that is the point.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, there are composition standards. Of course when you take what is generally known as Kraft it has been specially prepared, and is sold as that .The dealer does not attempt to sell it as anything but what it is, but it is not what we generally call cheddar cheese.

Mr. Cardiff: Does the Kraft company, which has probably imported more cheese into this country than anybody else, sell that cheese as New Zealand cheese or is it mixed up with Ontario cheese and sold as Canadian cheese?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, most of it is brought in for processing. Some of it is sold directly on the market, depending on who brings it in. If the Kraft people bring it in, they use it for making up this special Kraft cheese. It is a processed cheese. It may have some Canadian cheese in it, but there is more moisture in it than is in the ordinary cheese.

Mr. Cardiff: I do not think that is right. I do not think they should be allowed to bring in New Zealand cheese and mix it with our good cheese and sell it at a high price, taking a huge profit. That is what it amounts to, so far as I can see.

Mr. Charlton: In so far as this processed cheese is concerned, I presume the regulations would be somewhat similar to the butter regulations. Is there any moisture content that the cheese has to contain?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, both moisture and salt.

Mr. Charlton: In cheese?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a salt regulation for cheese, too.

Mr. Charlton: Is there a moisture regulation?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a regulation for moisture and salt.

Mr. Charlton: Does the soft cheese have to conform to a standard? How about cheese spreads; is there any standard for them?

Mr. Gardiner: There is a standard for it.

Mr. Charlton: What about ice cream? As we all know, there is a good deal of what is sometimes called frozen custard or of ice cream sold under various names. What is the standard of butter fat content for that soft ice cream, if it is properly called soft ice cream? Is it within the law to call it soft ice cream of must it be called some other name? What are the regulations under which that is sold in comparison with real ice cream?

Mr. Gardiner: The ice cream regulations are to the effect that ice cream shall contain not less than 10 per cent by weight of milk fat; not less than 36 per cent by weight of food solids; not less than 1-8/10 pounds of food solids per gallon, of which more than 50/100ths of a pound shall be milk and not more than ½ of 1 per cent by weight of stabilizer, and so on. The regulations are all set out.

Mr. Charlton: It is within the law, then, to call this soft product, whatever it is, soft ice cream?

Mr. Gardiner: So far as the content of it is concerned, it is within the law. It is just not frozen as solidly as the other.

Mr. Charlton: Is it correct to say that it cannot be frozen hard? Does it contain too much moisture, and if it were frozen hard the crystals would show up?

Mr. Gardiner: My experience has been that the ice cream that cannot be frozen hard is nearly all cream. We make it at home sometimes, but you cannot buy it in the stores.

32. Livestock products, stockyard supervision and furs, $769,648.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Could the minister tell us what duties are performed by stockyard supervisors?

Mr. Gardiner: Their duty is to enforce the stockyard and livestock regulations under the Livestock and Livestock Products Act at the different stockyards where they are in charge.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): I take it that it is more of an inspection job than anything else, to see that the act is followed. Is that the idea?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, very much an inspection job.

34. Marketing of agricultural products, including temporary appointments that may be required to be made notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, the amount available for such appointments not to exceed $6,000, $100,000.

Mr. Nowlan: Just what is included in this item? It says, "marketing of agricultural products". We have various groups for livestock, poultry and cheese, and we have had everything else. I was wondering just what is included in the marketing of products. In the breakdown there is an item for marketing projects, about $55,000. I should like the minister to give us a word of explanation with respect to that.

I also see there is a provision here that has to do with appointments notwithstanding the Civil Service Act. The amount available for such purpose is not to exceed $6,000. That looks almost like a casual appointment. In any event I am wondering just what is proposed, because when I turn to the breakdown I find there is a lot of money available for casual employment. I have something else to say about that in a minute, but I should like to get from the minister a picture of just what is involved in the item.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, when I first came to the department 20 years ago there was not any marketing service in the department. When we made the classification which I indicated earlier, when we were talking about splitting it up again, we brought in those five branches, marketing being one of them, and we set up certain amounts for the promotion of the marketing of farm products. In more recent days—I think it actually came up during the war and has been continued since—we asked to have an amount put in for advertising farm products. One of the uses that we did make of it was putting those advertisements out all over the country before we started the present butter program. "Butter is better" is one advertisement that we put all over the place, and it did increase the sale of butter. Anything that is undertaken that way we finance out of this fund. If we were to start out, for example, to promote the sale of more cheese or the eating of more apples the money would come out of this fund.

Then at that time we had in mind setting up a plan under which we might carry on greater operations than this amount of money would provide for, and we put in this one salary under the condition that we could not pay a man any more than $6,000. As a matter of fact we have not paid him up to date; we have been using the money for advertising purposes.

Mr. Nowlan: What is proposed, Mr. Chairman? I understand advertising. There is a provision of $35,000 in the breakdown for advertising. Then we have $52,300 for marketing projects. Just what is involved in the term, and what is done under those marketing projects?

Mr. Gardiner: Well, it is utilized for the study of marketing problems such as grading bacon, grading butter, grading cheese or products of that kind.

Mr. Nowlan: Would that not come under the vote of the department? The minister has separate funds for livestock—

Mr. Gardiner: It could, but the hon. member will note that this is something that goes on. These marketing projects are, for example, something that we start up and carry on for two or three months or for six months, and for that reason we do not think we should set up a civil service appointment in order to cover that particular work. We get some person appointed. He may be a provincial man or he may be a man engaged in the dairy industry somewhere who can do this job for us and we pay him up to $6,000. We cannot pay him any more on these projects that the hon. member speaks of. He may be examining into one of these projects, is our bacon properly graded, is our butter properly graded, and so on? We have him check on that and report to us.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister give us an example of the project that he proposes to carry out under this $6,000 vote?

Mr. Gardiner: The one that is on at present is in connection with the project for bacon that I have just spoken of. We have a project on now in Montreal studying the grading of bacon to determine whether or not it is being done in the proper way and whether the public are being sold what they think they are getting. Take the matter that we discussed in the house about five years ago about putting coloured paper on bacon, and so on. These are the kinds of things that are investigated under these projects.

Mr. Nowlan: I can quite realize the importance of this. I shall draw the minister's attention to a marketing project to which I wish he would give some special attention in the immediate future, in co-operation with the Department of Trade and Commerce. He will know that Great Britain has now released sterling exchange, or it is released so far as the British West Indies are concerned. There is a potential market there for the sale of Nova Scotia apples at a relatively profitable price. Last year as well there was a market there, but owing to the fact there was not sufficient cold storage space available I know of one firm which lost a market for 4,000 boxes of apples at a relatively high price.

I realize that the Department of Agriculture does not control transport, but in view of the sudden announcement of the relaxation of restrictions on sterling I can pretty well envisage what is going to happen in the next few months with respect to that market. I do think there should be the closest co-operation between the Department of Agriculture marketing branch and the Department of Transport to find out what cold storage space is going to be available in Canadian National Steamships—and there will not be enough—and also to see if arrangements can be made with ships plying between Montreal and the Caribbean that have cold storage space that could, of course, stop at Halifax or Saint John to pick up those apples which, for the first time since before the war at any rate, will have access without any restrictions on exchange to not an extensive market but to a reasonably profitable one and one which is highly desirable to foster in every way possible.

Will the minister mark that down as the No. 1 marketing project? If he does, I shall vote unanimously and enthusiastically for the passing of this particular item.

Mr. Gardiner: I shall consider it.

Mr. Charlton: I notice that in the year 1954-55, $10,336 was spent under this item. For the year 1955-56 the actual expenditure to December 1, 1955, was $7,431 and the estimated balance for the year, $16,469. I suggest to the minister that the marketing service is one of the most important branches in this whole Dominion of Canada so far as agriculture is concerned. I suggest that very seriously, because marketing is the most important segment of the agricultural problem right now.

I am not criticizing in any way the amount of money that is spent, either in a special project or in any other project, if it is going to do some good in the marketing of agricultural products, but I wonder how the item of $100,000 is arrived at when last year's figure was only $23,900? I suggest the minister must have something in view. Since it is six o'clock perhaps I could ask him to bring in the program the next time the estimates are up and give us some of the projects that he is planning to do this year over and above those that were done last year.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall take the resolution in my name with respect to fiscal arrangements with the provinces; then the items which appear on today's order paper as Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

D.E.W. LINE HAUL—CANADIAN EMPLOYEES

Question No. 362—Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many Canadians were employed during the winter of 1954/55, by the various contractors on the haul to D.E.W. line points out of Eagle, Alaska, into the Yukon?

Answer by: Mr. Langlois, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

The government is not in possession of other information concerning the transport of D.E.W. line supplies out of Eagle, Alaska, than that given in the general statement on this matter made on April 9, 1956, at page 2725 of Hansard.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 16, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF STATUTORY HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 441, to provide for pay for statutory holidays for employees and for pay for work performed on statutory holidays.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make provision for at least eight statutory holidays with pay each year for all employees in Canada who come under the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. It also provides for additional pay at overtime rates in the case of any employees required to work on statutory holidays.

This is a companion bill to Bill No. 211. Taken together they provide each year a minimum of two weeks' vacation with pay and a minimum of eight statutory holidays with pay for all workers in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GRAIN

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the order:

Government notices of motions—the Minister of Trade and Commerce—the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve the international wheat agreement opened for signature at Washington on May 14, 1956, and that this house do approve the same.

Mr. Speaker: This is transferred to government orders.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING AUTHORITY TO CONSTRUCT AND OPERATE BRIDGE

Hon. W. E. Harris (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act by repealing subsection 1 of section 14A thereof as enacted at the present session of parliament and substituting the following subsection therefor:

"14A. (1) The authority may, alone or jointly or in conjunction with the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation of the United States, construct, maintain and operate, either

(a) a bridge over Pollys Gut in the St. Lawrence river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles, railway trains and for other like purposes, with all necessary approaches and facilities, from Cornwall island in the county of Stormont in the province of Ontario to Massena point in the state of New York, or

(b) a bridge over the south channel in the St. Lawrence river for the passage of pedestrians, vehicles and for other like purposes, with all necessary approaches and facilities, from Cornwall island in the county of Stormont in the province of Ontario to the United States mainland in the state of New York."

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ALLEGED REFUSAL TO ISSUE REVOLVER LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Before I do so, I should like to say how very glad I am—and I am sure everyone else in the house feels the same way about it—to see him back. Could the minister give the house a report concerning the action taken by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police this summer in refusing to issue licences to prospectors or men engaged in similar work in British Columbia to carry a revolver? There is quite a lot of objection to that course being followed. Apparently this is the first year it has been done, and the result may be that some of these men will lose their lives.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in rising to reply to my hon. friend's question I wish to thank him for his complimentary reference to myself and to say that there is no person in the house any more glad that I am back than I am myself. With regard to the question which he has asked without notice—

Mr. Green: I did not realize the minister would be here.

Mr. Garson: No, quite—my impression is that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in taking the actions which they did, have in every case administered the law as it stands. But I think I could perhaps give a more satisfactory answer to my hon. friend if I checked with him in order to put myself in a position to explain how it was that they have administered the law in these cases to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. Green: I point out that apparently this practice has not been followed in earlier years and that for some reason or other the police have cracked down this year. It may be that the law should be amended but something should be done about it quickly because these men are forced to go into the bush without revolvers.

Mr. Garson: The reason I answered in the way I did is that one or two individual cases came to my attention and I checked them and found that they had been dealt with in accordance with the law, and that what in my opinion was proper discretion had been exercised in those particular cases. I do not know whether or not these are the ones to which my hon. friend refers, and I think it would be helpful to me if he could give me the names of some of the cases he has in mind.

Mr. Herridge: May I say that this is a matter of great interest to a number of my constituents, and I would ask the minister to inquire into the circumstances and what has been the practice in the past.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO DELAY IN PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Victoria, Ont.): I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice the back pay of the mounted police. I understand that in Newfoundland they are behind some three or four months and the amounts run from $43 to $55 a month for these constables. Will the minister look into the situation and give us a reply tomorrow?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—INQUIRY AS TO PLANE PROVIDED FOR TRIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Why was it that during the recent official trip of His Excellency the Governor General to western Canada he was required to travel in a more or less second-class unpressurized aircraft rather than one similar to that properly used by the Prime Minister and also those used by the Department of Transport? Surely His Excellency, as Her Majesty's representative, should not be required to travel in a second-class aircraft.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I quite agree with the hon. gentleman and I will inquire into the situation. I am quite sure there must have been good reasons for the fact that the C-5 was not available to His Excellency for that trip. I will make inquiries as to the reasons and make a further reply when I have received the information.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING DECISION TO DISBAND MOUNT HOPE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister taken any action in regard to 424 squadron at Hamilton as a result of the representations which have been made to him?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I have received a number of representations personally and by letter from persons in Hamilton, and last week the chief of the air staff discussed the matter fully with a delegation of air force reserve officers from the squadron. These officers requested that they be given more time to prepare some further representations which they wished to make. That request was granted, and I believe they are now preparing some further data which they wish to take up with the chief of the air staff.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that the subject is being given further consideration, will the Minister of National Defence consider taking steps to permit flying to continue at Mount Hope until the department has had an opportunity of considering the further representations which apparently have been invited as well as permitted?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take up with the chief of the air staff the question of whether flying should be continued under present circumstances at Mount Hope. I am not just sure as to the exact position at the moment.

Mr. Drew: I have one further supplementary question in relation to the same subject. If there is in fact to be a reconsideration of this matter, as the minister has implied, would it not be reasonable to permit flying to continue so that the squadron may be maintained in being until such time as the decision has finally been made?

Mr. Campney: It might be, Mr. Speaker; but I am not familiar with the state of flying operations at the Mount Hope airport since the decision was taken. I therefore would wish to take the matter up with the chief of the air staff.

IRRIGATION

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the question I addressed to the Minister of Agriculture on June 26, and his reply that it would be referred to the Prime Minister on his return. I think the question is appropriate since we are about to launch into a discussion of federal-provincial relations. The question is this: Has the federal government now decided that the building of the South Saskatchewan dam would be in the national interest? Has the government made any offer to Saskatchewan as to the terms on which it would agree to proceed with such construction?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the two questions is a negative one. No decision has yet been made that the government would take the responsibility of recommending that project as one that was in the national interest.

NATIONAL REVENUE

LETHBRIDGE—INQUIRY AS TO CLOSING OF DISTRICT OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): I wish to direct to the Minister of National Revenue a question of which I have already sent him notice. Has the minister received a letter from Dennis O'Connell, secretary of the Lethbridge chamber of commerce, stating that there were rumours that the income tax office in Lethbridge is to be closed and asking that the minister confirm that the rumours are well founded or deny that there is any truth in them?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The answer to the first part is yes. We have received a communication from Mr. O'Connell, executive secretary of the Lethbridge chamber of commerce. Following the policy of the department, and in the interests of economy, all other suboffices of the taxation division have been closed. The office at Lethbridge will be closed, effective September 1, 1956. It is felt that the taxpayers will be better served by dealing directly with the Calgary district office instead of through an intermediary suboffice.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Blackmore: I desire to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question supplementary to the one which I have already asked here. Will he tell the house tomorrow, or as soon as he can get the information together, how many stations or income tax offices similar to the one in Lethbridge have been closed or are being closed in each of the various provinces?

Mr. McCann: They have all been closed except Lethbridge, which will be closed on September 1. We find that running suboffices is not an economic thing, although at times during the year it is convenient for the particular residents of the community. But with modern transportation facilities, and with the full complement of people we need to run a tax office, we feel that Lethbridge can be better served from the main office in that part of Alberta, which is Calgary.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister if he can recall right off and give the house the number of similar offices that have been closed or are to be closed in western Canada this year.

Mr. McCann: Well, there are none in western Canada because Lethbridge was the only suboffice we have in western Canada.

PUBLIC WORKS

FALSE CREEK, VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO FISH DOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): May I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works? Press dispatches from the west coast indicate that work on the fish dock in False creek in Vancouver has been stopped, or in any event has been delayed, and that the city council has protested to both this government and the provincial government. Can the minister give the house a report? I tried to reach him before eleven o'clock but he was not in his office.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any stoppage of work. I looked at that site a few months ago and work was going on then. I have received no report to the contrary, but I will look into the matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RELEASE OF F-86 AIRCRAFT AS MUTUAL AID TO GERMANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does he intend to inform the house as to the general arrangements under which 75 fighter aircraft are to be delivered to Western Germany, as announced in the press over the week end?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it has not been the custom to make announcements in the house with regard to transfers under mutual aid, but I have prepared some facts which I shall be glad to give to the hon. member and the house.

In accordance with the normal procedure which has been established to handle mutual aid, the advice of the supreme allied commander was sought last December in regard to the release of 75 F-86's which would become available during the latter part of this fiscal year.

The supreme allied commander recommended that the release of these aircraft would make the greatest contribution to NATO if the whole of these aircraft were released to the federal republic of Germany to allow the early build-up of the West German forces. This recommendation was further discussed with the standing group in early February and was later confirmed by the Canadian government, and as is the usual custom, the offer was made through diplomatic channels.

This is exactly the same procedure which has been used in the past for the release of other mutual aid, including fighter aircraft. Three hundred and seventy F-86's were transferred as mutual aid to the United Kingdom jointly by Canada and the United States in 1952-53. One hundred and seven aircraft were allotted to each of Greece and Turkey in 1954 and deliveries are just being completed.

There have been numerous transfers of items of mutual aid throughout the years and it has not been customary to announce any such transfers in the house, but references have been made to our mutual aid program in the white paper and in the discussion on the mutual aid item of the national defence estimates.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): May I ask a supplementary question arising out of the answer given by the minister? Who is on the committee of NATO that makes the determination as to the allotment of aircraft? Is its consent required to any allotment such as this being made? Has it been consulted in reference to the request of Israel for 24 fighter aircraft?

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Campney: The committee which deals with and recommends the allocation of mutual aid, subject to the recommendation of the supreme commander, is known as the standing group. The standing group consists of a representative of each of Great Britain, the United States and France. The procedure that is followed, and which I have just outlined, is the usual procedure in securing the approval of mutual aid transfers.

The question to which the hon. member referred having to do with Israel has nothing to do with NATO procedure and has nothing to do with mutual aid. It is an entirely different matter. The procedure to which I have been referring is the one that covers mutual aid transfers to NATO allies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the minister, is it a fact then that aircraft can be furnished to Israel or to any country by Canada without the other nations of NATO in any way being consulted as to whether or not they approve of that being done?

Mr. Campney: Well, Mr. Speaker, the question of gifts, sales or disposal of equipment to countries other than those within the NATO alliance is a matter between the countries concerned, and has never been regarded as coming within the purview of NATO. If we make gifts or transfers within NATO, the procedure I have outlined is followed. If we are making transfers to countries outside of NATO, it is a matter of negotiation and discussion between the countries concerned and ourselves.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CROWN CORPORATION—APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL MANAGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he is yet in a position to answer my question of Friday concerning Mr. Victor G. Bartram, general manager of Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, with respect to his directorships in private companies?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in a position to answer the hon. gentleman's questions.

ATOMIC ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO RUSSIA'S SUGGESTION TO END EXPERIMENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would he care to tell the house this morning how he feels about Dmitri Shepilov's suggestion that the nations reach some agreement other than within the United Nations or outside of it for putting an end to atomic energy experimentation and explosions?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a question that might better be answered in a general discussion on external affairs. However, I would refer my hon. friend to the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare at the disarmament committee of the United Nations the other day which did give the present Canadian position on this matter.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs supplementary to the one which was asked of him by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). When the minister goes into detail concerning the invitation which Canada apparently has received to discontinue the practice which we have been carrying on of training ourselves in the use of nuclear weapons, will the minister hold himself prepared to explain to the committee and the hon. members what weapons Canada could have recourse to which would help compensate for the colossal disparity of numbers which would be in existence once we engaged in a major conflict with the 800 millions of the communist world?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO RETIREMENT OF DEPUTY POSTMASTER GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether his deputy minister's announced intention made on Friday is of the irrevocable type or of the more liberal revocable type?

Hon. Hugues Lapointe (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend, I did read with interest the articles which appeared in the various papers on Friday. I was not surprised, since the deputy minister had announced publicly on three occasions, to my knowledge, before groups of postal employees that it was his intention to retire from the service after the universal postal union congress in 1957 and after 41 years' service. I must say that he had also, to my knowledge, informed his associates in the department and that he had informed me when I first took over this portfolio.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As a supplementary question, did the Postmaster General study carefully the reasons given on Friday by his deputy for his proposed retirement?

Mr. Lapointe: Well, Mr. Speaker, I did read the newspaper articles. The only reason directly attributed to the deputy minister himself that I know of was that he felt that a man after 41 years' service in a high level position of responsibility such as that of deputy minister should, if he is capable, permit others to have access to these higher positions. That, to my knowledge, is the only statement of any authority that he did give. I have questioned Mr. Turnbull and he told me, and pointed out rightly, that the remainder of the statements in the various articles which had been attributed to him were purely newspaper speculation.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): This, Mr. Speaker, is a supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As a supplementary question—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question, would the Postmaster General inform the house where he saw the statement which he attributed to a press conference to the effect that the deputy postmaster general was retiring in order to allow others to move into his position?

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry; I did imply it was a press statement. I should have said it was a statement that came over the C.B.C. It was given by the deputy minister to the C.B.C.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

HIGHWAY BRIDGES—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. When may I expect an answer to my question which was made an order for return on April 11 of this year?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): I shall inquire, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF WOMAN MEMBER TO THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Ellen L. Fairclough (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Since it is now a year from the time a vacancy occurred on the civil service commission and since there have been repeated statements to the effect that a woman would be appointed to that vacancy, can the Secretary of State report to the house what progress has been made with reference to filling that position?

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I did refer to that during the discussion of the estimates of the civil service commission, and when an announcement is ready it will be made in due course in the house.

TAXATION

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the first day of April, 1957, and ending on the 31st day of March, 1962

(a) a tax equalization payment with respect to individual and corporation income taxes and succession duties;

(b) a provincial revenue stabilization payment with respect to such taxes; and

(c) a tax rental payment in accordance with a tax rental agreement that may be entered into by any province as an alternative to levying such taxes on its own behalf; and also to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Chairman, all the relevant correspondence and documents have been tabled from time to time in connection with the various steps which were taken to arrive at the point we have come to today so I do not intend to take very long at the resolution stage in dealing with this particular matter; however, since the resolution does precede a bill which in many respects will be substantially different from the tax rental arrangements under which we have been operating since 1952, I think it would be appropriate to make some remarks and to place a few explanations before the committee.

As the resolution indicates, it will precede a bill which will implement the offer made to the provincial governments as a result of the several conferences held during the past 15 months. A great deal of study has been given to the subject of financial arrangements with the provinces in that time. We met first on April 26 of last year to decide what matters should receive consideration. We met again in June to work out an equitable method of sharing the costs of unemployment assistance, and our legislation with respect to this received the royal assent last week. On October 3, the main conference was held. At that time, while fiscal matters were the main topic of discussion, other important subjects of mutual concern were also considered. In November, we agreed to pay a greater share of trans-Canada highway costs. In January of this year, the sub-conference on health insurance met, resulting in specific proposals being made to the provincial governments for federal participation in a national scheme. The final conference on the fiscal proposals took place on March 9 and at that time the plan which is the basis of the bill was discussed in detail, it having been made available in a proposal by letter dated January 6. In addition to these ministerial conferences, numerous meetings have been held at the official level to discuss details of the various questions brought forward. Arrangements have been made for the continuation of these official meetings from time to time in the future.

Government in a federation is not a simple process for the provincial and federal governments. For that matter government in these times is not a simple matter anywhere, but additional complications are present in a federal state in the fact that by its very nature the freedom of action that exists in a unitary state is absent. For all this there is no questioning that it is the form best suited to our needs, for only in this way is a reconciliation possible of the differing factors of economics, geography, race, custom and religion. The fathers of confederation understood this, even though some of them, including Sir John A. Macdonald, believed that a unitary state would have been more suitable in the circumstances then prevailing.

As I see it, the federal government has two purposes that are essentially complementary and not conflicting. It must perform those functions of national interest that are specifically assigned to it under the constitution and further, and this is of equal importance, it must act as a unifying influence, drawing together, by all proper means at its disposal, the constituent parts of the nation. The federal government is not the creature of the provinces nor are the provinces creatures of it. Each has its own assigned responsibilities, but it is the federal government that must provide the unifying force that makes a nation out of what would otherwise be a confederacy of the loosest sort. And so it follows that in the fiscal arrangements with the provinces, the federal government must follow a policy advantageous to the best interests of the whole of the country.

It is in this atmosphere that we have worked out what we consider to be a fair and logical approach to our fiscal problems with the provinces. I said "approach". I was not even tempted to say "solution" because no final solution is practicable, and in this fact lies much of the merit of these limited arrangements. Times and men both change, and our problems will change with them. Always, however, we should have a plan which is equitable and which makes it possible, in so far as this can be done, for all citizens of Canada, no matter where they live, to enjoy that reasonable standard of services that they have a right to expect.

There is, I am sure, no necessity for me to go into the background of federal-provincial financial relations at this time. The historical aspects of the subject are readily available and have been placed before the house on many occasions. I believe, however, that a brief reference to the events leading up to these current arrangements might serve a useful purpose.

The wartime tax agreements, while limited in scope, were the forerunners of the tax rental agreements of 1947 and 1952. They were intended as temporary expedients to permit the federal government to raise the necessary high wartime revenues as equitably as possible between taxpayers, while at the same time permitting the provincial governments to operate on an assured income sufficient for their needs in time of great national emergency. They were emergency solutions to a short-term problem and obviously never were intended to be applied to times when a normal expansion of provincial services would be required.

These agreements, that is those which were made at the end of the war-time period were strictly fiscal in nature and did not attempt to cover the broad social and economic fields as visualized in the original post-war proposals. Under the first post-war tax rental agreements, Canada rented from all the provinces, except Ontario and Quebec, the fields of succession duties, individual and corporation income taxes and corporation taxes, in return for payments which from a guaranteed minimum would increase with changes in population and gross national product per capita.

In the period of these agreements, April 1, 1947, to March 31, 1952, in line with decreasing costs of defence, the federal government was able to make substantial advantages available to the provinces by withdrawing from certain of the consumption tax fields it had occupied during the war. In addition, of course, we continued to withdraw from other fields down to and including 1953, when the stock transfer tax was dropped. We also shared with the provinces the returns from taxation of public bodies dealing with the generating or distributing of electrical energy, gas or steam. We are now proposing to allow the provinces to enter the field of taxation on insurance premiums, which at the current rate yields about $22 million a year. In addition, since 1948 there has been a large increase in the special grant programs, the most important of which in dollar amounts have been the national health program, on which over $185 million has been paid the provinces, and the trans-Canada highways program where these payments have totalled about $82 million to date.

Owing in part to their successful operation and in part to an extremely dangerous international situation, no basic changes were made in the principles of the tax rental agreements as renegotiated for 1952. The payments were on a more generous scale than before, and it was largely owing to this that Ontario entered into an agreement, along with eight of the remaining nine provinces.

When it came time to consider what should be done when the tax rental agreements expired at the end of this fiscal year, we carefully studied what had been accomplished in the years that they had been in effect. While no economic yardstick can be applied to measure the value of such things, some fairly obvious conclusions can be drawn:

1. They have made possible the utilization of the corporation and individual income tax field, largely without disagreement or duplication.

2. They have avoided unnecessary and wasteful administrative duplication of tax collection machinery with substantial savings to both taxpayers and governments alike.

3. They have provided financial assistance to provinces that would have had difficulty in maintaining services at a reasonable level by their unaided efforts, thus compensating for a concentration of these taxing powers in a few of the provinces.

4. They have provided the means of fiscal control through taxation which has proved a useful power on occasion.

These were the results that we had to evaluate and, while we were quite aware that the agreements were not without faults, we had to be sure that there was some more satisfactory approach to our mutual problems before we discarded what we had.

During the course of our meetings with the provinces, I suggested certain objectives that I thought we should keep in mind in seeking a solution to these problems. We should try to assure, as far as possible, that both the federal and provincial governments have access to revenue sources consistent with their responsibilities and at the same time we should promote simplicity, economy and equity in the tax system as a whole and in the machinery of tax collection. In so far as is possible within our constitutional limits, we should endeavour to develop and maintain fiscal arrangements that will contribute to high and stable levels of employment and that will tend to moderate rather than exaggerate the ups and downs of economic activity.

While the tax rental agreements now in their tenth and final year have gone a long way toward meeting these objectives, in some ways they do not meet all the criteria to which some provinces attach particular importance. The proposals incorporated in this bill are designed to reconcile as far as possible these various conflicting points of view.

These new arrangements provide increased room for the provinces to utilize their taxing powers and at the same time to share through unconditional equalization payments the tax fields covered by these proposals. By this sharing, the equalization payments provide the fiscal assistance that will aid the provinces in meeting a standard of services that would not otherwise be possible.

Secondly, by means of the stabilization payments they place a floor under a large segment of the provincial revenue system which has from time to time in the past shown evidence of instability. It is our hope that the steady growth of this country will continue in a manner that will make the operation of this part unnecessary. Nevertheless, this is a policy of insurance that has been sought by the provinces, which have been conscious of their vulnerability to economic change in the light of past experience. The stabilizing effect of a provision of this nature on the public sector of the economy should not be minimized and its general acceptance emphasizes the importance of a strong and continuing federal position in fiscal matters.

Third, they provide means for the development of a method of preserving the simplicity and economy of our tax system in these three common fields of taxation.

These arrangements make it possible for us to retain these advantages that have been an essential part of the tax rental principle and at the same time provide freedom of action to the provinces.

These proposals provide an answer to a very substantial extent to the problems confronting us. By them the provinces will have available from the tax fields in which we are mutually concerned revenues that are in our view consistent with their actual responsibilities now and with those that seem likely to develop in the next five years. It is characteristic of the freedom of action that exists under these new arrangements that any province that feels it requires more or less revenue from these tax fields is entirely at liberty on its own responsibility to impose and collect at whatever rates it deems suitable without sacrificing the assistance the equalization and stabilization payments supply.

The problem of determining the financial limits of these proposals has not been an easy one. We have tried in every way to be sympathetic to the many legitimate provincial claims and at the same time reconcile them with our national responsibilities. It is our view that in the limits decided upon both questions have been met in so far as it is possible to reconcile the needs of our expanding expenditures with restricted if buoyant revenues.

I should like to have the committee's permission to table a statement illustrating the workings of these proposals in the first year of the new arrangements, 1957-58, and I would ask permission to have it put on Hansard.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the minister permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harris: The table is as follows:

The yield of standard taxes and the insurance premium tax have been increased by 6% per annum over the basic 1955 data. The distribution of taxable incomes, profits and successions between provinces is on the basis of data presently available. 1956 Federal rates for individual income tax and succession duty have been used.

[1] To bring up to tax rental payment available in 1957/58 if the 1952 Agreements were to be extended.

[3] Estimated on Gross National Product at factor cost of $24.70 billion (Corresponds to GNP of $28.00 billion at market prices).

Federal-Provincial Financial Arrangements

This illustration, and it is only that, assumes, of course, certain economic conditions at that time. Briefly, the result is that in this first year there will be available to the provinces some $653 million, including the revenue from the insurance premium tax which is to be made available to them. This is nearly $115 million or over 20 per cent more than would be available if the present tax rental agreements were to be extended for all provinces into the year in question. This $653 million is made up as follows:

1. Unconditional equalization grants	$155 million
2. Revenue from individual income, corporation income and succession duties either by way of rental or by direct provincial impost without additional tax burden on the taxpayer	474 million
3. Insurance premium tax	24 million
	$653 million

These payments are very substantial and, taken in conjunction with the growth factors that will operate and the heavy contingent responsibilities of the stabilization payments, make any greater payment impracticable at the present time under present circumstances. I know that this house is acutely aware of the very heavy stress laid upon the federal budget by the responsibilities of defence. These costs total almost 40 per cent of our expenditure and while they are more or less stabilized at this time we cannot be sure what outlay may be required to maintain our security.

During the past 15 years, with the consent and often at the urging of the provincial governments, the federal government has taken on heavy expenditures for objectives which have not been considered, traditionally or constitutionally, federal responsibilities. I think particularly of those in the field of social welfare where payments for unemployment insurance, family allowances, old age pensions and assistance and like measures now cost us close to $900 million a year, and this is constantly rising. In addition, we have commitments to the provinces in health, trans-Canada highway, university and vocational grants, among others, that add substantially to our costs.

We are under constant pressure from all sides to increase these forms of aid—I need not remind hon. members of that—and I need only point out as an illustration of this growing burden that since these present negotiations started in April of last year we have assumed responsibilities in connection with unemployment assistance which in a year such as 1954-55 would cost us $25 million. We have further agreed in principle to assume costs in connection with a national health insurance program that could easily total over $180 million in a year. Both these are constitutionally the direct responsibilities of the provinces. If the presumed payments become a reality, this means that together with the increase provided by this bill our annual outlay for these matters to the provinces would have gone up by about $320 million as a result of our recent conferences.

I think it becomes quite clear that there is a very practical limit to our ability to dispose of our revenue sources and it is our view that this limit has been reached under present circumstances with these proposals at this time.

Under the rental agreements fiscal aid was an essential part of the payment made. Under the 1956 proposals any element of fiscal aid has been separated from the rental feature and payments will be based on the value of the field in the province concerned. By renting, the provinces may obtain the benefit of these taxes without a taxing statute and without administrative costs. However, much the same result can be obtained less directly and where a provincial government would prefer to have legislation of its own for individual or corporation income taxes that is consistent with the federal legislation at the rate allowed as offsets to federal tax, this government is prepared to enter into agency agreements for the collection of these taxes at a fee proportionate to the costs.

On the whole I think we have some reason to be gratified with the degree of acceptance which the principle of our proposals has received in the provinces. We have not reached and would not expect to reach unanimous agreement on the proper division of these tax fields. We have had our differences, but I think it is a matter of great satisfaction to all who have been concerned in these negotiations that they have been marked by sympathy and understanding of each other's problems.

To sum up, Mr. Chairman, the bill will provide for: (1) Collection agreements on behalf of the provinces; (2) tax rental agreements; (3) a tax equalization payment to those provinces in which the yield at the standard rates is below the average of the yields in the highest two provinces; (4) a provincial revenue stabilization payment to any province when the yield of the present proposal falls below certain floors; (5) abatement of tax in a province where there is no tax rental agreement is supplied in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, the statement just made by the Minister of Finance gives a somewhat comfortable interpretation of the situation which exists, an interpretation very much in contrast with what those of us who have been reading the press were under the impression did in fact prevail. When the minister says that we have not reached and would not expect to reach agreement I must say that he is using a very mild and rather deceptive interpretation of the vehement denunciation there has been of the inadequacy of the proposals now put forward.

The minister has pointed out that there will be a very substantial increase in the amount of money to flow from the federal treasury to the provinces over and above what would have been payable under a continuance of the present tax rental agreements. There is no question as to that fact. That, however, should immediately bring to our attention the source of these revenues from which payments will be made. These are revenues that by tradition were primarily provincial revenues under the concept of confederation. This is not a case of a generous handout by the federal government. This is or should be an attempt to reach a just, sensible and reasonable solution of the use of the main fields of direct taxation which are the fields primarily open to the provincial governments.

I agree with what the Minister of Finance has said in regard to the extent to which this subject has been discussed in detail. I do not believe that it is necessary to review the history of the federal system on this occasion and particularly at the resolution stage. Nor do I think it is necessary to go into the history of the various stages by which we have reached this point. However, I think it is essential that we recall that if in fact we believe in the federal system, we must remember the basic proposition that the power to tax is the power to govern. We must remember that if one government becomes dependent on another government to the extent of a considerable part of its revenues, then its real right to govern as an independent body may become more than illusory; it may become a myth with serious consequences to the survival of the federal system in Canada.

We are not dealing now with something that has not been discussed frequently before this time. But it seems necessary to reiterate the basic proposition that wherever governments have become dependent upon other governments for their revenues in substantial measure, fixed upon some rigid pattern, the fate of those governments has usually been in jeopardy. That goes back over a long range of history. It has not always been the case that central governments made payment to the local governments. Actually in the Weimar republic in Germany after the first world war the situation existed under which the central government became largely dependent upon payments from the states. That situation seriously weakened the central democratic government in Germany; it seriously weakened its capacity to meet the urgent problems of the times.

Here in Canada we have a case which has been paralleled in other jurisdictions over the centuries, and that is a situation where the provincial governments, as a result of certain historic facts, are becoming more and more dependent upon the federal government. What is more, the municipal governments are becoming more dependent upon the federal government and the provincial governments with which they are directly associated. It is customary for us to use the legal expression that the municipalities are the legal creatures of the provinces. It would always be well for us to remember that these municipalities are very real entities and not just constitutional bodies. They are very real entities which predate confederation itself. They are very real entities which in some cases represent the actual beginning of all our history. They are very real entities where the roots of our democratic system grow. Therefore the needs of the municipalities and the plight of the local ratepayer—whether he be a home owner, a tenant or an operator of a business—are things which we must have vividly before us when we attempt to assess the adequacy or otherwise of the arrangements that are made with the provinces.

There sometimes may be a tendency to think of these large payments—and they are large payments—as something which simply affects the provincial governments in their various duties. Let me point out how heavy the responsibilities of the provinces are with regard to the municipalities. Merely as an example, and not because it happens that I had some close association with that province for some time, I should like to point out what happens in the province of Ontario, and I may say it happens in varying degrees in other provinces across Canada. Some 40 per cent to 45 per cent of the total revenue available to the government of the province of Ontario —whether by way of payment from the federal treasury or from its independent collection of money—is passed over to the municipalities or to various local municipal agencies. That percentage represents a tremendous proportion of the total money that goes to a provincial government. The figures are not available right across Canada with regard to the exact amount that is payable in that way to the various municipal agencies such as school boards and other local bodies of that kind. But what is abundantly clear is that when we consider the amount of money that goes to the provincial governments we are in fact also considering the position of the municipalities and in turn, of course, the position of the local taxpayer as well.

When I listened to the statement made by the Minister of Finance I could not help recalling the opening words of a pamphlet on the negotiations which have taken place up to the present time and which was written by Mr. J. Harvey Perry, the director of the Canadian Tax Foundation. I think I will read these words because they set forth fairly clearly not only the problem that confronts us but the way in which the general public looks upon these highly involved discussions which are represented in such a table as that which was put on Hansard this morning and which is now before us. These are the opening words in the foreword to his pamphlet which was published in February of this year:

> Surgery in all its forms is now so complicated that the layman has long since ceased to understand anything but the simplest operation. Among the more baffling of the modern techniques is that employed every five years by our politicians in dissecting the Canadian body fiscal. Even the intelligent citizen earnestly trying to understand finds it difficult to decide whether this quinquennial quartering of the tax system involves highly skilled surgery or merely sophisticated butchery. In part this is attributable to the fact that the really vital incisions take place in the decent privacy of the conference room. But it also arises no doubt from the frustration of attempting to relate the periodical bulletins on the progress of the patient, in which developments appear to be expressed in the equivalent of algebraic equations, with the ritualistic invocations and tribal incantations which mark all outward aspects of the performance. This state of frustration the citizen could probably ignore if it were not for a niggling feeling that all these events must in some way be of importance to his welfare.
> In this, of course, the citizen is wholly right. These are matters of great importance to him, and he should have some idea of what is going on.

I have read those words, Mr. Chairman, because it must have seemed to many of the hon. members here that they were hearing something in the nature of tribal incantations when they heard flowing from the lips of the Minister of Finance some of those references to the discussions which have taken place and the formulae which are embraced in the various agreements which have existed in the past and which are now being supplemented by the measure under consideration. In fact, one might go a little farther. From the statements that have been made by many of the provincial premiers it would seem certain that this is not merely sophisticated butchery, but cynical butchery of our federal system. These statements must have come, and I am sure did come, to the attention of the members of the government. They do not come from any one single premier. They came from different premiers across Canada who have complained bitterly of the fact that whether the increase over the amount that would have been payable by a continuance of the tax rental agreements be $163 million or some other figure, these are hopelessly inadequate to meet the demands not merely of the provincial governments, but perhaps even more important of the municipal governments in relation to the rapidly pyramiding demands of our society at this time.

We have entered a period where old standards have simply become meaningless. We have been hearing of the crisis of education. It is more than that. It may well become a tragedy. Just today I was reading a statement that in Paris, France, there is great concern about the fact that only one-third of the number of pupils who ordinarily pass certain examinations in that city have passed on this occasion. This is a symptomatic problem. In order to meet the shortage of space, examination standards are being raised to a point where many children are being denied the opportunity for advanced education which they really need, and which this country needs at this time with the demands of technical and other skilled training.

This is no theoretical problem. This is a very real problem, a grave problem, and one with immense implications for the future of our country. It may well be that within the period of five years that these present agreements are to run, the demands on accommodation in our schools, our technical institutions and our universities, will have mounted beyond all recognition. If the present rate of growth continues in many parts of Canada, the schools of today will be hopelessly inadequate for the demands of five years from now. Already university accommodation is utterly inadequate for the present demands, let alone the demands of the future. At this time young people who have written their university examinations are waiting in suspense, not merely to know whether they passed their examinations, but to know whether they passed their examinations with a standard sufficiently high to get them through the gateway of the university they desire to enter. It is an agonizing situation. No longer is it a mere question of ability to pass examinations. It is a question how many can get into a university where the space is so severely limited. That is not a good thing for them; it is not a good thing for us and it is not good for the future of Canada.

Another thing which has its impact upon this whole situation is that, as we look at the tremendously increased use of mechanical equipment to do work that was previously done by hand, we are seeing a rapidly increasing demand for higher training in the technical fields which will qualify young people to handle these delicate and involved machines which do these jobs that were earlier done by hand. This is going to mean that a higher percentage of our young people must have a higher standard of education. This is going to run the graph line of demand on space in our elementary schools, our secondary schools, our technical schools and our universities away up into figures that it is difficult even to suggest at this moment. It is in the light of that situation that we must examine the adequacy of what is now before us.

When Mr. Perry in his article to which I have referred, speaks of the fact that the citizen is coming to realize that this is a subject of great importance to him, I hope that it will be realized how vitally important this subject is to every citizen and particularly to the home owner who is now bearing a crushing burden of taxation in many municipalities across Canada today. There are municipalities at this time which are forced to charge taxes which are almost equal to a rental of a few years ago. This is only the beginning unless arrangements that are made today make it possible for these municipalities to meet their demands.

Now, in saying these things following the speech of the Minister of Finance, I wish to make it quite clear that the present formula has some merits in the acceptance of certain very important principles. As the minister pointed out, the proposal contemplates the continuance of a form of tax rental agreement, arrangements for federal collection of payments under those agreements, a tax equalization plan, a provincial stabilization fund which will protect municipalities against a severe drop in their revenues, and in turn an abatement in the federal taxation fields of personal income, corporation taxes and succession duties. The acceptance by the federal government of the place of the provinces and the right of the provinces in the field of income tax, corporation tax, succession duties and other direct taxes is, in itself, a welcome evidence of a return to the position which was always accepted without question over the years between 1867 and 1941, when the wartime tax agreements were signed. Unquestionably, the formulae put forward have some merit; undoubtedly, there are improvements over the fiscal arrangements made in 1947 and 1952; undoubtedly, many provinces will be compelled to enter into agreements with the federal government no matter what those agreements may be. They have no choice.

It will be recalled that after the first fiscal agreements were proposed many provinces held off for some time. Finally, however, most of them came in reluctantly and with complaints against the inadequacy of the agreements, which were demonstrated to be true as time went on. The complaints that have been made have been demonstrated to be true on each occasion and it is with that thought in mind that we should examine what is now before us.

Whether the provinces are compelled to enter into these agreements or not has nothing to do with whether these present proposals are satisfactory. Are they satisfactory in the minds of the provincial premiers and the representatives of the municipalities at this time? We know they are not. We know that right across Canada the strongest possible terms have been used to describe what may happen if the provincial governments and the municipalities are put in a financial straitjacket which will limit their ability to meet the mounting demands that lie before them. It can only be said that there may be no choice.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has told us that there were discussions. He has told us that government in a federation is not a simple process. It is not. It becomes increasingly difficult, however, if the rights of the provincial governments within that federal system are not fully recognized and that the dealings with those governments are not made on a basis of equality in whatever the allocated fields of responsibility are. It is not enough to admit in discussing the subject now before us that Canada is a federal state; it is not enough to repeat the tribal incantation that we believe in the federal system and that we are in fact children of a federation; it is not enough to say that we believe in the dividing of revenues that will balance the abilities of the governments to meet their responsibilities. The subject now before us is whether we really believe in the federal system sufficiently to do our utmost at this time to find real agreement with the provincial governments and with the municipalities which are very real entities indeed as to the allocation of taxes which will make it possible for them to carry out the heavy responsibilities which they cannot ignore and cannot shirk.

The true federal system admits that in their own fields the provincial governments have full authority over the responsibilities imposed upon them by our constitution. There are special reasons why the federal system must be conserved and strengthened in Canada. We have reasons of history; we have reasons which lie at the root of the very existence of one nation known as Canada here on the North American continent which cannot be ignored in discussing the solution of these problems. It is not only for reasons of history but also for reasons of geography that we must not merely give lip service to the idea of the federal system, but that we must do all within our power to vitalize that system, to give it living strength so that every government, federal, provincial and municipal, may meet the great and expanding responsibilities of the years of peace.

It was argued, and the argument was accepted by the provincial governments, that centralization became necessary during the years of war. Decentralization is equally necessary in years of peace. Decentralization is just as much a part of our federal system, and just as much a part in the needs of peace, as is the necessity of some measure of centralization to meet the compelling demands of war.

Mr. Harris: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: We are now at another point of adjustment resulting from the agreement made in 1941. All that we are now discussing goes back to what took place at that time under the terrible demands of war. At a time when that war was in its most critical stage, the provinces agreed without hesitation to vacate their traditional fields of direct taxation with a clear understanding, however, that this was only for the duration of the war, and that once the war was over their historic position would be restored without impairment. We must remind ourselves of that consideration which was in the minds of the provincial governments when they signed the agreements in 1941.

We have listened to the details which have been put before us. We have a table which interprets in figures many of those details in somewhat complex form. But it is not necessary, I submit, to go into those details now. I am sure there will be general approval of some of the principles accepted in what has already been done; I am sure there will be a general approval of the principle of equalization grants, whatever the actual formula may be, or whatever the adequacy of the grants may be. Something of that kind was recommended first in the Rowell-Sirois report. I say it was recommended in the Ontario proposals of 1946 to the conference, which was held that year, under the name of national adjustment grants. I mention that only to indicate that there has been general agreement for some time that the equalization of revenues in this country is necessary to make it possible for the less wealthy provinces of the country to give to the people of their provinces the local services that are the constitutional obligations of those governments, whether they be provincial or municipal governments.

The question before us is not whether the right method has been adopted, whether the formulae are the desirable methods to reach these conclusions; the question before us I submit, Mr. Chairman, is whether or not at this time there is evidence that these agreements will satisfactorily meet the demands which are actually now imposed upon the provincial governments and the municipal councils throughout Canada and particularly whether they will be adequate over the five-year period during which these agreements will operate. I think that is what we must ask ourselves.

We have statements from every part of Canada that the requirements will not be met. We have ahead of us not merely the crisis in education but we have before us various problems of the most urgent nature which are increasing in importance by leaps and bounds.

Mr. Blackmore: Hospitalization, for example.

Mr. Drew: Where in the whole of Canada today is there a single municipality that can say definitely it has been able to meet the demands for modern needs of roads and highways? Where is there a municipality in Canada today which would confidently say that under the proposals now before us they see the solution ahead of meeting the enormously increased demands for improved highways and roads which come from the rapidly increased number of automobiles in this country? Where is there a municipality in Canada today which sees in these proposals an adequate solution of hospitalization problems? We must remember that personal health is primarily the responsibility of the provincial governments, and in assisting the municipalities that come under our constitution it must be remembered that no matter what grants have been made or are contemplated by this government in the field of hospitalization or in health the main burden for anything that is done rests upon the provincial governments and the municipalities and will continue to do so.

We have the unqualified statement from municipality after municipality across Canada as well as from the provincial governments that these proposals will not make it possible for them to meet their needs even at the present level, let alone the rapidly mounting levels of the years immediately before us. Where is there a municipality in Canada today which is not having some problem with its supply of sewers and water supplies for any rapid housing development that may be taking place? Where is there a municipality in Canada that has been able to keep pace with the demands that we always regarded as normal in days gone by where houses went into new areas that had been opened up? It must be remembered that there will be an increased demand for the supply of water, sewers and electricity and all the other local facilities which are far closer and of more immediate need to the people than most of the things which come from this government and those needs can only be met by revenues which are not even contemplated in the proposals now before us.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) said that he is not even tempted to say that this is a solution. That is certainly an admission of the reality. The fact that he is not even tempted to say this is a solution is a recognition that in his mind this is only another makeshift. By now it should have been possible for us to find some solution for the situation which arose as a result of the wartime agreements of 1941. Ever since those first agreements came near their termination there has been a demand from all the provinces for a satisfactory solution of the difficulties that were inherent in those agreements once we returned to a period of peace. It was recognized from the very beginning that those agreements were only makeshift and now in the admission of the Minister of Finance that he is not even tempted to suggest that this is a solution we have the bald declaration of the government that in 1957 there is going to be another makeshift for something that should have been solved long ago through the joint consideration of these governments.

We are now asked to go ahead with an arrangement which the government admits is a makeshift. We are asked to say it is expedient to adopt another makeshift at this time. We are asked to say that even after these long years the government has not yet been able to sit down and thrash out this subject to a point where we can hope to have some satisfactory solution that will prepare us for the years of peace. The agreements of 1941 were for war; we want agreements now for the years of peace, agreements which will work, agreements which will make it possible to ease the tax burden of the local taxpayer on his home, his business and his rental in a way that will make us better able to meet the keen competition we now face throughout the world.

We have seen something of what the dangers of inflation really are in the statements that have been made in the United Kingdom just within the past few days. Let us not blind our eyes to the fact that one of the gravest dangers we face in Canada is inflation based upon an excessive burden of taxes at the various stages at which taxes are imposed. Certainly unnecessarily high taxes are inflationary and not deflationary. They do not keep down the inflation and instead they add to the pressures of inflation because if taxes are unnecessarily high, as they are in many municipalities today, they have inevitably increased the needs of every individual for the amount that will be received for the purpose of meeting those taxes and to a point this contributes to the inflationary spiral. There are many other factors, of course, and I am not suggesting for a moment that there are not, and all these must be considered. But certainly in this competitive world the effect of taxation on our competitive position is one which we must not ignore.

What has happened in this case is unhappily typical of what has happened on other occasions. It illustrates the unfitness of this government to govern. The Minister of Finance has told us that there were meetings from time to time starting on April 26 of last year and then finally coming to a meeting on March 9 of this year. That should never have been dignified with the name of "conference". All that amounted to was that this government called the provincial premiers together for one day so that they might be told what this government was prepared to do. That is not a conference in any meaning of the word "conference". It is certainly not the type of conference that accepts in fact or in principle the relation of the federal and provincial governments or the place of the provincial governments under that system. It was said by more than one provincial premier that this was no conference at all. It was said that they could just as well have stayed away and been told by a letter what this government was prepared to do.

Once again it was a case of "take it or leave it". I know the Minister of Finance shrugs his shoulders.

Mr. Harris: No, he shrugs them in denial.

Mr. Drew: He indicates that he does not agree with this. It certainly was "take it or leave it". Of course, he has used the very misleading suggestion that the provinces are quite free to go ahead and tax without any effect upon their position under agreements or otherwise. That is all right, if people are satisfied with double taxation. But what should be attempted now is not a makeshift but an arrangement that will avoid double taxation in Canada. This is not a case of avoiding double taxation in future. There should have been a real attempt to avoid double taxation which exists today. There would not be double taxation if the arrangements were in fact adequate for the needs of our provincial and municipal governments. There was none of the real spirit of confederation in that meeting; that was made perfectly clear by the statements that were made by the provincial premiers after they left. That criticism came from every part of Canada. Just over a week ago, the four Atlantic provinces made it abundantly clear that these proposals do not meet their expected requirements. Those provinces met and emphasized their need for greater revenues than will be available to them under these proposals if they are to carry out their responsibilities either under the provincial governments or through the municipalities, and particularly if they are to give to the Atlantic provinces the various rights of improvements that were contemplated in confederation itself.

As one who lives in one of the central provinces, may I say that a full recognition of the moral obligation due to the Atlantic provinces—and that includes Newfoundland as well as the three maritime provinces—and a just arrangement with those provinces is long overdue, merely as a recognition of what was said at the time when those provinces came into confederation. I am not going to quote the various statements that were made; it is not necessary. Every hon. member knows the extent to which those premiers went in emphasizing the urgency of their needs. Everyone who has gone through those provinces and has seen the need for improvement in many communities throughout those provinces knows that a recognition of their needs is something that is very urgent within this federal system of ours. Nor is it merely the Atlantic provinces that require recognition. The province of Saskatchewan has not benefited to the extent that many other provinces have. But it not only concerns those provinces whose average income is well below that of the more fortunate provinces from the financial point of view; it is also true that in the provinces with large financial revenues it has been pointed out that these proposals will not meet their demands, and it has been said that, with the pyramiding responsibilities of the municipal governments, we may well reach a disastrous position within the five years that the arrangements now before us would run.

As I said before, whilst there is no need to argue this in detail, one inescapable fact does emerge. These proposals are not satisfactory to the provinces. They are regarded as inadequate by the provinces. If they are regarded as inadequate for their needs now, they will be hopelessly inadequate for their needs five years from now. Not long ago the Minister of Finance used these words:

> We cannot at this time make any further material concessions that would adversely affect our revenues.

The government speaks of concessions. Actually there is no question of concessions involved. Under our own federal system, the only source of revenue available to the provinces is in the field of direct taxation. The most important of those taxes are, of course, the personal income and corporation taxes. Without arguing as to whether or not the provinces have a prior moral claim in those fields, the fact obviously remains that, since the British North America Act gives to the provinces only the field of direct taxation to carry out their tremendous responsibilities, and since those fields alone are available to the municipalities which do most of the things that are directly felt by the people themselves, then we must consider what the situation is in regard to these taxes and the need of the provinces in regard to those fields. Certainly, whether or not they have the prior claim, at least their moral claim is equal in those fields. They must have a right to levy such taxes as they actually require in the only field open to them, without the added burden of double taxation being imposed upon the taxpayers of this country.

There is no question of concession involved, either in meeting the demands of the Atlantic provinces or in meeting the demands of the other provinces. All that these claims are based upon is the legitimate need of the provinces and the municipalities, based upon the burdens which they cannot escape under our constitution.

The claim of the federal government that it is unable to make any better arrangements comes strangely at a time when we hear reports that there is likely to be a surplus well in excess of half a billion dollars during the current year. Where does that surplus come from? It comes from the very taxes which in earlier days were regarded as provincial taxes and concerning which the provinces and the municipalities certainly have as high a moral claim as the federal government itself. Whether or not the sums that are raised by the new proposals are higher is not the point. It is whether they are adequate or not. Whether or not the surplus reaches the figures that have been predicted, certain it is that there is going to be some large surplus at a time that this government claims inability to make any better arrangements with the provinces for their needs.

It is necessary at this time to recall the basis on which the provinces vacated these fields in the early part of the war. There are hon. members in the house who remember very well the basis upon which these arrangements were made. In his budget speech on April 29, 1941, announcing the details of the agreement which had been made, the then minister of finance said, as found at page 2345 of Hansard:

> I should like to emphasize that this is not an attempt to get the provinces out of these tax fields permanently.

The agreements which were signed at that time also offer explanations of some of the understandings that existed. In the agreements then signed between those provinces of Canada which did sign agreements with the federal government these words are to be found after a general statement in regard to the agreements. The federal government undertook in the year after the termination of the agreements:

> . . . to reduce its rate of taxes by such an amount as will enable the province again to use the income tax and corporation tax fields and in particular the dominion undertakes to reduce its rate of tax on corporation incomes by at least 10 per cent of such incomes.

That was intended to be done within the first year after the termination of hostilities, a period which would be required for the readjustment. What was intended? Many of us know what was intended because some of us actually were present at the discussions which took place. It was intended that the rights of the provinces and municipalities would be respected and preserved. It was intended that the provinces and municipalities would have their positions in these tax fields restored without diminution. That did not mean as to the dollars and cents that were involved. It meant as to principle as well, and I mean "principle" spelled p-r-i-n-c-i-p-l-e. It meant that the place of the provinces in those fields would be fully recognized. What is more, it said that in particular the federal government would reduce its rate of taxation on corporation incomes by at least 10 per cent. That was not merely a declaration that they would reduce it. It was intended that this would avoid double taxation and would permit the provinces to enter that field to that extent.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no such statement.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration interjects that there was no such statement. There certainly were statements to that effect.

Mr. Pickersgill: When the wartime tax agreements were made?

Mr. Drew: I happen to have had the privilege of attending the discussions that preceded these arrangements, and I know perfectly well what the statements were that were made.

Mr. Harris: Would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question? By way of interpretation of what he read in connection with those agreements, how does he come to the conclusion that it meant no double taxation if all the federal government agreed to do was to vacate the field to the extent he has described?

Mr. Drew: It was perfectly clear. Before the war there had been arrangements under which certain of the provinces were imposing taxes, and that was in the mind of those who were arranging the agreements at that time. It was understood that immediately afterwards those provinces that wished to do so would again impose taxes and that the federal government would carry out the arrangements which it carried out before the war with respect to collecting those taxes up to the amount imposed by the provinces and without double taxation. That was the simple and clear understanding at that time.

Mr. Harris: Is that not what the present bill does?

Mr. Drew: This bill does not meet the situation because the minister knows perfectly well that at this time there is already double taxation in some of these fields. He knows that it has been made clear that under these arrangements it is certain that there will be further double taxation. My point is that these fields are fields in which the provinces have just as high a moral right and the governments of the provinces, within the realm of their own constitutional jurisdiction, have just as much right to be recognized in their ability to determine what is needed as has the federal government itself.

Mr. Pickersgill: No one has ever denied that.

Mr. Drew: I am very glad to hear that announcement for the first time. If it is not denied, then there is support for the argument I am making that the present proposals are unsatisfactory. If the statement made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is correct, then I submit it is perfectly clear that when we are told by certain provincial premiers that double taxation will be the result of this situation most certainly there should be a pause and there should be an opportunity to get together and to really analyse what will be done.

I know the arguments that can be made, Mr. Chairman, about corporation taxes. The simple fact remains that what is called the abatement in the corporation tax field is 9 per cent and not even the 10 per cent that was stated in principle as being the very starting point, the minimum that was to come within a year after the war. To the extent that that was only a minimum at a time when the needs were not comparable in any way with the needs of today, the federal government is in default in principle even in relation to what was promised that long ago. Certainly this statement would have been meaningless if it only suggested that the provinces could go ahead and levy taxes and create double taxation because they could have done that at any time. There was never any uncertainty about that. The very fact that they can supports my point that there was a clear understanding that the percentage then indicated was a percentage which was to avoid double taxation.

Mr. Harris: You mean that if a province feels it ought to have anywhere up to 100 per cent of a particular field we would have to vacate it to that extent to avoid double taxation.

Mr. Drew: That statement is just as absurd—

Mr. Harris: It is not absurd, not a bit.

Mr. Drew: —as the suggestion that the federal government has the right to occupy it up to 100 per cent. It is just as absurd as to say that the federal government has the right to say that it will occupy it up to 90 per cent of all taxes collected in that field, and that is what it is saying now.

Mr. Harris: Oh, no.

Mr. Drew: That is exactly what it is saying. This government is saying: Here are fields of taxation only open to the provinces and yet we are taking it on ourselves to say how much of the taxes collected will be collected by the federal government unless there is to be double taxation. It is an utter absurdity to suggest that the provinces of this country would make 100 per cent collection of the amounts now collected in income taxes and corporation taxes. It is an utter absurdity. The very fact that an absurdity of that kind is put forward indicates the weakness and the fallacy of the present position of the federal government when it takes it upon itself to say: Here is how far we say we should go. We say we have a prior moral claim up to 90 per cent of all the taxes collected in the income tax and corporation tax field. That is what they are saying. Who gave them that right in a field of taxation that is the only field open to the provincial governments with all these heavy obligations with regard to hospitalization, highway construction and all the other things that they must do to carry out their obligations to the people?

It should be realized, Mr. Chairman, what happens when these various things are done. Where does all this money come from? Mainly from enterprises which are organized with the assistance of the provincial and municipal governments. Where do the corporation taxes come from? They come from corporations which, the moment they locate, must have light, water, sewerage, educational facilities nearby and roads and highways to them. These things all must be provided by the provinces, in the case of mining, forest and other operations of that kind. These things must be provided by the municipalities in many cases. These are the things that must be provided in order to make it possible for the revenue to be earned by these great corporations. Where do personal incomes come from? The larger incomes come from people who are engaged mainly in activities which also find their support from the provincial and municipal governments. If there is any question of a prior moral claim in relation to these taxes, the prior moral claim rests with the provincial governments and in turn with the municipalities operating under them.

As each ratepayer in the municipalities looks at this tax bill now, let him recognize the fact that with the growth that is taking place or should take place in those less fortunate areas there would come, even under these proposals, rapidly increasing taxes that will in fact assume crushing proportions within the life of this agreement. It is for that reason that it has been said by those who speak on behalf of the provinces that the consequences of this agreement can be disastrous if it is carried forward on this basis.

The Minister of Finance has spoken about the fact that there are pressures to get into fields that are not ordinarily occupied by the federal government. In the light of what has been said by the provincial premiers and of what has been said by the Canadian mayors and reeves association, it is clear that within the life of this agreement there will be further demands made upon this government which should not be made at all if there were a proper adjustment of taxes.

Recognizing the fact that there is a steady swing of population from the rural areas to the urban areas, and recognizing these mounting demands to which I have referred and which are going to produce not merely a crisis in education but also a crisis in highway construction and in the construction of many other services that are needed, I submit that before a bill of this kind goes forward we should have a real understanding between the provinces and this government, and that we should not be asked to put into rigid form something which, by some of the provinces, is described as a strait-jacket. The position of the municipal taxpayer, of the home owner whom we should encourage, may well be disastrous under these proposals if the predictions of those best able to interpret their needs are in fact borne out by events.

The time is long overdue for a real examination of this question and an allocation of taxes which will take the load off the home owner and the municipal taxpayer. From provincial governments of different political complexions comes the same statement, namely that the present proposals will not make it possible for them either to meet their needs or to assure adequate revenues to the municipalities. The Minister of Finance has made it clear that this is just another stop-gap.

This is a time when we should have a real solution of this problem. The governments of the provinces and the governments of the municipalities as well agreed to centralization for war. Let us now make a declaration of decentralization for peace which will make it possible for the provincial governments and the municipalities to carry out their full role under our federal system, and in the light of our rapidly mounting burdens. A government that fails to seek a solution of this problem and puts this matter into rigid statutory form before there has been approval is a government that is unfit to govern. I urge this government, even at this state, to withhold this resolution and to seek a real conference with the provincial governments at which there would also be representatives of the municipalities which are very real entities at this time, and to seek a solution for the years of peace that will make it possible for Canada to grow in the way it should. None of these great developments take place in a vacuum. All these developments take place in areas where their primary concern must be the assistance given by the municipal or provincial governments. As we look with confidence to the future; as we recognize the unparalleled opportunities of Canada at this time; as we recognize the bright prospects before our own people, let us ask—yes, let us demand—that the government have a real conference, not just a meeting where the premiers will be told what they are going to be allowed to have, and that there be worked out a lasting solution—and not merely a stop-gap—under which our federal system will grow and prosper in all its strength.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, in participating in the discussion of this resolution I think if I were to choose, as the clergy do on Sunday, a text for the view that I want to express this afternoon, I would find it in a paragraph of the Saskatchewan brief at page 82 of the transcript. The premier of Saskatchewan said this:

> We cannot look with equanimity on any possible return to all the pitfalls of unrestrained tax competition, double taxation, and overlapping collection machinery . . . this conference must be sure that the federal government does not lose the effective control it can now exercise over the income tax fields so important in combatting depression and maintaining high levels of employment . . . We fear that the plan the federal government seems to favour could seriously weaken the ability of the national government to carry out essential fiscal measures.

That, I think, pretty well summarizes the view that we take of the proposals that I believe are envisaged by this resolution.

Mr. Blackmore: From what document is the hon. member reading?

Mr. Coldwell: From the transcript of evidence of the premier, the Saskatchewan brief to the conference, at page 82.

This morning, the Leader of the Opposition told us about what happened in Germany during the Weimar republic, which was largely destroyed because the federal authority was dependent upon the German states which comprised the Weimar republic. In looking at this matter under discussion, I think we have to bear in mind how, when confederation was achieved, certain rights were given to the provinces in the constitution of our country. Those rights dealt with certain fields of taxation. But we must not overlook that the fathers of confederation in their wisdom, and I believe in their wisdom as time has passed, decided that this parliament should have the right to enter any field of taxation to meet the needs of our country as they might arise in the future.

It seems to me that we have to keep that in our minds because over the years the responsibilities of the federal authority have grown almost year by year. If we could vacate the fields of taxation which we have assumed, and which were also delegated to the provinces by the British North America Act—I immediately say I think no one is considering this completely—then, we should have to consider how we could curtail the expenditures of this federal parliament, and curtail them very drastically indeed. I am not minimizing the difficulties of either the provinces or the municipalities, particularly in certain fields, such as the field of education, which was emphasized this morning. I believe, in fact, and we in this party believe, that without interfering in any particular with the control of education by the provincial authorities, this parliament of Canada should be making grants and assuming a very large responsibility for the encouragement of education in this country.

It is quite true that, in the competition in which we are now engaged, and likely to be engaged for a number of years, with nations organized along lines different from ours, with nations that are determined if they can to equal and surpass the highest level of activity and progress of the western democratic nations, fundamental to our meeting that competition is that we shall have the finest educational facilities that are available to us. Quite obviously with the present levels of revenues to the provincial governments, they cannot achieve or maintain those educational levels which are essential. The same thing applies, as again we were reminded this morning, to the particular field of highway construction. In recent times the automobile and the truck have together made it inevitable that this country shall provide, somehow or other, first class transportation facilities in the nature of highways. If they are to be uniform, if they are to be of a proper type to serve the entire country from coast to coast, then more and more I believe this federal authority will have to assume a greater responsibility for that facility.

So it seems to me that, in discussing the bill that will be placed before us and which will receive more detailed study of course on second reading and in the committee, we have to keep constantly in mind that today the people of Canada look to the federal authority for more and more assistance in a number of fields, and particularly two or three of them. I have mentioned a couple, but of course there is too the very important field of national health.

Well, now, what it seems to me to be is this. In this resolution and in the bill which will follow, the latest taxation proposals by the federal government mark the end in reality of the policy adopted several years ago of encouraging tax rental agreements as we have understood them. I might say this to the government. In at least two successive general elections the party of the government defended the tax rental agreements, and particularly defended them on the prairies and in the maritimes and alleged that the official opposition, at least given the opportunity, might seek to destroy these agreements.

It seems to me that in these recent days, and under the proposals which we now have, the present government have committed the very crime they warned that others would commit. I think the government has made a retreat from the position which it has taken since the end of the war. It is true that the tax rental agreements are still available as part of the new fiscal proposals. The proposed tax rental agreements are the ones which differ in kind as well as in degree from those at present available. Behind the tax rental agreements signed in 1952 lay this, I think, very important assumption, that all provinces contributed to the national income which however might, for reasons of geography and other factors, be more concentrated in taxable form in some provinces than in others. Accordingly, under these agreements, it was recognized that a fair rental of these taxation fields would have to take into account the revenues that a province might raise if national income were distributed.

Now, the new tax rental agreements at least—perhaps when the bill is before us we shall be able to see this more clearly or perhaps have the question I have in mind more or less refuted—take an entirely different view of the nature of Canada's national income. Income is now regarded as being earned entirely within the province —and that was an argument made before lunch today—and the tax rental is thus restricted to the amount that certain standard taxes might yield if imposed by the provinces. There is, I think, a long-run danger to be found in these new proposals. The equalization payments, by their very nature not available to the wealthiest provinces, like Ontario, will look to the people of that province like a subsidy which others get and which they are going to pay for.

This is the wrong attitude of course, but it is there and will be powerfully reinforced I think as time goes on and may invite powerful opposition to taxation policies that recognize the fiscal need of the various separate provinces. Under the 1952 and earlier tax rental agreements the payments named to be made as equalization payments were included in the tax rentals. Under the arrangement it was much more difficult to sustain a charge of subsidy to the poorer provinces. Therefore, in adopting their new policy the federal government risks calling forth a greater degree of recrimination and misunderstanding among the provinces than has been the case since the relief payments of the 1930's. I think one of the values of the former tax rental agreements was that they minimized the amount of recrimination and misunderstanding that might otherwise have been in evidence. Consequently, this bears the mark of the beginning of the end of the fiscal foundation under the 1945 green book proposals which, as I recollect, at the time were welcomed on all sides of the house, and which followed a report which was universally regarded in this country as an outstanding report after very long inquiry, and a report which might guide Canada in her taxation and other policies over the next 10, 20, 30 or more years.

This statement is to be found in the proposals of the government of Canada of 1945 in the green book proposals at page 52:

To do these things fully—

I shall say more about those 1945 green book proposals in a moment. I continue:

—and without destroying the federal system, the dominion government considers that it should have full and exclusive freedom to tax personal and corporate income and estates so that the restrictive effects of double and competitive taxation may be avoided and so that income earned and wealth accumulated nationally can be fully and efficiently taxed for national purposes and the mutual advantage of all provinces.

That was indeed a very important statement of federal government policy at the time. It seems to me that these high principles have now been abandoned and the ability of the federal government to use fiscal policies for the general welfare and in avoiding recessions and depressions has, under the proposals now before us, been very tragically weakened, to put it mildly. It must not be forgotten either that the proposal of the government of Canada to the dominion-provincial conference on reconstruction in 1945 included more than the fiscal arrangements encompassed in the tax rental agreements. The terms on which the federal government asked the provinces to lease to it certain tax fields included not only rental payments but undertakings by the federal government to do things that would ease the financial burdens on the provincial governments. And, as we have heard it said already today, the financial burdens on the provincial governments and on the municipalities over the last 10 or 15 years have become pretty well unbearable. Consequently, what was said in 1945 must be remembered when we are discussing the new proposals at the present time.

What were those former proposals, other than fiscal proposals? They were these: one, assuming complete responsibilities for old age pensions from age 70, without a means test, and by contributing half of the cost of old age assistance for persons aged 65 to 69. It may be said that the government has done that. As I shall show in a few moments, while ostensibly the government did do that, the inflationary period through which we have gone has compelled the various provinces to make supplementary payments to the old age pensioners to improve their lot, or to provide them with free medical and other care.

Mr. Knight: Both.

Mr. Coldwell: Or both together as in Saskatchewan, as the hon. member for Saskatoon says, which, in effect, is placing upon the provinces a further burden in connection with old age pensions that was not contemplated in 1945.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure the hon. member wants to be fair. Will he permit a question? Is it not true that the rate of old age pensions now in effect is 33 per cent higher than that contemplated in the green book?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, I quite agree. I can accept that, but let me say to my hon. friend that the cost of living has gone far beyond 33⅓ per cent over what it was in 1945.

Mr. Knowles: One hundred per cent higher.

Mr. Coldwell: Very much higher in actual fact; I am not going to argue about the percentage because it is a rather dangerous thing to do. Two: by assuming responsibility for assistance to the employable unemployed. That promise has not been fulfilled yet. Three: by introducing a system of health insurance giving complete coverage for all. That was an undertaking in connection with the 1945 green book proposals, and we have not seen it inplemented to any great extent, although, of course, the government might argue that the hospitalization plans and so on, as Mr. King said when they were introduced, were steps toward a national health plan. Four: a public investment policy to compensate for fluctuations in private investment and employment. Of course, we have not that.

Now, it will be remembered that when in the past this parliament has been urged to proceed with these undertakings we have always been told, yes, these undertakings were made but they have to wait, they have to be preceded by certain dominion-provincial taxation and other agreements.

Since 1945 federal expenditures have increased by 5·5 per cent. Of course I say immediately, to be fair, that the high expenditures of the wartime were in the 1945 period, but our expenditures for defence now have brought us up to within a measurable distance of what they were in 1945. Provincial expenditures have increased by 291·9 per cent and municipal expenditures by 276 per cent. This failure of the federal government to implement fully its 1945 proposals has resulted in the heavy pressure from some of the provinces for a revision of federal-provincial tax arrangement that is now taking place and which we are going to discuss under the bill when it is before us.

Let us take the 1945 proposals one by one. I have already referred to old age pensions, but I shall refer to them again. The assumption of complete responsibility for old age pensions from age 70 without a means test. In 1951 old age security payments of $40 a month—the government, of course, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has interjected, offered $30 in 1945—financed completely by the federal government were made available to all. But since that time the government has allowed the cost of living so to increase, in spite of the representations of some of us on this side of the house, that the real value of the old age security payments has been substantially reduced in terms of buying or purchasing power. This has brought severe hardship to many of the old age pensioners of this country and many provincial governments have felt it necessary to provide additional assistance in the form of supplementary payments, to which I have already referred, free medical hospital benefits and other forms of aid, as well as, in some provinces, a supplementary actual cash payment. Thus, the government in its general economic policy, by permitting the spiral of inflation in the post-war years, has reduced the burden of its commitments to old age pensioners by over one-third and has since put the responsibility for carrying that additional burden upon the provinces—at least, some provinces have assumed a part of that additional burden.

Let there be no mistake about it. The words were clear and explicit, and I shall read from page 51 of the green book proposals of the government in 1945:

> The dominion's assumption of complete responsibility for old age pensions—

I underline the word "complete".

> —from age 70 would relieve the provincial governments of an expenditure which has been growing and which will continue to increase rapidly in the future as the proportion of old people in the population rises.

The government's failure to live up to its full responsibility in this matter has meant that again the provincial governments are being called upon to bear a larger part of what the report calls "an expenditure which has been growing and which will continue to increase rapidly in the future." In fact, as I have said, some of the provinces are paying to old age pensioners over the age of 70 more than 25 per cent of the total amount of pensions than they had been required to pay before the Old Age Security Act came into effect. We say that the federal government must fulfil its responsibilities in the matter of old age pensions and provide for their payment at a level sufficient to maintain an adequate standard of living for the senior citizens of this country in order that the provinces can be relieved of this financial expenditure as they can legitimately expect to be in view of the government's statements in 1945. Secondly, the federal government proposed to accept responsibility for assistance to the unemployed employables. The federal government pointed out in 1945—and again I am quoting from the green book—that:

> The dominion's assumption of responsibility for unemployment assistance would relieve provincial and municipal governments of a potential burden which in the past has constituted the most important single threat to real provincial autonomy. It has been a burden which grew in weight as provincial ability to carry it declined. In the past it has necessitated harsh reductions in essential services, harsh tax increases, and in the majority of cases also dependence on special grants or loans from the dominion.

In addition, the government pledged that:

> . . . as rapidly as possible the Unemployment Insurance Act will be widened to embrace all employed persons.

Then, too, there has been a failure on the part of the federal government to introduce a comprehensive system of health insurance and this has forced some of the provinces at least to increasingly heavy expenditures in that field. I see that the hon. member for Rosthern is in his seat. He will recall very well that in 1945, I think it was, a bill was actually drafted although never formally introduced in this house but reported I believe in the report of the committee of which he was the chairman for the establishment of a national health insurance plan.

Mr. Knowles: 1944.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; I have been corrected. 1944. There is the failure, too, of the federal government to participate to the extent necessary in the heavy capital expenditures that have been required for various public development projects. We have had several debates this session dealing with that matter and therefore I do not propose to elaborate on it. And now, in addition to the needs which the 1945 green book proposals were designed to meet, there is the almost overwhelming problem of the costs of education and the need for federal financial assistance to meet those costs.

I also think that a policy of de-emphasizing the tax rental agreement brings in its train the hazards of the inequity and complexities of double taxation. I think that danger exists. The federal government has very quickly forgotten the lesson of the twenties and thirties. The Rowell-Sirois commission dealt with this matter. I am not going to read the three long paragraphs that I copied out with a view to putting them on the record because my time is running on, but I am going to refer the minister to the Rowell-Sirois report, page 111, where he will find the recommendations dealing with this problem of double taxation.

In respect to corporation taxes, a major criticism by the Rowell-Sirois commission was the—> . . . inevitable inequity, lack of uniformity, and lack of efficiency arising from the divided jurisdiction—

—in the realm of corporation taxation. In commenting on succession duties, the commission had this to say; and I am going to read this paragraph because it is shorter than the others. It said:

> This legal situation has led to great unfairness and inequality in the amount of tax exacted from estates of the same size and bequeathed to beneficiaries bearing the same degree of relationship to the decedent. One estate having assets only in the province in which the decedent was domiciled and passing to beneficiaries within that province will be taxed only once; another estate of the same value having assets in several provinces will be taxed by each province on the assets locally situate within it, and will be taxed on a second time on the transmission of the property to the beneficiaries in the province in which they reside. It is plainly inequitable that two similar estates within the same province should be taxed substantially different amounts because assets of the same value are held in different forms.

May I point out that the wealth of Canada, which is the basis of all our taxation, is produced nationally. I want to repeat that. The wealth of Canada is in the final analysis produced nationally but the distribution of it person by person, industry by industry, region by region is often inequitable. As a matter of fact, there is a state of chronic inequity and this is shown particularly clearly in the regional distribution of income in this country. I will put on the record a short table. It is table No. 3 from the federal-provincial conference proceedings of October 3, 1955.

Per Capita Personal Income By Province

Province	$
Newfoundland	638
Prince Edward Island	648
Nova Scotia	917
New Brunswick	795
Quebec	1,052
Ontario	1,470
Manitoba	1,085
Saskatchewan	867
Alberta	1,152
British Columbia	1,435

The average for all of Canada is $1,193.

Now, it is clear that the provinces with the lower personal incomes would have a greater difficulty in providing the same standard of services that other provinces enjoy. Either one or both of two things will happen. Either in order to provide the same standards the tax burden will become much heavier in the provinces with the lower income or the standard of public services will be lowered. I think that both might, and indeed would, happen. In any event there would be inequality for Canadian citizens resident in various parts of Canada.

I have another table dealing with the burden of provincial and municipal taxation province by province in 1953 but I am not going to deal with it; I may deal with it in the subsequent debate. But I do want to say that the problem we are facing in relation to this matter is, first of all, how best we can allocate to the various provinces sufficient funds in order that they may maintain a proper level all across Canada of services to people resident in those provinces. I do not think that can be done if we say that this parliament should vacate in any degree the taxation fields that are necessary to give to this parliament the revenues which we can reallocate across the country to bring about a reasonable level of equity from one end of Canada to the other. What I have been afraid of, as I have observed various discussions over the past few years in connection with this problem, is that more and more the government has retreated from the position it took several years ago. I am not going into the reasons for that this afternoon because they have been discussed in this house on several occasions but I have been interested in political developments in Canada long enough to know that we have had various proposals made from time to time regarding taxation in the various parts of Canada.

I remember, of course, how before the war we were told from time to time that, after all, the provinces could not be expected to assume these large responsibilties because in reality they were considered by the fathers of confederation to be little more than glorified municipal councils. I have never taken that centralist view. On the other hand, we have also heard it said that we were overgoverned, that the time had come when we should try to consolidate, for example, the three prairie provinces into one regional area with one government for the three provinces, or the three maritime provinces before Newfoundland came in, in the same degree. I do not believe that is feasible. It might have been feasible at the time of confederation, though I very much doubt that from the debate that took place at the time. It might have been feasible in western Canada perhaps prior to the autonomy act; I do not know. But I do know that such a proposition is not feasible at the present time.

Yet we are witnessing in our country a development of our economy where a few provinces may become richer and richer and, on the other hand, other provinces may become relatively at least poorer and poorer. This federal authority will be the authority that somehow or other will have to accumulate the necessary funds to redistribute across Canada so that the people, for example, in the maritime provinces may enjoy the same social services and the same standards of service as are enjoyed say, in the province of British Columbia, the province of Ontario or elsewhere in this country.

It is true that our natural resources are under the control of the provinces and, because some provinces are more richly endowed than others, their revenues will tend to increase out of all proportion to the revenues in the provinces where the natural resources are not varied and are not great. Accordingly any federal-provincial arrangement that depends in whole or in part on a re-allocation of taxing fields solely to the provinces will inevitably lead to the most pernicious of inequities as far as some of the provinces are concerned. That is the point I want to make.

The tax rental agreements, like the proposed equalization payments, have endeavoured to equalize the revenues realized in the corporation income tax, personal income tax and succession duty fields, and to that extent they are worthy of support. That is all to the good. However, not only are the revenues from those fields in need of equalizing. Tax yields generally in provinces like the maritimes are less satisfactory, and, in order to make the tax burden throughout Canada more equitable and in order to broaden the opportunities to Canadians wherever they may live, a distribution to the provinces of national income on the basis of fiscal need is essential. If that distribution to the provinces of national income on the basis of fiscal need is essential, then I think it follows that the federal authority must have the means of raising the required money to redistribute to the provinces of Canada.

We in this group are critical of the retreat of the government from the 1945 green book proposals and we regret very much that over the years they have receded from the position that seems to be inherent in the attitude of governments of the past and to have given colour to the more recent idea that this country is merely a collection of sovereign states when as a matter of fact it is the creation of the parliament of the United Kingdom under the British North America Act. The allocation of certain powers was made under that act, not by agreement among the provinces, as is sometimes falsely alleged, not by agreement among sovereign states, but by an act of parliament based on certain resolutions that were passed by a conference which had no standing in a legal sense, for the resolutions were never approved by the legislatures of some of the provinces which came into confederation in 1867 or afterwards.

Consequently, we have to beware lest we are led into what I believe to be a wrong attitude in relation to these problems of assuming that what this parliament is actually dealing with are sovereign states which have certain prior fiscal claims and that we must always accept the allegation that they are indeed prior claims. We do not accept that view. We accept the view that Canada is a nation and that, as a nation, it has national responsibilities. If it has national responsibilities, it assumes national obligations, and in order to fulfil those responsibilities or those obligations assumed it must have the power and the necessary financial authority to carry out a national program. That national program surely involves that every Canadian citizen, whether he lives in one part of Canada or another, should have a certain equality and right in the social services and the same standards of social and other security to which every citizen of this country should be entitled.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, with a good deal of what has been said by the speakers in this debate I am sure that we in this corner can find ourselves substantially in agreement. With a good deal of what has been said by the leader of the C.C.F. group, I am afraid we would have to take issue. In the course of what I shall say this afternoon in connection with the resolution now before us, I shall point out one or two of those more important things upon which we have to differ from my hon. friend, the leader of the C.C.F.

I turn now to the resolution. The language of the resolution that we are discussing today is like a velvet glove on a mailed fist. The language is bland and considerate and it makes it appear that the federal government is generous and thoughtful in its dealings with the provinces. But underneath a number of very dulcet phrases such as "the minister may pay to a province out of the consolidated revenue fund", "tax equalization payment", "provincial revenue stabilization payment" and "tax rental agreement as an alternative to levying such taxes on its own behalf"—as I say, under these, which I am sure are dulcet phrases to the provinces—there is to be found by careful study evidence of a surprisingly hard and uncompromising attitude on the part of the government of Canada.

I thoroughly agree with what has already been said in this debate to the effect that certain principles enunciated in the resolution are good and must carry a good deal of comfort to those provinces which have not had a reasonable deal ever since the days of confederation and where, as my hon. friend from Rosetown-Biggar has pointed out, there is the need for equalization payments. Recognition of that need is set out in the resolution, and we agree that recognition of the principle of equalization grants is something that has been long overdue and is something with which we must agree. So there are some things in the resolution that we regard as good; and we are pleased to see the government's acceptance of the principles contained in those phrases about which I have spoken briefly.

If we were to judge solely by the resolution that is before us and by what the Minister of Finance said in his speech this morning we would doubtless have to agree that this government was trying to be fair and just in its dealings with the provinces. There is nothing in the wording of the resolution itself to which anybody could take strong exception. If all were as smooth and well in the field of dominion-provincial relations as the resolution seems to make it appear then we could pass the resolution quickly, take care of the bill very quickly and get off home for at least a token summer holiday.

Unfortunately the resolution itself is misleading, and when we get into a careful study of the government's proposals to the provinces, proposals which will be embodied in detail in the bill to follow the resolution, we find that all is not well. There is widespread dissatisfaction amongst the provinces of this country. When we consider the details of the government's proposition in the light of all the circumstances and conditions we find them most unrealistic, and practically every province looks upon them in the same way.

That would be serious enough but there is much more to make the provinces very unhappy about the whole situation. The provinces think that the federal government is trying to ram a new formula for taxation and revenue division down their throats without taking the time and making the effort to work out in conference with them a formula which will be acceptable and much more realistic in its concept. I have talked to quite a number of people from the provinces, and without a single exception that is the attitude which they have all had.

Many of the provinces believed that when the federal government called them together something over a year ago, I believe a year ago last April, to consider extension of the tax rental agreements or some suitable alternative, as well as other important matters, the conferences would continue in intermittent session until a satisfactory settlement of the most important of the financial and taxation problems outstanding between the provinces and the federal government had been worked out and agreed to. I think they are entitled to this belief. There was nothing to indicate, when they were first called together over a year ago, that they would be called together, that they would draw up an agenda for a later conference, that the conference would take place and that at that conference a proposition would be put before them and then they would be dismissed to consider whether or not they would accept it. I think, as I said, that they were entitled to believe that they would be called together and perhaps would meet intermittently until an agreement had been reached amongst them.

However, as I say, they have been sorely disappointed. Instead of continuing in conference the federal government peremptorily put a proposition before the provinces and as much as said to them, "take it or leave it". I agree with the Leader of the Opposition when he said this morning that the way the provinces look upon this thing is that it is a take it or leave it proposition. They have had no alternative. This government has declared time and again, especially at election time, that they are promoters of unity and architects of smoothly working, successful federal union. But, Mr. Chairman, their attitude as expressed in the proposals they made to the dominion-provincial conference of October last, and in what they are obviously trying to do by asking us now to pass this measure at this time, cannot be considered as promoting unity or building a nation of happy, co-operative provinces.

The provincial governments almost 100 per cent consider that this measure is a breach of faith, and so some of them have told me. I believe I am correct in saying that they consider the "take it or leave it" attitude of the government is not the basis for a smoothly working confederation. As a matter of fact, persisting in the attitude adopted by the government today will not only wreck confederation but will make for serious disunity and, what is most serious, will result in a most objectionable measure of centralization of power and authority far removed from the individual citizen in this country, a centralization that is completely foreign to what the fathers of confederation had in mind. To pursue this whole matter of settlement of tax fields and revenue sources as it is now being pursued by this government can, in the minds of the provinces and their governments, result in tearing up the British North America Act.

I said that the government's proposition is unrealistic and niggardly. I am going to suggest four reasons why. Time of course will not permit me to do more in the 30 minutes I have at my disposal this afternoon, but perhaps later I will have something more to say and my colleagues will also present other reasons why they think that the whole proposition the government is making to the provinces today is unrealistic.

My first reason is this. The government's proposal fails to give anything like the weight that should be given to the burdens that are now on the provinces. It almost totally disregards the terrific strain which the demands of the next 20 years are going to place on provincial budgets, and it brushes off altogether too lightly the fact that every provincial government in Canada needs more money.

Much has been said already today about the burdens that fall upon the provincial governments. The Leader of the Opposition spoke about the crisis that looms in education. I agree with him. The crisis is now on us and it is going to intensify in the years immediately ahead. We all agree that education is a provincial responsibility. Educational costs, however, have skyrocketed during the past ten years. There has been a terrific increase in building costs, in salaries, in the cost of supplies, and the end is not yet.

Here is a specific example of the sort of thing that nearly every province is forced to deal with, and it gives substance to what the Leader of the Opposition said this morning and what I am saying now, that there is a crisis in education ahead of us. Let us take Ontario. My children are going to school in Ontario and I try to keep in touch with things as they are in this province. I am interested in education and I have tried to keep myself informed about Ontario education. I see municipalities like Ottawa telling the people in certain sections of the city that the city has to look upon them in future as second-class citizens, that they cannot allow them to have a school with a basement, a wood-working shop or an assembly hall because costs have increased to the point where they cannot tax the people any more to get such things. It is all right for the other parts of the city to have them but they cannot have them for the reasons I have suggested.

[Mr. Low.]

Today in Ontario the public, secondary and technical school enrolment is approximately one million boys and girls. It has taken 89 years to build up to that school population. The growth over these 89 years has been quite largely gradual and steady. But official forecasts indicate that in the next ten years there will be an increase of no less than three-quarters of a million students in the public, secondary and technical schools of this province, almost the same growth in ten years as has occurred over the last 89 years. A 75 per cent increase in ten years will put a terrible strain on an already heavily burdened provincial government and the even more harassed municipalities and school districts.

What about university education? As I understand it, there are seven universities in the province of Ontario. Ontario's seven universities now have approximately 20,000 students. By 1965 it is expected that they will have 40,000, if they can be provided for. That is what the Leader of the Opposition said this morning—if they can be provided for. But what if they cannot be provided for? Are they to be denied the advantage of a university education? Are they to be denied equality of opportunity with those who have gone before? They will be, unless we solve this problem, unless we divert it, unless we meet it in some way. I am told by competent authorities that by 1975 they expect to have fully 90,000 students in those universities in this province. That is a spectacular growth in 20 years if they can be provided for.

Are the provinces to be left to pay the huge costs of meeting this situation? It is not just a question of more students; it is a question of more accommodation, more teachers, more instructors, more administrative staff. Are they to be left alone to carry on? Let us not forget that Canada has been running behind in the output of the specialist class of students which was mentioned this morning by the Leader of the Opposition, specialists in engineering, mathematics and all that sort of thing. Yet we are told that Russia and the communist countries are going ahead rapidly. Are we going to turn over this big job of providing a national bank of ability and technical skills for the development of this country and to meet the demands of the future in war and in peace to the slender resources of the provinces and the municipalities which are already over-burdened.

I could speak about British Columbia and the situation there as I talked about Ontario. In British Columbia the enrolment in the secondary and technical schools in 1954-55 was 220,000; competent authorities indicate that in 1964-65 it will be 340,000, an increase of 50 per cent in ten years; in 1974-75 it is estimated it will be 420,000. In the one university in that province which is a provincial institution it is expected that the requests for enrolment will increase from 6,300 as they were in 1955 to 26,000 in 1975. How are they to meet that situation unless they are guaranteed some sort of assurance that their revenues will be adequate to meet their responsibilities?

I could talk about a good many other things such as polluted waters and the necessity of cleaning up that situation. It is going to cost this province $120 million per year over the next 15 or 20 years and there will be no hope for any return except the satisfaction that comes from having waters which are clean. How are they to do it? I could go into a lot of these things but I must hurry on.

My second reason for saying that the present proposition is unrealistic is that it does not take into account the great upsurge in national revenues which will result very largely from the work and efforts and planning of the provincial and municipal governments. My hon. friend, the leader of the CCF, if I remember correctly has said that the wealth of Canada is produced nationally. That is pure silliness. The wealth of Canada is produced by individuals, largely as a consequence of work done by the municipalities and the provinces. While it is true that there must be some fiscal need arrangement to help the provinces with the least to get along and have something like equality, I still cannot agree that the wealth of Canada is produced nationally. The money is produced nationally, no question about that, and often times in such meagre quantities that we cannot distribute what we produce.

When one considers the very considerable growth in the gross national product and the change in the industrial activity since 1937-38 he cannot help but be greatly impressed. I think I am correct in saying that back in 1937 the gross national product of Canada was only $3·5 billion; in 1955 it reached the very marvellous figure of $26,600 million, and it is expected to reach $28 billion this year. Does the Minister of Finance think it is going to stop there? Everybody knows that it will not with the development that will take place and we know can and will take place. I am sure that he realizes that revenues will pour in to this government very largely as a consequence of the work done in the provinces and the municipalities, carried on by individuals and individual enterprise. The provinces and the municipalities ought to feel that they are getting a fair share out of those revenues in order to help pay their costs.

These things are not reflected in the proposition made by the government to the provinces. I think we should all bear in mind that it is not next year or the next five years that we should be planning for; we have to look ahead at least 20 or 30 years and plan for them. We are on the verge of a spectacular development and the provinces must have pretty definite knowledge of what they can count on by way of revenues if they are to achieve anything like what they so much desire to do and what is expected of them. The government's proposal to the provinces is most inadequate.

The third reason why I say that the present proposition put before the provinces by the government is unrealistic is that it gives no consideration whatsoever to the almost maddening frustration presently felt by the municipalities of Canada because they are faced with rapidly rising costs, increasing demands for service, but have no more money to meet them unless they carry their present property taxation to the point of confiscation, at which point I claim it is at the present time. They in turn have to look to the provinces for relief and help.

Let us not overlook the fact that in the development of this country the dominion government must always keep in mind that its strong right arm is the provinces and municipalities. Are they going to cut off that strong right arm? I could deal at some length with that but I am going to leave it for the moment.

The fourth reason I say that this proposition is unrealistic is that the governments of the provinces rightly believe that they are as much entitled to the fields of taxation as is the dominion. I do not need to enlarge upon that. Let me just say that what we have before us is a niggardly settlement of tax fields that belong as much to the provinces as to the dominion. I say it is unrealistic to take any other point of view.

During the second world war the municipalities and the provinces were strictly secondary. They had to be so. We all realized that if Canada was to make an all-out effort that must be so. The provinces willingly vacated the three tax fields on the understanding that they would be returned to them one year after the war ended. I happen to have been a signatory of the first one in 1941 and I know that the federal government told us that they would be returned at the end of the war or one year later. That was not done. This government feared that when the war was over a depression might come with peace and therefore they continued the wartime arrangements.

Then war threatened again when North Korea invaded South Korea. Again it seemed necessary for security reasons for the provinces and municipalities to continue in a secondary position. Six more years have passed, years of cold war and the threat of a shooting war. It has now been sixteen years since the first tax transfer agreements were asked for by the government of Canada and during those years the senior government has come to look upon the provinces and municipalities as permanently poor relations of a second degree character.

It is easy to fall into the habit of thinking that centralization of power and authority for security purposes ought to be continued indefinitely and made a permanent arrangement. We believe that the time has come for a change of attitude on the part of the government. We face in this country an era of marvellous development. This development cannot possibly take place in the interests of all the Canadian people unless this government sets out on a deliberate and definite policy of close partnership with the provinces. You can never encourage close partnership by slapping 10 provincial premiers in the face or offending provincial governments; that is what you are doing when you put up to them a proposition like this one and then as good as say, "Take it or leave it".

Here you are bringing in legislation to give effect to a unilateral formula—that is what it is—for tax and revenue sharing; and if the bill to follow this resolution is couched in anything like the rigid terms of Bill No. 418, then it will become a stone wall behind which this government can and doubtless will take refuge when the provinces try to obtain a fair division of the revenues which will surely be available to this government in the years ahead.

With this bill made law, I can easily imagine what kind of reception the provinces will get if they come back in an effort to negotiate a better deal. They will be told doubtless in words something like these: "Parliament enacted this law and we are powerless to change it unless and until parliament shows a disposition to amend it. Sorry; we can't depart from the formula. Better go home and try to get along on what you've got." That is the way they will be dismissed. Let me point out that this could very well become a kind of closure imposed upon the provinces themselves.

I think the minister should not proceed with this resolution at this time. He should try to allay the fears of the provinces by announcing another conference some time this fall. If it could be called for October, and if this government would attend that conference with a realistic attitude and with the true spirit of understanding partnership I am confident that an agreement could be reached with all or nearly all the provinces. There would then be time to prepare the legislation and get it ready to be made law early in the next session, as early as January. If that were done the provinces would not feel as if they had suffered, and when I say "suffered" I mean not merely a slap in the face but also a bad beating from this government this year.

I warn the Minister of Finance that the provinces are not at all happy about the miserable, penurious deal under which you have handed over to them and their harassed municipalities half your unemployment responsibilities, as was done just recently. There is not one satisfied province in Canada today. I challenge the minister to name one when he replies. But if the measure envisaged by this resolution is made law, then I warn him that the dissatisfaction will turn into hostility, and I am sure that feeling is not conducive to progress and sound development in Canada as we want to see it.

I remind the minister of something else in closing. I remind him of what has happened during the past 17 years. Those are the years during which the federal Liberal government has been centralizing financial and taxation authority in Ottawa. It is true that was to meet a particular situation, and we are not complaining about that. However, 17 years ago every provincial government in Canada except one was a Liberal government. One by one those Liberal provincial governments have fallen until today only three of the smaller provinces of Canada have Liberal governments, and even they are very dissatisfied and for good reason. I noticed just a few days ago where they met in Fredericton and worked out a permanent organization to seek a better deal. They are not satisfied.

Has it occurred to my hon. friends and the Minister of Finance, for whom I repeat I have very high regard, that the people of the provinces, who are closer to their governments, have turned down the Liberals by at least 12 to one on the basis of population, largely because they felt they had to turn to opponents of the Liberals for their own protection? I should think you boys over there would take a fairly careful look at the whole situation, and when you do you will perhaps give the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister some fatherly advice, prominent in which ought to be instructions to withhold this legislation until a much more sympathetic effort has been made to find a more acceptable formula. It can be done.

You should bear in mind that a good many people, Mr. Chairman, are quite aware of the fact that since 1946 this government has piled up accumulated budgetary surpluses of more than $2 billion. This is the period during which municipalities all over Canada, and many of the provinces, have been forced to raise property taxes until they amount to sheer confiscation; and still in spite of that they have sunk into a slough of debt and interest which threatens to crush them. The people in the provinces and municipalities, I will tell you, are watching the federal finances at this time.

Moreover, they see that this year, when the federal government is trying to justify a niggardly settlement of tax fields which belong as much to the provinces as to the dominion, this government will likely pile up a huge surplus of three-quarters of a billion dollars. And when they see a good part of that surplus used in the 1957 budget as election bait, as it surely will be, they will be quite satisfied in accusing this government of callous indifference to the actual needs of the municipalities and the provinces, or lack of vision and responsibility, or both. In the light of all the facts, how can the government refuse to try to seek a less penurious, less objectionable settlement of the taxation field? The minister ought to do it.

I am going to leave it at that, Mr. Chairman, but I do feel very keenly that every effort ought to be made to work out a much more justifiable settlement than this represents, to see if we cannot get a happy, smooth working democracy in this country.

Mr. Harris: I was looking at the 1952 debate on the renewal of the tax rental agreements during that year, Mr. Chairman, and I noticed that only seven members took part at the committee stage. I am informed that I am not going to be as fortunate this time, therefore I think perhaps I should answer some of the remarks that have been made and some of the questions that have been raised up to this time. Perhaps it will be necessary to intervene on another occasion.

There seems to be an advantage to the Minister of Finance on this particular matter in that he is being criticized for completely different reasons, in fact conflicting reasons. Therefore I begin by saying that possibly under those circumstances I might be comforted in thinking I have arrived at perhaps the best solution.

We have the Leader of the Opposition, not perhaps directly but indirectly, repeating the argument he made in opposition to the tax rental agreements of the past. We have the leader of the C.C.F. party upholding the tax rental system of the past and criticizing any departure from it. We have the leader of the Social Credit party taking a position which I think may be described as somewhere between the two, except that he is opposed to the change now not on the grounds of principle but simply on the grounds of the money involved in the particular solution at which we have tried to arrive.

May I for the record repeat what I said in my budget speech in connection with this, and I point out that I made this statement this morning in a different form. On March 20, at page 2335 of Hansard, I said this:

> But may I make it quite clear that not one provincial premier is on record as saying that this new tax-sharing plan is not as good as the present tax rental agreements; and I am prepared to go further and say that almost all of them have stated that the principle of the new plan is better than the present system.

From that day to this no one has questioned the validity of what I said. So I am prepared to say to the committee that while there may be, and there certainly is, a difference of opinion as to how much may be paid to a province, I take it that even in this debate except for the questions of the leader of the C.C.F. party there has not been anyone who has suggested that the system we have proposed to the provinces and which is now before the committee, is not better than the previous system.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Which premier said perhaps it was better?

Mr. Harris: I made the statement that no premier had said it was not as good, and I am prepared to say that most of them have said it was better. I say that because in all the meetings and in all the correspondence no premier has suggested that we should continue with the tax rental agreements as they are now in existence, even with increased payments, and they have all agreed at one time or another that this system is a better system for the purpose of distribution, if you like, of certain tax receipts among the provincial governments. Now, that is not to say that they have agreed on any detail whatever of the plan. I merely confine myself for the moment to the principle.

But may I go back and cover some of the points made by the Leader of the Opposition. I have been astonished at the repetition of what I consider a fallacy in his argument even today with respect to what happened under the wartime tax rental agreements. He has made the point, or has tried to make it, that when the federal government entered the field of taxation for wartime purposes by agreement we in some manner avoided carrying out the engagements that were made at the time so there has been a disadvantage to the provincial governments.

I want to read what was contained in the wartime tax agreements with respect to this point. I am quoting:

The federal government undertakes—

—to reduce its rates of taxes by such an amount as will enable the province again to use the income tax and corporation tax fields, and in particular the dominion undertakes to reduce its rate of tax on corporation incomes by at least 10 per cent of such incomes.

That was the extent of the undertaking given at that time. May I point out what we have done. As from January 1, 1947, at the conclusion of those agreements, the federal tax rates were substantially reduced and the conditions met. Corporation income taxes were reduced by 10 percentage points and personal income taxes by well in excess of 20 per cent. These reductions were in excess of the levels of taxation prevailing in any province prior to the wartime tax agreements. Well, we went farther, sir. When we entered into the 1947 tax rental agreements we also agreed to certain conditions which we would meet at the termination of those agreements. We agreed to allow a deduction of provincial personal income tax up to 5 per cent of the federal tax, a deduction for provincial succession duties up to 50 per cent of the federal duties, and a deduction for corporation income tax up to one-seventh of the federal tax.

Our performance with respect to that undertaking is this. At the conclusion of the agreements these conditions were met exactly in the case of the personal income tax and succession duties, while in the case of corporation income tax a credit of 5 per cent was allowed, which was in excess of the one-seventh of the prevailing federal rate.

We have similar conditions in the 1952 tax rental agreements. We agreed at the termination of those agreements to allow a 5 per cent credit for personal income, a 50 per cent credit for succession duties and a 7 percentage points credit for corporation income tax. These conditions will be more than met with a 10 per cent personal income abatement, a 50 per cent succession duty abatement, and an allowance of 9 per centage points for provincial corporation taxes, as is proposed in the legislation before the committee at the moment. Therefore I am completely unable to accept the argument advanced by the Leader of the Opposition that we have failed at any time to carry out any engagement that was made, beginning with the wartime tax rental agreements.

When I interrupted the Leader of the Opposition this morning with respect to the argument he was making as to the result this would have, I gathered he had in mind that not only should we vacate those tax fields, as we have done on successive occasions, but that we should continue the former arrangement, as he said, and I read from the Hansard typewritten sheets of his answer to my question—

Before the war there had been arrangements under which certain of the provinces were imposing taxes, and that was in the mind of those who were arranging the agreements at that time. It was understood that immediately afterwards those provinces that wished to do so would again impose taxes and that the federal government would carry out the arrangements which it carried out before the war with respect to collecting those taxes up to the amount imposed by the provinces and without double taxation. That was the simple and clear understanding at that time.

I asked at that point if this bill was not doing that and, of course, he said that in effect the bill may be doing so at the moment but that we had not done so in the past. I have examined the record, and I cannot find any undertaking whatever by the federal government to go on collecting taxes at the conclusion of the war period on the same basis as before. However, let me point out that we are offering to do it at the present time and the conclusion of the tax rental agreements.

The leader of the C.C.F. party has made a number of suggestions as to why we seem to be retreating from the position we took in 1945. He knows quite as well as I do—and I think I should repeat this although he has heard it many times—that the green book offer of that year was conditional on a great many things which were not met, including the fiscal arrangements contained in the suggestions in the green book. On the other hand, I think he can go through the green book, and while he can make arguments with respect to the price of goods to be purchased now as compared with the price at that time, he will find it somewhat difficult to pick out any offer we made at that time that has not been carried out or is not about to be carried out by offers that are now outstanding.

Mr. Winch: I will be glad to do that.

Mr. Harris: Just a moment. This is from the green book in which those offers were made conditional upon certain other arrangements being entered into, which have not been met, and for that reason the original offer was vitiated.

I take it his argument is that the tax rental agreements now in existence have met to a considerable degree the fiscal need of some provincial governments at least; yet because they hid the fiscal need element, they were to be preferred to the present system. Let me answer that very briefly by saying this. The present system will show quite clearly the amount whereby the taxpayers of a given province are not able to contribute in these three tax fields to the extent of other taxpayers in other provinces, and we have based the equalization payment on the deficiency between any given province and the average of the highest two provinces. In this way everyone can see at a glance what that deficiency is from year to year, and will be able to decide whether or not this parliament should make a deficiency payment in this particular case to the extent that the legislation calls for.

I would suggest to the leader of the C.C.F. party that it is far better to know the extent of the fiscal need that is being met in this matter, so that if the argument should be made that this government is not aiding in this particular field we can see what is being done; and if the argument should be made that it is not enough we have the statistics on which we can base our decision on that argument.

I noticed also that he emphasized more than once in the course of his remarks that we seem to have given up some of the authority and the power we had to control by taxation the difficulties that we may become involved in if we have another depression. Well, now, sir, we are not doing that to any great extent. It is true that to the extent that a provincial government may elect to impose and collect its own taxes under the legislation now before us there will be that diminution, if you like, in the almost complete authority of this parliament to impose taxation in those fields which has existed when all but one of the provinces have made tax rental agreements, as has been the case in the last four or five years; and yet, sir, I suggest that that slight diminution, if it is serious at all, is not by any means serious enough to take away from this parliament whatever opportunity it may have to exercise by fiscal policy, some changes in the economy from time to time. If I had thought that there would be any other result I would not have presented this resolution in its present form.

I believe—and I think the leader of the C.C.F. recognizes this—one of the principal problems in carrying on with a tax rental system such as we had is that despite the expression of opinion in 1945 that it would be desirable to maintain that authority in this parliament against the possibility of a post-war depression—and I think I should add here that I never heard of anyone who did not expect a depression at that time; everyone was apprehensive, therefore the thinking and planning of everyone was coloured a little by that—it should be borne in mind that since that time we have had only the slightest of recessions in 1954 and during that time it was quite clear that the whole of the provinces of Canada were not going to be in agreement with the tax rental system that we began at that time. That is a political fact that ought to be considered and due weight should be accorded to it.

Therefore, as I said in my introductory remarks, when we came to consider what should be done when the tax rental agreements ran out we were obliged to think of another system that would meet the needs of the people and maintain in this house to a large extent the power and authority for taxation purposes that have been mentioned, as well as to recognize, if we come to the other argument, that the tax rental system imposes upon provincial governments some restraint on their autonomy, a restraint which is not good in the long run. So we had to consider whether some system might be devised under which if they wished they might return to taxation in those particular fields on their own terms to a certain extent.

Briefly the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. party referred to the weaknesses of the Weimar constitution, and I think I could add one to it. My recollection is that the first constitution of the United States provided for maintenance of the central government by the governments of the 13 states, and it too fell by the way for the simple reason that you cannot have a central government dependent on the support of the constituent parts of that central government. For good or ill a central government must stand on its own feet and must be able to exercise the authority and powers which it is called upon to do by the constitution. Inevitably, in a country like Canada at least, the central government when times are not as good as they are at the moment would have to stand behind the provincial governments in any crisis that might arise, as it did in the depression which brought about all the things we are talking about now.

We should not overlook the fact that while the Leader of the Opposition seemed to suppose I should have found a solution to this problem in the past few years, the history of this problem only goes back to the depression of 25 years ago, and we have experimented with only one solution, which was the tax rental system to overcome the difficulties reported on by the Rowell-Sirois commission.

It is true the provinces accepted the tax rental system during the war simply on an emergency basis; the Leader of the Opposition is quite right in saying that. On the other hand it is equally certain that a great many people in Canada would have desired that the Rowell-Sirois commission report be carried out before the war in one form or another, and that when the war ended there were a great many people who felt that the advantages of the single tax system in these particular fields should be maintained, that at any rate the advantages to certain provinces and communities by reason of distribution of these tax fields had been very great and should not be discontinued.

That has been the policy of this party. We have upheld the tax rental system in two general elections, as the leader of the C.C.F. party mentioned. We have been upheld in those general elections not because of the tax rental system itself but because the result of it was that we were able to provide the provincial governments with extra revenue they could not get by their own means, and in that manner they were able to provide services for their people which otherwise would not have been provided.

The leader of the C.C.F. party remarked that we might possibly be losing our powers to control unemployment. We have, of course, provided a means of alleviating the difficulties that arise with unemployment, but I suggest that the record of this government in maintaining a high level of employment over the past 10 years at least has been such that no criticism can be directed at it at the moment. We are today approaching a time when there will be a shortage of labour in Canada, and practically everyone who can work will be working. Indeed I think we have passed that point until now people are saying, "Let us have more hands." Everyone is working.

I do agree with one thing that is said with respect to succession duties. There is no question at all, sir, that this duty is one which in my opinion should be collected by the federal government and by provincial governments if they so desire, of course. It is true that the facilities for becoming wealthy in Canada are not confined to any municipal corporation or any provincial area, and that when great wealth is made it is usually made throughout the dominion. In my view in this particular instance it would be desirable to maintain the collection of succession duties for the purpose mentioned by the leader of the C.C.F. party.

A great deal has been said about the ill effects of double taxation. There is no question about it that double taxation is undesirable in Canada from a practical standpoint and from the standpoint of the taxpayer. He would prefer to make one return and deal with one government so that his costs could be kept down and so on. On the other hand it should not be overlooked that we in this country have a federal system with provincial governments, and one should not expect to take away from them the right of taxation if they desire to do so, except by their own consent.

I must say the fact that some provincial government might choose to impose taxes in these fields rather than agree to a tax rental system does not bother me particularly because I realize that while there will be in that particular province a little bit of difficulty for the taxpayer in filling out more taxation forms and satisfying a second government instead of only one, I think this will be accepted by the taxpayer in that province on the basis that the provincial government in its wisdom feels it is desirable to enter this field either for maintaining its autonomy or for the purpose of obtaining a greater revenue from the particular tax than that which we would be able to provide by the tax rental agreement.

The leader of the Social Credit party has perhaps given greater condemnation than any others of the offer we have made. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am not in a position to say that under some conditions we could not have provided a greater percentage in the standard rates than we have at the present time. All I can say is that we met in conferences, and may I say at this point that they were conferences. There was discussion, and there was no take it or leave it attitude. Although I was not a member of any other conference I have spoken to many who were members of previous conferences, and I have been told by them that these several conferences were conducted in a better spirit than any others have been, which is an indication that we were not adopting a take it or leave it attitude.

I pointed out at the conference last year that I thought perhaps I was the only minister of finance or provincial treasurer present who would show a deficit during the last fiscal year. My recollection is that one of them mildly disagreed with me on the ground that in his province there was apt to be a deficit under certain conditions. I think the committee should bear in mind that we did have a deficit in our fiscal matters in the last fiscal year. It is true that this year we expect to have a surplus as I indicated in March and that surplus is due, as everyone knows, to the increased activity in the country together with the delayed effect of the payment of corporation income taxes.

This, of course, does not redound to our complete advantage under the system we have here. As corporation and individual income taxes and succession duties increase, the provincial governments will receive the appropriate increase that we have provided in the legislation. We are not tying them down for five years to the maximum amount they are going to receive next year so that from then on they are constant while we take the extra payment; by no means. They are getting their share of the increased payment if there is an increased payment of tax in these fields.

On the other hand, and this should not be overlooked, we are guaranteeing the provincial governments that they shall not fall below a certain level, no matter what those payments may amount to. That guarantee is a very essential and very desirable part of those arrangements from the standpoint of the provincial governments. It might happen that we shall not have to use the guarantees we have given. As I said this morning, we should hope that conditions in the country would be such that it would not be necessary, but I think we have to accept the fact that as difficulties arise this government must see that on all occasions the revenues of the provincial governments do not fall materially or drastically because of conditions arising throughout the country as a whole.

The leader of the Social Credit party has called these proposals niggardly. I have been finding it difficult to understand this language, sir, because the document I tabled this morning indicates that if the tax rental agreements have been good from the standpoint of payment—and no one particularly has said they were not reasonably good—surely this is better, when every province receives at least as much under the proposals before the committee, and in most cases more than they would under the tax rental agreement if it were extended into the following year. I do not know what one would consider an adequate increase in provincial revenues from year to year might be, but let me point out that this means a 20 per cent increase in the payment from this government to the provincial governments. Further than that, the amount being paid comes, I think, to an average increase in provincial budgets across the country of about 8 per cent, and in some cases more than that. It seems to me, whilst I would not be in a position to judge whether any provincial government would feel that it ought to have more than that, if you find an average of 8 per cent it would mean that some had around 11 or 12 per cent. That is a fairly substantial increase in gross revenues in any year, and provincial governments probably would not be in any particular financial strait-jacket, as has been suggested during this debate.

Now I want to point out one other thing. The Leader of the Opposition made some fun over my remark about not having a solution to this problem. I said a moment ago that we have been only experimenting with it for less than 20 years. We have only had a report suggesting something like this for less than 20 years. I should not suggest that we could arrive at a final and conclusive solution at this time. We have followed only one system up to the present time, tax rental agreements negotiated separately with the provincial governments. We are now attempting here a solution which is not final—that is why I did not use the word—and which even the Leader of the Opposition described as having merit.

In fact I suggest now that it has this merit, that when the terms have become known it will be seen that about the only argument that might be made against it is with respect to the amount of money involved under any given circumstances, and that the need of the provinces is clearly set out. The federal government makes certain payments under certain conditions; and for these reasons the provincial premiers who studied it, whilst dissatisfied no doubt with respect to the amount of money involved, have not, as I have said, suggested to us that any other system would be better than the one we have suggested here.

When the bill is before the house, of course, I shall go into much greater detail than I have done today; but I suggest that if any increase in contributions to the provinces to the extent of 8 to 12 per cent is going to be described as niggardly, then I am afraid I shall not be able to carry on a discussion on that basis. I suggest that it is a good increase, one which may not perhaps be acceptable in some quarters, but which does not tie down the provinces over a period of 20 years, as has been stated here today.

I realize that the provincial governments, like this government, cannot plan just from year to year, though we only tax from year to year. We must be aware of the problems that are going to arise from time to time, but this government engages upon programs which are not completed in one year. We have programs going on which we know will not be completed for another three or four years. We have embarked upon them with what money we get from year to year in the meantime to complete them. Therefore we limited the proposal before the committee to five years.

I for one would doubt that in five years' time the system would remain precisely what it was. At that time, as I said this morning, there will perhaps be different men dealing with this matter, with different ideas as to what ought to be done, but this plan is good for five years. I do not think it is going to destroy the municipalities and provincial governments in the meantime. What is more, I think it is going to be advantageous to them. At that time, if a change is required perhaps it may be worked out. In the meantime I suggest that we ought to rely on the opinion I have given, namely that so far no one has suggested a better system, and we can discuss it in detail when we come to the bill.

Mr. Nowlan: I am not going to get involved in a discussion with the Minister of Finance as to what may or may not have been suggested or what may or may not have been done in years gone by. The Leader of the Opposition and others who have participated in this debate will have an opportunity of speaking again at other stages, and I am sure the record will be dealt with effectively at that time.

The minister has given us a fairly long dissertation upon his philosophy and the philosophy which he thinks motivates those who have proposed this resolution. I cannot disagree with him in everything. As the Leader of the Opposition said this morning, there are good points about this legislation. As was said, opinions may differ as to whether this is scientific surgery or sophisticated butchery.

We saw a difference here this afternoon among the leader of the C.C.F. party and the leader of the Social Credit party and the Leader of the Opposition. Like the three blind men dealing with the elephant in the dark, one felt the leg and one felt the side, one felt the trunk, and they each got a different reaction. So it is not something on which one can be dogmatic in every respect. There have to be qualifications in anything which may be said. However, I would take some objection to what the Minister of Finance said to the effect that the support which his party got in elections in the past had been partly attributable to the fact that people in some provinces realized they were getting moneys as a result of those tax rental agreements which otherwise they would not have got. Actually I do not think that can be justified at all, because those agreements, as the Minister of Finance knows full well, were not designed for the purpose of distributing the wealth in any way. As a matter of practice, in the end federal agreements were made with the wealthier provinces which were much more lucrative than those made with the provinces which had less, and which were compelled to sign because if they did not sign they would starve to death. It had nothing whatsoever to do with the distribution of the means of this country in any shape or form.

If one reads the history of this, one sees how complicated it is. The minister made reference to the Rowell-Sirois report and the studies carried on before the war.

There is no question but that at that time it was envisaged by that commission that there should be a centralization of taxation, a recasting of federal responsibilities and duties under confederation. Many things were envisaged then including, of course, the fact that taxation was necessary as a fiscal instrument in order to control or deal with depressions. That is one factor the member for Rosetown-Biggar referred to this afternoon, and I think the Minister of Finance suggested it. I believe he will admit that today the emphasis is placed on central banking and on monetary policy, and that the government realize that perhaps in that field they have a more effective weapon to deal with depressions should they come, so they are not so dependent upon taxation and therefore have been willing to relax some of the powers of taxation which they previously controlled.

There are many criticisms one could level. I propose to deal only with two this afternoon and to do so briefly, because the ground has been covered in general by other speakers and there will be others speaking as well who will perhaps develop the other points. The Minister of Finance says, "Oh, there have been conferences, and it is unfair to suggest that there have not been conferences." Well, you can call them conferences, Mr. Chairman. We have also had consideration in this house which lasted 15 seconds. That was deemed consideration. We have the minutes here of the conferences, and we can see what voluminous documents they are. They certainly are conferences only by courtesy. They made long speeches. In fact they took all one day complimenting each other all around the table, and then went onto camera on the second day. But surely no one is going to suggest, least of all the Minister of Finance who understands the complicated constitutional problem with which this country is confronted, that in such a short time as was taken by these conferences one could attempt to deal with the various problems confronting the governments of Canada today.

The minister says, "Oh, my, we have only spent 25 years considering this and we have made remarkable progress because we have got away from the leasing type of taxation agreement and now, after 25 years, we are going to try something else which is a step beyond that, and only a step, and which is only going to tie our hands for five more years." He admits, and quite wisely I think, that after 30 years there may be somebody else there who will be able to deal with this matter in some other way. Yet during that 25 years the constitutional problem in this country has only been brought particularly into crisis since the war.

Certainly there was no great need of haste, no great need of immediate decision in the horse and buggy day, in the red school house day, even in the days not too long prior to the second world war. But the pressure which has been brought to bear on the provinces and municipalities by circumstances over which they had no control at all necessitates and requires that some decision be arrived at on the over-all picture rather than a piecemeal attempt to deal with it by this so-called conference when, as a matter of fact, the premiers of the provinces were called together and told, "Here is our proposition; now, take it or leave it."

That is essentially the situation. This time they were given an escape clause if they did not want to take it. They were given a part of the back yard in which to play. It was not fenced off but they were told, "If you do not want to accept this, then you can go and play in the back yard. We will give you a little part of it where you can exercise your own taxation powers." In other words we have a feudal complex which arose first out of wartime pressure, and having made use of the last agreements for their own ends the government now feel that they should have the right to control these moneys collected by the central taxing authority, whatever the effect may be on the provinces and municipalities.

We in this party believe and have said time and time again that there should be a reallocation of responsibilities, that there should be a reallocation of taxation powers, and that this should be done by a constitutional conference properly called where these matters could be given consideration, where time could be given to them, and where the problems of Canada in the last half of the twentieth century could be faced. One of our objections to this type of agreement is that it fails to recognize that problem. The government says to the provinces, "We are being a little bit more generous. However, you do not have to lease. If you do not want to, you will be given a little bit of space in the back yard in which to play, but we are going to continue to exercise control over the collection of revenues and how we shall spend them."

What did the Minister of Finance say this morning? I made a note, and I think I took him down correctly. After dealing with the responsibilities of the provinces he said, "In our view"—there is the feudal right, the seigneur surveying the field—"this proposal will give the provinces the revenues necessary to meet their needs in so far as possible." He said, "in our view". There we have the view of the government of Canada determining what revenues are going to be necessary for the provinces and determining that in so far as possible, whoever may control that possibility—

Mr. Harris: That had regard to these particular taxation fields, not other revenues.

Mr. Nowlan: That had regard to the matters envisaged by this resolution and the control of the taxation fields. Then the minister went on to say all the things that Canada was doing for the provinces. He listed them and suggested that they ran into several hundred million dollars. That is true, Mr. Chairman. There are many things being taken over by the dominion, some of them I think necessarily so, and many more that perhaps should be taken over. But our objection is that they are being taken over indirectly. The government is coming in through the back door and doing something which should be done through the front door, and should be arranged definitely and fairly and on a basis on which agreement can be reached between the provinces and the dominion.

Frankly, some of us get rather tired of being told at election time that so and so, Paul somebody, is giving the people the baby bonus or is giving increased old age pensions, as if the government were reaching down into its own pocket for the money and giving it to the people out of generosity, when as a matter of fact the money is provided by taxes collected in fields which, at one time at least, were constitutionally believed to belong to the provinces at least as much as, if not more so, than the dominion.

So the time has come, as the Leader of the Opposition and others have emphasized today, with the increased problems confronting the municipalities and the provinces, to deal with this matter on a more constructive basis. Surely the time has now come after 25 years—and we admit that part of that time was a period of war with all the stresses, strains and difficulties of war; no one will question that for a moment—when these matters can be dealt with on a more constructive basis, a long term program worked out and the problem dealt with in such a way that the responsibilities of the municipalities and the provinces, which are suffering from an impossible burden of taxation, which are called upon to perform services in the field of education, the field of highways, the field of public health, for which they have not the money, may be met now and dealt with on a long term and permanent basis.

It is true, as the minister says, that the dominion has heavy taxation and financial burdens. We realize that; but it is quite possible and I hope and think more than likely, that within the next year, two years or three years that lie ahead the heavy burden resting upon the dominion will lighten substantially because of improvement in the international situation, reconsideration of defence expenditures and the rest of it. The burdens resting on the provinces and the municipalities certainly cannot lighten in any way. They are going to increase. Their revenues are frozen until they are given reconsideration and until the whole situation is dealt with properly and, after conference, they are relieved of some of the responsibilities, with the federal government taking them over in a proper way rather than doing it indirectly, casually and in a haphazard and piecemeal way as has been done heretofore.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said a while ago that the federal government needed these increased revenues so it could deal with the requirements of the provinces and the municipalities. He intimated that he hesitated to advocate anything being done which would result in a reduction of income to the dominion. I think it has been pointed out today that there is little probability of a reduction of income to the national treasury. If this expansion goes on, and we know it will go on, over the long-term period—there may be minor areas of recession—with our natural resources there is bound to be an increase in the national wealth of this country.

There need be little worry about the dominion finding itself in a strait-jacket in dealing with the problem. As a matter of fact it has been pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition that the probability is that we will have a surplus of $500 million or $750 million or some such astronomical figure at the end of this fiscal year. Yet what happened? The provinces are given a little largess, a little gesture of help, and then the Minister of Finance says "In our opinion that is enough for you to carry out your provincial responsibilities".

Mr. Harris: Out of these taxes.

Mr. Nowlan: Take those taxes out and the problem facing at least some of the provinces will be most difficult indeed. That is one reason I, and I believe there are many others, am opposed to this resolution at this time, because it fails to deal with the problem with which this country is confronted and with which this country must deal. We have played with it for 25 years. We are now facing a crisis, and an immediate solution must be found. This is not something which can be deferred for five years, during which time, as the hon. member for Peace River has said, if there is not sufficient revenue it can be said that the House of Commons in its wisdom decided that such legislation should be passed and therefore there is nothing more which can be done.

There is another matter about which I wish to speak for a moment and which has particular reference to certain provinces. The minister said this is justified because it provides for the distribution of wealth among those provinces which are not as well endowed as some of the others. I am entirely in agreement with that principle. If you go back to the conference of 1945 you will find that the proposal then made by the premier of Ontario, the present Leader of the Opposition, suggested that out of the tax revenues which were to be allocated, 10 per cent should be set aside as a national adjustment fund for the provinces.

Mr. Harris: Ten per cent of the provincial revenues.

Mr. Nowlan: The revenues with which he was dealing at that time. At least he suggested that principle, and it is one that certainly should be recognized. There certainly is something wrong with the principle suggested by this government in this resolution. Again it is based on a per capita formula. A rather involved formula is proposed whereby you take the average of British Columbia and Ontario and apply that on a per capita basis, and the provinces below that average are to be reimbursed on that basis. That does not take into consideration at all the ability to pay as well as the population itself.

If you want to see the results of the application of the per capita basis just look at the payments made to the universities. The universities in the maritimes receive, as I pointed out the other day, in one case only $80 per student, while a university in another province receives over $400. If the Minister of Finance wants an argument with respect to that I can give him one which he certainly cannot accuse of being partisan. I would refer him to the argument advanced by the premier of Nova Scotia at the conference in April. At that time the premier took violent objection to the proposal that this should be worked out on a per capita basis.

I am not going to quote his words, but he went on to say that you could have a province with a per capita income of $900 and you could have another province where the income was $1,200, and then you could work out something on a per capita basis, but the fact remained that the people in the provinces having only $900 of income would have very little left after paying their federal taxes with which to pay their provincial taxes, whereas in the other province, though they might feel that they were being overtaxed and undoubtedly could claim an increased burden of taxation, nevertheless they would have greater means with which to pay the provincial taxes to meet the provincial requirements. In the case of the poorer provinces they would not be able to do that and would have to rely almost entirely on the per capita grant. The province which fell below the average would be given something. But a formula should be worked out that would recognize the capacity to pay of the individual as well as the number of heads in a province. That the government has not done.

The maritime provinces submitted formulas to the conference under which they sought equitable treatment. One province approached the problem in one way and worked out a mathematical formula which could be justified. Another province decided what they needed in order to carry on their services, and they translated that into a formula. They both arrived at virtually the same formula. I am not going to try to check those formulas now because the minister knows very well that they were presented to the conference. But with what result? In this letter of January 14, 1956, to the premier the Prime Minister said this:

> At the same time we made it clear that the present government had no intention of abandoning the objective of the tax rental agreements which is to make it financially possible for all the provinces whatever their tax base to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation. That is the foundation of the policy of the federal government.

If that is the foundation I certainly say they failed to build on that foundation. The premiers of the Atlantic provinces made it abundantly plain that the foundation is most unstable. It reminds me of what was said about the man who built his house on the sand. The rains fell and the winds blew, his house fell, and great was the fall thereof. This is a sand foundation which you are constructing under the financial structure of Canada. We must have something that will provide a more stable fabric on which this country can be built, something which will provide rock and not sand.

What the end will be it is difficult to say, but it is not one which is going to add to the standard of government of the provinces of this country. I should like to quote from a letter written by the premier of Nova Scotia, and again I state that he can not be considered as being a Conservative partisan. On January 12 of this year he wrote to the Prime Minister as follows. I am only going to quote in part. The Minister of Finance said that these agreements were an advance over anything which has gone before, or something to that effect. This letter states in part:

> The present proposal in essence does not approach this objective—

That is the objective I just read.

> —any more nearly than do the existing tax rental agreements. Indeed, one might observe that it differs from the tax rental agreements only in that:
> (a) it substitutes the per capita yield in the two highest provinces from three fields of taxation for the gross national product; and
> (b) it provides for an "equalization payment" to each province which falls below the average, whether or not that province chooses to vacate the three tax fields.
> In principle it gives no greater recognition to the fiscal needs of the provinces than did the tax rental agreements. I wish to impress upon you that the federal proposal compensates for lack of tax potential in only three fields of taxation and leaves the less favoured provinces (as do the tax rental agreements) with a per capita rate from local sources of taxation far below the national average.

Then he goes on to say:

> If, therefore, your letter of January 6 finally sets forth the position of the federal government with respect to federal-provincial arrangements—

It did, pretty well.

> —relating to these three tax fields, it would be my hope that in some other way consideration might still be given to the position of this and some other provinces, as urged by myself and several other provincial premiers during the October meeting.

That is the statement of the Liberal premier of Nova Scotia with respect to these tax agreements. I have a letter here written by the premier of New Brunswick which appeared in Hansard for January 31, 1956. It is a letter to the Prime Minister dated January 27, 1956, in which he said:

> Our government is now asked to accept a situation which does practically nothing to relieve the special disabilities under which we have laboured for so long. The formula which we presented to the conference envisaged transfer payments to our treasury of some ten millions of dollars more than we were receiving annually under the 1952 tax agreements. This amount is based on a realistic appraisal of our minimum requirements, if we are to be able to carry out our constitutional responsibilities. The proposal of your government would increase payments to New Brunswick by about $1 million annually, 10 per cent of our indicated requirements.
> This small percentage of the $10 million special adjustment grants envisaged by our formula will not enable us to provide the health and social needs, the educational facilities and services, the public works, the material benefits and cultural advantages—all of which are the birthright of an industrious and enlightened people.

That is the statement of the premier of New Brunswick with respect to these tax agreements. Now, we are told that this is a solution of the problems of the have-not provinces. It is no such thing. It is only a palliative. It makes no approach to an actual solution of the problems at all. New Brunswick requested $10 million, and actually Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were within a few dollars of each other as to what was required by each province in order to put them on a basis where they could satisfactorily perform the services required of provincial governments in this country today. They were refused and told that 10 per cent of that was the amount to which they would be entitled. I do say, Mr. Chairman, that is not the way to deal with the legitimate demands of the provinces.

When the Minister of Finance tries to stand up, smile and shrug his shoulders and say, "I did not hear anyone say they were dissatisfied with it", or something to that effect; "I did not hear anyone suggest anything better"; he knows that many of the provinces are in a position where they have to accept this whether they like it or not.

It is true it is an improvement over the days when people were allowed to starve. You are allowed now to eke out an existence because of the largess of this government which has pre-empted to itself this whole lush area of taxation, which undoubtedly it should occupy to a greater extent than it did in the earlier days, I grant you; but let us see that the moneys are divided properly. Let us see in particular that we have no more thoughts about this being for the benefit of the have-not provinces, as the minister told us, provided for them at the expense of the haves, because that is simply a fairy story and has no relation whatever to reality.

For these two reasons and others, I propose to vote against this resolution when the times comes.

Mr. Gillis: I feel it is my duty to say a few words on these agreements, Mr. Chairman. Having had something to do with many agreements, may I say that I do not ever expect the time to arrive in this world when two parties will get together where money is involved and come away with a satisfactory agreement. There is going to be something wrong with it. If there were not the two people would not be human. At least I have never seen one that was completely satisfactory to all concerned.

I have always supported the dominion-provincial agreements, because I remember back to 1939. I think the measure of the agreements, if you are going to be realistic about it, can be seen if you ask yourself the question whether you are better off with the agreements or without them. I can answer that in the affirmative so far as Nova Scotia is concerned. I do not want to go back to 1939. This province under the present taxing agreement is much better off than it would be if there were no agreement.

I think the main principle behind the dominion-provincial agreements, and the main reason I support them, is that in a country like Canada where you have a huge centralization of the wealth-producing organizations in two provinces, following the pattern in the United States, the only way you will get a redistribution of wealth to the other provinces under the present mechanics of society is through these agreements.

While I am on that point I might add that so far as I am concerned I did not come into this house to fight a party, either Liberal or Conservative. When I joined the group I joined, my quarrel was with the order of society under which I grew up through the thirties into 1939 and another war. My quarrel was not with the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition. My quarrel was with the mechanics of society which left people in the circumstances in which they were previous to 1939. I see in these dominion-provincial agreements, as in the other social security measures for which the present government is legislating, at least a move in the direction of changing things from the way they were and bringing about at least some degree of equalization and sharing the wealth.

This morning the Leader of the Opposition was emphatic in saying he did not agree with the centralization of finances and the centralization of taxing powers in the hands of the federal government. He believed that decentralization was necessary. I agree that decentralization is necessary in this country, not only in the field of finance but in the field of industry. Decentralization of industry is a very important point.

While there has been a lot said by the hon. member for Peace River and others in this debate on the question of financing education in the provinces, I think the main reason for that problem is that there are a great many municipal difficulties. Premier Frost made it quite clear at the conference of mayors. He said the development had taken place so fast in this province it had created municipal difficulties with which they were not going to be able to contend, such as more schools, more sewers and streets. He suggested at that time he thought the time would have to come when everybody would have to begin thinking in terms of decentralization.

As I see the proposition of the Leader of the Opposition, it is this. While there is a concentration of the wealth-producing organizations already in the two central provinces, to ask the federal government and the members of this house to go back and place the taxation powers in the hands of the provinces would mean a further concentration of wealth in the central provinces, because of the greater industrial development and the larger fields of taxation that exist in those provinces as compared with the other provinces that are not so highly industrialized. I think the proposition would mean not only a complete centralization of the industrial development of the country in those two provinces, but if the taxation powers were handed back to the provinces you would have an 80 per cent centralization of the taxes that are paid in this country in the two central provinces. Of course that would be good for them, but it would be bad for the part of the country from which I come.

I realize that there is not a province in Canada that suffers to a greater extent with respect to municipalities financing education than the province from which I come; but I do not think that going back to the system of taxation that existed prior to those agreements will help the municipalities. In fact it will hurt them in that part of the country. I read one very good survey made by the province of Saskatchewan. It was research into school financing. It came out last year and was a beautiful job of research right across the country. I have seen several other pamphlets put out by qualified people. None of those people suggest that you are going to benefit the provinces or municipalities in the field of education by reverting to the taxation system that existed before these agreements. Every one of the briefs and analyses that I have seen hark back to the same question, namely more federal aid to education.

You see, you cannot keep on demanding that the federal government do all these things and at the same time take the position that you are not going to give them the power that is necessary to weld this country together as a nation and try to bring about some equality. I took a look at our own position, and with all due respect to the letters that were read by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, I do not agree with him. Naturally, if I were on the bargaining side of the table and I was a provincial premier I would stick out for every last nickel I could get. I would do that in negotiating for any organization or for any group of people. That is the job of the negotiator. I believe more money could be used in the maritimes, but to say that this particular agreement did not do something for the province of Nova Scotia is to ignore the facts. Anyone who has taken the formula, the method of applying it as related to the population of the provinces, what the agreements were previously and what they will be when this legislation comes into force, will see that it has improved considerably. In fact the amount of money that Nova Scotia will receive under the present agreement, with the equalization, indicates that Mr. Hicks did a pretty good piece of collective bargaining, though he left the bargaining table and went back to his province not satisfied. I do not think any negotiator who is looking for some money for the people whom he represents should ever be satisfied. It is bad psychology to say you are satisfied.

In going through the agreement—and I did go through it pretty thoroughly, because I did a radio broadcast on this agreement some time ago, and to do that you have to examine the situation—I found that Mr. Hicks went back to the province of Nova Scotia with an increase of 20·1 per cent for that province. I am sure any union representative in this country who goes into a meeting with a corporation and comes out of the board room and tells the membership for whom he is negotiating that he got a 20·1 per cent increase in wages tells them something that is welcome news. It would be unexpected in many sections of industry today, but that is exactly the position in Nova Scotia.

I am not looking only at the amount of money they get at this time. I am concerned with this argument from different sections of the house and different parts of the country, and largely from provinces that are able to look after themselves, that we should get back to the system that existed previously to those agreements. I refer to the arguments that these agreements were war agreements; that they were emergencies. I believe that if the war had not broken out when it did in 1939 we perhaps would have had a revolution on the North American continent. We had a million and a half young men on the streets of this country with nothing in sight for them. If you went to Toronto even in 1940 you found hundreds of young men sleeping in the basements of churches. To say that these were war agreements designed to take care of war emergencies is to ignore the facts. I believe that those agreements would have come in any event. Had there been no war the trend we are following today would have had to be followed in order to bring about some equality in this country.

I would like to warn those who are saying that the agreements have no value and that the provinces are not getting enough—no, they are not getting enough—that I am prepared to hang on to the principle we have established and to continue the process of collective bargaining with the federal government in order to get the amount that we do need, in time. I think it is democratic to continue to bargain with them rather than to throw away something we have now that has a great deal of value.

If tomorrow we handed over the fields of taxation to the provinces the benefit would accrue to Ontario and Quebec. To some extent British Columbia might benefit, but to some extent every other province in this country would suffer. The important thing to remember is that by cancelling these agreements and giving back the provincial fields of taxation you would dry up the field of social security. In my judgment without these agreements, without the reallocation of the wealth from the centre to the frontiers of the provinces that have not any great industrial set-up, high succession duty collections and so on, the federal government would not have the money in the treasury to make improvements in old age security pensions, family allowances and these other things which in fact are merely redistribution of wealth and of great benefit to the whole economy of this country.

It is not giving anybody anything, because the people who are getting the money are spending it on the essentials of life. That in turn creates purchasing power, and the purchasing power in turn keeps the wheels of industry moving and keeps the employees working and producing. At the present time the federal government is committed in the field of social security alone to spend some $650 million a year. That is a lot of purchasing power in the social security measures alone. In addition to that, of course, under these agreements the maritime provinces are much better off than they were. I told the committee a moment ago that Nova Scotia is 20·1 per cent better off in cash under this new agreement than it was under the old one.

If we continue the process of collective bargaining we may arrive at the point where we can strike a happy medium and provide equality right across the country, but I believe we should examine our criticism very carefully. I do not know what happened at the conference in Fredericton; at least, I did not get very much news out of it. About all I heard on the newscast was that they held a meeting of four provincial premiers at Fredericton. They decided to set up a permanent organization. They appointed a secretariat. Mr. Hicks said that freight rates was one of his greatest difficulties; that the freight rate increase would make it more difficult for all industry in Nova Scotia to market their goods in the central markets.

I did not hear anything about these agreements. The premier of Newfoundland said they were going to get all they wanted. That is a good collective bargaining attitude. The premier of Prince Edward Island said they were going after what they wanted and he thought they could get it. I did not hear what the premier of New Brunswick had to say. He convened the conference.

I hope they will stick together, because in the final analysis this particular question is not political but economic. It is a question of bread and butter for the people in the provinces these premiers represent. I am sure that each one of them realizes, if they examine their position today and their position prior to the agreements, that they are in a much better position today than previous to the establishment of these agreements. I think this is in keeping with the trend of the times. You cannot turn the clock back and you cannot look back to prewar days to try and get a picture of what you should do today, because we are living in a spanking brand new world.

I believe that in 1939, when the war broke, the other scheme as it then existed died a natural death, and when we emerged from that war we began to build a brand new world. We are mapping the world anew. We are getting propaganda and practical demonstrations from these other countries. If you look at these things in a material way alone you can get the economic side of the picture. We have no yardstick by which to measure the future, because we are prodding into the unknown.

While some people may quarrel with this idea of centralization, I think there has to be a head to the nation. There has to be some organization that has the responsibility of giving assistance, direction and guidance in the development of our resources. There has to be some authority. As in the case of a man with eight or nine children, there has to be a boss in the house. You cannot let everyone be boss and arrange their program and do what they like on their own. The father has to take the lead and assume the responsibility for establishing law and order in the home.

Canada with its ten widely scattered provinces and with people coming in from different parts of the world has to have a good central organization, and I think that is what was envisaged at confederation. I believe anyone who sits down and reads the British North America Act as I have attempted to do realizes it was the intention of the fathers of confederation to have a central governing body. I believe that definitely was why the maritime provinces made the sacrifices they did. They realized they could not sit off in a corner by themselves and never help to build a nation. They were aware of the geographic problems they were going to have and the difficulty of marketing their products. They lost 50 of their basic industries. The first seven banks in this country were established in Nova Scotia, and that money was used to develop the markets and resources of that province. The resources were highly developed and their market was across the road.

They sacrificed all that; and although when you read the record of that period you find men like Howe and others making quite an issue of that particular position, nevertheless the people of the maritimes were prepared to go along with that and build a nation. I think you will find that in the maritime provinces today the people are more national minded than in any other section of this country. You do not have any difficulty selling the people down there on the idea of building this country as a nation.

The hon. member for Peace River said this afternoon that the wealth of the nation is produced by the people. Sure it is, but it is not produced just in one province. The gross national product is produced by the whole country working in co-operation. You will find Cape Bretoners cutting wood in British Columbia and you will find British Columbia machinery building the causeway down in Cape Breton. You will find Ontario machinery all over this country. The product of one province being sent to another and the economy of one province complementing the economy of the others is assisting to build this country as a nation. While the individual may work with his hands and produce the wealth, nevertheless he is not doing it as an individual but as a Canadian. In so doing he is trying to build the Canada of the future as a bigger and better place for his children to inherit.

As far as I am concerned, I have already put myself on record with my own people shortly after that conference took place. I knew the importance of this agreement to the part of the country I come from. I made it my business to sit down and examine the formula and work out the exact amount of money we were going to receive under this agreement, as compared with the agreement that will expire. As I said before, in cash it amounts to an increase of 20·1 per cent which the premier of Nova Scotia is going to have to play around with. I think he will realize—of course, he is young yet and he is new and we will have to be patient with him and help him all we can—

Mr. Winters: He is coming along.

Mr. Gillis: It has always been my position that I will oppose you on principle. I will try to defeat you but if I do not succeed and you are elected to run the affairs of this country then as a citizen it is my job to help you in every way I can and to kick you around when I think I have to, and that is the position I am going to take.

Mr. Pickersgill: A very sound doctrine, too.

Mr. Gillis: Whether I like it or not he is the head of the government in Nova Scotia and he has a tough job to do. I am not going to make it any tougher for him, but if he is not trying to do the job to the best of his ability I am going to kick him around and show the people that he should not be there, that we should get another man. But I agree with the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, the Minister of Public Works; I think that as a new premier he is learning very well.

Mr. Winters: He is doing a great job.

Mr. Gillis: I do not intend to hinder him. I just wanted to put myself on the record here, because I have already done it publicly with my own people. I might say I never received a word of criticism about this and even if I had, feeling as I do that this is not a bad piece of collective bargaining as far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, I looked upon it as my responsibility to say so. If I am honest I am obliged to say that. I shall not make an attempt to analyse what this means to Ontario, because that is a job for those members who represent Ontario. The same applies to British Columbia and the other provinces. As a Nova Scotia member I figured it was my responsibility to know everything I could about this particular agreement because I represent a part of that province. I also think that despite all the legislation that comes before this house, including national defence matters and others, this legislation we are discussing now is of more importance to the maritime provinces than any other piece of legislation that has been passed in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gillis: Another thought I would like to leave with the committee just before I sit down is that I do not think we are going to solve all the problems of the maritimes under this agreement. I think the main problem of the maritimes is development. We have to try to get back to the position we were enjoying in 1867. With all due respect to the confreres of the four provincial premiers, I hope they will do something.

The Atlantic provinces economic council has been working now for the past two years. It has a good secretary and some of the most important and competent people in the maritimes are on that council, with their main objective that of trying to bring some stability into that province. With that, coupled with measures of this kind, I think in time we are going to bring that part of the country back to its feet by developing industry that will work on the vast resources of those provinces. There is plenty of power in Nova Scotia. It is thermal power, and it is produced reasonably. I believe that any industry locating there can obtain power as cheaply as in any section of Canada. That is my information. There is a ready supply of power in the province of Nova Scotia and particularly the part I come from.

I do not envisage that anything is going to completely solve our problems in that part of the country until we get working on them ourselves and building the economic processes that will use the materials that exist in that part of the country. This, supplemented by the kind of legislation we are discussing today and coupled with the efforts of an organization like the Atlantic provinces economic council, will lead us to a solution for the problems of the maritimes.

Whilst I support these agreements for the value they have and the work they are doing, I do not envisage them as the kind of legislation that is going to solve our problems down there, because what we need is development. What I think would help Ontario is the realization that it is overdeveloped and has developed too quickly, and that its municipal problems are going to become greater and greater for the reasons stated by Mr. Frost at the mayors' conference. When they come to that realization there is a chance that some of the industry that is rushing in here because it is close to the main market and the main centres of population will be farmed out so as to bring about a better balance in the economy of the country and some protection in the event of war.

Mr. Chairman, my time is almost up, but I want to assure the house and the Minister of Finance that as far as I am concerned I am prepared to support this agreement as a step in the right direction, with the hope that the collective bargaining process in time will bring us to the point where we get something that is more satisfactory to everybody in the country.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): First I should like to say that I agree with what my hon. friend from Cape Breton South has said regarding the problems encountered by the maritime provinces, and I think he has been very fair in his reference to this legislation. We all know that the tax rental agreements were emergency agreements at the beginning of the last war. At that time they were never intended to be of a permanent character; they were for wartime only. After the war the federal government was prepared to discontinue the wartime agreements and let the provinces get back to a system they had followed previously of collecting their own revenues and spending at will.

I well remember the first conference that was held in Ottawa after I came here in 1945. At that conference there were seven of the nine provinces that felt that something along those lines should be done. Two of the provinces were opposed to it. Of course in the original tax rental agreement all the provinces were involved. The prime minister of that day stated that unless all the provinces agreed it would be impossible to work out any agreement with the federal government. I well remember that the premier of New Brunswick at that time, Hon. J. B. McNair, fought vigorously at that conference for an arrangement that he felt would be beneficial to the province of New Brunswick. I was proud of the stand he took at that time, and I believe that it was through Hon. J. B. McNair and some others that the arrangement we had during the war was carried on afterwards. I believe they deserved a great deal of credit.

In order to determine whether or not this arrangement we are discussing at this time is generous and fair, the reasonable method to use, in my opinion, would be to decide the amount that any province might collect from the fields that are rented to the federal government and then decide whether or not the arrangement under this proposal is fair. In looking over the figures that were supplied today by the Minister of Finance, I find that the tax fields rented by the province of New Brunswick to the federal government would yield $7,375,000. When I look down the list, I discover that under the new formula the province of New Brunswick will be paid $19,320,000. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South has said, those are the facts on which one must determine whether or not the arrangement is fair. When I look at those two sets of figures I am convinced immediately that as far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned, it is fair in every way.

Surely an agreement whereby for every dollar taken out of the province in taxation nearly $3 is returned could not be looked upon as a niggardly agreement. That is what the facts bear out in so far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned: we are getting nearly three for one. For every dollar taken out by the federal government in these fields we receive $3 in return. I believe it is most beneficial to us down there, even though there may be some who feel that the amounts should be increased. I am sure we shall discover that the feeling of the average citizen in the province of New Brunswick is that it is fair in every way.

The leader of the Social Credit party, when he spoke today, called the agreement a slap in the face. In reply I can only say that in so far as New Brunswick is concerned, if this sort of arrangement is a slap in the face I am one who would be ready to turn the other cheek at any time, for I feel that any arrangement whereby we receive three for one cannot be considered as niggardly or as a slap in the face.

In other words, under this tax-sharing arrangement about two-fifths of the total revenue of the province of New Brunswick will be paid directly by the federal government, and two-fifths of our revenue amounts to approximately $20 million. I am sure that without those payments it would be very difficult to maintain the services we need in New Brunswick at this time, or ever hope to improve them in any way.

It also must be borne in mind that in addition to this, which I consider to be a generous arrangement, there have been many other services provided for our province that under normal circumstances would be considered as purely provincial responsibilities. The minister today mentioned the fact that we have under consideration a health plan which would cost the federal treasury approximately $180 million. There is little doubt in the minds of any of us that the health of our province does come under provincial jurisdiction. There are the old age security payments, which were taken over by the federal government only a few years ago for those 70 years of age and over, who 20 years ago were considered to be a provincial responsibility. The federal government also pays 50 per cent of the cost of those between 65 and 70.

We all look back to the days of our boyhood—those of my age do, at least—when we had what were known as poorhouses or alms houses. We had overseers of the poor, and a person who was obliged to ask for assistance in those days was looked upon as a citizen who would not be too highly regarded; I can go that far, at least. I remember those circumstances well, and I remember how much I hoped that some day such circumstances might be improved. We have seen that improvement take place. The cost to a great extent has been borne by the federal government. We have also family allowances and unemployment insurance.

In my opinion the family allowance is one of the greatest means of distributing wealth this country has ever known. It is beneficial to nearly every family in our country. I have heard criticism of the department and the act, but I for one believe it is of enormous benefit to the children of the country. Again, it is a service that might be considered a responsibility of the provinces, but the point I want to make is that regardless of that fact the federal government has made every effort to distribute the wealth of the country fairly and equally to all. I believe that is one of the greatest things they have been able to do over this period of years.

The statement was made a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Cape Breton South that the wealth found in the different provinces should not be considered to be the property of the particular province. With that suggestion I heartily agree, because I am one who also believes that the wealth of the country belongs to the Canadian people. If some better way can be found of distributing the wealth of the country, that is the thing we are looking for; but to date I am convinced that the measures we have put on the statute books and the one that is under consideration today are very good examples of an honest, sincere effort to distribute wealth among the Canadian people.

Some in the central provinces may make the criticism, and they have a perfect right to do so, that this is taking from them and giving to the less fortunate provinces. My reply to such an argument would be that today perhaps 70 per cent—I am not quite sure that figure is correct—of our revenue is derived from the two central provinces, between 60 per cent and 70 per cent. We all know that the great and enormous industries of Canada are established in those two provinces. One can take so many different examples, but let us take General Motors or the Ford Motor Company or any of these large corporations. Their manufacturing plants are in Ontario. They sell their products in every province of Canada. There is no way in which the province of New Brunswick can be benefited so far as taxation is concerned. It is utterly impossible for us to reach General Motors in any way.

But through the taxes that are paid to the federal government, under the plan being discussed at this time and through the social services which we enjoy the federal government makes every effort to put the money from the taxes that have been collected back into the hands of those who could not benefit from them in any other way. I believe that is a fair and honest way of distributing the wealth of our country.

In his remarks the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings mentioned the fact that this was a take it or leave it proposition. I for one believe it should never be any other way. I do not believe that any province should be forced to do anything. It is purely a case of take it or leave it. So far as the discussion with the provinces is concerned, there is no doubt in my mind that they were given every opportunity in the world to present their views. I believe their views were very carefully considered by the Minister of Finance and the government. But when it is suggested that the provinces were called in and told that this was the proposition and they could take it or leave it, go home or remain and discuss it, I cannot believe for one minute that was the attitude taken by the federal government. I say again that I believe that no province should be compelled to accept the agreement unless it wishes to do so.

When I look at the province of New Brunswick again and discover that if that province refused to enter into an agreement it would have about $14 million less revenue, then even though they may ask for more and demand more, as the member for Cape Breton South has suggested, and that is a natural thing to expect, I believe that every premier in the maritime provinces realizes that this is a good agreement.

I might also say that in the four maritime provinces we have three Liberal and one Conservative provincial premiers. I have read and listened to statements made by Liberal premiers in the Atlantic provinces that I did not like. A discussion took place in Sackville last spring in which all their troubles were blamed on the federal government. I realize that they have a story to put over and that when they come here seeking assistance they have to use every argument possible, but I do believe that deep down in their hearts they realize that never prior to the last 10 or 15 years was the same consideration given to the provinces as has been given in that period by this government.

I am sure they realize that the treatment of all the maritime provinces under the agreement is fair and just in every way. I support the proposal without any hesitation, because I for one believe the day may come when these agreements are criticized to the extent that the government may consider turning back these tax fields to the provinces and allowing them to collect their own revenue, thus relieving the federal government of that enormous responsibility. There is over $600 million involved in these agreements. I think we must all realize that is an enormous amount of money. In fact it is practically the same as our total revenue in 1939.

That is the amount we are turning back to the provinces today. Should the federal government decide that some other plan the provinces might have was a better plan, or should there be dissatisfaction with the manner in which the agreements were negotiated by the federal government and the provinces were told to collect their own revenue and spend the money as they wished, I am sure that in the province from which I come the services we now enjoy would be greatly curtailed and any thought of improving services in the future would be forgotten.

Under this arrangement, as I have stated, we are receiving nearly $3 for every $1 taken out. I believe we should all be prepared to acknowledge that fact, and at the same time be prepared to state publicly and otherwise that in the opinion of the citizens of that area the agreement is fair and just so far as they are concerned. I agree with the principle completely because, as I have said, it is just another effort to distribute the wealth of the country fairly in order that the same services may be provided for all citizens, regardless of the part of the country in which they may live.

I know it has been most helpful to the citizens of the maritime provinces, and I hope that not only will the agreements continue for this period but that the criticisms we hear from certain sections will not be sufficiently strong to convince the Minister of Finance or the government that these agreements should be discarded because the provinces, which are finding it very difficult to get along financially at this time, would be then placed in a more difficult situation.

The member for Cape Breton South has suggested that this tax rental arrangement is not a cure-all. I am sure we can all agree with that. There is no one who would be more willing to acknowledge that fact than the Minister of Finance. He has suggested today that this is a matter that has been given a lot of thought and consideration, and that in the opinion of the greater percentage of the provincial premiers and treasurers who attended the meeting this proposal was an improvement over the old agreement. I agree that it is an improvement over the old agreement, because any agreement that provides a greater amount must be an improvement. It is true that the generosity which has been extended to the maritime provinces under this agreement will be of more benefit.

The one cure-all for that part of the country is cheap power, and at the present time that is something we cannot see in prospect. I do hope the day will come when we can develop electrical energy in the Atlantic provinces at a cost comparable to that in other parts of Canada. When that time comes I can see some hope for the development of manufacturing and industry. Until we can find some way to develop electrical energy at a more reasonable cost than is possible at the present time we must carry on as we have in the past.

I believe that conditions there at this time are much better than they were 15 years ago, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South pointed out. I believe they will improve in the next 15 years. I assure the Minister of Finance that the people I represent consider that this arrangement will be helpful to the citizens of our province. I am prepared to support it, and I know in doing so it will be approved by those who receive the benefits.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, we are discussing a measure the heart of which seems rather difficult to get at. There seems to be a considerable amount of disagreement among hon. members who have spoken as to interpretation. I believe that in general most of the hon. members who have participated have forgotten that this measure is a direct descendant, shall I say, of the Rowell-Sirois commission and the Rowell-Sirois report, and also that the Rowell-Sirois report was put before the conference with the provinces on January 14, 1941, and was unconditionally rejected by three of the premiers, conditionally rejected by three, and supported by only three. It is the fact that three premiers of Canada were free enough, brave enough and patriotic enough to reject that recommendation that makes it possible for us to consider this measure today.

If we can all keep that in our minds it will help us to view this measure against a background which might considerably modify our attitude toward it. We can now ask ourselves who were behind the Rowell-Sirois report? Who were the people who caused the Rowell-Sirois commission to be set up? What was the aim of those people? Are those people aiming to accomplish the same thing today? Is this measure designed to be a move in the direction of the achievement of the objectives which the movers behind the Rowell-Sirois commission and the Rowell-Sirois report had in mind years ago?

The danger we face is that the same men who designed the Rowell-Sirois commission and the Rowell-Sirois report may be in position today to influence very forcibly the present government, this Liberal government which is the successor of the government of William Lyon Mackenzie King, who I believe against his will set up the Rowell-Sirois commission and who I believe against his will called the provinces together in January, 1941 and asked them to decide in wartime on a matter which threatened the peace and harmony and unity of this nation.

There will be some who will say that is pretty extreme. Maybe it is, but I am afraid it is not. Everywhere we look today we see restless pressure for centralization. They are not content to allow people to govern themselves. We are working in NATO to deprive people of their sovereignty as nations, in organizations like the United Nations to deprive them of their sovereignty as nations. We have already accepted Bretton Woods with the object of depriving nations of their sovereignty. We are talking of world government to accomplish the same objective. It is everywhere in the air and everywhere in the press if we just listen and look. Can we expect that the men who are fundamentally and signally behind this centralization movement may not be seeking for centralization in Canada which could destroy the British North America Act?

When Major C. H. Douglas, the founder of Social Credit, was in Alberta in 1934 he told us that the two most perfect constitutions in the world were the British North America Act and the constitution of Australia. He told us that the powers who were seeking for centralization in the world were seeking by every means at their command to destroy those constitutions. Until they can destroy the British North America Act the sovereignty of the provinces cannot be destroyed. It will not matter very much if they get complete control of the central government of Canada, because the provinces can denounce the decisions which that central government may make.

I think a fairly good case can be made out for the general proposition that there is danger in this measure on the very score that it is a measure designed to weaken the British North America Act. One thing about it that leads one to suspect that is the fact that for the first time, as I recall, the bill has been sought to be introduced as a sort of enabling legislation. The bill had been planned to be introduced before the provincial premiers were called together in conference to make a decision. As I recall it that is so, if I am not right, then bring along the evidence. I do not have all the information, but I have quite a little bit respecting these matters.

In this case the provincial premiers did not meet and agree with the federal government as to the details which would be embodied in the act which will follow this resolution. The resolution is worded, apparently, to make it so that, as the hon. member for Peace River pointed out, the decision will in large measure already have been made before the provincial premiers come together in a conference. At least there will be a law on the statute books of Canada which can be used as a means of exerting most severe pressure on the provinces which, under the circumstances of tension, a measure of confusion and haste and all that kind of thing, can be used to cause a number of the provinces to weaken in their stern resolution to resist any encroachment upon the fundamental rights of the provinces to provincial autonomy. There is the great danger as I see it, and that is the great danger that more than one premier sees in this measure.

Now, if this kind of procedure is adopted at this time, then five years from today, using this as a precedent, another measure could be adopted just a little more severe. The first thing we know in perhaps 15 years we shall have the provinces in a position where everything will be almost cut and dried before they get together to discuss the arrangements to be made.

While mine is going to be probably more or less a philosophical approach to the whole matter, I suggest that some of the evidence which I feel I can adduce before the house will be most interesting to a great many members as evidence upon which they can base their thinking.

I think there is no doubt that it is agreed that after the premiers rejected the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois commission in January, 1941, and the dominion came back to them with the proposition that they would have a tax transfer agreement, in connection with which there was a certain amount of financial reward to the provinces. It is agreed that the end result financially to the provinces of the tax transfer agreement was beneficial. It is agreed by everyone that, when we came to the next two agreements, which were tax rental agreements, the net result was beneficial to every province, I think, probably, even to Ontario and Quebec, though I am not in a position to judge very well in respect of those two provinces. Certainly there was a substantial amount of financial advantage to provinces like Alberta, British Columbia and the maritimes. As a matter of fact every province in the dominion benefited, except perhaps Ontario and Quebec; they might have lost.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Now, in this resolution, we come to a third type of agreement. We had first the tax transfer; then we had the tax rental agreements twice, and now we come to another kind of agreement, apparently. The name of it is given here in the last part of the resolution as "tax collection agreements". I believe it is sound for each of the provinces as a whole to say, in effect, to the dominion government —Alberta, for example, might say this. "We as a province do not possess the necessary power to tax the Canadian Pacific, for instance, and make them pay. We have not the power to tax many other corporations". Most provinces would say almost exactly the same thing. Now the dominion government has full power to tax these corporations and make them pay their share of taxation toward the financial well-being of this country. Alberta, therefore, would say to the dominion, and the other provinces along with Alberta would say the same thing, "You tax them, and then divide the money up between us and yourself". This would be sound so long as the province of Alberta took the initiative, and the other provinces likewise took the initiative.

When, however, we get to a point where the central government says, "We are going to tax all these corporations and we are going to give you, the provinces, what we think you ought to get according to a formula," then that is approaching the problem from exactly the opposite to the right method. The first approach, where the provinces take the initiative and agree as to what should be done, is the democratic method. It is the method which you would expect to be used in a federal state where each of the members is a sovereign province under the queen.

That, constitutionally speaking, is exactly the state of affairs here in Canada now, and that is exactly the state of affairs I believe I want to hand down to my children, that the provinces be sovereign just as the fathers of confederation made them. If the dominion government, in this measure now before us, is beginning the method of taking the initiative and telling the provinces what it is going to do, then it is just exactly the opposite of what ought to prevail under a federal state; it is undemocratic, it is dictatorial and it is contrary to the British North America Act. It will result ultimately in the destruction of the British North America Act.

I hope I have made clear the general attitude I have in mind when I approach this measure. I strongly suspect, Mr. Chairman, that this method of procedure is the beginning of a mode of approach which will result in the dominion government taking the initiative, assuming command and telling the provinces what is going to happen. Because I believe that I am going to oppose this resolution with every bit of strength I possess. I believe it would be a good thing for the government to withdraw the resolution and call a provincial conference first. If it takes six weeks, let both parties talk the thing through and come to an understanding. Let the dominion have the provincial premiers put their case and listen. After they put their case then let our Prime Minister say, "What would you provinces suggest as an acceptable method of approach in respect to this matter? Obviously the tax rental agreements have been good for all the provinces, and very likely the tax collection agreement would be, whereby the dominion government collected certain taxes and divided them up amongst the provinces as they, the provinces desired they should be divided."

With that point of view, we the dominion government, say to the provinces, "Well, now, what is the best method of procedure; what is the best formula? How much money is involved? How much do you think we ought to have, because you know quite well, we, the dominion, have to have money to run the country. We have to have money if we are going to do more and more, as we have been doing"—the government has been doing that, and has been doing all the things the hon. member for Charlotte mentioned. All the things he said concerning the benefits which this government has conferred upon the various provinces are true. No one is challenging that.

Well, the Prime Minister would say to the provinces, "Now, you know we must have money and you must have money. Here we have a chance of raising money by taxes, corporation and income tax levies, succession duties. What is your idea?"

There would then be a wide divergence of opinion. I suggest they all should then do just what would be done in any public meeting. They should say, "Let us appoint a committee of the different provinces. Let them take this home, if they want to, and study it. We want this committee to come in and make recommendations that will seem to them equitable and advantageous in the circumstances." What an entirely different method of approach that would be.

The Prime Minister may say, "Well, I have not the time." I do not say he has, but he certainly has plenty of officials who have the time if he would tell them to go in there and listen to the provinces and let all work out the problem with the assistance of the dominion officials in the way of pointing out the difficulties confronting both sides. What difference does it make if it takes more than six weeks, if, at the end of that time, the provinces feel that there has been a straightforward approach to the problem with the objective of getting for everybody concerned the very best solution?

I think possibly I have placed my case before the committee in a general way. There will be those who will disagree. I would be surprised if there were not. I would think there was something wrong with me if everybody agreed with me, nevertheless I think there is a germ there. I have heard a great many people, prominent persons, express very much this same idea.

Now may we turn to the resolution just as it is? I have made this little introductory statement so that people could see what I am driving at. For the members of the committee and for those who will read Hansard out in the country I propose to examine a few aspects of Canadian financial history as those aspects may be related to this particular problem before us.

Meanwhile we have got so far away from the resolution that I think it would be well for me to read it so that those who read these remarks will know what we are talking about. The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the first day of April, 1957, and ending on the 31st day of March, 1962
> (a) a tax equalization payment with respect to individual and corporation income taxes and succession duties;
> (b) a provincial revenue stabilization payment with respect to such taxes; and
> (c) a tax rental payment in accordance with a tax rental agreement that may be entered into by any province as an alternative to levying such taxes on its own behalf;
> and also to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces.

This is the resolution we are talking about. Now, you will know, of course, as those out in the country would not know, that this resolution is the precursor of a contemplated bill, one measure in a considerable series of financial measures in Canada, commencing with the Dominion Notes Act of 1868 and including in the series, first, the Finance Act of 1914; second, the Finance Act of 1923; third, the Bank of Canada Act of 1934; fourth, such acts as have been passed by this house to legalize the tax transfer agreement and the tax rental agreements between the dominion government and the provincial governments which followed the rejection in January, 1941, by the provinces of the proposals recommended by the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations, set up by Prime Minister King on August 14, 1937. For those who want to find out where the authority is for that, may I refer to Mackenzie King's opening address to the premiers on January 14, 1941, at page 1 of the minutes of proceedings of that conference.

This present resolution appears to mark a new departure. It could be called an introduction to a tax collection agreement. It assumes that the coming dominion-provincial conference upon tax rental agreements will accept once more a dominion-provincial tax rental agreement of the general nature of those already accepted in years gone by, the difference being that this is a tax collection agreement.

It would have appeared more becoming if the conference had been held first and the provinces consulted before the bill was introduced, as I have already pointed out. Thus the provinces would be still in the position of taking the initiative, and the dominion would be acting as an agent for the provinces.

Now, the centralizers just hate the thought of an agent. They talk about the fears that the dominion will fall apart; there will not be any coherence. How in the name of common sense did we "cohere" up to the time the Rowell-Sirois commission was set up? We "cohered" pretty well then. We made a magnificent combination in world war I, and we accomplished a war effort that considering our resources probably surpassed that of any other community on the face of the earth. There was no big stick hanging over us in those days.

What held us together? The love of the union jack; the love of the king; the love of Canada; the love of the dominion; the love of righteousness; the love of Britain. These were the things that held us together, and these are the things that will hold us together in the future, far more solidly than any other consideration like laws, acts or agreements. Therefore those who believe in centralization and who fear that this dominion will fall apart if the central government does not have the power to command them need to revise their opinions in the light of the facts. We Canadian people are people who love great ideals, we people in Canada from coast to coast.

No, I do not hesitate to say that we look upon the dominion as an agent of the provinces put here to do a job for the provinces, just like the democracies in other countries. The government is their agent, their representative that exists for them. They do not conceive of themselves as existing for the government. That is the concept of the communist dictator people. Our attitude is entirely different. Therefore I do not hesitate at all to use that expression. Thus the provinces would be well in a position to take the initiative and the dominion would be acting as an agent for the provinces.

Now, then, by mentioning the individual income tax, the corporation income tax and the succession duties, the resolution reminds one of the Rowell-Sirois recommendation. I do not propose to go into that in any great detail at the present time, although I propose to go into details later on. Generally the Rowell-Sirois commission recommended that the provinces vacate income tax, corporation tax and succession duties as fields of taxation, in favour of the dominion, in consideration of certain financial benefits which the dominion would return to them.

I am not going to deal with that in detail at the present time. I am told that my time is up for the present. Therefore I shall make an end of these remarks at the present time, with the promise that when the time comes for me to speak again I shall deal with it then.

(Translation):

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, it would be superfluous for me to remind the house that we are now discussing one of the most important matters of national interest. Indeed, this year the matter of the federal-provincial financial relations seems to attract much more attention in the other provinces than it has in the past, but for us, citizens of Quebec, that problem always remains our main concern.

This year, the house is called upon to decide on a proposal different no doubt in its form from the proposals made previously by the federal government. First, the amounts offered the provinces by the federal government are a little higher than before; the government will therefore claim that this proposal takes greater account of provincial autonomy than did the previous centralizing proposals, since provinces are given a free hand in the matter of direct taxation: up to 10 per cent of personal income tax, 9 per cent of corporation income tax and 50 per cent of succession duties.

However, Mr. Chairman, this is no solution to the problem, and the amounts that the province of Quebec may receive are totally inadequate for its present and future needs since the economic and industrial development now going on in Quebec is but a beginning. Moreover, the constitutional rights resulting from confederation are no more respected than they were before.

Naturally, we could hardly expect a complete change of policy after the famous speeches delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on board the Saxonia and at the Reform Club, when he tried, in the strongest terms, to ridicule the stand taken by the government of the province of Quebec on that matter. Besides, this centralizing stand was reaffirmed by the four other federal ministers from Quebec and by the non-co-operating Liberal members, as my friend Mr. Mongrain called them during the last provincial electoral campaign.

They bore down heavily on the autonomous policy of Mr. Duplessis. They jested mightily about it, with results that are now rather well known.

While federal Liberal ministers and members did their utmost to belittle, in the eyes of the electors, the decentralizing policy of Quebec's premier, their provincial leader, Mr. Lapalme, stated on the same hustings that the federal government owed the province of Quebec $300 million which he promised to recover should the provincial Liberal party be elected. However, we must admit that the federal Liberal members did not say much on that point; they did not insist upon it, any more than they talked about the matter of the Chateau Maisonneuve, which only they can settle.

In fact, the resolution moved by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) and upon which we are called upon to pass judgment, is not the result of a conference between the federal government and the provinces; not at all. We are not being asked to ratify an agreement between the dominion government and the provinces, an agreement reached following long negotiations where every party concerned had previously examined the proposals made. On the contrary, once again the federal government acted in a centralizing and unilateral way. It called the provinces together, read its proposal and asked them what they thought about it, made a few minor changes here and there and said: "Do as you wish; this is as far as we can go," knowing full well that the provinces are not in a position to do without them, even though they found the amounts altogether inadequate.

The federal government proposes the 10, 9 and 50 per cent formula with equalization, but warns the provinces that it does not intend to add one cent. If you want more money, it is very simple, all you have to do is to levy additional taxes, or increase the present ones. If your municipalities are overburdened by heavy expenditures, and if your school boards cannot supply all the necessary schools and class rooms for a school population that has nearly doubled in the past fifteen years, the only thing to do is to levy new taxes or increase your taxes on real estate, even though those taxes are already too high and have long exceeded the limit.

As for the federal government, it dries up all other sources of taxation but says to the provinces and municipalities: "Levy new taxes", as if the provincial and municipal taxpayers were not the same taxpayers who are already so regularly and thoroughly fleeced by the federal government. As if those taxpayers were living in Africa! No, Mr. Chairman, those taxpayers who live in municipalities and in the provinces are the same ones who are faced with urgent needs; they are the same ones who must pay excessive taxes to the federal government, which is wallowing in wealth.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, prior to the dinner adjournment at six o'clock, I was saying that the federal government was wallowing in wealth while the provincial governments and the municipalities were facing the greatest difficulties. Here in Ottawa surpluses have been recorded practically every year since the end of the war, and these surpluses of $100 million, $200 million or $300 million which have been accumulated since the war now reach a total of close to $2 billion. That is an extravagant figure, and even this year many experienced people claim that the federal government may end the year with a surplus of close to three-quarters of a billion dollars.

That means, Mr. Chairman, that the federal government will have overtaxed the provincial and municipal taxpayers to the tune of $750 million, which makes absolutely no sense. And the proof that it does not make sense is that the federal government feels so rich that it rushes into adventures as scandalous as its gifts and its loans of more than $150 million to the pipe lines of Mr. Murchison and his friends in the United States.

These much talked of surpluses, Mr. Chairman, are piled up by this government at the expense of the provinces and the municipalities themselves. If this country is now experiencing an unheard of industrial development, which in turn fills the coffers of the Minister of Finance, it is due first of all to the provinces which are called upon to make the first disbursement, though they have to wait long after the federal government has helped itself, before they get anything out of it.

If you want examples, they are very easy to find. Take the case of all the new industries which come and settle in the towns of our province. First, the municipality has to ensure water, sewer, street or road services, garbage collection, snow removal, schools, etc. Most of the time, the municipalities have to grant tax exemptions and seek assistance from the provincial governments for the establishment of each of the municipal services, and, finally, the provincial governments have to help school commissions give these new developments new school buildings almost every year.

After all those expenses caused by a new development have been made, the federal government establishes mail service for instance, but here again, only after receiving delegation after delegation, after requesting that a sidewalk be built and that there should not be more than 80 feet between one house and the next, that the federal government agrees to provide letter-carrier service, even if it takes only one hour per day, at a cost of approximately $500. It is probably the only immediate expense that would be incurred by the federal government in a new development.

And all the time the plant is being built, the federal government,—which did not have to pay a single cent for this new development, collects the sales taxes on materials, income tax from the first pay day of each worker, and so on; and later on it collects taxes on corporation profits as soon as the manufacturer is making any money.

For a more concrete instance, take the case of Chibougamau.

The province of Quebec had to build a road costing more than $6 million from St. Felicien to Chibougamau, right in the middle of the woods, where there was not a living soul, and even before a single ton of ore could be processed. This road enabled an absolutely virgin area to become one of the most important mining centres of this country. Out of the pay cheque of each miner, out of the profits of each of these companies that were developing the fields, the federal government took the lion's share before the province even received a cent, though it was the province that had paid so much to bring this new development into being.

When everything was done and the strides of mining would have called for the building of a railway, it had to be demanded for years in this house. The companies, the chamber of commerce of the Lake St. John district, and the municipalities had to prove with figures to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marler) that the federal government could make a profit as soon as this railway was established. The companies were even asked to give written undertakings before the government agreed to build this railroad—

Mr. Villeneuve: None was given.

Mr. Balcer: Even when those gentlemen of the Department of Transport and of the Canadian National Railways had all the necessary evidence on hand, they required a further six months to think it over before they agreed to invest funds in a venture the outcome of which could no longer be doubted by anyone.

At present the north shore of the St. Lawrence is witnessing an unparalleled development: Baie-Comeau, Seven Islands, Labrieville, Havre St-Pierre, Schefferville, all those municipalities are mushrooming, producing for the country and paying taxes that are increasing steadily each year.

The province of Quebec is building roads in the most rugged country and large dams to provide electricity for the new economic development not only on the north shore but in the Gaspe peninsula and the rest of the province. Cities are built, schools go up by the hundreds and the federal government gets millions of dollars out of it while the provincial government spends its funds. And if you ask for a railway to link this new industrial empire to other parts of the country, the Minister of Transport says you are a dreamer.

To give another example concerning my riding, I am going to mention the harbour of Three Rivers, one of the few whose operation is paying the federal government a profit.

The Three Rivers harbour, Mr. Chairman, lacks modern equipment and sheds. Very often the goods of our manufacturers are left on the wharves, exposed to rain and weather, because of the lack of sheds. The amount that the federal government proposes to spend on improvements to this harbour, from which it derived millions of dollars, is $35,000, and this only after the representations of the chamber of commerce of Three Rivers, and those of municipal authorities, which I have been echoing in this house.

Do you know what the chairman of the national harbours board said when the board sat at Three Rivers? This gentleman told us emphatically that if new companies in Three Rivers needed additional wharves, the board would not impede that development and would make sure that they be given to those companies once they are established there.

The federal government, which does not want to give up its privileged position as far as taxation is concerned, a position in which it has entrenched itself during two world wars, always resorts to the same pretext, national defence.

Every time anyone talks about income tax reductions, the government answers that it is impossible on account of national defence. Whenever public works are required that would help industrial development, we are told that it is impossible because of national defence. And whenever the provinces ask for more generous treatment by the federal government, they too are told that it is impossible on account of national defence. However, although the necessary national defence expenditures are high, at present, they are not likely to increase as the years go by, while the expenditures that the provinces must assume in order to ensure the industrial development of Canada are and will be steadily increasing from year to year.

Besides, is it not obvious that Russia tends to transform her threat of military conflict of these last years into a threat of economic domination. And the western countries, such as England, are going to reduce their war budget, their national defence expenditure, to undertake a greater economic development. Canada will no doubt have to follow that example, and while federal defence expenditures will be on the wane, the provinces will have to face the prospect of economic warfare and pay the costs of it should the present fiscal agreements remain in force.

The Minister of Finance makes much of the fact that one of the most interesting features of the present federal proposals is that the province of Quebec will be in a position to receive the same amounts as the other provinces without having to sign any agreements to that effect, agreements which the people of Quebec province would never, in fact, have signed, as was so often demonstrated in the past.

It is high time that the people of Quebec should cease to be placed in an inferior financial position and to lose vast sums of money simply because its government, answering the all but unanimous views of the people, has refused to be a party to agreements which run counter to its traditions, to the traditions of the province, to its autonomy and to those rights guaranteed to it by the constitution of this country. However, the proposals brought down by the Minister of Finance in this resolution do not solve the problem within the meaning and the spirit of the constitution, not even for the next few years. What is in fact required is a federal-provincial conference in which the federal government and the provinces will consider the steps to be taken for a fair distribution of taxation fields, so that the provinces may play their part in their own sphere. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) so aptly stated, the power of taxation means the power to govern, and the government of the province of Quebec must enjoy its own powers of taxation so as to be able to administer that province which, no matter what is said, is different from the others because of its language and its faith.

Education is the guarantee of the survival and development of the French Canadian race on the North American continent, and it is the duty of the Quebec government to preserve it with jealous care. To do so, it must have the power to legislate on all matters pertaining to education within the province. The power to legislate cannot operate soundly without the power to tax for the same ends, and that power cannot operate soundly if the province is at the mercy of the central government's subsidies.

That is why, Mr. Chairman, while the federal proposals are an improvement as far as the amounts to be paid the provinces are concerned, I consider first that these amounts are inadequate to meet the enormous responsibilities of the provinces in the economic development of the country, of which they are the main architects.

And then I feel that, while the federal proposals acknowledge for the first time that the provinces have a certain right to direct taxation, that acknowledgment is still utterly inadequate, for the federal government should not dry up the source of that taxation in order to pile up unjustified surpluses.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I will vote against the resolution of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the wailings of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), uttered with the sluggishness of a litany. And, while he was speaking, I was asking myself how it happens that he and his leader are not entirely of one mind.

It is true that the Leader of the Opposition dealt with the question of provincial rights, but was laying stress especially on the amounts of money, as if the amounts of money were more important that the provincial rights themselves. As for my hon. friend from Three Rivers, I grant that he discussed the question of autonomy, that same old story on which they have been harping for fifteen years, especially in the province of Quebec. But he dwelt at some length on the wealth of the federal government. He dwelt on the financial side of the question, and I wonder whether his purpose would not be to sell that autonomy, if the amount offered was high enough to attract his attention.

Indeed, his friends complain everywhere that their autonomy is jeopardized. In what way is their autonomy jeopardized in this resolution?

Now, the first part of the resolution provides:

> A tax equalization payment with regard to individual and corporation income taxes . . .

It is merely an act of distributive justice on the part of the government, which offers to share the revenue it always got and will be getting, even if there were no agreement, with the poorer provinces, in order to help them overcome the difficulties they have to face. It is not a matter of asking whether anyone is happy about it. To establish a certain balance with regard to the provinces who are experiencing very special difficulties from a lack of revenue because they are sparsely populated, or owing to bad soil conditions, or an unfavourable economic position preventing them from developing their farm economy, or their industry as they should be developed—the federal government pays certain sums of money from its regular revenues. This plan seems extremely logical, because the country consists of ten provinces forming a single unit. Now, just as in the human body, the whole body is affected when an arm aches, the same happens in a national body. This is why, in order to make Canada a prosperous country able to play its full part in the world, the federal government has thought of giving some of the poorer provinces some additional fields of revenue, so as to enable them to emerge from their difficulties.

How can this gift of revenues from the federal government to the provinces who need them jeopardize the economy of the other provinces? I know that my honourable friend, who is a lawyer, would have great difficulty in proving before an impartial jury outside of this house that this would in any way prejudice the autonomy of any province. Part of the revenues of Ontario and British Columbia, as is the case for others, is taken, but these two provinces will receive nothing; the poorer provinces will benefit.

With regard to industry, the province of Quebec which occupied the first place in 1939, now comes in fourth place, precisely because of the activities of the friends of the member from Three Rivers, who are now administrating it. The federal government takes pity on the provincial government for its unsound administration of the affairs of the province. The province needs something to get over its troubles.

It may be that the population of the province of Quebec has been deluded. If we made a thorough study of the means the provincial government has taken to achieve its ends we may believe that the population of the province of Quebec has not been deluded but robbed. The hon. member knows the methods which have been used by his Quebec friend.

Mr. Balcer: You remind me of school children. When, during a hockey game among school children, one team is behind 22 to 1, it may admit defeat but says that the referee was against it.

Mr. Caron: The remarks just made by my hon. friend leads me to think that he has not yet reached full maturity.

I wonder if an impartial jury would accept what the hon. member for Three Rivers has just stated, namely that the province has been wronged because the federal government has decided to make her a gift to enable her to overcome some of her difficulties. For all the parties concerned, it is only an agreement signed between the provinces and the federal government. How could the rights of the provinces be encroached upon if, as a result of negotiations with the representatives of the federal government, the provincial governments finally agree to accept as a fair amount what will be given to them in exchange for certain taxation powers? How can one say that there has been an encroachment upon the rights of the provinces when those same provinces have accepted the agreement? If any province refuses to sign the agreement, if she does not accept it, its autonomy will not be jeopardized. It is contended that so much has been lost due to the fact that the agreement has not been signed, but nothing has been lost if there has been no agreement. It is just like the parable of the vineyard. The worker hired in the first hour received no more than the one hired in the last. However he received just as much. This was distributive justice.

I do not think that the member for Three Rivers is convinced of the truth of what he is saying. The very tone of his remarks demonstrates that fact. He claimed that the premier of Quebec had been ridiculed when he had brought up the subject of autonomy. Well, that is quite possible. We may very well have held him up to ridicule. But he who has always spoken of provincial autonomy has never been able to respect municipal or educational autonomy. More particularly has he been no respecter of the autonomy of trade unions, since he has denied workers the right to think for themselves. We also have the right to criticize the government of Quebec on that score. There are a great many other charges too that we could level at the friends of the hon. member for Three Rivers. During the recent Quebec elections Mr. Duplessis, in his speeches and campaign publicity, claimed that all existing pensions were paid for by the Quebec government, that they were granted by the provincial government, which even added family allowances. Why, the government of the province of Quebec never paid a single penny in this respect. With the help of any advertisement that appeared in the papers, I could prove that the provincial government claimed credit for establishing family allowances. They do not have the courage, nor the honesty, to say that the old age pension for those 70 years old or over is paid in full by the federal government. Let them be honest enough to admit that the federal government pay 50 per cent of the pension for people between 65 and 70. Let them be honest enough, when they request the federal government to respect provincial autonomy, to respect the truth.

Mr. Balcer: No wonder Mr. Lapalme was beaten.

Mr. Caron: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the people have realized that the provincial government tried to mislead them. Besides, the hon. member for Three Rivers continues to mislead them by his remarks. He claimed that it took years and years to get a railway line in the Lake St. John area. That line was approved as soon as it became necessary. Surely, the federal government was not to build a railway when there was no need for it or when eventual profits did not justify the undertaking.

Obviously, he has nothing but criticism towards this government as regards the port of Three Rivers. The board responsible for the administration of that port, an independent body, promised to reorganize the port of Three Rivers when the need is felt, if there is an increase in the number of industries. But that is not what the hon. member for Three Rivers wants. He would have the government venture into an undertaking without considering all its aspects. The hon. member for Three Rivers says to the people of Quebec that, when a reduction of income tax is requested, the answer is that it cannot be granted because of national defence. No one can deny that the problem of national defence is paramount.

Canada, like the United States, Great Britain and every other country in the world, feels that this is a problem of the greatest magnitude. We know that the threat of war continues in the world, and that as long as it does all governments will continue to prepare to defend their rights and liberties. The government, along with every other government in the world, is working for national defence and striving to ensure that the hon. member for Three Rivers retains the right to speak as he has just spoken in this house. And this will hold true as long as this threat hangs over the world.

National defence is, at the moment, a necessary evil. If we wish to continue to live in peace in this country we must remain prepared. As the Latin proverb puts it, he who wants peace must prepare for war. The United States are spending enormous sums in this country to help us in defending the continent, since Canada is far more vulnerable than their own land.

Is not France obliged to spend huge amounts for its defence? It is the same thing in Great Britain, the same thing in Italy, the same thing again in every democracy in the world.

The hon. member for Three Rivers is ill-inspired when he is blaming us for doing what every NATO country is doing.

At any rate, I have more confidence in the opinions of our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and our Prime Minister who are in a position to get all important and valuable information, than in the lucubrations of the hon. member for Three Rivers.

The government of the province of Quebec should stop recriminating; it should stop indulging in petty politics and the like; it should stop destroying in order to try to lift itself up. The hon. member for Three Rivers should stop his demagogy.

The Ottawa government is proposing sound and wise measures, such as to help the provinces to solve their problems. As far as I am concerned I support the federal government in everything it is undertaking with a view to helping the provinces to lead an easier life and to meet their needs.

(Text):

Mr. McLeod: Mr. Chairman, I feel rather hesitant in rising to my feet after the display of emotional oratory we have just heard. I do not blame the hon. gentleman a particle, because this is something which should arouse deep feelings. My only regret is that I will not be able to do justice to it. What the minister said in introducing the resolution did not salve my feelings a particle when he used phrases such as "implement the offer." That is good proof of what we claim this to be, that it is nothing less than an offer by the federal government to the provinces and is not anything in the nature of an agreement as we are given to understand it is.

Then we heard the phrase "allow the provinces." That is another phrase I do not like. I do not think it is up to this central government to allow the provinces any rights so far as taxation is concerned. These tax rights were granted to them many years ago when this confederation was first born, and I do not think phrases such as that help to ease a situation which to say the least is packed with dynamite.

Those speakers who have spoken thus far have certainly covered the ground quite fully, and it is rather hard to find something new to bring up. The Leader of the Opposition did a splendid job this morning in outlining the general principles on which our opposition to the bill to follow this resolution should be based. The resolution states:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund—

I do not like that "pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund." I should like to ask a question. Where does the money come from that is placed in the consolidated revenue fund? Is it not money that has been collected from the various provinces and the people who reside in them? A sentence such as that would give the impression that a dole is being handed back to the provinces from this general revenue fund. It may be a payment from the consolidated revenue fund, but in my opinion it is nothing more nor less than a refund of a small part of the money the central government has collected from the provinces.

Then we come to paragraph (c) of the resolution, which says:

> (c) a tax rental payment in accordance with a tax rental agreement that may be entered into by any province as an alternative to levying such taxes on its own behalf;

There is talk there of an agreement, but from what we can gather from the expressions of opinion in the different provinces from one side of Canada to the other it is very doubtful if there will be any agreement. If an agreement is made, how has it been reached? Further, I cannot see any possibility of this being anything more than a one-sided agreement to which the federal government alone agrees. Then why the rush in introducing this legislation at the present time? Why not wait until there is an agreement?

I wonder if there is any sinister motive, such as the idea that the central government can go to the provinces, once the bill following this resolution has been passed by the house, and say, "This is what has been passed by the parliament of Canada. It is up to the various provinces to attach their signature to it in order to close out what has been approved by this parliament as representative of the people." I think possibly that is the principal motive, in order to strengthen their hand in the forthcoming settlement which, at the present time, is very far off. I do not like this idea of the strong voice or playing from strength in so far as the central government is concerned.

The increasing authority this government are placing in their own hands is, step by step, vesting in this government the sole right to tax. There have been various other infringements of provincial rights which we have seen during the past few years. We are all well aware of the old saying that the right to tax is the right to govern, and what will follow this measure will certainly take away from the provinces the right to tax and substitute therefor the right of the federal government to perform all functions. There is also an old saying that whoever collects and handles the money will want to call the tune.

Now that the right of taxation is being delegated to the central government, where are the rights of the provinces? What has become of provincial autonomy about which we heard so much? This whole problem, Mr. Chairman, of federal-provincial relations and it is a problem—is to my mind being approached in the wrong way. In my opinion the provinces of Canada should be calling this conference and not the central government, just as at the time of confederation it was the provinces which called the conference to set up this central government. It is from the provinces of Canada that this central government receives its authority. I maintain that this still is an institution, and should always remain an institution, to carry out the wishes and the will of the provinces of Canada and the people who live in those provinces.

I agree that it is sound policy to have one collection agency. The way to have that agency set up would be for the provinces and the federal government to get together and work out some plan for the collection of these taxes through one central agency. Instead of that, at the present time we have the central government saying in effect, "We have decided that we shall collect all taxes on a national basis for the next five years, and we shall pay you a small percentage of what we collect in the provinces. A formula has been arrived at. We have carefully figured this out. If you want to accept it, it is there for your signature. It is our only offer, so take it or leave it".

Where is the idea of confederation about which we heard so much in the early days when this country had its birth? I am satisfied that if those statesmen who gathered around the conference table some 89 years ago—Macdonald, Brown, Tupper and Cartier —could see the turn events have taken since their day they would not be too well pleased. What would they think of the central government imposing its will and authority upon the provinces which they were so careful to agree should retain autonomy within the federation?

When a conference is called, it should be called to consider this whole problem. I believe all the provinces should be given an opportunity to lay their cards on the table. They have their problems. They have revenues to find to cover such things as health, mental institutions and so on. They need money for universities and technical training, a serious problem which was raised here today. They need money for roads, bridges, public buildings and all that sort of thing. Why not have all the authorities get together and lay that information on the table, then come to some kind of an agreement? It could be a tax rental agreement, or whatever you like to call it, and these points could be considered. We could work in harmony and close co-operation in the setting up of this single agency for the collection of taxes, but we should see that sufficient was left in the coffers or returned to the coffers of the various provinces in order to take care of those things I have mentioned.

It is not only the poor provinces but some of the wealthiest provinces that are having considerable trouble financing the increasing demand for services. This is a nation-wide problem which extends right from the Pacific to the Atlantic. It is not only in the federal field that the cost of government has increased. In fact we find that the increase in the cost of the federal government has been much less than for provincial and municipal governments.

For instance, in 1945 the expenditure of the federal government was $4,527 million. In 1955 it was $4,733 million, an increase of 5·5 per cent. In 1945 the total cost of the provincial governments across Canada was $384 million. In 1955 it had risen to $1,505 million, an increase of 293 per cent. Just think of that. In 1945 the municipalities, Mr. Chairman, had a total cost of operation amounting to $344 million. In 1955, 10 years later, it was $1,293 million, an increase of 276 per cent.

These figures show that we have federal increases in the cost of government of 5·5 per cent, provincial increases of 292 per cent and municipal increases of 276 per cent. This is something that must be given very careful consideration. Under the staggering costs these figures show, what can the provinces and municipal tax collecting agencies do when they find that their fields of taxation are being encroached upon by the federal authorities? They might well ask themselves, where is this money to come from?

There is one field of expenditure in my own province that I should like to spend a few moments on, and that is the matter of roads. The government of British Columbia has set up a five-year program for the building of roads into forest areas known as public working circles of that province. In the next five years they are committed to build 1,460 miles of roads. The total cost of those roads is going to be $41,350,000.

It is true that the British Columbia government will get some revenues from the forests that are tapped by those access roads, but what about the huge taxation that will also accrue to the federal government through access being provided and those areas opened up? It is estimated that in the area which those roads will serve there will be a yearly take from the forest of $64,787,916. The total for the five years is estimated to be $323,939,580. From that staggering amount, Mr. Chairman, the central government is going to collect, by way of income and corporation taxes, a huge amount of money; yet in opening up those areas not a five cent piece will be given toward the staggering cost of $41,350,000.

Then we have our arterial highways and bridges. For these they have set up in the province of British Columbia a 20-year program. There are yet to be built 2,086 miles. The estimated cost of that program is $397,500,000. In that 2,086 miles are included 350 miles of the trans-Canada highway. The central government is contributing toward that. I am very glad to say that road will go through the most expensive area of British Columbia, so far as road-building cost is concerned, and I think a very wise decision has been made in that respect. There we have an outlay on arterial highways of $397,500,000 for the next 20 years.

But that is not all. There are also other, what we call in British Columbia pioneer roads, opening up new areas in the north and districts that have not yet been reached by highways. That mileage cost in the next 20 years will be $498,500,000 and the number of miles will be 3,530. If we add these together, Mr. Chairman, we find that for the next 20 years the province of British Columbia is faced with an annual cost of $44,800,000. That is the cost at present.

Those new roads that are being built into the undeveloped areas will tap the forest resources, the mineral resources, the gas and oil resources of the north, and the new agricultural areas. It is true there will be some wealth accrue to the government of British Columbia, but at the same time millions of new money will find its way into the treasury of the central government as a result of the opening up and the development of those areas, yet of the expenditure of $44,800,000 annually not a five cent piece will be contributed by this central government.

Then, of course, we come on down to what we call our country and feeder roads. I have not the figures on these, but I know it is a staggering amount. Of course that is something that is the problem of the municipalities and the smaller local governments of the province of British Columbia. I think it is only right that in arriving at any agreements with the provinces items such as these should be given consideration and should be taken into account.

I agree there should be a plan to assist the so-called have-not provinces, but this should be done by building up the poorer provinces, not by tearing down the standards of the wealthy and more industrialized provinces. The old socialist slogan, even accepted by some today, and voiced in parliament since I came here, is that in order to make the poor richer the rich must be made poorer. This is just as outdated as socialism itself. It is not right that in this modern age, in approaching the question of balancing the standards of living, you might say, among the provinces, this same method should be followed. It is certainly not the ideal of free enterprise which we in this country profess to believe in; yet in reaching an agreement such as we have before us at the present time that is the system which is being used.

To back that up I should like to read a paragraph from the brief presented by the province of British Columbia on federal-provincial fiscal relations, just to show the committee that this is not my idea alone:

> British Columbia has constantly advocated financial assistance to provinces in depressed economic circumstances, but there is a vast difference between one method of securing greater equality and another. One way is to level up; the other is to level down. One way is to raise the real income of the worse off without endangering the standards of living of those with special abilities who have the means to provide greater awards. The other is to deprive this group of the gains which would accrue from ability and potential worth.

Yet that is the policy which is being adopted by the central government in their approach to the problem we are considering at the present time. We believe that where there is criticism there should be some suggestions. I do not think it is right and correct for a person to stand up and tear down unless he has something to offer in return. I should like to present two or three suggestions for consideration. First, with respect to this resolution, I would like to see the whole thing done away with except the last line, which reads:

> To authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces.

I would say the only way to arrive at such agreement is for them to gather around a conference table and sit there for days and weeks if necessary until an agreement is reached. Second, immediately call another conference with all the provinces and give sympathetic attention to the varying needs of the provinces, and careful consideration to all problems that are in the national interest such as education, health, highways, highway transportation and development of natural resources that are in the national interest. Third—and this is the most important; it is the environment under which these agreements are reached—endeavour at this conference table to create a spirit of co-operation and let the provinces know that the spirit of confederation is not dead; that there is still such a thing as provincial rights, and that the federal government exists for the sole purpose of discharging the duty of administering the affairs of Canada in the interests of all the people of Canada and of all the provinces of Canada in which those people live.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Chairman, like other hon. members who have spoken to this resolution I too am greatly interested in the legislation. As the minister said this morning in his opening remarks, we all know pretty much what it is going to contain. I was rather hoping he was not going to make such a definite statement, that an opportunity would still be left for bargaining and that it would not appear that an agreement was going to follow as a result of the legislation from which rightly or wrongly one gets the impression that the government is saying, "We will offer you this and if you do not like it you do not have to take it".

That just does not seem to me to be the way an agreement should be arrived at. An agreement is usually arrived at through a meeting of minds, and each party has an opportunity to present his views. I do not mean to imply that the provinces were not given an opportunity to discuss the matter, but from reports of the conferences that were held I cannot help but gather the impression that while the provinces were permitted to put forward their cases, their formulas and problems were not given the consideration I feel they should have been given because—and this is the ground on which I base my statement—if the provinces' propositions had been given consideration I do not think the premiers and officials of the provinces would have returned home and said that the offer which the Prime Minister submitted in his letter of January 6 was not sufficient to meet the needs and carry out the services of the provinces, which are fair and reasonable under the Canadian standard of living, or words to that effect.

The resolution itself, of course, is leading up to enabling legislation. I do not think there is any reason why it should not be brought in at this time. I do not agree with one of the speakers who suggested that the legislation should not be brought in. I can see no reason for not bringing it in, because it is enabling legislation. It seems to me, however, that the government should convince us that they are going to be fair in the agreements they present, and will give the provinces a fair opportunity to present their cases if they want us to support this resolution. The government should assure us that the views of the provinces will be considered and that through negotiation and by compromise something will be arrived at that is satisfactory to at least the majority of the premiers of the various provinces. As I understand the situation as it exists today, they are not satisfied.

Perhaps I could just digress for a moment. This whole matter arose in the dark days of the war when it seemed right for all the resources of this country to have been concentrated in a central authority in order to successfully prosecute the struggle in which we were then engaged, which was a life and death struggle involving Canada and her allies. At that time the provinces and municipalities under the agreements entered into were guaranteed as much as they had been collecting up to that time. During the latter years of the war and up until 1946 or 1947, when the agreements ran out, the people became accustomed to the system of single taxation. In many cases the provinces did away with the administrative machinery they had used to collect revenue, and as I said the people became accustomed to the single taxation system. In effect I think it was more equitable. I feel the central government has a better and fairer method of collecting income tax and succession duties, because it is sitting here like the head of a family. I believe it is true that the people would rather pay into one treasury than into several.

One opinion was extremely well expressed by Mr. Matheson, the premier of Prince Edward Island, during the negotiations last fall among the various governments. I am going to quote his words, because I think he expressed the feeling of the maritime premiers and the people of those provinces concerning the renewal of these agreements at the end of the war. This is what he said:

> Referring to the provinces.
> —accepted the tax rental agreement offer—

Notice that, "the tax rental agreement offer". You cannot get away from the idea, whether or not it is correct, that these have been offers, which have been presented to the provinces by the federal government, which has said, "That is all we can do; take it or leave it." Mr. Matheson said they accepted it:

> . . . not because it represented some recognition of fiscal need but with a hope that during the lifetime of that agreement a more satisfactory formula would be devised. In 1952 the federal government proposed a new guaranteed minimum payment based on the one allotted to a province under the 1947 agreement with an increase proportionate to change in provincial population and per capita gross national product between 1942 and 1948.

> No recognition of a province's fiscal need problem or its tax-raising ability was taken into consideration in the reallocation or distribution of the tax moneys, but the same old factors were again used in the formula—the gross national product of Canada and the population of the provinces.

He concluded:

> One of the principal functions of the tax rental agreements was that they were to ease the finances of the provincial governments possessing the lowest fiscal capacity.

Rightly or wrongly I believe that was the principle that was supposed to have been followed under the tax rental agreements from the beginning. The underlying principle was to make it financially possible for provinces whatever their tax base to carry out and perform their constitutional functions, and to provide a reasonable level of provincial services without abnormal burdens of taxation. This includes the province's responsibilities to the municipalities.

That brings me to another point I should like to mention. It has been stressed a great deal by all the speakers today, but I should like to say something further about it and I hope to approach it from a different angle. You may say that I am municipal minded. You may think I am altogether wrong. Perhaps I am; nevertheless I have views, and I know they are shared by many others.

The municipalities must be kept in mind when these agreements are entered into. With all respect, it seems to me that these negotiations between the provincial and the federal authorities have started from the wrong premise. I shall try to explain that. It seems to me that the governments have approached this from the top and gone down. To me the proper method of approach in arriving at any agreement which is going to give the people any relief from taxation and a fair division of the tax moneys collected from the people of this country is to start at the bottom.

It seems to me the first thing that should be done is that the provinces should be asked to lay before the federal authorities the requirements of their municipalities in so far as the real necessities that must be furnished by the municipalities to the people are concerned. We are all very familiar with those services which are the primary responsibility in so far as the taxpayers in our communities are concerned; education, hospitalization, roads, streets, water, sewage disposal, police and fire departments, and to a large extent the administration of justice. Those are essential services. I think the people of Canada have a right to expect a certain level of those services all across this country under our constitutional set-up. I believe that has been brought out more than once by various commissions.

Therefore I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Charlotte. I do not think the people are going to be satisfied, and I am very mild in that statement; because I feel, and a good many of us feel, that we in New Brunswick and in Prince Edward Island and in Nova Scotia deserve just as good schools, and our teachers should be paid just as much money; we should receive just as good equipment; our young people getting an education should have the same privileges as they would have in Ontario or any other province where they have a much broader base on which to assess. In a province like one of those in the east, the federal income tax people collect our income tax, which seems to come first; the corporations have to pay corporation tax; and the estates have to pay succession duty tax. Of course that does not come into municipal matters.

But take the municipal tax collector. The municipality has to assess for those schools, for the buildings, for the teachers, for the equipment, for the transportation. They have to find ways and means of getting that money, and the money must come from earnings. Earnings will depend very much on the type of industry in the locality. In our province we have to resort to poll taxes, which some provinces do not have to resort to. We have to resort to personal property tax in order to raise money locally to provide the best service we can in the way of education, hospitalization and these other services.

In rural municipalities it used to be that education did not cost very much. In fact I remember quite well that even in the period after the war the cost of running the schools in the municipality where I used to live was in the vicinity of $60,000 to $70,000. Last January the budget presented to the municipality for the same area was over $400,000. Even though, as Premier Matheson has said, the dominion did not take into consideration the fiscal needs, they may not have been impressed upon the federal authorities in 1946 because the period 1946-47 was when these costs commenced to rise. Prior to that, as I have just pointed out, the cost of education was rather a small item. It has kept going up until now it is a very large item. Still we have no more resources to tax. Our tax base is very narrow. Once the income tax is taken and the corporation tax is taken, we have to look to the province for the balance.

I am not going to criticize or brag about what our province has done. I am not familiar with what others have done, but I know, because I have been connected with municipal governments right along, that our province has increased grants to the municipalities by a very considerable amount. As my hon. friend from Charlotte says, percentagewise it has not increased so much. I have no complaint about that, but they have received enormous sums. The point is that everything else has increased. The province has to spend more money on other essential services, and the revenue is taken up in meeting those other services.

That brings me to another point which I think should be mentioned. I notice that in that report there is an extensive list of services rendered by the dominion and the provincial governments, services in the fields of health, welfare, and education to some extent but not in the most necessary fields of education; it is for vocational training mainly. Then there is the field of agriculture and the field of national resources, for which there is quite an extensive table. However, what the provinces have to do is to meet those services dollar for dollar. I believe most of them are essential, but I feel that some of the services in that list, which the federal government has been offering to the people through the provinces on a share basis, are not as essential as education, health and justice.

There is another point I should like to mention. First, I claim that this federal authority and the provincial governments should find out the essential needs of the municipalities to provide at least the minimum service at the level of what we might call a Canadian standard of living.

Second, I think there should be an investigation into the essential provincial services that have to be rendered to the people in order to keep the province abreast of what the people expect by way of roads, bridges and various other things. I know we have a tremendous number of bridges in my province, and it is very expensive to maintain them. In addition, so many of the old roads are narrow. Demands are made for wider roads, and we also have heavier equipment using our roads today such as buses, trucks and so on. These are all essential provincial services.

Having established these minimum essential services, I claim that the federal government should then commence to consider what their minimum requirements are. After all, there is only one source of taxation and it is very foolish for two or three governments to try to see which one can get there first or get the most. I think it should be a sensible thing to sit down and say that those are essential, those are essential and we have certain other essential services. But after sitting here for four years and looking at some of the estimates I am satisfied, and I cannot be convinced otherwise, that the government can tighten its belt and furnish the essential services that are required with a lot less money than is being spent now.

There is one other factor I wish to mention. Industries from which income taxes and other revenues are collected settle in a municipality and the first government they contact is the municipal government. I know that the practice to which I am about to refer has been carried on over the past years and I know that, rightly or wrongly, it is still going on. I do not say it is right and I would not be surprised if the Minister of Finance said it was not the fault of the federal government and that it was wrong in principle. However, the fact is that when an industry settles in a municipality it immediately approaches the municipal governing body and asks for tax concessions. In many instances those concessions have been granted by municipalities in order to encourage industry to settle there. They have been granted in order to assist industry to get going.

But after they have got started, are doing well and are progressing, who gets the first returns? It is the federal government. They get them through corporation taxes and through income tax paid by the people who work in those industries. Then the municipality, which has to furnish the services for the industry, has to tax the land and the people. The municipality has to come second. As all members know, there is a limit to the extent to which you can assess real estate in the form of land; and I say without fear of contradiction, and I know hon. members from the province will support me, that in my province the municipalities have reached a point in taxing real estate beyond which we have no right to go. In fact it is a point beyond which it is not safe to go, because the people cannot afford to pay more taxes and retain their real estate. It will be cheaper to let the municipality take it.

These tax concessions are a fact and I think they should be taken into consideration when negotiations are being carried on between the provincial and federal authorities. In some instances the municipal authorities grant tax concessions to industries extending over a period of 20 or 25 years in order to keep the industries there, and during that period the municipalities fail to realize revenue from them. Rightly or wrongly, it is a fact and it should be taken into consideration.

I say again that I feel we start at the wrong place when we start at the top and go down. It seems to me that is exactly where these negotiations have been starting. The federal authorities figure out how much they must have to maintain their services, and then they say there is only so much left. Education, health and the administration of justice are three things that take a lot of municipal revenue. In case some of you do not know, may I say that it is surprising how much a municipality has to raise for the administration of justice in order to furnish the buildings and provide other things. As I say, I do not think these three things should have any boundaries.

I think every child and every other person in Canada should have an equal opportunity to acquire an education. Under the framework of our constitution this responsibility of course rests upon the municipal authority. That is why it seems to me that in all fairness we should find out what the essential services are and how much money it is going to take to provide a reasonable standard of education, a reasonable standard of health and a reasonable standard of justice throughout the nation. That would be one place to start.

I think there is a good foundation to be found for this argument in the past, and also good reason for us to be talking about it today. Reference has been made once or twice to the Rowell-Sirois report. There is a quotation from that report which seems to me to be applicable. It is to be found in chapter 5 of book 2, and has to do with adjustment grants about which I intend to say something later. It has this to say:

> They are designed to make it possible for every province to provide for its people services of average Canadian standards and they will thus alleviate distress and shameful conditions which now weaken national unity and handicap many Canadians. They are the concrete expression of the commission's conception of a federal system which will both preserve a healthy local autonomy and build a stronger and more united nation.

That brings me to the second part of my remarks. According to the premiers, and they should know best, these agreements are not sufficient to bring the people of the provinces up to the standard of living which I think Canadians should expect. As a matter of fact I do not think they measure up by any means to the declaration of the Prime Minister when he set out what he thought—and I agree with him—was the intention of these agreements. His remarks are to be found in one of the letters and are set out at page 747 of Hansard of January 31, 1956. I think this is a declaration which should be lived up to, and if I felt it was being lived up to so far as the provinces are concerned I could very readily support the legislation that will follow this resolution. He said:

> The present government has no intention of abandoning the objective of the tax rental agreements which is to make it financially possible for all the provinces whatever their tax base to perform their constitutional functions themselves and to provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services without an abnormal burden of taxation.

That is in line with the Rowell-Sirois report; it is in line with what I said at the beginning I thought the idea was when they started out with these agreements. I think the agreements have been a good thing, and I think the maritime provinces want these agreements renewed. As a citizen of one of those provinces I believe it is far better to have agreements than to be compelled to go back into these fields of taxation, because we have such a narrow tax base.

We have no resources to tax, that is as yet. Unless the principle which has been recognized has been carried out, we will be faced with difficulties. In order to carry that out it seems to me that you have to go right back to my suggestion. You have to find out how much is required by the municipalities for education, hospitals, streets, roads, fire protection and so on. You have to find out what it is necessary for the provinces to do. When that has been arrived at—and there may have to be some compromise but I think it can be worked out—you have a point at which to begin. It seems to me that it could not have been approached from that standpoint or we would not have had all our premiers dissatisfied.

There is another situation we have in the maritimes which in my opinion does not apply in some of the other provinces. We were the original partners in confederation, and as was stated in the Rowell-Sirois report succession duties, income tax and corporation tax were considered as national taxes which should go into the national revenue. I agree with that. I believe the central authority can do the best job of collecting; but just because it can do that job of collecting, just because it got into that tax field during the war and finds it is a grand place to get money, is in my opinion no reason why it should want to hang on to it. I submit the provinces must be given sufficient so they can provide a reasonable Canadian level of provincial services, as set out in the Prime Minister's declaration. The formula which I understand will be incorporated in the legislation to follow is not going to do that.

Therefore I cannot see how I can support this legislation or any legislation that follows unless I have some assurance on behalf of my people that we are going to have sufficient money out of these agreements to permit us to provide the same level of services which the richer and more fortunate provinces can provide. There are one or two other things I wanted to mention, but I believe my time is up.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman, I rise to take part in the debate on this resolution tonight because the municipalities in the county which I have the honour to represent are finding that the revenue they are able to collect from real property is not sufficient. They are taking all they feel they can take, and the squeeze is getting tighter and tighter because of the increased need for new surveys, roads, bridges and educational facilities.

I do not propose to go into all the details of these agreements which have been brought out today, as I think they have been covered pretty well pro and con, nor do I propose to go into their history. I well remember that in 1945 one of the things I was asked to digest was the Rowell-Sirois report. Even to this day I have not been able to take in all its ramifications. However, I do propose to bring to the minister's attention some of the things which are happening in the municipalities. I mention the municipalities particularly because they are less able to expand their tax base than either the provinces or the dominion.

I would point out that no government can give anything until it takes something away from someone. While there may be three different levels of government doing the taxing, there is still only the one taxpayer, the one source of income. I think it was pointed out quite well today that the responsibilities of the federal government have been expanded and extended since the close of the war. No one can question the increased amount of social services which have been asked for, no doubt with more to be added. No one can question very much our expenditures on national defence. I think everyone is worried about the future as far as national defence is concerned, but I do think we have less to show for our national defence dollar than for any dollar spent by the municipality. I believe the municipality can show more for its tax dollar than any other taxing authority in the country.

We must consider the tax revenue which the municipalities receive and compare it with the services they provide in the way of education, roads and other things. I have here a breakdown of what one municipality does with the money it collects. Another thing we must realize that is out of every tax dollar collected, only 11 per cent is used by the municipality. That should make us wonder that they are able to do as much as they do with the little they get.

In the case of the municipality in which I live, 25 per cent of its tax dollar goes to the county; 45 per cent is used for schools, and only 30 per cent is used for township purposes. They have very little to use of the tax dollar they collect after the schools have taken 45 per cent and the county another 25 per cent.

People think rigid economy on the part of the federal government could provide some saving, but I suppose the minister will ask me where they should start. I find that with an election not too far away surpluses are piling up. Probably that is not attributable so much to the government's good housekeeping as to the increase in the gross national product which has taken place.

As I pointed out in the beginning, the municipal governments are really the weakest. They are not able to expand their tax base, nor are they able to demand from provincial or federal governments a much greater share of the tax dollar. The situation has become so serious in some municipalities that they are discouraging the opening up of new subdivisions and that, in a sense, is rather serious. These municipalities feel that for the time being they had better consolidate their position and let some other municipality take the influx of population and also carry the burden so far as schools, roads and other services are concerned. As the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton so ably pointed out, the municipality has to take care of education, streets, hospitalization, water supplies and sewage disposal. Those are only a few of the items.

When it comes to the question of water in southwestern Ontario, we are almost surrounded by the great lakes but the water supply problem is quite acute. The water resources committee of the province of Ontario is trying to aid the municipalities in securing water supplies in a co-operative way, in order that many municipalities can take advantage of the abundance of water that surrounds them. Then there are other municipalities which, in a sense, are stealing water right from under another municipality and selling that water back to the same municipality. They are also dumping the water back into the municipality in the form of a kind of diluted sewage, to the detriment of the neighbouring municipalities along the rivers or streams of the province. Municipalities are hesitating about installing improved sewage disposal facilities because of the tax rates. They realize that when these additional improvements are made, the tax rate must go up.

There is another aspect of the problem of which all levels of government should not lose sight. When taxes are imposed on a land owner, he cannot pass them on to anyone. The taxes at other levels can become part of the cost of doing business, and they also become a part of the cost of goods that go into the export market. When the level of taxes becomes too high we find ourselves in a difficult position. I realize, of course, that taxes only become a small part of the cost of manufactured goods, but they are a part.

Now, I do not suppose anyone realizes the impact of all these problems better than the reeves and mayors of the various municipalities in the province. I do not intend at this time to go into the details of the various resolutions the reeves and mayors have placed before the various governments, but they are the ones who are closest to the people and their resolutions should be seriously considered.

There has been considerable said in the press and other places about United States investment in Canadian resources. I am just going to digress for a moment to point out that if more of the Canadian taxpayers' earned income were left in their pockets, more Canadian dollars would be available for investment in Canadian resources. I want to point out also that the federal government should be exemplary in its own tax-paying policies. The percentage of tax the federal government pays on its property should be 100 per cent, not a percentage depending on the concentration of federal properties in any one municipality. The federal government, in my estimation, should be in no different position from the ordinary taxpayers in this country. Why should they be in a preferred class? Some time ago there was a reference in the newspapers to a municipality on Manitoulin island that was threatening to sell some government property for taxes. I have not heard anything about it lately, but probably the minister will say something about it when he replies to the various criticisms that have been hurled at this resolution.

Mr. Harris: Don't base your case on that one.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I mentioned earlier that it seemed strange how surpluses develop about the third or fourth year of any parliament. However, I have noticed that the surpluses are never used to alleviate the problems of the municipalities. The government always seems able to find what appears to be a better use for the money. I think it was back in 1953 or 1954 that the federal government took in by way of taxes about $4,500 million, or 67 per cent of all the tax moneys paid. In the province of Ontario the province got about 20 per cent, and the municipalities $900 million or 13 per cent. I understand that over the years the municipalities' percentage has been reduced to about 11 per cent.

I have some resolutions from some municipalities in the province of Ontario dealing with this question of dominion, provincial and municipal share of taxes. This is a resolution from the city of London, dated May 14, 1956. It says:

> Whereas the last quarter century has seen great changes in the living standards of the people of Canada;
> And whereas these changes have increased the variation in the personal income of the citizens;
> And whereas the increased standards demand more and more public services both material and cultural;
> And whereas the municipal governments are asked to supply many of those services from taxes based on values unrelated to modern incomes;
> And whereas the municipal percentage of the total taxes paid has dropped from 29 per cent to 11 per cent despite the fact that mill rates have increased while provincial and federal rates have decreased;

Those are the factors presented in the resolution to bring to the attention of the authorities the plight of the city of London and the municipality of Long Branch near the city of Toronto. Last year the city of London paid $150,000 in sales tax to the senior government.

I just want to read one paragraph of another resolution of May 24, 1955:

> And whereas this problem has been drawn to the attention of the dominion government on many occasions and, notwithstanding assurances that the submissions of this and other municipalities would be studied during the preparation of the annual budget of the dominion government, no action has been taken to afford relief to the municipalities of Canada by way of exemption from sales tax.

Here is one municipality that pays $150,000 in one year into the coffers of the government. I suppose the minister will reply by saying, "Well, we have to get the money somewhere", but it seems to me that this is a type of, shall I say, double taxation that puts an unfair burden on the home owner in the municipality.

Let me read one paragraph from the submission of the city of Fort William:

> The high cost of financing capital improvements is threatening and seriously curtailing the expansion program of many municipalities in Ontario.

Then the survey commenced by the United Nations has this to say:

> Wages, salaries in Canada rose 4½ times, 1935 to 1952, and government spending six times.

Therefore the actual squeeze of taxes becomes greater and greater as time goes on.

Then the minister will recall that very recently the president of Stelco had this to say. I can remember when they were talking of taxes to control inflation. They were going to draw off surplus purchasing power in the hands of the consumers, but the president of Stelco does not go along with this idea. He said:

> It is difficult to understand the argument that high taxes curb inflation, H. G. Hilton, president of Steel Company of Canada Limited, said today at the company's annual meeting.
> "What difference can it make as far as inflation is concerned," asked Mr. Hilton, "if we as individuals spend or save our money as we see fit, or if our governments take it from us and spend it as they see fit?"

I think that answers in a way the claim that governments are taxing to help control inflation. In a sense it sometimes adds to inflation.

Along with other hon. members who have taken part in this debate, I was hoping that out of those conferences that have been held and the many things that have been said about them pro and con, probably some equitable solution to the problem would be found; and I think we shall hear more and more of this as time goes on.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, at this stage in an 11-hour day I daresay that the keen edge of the minister's mind and his receptivity to suggestion or even to constructive criticism are somewhat dulled, so I shall begin by giving him the best of my thoughts on his resolution and save perhaps the more critical remarks for the morning.

It appears to me that the principles on which the minister justifies the resolution in the addresses he made on it are principles which everyone would accept. Perhaps the difference will be in the application of those principles. I refer to the first of those basic considerations for which he was striving, as enunciated in an earlier speech, and that was to make revenues available to the provinces consistent with their responsibilities. I am sure that is what every member of the house wants to secure by any federal-provincial arrangement, an assurance that the provinces will have the means of carrying out their responsibilities.

Then the next principle was that of maintenance of full employment. I think the minister said maintenance of a high level of employment. That is a theory that was raised with very considerable enthusiasm by all governments and parties some years ago and subscribed to with a great deal of zest on the hustings and in the House of Commons; and it is, of course, a much to be desired end.

The third reason behind this scheme of federal-provincial agreements was that of simplicity in collection, which all taxpayers appreciate; and equity, I think the minister said, to the taxpayer. I daresay the ends which he would define as being his ends are those that I myself think are desirable; that is, a strong central government with adequate resources to carry out its obligations, and strong and independent provinces with adequate resources to carry out their obligations. The real problem is how to achieve both of these results in an effective and harmonious way. I suggest that the basic test by which this resolution should be judged and by which the bill should be analysed when it comes before the house is whether it does tend to the maintenance of the confederation, of the federal principle of government.

Some people may ask, why should we maintain the federal principle of government? I do not think the minister is one of those. All of us recognize that times change and that there is a need for change in any constitution or in any system such as our federal system, and that from time to time there is a shift in emphasis with a change in the economy. Therefore since 1867 we have seen a great many conferences just like the one which recently concluded. I think there have been 17 interprovincial and federal-provincial conferences in all, and if one counted the conference which began on July 9 in the Atlantic province, the conference among the four premiers of the Atlantic provinces perhaps we could count 18. They have been ample proof of the need for reconsideration of the basis on which responsibilities and revenues have been adjusted in our federal system.

But the basic factors which were present in 1867 are as pressing and vital today as they were then. I think those factors are that Canada is a country of two races, two languages, two cultures; that there is diversity, and there needs to be local government to satisfy the needs of diverse groups. There is in addition the diversity of our geographical location and division, which does not need to be recalled to this house because it has often been mentioned. Those diversities are as real as they were then and need recognition today as they did in 1867.

The problem is to create unity in the face of so much adversity, as has been said by Professor Corry of Queen's University in a very apt phrase. While a substantial part of Canada desires local autonomy—and there is no question that the substantial part of Canada does desire local autonomy—it is clear that the federal system has not outlived its usefulness and is the only means by which we can achieve unity in this country. I think no one who speaks the French language would deny that over 30 per cent of Canadians ardently desire the right to be different. That seems to me to be the conclusion of all sound opinion; therefore, as I suggest, it is the basic test which should be applied to this resolution and to the bill which is to follow it.

There are two aspects to the resolution which the minister has presented, and they are separate, distinct and different in principle. The first aspect is that of the division of taxing powers, and you might call that the arrangement for the renting of tax fields or the sharing of tax fields, depending on where the emphasis is put. The emphasis has shifted since 1946. In 1946, when Mr. Ilsley introduced his budget after an unsuccessful attempt to reach an agreement among the provinces, the emphasis was on the central authority renting from the provinces their major tax fields; and those tax rental agreements which were entered into by most of the provinces at that time gave way in due course to a further series of agreements with a slight shift in emphasis. Now in 1956-57 the agreements are running out and a new arrangement must be found.

Despite the fact that these agreements have not met with acceptance by any of the provinces I think it is fair to say there has been decided progress in the approach the minister has made and in the ingenious development of the theory which has been developing over the course of 10 years. I would like to acknowledge the ingenuity and skill of the members of that great department of government who have devised the new formula.

The improvement which I acknowledge tonight and suggest exists here is that there is now greater evidence than there has been in the past of a desire to share those fields which are the property of both the provinces and the dominion. The emphasis in the past has been more on keeping control of those tax fields by the dominion and paying the provinces some subsidy by way of rental for the use of the fields, but one can see here that there has been an effort to achieve a balance between the two ideas of the rental of the tax fields to the federal government and the joint occupation of those tax fields or the sharing of them between the two levels of government.

The other aspect of the proposed agreement is that of subsidy, and it takes its form here in equalization payments. That is not a new idea, as I shall indicate a little later on, but it is a vitally necessary part of the fiscal arrangements between the federal government and the provinces. It has been recognized since the time of the earliest agreements that some subsidies were necessary and some such payments had to be made to those parts of Canada and those governments which perhaps gained less from confederation; or shall we say, using the words of some of them, "suffered more from confederation" than others, and therefore had to be compensated to put them in a position of equality with the others.

We have had constant reminders of the feeling that certain parts of Canada have contributed more to and received less from this union. We have even had suggestions of secession from time to time, but perhaps they have not been too serious. I reemember that one wag gave a name to the secessionist movement in Alberta and British Columbia a few years ago. He suggested that when that part of Canada broke away the two provinces in their united form might very well be called "Albumbia". There have been rumblings in the maritimes from time to time, and it is not clear yet whether confederation has been accepted in the newest province, Newfoundland.

In any event I think our objective in trying to work out a new fiscal arrangement within the federal system is to allay as much as possible these feelings of injustice which to the minds of us on this side of the house appear to be pretty strong and rather widespread.

As I understand the position, the minister comes to the house with a resolution, but he is not in a position to say that if we pass the resolution and the bill any of the provinces will welcome it as a solution to their problem.

Mr. Chairman, it is ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with this tomorrow and then take the resolution in the name of the Minister of Justice with respect to an amendment to the Supreme Court Act, then the second readings of bills in my name for several insurance companies, and then the Public Service Superannuation Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CIVIL DEFENCE

Question No. 416—Mr. Bryson:

1. By provinces, what civil defence projects submitted for 1955-56, for federal aid, were rejected by the minister, and for what stated reasons?

2. Do the federal civil defence authorities provide financial or material support in fighting peacetime disasters within the provinces?

3. What are the forms of assistance available to the provinces by appeal to the minister, to meet the costs of fighting the current floods in western Canada?

4. What financial or other help did the federal civil defence authorities give last year or in previous years to any of the provinces for peacetime disasters?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. (a) Saskatchewan project 6B—$7,500. During 1954-55, 10 trailer-type fire pumpers were purchased by the province, the federal government paying half the cost. The province wished to purchase a further 10 pumpers during 1955-56 on the same basis. However, investigations by the federal civil defence division revealed that the first 10 pumpers had not been utilized in the provincial training program to an extent sufficient to justify the purchase of 10 additional pumpers requested.

(b) Alberta, Lethbridge, project 14—$4,450. This proposal was to provide heating installations in exhibition ground buildings to enable the sheltering of evacuees in the possible event of a disaster occurring during winter months. Federal policy precluded participation in this project that was not for the specific purpose of "improving and strengthening of a civil defence organization for the purpose of combating the results of enemy action upon the Canadian people and their property".

(c) Alberta, Riley, project 31—$296.35. This proposal was for the purchase of fire hose and couplings. Riley is a small town, remote from any potential target area, and therefore could not be of any assistance to such an area in the event of an emergency. It was also considered that as the requested fire hose would be used largely to meet the normal requirements of the town it should be purchased from municipal funds.

(d) Alberta, Drumheller, project 34—$1,422.15. This proposal was for the purchase of a boat, motor, and portable fire pump with hose, to assist during annual spring flooding and to maintain water supplies. The project was rejected for the same reasons as indicated in (b) above.

(e) Alberta, Red Deer, project 35—$8,128. The proposal was to provide an extensive warning and communications system. It was rejected as the proposed system was considered to be far in excess of actual requirements under present federal planning and policy.

2, 3 and 4. The federal civil defence authority does not assist financially in the event of a natural disaster. However, materials provided free of charge to the provinces for training purposes have been utilized combating peacetime disasters. While federal assistance has been provided in past years to the provinces for peacetime disasters, it has been the practice to direct this aid through channels other than the federal civil defence authority.

OLD AGE SECURITY STATISTICS

Question No. 542—Mr. Follwell:

1. What were the total payments under the old age security legislation in each of the years, 1953, 1954 and 1955, (a) by provinces; (b) in the constituency of Hastings South?

2. What number of persons received old age security in each of the years, 1953, 1954 and 1955, (a) in each province; (b) in the constituency of Hastings South?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

Questions

1 (a). Total Net Old Age Security Payments

Province	1953-54	1954-55	1955-56
Newfoundland	$ 7,242,820	$ 7,459,680	$ 7,599,405
Prince Edward Island	3,203,780	3,261,800	3,313,980
Nova Scotia	17,702,477	18,149,526	18,411,345
New Brunswick	12,606,600	12,945,905	13,246,139
Quebec	72,032,527	74,724,977	77,110,979
Ontario	125,775,222	130,296,095	134,644,236
Manitoba	20,052,895	21,051,155	21,953,424
Saskatchewan	20,111,120	21,202,779	22,331,243
Alberta	20,137,730	21,418,246	22,681,995
British Columbia	39,880,100	42,449,810	44,657,286
Northwest Territories and Yukon	225,520	245,360	268,440
Total	$338,970,791	$353,205,333	$366,218,472

1 (b). Old age security records are not maintained on a constituency basis.

2 (a).

Number of Pensioners as at March 31

	1954	1955	1956
Newfoundland	15,343	15,693	15,973
Prince Edward Island	6,669	6,786	6,884

OLD AGE ASSISTANCE STATISTICS

Question No. 543—Mr. Follwell:

1. What were the total payments under the old age assistance legislation in each of the years, 1953, 1954 and 1955, (a) by provinces; (b) in the constituency of Hastings South?

2. What number of persons received old age assistance in each of the above years, (a) in each province; (b) in the constituency of Hastings South?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1 (a).

Federal Payments under the Old Age Assistance Act for the fiscal year

Province	1953-54	1954-55	1955-56
Alberta	$1,107,190	$1,165,332	$1,240,452
British Columbia	1,863,052	1,872,909	1,788,309
Manitoba	1,112,322	1,119,639	1,111,604
New Brunswick	1,248,339	1,288,095	1,303,189
Newfoundland	896,429	898,973	877,213
Nova Scotia	1,028,756	1,063,165	1,046,927
Ontario	4,726,153	4,858,693	4,918,978
Prince Edward Island	85,986	98,531	99,660
Quebec	7,187,259	7,392,923	7,357,373
Saskatchewan	1,017,535	1,089,705	1,150,402
Northwest Territories	14,251	18,942	21,000
Yukon Territory	880	2,220	3,080

The cost of old age assistance is shared equally by the federal government and the provinces. The amounts paid by the provinces for the three fiscal years would be approximately the same as the amounts shown above.

1 (b). Federal records are not maintained on a constituency basis.

2 (a).

Number of Recipients as at end of fiscal year

Province	1953-54	1954-55	1955-56
Alberta	5,014	5,341	5,521
British Columbia	8,144	7,868	7,441
Manitoba	4,838	4,847	4,652
New Brunswick	5,756	5,808	5,891

POST OFFICE BUILDING, WAWOTA, SASK.

Question No. 550—Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What is the total cost of renovating the building now being used as post office at Wawota, Saskatchewan?

Questions

2. Were tenders offered in respect to provision of a building suitable for post office accommodation?
3. Was the owner of the former building utilized as a post office given notice of no further contract prior to selecting a new building?
4. If so, when?
5. What was the rent on the former building?
6. What is the rent on the present building?

Answer by: Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works):

1. Information not available. The post office at Wawota is in a rented building. It was a condition of the lease that the lessor carry out certain renovations and alterations to make the premises suitable for postal accommodation. These improvements were carried out by the lessor at his own expense.

2. Two offers were received and considered.

3. The lease was on a month to month basis. The lessor was given the required one month's notice of intention to vacate, in accordance with the terms of the lease.

4. Notice was given on February 3, 1956, that the premises would be vacated on or before March 31, 1956, and that rental would be paid to March 31, 1956.

5. $35.00 a month for 296 sq. ft. of space.

6. $102.50 a month for 820 sq. ft. of space.

AIR TRANSPORT

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—STATEMENT AS TO PLANE PROVIDED FOR TRIP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Prince Albert made an inquiry yesterday about the aircraft used by His Excellency the Governor General on his recent flight from Ottawa to Calgary as part of his western tour. I agreed with him that Her Majesty's representative should always have the best means of transportation available for any of his official tours. The Ottawa Journal said yesterday:

> When Prime Minister St. Laurent checks into the reason why the government's far-travelled luxury aircraft, the C-5, wasn't available to take the Governor General west, he will find that he himself was responsible.

That is probably true. I was on the C-5 returning to Ottawa on July 7 and reached Ottawa about 45 minutes after His Excellency had taken off for Calgary in the North Star aircraft No. 17520, which he had used for his northern trip. I can assure the house that when it was decided it would be preferable for me to travel to and from London by air for the prime ministers' conference in London so as to be away from the house as short a time as possible, I was somewhat disappointed because I had hoped earlier that it would be possible for me to travel by sea.

I was quite unaware that making the C-5 available to take me to and from London would interfere in any way with any plan for a flight on an official tour that His Excellency might wish to make. I was informed that when inquiry was made whether the C-5 would be available my office was informed that it would be available, that before giving that answer there had been communications with His Excellency's secretary, and that His Excellency had expressed the desire that the C-5, which is the only government plane that is proper for a trans-Atlantic flight, be used for that flight. Had I known that it was going to interfere with any plan that had been made for His Excellency's own flights on an official tour in Canada I certainly would have insisted that other arrangements be made, because I think these tours of His Excellency as Her Majesty's representative are extremely important.

It had been suggested to His Excellency that the Viscount, which is the only other pressurized plane in the government service, be placed at His Excellency's disposal. But His Excellency felt—and quite properly, in my opinion— that because there was going to be a guard of honour to receive him at Calgary it would be preferable for him to arrive there in an R.C.A.F. plane rather than in a plane in the service of the Department of Transport. But it certainly would have been possible for me and my department to make other arrangements and I would have insisted that they be made. I know it is difficult to secure accommodation on commercial lines without long notice with regard to reservations, but I am sure it would have been possible to have those arrangements made. I certainly would have endeavoured to avoid a situation, though I was unconscious of it, which would allow any newspaper to say that I myself was responsible for the fact that this plane which His Excellency had used for his northern flight—and which was the only one that was appropriate for the flight and which he had found very comfortable—would be used for this flight to Calgary.

I am sorry the incident occurred, because I quite agree with the hon. gentleman and I feel that hon. members of the house will agree that these official tours are an extremely useful part of the way His Excellency is carrying out his duties and responsibilities as Her Majesty's representative in Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question, and it is this. How many aircraft are available to members of the government? Is there not a Viscount used by the Department of Transport?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that the Department of Transport has a Viscount among the aircraft operated by the department. In the case to which the Prime Minister has just referred the use of the Viscount was offered to His Excellency but, for the reasons which the Prime Minister has just given, he preferred to use the North Star.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ATOMIC ENERGY

CANADIAN VIEW OF RUSSIA'S SUGGESTION TO END EXPERIMENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What is Canada's view of the extremely interesting announcement made by Mr. Shepilov yesterday with regard to the banning of experiments with nuclear weapons? He gave three alternatives that I think would appeal to people who are asking for the banning of this bomb. What is the government's position with regard to these three proposals?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are studying with great interest the speech given yesterday by the Soviet foreign minister which dealt with this matter, but have not yet come to any conclusions with regard to it. As my hon. friend knows, the disarmament commission has been meeting in New York. It concluded its meetings last evening. At this session my friend and colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) made a statement on Canada's policy in this matter. Whether as a result of the statement made in Moscow yesterday by the Soviet foreign minister our position should be revised in any way is a matter we are now considering.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister whether the representative of Canada at the United Nations recently stated the attitude of Canada toward the Krishna Menon proposals before the disarmament commission? Did Canada make a statement at that time, and if so what was our position?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs has suggested that I might supplement what he has said in answer to the question just now put. Canada was one of the two nations that suggested Mr. Menon should be allowed, although not a member of the disarmament commission, to make representations on behalf of his government with regard to the question of the banning of nuclear tests. Canada was the country that yesterday suggested that when the subcommittee of the disarmament commission resumes its sittings at a date not yet decided, special note should be taken of the representations made by the delegate for India.

Canada has taken the position in the disarmament commission that it was in favour of the cessation of nuclear tests when this cessation could take place at a time, and under conditions, that would not prejudice the security of the nations concerned. We did indicate our sympathetic interest in the suggestion that a committee of experts might be designated to consider a limitation on the number and nature of test explosions. We asserted that we would give consideration as well to the banning of explosions for military purposes, to be closely coupled with a controlled ban on manufacturing for military purposes. But it must be clear that if there was not agreement on this subject it was not because of any action taken by any western nation. This ban could take place if the Soviet union would agree to the kind of controls which are desirable and necessary in this situation.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a further question. Do I understand that Canada does not require that this shall be a part of a general disarmament agreement? Is that right?

Mr. Martin: Canada's statement was that we would agree to such a cessation in the context of an agreement on disarmament. This does not mean that there must be a comprehensive state of disarmament. We would agree to such cessation, within the context of an agreement on disarmament, effective at an appropriate stage and under conditions that would assure our security.

GRAIN

REPORTED DECISION OF RAILWAYS TO CHARGE DEMURRAGE ON BOX CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister been made aware of the announcement by the railways that beginning August 1 it is their intention to charge demurrage on box cars of grain at terminals that are not unloaded within a 48-hour period? Does the minister know whether or not, on the basis of this year's experience, such a charge would cost the grain producers of western Canada a sum in excess of $4 million? If this has now been approved by the board, will the minister use the power of disallowance provided under the act to see that this grave injustice is not inflicted on the wheat producers of western Canada?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): I have not seen the announcement. I shall have to make inquiries in order to be able to comment on it.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It arises out of a question already asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. Will the minister, as the minister under whose administration the wheat board operates, do what he can to prevent this very unjust further exaction being imposed upon the western farmer? The penalty will be from $3 to $7 per carload of wheat. Will the minister consider doing his part to suspend the operation of any such exaction at this time?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague the Minister of Transport I know nothing about this proposal that demurrage will be charged on cars loaded with wheat. Offhand I cannot think how it would be brought about, but in any event I shall take the matter up with the wheat board and see what are the facts. Certainly we shall endeavour to avoid any further charges on wheat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister any knowledge of it at all?

AVAILABILITY OF BOX CARS IN INTERLAKE REGION, MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The transport controller, Mr. Milner, said he would do everything he could to see that those points where producers are unable to deliver an 8-bushel quota by July 31 were given a larger proportion of box cars in the new crop year. Will the minister see that this concession is granted the marketing points in the Manitoba interlake country, where little or no grain was marketed last year because of crop failure?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will draw this question to the attention of the wheat board. I am sure they will take a sympathetic view of the situation in the interlake country, which has not had a crop for two years. I think my hon. friend will find that if that area has a crop this year it will get a movement that will supply ready cash at the earliest possible time.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO REDEVELOPMENT IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the government of Quebec indicated its approval of the proposed housing redevelopment project in Montreal, and will it be prepared to enter into an agreement with the federal government providing for the housing project on the cleared site?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, from conversations I have had with Mr. Duplessis I understand the government of Quebec is prepared to approve the entry of the city of Montreal into a slum clearance agreement with the federal government.

As to the subsequent housing development, I believe it is the intention of the Quebec government to designate the city of Montreal as its agent. Nevertheless, under section 36 of the National Housing Act it will be necessary for Quebec to become a party to an agreement with the federal government. In a telephone conversation yesterday the premier of Quebec informed me that the principle of entering into a formal agreement with the federal government for this purpose was acceptable to the government of Quebec. The signing of an agreement will be subject to the various aspects and details being acceptable to all three parties concerned: that is, the city of Montreal, the government of Quebec and the federal government.

PUBLIC WORKS

FALSE CREEK, VANCOUVER—STATEMENT AS TO FISH DOCK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give a further reply to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) about the progress of work on False creek.

The situation is that the work there is in four stages: stage 1, road construction; stage 2, bulkhead, road and shed; stage 3, dredging; stage 4, wharf and floats. Stage 1 was completed this spring, and stage 2, that is the bulkhead, road and shed, has just been completed. The next stage is the dredging, and plans and specifications are ready but before tenders can be called it is necessary to obtain a spoil area from the Granville Dry Kilns. This area has not yet been obtained, but the matter is being processed through legal channels now.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Green: Can the minister tell the house how long a delay will result?

Mr. Winters: I should think it would be a very short time, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

CONSTRUCTION OF AIRPORT AT RIVIERE DU LOUP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the federal government decided to build an airport at Riviere du Loup at a cost of about $2½ million, as stated by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. St. Laurent) during the last provincial election campaign, according to local papers?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of building an airport at Riviere du Loup—the locality mentioned by the hon. member for Quebec West, was it not?—is under consideration, and I understand that the municipal authorities of Riviere du Loup are investigating the possibilities of acquiring the land required for that airport.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

QUEBEC CITY—INQUIRY REGARDING SITE OF PROPOSED NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Have the Department of Public Works and the Canadian National Railways reached a final agreement leading to an exchange of properties to provide for the construction of the new post office in Quebec city?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker. The situation there is that the mayor of Quebec undertook to arrange a meeting of all parties interested in any proposed exchange of property. I have not heard from the mayor. I told him that officials of the Department of Public Works would be prepared to attend any such meeting, and within the course of the past few days I wrote the mayor again reminding him of the long delay that had taken place and urging that he assemble the meeting at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Dufresne: Who would represent the federal government at a meeting such as the minister referred to?

Some hon. Members: You.

[Mr. Winters.]

Mr. Dufresne: I have no objection at all.

An hon. Member: That is not unanimous.

Mr. Winters: The officials of the Department of Public Works, amongst others. I cannot speak for my colleagues.

COMMUNICATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—SERVICE AND RATES ON LONG DISTANCE CALLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation has shown a surplus for six consecutive years, is it the intention of the company to improve service and reduce rates for long distance telephone conversations to and from Newfoundland?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question which the hon. gentleman just asked I would say that when the new trans-Atlantic telephone cable is completed later this year six additional circuits will be put into service by the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. It will then be possible to introduce substantially reduced telephone rates for long distance service with Newfoundland. I am advised by the C.O.T.C. that the new rates will be in line with the trans-Canada and Canada-United States rate schedules for person to person, station to station, and night, Sunday and holiday rates.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

420 SQUADRON, LONDON—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REVISION OF DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. On June 29 the minister replied to a question of mine referring to 420 squadron at London, Ontario. In his answer as reported at page 5516 of Hansard, he said:

> I believe it was felt the activities of those who are air-minded in the London auxiliary—and there are some very good people—could be better tied into the Royal Canadian Air Force organization in the way which is proposed under the revision of duties which has been worked out.

Would the minister now indicate what this revision of duties comprises and what the plans are, in order that those who are vitally interested in this 420 squadron will know what will likely be done?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the hon. gentleman's question as notice and refresh my memory concerning the details before I answer.

REPORTED POSTPONEMENT OF DECISION TO DISBAND MOUNT HOPE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, further to a question which I asked the Minister of National Defence yesterday, can the minister make any statement with regard to a report in yesterday's Hamilton Spectator that the disbandment of 424 squadron of the R.C.A.F. auxiliary at Hamilton has been postponed by order of the department?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the position is that the decision was taken to disband this squadron, and that decision still stands. After the decision had been announced representations were made to me personally and by letter from Hamilton, as I indicated yesterday, and to the chief of the air staff by officers of the auxiliary squadron. These representations naturally will be considered, as will further representations which I understand officers of the auxiliary wish to make.

Perhaps I might also deal with the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday with regard to resuming auxiliary flying at Hamilton. As I indicated I would, I discussed the matter with the chief of the air staff, who informs me that at the meeting he had with the auxiliary officers it was mutually agreed that flying having been stopped it should not be resumed unless and until any changes were made in the decision.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, do I understand from the statement just made by the Minister of National Defence that it has been agreed by the officers of 424 squadron that they shall not continue flying for the time being?

Mr. Campney: That is the advice given me this morning by the chief of the air staff.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATEMENT AS TO REPORTED DELAY IN PAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Victoria, Ont. (Mr. Hodgson) asked me the following question:

> I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice the back pay of the mounted police. I understand that in Newfoundland they are behind some three or four months and the amounts run from $43 to $55 a month for these constables. Will the minister look into the situation and give us a reply tomorrow?

Mr. Speaker, as would be indicated by the amounts of $43 and $55 per month, this is not back pay. There has been no delay in issuing the regular pay cheques to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Newfoundland. Members of the force stationed at St. John's, Corner Brook and Grand Falls, however, were in receipt of special Newfoundland allowances ranging from $25 to $45 per month. The authority for these allowances expired on March 31, 1956. At that time, due to an increase in the differential between living costs in certain areas of Newfoundland and other Canadian urban centres, a recommendation was made for an increase in the allowances. The authority to increase these allowances was granted by order in council under date of May 17, 1956. The new allowances, effective April 1, 1956, range from $30 to $35 per month. Cheques having been made out are in the mail, and will be received in due course.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON ALLEGED REFUSAL TO ISSUE REVOLVER LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am now in position to make a statement with regard to a matter which was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), and which was raised with me some weeks ago by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite), concerning the issuing of permits to trappers and prospectors in the northern area of British Columbia to enable them to carry pistols and revolvers in connection with their work.

Section 90 of the Criminal Code makes it an offence for a person to have a pistol or revolver elsewhere than in his dwelling house or place of business unless he has a valid permit. Section 94 of the code authorizes the commissioner of the mounted police and the attorney general of the province to issue such permits. Since section 94 places the authority for the issuance of permits within the province in the hands of the attorney general of the province, the commissioner of the mounted police confines his authority to issuing permits to those of an interprovincial nature, such as permits to express messengers.

In those provinces such as British Columbia, in which the government of Canada has entered into an agreement with the provincial government to make available the services of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to discharge provincial police duties, it is the provincial attorney general who controls the policy under which those authorized to issue permits, including officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, must issue them. Moreover, the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in the issuance of permits for pistols and revolvers in such a province, are, pursuant to the police agreement, under the direction of the provincial attorney general. I suggest, therefore, that my hon. friend's question might be more appropriately directed to the attorney general of British Columbia.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): I have a submission from the British Columbia-Yukon chamber of mines on this question which I should like to place before the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that these men were permitted to carry revolvers for many years up until this year, will he not make some effort to see that they are allowed to have revolvers this year, even though it means making representations to the provincial government?

Mr. Garson: I have no hesitation in agreeing to do anything that is reasonably within my power in that connection; but I must say that where we have a police agreement between a province and the dominion we do make a special effort not to appear to take advantage of that fact to impose anything more than suggestions upon the provincial attorney general in respect to matters which fall within the jurisdiction of the province. It would really be much more appropriate, if I may say so, if my hon. friend would raise this matter with the Hon. Mr. Bonner, whose responsibility it is, and have him do it. I do not like, as a co-signer with Mr. Bonner of the British Columbia police agreement, to be suggesting to him how he should handle his end of that.

Mr. Green: Is it not a fact that the basic trouble is the terms of the Criminal Code itself, and that that is a matter for amendment here?

Mr. Garson: No, not at all. I think there would be general agreement in the house that so far as the discretion in the issuance of permits of this sort is concerned, it can be far more appropriately exercised by the provincial or local authorities than by myself or my officials in Ottawa. It would not be reasonable that a man in northern British Columbia wanting to carry a revolver should have to write to the Minister of Justice; and if he did, what would we know about the circumstances under which he was going to carry it?

Mr. Green: Why should the code not permit the carrying of a revolver by this type of person?

[Mr. Garson.]

Mr. Garson: For reasons that were gone into at length at the time this particular section was debated. I do not want to review them now, but I would point out to my hon. friend that if we did not have a restriction of this kind on the carrying of revolvers by people circulating around the country, everybody could carry them, with consequences that I feel he might deplore.

STEEL

PRESENT SUPPLY POSITION—EFFECT OF U.S. STRIKE ON INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Defence Production could give the house a statement as to the present steel situation in Canada, how long the stockpile will last and if the United States steel strike has had any effect on Canadian industry yet.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): The situation in Canada is that our steel mills are producing to capacity, as they have been for some time. Imported steel is cut off completely. Warehouse stocks are being depleted. I dare say we will feel the pressure there in time, but I can assure my hon. friend that the Minister of Defence Production can do nothing about it.

Mr. Michener: I understood the powers of the Minister of Defence Production had been extended for three years. Has he terminated them voluntarily?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I found they were so distasteful to some hon. members that I have not exercised them.

DUNN ESTATE—REPORTED LIQUIDATION OF HOLDINGS IN ALGOMA STEEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production. Has the minister received an indication from any of the executors that the holdings of the Dunn estate in Algoma Steel are about to be sold to others?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

TAXATION

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The house resumed, from Monday, July 16, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Harris—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the first day of April, 1957, and ending on the 31st day of March, 1962

(a) a tax equalization payment with respect to individual and corporation income taxes and succession duties;

(b) a provincial revenue stabilization payment with respect to such taxes; and

(c) a tax rental payment in accordance with a tax rental agreement that may be entered into by any province as an alternative to levying such taxes on its own behalf; and also to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces.

Mr. Michener: Mr. Chairman, when I began last night I suggested that an appropriate test by which this resolution might be judged was whether or not it tended to maintain the federal system or even to reduce the over-centralization which has been a continuing legacy of the war. I suggested that there was one bright ray appearing, in that the new arrangement seems to leave in an equal position a province which wishes to rent its tax fields and a province which wishes to collect its own taxes, in other words to share its former tax fields with the federal government, and that the proposal would be equally beneficial, if you want to put it that way, or would be equally harmful, if you want to put it the other way.

The minister's assessment of the provincial attitude toward his proposals is contained in his remark that not one province over a period of 15 months, I think he said, had said that the new plan was not as good as the tax rental agreements. It strikes me that is pretty faint praising by the minister of his own proposal and of the provincial reaction to it. It seems clear to me that the provinces have not reacted favourably to the new proposals. They have recognized an advance, as we do, in the respect which I have mentioned. They have also recognized that there is more money for them. I think the minister estimates that there is 20 per cent more money.

It is perhaps significant to note that the corresponding grants from the province of Ontario to its municipalities have increased in the last five years by something like 190 per cent. I think that is approximately the figure, but I will get the exact figure. In any event there is a 20 per cent increase under the resolution and bill, and that is not to be overlooked. But notwithstanding the two things that can be said and which I have said, it seems clear that the provinces are dissatisfied. They have spoken for themselves, and it is not necessary for us to speak for them today. But I think it is desirable that this committee should have the provincial viewpoint expressed very clearly, because to my mind it would be an unsatisfactory thing if this house passed a bill which had the unanimous approval of the house and which was presented to the provinces as the only course open to them; in other words an offer which they must either take or get along with, having no choice in the matter. If it were presented to them as the unanimous decision of the house it seems to me that would impair the bargaining position of the provinces and, as the minister knows, these matters ultimately have to be settled by agreement if they are to be settled satisfactorily.

I should like to suggest to the committee that the provinces have very little to hope for from this government, and I should like to take a minute or two to explain why that is so. For 17 years this government have been going in one direction, to the extent that they have lost their brakes and they have no reverse gear. They have been going in the direction of centralization of authority in Ottawa. Seventeen years is a long time, long enough for most ministers to form habits.

There is no question but that the government enjoys the position it holds in confederation. The members of the government have even, I think, attributed to themselves a certain indispensability which is not calculated to improve relationships between the central and the provincial governments. If I may say so, they have the attitude that no one can do it like we do, that we are the best spenders Canada has ever had. There is no question but that they are the biggest and the fastest spenders.

Mr. Chairman, it began with the Rowell-Sirois commission report. That report planted the seed of an idea. It did more than plant it; it expounded a theory that full employment could be maintained in Canada if the great progressive taxes, namely the income tax and the corporation tax, were centralized in the hands of Ottawa. I think that report could not have been more satisfactory to Mr. King if he himself had written it. In any event he seemed to accept, as have his successors, the central theme that if we are to have no more unemployment—and all governments have made that one of their objectives—the more centralization control of the economy there is in Ottawa, the better it is for everybody.

That is the thesis I want to challenge. That is where it began. The provinces would have none of it. However, the war came to the rescue of the government and under the real and grave necessities of the war and the essential need for a unified command, we had a centralized authority and centralized tax collection, and all the provinces entered into agreements which handed over completely to the federal government their right to levy personal incomes taxes and corporation income taxes. That was a complete vacation of a field which the provinces enjoyed under the constitution equally with the federal government. They were joint tenants, if I may put it that way; and my conception of a joint tenancy is one in which each party has a fifty-fifty interest, in the absence of other arrangements.

That was the position. They had equal rights in that field, and I do not believe anybody would deny that as a constitutional and legal concept. In any event, the provinces, with very strong assurances that they would be restored to their former rights, gave up completely their taxing authority in those two fields for the duration of the war.

Then after the war, in the 1945 and 1946 dominion-provincial conferences, called the reconstruction conferences, the provinces were presented with the green book which was an ambitious scheme to continue the effect and carry on the general ideas of the Rowell-Sirois commission's report and to continue the centralized authority over and control of the economy which was the basis of that recommendation. At that conference the provinces were anxious to agree, but they were unconvinced and they were divided, and in the end they were forced to accept.

The next event was the budget of Mr. Ilsley, brought down in 1946, which to some extent resembles the proposals under which we still are obliged to work, an arrangement by which those who were unconvinced, and unwilling to leave their birthright in the hands of the federal government, would be obliged to continue on their own, with such abatement and recognition as Ottawa chose to give. Quebec and Ontario undertook to maintain their independence and go their own way and for the next few years they levied corporation taxes at the rate of 7 per cent, although the federal government's allowance to their taxpayers was only 5 per cent. They did not levy personal income taxes; that field was left entirely to the federal government.

Then in 1950 there was a further conference. The first agreement had been a three-year agreement and obviously was only a stop-gap agreement pending some more comprehensive solutions of these matters. In 1950 there was a conference in the shadow of the Korean conflict, and as a result of that conference new agreements were made in 1952. At that time Ontario joined in the agreement to rent these tax fields for a period of five years, leaving Quebec as the only province which remained outside the agreement; and until this day Quebec has stoutly maintained its independent position.

I think those who believe that the federal system means something in this country and should be preserved owe a great deal to the fortitude of the people of Quebec, who have maintained that position throughout the last ten years since the war. But even Quebec felt the pinch of the conditions with which they were confronted, and in 1954 and 1955 met something of a crisis which required the province to levy income taxes of their own, something which proved to be an embarrassment to them, and certainly to the federal government, and which resulted in a concession from Ottawa, namely a 10 per cent abatement in the personal income tax field. I think that is probably the genesis of the new agreements or the new arrangements which are now under consideration.

These agreements which were made in 1952 run out in 1957. The opportunities to provide a more satisfactory and comprehensive arrangement to meet present day needs are also running out. No solution has been found. The minister has propounded a principle to which I subscribe, namely that the provinces' revenues should be consistent with their responsibilities, but that result has not been achieved. The revenues which the provinces might enjoy have been rented under the circumstances I have recounted. They have been withheld; some say they have been filched away from them by the overweening central authority which does not wish to return those taxing powers to the provinces.

I suggest that the position today can be readily appreciated by looking at a table showing a comparison of the spending by the federal government and by the provincial and municipal governments over the last few years and by seeing how the balance has shifted toward the central authority. I am quoting from table 7 in the Canadian Tax Foundation's review entitled "The National Finances", 1955-56. It appears at page 12. The comparison is between the expenditures, which I think is the true basis rather than the revenues. The revenues are even more in favour of the federal government, but they do not take into account intergovernmental payments.

The expenditures in 1929 by the central government were $323 million and by the provincial and municipal governments, $600 million. I see that the minister has the table before him. To express it in percentages, the federal government was spending 5·2 per cent of the gross national product and the provincial and municipal governments were spending 9·7 per cent or almost twice what the federal government was spending. In 1933 the provincial and municipal governments spent 16·5 per cent of the gross national product as against 8·5 per cent spent by the Ottawa government. Those were depression times, and the weight of the depression on the municipalities was extremely heavy. In 1945—and this is the next comparison I should like to make—we find that a complete reversal had taken place. In that year we find that the central government was spending 34·6 per cent or more than one-third of the gross national product, and the provincial and municipal governments were down to 6·8 per cent, a smaller proportion than they had spent at any time previously.

We now come up to date. In 1954, which is the last year for which figures are given, the amount spent by the federal government was $4,142 million and that was 17·2 per cent of the gross national product; the provinces and municipalities combined spent $2,447 million, which was only 10·2 per cent of the gross national product. If one quoted the figures for collections for the same year one would find that in 1954 the federal government collected 19 per cent of the gross national product and that the provinces and municipalities combined collected 8·5 per cent.

That is a complete reversal in the short period of one generation and all of it has taken place under the aegis of this government. It is for that reason I say the provinces have little to hope for from a government that has that record and that background. They have been conditioned, as the psychologists say, to the belief that the welfare of Canadians stems from what is done in Ottawa rather than what is done by local governments.

I have been speaking about revenues, and now let me say one word about the responsibilities of different levels of government. There has been no determined effort to resettle their responsibilities, either in line with this sharing of revenues and expenditures or on any settled principle. Here again there has been an encroachment by the federal authority, partly I suppose because it has had the funds with which to meet the needs. The provincial governments, as I say, have been occupying a lesser position throughout. This point was well expressed by Mr. Hicks, the premier of Nova Scotia, when he spoke to the Canadian club in Toronto on January 25 of last year. He said that without the people knowing it or deciding it, the basis of the constitutional relationship was being changed and that the federal government was encroaching in almost all fields, agriculture, fisheries, transport, finance, education, labour, health, pensions, highways; all those provincial fields had been encroached upon by the federal government.

Mr. Harris: And every one of them you support.

Mr. Michener: Every one of them has been done, as Mr. Hicks indicated, without any arrangement. This has resulted, no doubt, because the resources were available to the central government. That is demonstrated by the fact that the clamour for money is directed to Ottawa, and for many things which are purely provincial in their concern. This is particularly true of education and highways. There is a path worn to the minister's doorstep in connection with all these matters, which are matters of provincial concern. The reason is that Ottawa has money to burn. I do not know what the minister's surplus will be this year, but I suggest to him it may run as much as $750 million. I hope it will. With a surplus of the kind which he will have to present, if he is not able to conceal it, he is not going to be very popular with the provincial finance ministers in endeavouring to settle their problems on the basis he is proposing to this house today.

What is needed, Mr. Chairman, is a new look, because the war has been over for some years and the cold war, while it is making constant demands, is taking a secondary place to the industrial growth and peacetime development of this economy. I suggest that our expanding economy is soundly based on the possession of resources that the world needs, and that the main problem is to create a condition in which those resources can be used and developed. Wealth, Mr. Chairman, is not created at Ottawa. It comes not from Ottawa, but from the ground and from the work of the people of this country. Ottawa has failed, I suggest, to see that there is a change; that what was desirable 15 years ago and what was represented by the Rowell-Sirois commission is no longer appropriate to meet the needs of the time.

The truth of this assertion can be readily demonstrated by the condition of the municipalities and provinces and the services they have to perform. This expansion of our economy rests on the services which are provided locally. It rests on a grass roots development throughout every part of Canada. The municipalities are struggling with a problem which they are unable to meet. I should like to cite one or two examples to demonstrate to the house how, in a few short years, the responsibilities of the municipalities have changed. The city of Kitchener is a typical example of an expanding city. Its total debenture debt in 1951 was $6·8 million. By 1954 it was over $10·25 million. Its school debt in 1951 was $1,169,000. In 1954, it was $2 million.

This rate of increase in the school debt amounted to 77·3 per cent in four short years, and that is not unusual. There is one municipality in the province, Dundas, where school debt increased by 813 per cent in the same period. Throughout the whole of Ontario the municipalities—and they are the ones I naturally would use to illustrate this point—were faced with an enormous increase in their responsibilities, an increase in debt and in the levy of taxes for schools and other municipal services. In Toronto the increase in the school debenture debt in that same period was 165 per cent.

Now let me further illustrate by levies in some of these centres. The tax levy in Kitchener increased from 1951 to 1954, for all purposes by 55 per cent and for school purposes by 57 per cent. In a smaller community like the township of Toronto, where there is a great deal of activity resulting from the industrial development in the Toronto area, the total tax levy increased from 1951 to 1954 by 121 per cent and the total school levy by 165 per cent. Those are only figures, but what do they mean to the ordinary person who lives in the township of Toronto and pays his taxes there? They are a staggering burden for the home owner, and it cannot be tolerated for long. Yet there is no visible end to this problem short of some general readjustment which will give the provinces greater financial resources.

There is one other illustration.

The Chairman: I am very sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Michener: If the committee does not mind my finishing, which I can do in about three minutes, it will avoid the necessity of my making a 30-minute speech later.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Michener: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The provincial problem is of the same order. I should say that these levies made by the municipalities for school purposes are made after the provincial grants to the municipalities which this year in Ontario for all purposes, including education, are $184 million or 40 per cent of the total Ontario provincial budget. If one can imagine such a transfer of funds, that is what is taking place. Ontario's total budget of over $400 million has to be paid over, to the extent of 40 per cent, to the municipalities.

The provinces have their own part to play in maintaining our prosperity. This results mainly from their control and direction of our natural resources. The provinces must plant, but Ottawa reaps the harvest. This situation cannot go on. I should like, Mr. Chairman, to use the figures for Ontario forests and mines to show exactly how the federal government benefits from the developments which are mainly made at the expense of the provincial governments. In the forestry department the Ontario government revenues, made up of timber dues, fire tax and other department of lands and forests receipts, totalled $20 million. The treasury department receives a logging tax of $800,000, making total revenues to the province of Ontario from these lands and forests of $20,800,000. The total federal tax declared by Ontario's forest-based industries was $39·3 million, that is just about twice what the province received from industries working in this natural resource and which depend on the province and municipalities for services that sustain those industries, and without which they could not operate. Yet Ottawa, as I say, reaped a harvest of approximately $40 million, twice as much as the province, in the same field.

In mining the contrast is even more striking. If the government were at all receptive to the importance of the activities of the municipalities and the provinces in these fields they would appreciate that this condition cannot continue. From mining the Ontario government receives a total of $5·2 million, whereas the total federal tax taken from the Ontario mining industry is $27·4 million, or more than five times the amount which the provincial government receives in taxes from its mining industry.

This situation can be very simply illustrated by the kind of development we see going on everywhere in Canada. At Bancroft, in Ontario, one of the uranium mines is making an expenditure of $10 million in a mill and mining plant. That involves the province in the construction of roads; it involves the municipalities in building schools to house the children of a community of 5,000 people, and all the incidental services that are necessary to establish a community without which a mine cannot function. These miners begin to pay taxes to the federal government from their very first pay cheques; while the mill is in the process of building, the federal government draws excise and sales taxes and that sort of revenue, and as soon as the plant begins to operate the profit tax begins to roll into Ottawa.

Up to the present time the federal government has not expended one cent in the ground work which makes the industry possible. It is true they have, under their direction, arranged for the sale of uranium, which they control. To that extent they have a part, but there has been no cost to the federal government. The cost of all of this is on the municipality and the province, and the disproportion of the resulting revenues for government purposes is five to one in favour of the federal government. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a condition that I say cannot continue. The clamour at the door of Ottawa is the proof that there is an imbalance which is of serious proportions. A broader conference is needed, Mr. Chairman, and a resettlement of the responsibilities and revenues.

The minister has said that time and men both change and our problems change with them. There is no hope of a broad federal solution from this government, with the background I have illustrated. Change is taking place, and a change in the approach to these problems is needed. If the government will not change, Mr. Chairman, I suggest it is time to change the government.

I wish to close, Mr. Chairman, with one more quotation from a man who was quoted with considerable relish by the other side of the house not so long ago. Mr. Frost, the premier of Ontario, in speaking about these negotiations in the Ontario legislature on March 12, 1956, said, as reported at page 929 of the Ontario Hansard:

> I tell this house today that the federal government has deplorably failed to assess the needs of the provinces and their municipalities which are the right arm of peacetime development and expansion. They are as wrong in this as they were in the attitude of 1945 and 1950. The unfortunate part is that this matter is urgent, that our taxpayers are being overwhelmed because they are being deprived of their fair share of the revenues which come from the very production which causes our problems. That the federal government will be proved wrong again I have no doubt, but it is my hope that it will not be too late, before they find they are wrong, unfair and unjust to the provinces.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak briefly in this debate. I do so because of some of the comments that were made yesterday afternoon and evening. I should like to make particular reference to the maritime provinces, and particularly again to the province of Nova Scotia of which I am one of the representatives.

Statements were made yesterday that the maritime provinces in general are being treated unfairly by the federal government; that the federal government was doing nothing, or at least was not doing nearly enough, to assist in the economy of the maritime provinces; that there was a lack of defence expenditures in the maritime provinces; that the present proposed tax rentals, including the tax equalization payments, were not large enough, and so on. In doing so, one or two of the speakers made slight reference to other expenditures which are made by the federal government, and I do feel that if one is going to look at the proposal as set out in this resolution, one must in fairness look at other expenditures being made by the federal government.

I should like to speak briefly of three of our main industries in Nova Scotia, our three primary industries, mining, fishing and agriculture. I do not think it is generally realized by Nova Scotians, and I am sure it is not by many members in this house, that in so far as the mining of coal, for example, in Nova Scotia is concerned, five federal government assistance grants are received. I am sure that no one has any idea, or very few have any idea, of the magnitude of those grants. For example, from the transportation subvention, which is to overcome to some extent the handicap of the distance of the coal mines from the main markets in the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec, in 1954-55, the last year for which final figures are available, the province of Nova Scotia received $8,689,000. Since this subvention assistance was put into effect in 1929 the province of Nova Scotia has received over $55,600,000.

Another form of assistance is the subsidy payments on coal which is used in the manufacture of iron and steel. This goes back to the coke bounty act of 1930. Under this act and under the Canadian Coal Equality Act of 1952 Nova Scotia, in 1954-55, received $224,600. Since that act has been in effect, from 1931, Nova Scotia has received almost exactly $7 million.

The third form of assistance for the coal industry is the coal production subsidies, the loans and the rentals. Under this plan there are long-term loans made for the purpose of increasing efficiency of production through modernized mechanization. Nova Scotia has received under this plan over $30 million; to be exact, $30,863,000 over a period of five years.

Then there is the coal production assistance loan under which we have received in the last six years $7,600,000 and, of course, the export subsidy on coal which brought us in the last year $300,000. I mention these, Mr. Chairman, just to show that in coal alone, not only recently but over the last few years, Nova Scotia has received very large sums to assist its mining industry.

We do hear a little more in the house about the freight assistance under the Maritime Freight Rates Act, which provides a reduction of 20 per cent on all freights charged on certain traffic originating and terminating within certain designated areas. Unfortunately, at the moment I have not the exact figure for the last year for Nova Scotia, but the maritime provinces and the Atlantic provinces were referred to yesterday. In the Atlantic region the freight assistance amounted to $10,590,000 in 1954-55, and within the last nine years it has amounted to over $77,500,000.

In so far as fisheries are concerned, there are many avenues in which the federal government is assisting the fisheries in the maritime provinces. For example, there is the fishing bounty which is to aid in the development of the sea fisheries of Canada. In 1954-55 Nova Scotia received approximately $85,000, and within the last 10 years $839,300. There is assistance in the form of educational service for fishermen, which is to extend the educational work in co-operative producing and selling among fishermen. The maritimes received last year, under this item $46,000, and in the last 10 years the maritimes received in round figures $460,000. There is also assistance in the form of industrial development to provide for expenditures in so far as technical service to fishermen is concerned, and in that regard the maritimes in 1954-55 received nearly $250,000 and in the last three years received about $370,000.

There is construction assistance for fishing vessels, which is of great value particularly in my own province of Nova Scotia in so far as the construction of draggers and the long liner type of vessels are concerned. In this case the subsidy payments are made through the fishery loan agencies, and in the maritimes they amounted to almost exactly $114,000 during the year 1954-55 and during the last eight years have amounted to approximately $658,000.

Still another form of assistance is that given to bait freezers. That is of particular interest to my own constituency, where several have already been built and others are under construction. In the last seven years that has amounted to $65,000 for Nova Scotia and a large part of that has gone into the constituency of Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare.

In so far as agriculture is concerned I think one of the best moves made in recent years was the passing of the Maritime Marshland Reclamation Act. Under this act Nova Scotia received $733,000 in 1954-55, and in the last seven years it received nearly $2¼ million. That program has gradually been developed, and each year the expenditures increase and doubtless will continue to increase for a few years until the program is still further developed. This program provides for the construction of dikes and aboiteaux to reclaim the marshlands. This is a co-operative arrangement between the federal and provincial governments and the marshland owners.

There is another form of assistance which goes to maritime farmers, namely the agricultural lime assistance program. Under this program in the last nine years Nova Scotia has received over $500,000.

In addition to the freight assistance I mentioned earlier, which applies to all traffic moving in certain designated areas, there is freight assistance on western feed grains which represents a considerable amount and makes a vast difference in the economy of the farming areas of Nova Scotia. In 1954-55 Nova Scotia received $1,600,000 under this form of assistance, and has received in the last nine years over $13 million.

One could go on in great detail, Mr. Chairman, and one could quote a great many figures, but I think I have perhaps given enough figures concerning mining, fishing and agriculture to show that there are a great many forms of assistance and a number of ways in which the maritime provinces in general and Nova Scotia in particular receive funds from the federal government in addition to the proposal we have in this resolution today.

To give another example, there are the general health grants under the Department of National Health and Welfare. In 1954-55 in Nova Scotia these amounted to $2½ million, and over the last seven years since they were inaugurated they have amounted to over $8½ million.

So much for the general forms of assistance. In Nova Scotia we have also had a great many individual development projects over the last few years, many of which have been discussed in the house. I think it might perhaps be just as well to mention four or five of them. For example, there was the development of the North Sydney terminals, which in the last few years amounted to approximately $3½ million. In the last ten years the expenditures of the national harbours board amounted to over $6,300,000. The general vote for harbours and rivers varies from year to year, but in 1954-55 it was over $3 million in Nova Scotia.

There are also three ferries, two of which have been completed and one of which is now being built. I refer first of all, of course, to the Bluenose which operates between Bar Harbor, Maine and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. This was built by the federal Department of Transport and the province of Nova Scotia, the Department of Transport paying something over $4 million and the province of Nova Scotia paying $1½ million. This motor vessel has been in operation since last January and traffic is increasing very rapidly. During the last week, for example, there were over 6,000 passengers carried between Yarmouth and Bar Harbor. Over 3,200 coming from Bar Harbor to Yarmouth and about 2,800 travelling from Yarmouth to Bar Harbor. In addition the ferry carried between 125 and 150 cars, trucks and buses every trip in either direction.

Not only was the expenditure to which I referred important so far as the vessel is concerned, but there is also of course the expenditure necessary so far as docks and dredging are concerned. In Yarmouth alone this amounted to between $2 million and $3 million over the last few years. Of course, with 6,000 people either entering or leaving a port within one week it means a great expenditure on the part of the passengers, which is of assistance to everyone who is in business in that area. In other words it is of vast assistance to the general economy of the area.

I should also refer to the expenditures for the William Carson and the new ferry Selkirk which is being built at Pictou to operate between Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. The Selkirk is going to cost approximately $2 million. I might also mention that the federal government's share in the Canso causeway was something over $13 million. Then again there is assistance to the trans-Canada highway in Nova Scotia. It is estimated that by the time the highway is completed it will amount to $11½ million.

Last evening an hon. member referred to the expenditures of the Department of Defence Production and I would just like to take one branch of that department, the department of defence construction, which in the Atlantic region—and here I bring in the province of Newfoundland—spent nearly $10½ million during the year 1954-55 and within the last five years has spent nearly $71 million.

I think I should call to the attention of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton that there is a camp in his constituency, or at least part of it. I should like him to remember that in 1954-55, the last year for which figures are available, almost exactly $10 million was spent on that camp and in the last three years nearly $68 million was spent. There are also additional commitments for that particular area of $21 million. I think expenditures of that magnitude going into that area certainly belie any statement that defence money is not being spent in the maritime provinces or in that particular area.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member what camp he refers to in Victoria-Carleton?

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne - Yarmouth - Clare): Camp Gagetown.

Mr. Brooks: That is not in his constituency.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): I believe I said in his area. It is not in his particular constituency but it is in his general area.

Mr. Brooks: It is a good many miles from his area.

Mr. Sinclair: You are the lucky man with all the construction.

Mr. Kirk (Shelburne - Yarmouth - Clare): Perhaps when the hon. member for Royal speaks he will be able to tell us how happy he is to have so much of that expenditure being made in his particular constituency.

As far as direct payments under the tax rental agreement in the province of Nova Scotia within the last few years are concerned, I would just like to put on the record in round figures the payments for the past five years. These are direct payments to the provincial government of Nova Scotia. In 1949-50 it was $12½ million; in 1950-51, $14½ million; in 1951-52, $15¾ million; in 1952-53, $23·8 million and in 1953-54 it was nearly $24·4 million.

Under the new proposal which is before us today it is estimated that the equalization payment to Nova Scotia for the fiscal year 1957-58 will be $17,130,000, and the standard taxes plus the equalization payment are estimated to be $26,855,000. In other words the total revenue available to Nova Scotia in 1957-58 under this tax-sharing agreement will be $27,635,000, which will represent approximately 45 per cent of the total budget of Nova Scotia. Under the present agreement we would receive $22,865,000, so the new agreement represents an increase of $4,770,000 over what we would have received under the old agreement in so far as 1957-58 is concerned. That is an increase of 20·9 per cent.

A little earlier I gave the details of the direct payments to Nova Scotia for the last five years and indicated the amount that would come to that province under the present plan, but when we are considering those two sets of figures we should bear in mind that the amounts have been increasing from year to year. At the end of each five-year period the proposals have been revised, and in every case the revision has been upward. In so far as the proposal for the next five years is concerned no one can predict exactly what will happen, but I do feel that what has happened in the past and what is happening at the present time give a fair indication that at the end of another five-year period there will be a further study made and a revision if necessary.

According to the figures I have given the position of Nova Scotia compares most favourably with that of the other provinces of Canada. This is an excellent tax-sharing proposal. It has been brought up to date, and it is my personal feeling that it is the best we can expect under present conditions, especially when one considers all the other amounts being spent by the federal government, which I mentioned earlier. Personally I am only too happy to support the resolution, and I firmly believe the vast majority of the residents of Nova Scotia feel that the new tax-sharing proposal is an excellent one and will be of great benefit to our province.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I had generously agreed to give the floor to another hon. member, but I am sure the Minister of Finance would not want this resolution to pass without further discussion.

Mr. Harris: Just a moment, please.

Mr. Churchill: I noticed that yesterday the minister was a little plaintive when referring to the short time which had been given to the resolution in 1952. I looked that up and found that only about an hour and a half had been spent discussing it. The minister should not complain because in 1952 our war troubles were still alarming and the tax agreements were just a continuation of those of 1947. The major advance in Canadian life had just begun four years ago, and the tax rental agreements of that time were carried on without too prolonged a discussion.

But the situation has changed materially. We have reached a stage where the pressures or fears of a world war have diminished. They are still present to a certain extent but they have diminished, because the possible destruction resulting from a thermonuclear war has alarmed even the most aggressive of nations. Although we have to make preparation for war in the future, the fact is that we are not in the same state of despondency regarding the world as we have been for the last few years. That has eased the pressure to a certain extent and has given us a chance to look at other matters within the state. Hence the more prolonged discussion at this time with regard to dominion-provincial tax arrangements.

I think that is the sensible way to look at this matter, because we are now on the threshold of great advances in Canada and there is no reason why we cannot look forward to a period of peace, a reduction in armaments and a general easing of tension. Under those circumstances the reasons which kept the wartime tax rental agreements in operation in Canada must be considered as having ceased to exist, and a new look should be taken at the problem.

As I see the situation at the moment, the minister has taken a new look at the pressure exerted upon him by the provinces, but it is not a very broad view. He has made modifications of the earlier agreements, but they are only modifications. I had hoped that a much larger view of the whole problem would have been taken and that the minister would have come forward with a more comprehensive suggestion. I realize that he has been patting himself on the back for the additional grants which are going to be made available to the provinces, the higher ceilings on the grants which will protect the provinces in case there is a turn for the worse in our economic conditions and the 8 per cent increase, as he puts it, in the revenues of the various provinces as a result of the increased amounts being available. The minister seems to be satisfied on that ground, but I must admit that he expressed some doubt that this plan will last without modification. I am sure it will have to be modified before too many years have gone by, because it is not possible to foresee all the problems which will arise.

I am always interested in the approach of cabinet ministers to the problems placed in front of them. A study of their speeches and expressions gives an inking of their philosophy. I should like to give three examples of this. In introducing the resolution yesterday the Minister of Finance seemed to be extremely hurried. It was difficult for us on this side to follow his remarks. I have just read them in order to get their full gist. The minister seemed to be a little anxious to get his resolution passed, or was not altogether satisfied with the proposition he was putting forward and hence was extremely hurried in his remarks. I should like to quote one sentence which he used, which appears on page 5987 of yesterday's Hansard:

> The payments were on a more generous scale than before.

I notice the word "generous". That is the great white father making generous payments to those beneath him.

Mr. Harris: May I interrupt just to say that I used the word "generous" to indicate "greater", not in that sense at all.

Mr. Churchill: All right; the minister has now corrected that. Then as found at page 5988, the minister used this expression:

> We have tried in every way to be sympathetic to the many legitimate provincial claims and at the same time reconcile them with our national responsibilities.

"Sympathetic"—another word that indicates that avuncular view of life. Why not simply say, "We have tried in every way to balance the legitimate claims of the provinces with the national responsibilities"? Let us not have this sympathetic attitude. Let us deal on a basis of equality. Similarly I notice that in the report of the proceedings of the federal-provincial conference of October 3, 1955, the Prime Minister used an expression which seems odd coming, as I think it did, from a prepared manuscript. It is to be found on page 15 of the proceedings, and the Prime Minister had this to say:

> These advantages are of real value, but they are not benefits for which we must ask federal taxpayers to pay too high a price . . .

I did not realize that we had a particular class in our society who were federal taxpayers alone. I thought the taxpayer was just that chap who paid municipal taxes, provincial taxes and federal taxes all from the same pocket. If the thinking of the government is that there is a special class in the community called the federal taxpayer, I suggest that thinking should be revised.

The Minister of Finance doubted that the present proposal would last for all time, and with reason, because I am sure he has looked back at what has transpired in the past concerning the relationship between the dominion government and the provinces in connection with the division of their responsibilities and in connection with the amount of money available for each level of government to carry out its functions. Last year, speaking in the budget debate, I dealt with the subject of dominion-provincial conferences and traced the history of those conferences and the purpose for which they were devised. I noted that in the first 20 years following confederation there had been no interprovincial or dominion-provincial conferences, not that there was not dissatisfaction on the part of the provinces with regard to the financial arrangements made at the time of confederation but because no one took the initiative until about 1887.

For a period of 39 years from 1887 to 1926 there were a series of conferences called on the initiative of the provincial premiers to discuss matters of concern to them. There were seven of those conferences. I omit reference to the one called in 1918 by the then prime minister, Sir Robert Borden, in order to stimulate the war effort. The other conferences were called on the initiative of provincial premiers, and the subject matter of those conferences was very largely the question of financial assistance and a revision of the subsidies paid by the dominion government to the provinces under the terms of the confederation agreement.

So the problem is far from new in Canadian life, and the fact that it was not solved in those early years led us into the extreme difficulties of the depression years and resulted in the Rowell-Sirois report and finally in the tax rental agreements. But unless we are careful for the future we may again run into difficulty, and once again in Canadian history perhaps some of the areas of Canada will find themselves in an extraordinary depressed state and increased assistance will have to be given.

At some stage in Canadian history this matter must be grappled with, and though it cannot be settled in final terms improvements can be made. It is rather astonishing that 89 years after confederation there should be areas in Canada which are economically depressed in relation to other areas. The tempo of advance has not been the same all along the line, and apparently this has not been recognized from time to time. We have reached a period in national development when I think a much greater effort can be made to correct the disparities in our national life.

Ever since I have been here I have been hearing legitimate complaints from various areas of Canada with regard to the restraints that have been placed on their economic development, and I had hoped that now, having reached this stage, having to revise the tax rental agreements, a much greater effort would be made on the part of the government to correct these errors in our national life.

I spoke about the earlier conferences up to 1926. From that time to the present there have been another seven or so conferences called at the instance of the dominion government, and called for a variety of purposes. A year ago last May when I was criticizing dominion-provincial conferences I objected to the nature of some of those conferences in the past and hoped that in the future the conferences would not take that turn. I pointed out that at one of the dominion-provincial conferences the delegates were advised that the purpose of the conference was to provide material for legislative programs for the legislatures as well as for the dominion. I recall that last year I objected to the Prime Minister announcing to the dominion-provincial conference the policy of the government with regard to unemployment, when it might better have been announced here in the House of Commons.

However, these later conferences, though dealing with a wide range of subjects, have nevertheless been compelled to deal with the same problem that affected the premiers in the earlier interprovincial conferences; how to solve the problem of meeting provincial responsibilities with the funds that were available to the provincial governments. That problem remains at the present time. In the conference that was assembled here last October the premiers in turn made their statements, and once again their recurring theme throughout the proceedings of that conference was that provincial responsibilities exceeded provincial sources of revenue, and the premiers asked that something be done about it.

Now we have the proposal of the Minister of Finance in order to come to grips with that problem. I think he is rather disappointed that his solution has not received wide acceptance, but it has not received wide acceptance because it has not gone far enough. I think any solution evolved by dominion-provincial representatives will have to go much further than the one now before us. On its face it looks attractive. There is more money available for the provinces. There is greater protection offered to the less well off provinces. But the root of the matter has not been attacked, and that is the division of responsibility between the dominion government and the provincial jurisdictions. I note that last year I concluded my remarks in this way:

> I will conclude with this statement. Dominion-provincial conferences may continue to be a necessity for Canada. If so, they should be restricted to the core of the problem, the division of administrative responsibility between the dominion and the provinces, and the division of fields of taxation.

That remains the core of the problem. The only way in which to approach that problem is by a conference which would deal with that crucial matter and deal with it not in 24 hours or in 48 hours but over a lengthy period. I believe we have reached the stage where we must reassess the effects of confederation and re-examine the responsibilities assigned to the various governments. We cannot continue on this basis of the dominion government putting forward, in the interests of the general advancement of Canada, various schemes which involve provincial participation on a financial basis, thereby increasing perhaps the load on provincial resources, without the assumption of full responsibility on the part of the dominion.

To my mind the best example of that, or perhaps not the best example but an easy example, is the question of the trans-Canada highway. On the surface it looks to be a fine scheme for the dominion government to say, "Canada is interested in communications. The trans-Canada highway, after the fashion on the great highways that criss-cross the United States, would be a good thing for our country. This matter of highway construction is a provincial responsibility but the dominion government will assist. Let us now get together with the provinces and determine some plan of action." I do not know how many years it has been going on but it is a good many years, and we still have not completed the trans-Canada highway.

That is an example of the faltering steps this government has taken toward the solution of problems that happen to cross over into the provincial field. Why could it not be determined that the dominion government would accept full responsibility for something which has a national aspect of that character and which would be agreeable generally to the people of Canada? Why could the federal government not accept full responsibility for it and put that trans-Canada highway through? Have the provinces ever suggested that they would be opposed to having a first-class highway put through their territory without having to bear half the cost of construction of that highway? I think not.

I was interested in the October federal-provincial conference and in the remarks made by the premier of Manitoba, who is a good Liberal and who is, I think, sympathetic —and I now use that word "sympathetic" properly—to this dominion government because he has troubles somewhat similar to those of this government. I think he would like to help them out as best he could if they will help him out. Being in that frame of mind, he nevertheless was not too enthusiastic about some of the government's proposals, and he set forth very clearly the situation with regard to Manitoba. I thought some of these things might have been referred to by the Minister of Finance when he was introducing his resolution.

The premier of the province of Manitoba, as found at page 59 of this report, points out that the increase in government expenditure—and he is comparing the years 1945 and 1955 —was, for the federal government, 5·5 per cent whereas for the provincial governments the increase was 291·9 per cent and for municipal governments it was 276 per cent. Then the premier of Manitoba dealt with the question of capital investment and he showed the extent of the investment by the provinces and the municipalities. I quote his words as found at page 62:

> Over the past five years, the provinces and municipalities between them have been spending nearly a billion dollars per year on capital projects of all kinds. The federal government has been spending perhaps half this amount annually. It is noteworthy that, in these post-war years of prosperity, the indebtedness of the provinces, municipalities and their agencies has risen from $2·977 billion in 1945 to $5·715 billion in 1953—an increase of 92 per cent. while the federal government debt has actually been reduced from $18·438 billion to $18·276 billion.

So you have there a provincial premier pointing out the tremendous increase in the indebtedness incurred by those other governments, provincial and municipal, and the more satisfactory situation of the federal government. Then, dealing with that very matter, as found at page 63, he went on to say this:

This gives rise to the grave question of how the provinces and municipalities can hope to support much greater indebtedness in the next few years—an indebtedness which may well reach about $10 billion by 1961.

In other words the provinces see a great increase in their costs; and it is for that reason that they are not satisfied with the modest increase in their revenues which will result from the proposal of the Minister of Finance.

Earlier I mentioned the cross purposes which we sometimes find in Canada because of the overlapping of the dominion and provincial fields of activity. The premier of Manitoba gave an instance of that situation in dealing with what are called shared cost programs. He points out that although the provinces are appreciative of the initiative of the dominion government in putting forward these ideas concerning shared cost programs, nevertheless they create quite a burden for the provinces. He lists 15, I think, of these shared cost programs covering the fields of health and welfare, education and labour, public works, agriculture and natural resources. I quote his words as found at page 65:

In our fiscal year 1954-55 these programs involved expenditures amounting to more than $8,500,000. For the year in question this figure represented an amount equal to 15 per cent of Manitoba's budget.

In the list of these shared cost programs he queries the dominion's attitude toward an item such as civil defence, which apparently he would be happy to see taken over entirely by the dominion authorities.

He goes on, of course, to deal with the problem of education and the increasing burden on provincial and municipal resources as a result of the increased enrolment that is foreseen in all the schools and universities. Then he suggests, not an increase in the financial contribution from the dominion government of $115 million but that something in the nature of $200 million or $300 million a year would be a satisfactory increase. For example, he says this:

We think then, that the constructive approach to federal-provincial fiscal problems is to substantially expand the federal tax rental payments in the order of $200 million to $300 million a year. Further, if we are to rid ourselves of some of the clutter, uncertainty and inevitable interference of the many shared cost programs, then the tax rental payments should be increased by an additional $100 million to $150 million annually.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this sets out the problem rather briefly. The provincial governments and the municipalities are carrying a greater share of the load in Canada than they are able to bear. Obviously if you study the statements by these various provincial premiers you will see that they feel there must be greater revenues available to the provinces. The method by which these revenues are made available, I concede, is something that can only be hammered out during long drawn out investigations and studies. We have one method put before us now by the minister, and although that method in itself seems acceptable, the amounts involved are under criticism and properly so, because the real problem has not been approached; that is the division of responsibility in accordance with the change in our life in Canada. It is the responsibilities of governments in this country that require careful study.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance was telling us that over the last 20 or 25 years some progress has been made. One method has been tried out, tax rentals, and here is another method. I do not know whether he was implying that this should go along for another 20 years and then we should take another look at it. That is rather slow progress in 20 or 25 years, just one method being tried out. Now we have found that faulty and surely the present approach should be toward an investigation of the division of responsibility as between the dominion and provincial authorities. Can we suggest that a solution has been arrived at by way of this resolution and the bill that is going to follow it? It is a stop gap to a certain extent, and it is a bit of a dole to those provinces who have no bargaining power. Really, some of the poorer provinces have no bargaining power as against this strong dominion government. Fortunately there are in Canada some provinces which have bargaining power, and they have assisted their junior brethren by standing up to the dominion government and insisting on a better deal.

I do not like the idea of the dominion government taking the stand that they are handing out charity to the poorer provinces or taking this sympathetic approach to their problems or things of that nature. I think it is a question of sharing equally in this great country of ours, giving each part of it a fair share of the national wealth that is being produced, not by the dominion government and its policies so much as by the actions of the provincial and municipal authorities. The real work of the country is being done down at that level. The profits accruing from that work are being taken into the coffers at Ottawa. Then the authorities here seem to think that having received the profits from those activities, they were the producers of those profits.

That is not the view that is taken by the provincial and municipal authorities who have to provide the means by which the general industrial growth of this country takes place. They have to provide all the services that are ancillary to the development of industrial centres. They build access roads to develop our mines in the northern part of this country. They provide educational facilities and things of that nature. The profits come down to the central government, and then the central government thinks it has created all this wealth.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that a dominion-provincial conference be called devoted to the task of solving the division of responsibilities as between the dominion and provincial governments. It would have to continue for a considerable length of time because it is a difficult problem, but that is the only way we can reach a solution of this problem which has beset Canada ever since confederation.

Mr. Blackmore: May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, having in mind the considerations which I put before the committee last evening, as recorded on pages 6025 to 6028 of Hansard, considerations, including such matters as the moves already made in Canada, apparently directly aimed at weakening and ultimately destroying the British North America Act; having all these things in mind, one can be pardoned if he is tempted to wonder what the Minister of Finance is up to, he and the interests directing him from behind the scenes, granting there are such. Naturally we people in the opposition have to be aware of possibilities every time a move is made.

To the casual onlooker the resolution before the committee is innocent looking, innocuous in appearance, but this resolution could be, and probably is, designed to be a blank cheque in favour of Marxism. One of the great characteristics of Marxist philosophy is that very exacting taxation might be applied. This will help to explain why I used the expression I have just used.

Most hon. members do not need to be reminded that there are evil forces abroad in the world. To those I referred last evening. That the agents of evil have manoeuvred themselves into high places is well known. From such agents of evil Canada is probably by no means free. Evidence of designing mischief-makers has been apparent in times past in Canada, more times than a few. Ours are days demanding the utmost vigilance because so many are talking centralization, as I pointed out last evening.

Let us look back over the past 30 years of our history. Thirty years ago it seems the efforts of the evil powers in Canada began to intensify. Consider briefly the passage of the Bank of Canada Act and events leading thereto. According to the testimony so ably and emphatically set forth by Sir Thomas White and Mr. Beaudry Leman in their memoranda of dissent, as they appear in the report of the Royal Commission on banking and currency for Canada, published in 1933, at pages 83 to 84 and 85 to 91 for Sir Thomas White, and at pages 95 to 97 for Beaudry Leman—according to these great Canadian authorities, Canada had about as much use for the Bank of Canada as a beaver would have for an extra tail. Why, then, was the Bank of Canada apparently forced upon Canada, and by whom and for whom and by what means?

More than a little light is thrown upon the situation by a more or less casual reference in a paragraph occurring in a letter dated January 14, 1941, by Hon. W. R. Motherwell, outstanding Saskatchewan statesman and at one time a member of this house. The letter was published in the Western Producer of January 23, 1941. In the letter Hon. W. R. Motherwell criticized the Sirois report. The passage in the paragraph to which I particularly refer reads as follows:

> As the date of the dominion and provincial conference on the report of the Sirois commission draws nearer, the signs of systematic and increasing propaganda on behalf of the acceptance of this report becomes more and more bold, insidious and emphatic, e.g. that, as per press report, unless the seven or eight provinces that are said by the secretary of this commission to be bordering on defaulting on their bonds, accept this Sirois report, something "villainously destructive of our war efforts" is going to happen.
> When the press of January 7 carried this remarkable statement by R. W. Fowler one of the secretaries of assistant secretaries of the Rowell-Sirois commission on dominion-provincial relations, it became quite apparent to even a blind man, that some one must have instructed him to make this, to me, quite unwarranted prediction and for the seeming purpose of coercing the Canadian provinces into the acceptance of this report by the application of stimulating doses of familiar propaganda dropped at appropriate times, places and occasions to check a growing suspicion that to use an old adage "all was not gold that glitters" throughout this much-lauded report. Mr. R. W. Fowler should remember that it is surely in vain for the fowler to spread the net in the sight of any bird (the Canadian provinces).

I understand from press dispatches that Premier Hepburn surmises that it was Ottawa (presumably the federal steering committee) that gave Mr. Fowler the tip what to say, but he denies it. Of course no one would expect the propagandist-in-chief would admit this, even if it were entirely correct as a "safe" man would never admit anything like that or his name would be Dennis the next time a "safe" man's services were in demand.

Evidently a further study of this voluminous, potentially well seasoned with dynamite report, was desirable before accepting it blindly in wartime at the instance of one commission assistant secretary, while another had been busy filling up our magazines and press with even more alluring and seductive descriptive dope, than that which preceded the launching of that other anticipated farmer cure-all—the Bank of Canada.

Hon. members who have heard that passage read I am sure will be impressed by such relics as those which are hidden away and which are to be found only in collections like the one which I happen to have been successful in accumulating a number of years ago.

But see now what is indicated by what this man says concerning the way in which the Bank of Canada was foisted upon the Dominion of Canada. There was an attempt to deliberately build up a public opinion in favour of the Bank of Canada. Now, if the Bank of Canada had been in demand by the people of Canada there would have been no need for the propaganda especially alluring, seductive and deluding such as occurred.

The reason I look upon this letter as being of more than usual significance is the fact that Hon. W. R. Motherwell was one of the finest public men, one of the finest statesmen who ever occupied a public position in the Dominion of Canada, either in a province or in the dominion, and he occupied both. He lived right through this period of which we are talking; he lived right through world war I; he lived right through the whole period during which the Bank of Canada was set up, and was living right through the time when the Rowell-Sirois report was being prepared to put before the people. He wrote this letter in the open forum of the Western Producer to draw to the attention of the people who might read it in western Canada the seriousness of the situation which was confronting the people at that time.

That passage from the pen of one of the really great Canadians merits most careful study and consideration. Notice the words "filling up our magazines and press with", and so forth, down to "Bank of Canada". You know, you do not get free access to our magazines and to our press so you can fill them up unless there is a lot of money behind you. And when a lot of money is behind anyone it is likely that he is not working for the welfare of the people; that has been proved over and over again. The Bank of Canada was represented—and I quote again the passage I read—as an:

The men who were advocating the Bank of Canada then knew perfectly well that the Bank of Canada would not cure the troubles of the farmers any more than it has done since. Our farmers are simply being crucified today, and what is the Bank of Canada doing? It is sitting with its hands serenely folded, incapable of doing anything about it and apparently not desiring to try to do anything about it.

Just imagine propaganda going out through the press in article after article after article assuring the farmers that once they got the Bank of Canada their troubles would all be ended. Just imagine what that means, Mr. Chairman. And then, after the propaganda had been going on long enough, when those who were engaged in sending out the propaganda thought they must have convinced the people, do you know what they began to do? They began to lie to the people in the maritimes, telling them that all the people out west were demanding this measure. Then they began to lie to the people in the west, telling them that all the people in the maritimes were demanding it, when the people had nothing to do with it at all. That is the sort of thing that went on in connection with the Rowell-Sirois report. Anyone who remembers those days will recall the coloured headlines an inch high which appeared in various newspapers all across the country.

The Bank of Canada was presented as a desirable institution, presented with—

. . . alluring and seductive descriptive dope.

—to use Mr. W. R. Motherwell's expression—in magazines and the press.

Somebody other than the common Canadian very much wanted the Bank of Canada, somebody with more than a little money and with quite above average influence with the press! There must be a good many hon. members in this house who know quite well who it is that exercises the greatest control over the daily press in our country. I have made references to that sort of thing in times past.

Now, the same or a similar somebody wanted the Rowell-Sirois report accepted. I think hon. members will find interesting an editorial which appeared in the Western Producer in the January 23, 1941, issue. I shall quote a number of small passages from that editorial; they are revealing to all who wish to get something resembling a comprehension of the kind of thing that was going on there. Here are some statements from the editorial. It is headed "The Interprovincial Conference". Remember that the Rowell-Sirois conference between the premiers and the prime minister of Canada had by that time been held. The article says:

> The collapse of the dominion-provincial conference was the signal for the release in the press of western Canada of a flood of special dispatches and editorial comment, hysterical in tone and viciously mischievous in content. This would have been discreditable in peacetime; in wartime it is disgraceful and highly alarming. The dictionary is scoured for adjectives to damn the three premiers who refused to proceed with the conference on the terms laid down. They are treated as if they were rebels against constituted authority and the least of the accusations levelled at them is that they are archfomentors of disunity.

May I break in here to comment that these three men, Premier Hepburn of Ontario, Premier Pattullo of British Columbia and Premier Aberhart of Alberta were the three greatest figures of their time working for unity. I proceed with the editorial:

> Be that as it may, it is our considered opinion that rarely in the history of Canada have the fires of disunity been more feverishly and effectively stoked than by the press of western Canada during the last few days. Throwing away all sense of restraint, without the shadow of an effort dispassionately to assess the merits of the disagreement, with an irresponsibility unmatched in the annals of journalism, the newspapers of western Canada—we have not yet seen those of the east—set themselves deliberately to fan the flames of discord by pouring contumely on provincial governments who dared disagree with them, and voicing open and convert threats of what is to happen to all the provinces from now on. All in all, in these days of travail, a sorry spectacle.

Having heard that passage I think the minister will forgive me if I have implied that he might be under the influence of people who are not working for the benefit of Canada. Here is another passage:

> To those who followed the course of the Sirois commission since its appointment there should have been little cause for surprise in the final denouement. Mr. King's first announcement of his purpose was greeted with almost overwhelming criticism. Mr. Bennett—

Mr. Bennett was the leader of the Conservative party in the years following 1930, and I think he was one of the greatest figures who ever occupied a position in Canadian public life, notwithstanding what a good many people like to say about him. The article continues:

> Mr. Bennett marshalled all the powers of his invective in his attack upon it—on the terms of reference, the method adopted and particularly the personnel selected. It was charged at the time that the common qualifications of the members of the commission were that they were all staunch Liberals and that they shared the doubtful honour of being highly acceptable to the Canadian institute of international affairs.

Anybody who knows anything about the Canadian institute of international affairs knows that any person intimately connected with that organization is open to very definite suspicion indeed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course there will be light laughter because there are people who are intimately associated with that organization who are just plain dupes and who do not know they are being led down the garden path, and there are others who are willing dupes and quite prepared to sell their country for less than a mess of pottage, and there are some who just do not know what they are about. Notice how significant that passage is. I continue:

> Many of the provinces protested because they had not been consulted. Mr. King, however, as was his right, refused to budge and the commission proceeded with its work.

You see how widely that differs from the principle I laid down last night in the case of William Lyon Mackenzie King. If the Rowell-Sirois commission was necessary, and if it was necessary that a division of taxation should be accomplished in Canada for the benefit of all the people of Canada, why were the provinces not called in in respect of this matter? Why were they not called into council before the Rowell-Sirois commission went to work? Well, the obvious reason was the Mr. King knew that almost to a man the provinces would resist the idea of doing the thing the Rowell-Sirois commission set out to do, and they would have objected to some of the personnel of the commission.

I might mention briefly John W. Dafoe, who was the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press. Perhaps I had better stop talking about him because I do not have a great deal of respect for him. At the present time I cannot think of any thing that man did which was in the interests of Canada, either in his newspaper or anywhere else; yet he was a prominent member of the Rowell-Sirois commission.

Here is another passage:

> Those who remember the reception the commission received at some of the provincial capitals, particularly at Toronto and Edmonton, surely could not have been taken by surprise at what happened last week. Mr. King himself admitted that he personally was not in favour of calling the conference at this time, but that he changed his mind as the result of the representations of the financial advisers of the government as conveyed to him by Mr. Ilsley.

Financial advisers of the government? Whom were they thinking of, and what interests did they represent? What were they moving for? Those are all matters that need to be examined with the utmost care, but it is very difficult to examine into them because the information necessary is not now readily available to us. Here is another quotation:

> Then as to the conference itself. The press focuses attention on three provinces. They might with equal justice have emphasized the fact that only three provinces, and these by no means the strongest, favoured the terms of the report in large part. It is assuming altogether too much to take it for granted that Quebec, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick would have adopted an attitude greatly different from that of Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta. They did not, as it turned out, find it necessary to give voice to any opposition; they could afford to sit back, as they did, in the knowledge that the three openly dissenting provinces would do all the opposing necessary, and, incidentally, bear all the odium resulting from their stand.

I commend those quotations to hon. members and to the people throughout Canada who are trying to feel their way through the dangerous times in which it is our lot to live. The same or similar persons are probably behind this resolution, and I say: Watch your step, Canada.

Who might those hidden people be? I find a clue to that in the setting up of the Bank of Canada, to be found in the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada which sat in 1933, which report I commend to the reading of hon. members of this house. That report is a perfect storehouse of information which bears most importantly upon us in these days.

Consider for a moment the members of that royal commission on banking and currency in Canada, 1933. I shall give their names so that hon. members can judge whether they would be men who would do a job for Canada. The first was Right Hon. Lord Macmillan, P.C., K.C., of the city of London, England. The city of London, England; what does that stand for? It stands for the concentration of financiers in England. In a very large measure those financiers are men of a blood which is alien to that of Anglo Saxon Celts, and they certainly are men who in no way are interested in the welfare of Anglo Saxon Celts. That has been proved over and over again, and it is still true.

The next member was Sir Charles Stewart Addis, K.C.M.G., of the city of London, England. I ask you who in his right senses in Canada would select two men from the city of London, England to come and sit in on a matter pertaining to the vital interests of Canada unless he were under pressure which he was unable to resist at the time.

The next member was Right Hon. Sir William Thomas White, P.C., K.C.M.G., of the city of Toronto, an eminently successful Canadian minister of finance during world war I. This man I regard as probably the greatest financial statesman in the whole history of Canada.

An hon. Member: What are you kicking about?

Mr. Blackmore: I will tell you in a minute what I am kicking about. This man and Beaudry Leman the other great Canadian authority sitting on that commission were smothered before the commission started its work by the bringing in of the two men I have mentioned already. The fourth member was Hon. John Edward Brownlee, K.C., of the city of Edmonton, who at that time was the premier of Alberta and whose major concern was to stop the growth of Social Credit in Alberta. There are people who think it is of great interest to Canada that Social Credit go forward. I tell you there is no doubt in the world that the only solution for our financial problems lies through Social Credit. If hon. members do not know that, it is time they learned.

Mr. Hansell: They will some day.

Mr. Blackmore: Let us hope it is not too late. The fifth member was Beaudry Leman, B.Sc., C.E., of the city of Montreal, a man eminently fitted for the position he was in. I shall not take the time to give his many qualifications, but certainly he was a very great authority on monetary matters. These men White and Leman in their dissenting memoranda to the report of the commission made it perfectly clear that in their judgment Canada had about as much use for the Bank of Canada as a beaver had for two tails. They proved their words thoroughly.

I happen to know quite a little about John Edward Brownlee, K.C., M.L.A., of Edmonton. I have no desire to cast any reflection upon him, but I believe that if he were in this house he would not hesitate to say that he had not done anything in his long life that would give him any right whatsoever to sit in on anything pertaining to banking. I say that whatever else he may have done during the course of his life as a lawyer, that would be the case.

This commission was set up with a majority against Canada before the commission heard a single word of evidence. I would wager that the commission knew exactly what it was going to find before it ever sat at all. There was no doubt in the world what the two men from the city of London would find. There was no doubt in the world which way J. E. Brownlee would go. The two men who were probably the greatest authorities in Canada at that time were completely smothered.

What was the purpose of establishing the Bank of Canada? The main purpose of establishing the Bank of Canada, I submit, was to strangle and abolish the Finance Act of 1923, as well as to destroy the whole Canadian financial system as that system had been set up and developed by the fathers of confederation and succeeding Canadians under the British North America Act. In other words, the aim of setting up the Bank of Canada was to hew out a vast proportion of the foundation of the British North America Act by sweeping away at one fell swoop a financial system which had functioned with such admirable and enviable success up to and through world war I—I referred to this last night—and on down through the reconstruction period until the United States dragged Canada into the great depression of 1929 and the 1930's. Before I finish my speaking on this measure I am going to read from the evidence to show how splendidly Canada had done up to the time the Bank of Canada was established.

Why establish the Bank of Canada if thought was given to Canada's welfare? The commission was set up on July 31, 1933, as is indicated at page 5 of the report, and its devastating and sweeping recommendation was submitted on September 27, 1933, as indicated at page 82 of the report. In other words this body of men determined in so short a period, as I have indicated by these dates, upon a recommendation that went far toward undermining the British North America Act. The Balfour declaration of 1926, which said that members of the British commonwealth now were equal in every aspect of their internal and external affairs, was undermined by the setting up of the Bank of Canada; and the statute of Westminster of 1931 was also undermined all by reason of the fact that the Bank of Canada brought Canada's financial system in indefinite measure under foreign, if not alien control.

There are those who say that this is not the case. All you have to do is read the evidence recently given by the governor of the Bank of Canada at the hearing we had before the standing committee on banking and commerce. You will see how very cagey and cautious he was, and how he replied once or twice to the effect that if the government asked certain things the bank simply would not agree. Look at what happened to our price structure.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Blackmore: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have no desire to infringe. I shall be back again.

Miss Aitken: Mr. Chairman, in speaking on the resolution today I want to take one phase of dominion-provincial relations, education. This is supposed to be a very delicate subject because we are told, especially by the government, that any grants to the provinces in aid of education would be an invasion of provincial rights. I believe we have reached a very real and very serious crisis in education. To say that federal aid would be an invasion is like a fire chief telling an Englishman that he cannot go into his house to put out a fire because an Englishman's home is his castle.

It is true that under the British North America Act the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over education. That is the way it is and that is the way we want it, but it seems to me that does not stop the federal government from giving a helping hand this year anyway, from the large estimated surplus of money that has already been paid by the taxpayers. Health is another item under provincial jurisdiction as set out in the British North America Act, but you do not hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare being particularly quiet about the grants he is giving to the provinces to help them to build hospitals, and there does not seem to be any undue modesty or embarrassment about the suggested health scheme which would be contributed to both by the provinces and the federal government. Certainly there have been no complaints from the provincial governments with regard to the grants that have been given for hospitals.

Therefore I do not believe it would be an invasion in any way, because education has gone far beyond the lower levels of government. When the British North America Act was drawn up children were educated and trained for life in their own local communities, but today children must be educated and trained for life in the whole country, in fact for life in the whole world. In a book published earlier this year entitled "Canadian Education Today" there is this observation:

> Education is a function of the province, a responsibility of the community and the concern of the whole nation.

I believe that education is an essential social service today. It is just as essential to the federal government as it is to the local or provincial governments. After a survey by the Canadian school trustees association last year, this statement was made:

> Much of the cost of the local school is due to national requirements. National defence demands that the basic education in all parts of the dominion be thorough and extensive. Canada's development as an industrial nation can continue as it should only if local schools provide the basic education for scientifically trained personnel. Technical education must be provided for an increasing percentage of youth.

Education has taken on a national significance since the fathers of confederation drew up the British North America Act. The type of schooling that was adequate 50 years ago is no longer good enough. I believe that our education is falling below acceptable standards. The criterion, unfortunately, is dollars and cents, and it certainly is a wrong criterion. If our educational standards are falling below acceptable levels, then not the least of the sufferers will be the federal government. As the trustees association said, the federal government is dependent upon the provinces and the municipalities for the basic general education of the people it needs, including engineers, civil servants, armed forces personnel, scientists—yes, and cabinet ministers too. Education is of such national importance that the federal government should make certain that it is not allowed to fall below acceptable standards. I think we all feel that education is becoming a grave national problem, and no small part of local school costs is due to national requirements. Indeed, schooling has taken on a national significance.

Earlier this year the President of the United States called in representatives of some 300 organizations to participate in a conference on education. I think that would be a good idea for us to follow. The vice president of the United States recognized at that conference the national importance of education when he asserted that it was education that determines the quality of our statesmen who are endeavouring to keep peace. It is education that determines the character and leadership of our religious men who are responsible for our spiritual standards. It is education that determines the character and leadership of management and labour, of our cultural life and of those who will determine this nation's future, the electors themselves.

Vice President Nixon said at that time:

> We should recognize that some additional federal activity and responsibility is inevitable and necessary in the field of education.

I believe that Canadians must recognize this realistic fact too, and I do not believe that education grants from the federal government would in any way threaten provincial rights in education. Canada is richly endowed with great natural and human resources. It has been pointed out by many of our intellectual leaders that we are concerned more with our natural resources than we are with our human resources. Education is the main tool necessary for developing a country's human resources, and I believe the time has come when the federal government must help fashion that tool and then the provincial governments will finish the job.

My interest in the problem of education is not purely academic. In the House of Commons I represent a suburban constituency where education is becoming an ever-increasing burden. We have a shortage of classrooms and a shortage of teachers. Communities are springing up overnight and schools are too small even before their construction is finished. Classrooms are so crowded that the hours have to be staggered so that all children in the communities can go to school. This is true of my constituency, and I am sure it is true of many parts of Canada. The school population is increasing at the rate of 150,000 a year. In 1951 there were 2½ million school children in Canada. Today there are 3½ million students enrolled in the elementary and secondary schools. Five years from now this situation will be even more complex and certainly the schools will be more crowded. As of June 1, 1956, there were 97 per cent more children under the age of five years than there were on June 1, 1941. Every one of those children must be given a good education; every one of them must be given a good education free. We believe that is the right of every Canadian child.

Even today education is one of our biggest problems, and it will become greater in the future. I believe it must be faced by all levels of government. Up to date the federal government just shrugs it off with a holier than thou attitude on the basis that it would be interfering with provincial rights if it were to do anything. Local governments are the poor relations with respect to the tax dollar, yet local governments carry most of the education burden. Municipalities are paying 65 per cent of education costs and the provinces are paying 35 per cent.

This really means that the home owner is carrying almost the complete tax load with respect to education, yet education goes far beyond the local community. Young people, wherever they are from Newfoundland to British Columbia, are being educated not for one municipality or for one province but for the whole of Canada. But it is the home owner who is paying two-thirds of the school costs.

Then, too, this system of financing education at the local level certainly fosters inequalities in education. Some communities have more tax resources than others, and some communities can have better teachers and better schools. At the present time there are 5,142 untrained teachers teaching in our schools and 3,744 partially trained teachers. It seems to me that this is a very bad situation, and one which is going to get worse. We boast of equal educational opportunity for all Canadian children; but again, because of dollars and cents, the opportunity is not equal.

A few years ago there came out a little book by George Orwell called "Animal Farm" and in it he made this sardonic observation:

All pigs are equal but some are more equal than others.

So it is with respect to our educational opportunities; some are more equal than others across Canada. The trustees association has stressed this fact by pointing out that all children do not have equal opportunities to get an education and that they are dependent on the taxpaying ability of the district in which they live. It is true that money cannot buy education. However, it can supply the tools; and the quality of education depends upon the teaching or upon the quality of those tools. The highest quality of teaching should be and could be available to all Canadian children. If the federal government would assume its share of educational costs, there would be equal opportunities for all children to get an education.

I have dealt only with the elementary and secondary school education because they are of vital concern to the people in my constituency. But as everyone knows, higher education is shaping up as an even greater problem for us to face in the future. In the past young people could earn enough money during the summers to put themselves through university. Today such a thing is impossible. If they earn enough to pay their fees they are lucky.

In May of this year the University of Toronto was obliged to raise its fees by 11·2 per cent and Dr. Sidney Smith, the president of the university has indicated that it probably will not stop there. Higher education should be available to all who have ability, and not just to those who have the ability to pay for it. At the rate we are going, higher education may well become just a rich man's privilege in this country. In a brief presented to the royal commission Dr. Sidney Smith summed up the situation in these words:

University courses are still much too expensive for a great many of our population. Equality of opportunity is a fine-sounding phrase; it will not be a fact in our democracy until the universities can enrol able students irrespective of the financial situation of their parents.

Tuition fees have been raised repeatedly in recent years . . . We have not been receiving from governments financial support that is worthy to be compared with what universities receive in Great Britain or the United States.

[Miss Aitken.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe the time has come when the federal government must find a means of paying its share of the cost of this essential service, namely education.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, one of the particular reasons we oppose this present resolution was expressed by the leader of our party the other day, when he stated that this bill is being passed without receiving the approval of the provinces. The government is now proposing to write into legislation something which the provinces may not accept. By doing so they are contributing to what we regard as an undesirable principle, namely the principle of the centralization of government or the centralization of power. That is a principle that is contrary to what we deem to be our free democratic way of life.

I think I can say that this central government now seated at Ottawa has become extremely powerful over the last few years with all the legislation it has been able to build up around it. Almost all the legislation which it proposes has the effect of solidifying its policies not only in the industrial world but in the economic and monetary fields. The more power that is given to governments, the less power remains in the hands of the people. We believe that a government should give a lead but that it should never impose its will. This resolution which precedes a bill has all the earmarks of attempting to impose the will of this government upon the provinces.

Once again I say that for democracy to function properly a government should lead, not impose its will. We in the Social Credit movement believe in the autonomy of the provinces. We do not believe we can go wrong in attempting, at every hand, to protect the rights of the provinces. One reason we believe that is that the provinces are nearer the individual than the centralized government at Ottawa. Once again I say I do not believe we can go wrong in principle by protecting the autonomous rights of the provinces.

I do not think we need to go very far abroad to recognize that this principle of the autonomy of the provinces is acceptable to the people of the provinces and the people of Canada as a whole. I think Mr. Duplessis is an example of that, for he has had remarkable success in winning elections on the basis of his determination to protect the autonomy and rights of his own province. Whether or not we agree with his platform in provincial elections is another matter. I am only saying this to illustrate that the people themselves are supporters of provincial autonomy. They do not like the central government, living a long way from them, dictating what their particular provincial government should do.

I believe that is where we differ with our C.C.F. friends. I listened very carefully to the speech given the other day by the leader of the C.C.F. party. In my opinion it savoured of centralization. He indicated that this government must have the power to do certain things. Our position is that this government should be in a position to lead the provinces in such a way that the provinces can do certain things for themselves.

This government has boasted of the high economic level that presently exists in Canada. They boast of their surpluses. They say that Canada has never had it as good as it is today. They appear to me, at least, to take all credit to themselves for what we will admit is a fairly high economic level.

Let me remind you, Mr. Chairman, that the provinces have been largely responsible for this high level of economic activity in this country. It is the provinces who have encouraged investment in business enterprises within their boundaries. I say, therefore, that the provinces have been largely responsible for the high level of business activity in this country. Ontario and Quebec are the two mainly industrial provinces of Canada. They have so managed their affairs that perhaps they have attracted industries over the years. Nevertheless those two great industrial provinces are managing their own industrial expansion. This central government has very little to do with the encouragement of business enterprise in the various provinces, unless of course it is in the awarding of certain defence contracts to certain firms who may operate within those two particular provinces.

Let us take Alberta as another very prosperous province. What has this government done to actually encourage the development of that province? Surely some credit is due to the present local administration in Alberta for the high economic level we find in that province. Well, so far as I am able to observe many of our Liberal friends have gone out in an attempt to destroy the policies of that government, which in the last couple of decades has virtually built that province into a new economic power. Therefore surely the provinces have some credit coming to them for the high economic level which Canada is enjoying today. My leader says, "the major part of it". I should not depreciate my remarks by saying the Alberta government have some reason to take some credit. I think they deserve practically all the credit, for they are the ones who encouraged investment in business expansion and in the exploitation of their natural resources in order that the province may benefit thereby.

Let us take British Columbia, for instance, and the great expansion that has taken place there over the past few years, and I am bold enough to say since the election of the present Social Credit government of that province. I picked up the Financial Post of March 17 and found one section in that paper devoted to the great expansion that is going on in the province of British Columbia.

Let me ask what part this central government at Ottawa has been playing in that respect. Here I find a full page of articles headed, "Prancing prosperity of Canada's west coast". I like that caption. It is prancing like a healthy steed, ready to win a race; and it is going to win, believe me. That is the first page. Here is the second page, "How and where B.C. industry is going". The third page heading is, "Why B.C. may stir some of the hottest future mine news". The heading on page 4 is, "Bustle and boom in B.C. towns". On page 5 the heading reads, "Here is how B.C. industry will grow"; a whole section devoted to it. The heading on the next page is, "Here is how west coast communities are growing". Another page reads, "What gas line will mean". The next page reads, "The fight about the B.C. forest future". Another page says, "Here's how B.C. fisheries can grow".

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): B.C., B.C.

Mr. Hansell: No, it is "B" as in boy, not "P" as in that word that means nothing progressive. Here is another one in big headlines, "They're Betting $180 Millions More on B.C. Bush". Here is another one, "Here's Growth Record of B.C. Towns". Here is still another one, "Here's Key Asset For Future"; and still another one, "B.C. Farm Cash Income Near Record '51 Level". Here is another one, "The Big B.C. Electric Plans for Gas". On the next page we find the following, "B.C. Oil, Gas Hunt Keeps Up". Here is another page, "B.C. Growth Communities".

There is a whole section of the Financial Post devoted to these matters. Now, the Financial Post does not write up news of that kind without having some foundation for it. British Columbia is becoming a powerful province. The high economic level that is experienced there is due almost entirely to the social credit government of British Columbia which is encouraging industry in that province.

Mr. Fulton: I must say that that is absolute nonsense. I never heard such rot in my life.

Mr. Hansell: I say once again, Mr. Chairman, and I am using these illustrations as illustrations to prove the point, the high economic level that is being experienced in Canada today is almost entirely due to the provinces themselves encouraging the expansion of industry.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one policy over which this government has almost complete control, and that is the monetary policy of the country. Those provinces have been able to expand not because of the monetary policy that this government is pursuing but in spite of the financial policy this government is pursuing. If this government were pursuing the right and proper financial policy, those provincial governments could expand industry in the provinces without a terrific trail of debt and excessive taxation.

The municipalities in those provinces find it very difficult to get through without excessive taxation which is almost breaking the backs of the taxpayer. The other day I had a letter from a group in the town of Nanton, an average-size community in my own constituency. They had set up a committee to investigate the possibility of bringing industry to that little town. Why? Because they felt that in order to relieve the tax burden of the people the town would be better off if it could have some industries established there. Let me ask what this government has done to encourage the establishment of small industries in any small communities? Why, they hardly know that those small communities exist until it is income tax collection time, and then they know because they send their inspectors around to see that the individual taxpayer is not beating the government out of a few dollars of taxes. In saying this, I am not countenancing for one moment the idea that anyone should evade the just laws of the country. When municipalities find difficulties in getting through without imposing almost unbearable taxation upon the people it is because the individual taxpayer himself has difficulty in getting through. And here is where we come to the monetary policy which this government is pursuing. Not only does it leave the provinces in a difficult financial position to get through, but it leaves the municipalities in a difficult position to get through, and it leaves the individual taxpayer in a very difficult position in order to make both ends meet in his common, ordinary everyday spending for the necessities of life.

If this government were pursuing a proper economic policy, the people would not have to go so heavily in debt and mortgage the future in order to live. Let me put it to you in this way, Mr. Chairman. These provinces have encouraged industry to develop within their own boundaries. Industries have developed; industries have produced the goods. They go on sale and people buy those goods. Coming from the process of industry is a certain amount of money that is distributed to the people in the form of wages, in the form of profits, in the form of dividends, and so forth. Since the provinces have encouraged industry, and by reason of that encouragement, the national income has reached a certain level.

This government then comes along and capitalizes on the effective operation of provincial governments in encouraging industry, and this government then receive their revenues from that prosperity which has been mainly due to some of the provinces encouraging industry. Very well; not only is this government enabled thereby to build up surpluses in their treasury, but let it be remembered that the individual taxpayer who buys the products of industry finds that he has not enough money to be able to buy those products of industry. The result is that if they want to acquire the products of industry they have to go into debt to acquire them. We find that instalment buying in Canada today has reached almost $2¼ billion. I have the exact figure here somewhere. It does not make any difference; it is well over $2 billion. Just what does this mean? It means that where the taxpayer has gone into instalment buying to the tune of over $2 billion he has mortgaged his future income to that amount. It means that his future income is not then able to buy the products of industry that are now coming off the assembly lines because his income has been hypothecated to pay for something that came off the assembly lines a year or two years ago. Of course, it leaves the taxpayer that much short in his present income to buy the products of industry today. Why is he left short? He is left short by reason of the fact that the monetary policy of this government is of such a nature that it never provides the consumer public of this country with the purchasing power to buy back the products of industry. So here we have the taxpayer short in his income, owing bills for things that he has bought on the instalment plan, and he also finds himself with his nose to the grindstone in order to get enough money to pay the various taxes that are imposed upon him. It is most improper to tax everything the wage earner has to buy. Regardless of what he wants to do he has to pay a tax on it. If he wants to get married he has to buy a licence; that is a tax. If he wants to own a dog he has to pay a dog tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not to the federal government.

Mr. Hansell: If an individual wants to buy anything he has to pay a sales tax. Regardless of what he wants to do or buy there is a tax somewhere which he must pay and what he has left to live on is very little. Surely in a country the size of this with its vast wealth of natural resources and industrial production the people should have incomes sufficient to permit them to pay their way.

I picked up a paper the other day and I have brought it with me with a view to referring to it by way of comparison. The material on the front page struck me rather forcibly. On the front page of the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, July 14, 1956 is a large aerial view photograph of a highway which is being built in Germany. The picture is captioned "This is not Carling Avenue" and beneath the caption the following appears.

An eye-catching pattern is formed by the new Autobahn highway junction, Germany's biggest and most modern, outside Frankfurt. The clover-leaf in the background connects the Berlin-Munich, Cologne-Nuernberg and Munich-Kassel-Hamburg highways. The junction in the foreground serves traffic to and from Frankfurt. The circle in the lower right is in front of the Frankfurt airport entrance. Built in a year, the giant junction was opened to traffic on July 10, closing the link in Germany's vast Autobahn system.

I mentioned that picture today simply to indicate what has been done in a country that was supposed to have been dead broke. Germany went through a war and was overwhelmingly defeated, its industries were destroyed and its cities demolished. I was in Germany not too many years ago and I took a trip to some of the devastated cities which had been levelled to the ground. Within the space of a few years Germany has been able to build up its industrial cities to a point where it has now become a strong competitor in the markets of the world.

I realize that I cannot deal with the work of the federal district commission here but I would like to mention that I have been sitting as a member of that committee and we have been told that their plans will be finalized 25 years from now. Surely there is something wrong with the management of the affairs of this nation as compared to some other nations when a country as well equipped as ours requires 25 years to complete a project and yet a nation that was supposed to have been dead broke following an ignominious defeat in war was able to complete a project such as this within a few months. It is time that the government accepted a little advice from some other people and some other parties in this country, and I am bold enough to say it should accept some advice from this party because we must recognize the fact that no government knows it all.

Mr. Dupuis: Only the Social Credit party.

An hon. Member: Well, we come closest to it.

Mr. Hansell: As we sit here in this house what do we find? The government brings down legislation; they know it all and that is it. The opposition tries to point out the weaknesses in it and proposes certain remedies; but, oh no, if it is proposed by any member of any opposition party it is never acceptable to the government. This government assumes that it knows it all. Here we have before us a resolution preceding a bill which once more indicates that the government thinks it knows more about it than the provinces. The government is prepared to write into legislation the principle of centralization. It is about to write into legislation something which it does not even know is acceptable to the provinces.

I would like to know if this is acceptable to the provinces. Which province has indicated that it is willing to go ahead with this matter now? The minister said the other day that several provinces have indicated they have no objections. Well, it is one thing to express something negatively and it is another thing to express something positively. Let us know what province has written to the government and said, "Here, we favour that resolution; go ahead."

Mr. Dupuis: That would never happen.

Mr. Hansell: That would never happen, of course not, and I do not blame the provinces if they do not permit it to happen.

Mr. Dupuis: Even if you gave them the moon.

Mr. Hansell: What should happen is that the provinces themselves should be called together in the first place.

Mr. Pearson: And given everything they want.

Mr. Hansell: I would have no objection if the government were to initiate a conference and then say to the provinces, "We will now step out of the picture and you provinces can put your heads together through your premiers and finance ministers and the other members of your cabinet to see just what can be done in coming to some mutual agreement, and whatever you decide then propose your plans to us and we will attempt to meet them."

I know that the minister may smile and say, "Of course, that is not very practical." I will therefore tell him something that is extremely impractical and that is to line something up, have it written into the law and then call the provinces together and say, "There you are, boys, that is it; take it or leave it. That is what we are prepared to do and nothing more". That is extremely unsatisfactory. It is undemocratic and against all the principles of the free way of life which we believe governments should sponsor.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am afraid I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Hansell: I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, that you informed me my time has expired because as I look at the notes I hold in my hand I see the word "conclusion" and I am forced to sit down. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that we are opposed to the principle of centralization as depicted in this resolution.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, first of all let me assure you that I have no newspapers to read to tell you about the wonderful expansion that is taking place in the province of Ontario and I have no notes here indicating when I should conclude my remarks, and therefore it may well be that I shall ramble a little bit today. Perhaps one of the reasons I might ramble will be explained by my initial comment in that I feel there is very little new which I can offer in this debate. I have no apologies to make for that because it seems to me that the only way to get across to the government the plight of the provinces, and more particularly the plight of the municipalities, is to repeat over and over the situation which confronts those levels of government. As a matter of fact I am surprised that more attention has not been paid to some of the problems which affect our municipalities. As I said once before, I have noted in the Parliamentary Guide the wide municipal and board of education experience which a great number of hon. members possess. However, once they arrive here the great federal problems that confront them apparently bury in their minds the real problems which they left in their municipalities.

It has been emphasized before, but I want to say again, that during a period of stress and strain of war we expect a trend, in these days at least, toward centralization, and I might use the term autocracy, in government. This method has been used in order to get things done. It is not a method, but rather an excuse to get things done. As a result many of the problems facing the municipalities and provinces are submerged in the over-all attitude that is adopted.

But when peace comes—I say this advisedly, notwithstanding the great problems which face the Minister of National Defence at the present time—there is a great necessity to return to a system of government which is more decentralized, which comes closer to the people, which gets down to the grass roots and enables the municipalities and the provinces to provide an expansion of services for industry which in effect will raise the standard of living and make the tax load easier as far as all levels of government are concerned.

I think that one of the major problems facing us right now in connection with this legislation is the difficulty of convincing the government that the stage of centralization and autocracy which found its place in a period of emergency is over, and it is about time we returned to the people who are closest to the tax dollar sufficient tax revenue to enable them to expand their economy.

This is a serious problem and I am not going to deal with it at length because we are going to have an opportunity to look at the legislation during its subsequent phases. However, I was most impressed with the remarks of the hon. member for York-Humber who said she represented a suburban constituency which was part of metropolitan Toronto and that the great problem which was confronting that area was the one having to do with education. I think that that represents one of the major problems in so far as the obtaining of necessary tax funds is concerned. The hon. member mentioned in that connection that 65 per cent of the amount required came from real property with 35 per cent coming from the province. The major load falls upon the home owner and this creates a major problem.

Just the other day I received as a taxpayer a letter from the clerk's department of the township of Etobicoke, which is one of the three municipalities which make up the constituency of York West. This letter is written in a rather apologetic manner but it points out the problem that is created by educational costs and what the municipality is running up against. The letter reads:

> This letter is written to bring the matter of multiple occupancy in single family areas to the attention of all home owners and explain as clearly as possible the scope of the zoning by-law in respect to occupancy and the necessity for the enforcement of said provisions.

I skip a few words.

> 1. Scope: The township building and health regulations provide further that no cellar shall be used as habitable space and this restriction applies to all cellars regardless of zone.
> The contravention of these by-laws by a minority of the property owners affects not only the adjacent properties but also the economy of the township as a whole in many ways including the following:

The letter goes on to set out the ways in which this affects the standards of the community, and then there is this paragraph:

(3) Additional families in a dwelling require additional services such as sewage disposal and garbage collection which obviously must be paid for. In this respect, however, the financial effect is most apparent when educational costs are considered which at present are approximately $225 per pupil in public school and $425 in secondary school.

The Minister of Finance may say that that is a particular problem affecting a small part of my constituency, that if there are people living in a zoned area which does not permit multiple occupancy that is no concern of his. But I would point out that from the municipal standpoint it is absolutely essential that every person be accounted for in connection with this requirement of $225 per pupil in our public schools and $425 per pupil in our high schools. Unless everyone is accounted for the money for educational purposes is not going to be available.

What will happen is that many of these people who might be quite happy to contribute their share of the educational costs are going to have to go out on the housing market. We will be confronted with a situation which is entirely different from the attitude taken in connection with financial responsibility. The government has been telling us that housing is going along fine, but the fact is that we are faced with a restriction in the granting of credit for the building of houses. Regardless of what is said by those who sit on the treasury benches, it is quite obvious to anyone who is close to the market that it is becoming more and more difficult to build necessary houses. In fact at the present time it is almost impossible to build houses that people can afford to buy.

Here is a situation where people are being put out of housing accommodation because of the necessity of eking out the last dollar which the municipality can make available for educational purposes. At the same time they are being told that there is no place for them to go. That indicates how serious the situation is at the present time. Unless more attention is paid to an equitable distribution of the tax load in connection with education we are going to be faced with a lowered standard of education. That is the last thing we want to have happen in this country.

What do we do about it? I do not know. We have had conference after conference in connection with the distribution of taxes and we do not seem to be accomplishing very much. I am wondering whether the people from the federal government who sit around that table realize that they are continuing the grasping attitude which they adopted during a wartime economy. It seems to me it is about time that they approached it in a new way or it will be too late to assist these people at the level of municipal taxation. The last time I spoke about this I mentioned that the situation was serious because we can get back to the position we were in during the depression when municipalities could not meet their obligations and there was default. As a matter of fact, I have read several headlines in local newspapers indicating that people were already being put in a position where they were forced to sell their homes and move farther and farther afield to escape this type of taxation.

Therefore I think my leader was quite right when he suggested that there should be a reconvening of this dominion-provincial group and that a new approach might be made to a more permanent type of solution. For my part I have said before that I do not think we will have a true attack on the economy of government until the time when the people who actually spend the money collect it. I do not mean by that that they must set up the mechanical means of doing it, but I think that somewhere along the line when collection is made it must be obvious that the money is being collected for certain purposes. Someone will say that the dominion government has always been in that position. Fortunately for them they are in the happy position of always being able out of their revenues to balance any detrimental effect on the public by saying we have got a new deal for you, we have got an increase of some kind in some type of allowance, we are going to introduce a new type of pension or we have got up our sleeve a new type of health insurance. In that way they are able to get a shot in the arm because the people say that they are collecting these taxes for purposes that are very good for the country. But along the line there will have to be a solid approach to the basis of collection of moneys and the spending by the same agency. Let us hope, as I said before in paraphrasing Mark Twain, that we will not all continue to talk about municipalities and do nothing about them.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in the debate on the resolution now before us I should like to begin my remarks with a paragraph from a history book entitled "Building the Canadian Nation" by George W. Brown. The paragraph is as follows:

I see in the not remote distance one great nationality bound, like the shield of Achilles, by the blue rim of ocean. I see it quartered into many communities, each dispensing of its internal affairs, but all bound together by free institutions, free intercourse and free commerce. I see within the round of that shield the peaks of the western mountains and the crests of the eastern waves, the winding Assiniboine, the fivefold lakes, the St. Lawrence, the Ottawa, the Saguenay, the Saint John and the basin of Minas. By all these flowing waters, in all the valleys they fertilize, in all the cities they visit in their courses, I see a generation of industrious, contented, moral men, free in name and in fact, ever capable of maintaining in peace and in war a constitution worthy of such a country.

Those were the words, Mr. Chairman, of D'Arcy McGee on the day when Canada was born. I am sure that those words expressed not only the hopes and the views of D'Arcy McGee but the hopes that were in the minds of all those great Canadian statesmen who, beckoned on by that glorious vision, cast aside their prejudices and worked together to achieve union of the provinces into the federal state as we now have it. We are privileged to view their labours from the vantage point of history. We can appreciate the prophetic vision which inspired them. We can share in the fulfilled dreams of a united Canada and we can also contribute something to the enhancing of those ties which bind together those of varying racial origins, religious beliefs and political persuasions.

As we turn back to history we find that some of the factors which were instrumental in the bringing together of the nation into confederation are outlined. I have read, for instance, of the civil war in the United States. Following the victory achieved by the northern forces some of the extremists expressed the view that their next objective should be the conquest of Canada and the freeing of the entire North American continent from British domination. Because of the expression of those views the early statesmen believed that in order to maintain an effective defence it was necessary that the provinces of Canada bind themselves together in union. One of these men, George Etienne Cartier, said:

If we desire to obtain England's support for our defence we must help ourselves. When we are united the enemy will know that if he attacks any province he will have to deal with the combined forces of the empire.

Defence was one of the factors that inspired these men to work towards the achievement of the union of the provinces. Trade was another factor. A crisis in government affairs more or less brought the whole situation to a head. Then we find in subsequent pages of history how the maritime provinces gathered together and had a conference to discuss the question of maritime union. At that conference some delegates were present from the Canadas, and as the discussions progressed they had a vision. A vision was born of something greater than maritime union, and that was the union of all the provinces of Canada.

The result was that a further conference was held in Quebec when resolutions were drawn up with the aim of providing a strong national government while at the same time leaving the provinces free to control matters within their own borders. We are all acquainted no doubt with the history of what happened and how that conference led to the London conference attended by 16 delegates. They used the resolutions drawn up at the Quebec conference as their working papers. They presented their findings, and the result was that the British North America Act was passed by the British parliament. So we find that through a process of negotiation, conferences and finally agreements Canada as a federal state was brought into being.

I think we should have appreciation for the achievements of the past. Just a short time ago we saw portrayed on television the history of confederation, and I am sure that we shared some of the pride of belonging to such a country as ours. I believe that the preservation of confederation is a matter of primary concern at the present time. Because of that belief I would sound a warning, as other speakers have sounded warnings, that the procedures followed by the present administration are tending towards a breakdown of that very same confederation that we so much cherish. By legislation, by practice, by economic pressures—in all of these ways—I fear that we are coming to the place where confederation may be getting into a rather shaky position instead of being strengthened with the passage of the years.

We find that the provinces themselves are taking a very dim view of many of the activities of this present administration. I have here in my file a number of newspaper clippings. I am not going to take time to read them all, but I am just going to refer to them because I feel that they indicate some of the feeling of the provinces with regard to the attitude of the federal government toward the provinces and toward provincial autonomy.

I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of February 24, 1955. I know we do not like to be reminded of these things, and I know some would say the very fact that we express these thoughts and refer to them tends to aggravate the situation. However, I am not in agreement with that deduction. The title of this article is "Overtones of secession in Angry P.E.I. House" and it reads in part as follows:

An angry murmur of maritime discontent with overtones of secession sounded Thursday in the legislature of Canada's tiniest province.

Opposition leader R. R. Bell told the Prince Edward house the province is getting "a miserable deal from Ottawa". If it continues unity would be undermined. He said that since 1873, the year the province joined confederation, "we've had nothing but blood, sweat and tears."

Then further on in the article, referring to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and one of his statements, Mr. Bell had this to say:

If he—

That is referring to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

—was to come over here and say we couldn't leave confederation, I'd tell him "who is going to stop us."

That, I must say, is by the Canadian Press.

The Ottawa Journal of June 21, 1955, contains large black headlines "Smallwood Would Secede", under which appears an article which reads in part as follows:

Premier Joseph Smallwood threatened last night to lead Newfoundland out of confederation with Canada unless the federal government stopped discriminating against the four Atlantic provinces, including his own . . . His threat of quitting Canada was given added weight by the presence of Premier Henry Hicks of Nova Scotia, a Liberal, and Premier Hugh John Flemming of New Brunswick, a Conservative. Flemming introduced Smallwood in glowing terms and Hicks praised him for "talking the way we should in the Atlantic provinces".

Then I go to a brief paragraph further down in the article where I find the following in quotation marks indicating that they are Mr. Smallwood's own words:

"Before we become second-class citizens of Canada, we will show the other maritime provinces how to get out of confederation." There was a storm of applause from the audience.

Mr. Chairman, it does not look as though the foundation of confederation were being strengthened very much when provinces and provincial premiers would give expression to such views and would threaten, if the situation continued, to lead their provinces out of confederation.

I have before me a clipping from the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, April 14, 1956. It is headed "Maritime premiers critical of Ottawa". I am just going to read one or two very brief statements:

Premier Flemming said as far as New Brunswick is concerned the new agreement is worse for the province than the old one.

Another paragraph reads as follows:

Mr. Matheson said his province probably fares the worst of all under the new scheme. Premier Hicks said if his province's proposal to equalize taxation payments had been accepted all three maritime provinces would have benefited.

Again I say, Mr. Chairman, that when we have expressions like that, where we find that people are not only thinking in this way but are voicing the opinions that the province could probably secede, we have evidence that the proposals themselves which have been presented to the governments were far from satisfactory. I would suggest that right across Canada there is a growing feeling that the dominion government are not playing fair with the provinces. They are centralizing more and more power and authority here in the federal government; they are assuming more power; they are trying to wield greater influence. All this is far from bringing comfort to the provinces in their particular situations.

I think that this resolution and the draft agreement that we have tabled some time ago indicate a failure on the part of the federal government properly to assess the position of the provinces in these proposals. During the course of the debate reference has been made to a number of important factors indicating the ever increasing demands that are being made on the provincial and municipal authorities. Reference has been made to education. A number of members have spoken of this particular phase of our national life. The leader of the official opposition stated that the situation could possibly result in tragedy. So as we face that particular issue and as we see the ever-increasing demands being made upon the provincial and municipal authorities with regard to education, we can see that the proposals that are being presented to the provinces are far from adequate to meet the challenge of these increasing costs.

Reference has been made to road construction. I know that the Minister of Finance referred to the fact that $82 million had been paid out thus far as the federal government's share of the cost of construction of the trans-Canada highway. In view of the fact that every province is facing the tremendous program of expansion and in view of the importance of adequate roads and transportation facilities, I would suggest that the $82 million is a very small part for the federal government to pay toward these increasing costs. I would also suggest that because of the building of roads—access roads to the natural resources, and roads of every description—the country is being opened up with the result that great new sources of revenue are being opened to the federal government. Yet, in spite of that fact, the federal government refuses to assume the additional cost or to share the additional cost so that the provinces can continue to develop in the way they should develop. As to the development of national resources and the cost of health and welfare, I know that the federal government has assumed some share, but I suggest that that share is extremely small indeed in comparison with the needs that exist.

Another problem that we face to quite an extent is that of conservation. I know that in British Columbia, in my own riding to a great extent, we are faced with a problem of trying to save for agricultural purposes what little arable land we have. The rivers are gradually eating it away. Yet when we present the matter to the federal government, what do we find? I know we received some assistance in the past.

I was rather disconcerted the other day to receive a letter from one of the municipalities saying the federal government had refused to pay anything towards the cost of protection there this year. I have not had time to discuss it with the Minister of Public Works, but I certainly will. Let me just refer to one particular section to which I have referred earlier. I see the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is in his seat and he will recall my reference to this matter on a number of occasions. It concerns the flood danger existing in the Vedder river area. I have made repeated requests and my predecessor made repeated requests; the provincial minister of agriculture has been down here presenting the matter and showing aerial photographs, but yet the federal government cannot see its way clear to assuming any responsibility. They say it is not within their jurisdiction but let me state that according to the information we have the section up above where this particular situation exists was, up until about 1930, part of the federal railway belt. The federal government up until 1930 received in excess of $400,000 by way of stumpage and royalties from timber removed from that area. This does not take into consideration what the government received through income tax and corporation taxes. They received revenues, Mr. Chairman, but when it came to the matter of assuming responsibility they said, "We have not any responsibility; that is something the provinces have to face." Certainly, it is resented.

In 1953 the province of British Columbia presented to the government of Canada a brief on federal-provincial co-operation in economic development. It is a very interesting brief and covers many of the great problems and projects that faced the provincial government in those days just after they had taken office. The premier, minister of finance and the attorney general came to Ottawa and presented the brief. What was the result, what were the effects? Well, we have not seen them. I suppose the cabinet listened to it all right, but as for responding and assisting in the development of British Columbia, they have refused.

Let me call attention to another field. I have referred to taxation and some other fields, but here is an illustration. It may seem strange that I should choose a subject such as this; I assure hon. members that I am not full of my subject. The total federal government revenue from the sale of alcoholic beverages in the year 1954-55 amounted to $176,963,000. The provincial revenue amounted to $159,873,000. I would call attention to the fact that the difference in the federal revenues was $17,090,000. Let me further state that the federal revenue includes the total identifiable taxes but does not include general sales tax on materials used in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages. The provincial revenue is for the 10 provinces and the figure includes not only the direct taxes but also receipts from permits, fines, confiscations, etc. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that here we have a case where the federal government received over $17 million more than the provinces did in revenue from alcoholic beverages, yet the provinces were saddled with the cost of administration. They were responsible for alcoholic research and for the rehabilitation of those who had become addicted to alcohol. They were responsible for providing housing for those who were put in prison because of this thing. The provincial governments had to assume all the responsibility, including the criticism attached to this type of business, and now the federal government comes along and takes $17 million more than does the provincial government. I cannot see any sense of justice or fairness in a situation like that. I am not speaking for the alcohol industry. So far as I am concerned, we would be better off without it. I believe that the revenues are far offset by the cost to the nation. But there is the picture. So I say, Mr. Chairman, the government is indicating a failure to properly understand and estimate the expenses the provinces have.

I know the federal government thinks their expenditures are increasing. They talk about defence and all these other things that have increased. I remind you again that according to the figures put on the record just the other day by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke, the increase so far as the provinces and municipal authorities are concerned is far in excess of that in the federal field. Government expenditures for 1954 compared with 1955 show the increase in the federal field was 5·5 per cent; provincial, 292 per cent and municipal, 276 per cent. We see, therefore, just where the increase in costs exists. It is at the provincial and municipal levels and not so much on the federal level.

The supercilious attitude taken by this government is being resented by the provinces. I wish they would forget this attitude, "We will allow you", and get down to business and work out an agreement that would be mutually satisfactory. I can somehow smell a carryover from Bill No. 3 of last year when this government thought they had to safeguard the rights of the people of Canada and protect them against the poor judgment or perhaps the vicious schemes of the provincial authorities. I am inclined to think this is somewhat of a carryover.

I took note, Mr. Chairman, of the retort of the Minister of Finance to the statement made by the leader of this group when he referred to the proposals as niggardly. The minister said he could not understand that type of language. He could not see where it fitted into this particular type of thing. Then, he went on to refer to the increase that would accrue to the provinces from contributions under this new proposal. It is something like the children who come to the father and say, "Dad, look at our shoes. They are just in tatters; the soles are worn out; our toes are sticking out; the laces are gone and the heels are worn out. We need some new shoes." The father, even though he can see it, says, "I see that; I understand. I tell you, we will put new heels on those shoes." He thinks this should satisfy the children. I would suggest that the Minister of Finance should take a look at the thing, and this is somewhat comparable. He should look at the increase and not say, "We are going to put new heels on the shoes". Bless my soul, he ought to buy new shoes. When you think of the budgetary surplus to which the leader of our group has referred, and when you think of the surpluses that are building up, he could well afford to buy them new shoes and not just put heels on the old shoes.

The Fraser Valley Record of Wednesday, July 11, has an editorial entitled, "Time For Tax Cuts". I shall read the first sentence of the editorial:

> In the first two months of this fiscal year, ended May 31, the Canadian government showed a surplus of $274 million.

Further down we find this paragraph:

> There is a theoretical limit, declares the Financial Post, to this intelligent paternalism. If there were no limit, the government would be right to bag all the money and then spoon it out; and that would be the end of economic freedom.

I was going to refer to the remark of the leader of the C.C.F. party regarding natural resources. He said that some provinces were more greatly blessed than others and therefore they should be willing to share. Well, we agree in that; we believe we should share. But, as the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke said the other day, we should grade the others up and not grade the top ones down. May I suggest that the extent of the natural resources in any given province is of great importance, but there is something of greater importance, and that is how the natural resources of a province are conserved and developed. I would suggest that every province has deposits of natural resources, but to a substantial degree it depends upon the vision, the wisdom and the initiative of the provincial administration to develop those resources or to have them developed in the interests of the people of the province.

The hon. member for Macleod referred to the Financial Post. I want to quote just one sentence from the same article to which he referred:

> Government—with a new boldness of concept—

I wish the hon. member for Kamloops were here. He rather snorted when the hon. member for Macleod was reading this. I continue:

> Government—with a new boldness of concept—is directing record capital outlays to push communication and transportation services into all parts of the country, to facilitate the big undertaking, bring a new degree of cohesion to the province and all that is taking place therein.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the members of this house, the Liberals, the Conservatives, the C.C.F.'ers were as great statesmen as those who founded confederation they would cast aside their prejudices as the fathers of confederation did at that time, they would throw their political philosophies out the window, and they would join with Social Credit and march with us toward that great new era that lies before us under a Social Credit administration. I believe, Mr. Chairman, you are attempting to rise.

The Deputy Chairman: I am afraid the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Yuill: Mr. Chairman, I realize that in rising to speak to this resolution I am doing so in rather a dual capacity. I have the honour to represent one of the finest constituencies in Alberta, but at the same time I have been the mayor of one of the finest towns for almost 12 years. More than that, I view this resolution with some concern.

I have had some nine years' experience as a board member of one of the large school units and I know the problems that prevail there in so far as administration is concerned. I should like to say this. Never in the history of our province, to my knowledge, have we been handed a package deal which we must accept whether we like it or not. It is the responsibility of this government to sit in conference with the provincial levels of administration and discuss the merits of this new tax agreement. After all, what is government but the manager of our biggest business, namely, the business of government? How does the authority become vested in this federal government ruthlessly to walk over the rights that were handed down at confederation to the leaders of the provinces? Where does the revenue come from that they are going to dole back rather niggardly to the people who earn it and who pay it out of their own pockets? Where have they the right to sit in judgment and dictate what shall be done with the revenues accruing within the provinces of this country?

We can see the tendency to centralize, as has been indicated several times. More and more the rights and the autonomy of the people of the provinces have been filched away from them and I think it would be fitting if this federal government set aside this resolution or this bill at this time and called into conference the premiers and their respective ministers and sat down and discussed this thing once again and tried to come up with at least a better solution to our over-all problem.

I know that some people say that the time element is of the essence. We have been sitting here for almost seven months. Not a bit of legislation has come up so far that is comparable with this or as far-reaching. This is a measure that is going to affect not only federal economy but provincial economy. I believe we have a very serious responsibility here to see that what the fathers of confederation fought so hard to establish shall not be ruthlessly thrown out the window. I know that we in Alberta are perhaps more privileged than many other provinces. For the last 20 years we have been blessed with a government that has a heart, a government that has vision, a government that realizes that our God-given natural resources are not there for the purpose of feathering the nest of political opportunists, but to be developed and the proceeds accruing put in trust and then handed back in terms of doing the most good for the most people, according to the best collective thinking of those charged with that responsibility. It is because of that that in a matter of 20 years our province has come from a state of bankruptcy to solvency. We were $167 million in debt. It required 51 cents of every revenue dollar to pay the interest on the debt alone. We have come from a state of bankruptcy to a state today where we have an over-all surplus of $180 million after our provincial debt is retired. It is the only province in Canada, or the only state on the North American continent, where half the revenue involved in our budget, which incidentally is $242 million, comes from the development of our natural resources and the profits accruing from them. It only requires roughly 50 cents on every tax dollar to be raised in the accepted tax medium. We have had demonstrated time after time that our government is a government with a heart, one that has taken the responsibility of providing for its people.

Concerning the resolution that is presented here I do not think any one of us feels there should be dual taxation; I do not think it is either desirable or necessary. But I do think that those who are charged with the sacred responsibility of administering the affairs at the provincial level should be shown the courtesy and granted the right of sitting in conference and endeavouring with the advice and co-operation of the federal government to come up with an answer that will be the right answer.

I am afraid that if this resolution is passed it will be altogether too rigid, and I certainly hope it will not be passed. I think there should be at least some measure of flexibility so that in the future, if it is demonstrated that this is not a satisfactory or efficient agreement, the provinces will not be pushed aside when they ask for a new deal or a new look at the existing agreement. I am inclined to the belief that if and when they come they will be told, "We are hewing to the line; that is the letter of the act and consequently we cannot do anything to help you."

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Chairman, we in Alberta have come a long way in the last 20 years. We have been able to provide benefits to the people of Alberta far beyond those provided in any other province of Canada. British Columbia is fast approaching the standard established in Alberta, but of course there is a reason for that: it is because they have a Social Credit government.

As is common in all provinces, we have a need for roads, we have needs in education and needs in the field of health. I think those matters are surely a part of the responsibility of the major government. It is true that in a sense it has been contributing in some way, but basically only to health and welfare, and I think the share that is put up is not over generous.

Let us take the case of education, for example. In Alberta, when our government took over 20 years ago, the best education standard we could expect to find anywhere outside the cities and some of the towns was grade 8. The government of that day seemed to think that was the height of its responsibility. When our government took over, it definitely declared itself in favour of the equalization of educational opportunities. It decreed that any child regardless of who he was or where he lived should not be denied anything short of a grade 12 education.

In order to make that possible it was necessary to centralize, from an educational point of view. I happened to be one of the original members of the divisional board in our part of the country at that time and I can tell you something about the position we were in then. This was back in 1939, of course, right after the hungry thirties, and the members of the teaching profession were in the worst plight they have ever experienced in all their lives. We had teachers working for as little as $300 a year. The best teachers and the principals of high schools earned the glorious salary of $750 a year.

When we took over the administration of some 105 schools we found even at that low level of pay some $20,000 was owed in back pay. In some cases we found that some teachers were owed salaries by as many as five different schools. It is recognized across the country that in Alberta today we have the highest standard of education. With the possible exception of British Columbia, the salaries of our teachers are higher than anywhere else in Canada.

In order to make grade 12 education possible to students it was found necessary to set up centralized units. It was also necessary to provide modern transportation and, further, it was deemed necessary to hire special teachers to teach such special subjects as home economics, shop, agriculture, music, art, business and many of these subjects that in some quarters are perhaps looked upon as frills but which are nevertheless within the orbit of a normal grade 12 education.

All of these things cost money, and the job of the school board was a pretty tough one, as we soon discovered. Our government realized it was necessary to give more and more assistance. In the last ten years the outright grants on a per pupil basis have jumped from $19 to approximately $120. In round figures this represents an increase in the last ten years of $100 per pupil. Naturally there has been a boon in the management of school affairs. The demand for new buildings, modern transportation and added services increased and the fact that grade 12 education was established meant that the school population increased at a rapid pace. Those who in most cases moved out following grade 8 stayed and received grade 12 education. All of these things are characteristic of all the provinces and they are not peculiar to our own community. These things posed an almost impossible problem to the administrative board.

The government has increased its assistance. Last year it provided more than $38 million for education alone. It realized that in spite of its ever-increasing generosity the problem would continue to exist and enlarge because of the increased demands through larger enrolments. The government realized this was posing a problem for the direct school taxpayer. A year ago the government pegged the school mill rate and provided $6,600,000 as a subsidy. It discovered that $7,108,000 was required to pull up the slack this year.

In the reshuffle that is apparently going to come about I think it would be possible for this government out of a budget of better than $4¾ billion to provide, over and above the specified terms of this formula, not less than $250 million in order to provide the provinces, irrespective of their location, with at least the minimum or the bottom of the barrel in services. Speaking strictly from the municipal point of view, I think it must be agreed that the problems are much the same wherever you go. Out of a budget of $242 million my province has seen fit to set aside $71.5 million for direct and indirect financial assistance to municipalities.

The city of Edmonton perhaps offers the best illustration of the need for quite considerable financial assistance, far beyond the ability of the province to render. Thanks to the generosity of the provincial government in the last five years Edmonton has received $40,942,541 in the way of direct and outright cash assistance. In the same period it has had the opportunity to borrow at interest rates as low as 2 per cent and not more than 3½ per cent a total of $57,292,900. Out of the surpluses accruing from the development of natural resources our province has set aside a revolving fund which has made it possible for municipalities of all sizes to borrow at that low rate of interest, thereby saving over $2 million a year in interest rates alone. Believe me, a dollar saved is a dollar earned.

If this government would just hold its shot a little bit and not be too anxious to railroad this thing through, if it would just take another look and take the various leaders of the provinces into its confidence, if it would agree to talk over this thing sensibly and in the spirit of the fathers of confederation, I am sure they all would come up with a more lasting and more satisfactory answer to our problems.

I am not going to take up any more time, but I should like to say that in my little town of only 2,000 population we received direct cash assistance amounting to $14,000 which came out of the provincial gasoline tax. Half of the 10-cent tax, or 5 cents a gallon, was set aside and divided across the board according to population. In that town we have sewers, natural gas, cement sidewalks and everything you could expect in a small town. Our debenture commitment is around $13,000 per year. As a consequence of this grant we were able to turn around and pay back the government in its own coin. We were able to show a substantial cash surplus and also enjoy a revenue accruing from the utility itself. There are not many cases where you can have your cake and eat it too from the municipal point of view. We have been able to reduce our tax rate by 19 mills, which does not alter the fact that in spite of that generosity we are momentarily faced with a tax rate of 48 mills.

I think it would be in the interests of humanity and everyone concerned from the federal government down to the smallest province if a more realistic view of this thing were taken. We should take another look at it and see if we cannot come up with a better and more satisfactory solution.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

At five o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair.

PATENT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FOODS AND MEDICINES, ABUSE OF RIGHTS, ETC.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. 292, to amend the Patent Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill deals with a subject which I believe is very important to the welfare of Canada. It deals with an aspect of control over our industrial life which throughout the years has become most involved and intricate. It seems to me that it is important to the industrial future of this nation that the way in which patents have been used, in many instances to restrict competition, to restrict production and in fact to restrict the general development of the arts of production, is something which should be looked into, and for which a solution is required.

In the past patents were valuable to the nation to the extent that they created an incentive to invest and resulted in reward for invention in a fair and reasonable way. However, with growing industrialization and the increasing size of corporations, with the growth and development of international cartels, the old concepts in relation to patents are to a large extent no longer valid and it is essential that a new look be taken at this whole field.

[Mr. Yuill.]

Hon. members are aware that by order in council of June 10, 1954 the government appointed a royal commission to inquire into this general field and I am pleased that as chairman there was appointed a man of the ability and integrity of Chief Justice Ilsley. If there is any man in the nation whom I have known rather intimately and who I believe is a conscientious person, one who will do his best to see that a fair solution is obtained, it is Chief Justice Ilsley. Quite a number of members of the house had the privilege of serving in parliament when he was minister of finance or occupied other portfolios in the government. We came to respect him. We are confident that the work he is now doing in this field will be important to Canada and will add to our material welfare in the years ahead.

It is a very complicated study. When I first looked into the matter I thought that perhaps the solutions would be very obvious and that with obvious solutions the government should act immediately. I still think there are some obvious steps that should be taken but I am quite prepared to say that many eminent people have spent a lifetime studying in this field and that among the experts there is not always agreement. Therefore one may say: Why do you have the temerity to advance a private members' bill? I do so not because I say that the provisions of the bill will remedy the situation and solve all the problems. I do so because I feel there should be an increasing amount of attention and consideration given throughout the nation to this very important question.

I believe there is no more appropriate place to discuss this general field than the parliament of this nation. By introducing the bill at this time I am hoping to have the matter aired, to give it some further publicity throughout the nation and to help in a small way to bring attention to the problem in the hope that solutions will be found in the not distant future. I hope that the government will study the suggestions made here along with any other suggestions that may be brought to them from time to time. I ask the government to look at the whole problem objectively and to act in the interests of the whole Canadian nation.

Before the Ilsley commission have appeared a number of eminent witnesses. I happen to be a resident of Saskatchewan and I suppose if I am acquainted with problems discussed in a public way more in one area than in any other it would be in that province. The daily newspaper to which I subscribe is the Regina Leader-Post. That newspaper has not always agreed with me. As a matter of fact if a census were taken I suppose it would show that it usually disagrees with me. No matter, I will say that the Regina Leader-Post and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, acting in this general field under the direction of the publisher, Clifford Sifton, have done and are doing an excellent public service.

I notice that they have been questioned as to the reason for their general interest in this field. They have said that they are interested not because anything that has been done has affected their business particularly but rather as newspapers who feel it is a public service to take into account the interests of their subscribers, the interests of consumers generally. Having that public spirited attitude, they obtained the services of three very eminent persons qualified in this field. Those persons made presentations to the commission and were subject to cross-examination and general discussion.

The first I shall mention is a Canadian, Ian Malcolm MacKeigan, who for many years was a public servant of this nation. In the fall of 1941 the combines organization took over the supervision of the law enforcement work of the wartime prices and trade board for the next five years, during the latter part of which Mr. MacKeigan was deputy enforcement administrator of the board. Mr. MacKeigan's special responsibility in this field was that of supervising the enforcement of food rationing, gasoline and tire rationing and related black market activities. He went from this position to the Combines Investigation Act administration and was appointed deputy commissioner. He served in that position until 1949 when he resigned. He has certainly studied this field very carefully.

The second person who appeared on behalf of the two newspapers to which I have referred was Judge Thurman W. Arnold, a noted and very competent expert in the United States. For years he was assistant attorney general in charge of the justice department's anti-trust division. He engaged in many suits in this field and became known as a rather famous trustbuster, to use a common term. He is a recognized international authority in the patent field.

The third person was Walton Hale Hamilton who has spent many years on the staffs of many prominent universities in the United States and who for a number of years was special assistant to the attorney general of the United States dealing with this general field. I believe that the knowledge they bring to this question and the evidence they have placed before the commission are valuable and I am sure will result in benefit to this nation.

We need to look at this field more today than we have in the past because the whole pattern of invention has been changing. When patent laws were first considered and enforced hundreds of years ago it was because some individual had invented some device and people thought it was fair to give him a reward for his invention. It was also thought necessary to hold out the promise of a reward in order to entice the individual to make his invention public. For these reasons the whole patent system was established. Today the role of the individual inventor, the single person who comes up with an idea and turns it into a practical device, is diminishing. There are few individuals who alone play an important part in this field. The whole general field of invention has been taken over by big industries, by the great laboratories. Giant corporations will hire many of the best brains in a certain field, place these people in a laboratory, give them an assignment, and ask them to inquire into a particular field of science in the hope that they may come up with some useful innovation.

It is important to us that we remove the restrictions that have been provided by patents not only because we need to increase the production of this nation to the fullest possible extent but for another major reason. It is being impressed upon me more and more that there is in this world a nation that, in industrial techniques is making rapid strides, sometimes frightening strides. We read statements of many high placed persons who have toured the U.S.S.R. We have been told by such a prominent person as James S. Duncan, president and general manager of the Massey-Harris Company, that in the U.S.S.R. there are being trained today from two to three times as many scientists as are being trained on this continent. He pointed out that they are using their human resources in a determined drive for ever-increasing production. In certain fields we have been hearing of late that they may be ahead of us.

We need to free inventions not only to increase production so that we ourselves in this nation may have a higher standard of living but for this other reason. I think it is imperative that we do everything that is in our power as a parliament to see that free institutions are more effective in providing an increased standard of living and increased production than any other system in the world. If we are to make certain to stay ahead—as I am certain all of us wish we can—in the production field, we must give more attention to the problem that I have been discussing.

Often in the past patents have been used not in order to add to knowledge, not to bring forward new inventions and new products, but rather to restrict the field so that those who can occupy it by the patent device are able to make extremely large profits. The illustration that has been used over and over again is what happened when it became known that a sulfa drug could be useful in treating certain diseases. The main sulfa drug at the time was sulfanilamide. It was a dye. The patent covering this material had long ceased to exist. The process had reverted to the public domain. When it was discovered that sulfa could be used in the medicinal field, a certain company found a derivative which they called sulfathiazole and applied for a patent. Soon after they applied for a patent it was learned that another company was applying for a patent for the very same material. It was not a case of judging which company had the patent, either by a patent commissioner or by the courts. The two companies got together. One said, "You have better marketing facilities than we have". The other said, "You have better production facilities". So they said, "Rather than compete, we will work together to maintain prices and to assure high profits for both firms". When they looked further into the matter they found that there were other companies working along the same lines. They therefore decided that one company would obtain the patent and that then they would licence other companies which had made certain progress in this field. Finally nine companies got together and controlled the production, distribution and sale of sulfathiazole and sulfa drugs generally. In my opinion, no one can defend the use of patents in this way. No one can say that by this use the public was being benefited. As a matter of fact, the patent system or the licensing system was used for one purpose only, namely to restrict competition and to make extremely large profits for the companies involved.

A little bit earlier I said that large corporations make most of the new inventions and that for the individual there is no longer any great place in the field of invention. The experience of Sinclair Oil Company serves to substantiate this claim. The company sent out a questionnaire asking for suggestions for improvements in petroleum products that might be adopted and that it received 6,000 replies. Among the 6,000 replies, the Sinclair Oil Company found only 400 ideas of any substance. Of the 400 ideas they found only 30 to be in the general field of petroleum products. Out of the 30 they found only 3 that made any industrial sense. Of the 3, only one was capable of production, but it was uneconomical and impractical. Hence, making a general inquiry among individuals in a particular field may not be very remunerative. If invention takes place and is accomplished, it is now done by vast teams of scientists, in modern laboratories, with adequate equipment and working together. They produce inventions.

The General Motors Corporation, which I believe is the world's largest corporation, has pointed out that the inventions so obtained are not obtained by individuals but are obtained in the General Motors research laboratories, and that once an invention is obtained in the laboratories credit is not given to a specific person or even to a number of individuals. Rather, they say that the fact is that a great number of people in the laboratories have contributed to the final invention and that the idea of remunerating the individual for an invention is obsolete since it has been brought about by a modern laboratory of a large corporation.

A large corporation can then produce the invention. It can obtain the patent. After it obtains the patent on an invention it does not say, "We will wait 17 years and after the 17-year period we will allow the invention to revert to the public domain". Oh, no. They usually say, "We will spend time, energy and money in order to dream up all sorts of variations of the invention, all sorts of tiny amendments to it, so that if anyone challenges the invention we shall have such a conglomeration of inventions in this field that we shall declare that some of them are being infringed". They go further. As a large corporation controlling a huge number of inventions, if any other company wants to use one of its inventions they say that, in obtaining a licence, it must agree that it will never at any time challenge the validity of the patent held by the patentee. This means in effect that a giant corporation can control a large area of the industrial art and that new companies coming into the field, if they know what is good for them and if they want to exist in a commercial way, will accept the facts of life by going to the company that has control of this huge number of patents, applying for a licence, paying the royalties, agreeing to its terms, and hoping thereafter to make a profit on its production.

If a smaller new company believes that the patents held by the giant company are weak and cannot be maintained in the courts, history shows that the company is probably still well advised to do nothing about its conviction, to spend no money challenging the patent, but obtain a licence and meet the conditions. A classic example often used is that of Eastman Kodak Company versus the Boston Camera Company. The Boston Camera Company needed a certain number of licences for patents. They believed that the Eastman Kodak Company was controlling very weak patents, and that in fact most of the patents controlled by the Eastman Kodak Company would not be held valid if challenged in the courts. So, the Boston Camera Company began production on its own. The Eastman Kodak Company instituted a long series of suits against the Boston Camera Company. The Boston Camera Company won every court case, but used all its money and soon became the property of the Eastman Kodak Company. Here is an example of patents being used in a rather predatory fashion to control the whole field of the industrial art.

Another classic example of patents being abused and used for purposes against the public interest is the use Standard Oil made of its patents for butyl rubber. Butyl rubber was the forerunner of modern synthetic rubber. This company did not develop its patents but decided to restrict them and allow their use only for the production of a very expensive product. The Standard Oil Company agreed with the I. G. Farben Company that it would not develop butyl, and the I. G. Farben Company agreed to keep out of the general territory of the Standard Oil. Prominent people have come to the conclusion that the role Standard Oil played in preventing the development at an early date of synthetic rubber was very expensive and costly, and proved a menace to the very existence of democracy in the war with Germany. Here is another classical instance of patents being used as a method of restricting and preventing production.

Now, may I refer to an example a little closer to home. It has been pointed out that the Fairview Chemical Company Limited of Regina, a very small company, decided a few years ago to produce a dust treatment for the control of smut in grain and for the control of wire worm. It decided, on the work done by Dr. A. P. Arnason whom I knew personally in Saskatoon that it had arrived at a good formula for mixing the two main components going into this chemical for the treatment of smut and the prevention of wire worm damage. The two chemicals were mercury and benezene hexachloride. Mercury had been used for many years in one form or another as a fungicide to control smut and other harmful seedborne spores. Benezene hexachloride had for some time been used in the control of wireworms. This company decided that if it could mix mercury and benezene hexachloride it could obtain one substance that could be used by the farmer to control both smut and wireworms. They decided they would go into the production of this chemical. They learned however that another company had applied for a patent. It was pointed out that the patent was granted on a so-called invention that was just as simple as mixing flour and sugar, and because this company obtained a patent the Fairview Chemical Company Limited of Regina decided, being a small company, that it could not afford to contest the patent. Instead it would either cease to produce this chemical substance or would pay a licence fee.

It was pointed out that the patent given in this instance was very costly so far as agricultural producers were concerned. The consumer wishing to obtain the patented article had to pay $7 per pound, whereas this company could easily have sold the mixture for $5.25 per pound. On the potential market available for that year, it was estimated that agriculture producers lost $17,500. This is another example of a patent being abused.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the general suggestions contained in this bill. The first one is the suggestion that the provision which now allows for free licensing of any invention used in the production of food or medicine should be extended. It should be extended not only to include the method of production but the end products themselves, namely the foods or medicines and also include other articles in the field of health such as optical goods, dental goods, dental and surgical instruments and equipment and devices such as wheel chairs and artificial limbs. I suggest that is a reasonable provision, and if it were placed in the law it would allow consumers of many of these goods to obtain them at lower prices.

The second main suggestion is for amendments to the general abuse section in the patent act. It is suggested that the Attorney General of Canada or any person who, at any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the grant of the patent, applied to the commissioner alleging in the case of that patent that there has been abuse of the exclusive rights thereunder, could ask that a license be issued.

At the present time the interpretation is based on the word which is being deleted, the word "interested" before "person", which has been defined as a person who is in the field already and is associated with the production of those articles. A further suggestion is that not only if the demand for an article is not being adequately met can a licence be granted as of right but that this should be extended to include any potential demand so that any potential demand for a cheaper model of the same article may result in a licence for production being granted. Butyl rubber, the example I used a few moment ago, might apply here. The invention was used in the production of a very expensive commodity only. This new provision would allow a licence to be granted on the ground that while the invention was being developed it was not being developed to take care of potential demand for a cheaper article.

It is further suggested that licences should be granted not on the narrow basis of the interest of the person concerned or about to be concerned in the production itself, but the provision should be extended to include considerations of the general public interest. If this were done a licence would no doubt be granted in many more additional instances.

It is further suggested that a licence should be granted when the establishment of any new trade or industry has been prejudiced so that patents may not be used to restrict the establishment of new trade and industry in this nation. A further important suggestion is that the commissioners should be given the right to issue a licence if an applicant for a licence to a patent can show that the said patent is part of a portfolio which is being used to lessen competition in the field they control.

It is further suggested that if an applicant for a licence can show that the patent is part of a portfolio substantially controlling an industry in Canada, then the commission should be given the additional power to grant a licence for the import of the article into our country. An example was the Arvin radio case. The suggestion here is that a licence could be granted if it could be shown that a portfolio is not only being used to discourage production but also to limit the field of consumption.

A further suggestion is that the owner of any substantial accumulation of patents, in either a portfolio or a pool, must register with the restrictive trade practices commission, a statement of their patents, a statement of their patent policy in enforcing them, a justification for the royalties, and so on. It is believed that if such a declaration is made public policy there will be less chance of companies using their patent system in order to prevent competition or control production.

I see that I have taken almost the whole of my allotted time, Mr. Speaker. I did not expect to take so long this afternoon. I want to conclude by saying, as I did when I began, I fully realize that this field is very complex; that over the years many experts have given a great deal of attention to it. There has been much genuine and conscientious difference of opinion as to what should be done in the national interest; but I am fully convinced that a new attack must be made on the restrictive use of patents in this country so that in the years to come production may be raised to the highest level.

Hon. Roch Pinard (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks which have been made by the sponsor of this bill. The general remarks he made before getting down to explanations about the proposals themselves were indeed quite interesting, and I am sure that the Ilsley commission will be quite interested in reading those remarks which deal with the general subject itself.

The hon. gentleman also gave illustrations of some of the facts which he thinks should should be corrected in this inquiry which is now going on and which is headed by Chief Justice Ilsley. He referred to the chairman of the commission, Chief Justice Ilsley, in terms with which I think everyone in this house will agree. We know that this commission is doing an excellent job at the present time. The assistants to the Chief Justice, namely, Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Favreau, are giving considerable assistance. I should also mention the fact that they are being given great help by the secretary of the commission, Mr. Laidlaw. I had occasion to meet the members of the commission to discuss some of the matters which were brought to my attention, and I may say I am fully convinced the report that they intend to bring down—and, as I indicated, this report will probably be brought down in the spring of next year—will be a report which will, I am sure, satisfy most people interested in that field. When I say that, I should also add that everybody should take interest in this matter. It is, as the hon. gentleman said, a very complex matter, in which one has to have special qualifications to be able to deal with it in a manner that may be as constructive as one would wish.

I should like to take a few minutes, if the house will allow me, to give some of the background of the legislation itself. Patents have been granted in Canada since 1824; that is, in Lower Canada, at the time, and in Upper Canada from 1826 up to the time of confederation. Shortly after confederation, that is in 1869, the first act was passed under the authority of the British North America Act, which gives full jurisdiction to the federal government in the matter of patents of invention. The Patent Act, which was passed in 1869, has often been amended but it is in its broad terms essentially the same.

The basic feature of the legislation is that it provides for the grant of an exclusive right for a limited time, 17 years in this case, to an inventor in return for the disclosing of his invention to the public. The purpose of this is to stimulate the making of inventions and the advancement of science and technology for the welfare and economic benefit of the people of the country. It is an exclusive privilege but it is not absolute.

The statute contains certain provisions intended to ensure that the grant of such privilege—which is a definite privilege for a period of 17 years—will promote not only the making of new inventions, but also their early working on a commercial scale in Canada wherever possible.

During the life of the patent, the patentee is required to supply the public demand for the patented article in Canada to an adequate extent and on reasonable terms. At the expiration of the patent the invention becomes public property. Those provisions of the act which aim at safeguarding the interests of the public are the ones involved in the bill presented by the hon. member. In other words, the bill would tend to extend the nature of those licensing provisions that are provided for under the act.

The hon. gentleman referred to the first clause of the bill in which there is a proposal which would add to the licensing provisions in the case when they are granted immediately upon demand. We are concerned with patented inventions relating to food, and medicine, and the other articles that are mentioned in this clause including articles vital to health, such as optical goods, dental goods, dental and surgical instruments and equipment, et cetera.

As I have already said, the statute presently provides for compulsory licensing in the case of a patented chemical process for the production of food or medicine, even in the absence of any proven or alleged abuse of rights and this at any time after the issuance of the patent. In the case of any other invention, the patentee is given three years within which to start working it in Canada on a commercial scale. If at the expiration of that period of time he does not supply the public demand in Canada on reasonable terms and to a reasonable extent, the commissioner of patents may grant one or more compulsory licences to others to manufacture and sell the article in question, or even revoke the patent if no other means of relief can be found.

The hon. member said there were many such abuses and he cited examples. Nevertheless the fact remains that during a period of 35 years I am informed that only three applications for licences concerning chemical processes for the production of medicine have been granted and only about three dozen applications for licensing other patented inventions. In other words, that might indicate there may have been abuses which were not brought to the attention of the commission. The fact remains, however, that during the long period of 35 years licences for the manufacture of medical articles were granted in only three cases and there were about three dozen applications for other articles. It may be that abuses have increased in number. But it remains a fact that during the long period of years I mentioned only those cases to which I referred were brought to the attention of the commission.

In connection with inventions pertaining to the field of health, the bill proposes that the compulsory licensing provisions be extended to articles vital to health, such as optical goods, dental goods, and surgical instruments. There may at first sight be much merit in that proposal. However, this whole subject is a very complex one and a proposal of this nature should not, I suggest, be adopted without careful analysis and expert advice as to all its angles and implications. The results obtained under the present provisions must be weighed against those sought to be achieved through the amendment. For instance, if generic terms are to be used together with an enumeration of specific items as illustrations of the scope and meaning of the generic terms, great care must be taken that, in the net result, some important item might not turn out to have been inadvertently excluded or omitted.

With reference to the second part of the proposals which my hon. friend made, he stated that in order to be considered as a person "interested" who can apply to the exchequer court for invalidating or voiding a patent or to the commissioner of patents for a compulsory licence under the existing provisions, one must be already in active competition with the patentee, which condition, he pointed out, often cannot be fulfilled in the case of a new product.

I submit that is not exactly the case. In fact, under the act as it now stands there is a provision under which a person who simply proposes to make, sell or use an article may apply to the court for a declaration that this will not constitute an infringement of a particular patent. In other words, he does not have to be in active competition. He simply has to declare that he intends to manufacture an article. Surely that does not mean he is in active competition at the time, and he can ask the court for a declaration that this will not constitute an infringement of a particular patent.

As to the nature and extent of the interest required to obtain a compulsory licence from the commissioner of patents, my information is that it has not been considered necessary for an applicant to be already in active competition with the patentee in order to qualify for a compulsory licence. I think that is only normal. The commissioner will, however, require the applicant to show that he intends to use the patented process or to manufacture the patented article and that he has the financial means to do so. In other words, he satisfies himself that the applicant is serious and is a bona fide applicant. Otherwise anyone could challenge whoever has obtained a patent of invention and there would be no protection for the patentee.

I would like to deal now with what I consider to be the more important part of the proposals involved in the bill. These are the proposals that deal with the abuses of patent rights and compulsory licensing. Perhaps one feature of those provisions which should more particularly be looked into by the commission is the primary requirement of manufacture in Canada and the bar indirectly placed against importations.

If one reads section 67, subsection 2, paragraph (b) of the act, one may feel that these provisions, indirectly at least, contain a bar against importations into Canada of an article that is being manufactured here when there is already in Canada a holder of a patent for a similar article. I am informed that this matter is being studied very carefully and numerous representations have been made to the commission in that respect. I am convinced the commission will give this matter a very thorough study and will investigate it fully.

The suggestion has been made that lists of patents be registered in some cases with the restrictive trade practices commission by the owners of any substantial accumulation of patents, in either a portfolio or a pool. The first remark I would like to make on this subject is that there would surely have to be a definition of what is meant by the words "a portfolio or a pool" in order that there would be no misrepresentation of the meaning. I do not think my hon. friend would subscribe to the practice of preventing an individual from holding more than one patent.

As far as the supplying of that list of people holding more than one patent to the combines investigation people is concerned, the powers under the Combines Investigation Act are already wide enough for the officials of that department to have full access to the patent division. They can obtain any information they feel they need if they wish to proceed with a prosecution or investigation. I consider it would be a wasteful duplication of records if this proposal were implemented.

The Combines Investigation Act also empowers the exchequer court to make one or more orders declaring void, in whole or in part, patent agreements, arrangements or licences, prohibiting the carrying out of any or all of their terms or provisions, directing the grant of licences under patents or revoking patents where patent rights have been used in restraint of trade or to lessen competition. In my opinion that covers the proposal that has been made in that report. In other words, the powers are already available under the Combines Investigation Act to bring about the type of investigation to which my hon. friend has referred.

I think I should at this time give the reason why I will oppose this bill if it comes to a vote. I consider the bill as being premature. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that work is now being done by a royal commission and it would appear to me—and I think he will share my views—that to legislate at this time would be an indication on our part that we have not enough confidence in the commission to allow it to proceed with its work. It is true that that work is going to take some more time before it is completed. As I said before, I have been informed that the report will be presented in the spring of next year.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether there is any likelihood or possibiilty that legislation will be presented to parliament next session as a result of that report?

Mr. Pinard: I think my hon. friend will appreciate that I would have to know first what the report will contain. If the recommendations of that report justify legislation that would be something to be considered by the government. I am sure that action will be taken in due course, as is always the case with this government. I am sorry not to be able to give a more encouraging answer to my hon. friend. However, I think I can go this far. If the report contains recommendations which justify the bringing down of legislation those recommendations will be studied carefully by the government and I am sure that the necessary legislation will be suggested to parliament.

I do not want to take a rigid stand against the proposals because, as I indicated to my hon. friend, I think they deserve to be studied carefully because they have merit. I think the hon. member should be commended for having brought this matter before parliament and no doubt his remarks will be scrutinized and studied by the Ilsley commission. I think my hon. friend has made a contribution to the work of the commission in bringing this matter before parliament at this time.

While I am not in full accord with all the proposals which he made, some of them I believe are worthy of study and I am sure they will be studied by the Ilsley commission. One of the more important proposals is that which concerns importations. This is one of the most serious problems which the commission has to face at the moment and I am sure that its report will deal with that matter.

On motion of Mr. Pinard the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that I resume the chair in committee since it is close to six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TAXATION

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Harris—Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that the Minister of Finance may pay to a province, out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of any fiscal year in the period commencing on the first day of April, 1957, and ending on the 31st day of March, 1962

(a) a tax equalization payment with respect to individual and corporation income taxes and succession duties;

(b) a provincial revenue stabilization payment with respect to such taxes; and

(c) a tax rental payment in accordance with a tax rental agreement that may be entered into by any province as an alternative to levying such taxes on its own behalf; and also to authorize tax collection agreements with the governments of the provinces.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks at this point in the resolution's progress and I assure you I shall not detain the house unreasonably. Yesterday the leader of the party to which I have the honour to belong spoke at some length and clearly enunciated the belief of all members of this group. He clearly stated that in our opinion the measure now before us is in no way adequate nor is it fair nor does it provide fair treatment with respect to the fiscal requirements which the various provincial governments have at this time if they are to discharge properly their responsibilities to the people in the respective provinces.

One could elaborate on his statements but may I just say that in Alberta this year our budget reached $242 million. This amount is required to provide social services for a population of a little more than a million people. The total of all direct municipal assistance will amount to over $64 million this year paid out for local government operations, almost half of the budget, and in the past seven years direct and indirect assistance to the various local governments has amounted to over $311 million. This substantial sum in my opinion gives ample evidence of our treatment of our junior governments and is in sharp contrast to the niggardly treatment proposed in the measure before us at this time.

In the interests of time I intend to confine my remarks to one single aspect of the problem, namely, the economic consequences that will result if the federal government continues with its present taxation policies, and I would particularly draw to the attention of the minister the fact that in this measure and through these taxation policies we are missing the very heart of the principle of fiscal need. I refer to the fiscal need of the people themselves and the concept that while various provincial governments are indeed desperately in need of financial assistance it is the people themselves who need help most at this time.

We are discussing a measure which is designed to provide equalization payments to the respective provinces with respect to income taxes, corporation taxes and succession duties. This measure, which is the product of various conferences and negotiations as well as the attitude of the government, misses the essential point, namely, that basic to the well-being of the nation and our people is the need to restore to the people themselves their earnings in order that they can provide those things which they are unable to afford at this time and consequently turn to the various governments to provide for them. I believe that reductions in income taxes, corporation taxes and succession duties are badly needed today and could help considerably.

As I see it, the removal of the impediment to more friendly fiscal relations between the federal government and the various provincial governments lies not only in the federal government adopting a more generous attitude toward the provinces but also in policies that will help to alleviate and remove the tremendous pressure and the demands being made at the present time on the various provincial governments. I believe that the proper way to do this is to allow the people to retain more of their earnings so that they have the facilities to meet their local levies, retain their independence and provide for their stability and growth.

Today this is virtually impossible by reason of our taxation laws under which the federal government makes it impossible for people to save or to pay cash for the things they require in their everyday life. This has resulted in the inability of small businesses to borrow and municipalities to provide services. Let us examine some of the actual evidence. There are many signs indicating that there are sags in our economy which belie the claim of a booming prosperity and in many instances could well mean the beginning of a recession.

What about instalment buying in our country? This has reached the highest peak in the history of the nation. In an article appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of May 23, 1956 we have information which shows that the bills that the people of Canada owe total $2,193 million. The article goes on to say:

> The amount of money Canadians owe for the things they buy on time rose to a new high of $2,193 million at the end of 1955. This was an increase of $134,900,000 in the last three months of 1955 and a rise of $327 million over the year, one of the largest increases in the post-war era, a quarterly Bank of Canada survey showed today. With the steady 1955 rise, the consumer credit bill had more than doubled over a four year period, increasing from $973 million at the end of 1951.
> At the end of 1955, unpaid bills in charge accounts had increased to $376 million from $330 million at the end of September and $363 million at the end of 1954. Total instalment credit had risen to $987 million from $942 million in September and $822 million in the previous year, while personal loans had swelled to $830 million from $779 million in September and $661 million in 1954.

The significance of these figures, Mr. Chairman, strikes home when compared with the total amount of income tax collected by the federal government during the fiscal year 1954-55 for all of the provinces of Canada, namely, $2,412,197,266.67. The significance of the large amount of personal borrowings and instalment credit lies in the fact that it is nearly equal to half of the yearly budget of the government. If this instalment debt were to be paid off in one year then on the basis of the disposable income of the Canadian people for the year 1955 it would require practically 12 per cent of that amount. Quite obviously we must give the people the right to keep more of their earnings and a reduction in income taxes would help considerably.

What about the people's personal savings? In the year 1939 personal disposable income of the Canadian people totalled $4,208 million of which 7·2 per cent was savings. In 1943 it totalled $7,478 million with 23·4 per cent being savings. In 1944 it totalled $8,164 million. In that year savings were 24·2 per cent. It is evident that there has been a steady decline in the annual rate of savings. Let us look at the last three years. In 1953, with disposable income of $16,725 million, only 9·6 per cent was savings. In the year 1954 disposable income reached $16,747 million with 6·4 per cent being savings. During the year 1955, which incidentally was the most prosperous year in the history of Canada, the estimated disposable income was $18,285 million and the people of Canada were only able to save 8·1 per cent.

The telling point is the extreme drop from the year 1944 comparing it with the peak year of prosperity, 1955. I submit that a choice has to be made whether to continue with the centralizing of power vested in the federal government or to restore quite rightly some of that power over the purse to the people of Canada. Finally, I should like to say this and I say it in good faith. I venture to suggest to the Minister of Finance that the foundation for the well-being of the people of Canada and the confidence which the people of Canada have in our free way of life and in our economic system is less firmly established in the measure now before us than it would be if the Minister of Finance were courageous and bold enough to review the entire situation, overhaul the entire tax structure of this country with a view to simplification and to removing all those taxes that are crippling to the people's savings or ability to pay cash for the things they need and in the case of small businesses, to restore to them the power to acquire credit at reasonable rates of interest. I believe that is one reform that is most necessary. In doing that I believe that the Minister of Finance would not only do a good stroke of business and increase the volume of revenue required for government expenditure but at the same time would earn the gratitude of the people of Canada and the co-operation, I am sure, of every member of this house.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon in a talk which I delivered I indicated the reasons for supposing that the Bank of Canada was forced on Canada by alien influences operating from the city of London. I suggested that the main reason the Bank of Canada was forced upon Canada was that the powers in London desired to take away from Canada the finance act of 1923.

The important element in the finance act of 1923 was that under that act the Minister of Finance could create money and spend it into circulation or lend it into circulation or otherwise use it as he felt the economy of Canada demanded, just as the Minister of Finance under the finance act of 1914 in the year 1917 printed and spent into circulation $50 million in buying Canadian goods and sent those goods over to Great Britain as a loan; and just as in that same year he created 26 million other dollars and spent them into circulation for the conduct of the war.

There are people who still persist in saying that action of that sort means that it will cause inflation. The whole secret is this: what is the definition of inflation? Inflation is a rise in prices which results from a scarcity of goods in relation to the amount of money in circulation. Consequently if money is created by the Minister of Finance and spent into circulation in such a way that it does not cause a rise in prices because of a shortage of goods, then that created money will not cause any inflation or any other undesirable condition in the economy. It was of that power that the city of London wished to deprive Canada. Why? Because that power is the power that makes the nation financially free. The minister has been sitting here and listening patiently to a great deal of talk about reducing taxes and that sort of thing. The minister himself knows, as does every person in this house, that if he taxes this nation to the very limit of its endurance he still is not able to get enough money to satisfy the needs of the various provinces in this dominion.

What is to be done about the matter? Are we to go on depending entirely on taxation, or are we going to go back and take the power the minister had under the finance acts of 1914 and 1923 and employ that power as a means of supplementing the money which is in circulation in the country, thereby enabling the people as a whole throughout the dominion to buy the goods which the dominion is able to produce and thereby raise the standard of living in less fortunate areas without deducting from the standard of living obtaining in the other provinces?

It must be quite obvious that it is not fair to Ontario or to Quebec, each of which requires all the money which they can collect within their own boundaries, if money is taken away from them to be distributed in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, no matter how much the people of Ontario and Quebec may desire to help those other provinces. But if the money could be created, based on the goods and services which those two central provinces can produce, and then that money distributed in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, that would enable those provinces to buy the goods from Ontario and Quebec and would in no way detract from the amount of purchasing power or revenue available in Ontario and Quebec. Without that device, I submit that it would be impossible for us to finance the affairs of this nation in a way satisfactory and fair to the people throughout this country.

Mr. Dupuis: What about the dividend?

Mr. Blackmore: The dividend is possible. The dividend can be paid by the same means.

Mr. Dupuis: Why not pay it?

Mr. Low: You fellows recognized the principle in your family allowances.

Mr. Blackmore: Just as soon as I am finished I should love to have questions from my hon. friend. But the simple fact that I am laying down is this. It is going to be absolutely impossible to enable the people generally throughout the Dominion of Canada to enjoy the high standard of living which the productive capacity of the Dominion of Canada would justify unless we adopt the principle which was written into the finance act of 1914 and into the finance act of 1923. We saw the performance throughout world war I. We have no excuse whatever for disregarding that performance.

I submit that the whole purpose of the financial interests in London in putting the Bank of Canada into this country was to deprive us of the finance act of 1923 which meant freedom financially.

Did the same city of London influence, motivate and dictate in relation to the Sirois commission? I promise to have something to say about that matter in this talk.

What was the nature and what were the recommendations of the Rowell-Sirois report? Over all, there are several essential recommendations, of which I am going to mention two which are, in my opinion, quite undesirable. The first one was that the provinces were to vacate personal income tax, corporation income tax, and succession duties fields. This procedure removes from a province most of its capacity for improving itself economically by developing industry which the province could otherwise do to raise its standard of living. Suppose we go on with the proposals which are now being used. Of what advantage is it to a province like Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia or any other province to expend great effort in developing industry within that province, if the more industry they develop the more they are taxed and the more money is taken away from them to go into the hands of other provinces? How can they get ahead? How are they motivated? There is the main difficulty when we suggest that the power to tax in those three fields of taxation shall be taken away completely from the provinces.

Another very important recommendation was that the dominion was to assume and carry provincial debts and to set up a finance commission to see to it that the provinces did not go into debt any further. It may be said that it is sound to put a limit on the amount that a provincial government can borrow but—

Mr. Dupuis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Blackmore: Just as soon as I am finished my hon. friend may ask questions and I will answer him during all the time remaining this evening. But I would ask him please not to interfere with me while I am talking. I say that not because I cannot answer his questions; answering his questions is just child's play to me.

An hon. Member: He might ask a sensible one for a change.

Mr. Blackmore: The point I was making is this. If we are to enable a province to build itself up or if we are to encourage it to build itself up to become great and strong and a real advantage to the nation, we must give it every advantage from the industry which it develops within the province.

May I now summarize and quote certain passages from an article by A. W. Roebuck, who now is a member of the other place, in the Labour Review. It is an address delivered in Toronto, January 3, 1941, and entitled "The Other Side of the Rowell-Sirois Report". I summarize this article in order to show what this eminent gentleman thought concerning the Sirois commission matter back there in those days while it was in the heat of discussion.

Who was A. W. Roebuck? In order that we can evaluate his judgment, I read from the Canadian Parliamentary Guide of 1951 a passage which is quite enlightening regarding the standing of this gentleman:

A barrister, K.C., and bencher Law Society. Member of Granite, Thornhill golf clubs.

Life member of Toronto Liberal association. Was candidate for Ontario legislature at general elections 1911 and 1914; for the House of Commons in 1917. Elected to Ontario legislature at general election 1934. Sworn as attorney general, minister of labour and member of hydro-electric power commission, 1934.

Now, this man had quite a lot of experience, and beyond any question his words are worth listening to.

Resigned portfolio, 1937. Re-elected at general election 1937. Resigned from the Ontario legislative assembly to be candidate for House of Commons. Elected to House of Commons at general election 1940. Summoned to the Senate of Canada, April 18, 1945. Party politics, Liberal. Religion, Anglican.

Now, this indicates we are not listening to just any idle talker when we listen to this man's speech. May I just summarize the article which was printed, as I have said, in the Labour Review? I am going to give the headings, and then there are two or three passages from which I should like to quote. The headings in this article, "The other side of the Rowell-Sirois Report" are as follows: First, "Confederation, a defence measure"; second, "Division of powers"; third, "Unity with diversity"; fourth, "The commission's work"; fifth, "Changes since 1867"; sixth, "B.N.A. Act has not held us back". And consequently there is no reason to change the B.N.A. Act or abolish it; seventh, "The Sirois Proposals"; then I propose to read from that division so that members may get this man's view of what the Sirois report proposed:

The Sirois report is a monumental document, but you will find its main recommendation stated with reasonable conciseness as follows:

(a) The dominion government is to become solely responsible for direct relief to unemployed employables, all other relief and public charities to be borne without dominion aid by the provinces and municipalities, with the exception only of old age pensions to which the dominion will continue to contribute 75 per cent as now.

(b) The dominion is to assume and pay the principal and interest of all the provincial debts (including both direct obligations and those guaranteed by provinces), the dominion to have the benefit of all interest collected by each province on its investments, a single exception being made of the province of Quebec where the dominion will assume 40 per cent of both provincial and municipal debts.

(c) In return the provinces and the municipalities are to hand over all personal income taxes, corporation taxes and succession duties to the exclusive taxing power of the dominion, with the exception that a portion of the corporation tax collected from mining and oil producing companies (10 per cent is suggested) is to be returned to the provinces in which the mine or oil well is located.

(d) The subsidies guaranteed by the British North America Act from the dominion to the provinces amounting to $21,000,000 are to be cancelled.

(e) The dominion is to pay to some provinces which are alleged to be in need an irreducible aggregate amount of $14,900,000 per annum in what are to be known as adjustment grants, to be supplemented to all provinces by emergency grants when necessity can be shown to the satisfaction of a dominion board to be appointed.

Such are the recommendations, simplified to the extent of my ability, and raising, as you may suppose an infinite series of questions.

Now, continuing with the divisions: division No. eight is, "Unemployment relief a diminishing factor;" No. nine, "Rescuing shipwrecked bondholders",—which may indicate one reason for the Sirois report; No. 10, "Centralizing financial power"; No. 11, "Poor bargain for provinces"; division 12, "Hurtful tax changes"; division 13, "Arbitrary handouts". Now, from this division, "Arbitrary handouts", may I read one paragraph?

The difficulty of determining degrees of need is obvious but the Sirois commission, whose chairman was from Quebec and upon which there was no Ontario representative, has discovered a method of calculation which to them seems satisfactory, for the commission recommends to Quebec a permanent annual grant irreducible in amount of $8,000,000 (page 96, Book II) and to Ontario the sum of nothing (page 97, Book II), and this notwithstanding that Ontario loses its confederation subsidy of $2,941,000. The grants are supposed to be made on basis of need and yet Alberta and British Columbia also lose their subsidies and get nothing. Quebec with its irreducible grant of $8,000,000 per annum apparently has $1,100,000 greater need than all the rest of the provinces of Canada put together.

Continuing with the divisions, division 14 is, "Summing up". I should like to read the last section of 14:

(e) Recommendations which tend to destroy the basis of confederation by curtailing the sovereign power of the provinces in the management of their local affairs or placing them in financial leading strings to the dominion should be rejected.

The last division, No. 15, is "Canada has done well". May I read this one:

Political leaders may confer, newspapers pronounce, and interested parties continue their propaganda, but nevertheless public opinion will decide whether or not Canada is to be melted down and recast in some new mould; whether the Sirois commissioners are to be "Fathers of Modern Confederation" or whether their report shall be buried like many another of its kind and forgotten. We have had some most unhappy experiences of late of nations changing constitutions over night, especially so in those instances where the changes involved a concentration of power. Canada has done well and been happy in the very wide distribution which she has enjoyed in governmental authority. Let us keep it that way.

To these words I enthusiastically say, "Amen". I should like, however, to go back a little farther than we are at the present time before I say that. Obviously, from this and from other considerations, Canada had done well, and done well without the Bank of Canada. This is important.

I was arguing this afternoon as to what good the Bank of Canada has been. I believe I can challenge anyone in this house or in this country to cite one single, solitary instance in which the Bank of Canada has been of benefit, or to cite one benefit that was not enjoyed by the Dominion of Canada before the depression set in in 1929.

Evidently Canada got along very well without the Rowell-Sirois report. It was argued that the Rowell-Sirois recommendations were necessary as a war measure. Evidently from what I have already said during this afternoon, Prime Minister King did not think so. May I refer to the passage from the editorial which I quoted this afternoon from the Western Producer of January 23, 1941. These are the words:

Mr. King himself admitted that he personally was not in favour of calling the conference at this time but that he changed his mind as the result of the representations of the financial advisers of the government as conveyed to him by Mr. Ilsley.

Who were those financial advisers and how closely were they attending to what was being whispered over across the water in the city of London?

Apparently Mr. Ilsley himself had not thought Canada's war effort required the Rowell-Sirois recommendations. Evidently premiers Hepburn, Pattullo and Aberhart did not think so. Neither did the other premiers think so. The Hon. Mr. Motherwell did not think so. The Hon. A. W. Roebuck did not think so. The Right Hon. Sir Thomas White and Beaudry Leman would not have thought so. All Canada needed to fight world war II successfully was a re-enacted Finance Act of 1923 under the Dominion Notes Act of 1868; and Canada's Bank Act in force as it was before the Bank of Canada Act modified it.

There is one matter which I think will be quite interesting to the Liberals in the house. That is the opinion of Premier Hepburn at the time when he resisted so violently and determinedly the proposals of the Rowell-Sirois commission. The opinion which Premier Hepburn held is recorded in the Western Producer of January 23, 1941. We find the article is entitled, "Hepburn Urges Money Reform; Urges Action to take Care of Expanding War Effort". The article reads:

At Toronto last weekend, following an Ontario cabinet meeting, premier Mitchell Hepburn issued a 700 word statement urging the dominion government "to make available sufficient new currency in order to take care of the expanding requirements of wartime."

He warned that a serious crisis was fast approaching and said "Canadians will look to the Bank of Canada, which must not be operated for gain or to serve selfish interests but should rather aid primary producers and which should assist in the solution of the financial problems of the provinces and municipalities of the nation.

I presume through granting loans. I go on with the news item report of Mr. Mitchell Hepburn's statement:

The statement said: "My first proposition is that the authority for creating money now vested by the constitution in the dominion government should not be delegated to any authority, public or private.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have said what I had intended to say on this occasion in the various debates on this measure. It will help us greatly when we see what kind of bill the minister has to follow this resolution; but I feel that up to the present time the things which I have said were things which the nation and parliament need very much to know.

As I said this afternoon, some of these things are hidden away in remote places. Most of them have been destroyed, things which gave us an idea of how our fathers felt about the situation when the Rowell-Sirois commission was set up, was functioning and was making its recommendations and the premiers of the provinces in 1941 were deciding what they would do about those recommendations.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take very long to sum up the position which we take on this whole matter. I think this has been a good debate, but it has not been anything more than could be expected or ought to have been expected by the House of Commons or its committees on a measure as important as this one. We look upon it as a very important measure, one that affects the provinces, the municipalities and the Dominion of Canada, not only this year but for a good many years ahead. We believe that the purpose of the debate has been served quite well. It seems to me that enough has been said at this stage to bring home to the government the feelings of the members of the house as well as the feelings of many of the governments of the provinces. We do not intend, therefore, to carry the debate any further at this stage. The resolution ought to pass and the bill be introduced so that we can have a look at it. We will take a look at the bill, Mr. Chairman, and decide what is best to do in the light of the terms and the provisions that are set out in that bill.

We thought we might influence the Minister of Finance and his colleagues to try once more to gather the provinces together in a conference with the object of working out a formula that would be more acceptable to them in the light of all of the conditions, as I said yesterday. We had no thought or desire to try to destroy the chances of getting this measure through. Frankly, we feel that the government is trying to reach some sort of solution of the financial difficulties that have arisen throughout Canada as between the provinces and the dominion and frankly between various areas of the country and the federal government. We give them credit for having made a try, and I wish to tell the minister that we look upon this tax-sharing proposal as being superior in many ways to the tax-rental scheme that has been in effect for the past ten years. I think that this proposal will mean a better deal for most of the provinces, although I must say there are some of them that will find a very slim improvement. I could name some of those, but I do not need to. The minister knows them quite well. To others, this is going to mean a considerable improvement, and I am very happy when I see what change it will make in the maritime provinces in the stabilization of their revenue. There is not any question about that, and we all rejoice in that because they have not had a decent deal. We all recognize it. They have not had their proper share of industrialization, and if they do not have some sort of balance between industrial and agricultural activity I do not see how in the world their standard of living can ever be brought up to anything like the level it has reached in other parts of Canada.

So far so good; but there is still evidence that the people of the maritime provinces are not at all happy, and the best evidence that one can cite, of course, is the conference that was held in Fredericton the other day when a permanent organization was set up for the purpose of attempting to get a better deal for the maritimes. We all sympathize with them and mind you, Mr. Chairman, there are others of us who have been in a similar position in times past. I can remember when our own province was the poor relation. It is spoken of today as the Cinderella province, having come out of the kitchen and the ashes and is now dressed in slippers and beautiful evening dress. It is quite true, but that was not so long ago. We suffered the same things essentially that the maritimes suffer, but we did get a break and we have brought ourselves up through some good luck, of course, but some very good management, through the development of our resources. But some of those opportunities the maritimes have not had, and they deserve them, and every effort ought to be made to see that they do get them. I only cite these things to show that one of the purposes behind our debate thus far has been to impress upon the government the need of pausing for just a little while, thinking over the situation and giving proper weight to the conditions of the provinces and the municipalities throughout this country.

I think, without exception, the provinces find themselves unable to cope with the needs and the demands for service and for development and so on in the municipalities. And so, I thought we might be able to get the minister to call a conference once again and to make that final effort which I still think ought to have been made. I believe he is a reasonable man, and I believe that he could persuade the provinces to go along with him if he would get them together and show them that he is anxious to help them to meet their problems and to try to solve them more or less on a permanent basis. I agree with him in what he said yesterday that you cannot sit down now and draft up any scheme or proposal for tax-sharing that will stand for, well, anything more than a few years. We realize that, but I still believe that what I said yesterday is true, that he failed in drafting up the proposals he now places before the provinces to give the proper weight to the circumstances under which the municipalities and the provinces are trying to carry on.

I cannot help feeling that there should have been that one last effort to meet the provinces, to look the facts in the face and try to carry them along with him, which he could have done. We feel perfectly satisfied on that. How much happier he would have been if he could have felt that what he proposed to the provinces would have been accepted wholeheartedly and in good spirit, and I am sure they would have gone with him.

I remind the minister that back in 1940 and 1941 when the government first negotiated the tax transfer arrangements the provinces recognized the case that was put up to them by this government. They recognized the force and the logic behind their claim that during wartime there should not be double taxation, the confusion attendant on so many different tax agencies trying to get revenues from the people, and they quite readily agreed that this government must have the wherewithal to put on a real war effort. They went along with the minister then and I am sure they would be just as reasonable now if they felt that the minister and his colleagues in the government had given sufficient consideration to the problems of the municipalities and the provinces and their circumstances. They do not, and that is their unhappiness today. That is why they feel the way I said yesterday they felt.

I hope we have at least impressed upon the minister the effect on the municipal and provincial situation. We think that when he drafted the proposal that is now before us he should have taken more fully into consideration what the municipalities and the provinces will have to carry in the future. I must say to him that he could very well have lifted some of the nightmares from the provincial and municipal authorities as they look ahead into the future and see little or no hope for a solution to their terrible problems of taxation, revenues and stabilization.

You know, Mr. Minister, there are a lot of municipalities today which are saying to themselves, "I wonder what kind of burden this is going to place on us when the federal government announces its national health scheme". I am satisfied that they are going to say to themselves, "Whatever is done by the federal government, the provinces are going to try to shift a share of that on the municipalities and how are we going to meet it with the slender resources we have?" That is the thing they are thinking about extremely seriously today.

It seems to me that here was a very good chance to do something of a more or less permanent nature to help both the local governments to find a solution to their problems. It is true that the plan we are about to consider in the bill that will be introduced does provide something better than the tax rental plan of the past five years, but it still fails to meet the immediate needs of both local governments. I said yesterday that the proposal was niggardly and my hon. friend the minister contended that I was rather harsh when I said that. Let me explain, Mr. Chairman, that any new proposal is niggardly if it fails to do what is possible to be done.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Physically possible.

Mr. Low: What was that?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Everything that is physically possible is financially possible.

Mr. Low: Everything that is physically possible and desirable should be made financially possible. You are becoming a good Social Crediter over there.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Those were not my words.

Mr. Low: It will sink in after a while if we keep on. There is no question about it and I think the minister realizes that is so. I am not digressing at the moment from the thing I wanted to tell the minister. I said that any attempt to solve the problem that faces the local governments today has to be considered as niggardly if it fails to do what it is possible for us to do.

I am just as certain as I am that I stand here that if the minister had called the provinces together, even if it meant an increase of $100 million or $150 million or $200 million a year to carry them along with him in a happy mood, and had given them some hope that they could help their municipalities to solve their problems, it would have been a splendid investment and would have been possible. The minister himself knows that it would be possible. He knows full well that any time a proposal of that kind is made to help the provinces and the municipalities they are going to spend that money in development and the minute the development starts to occur taxes roll into this government, the gross national product increases and the minister's tax base is broadened. He knows that.

I want to know where the minister's faith is. He is a man of faith but it seems to me that his faith has been weak this last while. When he looks to the years ahead he must realize that his gross national product is going to continue rising and he will have a much better chance of meeting the needs of the provinces and the municipalities as well as his own needs for defence and all the other things that are demanded of him provided we get the development; but we cannot get that development unless the municipalities and the provinces are prepared to go along and unless they have the wherewithal with which to go along. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think we have missed an opportunity.

I had thought that the minister would yield and perhaps say, "We will hold this over; we will call a conference and after the conference has reached a decision we will bring in the legislation." That would have been much better and everyone would have been much happier about it. Those are the reasons we feel the debate has been worth while. We tried to drive these things home to the minister.

While I was speaking yesterday I mentioned something about the various problems the municipalities and provinces have. One matter I did mention briefly was that the province of Ontario as well as others faces the problem of cleaning up its rivers. Water pollution has gone so far that it is going to cost the province an estimated $120 million a year for the next 10 or 15 years. I said $120 million a year yesterday but evidently Hansard did not catch the phrase "a year" and just recorded "$120 million during the next 10 or 15 years". It will cost well over $1 billion to clean up the rivers in this province alone. I emphasize that for the reason that there was a mistake made in Hansard yesterday. It may have been my own fault. I am not blaming the boys because they do a very good job, but I just wanted to say that by way of correcting the mistake.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, having said what we have said and having done our duty as we have seen it, we are prepared to wait and see what the bill provides for, and I ask the minister before he brings it in for second reading to just get off by himself and take a most careful look at it through the eye of faith in this country. I have faith in this country and I am sure the minister has too. I would like him to take a look at it through the eyes of faith with a little sympathy and understanding for the problems that are so critical in the provinces and municipalities. I urge the minister to please not bring in a bill for us to consider on second reading that is rigid in its terms. Have it so flexibly worded that if there are negotiations between the dominion and the provinces that may result in a change being required it can be changed without having to come back to parliament for a change in the act.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

[Mr. Low.]

The Chairman: Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No, no. On division.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harris thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 442, to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the governments of the provinces and to authorize the government of Canada to enter into fiscal agreements with the governments of the provinces.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHANGES IN CONNECTION WITH APPEALS, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Criminal Code to provide for certain changes in connection with appeals to the supreme court; and also to establish the office of deputy registrar of the supreme court.

Motion agreed to, resolution considered in committee, reported and concurred in.

Mr. Garson thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 443, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING FILING OF STATEMENTS, ETC.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 437, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

On clause 1—For life or fire insurance.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this bill and the bill which will follow come from the Senate. They do not involve any complicated amendments but provide for an increase in the amount of deposit required by an insurance company doing business in Canada. The bill now before us refers to foreign insurance companies and it is proposed that before a company is permitted to do life or fire insurance business in Canada the deposit will be $200,000, which is an increase from the present deposit of $100,000. The last time a change was made in the amount of deposit required was in 1927 and hon. members will realize that over the years there has been a great increase in the volume of business and consequently the liabilities incurred as well as a change in the purchasing power and the value of money.

The second portion of the bill contains a relatively minor amendment dealing with some awkwardness which has been experienced in connection with the date for filing reports. It is now suggested that in the case of foreign insurance companies, which are not required within their own country to file a report of a certain date they will be required to file a report in Canada not within a certain time following a meeting of the shareholders, as is now required by the act, but within six months after the annual balancing of its affairs.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is this increase tied particularly to any volume of business being done by a company in Canada or is it simply tied to the fact that there has been an inflationary period and this is to keep the deposit in line with the value of the former amount?

Mr. Benidickson: This is an initial deposit. After the company has done a certain amount of business and has consequently incurred liabilities to people in Canada whom it has insured it is required to increase its deposit in proportion to its liabilities to the Canadian people. In recent years Canadian companies have had suggested to them by the department of insurance that in their private bill it should be stipulated that there will be a minimum capital of $200,000 before it is recommended to parliament. Not only is this amendment in keeping with the inflationary tendency since 1927 that I referred to, it is also in line with the present capital requirements of new Canadian companies. My hon. friend will realize that Canadian companies have to petition parliament for a private bill.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I understand that this is an initial deposit. The parliamentary assistant has indicated that as a company continues to do business a larger deposit is required, which I understand would be for the protection of creditors in Canada. Can he state what is the largest amount now on deposit by any company?

Mr. Benidickson: I do not think I can answer that offhand. I have in front of me the annual report of the superintendent of insurance for the year 1954 which is the latest report tabled here. This large report is in two large volumes. One refers to the business done by fire and casualty insurance companies and the other by life insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies. These reports of the superintendent of insurance analyse the position in Canada of each registered company, foreign, British or Canadian, and full details are given of the amount of deposit in each case, the amount of insurance done in Canada, etc.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Has the parliamentary assistant not some idea of the amount I am talking about in connection with companies which have been operating for several years? Is it a matter of $500,000, $1,000,000 or an amount like that? I might relate my remarks further to this problem and ask the parliamentary assistant if this deposit is in the form of cash or government bonds, or just what form does it take?

Mr. Benidickson: The act sets out the type of securities which will be acceptable when placed with the Minister of Finance on a basis of trust for this purpose. It can include government bonds of this country, provincial and municipal bonds and then there are some special stipulations with respect to preferred and common stocks that these must be of companies which have a record of paying dividends over a certain period of years.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think the parliamentary assistant is getting to the question that I wanted to ask. We are always accused of being short of common stock capital or venture capital in this country and apparently it is necessary from time to time to go outside. If there are large amounts of money involved affecting several companies I am hoping that, whatever the terms are, this money is not allowed to lie idle when it is put on deposit with the department and that it may be made use of for investment in common stocks of the nature that he has said. I do not think we have any money to spare from the standpoint of capital and we should be making use of it as long as it remains within the category of investment which in the ordinary course of events would be treated as substantial enough to protect creditors. I certainly should like to have confirmation that that type of investment is allowed.

Mr. Benidickson: It is not prohibited, and there are a great number of insurance companies. We are dealing now with the foreign companies. There are 34 with deposits with respect to life and casualty business. There are 185 with respect to fire or fire and casualty and there are 32 foreign fraternal organizations. Therefore quite a substantial amount of money becomes available for investment for purposes of deposit.

Mr. Nowlan: The parliamentary assistant has said that the initial deposit is $200,000 and then he has told us, as we know, that there are further deposits afterwards depending upon the business which is done. Is there any difference in the allocation of these deposits with respect to the purpose for which they may be used or are they treated as a composite deposit in balance? Is one held for one purpose and one held for another depending on the fate and success of the particular insurance company?

Mr. Benidickson: It is a composite fund. It is a growing or diminishing amount related to the amount of business that is being done.

Mr. Nowlan: How many times have the deposits been called upon? Is there any record in the last few years of these deposits having been called upon because of companies getting in trouble of any kind?

Mr. Benidickson: I am not able to give that information readily to my hon. friend. I think he knows that the superintendent of insurance is elsewhere before the banking and commerce committee at the present time I could call him and get that information if it would not delay the committee.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the parliamentary assistant tell the committee why both foreign insurance companies and British insurance companies are making exactly the same deposit? What I have in mind is that under the existing act and under the two acts as they will be revised Canadian companies are required to make a deposit which is one-half of the amount envisioned in this bill. In other words, if a foreign company is required to deposit $100,000 a Canadian company is required to make a deposit of $50,000.

However, exactly the same treatment is meted out to foreign companies and to British companies. They are put on an equal basis. Inasmuch as this country has for a good many years given a preference to the empire and commonwealth in connection with its tariffs, it would seem to me that on exactly the same basis preference should be given to British insurance companies over foreign companies. I do not propose to debate that point here because it comes up under the next bill. But the reverse situation is certainly a proper question to be raised at this point. Why should no extra charge be levied against a foreign company compared with a British company?

Mr. Boisvert: All on the same footing.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You would put all foreign nations and Britain on the same footing? From some point in the house, Mr. Chairman, there came the interjection—I think perhaps it was from the direction of the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska that all these companies should be on the same footing.

Mr. Boisvert: The law is the same for everybody.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That interjection having been made, I want to make it quite clear at this point that there are those on this side of the house who are definitely opposed to such a course of action. While Canada has achieved nationhood, we feel that we have ties within the empire and commonwealth that we value and want to keep and for that reason we want to give preference. This recurrent desire, so well illustrated both by the bill and by the interjection by the hon. member I have mentioned indicating that he wants to put Russia, China, Japan and most of the 80 other countries in the world on exactly the same basis as England, Scotland, Wales and Australia, is one which is personally very repugnant to me.

Mr. Boisvert: To answer my friend's question, within the country the law is equal as it applies to all the citizens of the country and as it applies to all people outside Canada wishing to do business inside our country. There is no doubt about that. The law has to be equal in the case of everyone coming into this country or living within the country wishing to do business. If it were otherwise I think it would be very bad for a country like ours to try to bring about discrimination. This bill has the purpose of developing business within the country. If we consider the law, I think that everybody wishing to do business in Canada should be equal, and the law provides that if people from some foreign country have the intention of doing business in this country they should follow the law that we are trying to pass now.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I do not know what kind of Speaker the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska would have made but in my estimation he would certainly make a very poor minister of finance.

Mr. Nowlan: May I ask the parliamentary assistant this question? How many new foreign insurance companies have registered within Canada within whatever period he has there, if he has the information available? We have heard a great deal and read a great deal in the press in the last year or so about new companies coming into Canada. I realize that the parliamentary assistant may not have the information for the reason which he gave, but if he has can he tell the committee how many foreign insurance companies have registered in Canada within the last year or two?

Mr. Benidickson: I have a table here. Would my hon. friend like me to read it or would he consent to having it placed on Hansard? It shows the number of companies registered as at December 31, 1935, 1945 and 1955 and the companies are divided into Canadian, British and foreign.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that this table be put on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Benidickson: The table is as follows:

Number of companies registered as at December 31

	1935	1945	1955
Life or Life and Casualty
Canadian	27	27	31
British	7	5	5
Foreign	20	17	34
Totals	54	49	70
Fire or Fire and Casualty
Canadian	60	64	81
British	71	77	95
Foreign	159	176	185
Totals	290	317	361
Fraternal
Canadian	8	16	17
Foreign	26	30	32
Totals	34	46	49

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, despite the momentary diversion of a few moments ago I have yet to get an answer as to why this particular amount, which is exactly the same as the amount applicable to British companies, was set in the case of foreign companies.

Mr. Benidickson: I draw my hon. friend's attention to the short title of the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. It reads:

This act may be cited as the Foreign Insurance Companies Act. 1932 . . .

My hon. friend knows that this act was not introduced by this government.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, the bill is, and because the bill is being presented by this government the answer to the question should come from the government.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Date of filing.

Mr. Monteith: Could the parliamentary assistant explain exactly what is meant in the new section 4 (b) by the words, "in the case of a company holding a certificate of registry limited to the business of reinsurance"? Are there any companies doing insurance business in Canada limited to reinsurance only?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Each company indicates in its application for registration its purpose in the insurance field. Particularly since the end of the war and as a result of the increased volume of insurance business, a number of companies have come forward and, following their manner of doing business in other countries, have indicated that they do not propose to do any direct writing of insurance with individual people in the country. Their sole business function would be that of reinsuring companies who had direct writing with the public. In that case their reports and returns come to them at the conclusion or end of the year of the companies that they have reinsured. In consequence this bill proposes to give them another two weeks in which to make their report to the superintendent of insurance.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is this extension of time simply the result of business practice which indicates that these companies cannot conform to the standard practice required by the department?

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct. The acts have provided a rather heavy penalty for late reporting. It is found these reinsurance companies have difficulty in performing according to the present statute.

Mr. Monteith: Then I understand that clause 2 deals only with the statement of the Canadian business of these foreign companies?

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3—Time for filing general statements.

Mr. Monteith: From reading the clause I believe it is a general picture of the company's over-all business to which reference is made, no matter where its head office may be. It may be in Madrid, Spain, but they still must file, within six months of the end of the year, a statement of their over-all picture. Is that correct?

Mr. Benidickson: That is correct. A Canadian company files one combined statement. In the case of British and foreign companies, they usually file two statements, one with respect to business done in Canada. Then within six years after the balancing date of the company they are required to file a statement of their entire business.

An hon. Member: Six months.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That was six months, I understand, and not six years.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes; six months.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The "six years" startled me a bit. Is there a situation here that such a foreign company might have several years in which they could comply with this section? I do not think it is beyond the stretch of imagination. As an example, we do not know what the requirements in the foreign jurisdiction may be. Under this section they have one month after the requirement in their own domestic jurisdiction. There may be places of business that do not require to file for a couple of years. Under this section the company would have one month after that time. Under the circumstances surely there should have been an over-all limitation to six months, regardless of what the requirement of the foreign requirement might be.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the purpose of the amendment. I think that is what we are achieving. Under the existing law a foreign company is required to provide this general statement. It is tied up to two things. It is tied up with either the date on which it submits this annual statement to the foreign country from which it derives its charter; or, alternatively, if it is not required to do that, then it must do so within a certain period of time after this meeting of shareholders. Administratively the superintendent of insurance finds difficulty in checking up on the date of an annual meeting of shareholders of a company whose head office is abroad. So he says that he proposes—and we accept that advice—that administratively it would be much more convenient to forget about any meetings of shareholders and simply say that under any circumstances the statement must be filed within six months after the balancing date of the company, whether or not there was a shareholders meeting or whether or not a general statement was required to be filed in that jurisdiction.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I may be wrong on this, but it seems to me that you are not accomplishing what you are setting out to do because the wording of the section is not "and in any case within six months". It is "within six months" provided there is a failure to bring it in within one month of the filing date in the domestic jurisdiction. The domestic jurisdiction might require this return two years after the close of the fiscal year, in which case we would have to wait for two years and one month. This is not a limitation to the six months that you have led me to believe was the reason for the change in the statute. I am suggesting that the wording should be something like this: "and in any case within six months after the balancing date of the company in each year". I would respectfully submit that the parliamentary assistant might take a further look at this wording before we pass the clause, or he will not be carrying out what the superintendent of insurance desires.

Mr. Benidickson: I tried to make it clear that we are not interfering with the date of reporting in Canada, if there is a requirement for filing a statement in the country abroad. What we are doing is eliminating the necessity of concerning ourselves with whether or not there was an annual meeting of shareholders. That matter has been found inconvenient to supervise. If no date for filing is required in the other jurisdiction, then we will henceforth require that a statement be filed with us six months after the annual balancing date. I point out to my hon. friend that we are rather in the driver's seat because the registration could be withdrawn.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Surely, Mr. Chairman, we do not want to find ourselves in the position that we are dependent upon the law in a foreign jurisdiction for obtaining the report that is required by our department. I think the matter simply boils down to that. If the situation should be that the superintendent does not get his report within six months, he should be in a position to call for it. Under this legislation I say that there can arise a condition in which he cannot do so, and he may be hung up for two years, three years, or whatever the law in the foreign jurisdiction may be. It may be all right to say, "Oh, in these foreign jurisdictions their requirements are as stiff as are our own in connection with insurance matters". But as a matter of fact, I have had a little bit of experience in connection with this type of work, and it seems to me that what should be in here are the words that I have indicated. If the parliamentary assistant will read that paragraph over again, I think he will see the wisdom of my suggestion and will agree that the final words should have been "and in any case within six months".

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Monteith: Is that not the actual intent of the clause, namely, that in any case the statement should be filed within six months?

Mr. Benidickson: No, Mr. Chairman. If in the foreign jurisdiction there is a date with respect to the filing of a report of a foreign insurance company, we are not proposing to change our requirements in that respect. If my hon. friend looks at the explanatory notes on the right hand side of the page and reads there the existing law he will see that at the moment it is as follows:

> The statement of general business required to be made under section 21 shall be deposited in the department within one month after it is required by law to be furnished to the government of the country in which the head office of the company is situated, . . .

We are not changing that. We are changing only the portion that hitherto has had the filing in Canada in the alternative tied up with the date of the holding of a shareholders meeting in the foreign jurisdiction.

Mr. Monteith: Would it not be preferable to the superintendent of insurance actually to receive these statements at the end of six months rather than to look for them at the end of ten months, twelve months or fifteen months?

Mr. Benidickson: This bill has his approval. He reports he has had no difficulty administratively with respect to these reports, except in the circumstances where he is obliged to inquire about when an annual meeting was called in the foreign country. Under those circumstances, he has had difficulty, and he thinks this is an improvement.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEPOSIT, FILING OF STATEMENTS, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 438, to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Applewhaite in the chair.

On clause 1—

Mr. Monteith: A few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace mentioned that British and foreign companies' deposits were to be increased to $200,000. This bill increases the deposits of Canadian companies from $50,000 to $100,000. I understand this is to put Canadian and British and foreign companies more or less on the same footing, and I wonder if the parliamentary assistant would mind explaining how that would come about.

Mr. Benidickson: A Canadian company, Mr. Chairman, first of all must seek an act of incorporation from parliament. In that connection today, in order to get the recommendation of the superintendent of insurance before the bill is presented here and before it is considered in the banking and commerce committee a company is required to put up an initial capital of $200,000 as a minimum if it proposes to do business in the life or fire insurance fields. It is for that reason the Canadian deposit requirement is less than that of the British or foreign companies, because a Canadian company has the additional requirement of having minimum capital that has to be put up by the shareholders in Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND APPLICATION, MAKE CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. W. E. Harris Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 440, to amend the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister going to make a statement at this time or would he rather speak when it is time to end the debate?

Mr. Harris: I would rather speak later, sir.

Mr. Drew: Is the minister not going to make any statement as to the stage at which he is going to take into consideration any of the proposals that were put forward on an earlier occasion?

Mr. Harris: The proposals that were put forward on an earlier occasion, Mr. Speaker, had to do with some action the government might take outside the terms of the bill, and I thought I would deal with that at the conclusion of this debate.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that since this subject was raised we might have had the assurance that the government will take action to deal with the very serious plight of many superannuated civil servants, members of the armed forces and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who received their pensions at a time when the dollar was worth a great deal more than it is today. Just a few nights ago, I was looking at a television broadcast which compared the cost of living in Canada in 1936 with that in 1956, as well as comparing some other events. It brought home very vividly the tremendous difference in the amount of money that is required to give even a minimum of living standards.

Now, whether it is possible to deal with this subject within the framework of the bill now before us, at least it does seem to me it would be appropriate at the time when we are dealing with the public service superannuation that we should have a statement that there will be at this session something done to rectify an injustice which has continued far too long. We are not making any suggestion that is unrelated to reality. We are not making any rash proposals. As has been indicated, already in the United Kingdom there have been several progressive changes in the superannuation payments to a wide list of those who depend upon the government of the United Kingdom for their pensions. The last of those was during the spring of the present year. At that time it was pointed out that this is something that cannot be measured on a contractual basis. It was pointed out, as it has been pointed out on other occasions, that the civil servants, members of the armed forces and others, who received payments of that kind, accepted and received for many years payments which were far below the level of payments for corresponding activities in private occupations.

I must say that there has been a satisfactory improvement in the situation within the civil service here and in the provincial governments of Canada in recent years. Undoubtedly the gap between the amount received by civil servants and those doing similar work outside has been narrowed. We must recognize that the gap was very great indeed in earlier years. Pension payments were related to the amount they had received. Nevertheless, they were supposed to provide a minimum decent standard of living for those who were superannuated. I submit that this cannot be dealt with on a contractual basis like an insurance policy, or something of that kind. The test is a very simple one. Do the payments they now receive provide an adequate amount to give a decent minimum standard of living to those who served their country well in those various services? An attempt has been made to meet this situation upon that basis in the United Kingdom and in the United States. They have dealt with it on more than one occasion.

It must be common knowledge to every hon. member in this house that there are many splendid citizens of advanced years who served this country, either in the civil service, the armed services or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who are living in really desperate circumstances because of the inadequacy of the pension they receive.

If no other jurisdiction similar to ours had dealt with this subject, then it perhaps might be argued that this is one of those unfortunate instances where a contract has been made and that the contract must stand. However, in the United Kingdom, in other nations of the commonwealth as well as in the United States a real attempt has been made to meet this situation in a spirit of justice and humanity. I do not think it is possible to put into words the anguish of many of the people who are trying to eke out an existence on the pitifully small pensions that were fixed many years ago. I do not intend to put them on record, but I have received many letters, as I am sure other hon. members have, that tell the heartbreaking story of the struggle merely to survive with the amount of the payments they receive.

I would hope that since we are dealing with civil service superannuation, and since I am sure there will be general approval of such a plan, the minister will state now that steps will be taken to provide an over-all increase in the amount of pension. That could be done immediately. Then, more elaborate procedure could be followed to examine this subject thoroughly, as it has been examined in the United Kingdom, in the United States and elsewhere, and basing the adjustments upon the time at which the payments were made and upon the very real need of those people who have given great service to Canada, this situation could be dealt with in a way that I am sure would meet with general satisfaction. I find it difficult to believe that there would be opposition from anyone if such a proposal were made. I hope the minister, even at this stage of the session, will make an announcement that justice to those superannuated civil servants, members of the armed forces and members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will be meted out at this session. In that way, hope, encouragement and some faith in their prospects for the future will be given to many deserving people who are in desperate circumstances today.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is an appropriate occasion—and I gathered from what he said a moment ago that he intends to do it—for the Minister of Finance to make the statement which he promised on February 21 of this year he would make regarding this question. I refer in particular to the plight of superannuated civil servants, namely, those already retired who are on pensions in the lower brackets.

The fact that we are saying very little about what is in the bill that is now before us is a recognition of the fact that the steps proposed by this bill seem all to be good. As far as I can ascertain from my study of the bill, they are all steps in the right direction. They meet problems that have arisen in the administration of the Public Service Superannuation Act. Our complaint, however, is that once again the government is dealing with superannuation matters so far as our civil servants are concerned without touching this problem that faces so many of our older employees who are already retired and are having to exist on very small pensions.

I shall not take the time of the house to repeat the material in the speech that I made on February 21 of this year, as found in Hansard on pages 1415 to 1420. Neither will I attempt even to summarize the many speeches that I have been making on this subject during the regime not only of the present Minister of Finance but also of at least two of his predecessors, namely Mr. Abbott and Mr. Ilsley. I mention that fact simply to underline the situation with which we are confronted, namely, that for a long time some of us have been pleading for a measure of justice for our retired civil servants. Perhaps I might take just a moment to point out that the figures that have been given this year, as may be found on page 785 of Hansard for February 1, 1956, show that there are 2,710 retired civil servants whose pensions are less than $50 a month. That figure is included in a total number of retired civil servants of 13,022. On that same page it will also be seen that there are 4,196 widows of retired civil servants on pensions of less than $50 a month. That figure of 4,196 represents almost two-thirds of the widows of retired civil servants who are on pension. The total number of such widows is 6,459.

It is on behalf of all retired civil servants who find their pensions inadequate as the cost of living goes up that we plead with the minister, but we plead in particular on behalf of these folks in these lower pension brackets. As has been pointed out to the minister from this side of the house time and time again, we are not asking the government to break new ground when we ask that something be done for persons already retired, despite the argument the government continually throws at us about contractual relationships.

The Leader of the Opposition has just mentioned, as indeed I have put it on the record time and time again, that this has been dealt with by the government of the United States and by the government of the United Kingdom. It has been dealt with by the governments of a number of the states of the American union; it has been dealt with by two or three provinces of this country; it has been dealt with by private organizations like the Canadian Pacific Railway and International Nickel. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway the supplement which is given to certain pensioners is, I admit, cut off at age 70 when old age security comes into effect, and there are other complaints in that connection which we have already registered. But the fact is that quite a number of employers and jurisdictions have recognized that they have a moral responsibility to their former employees with respect to their standard of living after their days of active service to their employers are over.

We have made the argument time and again, and I refer to it again tonight, that the rise in the cost of living is something that has to be faced by these people and we feel a greater responsibility in this regard rests upon the government than on private employers because the government has some control over the economy of the country and some control over the cost of living.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that not only does the government owe consideration to these people because the cost of living has gone up and because they cannot get by on their small pensions but I submit also that the time has come for the government to recognize with respect to its own retired employees that people who have served their day and generation and are living in retirement have a moral right to share in the improved conditions that are achieved even after they retire.

I am sure it is not inappropriate to draw a parallel between this situation and what one would do in any ordinary decent family. I am sure any family that had its parents living in the family home and was able to improve its standard of living, if the time came when the old folks were no longer working the younger members of the family would not take steps to keep the old folks on the old standard of living. The ordinary, decent and human thing to do would be to share the better fortune, the higher standing of living, with all the members of the family.

I suggest that that is a parallel to which we shall have to come in society as a whole. That, indeed, is the philosophy that underlies the contentions many of us have made across the years regarding old age pensions. Actually what we are asking is that people who worked in years gone by and helped build up the country should receive not just what they by their toil laid by in years past; in our view they should share in the productivity of the present.

I enunciate that principle so far as older people generally are concerned and I think it applies with particular force to the government in relation to its former employees. It is not good enough, Mr. Speaker, to rely on the argument about a contractual relation and to turn faithful employees out saying to them, "Now that your days of actual labour are over, do the best you can on whatever pension the contract provides you". The fact of the matter is that due to their service the country has moved on. Due to what they did in the past, the present and the future witness greater productivity. We contend that those who in the past did the work that helped to make possible the greater productivity of the present and the future have a right to share in that higher productivity.

I point out in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that it is not only those of us whose approach to this problem may be pretty heavily humanitarian who are thinking along these lines but that some pretty hard-headed business people are facing up to this angle of the pension problem; namely, that a pension scheme will not be completely satisfactory until it provides not just a fixed number of dollars at the time of retirement, that time being years in the future, but a pension scheme to be satisfactory must provide the kind of pension in the days that lie ahead that will enable a person to live decently in those future years.

I have in my hand a copy of one of the monthly bulletins published by William M. Mercer Limited. This is a private company with offices in various cities of Canada that helps other companies set up their pension plans and it deals generally in that line of business. As a matter of fact, these monthly bulletins which William M. Mercer Limited sends out contain a good deal of useful information about pensions and other matters.

I have with me this company's bulletin dated June 1956 which is marked volume 6, No. 6. After some comments on an aspect of this year's budget which had something to do with pension funds, this bulletin deals with this very problem about which we are talking tonight and says this:

> The philosophy adopted by many who have tried to think the problem through is: whatever the rules of a pension plan may say it is fundamentally different from an insurance contract—it must eventually provide pensions related to employees' earnings and costs of living at retirement. If the benefit formula does not do this, the plan will be amended from time to time (either unilaterally or through collective bargaining) so that this goal is achieved. The pension fund must be looked upon as an accumulation of securities which gives the employees an equity in the future productive capacity of Canada.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, that is very well put. What is important in a pension plan that is in effect now for people working in the fifties is not just that a certain number of dollars that mean something in 1956 will be available as a pension in 1970 but rather what is important is that a person working in 1956 and giving his best to his employer, the community and the nation will know that in 1970 he will enjoy a retirement based on Canada's productive capacity at that time. We have denied that principle to employees of this government who worked for the government in years gone by and are now retired. We condemn them under the slogan of a contractual relationship to a number of dollars that meant something in the forties or thirties even though that number of dollars means nothing today.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that there are two things that have to be done. First of all, I contend that the government has to find some way to make a plain ordinary supplement out of general revenue to these people who are now retired and whose pensions are in the lower brackets. But that will not be enough. In addition to that I contend that the government has to do some real hard thinking about its Public Service Superannuation Act to make sure that 10, 20, or 30 years from now the same problem will not arise again for the people who are now working and who at this moment think the pension they are going to earn will be quite adequate. I have no doubt that many of the people listed on page 785 of Hansard for this year who are receiving a pension of $70 or $80 a month thought in the days when they were working and foresaw the possibility of a $70 or $80 monthly pension that it was going to be very nice. They find that that is not the case today.

I repeat that there are two things to be done. On the one hand the government owes it in terms of morality and humanity and decency to the people now retired on these small pensions to supplement the pensions and bring them up to a decent figure, and in asking the government to do that we are asking them to do only what other governments, other jurisdictions and in many instances other employers have done already.

In addition to that I invite the government to give serious consideration to the principle or the philosophy suggested in the bulletin by William M. Mercer Limited, which I read, namely that a pension fund must be a means not just of storing up dollars based on one's past earnings but rather a means of providing employees with an equity in the future productive capacity of Canada.

Just to underline still further my contention that what we plead for is not only humanitarian, although surely that should be sufficient, but is also something to which people are giving thought in academic terms may I remind the minister of something that he probably knows, namely that this matter is being studied by experts in the professional institute which represents employees in the public service of Canada.

I have before me a very interesting article on this subject which makes a number of suggestions. The article is academic in nature and in my view is particularly well done, but because it is academic perhaps I can sum it up and give some of its suggestions to the minister just to indicate what some other people have thought about this problem and the solutions they offer. For example, it is suggested that one way to deal with the plight of superannuated civil servants whose pensions are inadequate is to supplement those pensions out of general revenue. So far as the immediate situation is concerned I think that is the only answer, but that is not a permanent answer because to do that today is to admit that 10 years from now it is going to have to be done again. In other words, the act is not completely satisfactory.

Another way to deal with this matter would be to put actuaries to work—this is suggested in the article to which I have made reference—to compute what is likely to be the rise in the cost of living, the rise in the standard of living and the rise in the productive capacity of Canada year by year during the years that lie ahead. It is difficult perhaps to be a prophet in this field, but actuaries have been able to achieve some rather accurate predictions with their research and study. It is suggested that it probably could be ascertained what additional premium or payment into the fund would be necessary by civil servants so as to provide an automatic increase in the pension after retirement of, shall we say, 2 per cent per year or whatever figure might be arrived at to compensate for the increased cost of living, on the one hand, and on the other hand to give to retired civil servants their share of the increased productive capacity of Canada.

That is one way it could be done and I suggest that it merits active consideration by the government. An amendment could be made to the act to provide for a slightly higher payment into the fund the purpose of which would be to guarantee to civil servants on retirement that although their pension at retirement would be at the figure arrived at by the computation set out in the act, it would go up by a fixed percentage each year from then on so that they would not have to worry about losing out in the scramble created by an increasing cost of living.

Another way, and this also has been suggested, in which this could be dealt with is by arranging for a special fund separate from the normal fund provided for by the Public Service Superannuation Act, and patterned something after the way in which supplementary unemployment insurance benefits were first brought in. I remind the minister and the government that when it was first decided to have unemployment insurance benefits of a supplementary nature for seasonal unemployment it was decided that there would be a slight extra contribution to provide for those supplementary benefits.

Similarly I suggest that it would be feasible to have a fund into which the working civil servants would contribute a small additional amount to make possible supplementary payments to those now retired. The return or quid pro quo to those now working for making that payment would be the knowledge that when they reached retirement the civil servants of that day would pay into a fund to provide whatever supplement was necessary for them. In that way our retired civil servants would continue to get their share of the increased productivity of the nation just the same as we contend that those working at any one time are entitled to an increasing share of the country's increasing productivity.

There is another suggestion which could be made in connection with this matter but which perhaps is a little more difficult to work out in connection with a government scheme. Investments might be made of certain kinds with regard to these funds so that the amount of money in the fund would reflect the increased earnings of the country at any time.

I could go into further details of these various plans but I need not do so because I think I have made my point that thought has been given to this, not just in terms of a humanitarian approach, although that should be sufficient, but also in terms of an academic approach. There are people who are studying this question because they realize the difficulties that exist. Although the government may think that the Public Service Superannuation Act is perfect, it has one sharp deficiency which is felt by hundreds or indeed by thousands of people right now and which will be felt by thousands more in the years that lie ahead.

Therefore it does seem to me that the statement which on February 21 the minister promised to make is one that should be made in the light of its importance. I hope he will arrange the business of the house tomorrow so that this can be dealt with without having another break. This matter has been interrupted time and time again during the session and I hope arrangements can be made so that he can deal with it in the morning and let the house know that the government is at last becoming aware of the seriousness of this problem, is at last becoming aware of the fact that something has to be done about it. I hope that the minister in his statement will not just repeat the negative answers which Mr. Ilsley and Mr. Abbott gave, but rather that he will indicate that the government knows that the time has come to do something about his problem.

I do no know just what the plans are for the moment, so I suppose I had better play safe and move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Harris: There is no possibility of going on with this debate tomorrow if that is what the hon. member had in mind.

Mr. Knowles: That being the case I had better move the adjournment of the debate, unless the minister is prepared to answer right now.

Mr. Harris: I am.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): There are two things which I think should be pointed out. If the minister speaks now he will close the debate and we would have to have consent for the minister to speak, it being after ten o'clock. Order. I hear several members saying "ten o'clock". Has the Minister of Finance permission to speak now?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Yes.

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): I hear "no".

On motion of Mr. Knowles the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, the business tomorrow will be as agreed upon, namely, the estimates of national defence, followed by defence production and northern affairs.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 18, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DUFRESNE—ALLEGED ALTERATION OF "HANSARD" OF JULY 16

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On Monday last, July 16, hon. members in this house heard the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), speaking on federal-provincial tax agreements, state that equalization payments made by the federal government to the provinces were "charitable gifts" or, as he said it in French, "des dons de charité". The Canadian Press and other parliamentary correspondents quoted in their respective newspapers these words of the hon. member for Hull. On looking at Hansard of the same date we find, however, that these words "charitable gifts" were replaced by the expression "merely an act of distributive justice", or in French "simplement un acte de justice distributive", which has an entirely different meaning than the words originally used in this house by the hon. member for Hull. That is to say, Mr. Speaker, Hansard has been changed once more for self-serving purposes beneficial to the hon. member for Hull.

I therefore suggest that the hon. member for Hull owes this house a full explanation for the unqualified change made in Hansard of July 16, stating where the authority for such a change to be made came from.

Furthermore, I request that the words actually used in this house by the hon. member for Hull be restored. Changing Hansard must not be permitted to become a contagious disease.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) is absent at the moment. I am sure he will take note of the remarks made by the hon. member and govern himself accordingly.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Dufresne: Now that the hon. member for Hull is back, not in his seat but near his seat—

Mr. Caron: It is none of your business.

Mr. Dufresne: —would he be in a position to help answer the question of privilege I raised a few minutes ago and give us an explanation of the change?

Mr. Caron: I prefer, since the question comes from the hon. member for Quebec West, to read what he actually said before I give an answer.

Mr. Dufresne: I think this matter is serious and I will, with the permission of the Speaker and the house, read the question of privilege I raised a few minutes ago.

Mr. Speaker: No; the hon. member has risen on a question of privilege and it is on the record. The hon. member for Hull was absent while the matter was being raised, and it is quite legitimate for the hon. member for Hull to read the remarks of the hon. member before he makes whatever explanation he cares to make.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—STATEMENT ON REPLY TO LETTER FROM PREMIER BULGANIN

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Hon. members will recall, Mr. Speaker, that on June 12 I tabled in the house the text of a letter addressed to me by Premier Bulganin on the question of disarmament. Similar messages, as hon. members know, were received by the heads of six other governments: United Kingdom, United States, France, Germany, Italy and Turkey.

Hon. members will observe that all recipients are members of the North Atlantic alliance; they felt that, before replies were dispatched, there should be full consultation with the other members of the organization which were concerned with the issues raised in these messages. My reply, which took full account of the views of our NATO partners, was transmitted on Monday, July 16. In accordance with the usual practice in these cases, we agreed upon a brief delay in making the text public and I am pleased now to lay copies of my letter before the house.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the letter of Mr. Bulganin to the government of Canada was known at the time it was presented, and in view of the very general interest in the subject, I wonder if the Prime Minister is in a position to summarize the nature of the reply he has made, short of actually reading the letter if he deems that is not advisable? It seems to me there is general interest in the subject and that the members of the house might wish to know the effect of what has been said to the Russian government in these circumstances.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Well, Mr. Speaker, I would not care to attempt to summarize the letter. The letter will be made public. It is now tabled and it will receive such publicity as the gentlemen of the press feel its importance would justify.

We do express the view that had there been such a reduction at the time the western powers were making their reductions in armaments ten years ago it would have been apt to produce greater satisfaction throughout the world; that notwithstanding this reduction it is still quite evident that the armed forces of the Soviet republics in Europe will still greatly exceed in numbers the armed forces of the western powers and that we cannot accept the charge that neither we nor the western powers have been making any effort to bring about disarmament; and that from the very inception of the establishment of the atomic energy agency Canada has been a member of it and has also been a member of the disarmament commission and that although the disarmament commission has not achieved great material results up to the present time we think it would be extremely unfortunate if its efforts to bring about a genuine system of progressive disarmament that would also progressively produce greater mutual confidence between the nations of the world were in any way hindered.

The situation as to the destructiveness of modern methods of warfare is making the problems of agreed disarmament more intractable, but there would still be a great opportunity to serve the whole of mankind by general agreement with respect to disarmament which would provide effective control and effective safeguards against surprise attacks.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the general interest in this topic I am wondering if the Prime Minister would not consider it wise to have this letter printed as an appendix to Hansard. I think that would be better than relying on the press. If the Prime Minister has no objection I suggest that that be done.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): I certainly have no objection. The letter is now a document before the house, and if it is the desire of the house to have it printed as an appendix to Hansard for the convenience of hon. members I certainly have no objection. Perhaps Mr. Speaker might ascertain whether that would be the desire of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Instead of having the letter appear as an appendix perhaps it could be placed in Hansard following the remarks of the Prime Minister. Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The letter follows:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa,
July 16, 1956.

His Excellency
Nikolai Bulganin,
Chairman of the Council of Ministers,
The Kremlin,
Moscow,
U.S.S.R.

Dear Mr. Chairman:

Thank you for your letter of June 6 on the question of disarmament with which you forwarded the statement of May 14 of the government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The government of Canada has given earnest consideration to the contents of your letter and the accompanying document.

We have noted with interest the announcement of reductions in the armed forces of the Soviet union to which you refer in your letter. However, our satisfaction over the announcement is somewhat tempered by the reflection that these reductions would have been more timely ten years ago, when the western powers demobilized the great armies they had brought together in the common interest of the United Nations, and that the Soviet union will continue, even after the reductions, to dispose of a far greater number of divisions in Europe than those which the western powers have stationed there. We have also, of course, considered your letter and the related documents in the light of a number of recent statements on the part of Soviet authorities concerning the modernization and expanding might of the Soviet armed forces.

It is because of such considerations that Canadian representatives have consistently expressed our firmly held view that, if they are to contribute to international confidence, reductions in forces should be part of an agreement providing for machinery to reassure all signatories that the reduction measures are in fact carried out. We believe that the need for such controls together with an adequate system for warning of preparations for surprise attack has become more pressing during the past few years when, as you observe in your letter, new and increasingly destructive weapons have been developed.

As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, Canada has been directly associated with the search for an agreement ever since the United Nations general assembly in its first resolution created the atomic energy commission and laid upon Canada, as a permanent member of the commission, a part of the continuing responsibility for finding a solution to the problem of disarmament. Our participation in the negotiations in that commission and more recently in the disarmament commission and its sub-committee has made us acutely aware of the difficulties which beset the problem; it has also enabled us to associate ourselves intimately with the repeated efforts and initiatives on the part of the western powers to bring about a general disarmament agreement. This is not the place to recapitulate these successive endeavours which stand in the records of the United Nations. However, you will understand, Mr. Chairman, that my colleagues and I are impelled to state that we cannot accept the charge of a negative stand, as alleged in your government's statement of May 14, on the part either of Canada or of the other western powers.

The government of Canada shares the regrets you have expressed that the discussions on disarmament have not been productive of agreement. However, it is our impression that the more recent negotiations, particularly in the sub-committee of the disarmament commission, have given some cause for encouragement. We therefore differ with the stated views of your government that the discussions in the sub-committee have been marked by futility. It would, in our opinion, be unfortunate if these negotiations were to be interrupted. We favour the continuation of efforts through the United Nations to reach an agreement covering limitation, reduction and control of armaments including nuclear weapons. We consider that discussions in the sub-committee of the disarmament commission as well as in the commission itself are more than ever necessary in order to reach an agreement which will ensure the security of all by means of an adequate system of international control.

It is the belief of the government of Canada that the international situation which we hope ultimately to achieve can be created only through the establishment of greater mutual confidence progressively and by stages. In any comprehensive program directed to that end there should be arrangements designed not only to cover disarmament and control but also to solve urgent political questions, in particular the reunification of Germany and the problem of European security.

The government of Canada is strongly of the opinion that if a mutually satisfactory agreement on disarmament can be negotiated an important contribution will have been made to the development of greater confidence between nations. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that for our part, we will continue to exert every effort in negotiations within the framework of the United Nations to draw closer to an agreed solution. We are the more prepared to make these efforts to reach agreement because of our conviction that the disarmament problem is becoming even more intractable with the passage of time but that, if there is a corresponding willingness to co-operate in these negotiations on the part of the Soviet government, significant and gratifying results can still be attained.

Yours sincerely,
(Sgd.) Louis S. St-Laurent.

ALLEGED COMMUNIST INVESTMENT IN UNITED STATES THROUGH CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him whether or not the evidence of Chairman J. S. Armstrong, of the United States security and exchange commission, given before the United States Senate committee has been brought to his attention, to the effect that Canada may be being used by the communists for the investment of money in American industry? Has he ever heard of any suggestion along that line and has any complaint been made by the United States government or has any investigation with regard thereto been made by the United States government?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have read the evidence in question. We are looking into the matter. However, to my knowledge, no matter of this kind has been referred to us as a complaint or otherwise by the United States government. We are making inquiries.

STARRED QUESTIONS

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—WIRE AND CABLE

Question No. 59—Mr. McCullough (Moose Mountain):

1. What was the cost of the investigation, under the Combines Investigation Act, into the alleged combine in the manufacture, distribution and sale of electrical wire and cable products?
2. What was the cost of the prosecutions against the companies found guilty under the act?
3. What is the approximate estimate of undue profits made by these companies during the period when they were found guilty of breaches of the act?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer to the first of the hon. gentleman's questions is that the cost of the electrical wire and cable products investigation, not including general office administration, was $40,581.20.

The answer to the second question is that the cost of the electrical wire and cable products prosecution, not including general office administration, was $34,889.41.

The answer to the third question is that no estimate of undue profits could be made. The anti-combines legislation assumes, and I believe rightly so, that if competition is allowed to operate resources will be best employed, cost-saving innovations will be most quickly adopted and prices to the public will be the lowest. Where competition has not been allowed to operate, it is almost always impossible to determine accurately, from the records or other evidence available, what portions of total net profits of the accused corporations during the period in question are attributable to the lessening or elimination of competition by the accused corporation.

Questions

PUBLIC SERVICE INSURANCE

Question No. 60—Mr. Knowles:

1. Are civil servants or other government employees who are entitled to life insurance or a death benefit under part II of the Public Service Superannuation Act provided with any card, certificate or other document to show that they are covered by such protection?
2. If not, will consideration be given to the issuing of such a card, certificate or other document so that such employees might have evidence of such protection?

Mr. Benidickson, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Finance: In the absence of the minister, I wonder if the hon. member would allow this question to stand.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

Question stands.

QUESTION

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Question No. 437—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many orders in council are in existence which, while not classified as secret, have not had their contents made public?
2. On what date or dates were such orders in council issued?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There is on the order paper, and there has been for some time, question No. 437, which was placed there by the hon. member for Prince Albert and about which the clerk of the privy council and I have had some conversations with him. He has suggested that he would prefer that I make a preliminary oral answer rather than make it in written form at this time. The question is:

1. How many orders in council are in existence which, while not classiffied as secret, have not had their contents made public?
2. On what date or dates were such orders in council issued?

It is not possible to give a meaningful answer to this question due to the difficulty in determining what orders in council could be said to be in existence and which of those have had their contents made public. A good many hundreds of orders have been passed each year for many, many years, and the great majority of those have never been revoked. The majority of them, of course, are spent in the sense that the actions which they authorized have been taken and they no longer have any current significance. They remain, however, I suppose technically in existence as the authority for the action which was taken at the time. Serious practical difficulties have been encountered in endeavouring to determine what orders could be said to have had their contents made public otherwise than with respect to those that are published in the Gazette, part II, statutory orders and regulations.

The problem arises from the fact that a great many orders, particularly those of an administrative character, are not published in the sense of being printed in the Canada Gazette, but each is made known to those concerned with it and is normally available for inspection by anyone interested in its content. Such orders range, for example, from those that are printed in the Queen's Regulations and Orders for the Royal Canadian Navy, the army and the air force, which are of course very widely circulated in printed form. And then there are specific orders such as one, for example, that authorizes the construction of a wharf under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, of which properly certified copies are supplied to the applicant and others who may have any legal need for such copies.

There are also many orders relating to matters purely within the public service and a variety of administrative orders authorizing the entry by ministers, departments or agencies into contracts, land transactions and like matters. We could not tell without a diligent search of departmental records in each case whether those individual orders have ever been made public in any particular interpretation of that term. In some cases it will have been simply by chance that someone may have asked for an order in which he was interested; whereas other orders of a similar kind are not asked for and have not been made known except by those directly concerned with them.

All these orders, of course, have been listed in the summary that has been made available to parliament since July 1, 1948, and those which members of parliament have asked for, based upon the summary, have been provided except in the very few cases of the type that was mentioned earlier in this session and about which I spoke on January 31, as recorded on pages 701 and 702 of Hansard. Those were orders concerning transactions with other governments, and which were not secret orders but which it was felt out of courtesy to the other governments should not be widely publicized, but about which I declared they would be communicated confidentially to any hon. member who might be interested. I have had a count made of the number of orders of that kind that have been passed since I spoke in the house on January 31 and which it may be that the hon. gentleman had in mind in his question of April 20 last, and perhaps which he still has in mind. These are orders which, of course, we are prepared to make available confidentially to members but about which we would not wish to give wide publicity because of the interest of other governments concerned in the transaction to which each one of these orders refers. The number of these since January 31 is 12, eight of which authorized the transfer of mutual aid supplies to NATO countries, and four of which authorized the sale of material in defence stores under section 11 of the National Defence Act.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman who asked the question could consider the difficulties I have outlined and let me know what he would be interested in and I can assure him that we shall make every effort to supply such information as he feels it would be proper to have placed on the records of this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if it is permissible to ask a question at this time I should like to do so. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister to the effect that there are many orders in council which it is impossible for the privy council to know are or are not in effect now or have been exhausted, would the Prime Minister consider placing in the Canada Gazette a record or list of all orders in council that have not been published as yet which amend, suspend or abrogate any statute or portion of a statute so that the people of Canada may know exactly what the law is and, if the law has been changed other than by parliament, the manner and the degree to which the changes have been made.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to have the cumulative index that is made of part II of the Canada Gazette arranged in such a fashion as to provide that information. The hon. gentleman knows there are several statutes which provide that the governor in council may make some variation in their application. I think all of those are published in the statutory orders and regulations. I will have a diligent search made and should there be any that are not published in the statutory orders and regulations I will endeavour to have the cumulative index arranged in a fashion to indicate it.

I would assume that the hon. gentleman would not ask that that should cover the matters within the civil service where there are variations made in the application of the civil service regulations but rather those that have any general application to the Canadian public.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, so that the public may know the law at any one time.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): In order that we may make it as convenient as possible to refer to anything that has a general application.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CANADA COUNCIL

Motion No. 93—Mr. Regier:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister or any cabinet minister and any person or persons and organizations, since January 1, 1950 to date, regarding the establishment of a Canada Council.

Motion agreed to.

WATER RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF MEETING WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) or possibly the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any date has yet been set for the meeting that was to be held between officials of the Canadian government and the United States government to discuss, among other things, problems relating to international waters?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No date has yet been set, but discussions have been taking place with the United States government with a view to agreeing on the date.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the composition of the Canadian delegation to deal with this particular subject of international waters been decided on?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE CROWN CORPORATION—APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL MANAGER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) if he is yet in a position to answer my question of last Friday concerning Mr. Bartram?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked last Friday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to the appointment of Mr. Victor G. Bartram as general manager of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation I can give the following information:

Mr. Bartram is chairman of the board of directors of Shawinigan Chemicals Limited and a director of St. Maurice Chemicals Limited, B. A. Shawinigan Limited and Canadian Resins and Chemicals Limited. His positions as chairman of the board of Shawinigan Chemicals Limited and director of the above mentioned companies terminate in March, 1957. I wish to point out that there is no relationship between Mr. Bartram's position as general manager of the crown corporation and his association with the above mentioned companies. Mr. Bartram will be responsible for monitoring the loan to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and for laying the necessary groundwork for the construction of the northern Ontario section of the line as well as supervising construction when this phase is reached. In carrying out these duties he will be responsible to and take direction from the directors of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation, who in turn are civil servants appointed by and responsible to the government.

I repeat that none of Mr. Bartram's duties with the crown corporation will have any connection whatsoever with the companies of which he is a director. The duties and responsibilities of the officials and directors of the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation are clearly laid down in the act, and the terms and conditions upon which they shall operate are further set out in detail in the indenture of mortgage with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited and other agreements between that company and the Canadian government. I might say that Mr. Bartram is serving without pay and will continue to do so until he is free from all other engagements.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Is it not a fact that B. A. Shawinigan Limited, of which Mr. Bartram is president according to the statement just made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is owned in part by British American Oil, which through its ownership of Canadian Gulf is interested in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines because of the fact that Canadian Gulf owns over 300,000 shares of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines stock? I ask again the question I asked on Friday, does the government think it is appropriate—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): It is true that B.A. Oil is a shareholder in B.A. Shawinigan, and it is true that Gulf is a shareholder in B.A. Oil, but it seems to me that it is following a very devious line of thought to suggest that that association as shareholders would influence the position of a man engaged by the crown company to undertake totally different duties. My hon. friend seems to have a curious idea of the morality of people that have risen to the top in Canadian industry if he thinks otherwise.

Mr. Knowles: On the basis of my idea of morality, whatever the Minister of Trade and Commerce thinks of it, I ask him whether he thinks it is appropriate for an official to sit on both sides of the table?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is no sitting on both sides of the table. Mr. Bartram's sole engagement is to see that the government gets value for advances by way of loan to the pipe-line company. Responsibility for his decisions in that regard is taken by his board of directors, and the ultimate responsibility is taken by myself as the responsible minister. This idea seems to be a fixed idea of the hon. member—that the crown company can go out on the street and hire a man without any background and get more reliable service from such a man than from a man who has been through all stages of an industry in this country, has risen to the top and has retired with considerable kudos attaching to his past experience.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask a supplementary question? Does the minister mean to inform the house that there is only one man who is capable of acting as chairman of this company, when he says that you cannot go out on the street and pick someone up? Are there not other men who have had experience and so on and who are in no way connected with any company which has commitments with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): A man that is not connected with any company is one of the army of unemployed, and as such, in this country at this time, I do not want him.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister is taking me up the wrong way. I did not say "not connected with any company". I said "not connected with any company involved in this trans-Canada pipe line."

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): If my hon. friend will suggest some names that will compare in experience with the name of Mr. Victor Bartram, I should be glad to look them over, but I have always gotten on fairly well by backing my own judgment. My judgment is that Mr. Bartram is the best man available to take that position.

Mr. Coldwell: Of course we do not always agree with the minister's judgment.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I know that. Thank goodness for that.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question. Is it not also a fact that Mr. Bartram is a director of Shawinigan Water and Power Company which is owned substantially by the Power Corporation of Canada which also has shares in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): No, sir.

Mr. Knowles: —and that there are other connections as well that involve Mr. Bartram with the private company on the other side of the table?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Bartram is the chairman of the board of Shawinigan Chemicals Limited which in turn is owned by—I think it is a wholly owned subsidiary of Shawinigan Water and Power. Shawinigan Water and Power Company is one of the largest utilities in Canada. It is owned by practically everybody in Canada. Whether the corporation in question has a comparatively small holding in it, I do not know. But as I say again, I cannot worry about the devious mind which my hon. friend brings to bear on these matters. If he were equally scrupulous about some of the questions he has raised in the house, I think we would have less to worry about.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask the minister if he will investigate this matter and ascertain to what extent the Power Corporation of Canada does own the Shawinigan Water and Power Company? The minister says it may have some small holding. My information is that it has a substantial holding and that in turn it has a substantial holding in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I did all the investigating of Mr. Bartram's associations that I thought was necessary before we asked him to join Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. I will therefore make no further investigations. If my hon. friend continues to think about it as he does, he can continue to think so.

TRANSPORT

REPORTED PROTEST OVER SPEED OF TRAINS IN GREATER OTTAWA AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It is predicated upon the news that came out yesterday that some members of the Ottawa council are placing some responsibility on the Minister of Transport for trains speeding at crossings in the greater Ottawa area. May I ask the minister this question. Has he received any representation in respect to this matter? In any event, what action does the department expect to take in the matter?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I read the report last night in the newspaper and, from the circumstances that seemed to be related in the newspaper account, I would say that the railway concerned was not one that falls under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport.

As to the second part of the question, whether any representations have been received by me, the answer is no. No representations on the subject have been received. Until representations are made, I think I should not take any action.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

420 SQUADRON, LONDON—STATEMENT ON REVISION OF DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) asked me what the plans of the Royal Canadian Air Force are in respect of 420 auxiliary squadron at London.

In reply I may say that following withdrawal of 420 auxiliary squadron from its flying role, arrangements are now being made to convert it to an aircraft control and warning squadron.

Aircraft control and warning squadrons are essential elements of the ground control organization of the air defence system. Their functions are to man and operate the radars and associated communications for the detection and warning relating to unidentified aircraft and for the control of friendly aircraft and defensive interceptors within the air defence system. The auxiliary units provide back-up of the regular squadrons by maintaining trained fighter aircraft controllers, radarscope operators and operations room staff.

CIVIL DEFENCE

PARTICIPATION OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT IN EVACUATION EXERCISE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare in connection with the major civil defence exercise proposed for Canada late this month. Will this house be offered an opportunity to set an example to the rest of Canada by participating in the evacuation exercise or any other aspect of the civil defence operation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, apart altogether from the relation of my hon. friend's question to civil defence, may I say to him that I believe the whole nation would be interested in a quick evacuation of this house.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is what we have been trying to tell you for weeks. Dissolve it.

Mr. Martin: There is a difference between dissolution and evacuation. With regard to the question which my hon. friend quite properly asks, may I say this. The nature of this particular exercise is to test the communications of civil defence in a number of our Canadian communities. It will involve the use of some 5,000 civil defence workers in accordance with arrangements made with the civil defence authorities in the United States. I am sure that my hon. friend, who studies these matters with great care, will appreciate the significance of my reply.

CRIMINAL LAW

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION RESPECTING CRIMINAL SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. E. Lennard (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. Is he in a position now to state when the McRuer report will either be tabled or published?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, perhaps before I attempt to answer my hon. friend's question I should inquire which McRuer report he means. The hon. chief justice of the trial division of Ontario is chairman of two separate commissions. Which one has the hon. member in mind?

Mr. Lennard: The one on criminal sexual psychopaths.

Mr. Garson: I thought that was the one he had in mind, but before I gave an answer to that one which would be inappropriate to the other inquiry, of which the chief justice is chairman, I thought I had better make sure. With regard to that one about which he has inquired, may I say that I understand that a draft majority report has already been made and that work is now being done on a minority report.* We will table them as soon as they become available.

* See amended statement on page 6155.

[Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace).]

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED DELAY IN APPOINTMENT OF JUDGE FOR BRUCE COUNTY, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. On July 13 I asked the question of the house leader and he said that he would draw it to the attention of the Minister of Justice. The question was with respect to the reason for the delay in appointing a judge for Bruce county.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must admit with some embarrassment that there is some fault attributable to me in this matter because of my having been absent due to illness. I hope we shall be able to make an appointment within the next fortnight.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. When may I expect a return tabled in connection with No. 88 with reference to lighthouses?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I shall have to make inquiries to find out what the state of the return is.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

TEESWATER, ONT.—CONSTRUCTION OF NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. Robinson (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have another question. I wish to direct this one to the Minister of Public Works, or in his absence the parliamentary assistant may take it as notice. Can he bring us up to date on what plans have been carried out up to now in connection with the new post office in Teeswater which the department is intending to build this year?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will take my hon. friend's question as notice and will give an answer later on.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

235. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $143,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,470,423,461 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,675,484,744 will come due for payment in future years), $1,722,797,717.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that a considerable period of time has elapsed since we discussed the estimates of my department on June 20, 21 and 22, it seems appropriate and desirable for me to deal with some of the points and observations made during that period of debate before we resume the debate today. I should like, therefore, to comment on a number of matters arising out of the debate in that three day period.

I should like to make some remarks with respect to the white paper. It seems to me that there is a certain amount of misapprehension about the nature of the white paper. I must say I was considerably surprised at a number of comments made by opposition members. I think the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said the white paper was out of date and did not reflect the changes which had taken place. The Leader of the Opposition said the paper says nothing and it could have been taken out of the record of several years ago. The hon. member for Cape Breton South said it leaves much to be desired. There were certain other derogatory remarks but I think the high, or low, depending on which way you look at it, was reached in a remark made by the hon. member for Nanaimo, who referred to it as a piece of impudence.

It is not my idea that the white paper is formulated to announce policy, but rather to provide members of parliament and the public with general background details and comprehensive statistics about our defence program and about its progress during the past year. Its 50-odd pages dealt with facts and figures for the three services, the defence research board and the activities of the department generally. It deals with various subjects which we consider are of interest both to hon. members and to the public, such as manpower, construction, equipment, etc. I have never regarded the white paper as a policy statement for the future nor a prophecy in respect of things to come. So far as policy statements are concerned, I believe they should be made in the house and I endeavoured to do that in my opening remarks. I may also observe that I do not know how popular or well known it is, but the department also publishes an annual report of 90-odd pages based on the fiscal year, whereas the white paper is based on the calendar year. In view of all that has been said and of the existence of these two documents, my present intention with respect to the future would be to combine these documents into a single publication at a considerable saving in labour and money and endeavour to make it available in the early spring of each year for the previous calendar year. I think in doing that we would be more or less following the precedent which has been set by my colleague the Minister of Defence Production. In any event, in coming to any final conclusion I will be glad to consider any observations hon. members may still care to make.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich raised a number of matters about which he asked for information, and two of them had to do with mutual aid. He expressed some surprise that there was a contemplated reduction in mutual aid and also expressed surprise at the intimation which was contained in my speech that NATO air training would probably be adjusted downward commencing in 1958. Dealing first with the reduction in mutual aid, I would point out that our mutual aid effort now totals over $1,275 million. It was first instituted somewhat after world war II to provide from existing equipment for our NATO allies defence forces. They had bodies and uniforms, but they did not have very much equipment. Later, it was extended into the field of aircraft. We are now reaching a stage where the primary objectives have been pretty well met and our problem now, in relation to our NATO allies, is how to assist in keeping the equipment of their forces modern. We do not have to take the leading part in that because many of them have developed industrial capacity to take care of their own needs. Having regard to the fact that the equipment we now transfer to our NATO allies is from new production in our own country, I think that $143 million in the current year is very substantial assistance.

With regard to NATO air training, to which I made reference in my opening speech, we have now completed discussions with the military authority of NATO and most of the NATO countries have built up their air crew requirements to the desired level. They have developed their own training facilities to the point where they can look after their own needs. In view of the increasing cost of defence in our own country it is proposed that we will now close the air training scheme for most nations beginning in 1958 with the exception of three smaller countries in respect of which we hope to work out some further method of continuing assistance.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich wanted to know how many of the 23,000 militia troops taking summer training were training in units, and how many were taking individual courses. The figures show that about 95 per cent of the militia in training will train as units and the remainder will undertake special courses or training duties. The hon. member also asked as to what steps were being taken to develop a modern short range fighter to succeed the Sabre. The Sabre jet is, of course, primarily a United States development, although it was considerably improved in Canada when equipped with an Orenda engine. Since we never have, in Canada, developed a short range day interceptor, while other nations have, when the time comes to replace the Sabre we will have an ample field from which to select, depending of course on the nature of our needs then. It is not, therefore, a matter of importance at the moment. If we require one at that time we would do as we did before, because of the choice available among day fighters.

The hon. gentleman also stated that he had no criticism in respect of construction of the D.E.W. line, but he questioned the desirability, or the need, of establishing the mid-Canada line. The function of the D.E.W. line is to give warning of impending attack, of course, and to provide the maximum possible warning to the strategic air force and to the civil authorities. The mid-Canada line has the function of confirming the warning of attack and of indicating the direction in which it is heading and of alerting the air defence forces in more detail to get in a position to meet the attack.

The "Pinetree" line provides for control of interceptor counter-attack against attacking enemy forces. The whole of the system forms one vast network linked up by a very comprehensive system of communication. The mid-Canada line, therefore, is an integral and necessary part of our warning system, as is any other part of the system.

A number of other hon. members have also discussed various aspects of our radar line, especially the mid-Canada and D.E.W. lines, and our air defence system. Those hon. members who have had difficulty in understanding what I said about the system in my opening remarks on my estimates might very well look at the statement made in this house by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on the necessity of our radar network. I think he hit the central point of the matter by stressing that you must look at the system as a whole. I would add that that is the way continental defence was planned. For obvious reasons we started by building that part of the warning and control system nearest to our industrial areas, namely, the "Pinetree" system. This experience indicated that for the next phase of the joint project it would be preferable if Canada constructed the mid-Canada line and the United States undertook the construction of and responsibility for the D.E.W. line.

The hon. member for Nanaimo asked whether we are prepared to integrate our development and research facilities with those of the United Kingdom. Well, we have been doing that now for some years. Perhaps I might point out in that connection that the defence research board has scientific advisers and representatives in both London and Washington on the Canadian joint staff. Our representative in London at the present time is Mr. E. L. Davies, who was until recently deputy chairman of our own defence research board in Canada here. I might also point out that here in Canada we have scientific representatives of the United Kingdom and of the United States co-operating with our own research and development people. I can assure the committee that our liaison in this field has been very successful and useful, and it is based on the principle that Canada concentrates on those research and development projects for which we have unique resources and facilities, or for which there is a specific Canadian military need.

The hon. member for Peace River made some kindly references to the work of the bureau of current affairs and suggested that we should work closely with colleges and universities in that connection. It is encouraging to know that what we are doing is regarded as a step in the right direction, and I want to thank him for his kindly references. I may say that the bureau does work in close co-operation with universities and professional groups in this country and has done so since its inception. For example, last year the bureau sponsored some 780 lectures on Canadian and international affairs at armed forces establishments at home and abroad. The majority of the lecturers were from our universities, professional or cultural organizations. The essence of our current affairs program is the encouragement of discussion groups and the development of discussion group leaders at what we might call the barrack room and mess deck level, and we have found the result most encouraging.

The hon. member for Peace River also stated that he had heard there are piles of good equipment in some armouries which could be used for militia training and that the use is denied to men associated with the militia. Our policy is to equip the regular forces first with certain new standard types of equipment as soon as it becomes available and when this necessary priority has been met to replace similar equipment in the militia. This program is being steadily carried forward and I am advised by my own officials that the equipment used in the militia is today being steadily modernized and made available in greater quantities. I am also advised that this equipment is all being used regularly. If the hon. member or any other hon. member knows of circumstances otherwise I would be grateful if he would let me have the particulars so that any specific case might be looked into.

The hon. member for Oxford asked a number of questions with regard to naval ships. Perhaps they might have been more appropriately asked when we come to the naval estimates, but since they have been asked I should be glad to deal with some of them now. He inquired with respect to the navy's two cruisers, the Quebec and the Ontario. These ships were reconditioned following world war II and have played an important role in giving very large numbers of officers and men sea training. By now the increase in the number of naval vessels in commission available for training, as well as for other duties, can carry out a good deal of this work more economically than H.M.C.S. Quebec, and that ship is now being placed in reserve. The Ontario has been converted to train junior officers at sea. The Venture plan cadets have already received valuable training aboard this ship.

The hon. member also asked some questions about the conversion of destroyers and frigates. The approximate cost of conversion, including refitting, runs about $4 million each for the Crescent class destroyers, and $5½ million each for the Tribals. The life expectancy of these ships is something over 20 years from the date of their construction, as is the case in respect of frigates.

Modernization of our frigates costs approximately $3½ million. The Royal Canadian Navy has not converted any destroyers to frigates or vice versa.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South and several other hon. members have discussed various aspects of manpower, and I think it might be helpful to the committee if I make a number of observations on the subject, amplifying what I said at the opening of the discussion of my estimates.

Our objective is to have forces of about the right size for carrying out the defence commitments that this country has undertaken. The approximate balance between intake and wastage last year was about what we expected, because the emphasis has been on the qualitative and long-term career aspects of the regular forces. Our selection procedures, both for initial engagements and for re-engagements, are steadily improving and I think it is significant that now about two men out of every three offered re-engagement in our forces are accepting.

The hon. member for Calgary North mentioned the maximum strength figure of 120,000. The breakdown of that figure was given in the white paper last year at page 22, but as it was the result of an appraisal made some time ago, perhaps I should say a few words about each of the services in the light of current developments.

To begin with, a peacetime maximum strength figure is not a target to be reached as an end in itself. Rather, it is a means to an end, a planning limit within which the services agree to work out the details of their programs to enable us successfully to carry out our commitments.

In the case of the navy, this year's estimates provide for a slight increase over last year's average strength, but still within the ceiling. There have been no naval developments which were not foreseen reasonably accurately when that figure was agreed on.

Similarly, for the air force, provision is made for some increase this year, again within the ceiling. But I should like to point out that, having regard particularly to the formation of additional CF-100 squadrons which I mentioned on June 20, a careful reappraisal of the air force position is being made.

In respect of the army I would like to stress what I thought I made clear last year, and this applies both to the regular army and to the militia, that we on this side of the house have never subscribed to the nonsense which has been talked about abolishing our ground forces. Our army undoubtedly has an essential role to carry out and our efforts are being directed now to seeing that it will be in the best possible shape for carrying out its role.

In the coming year our emphasis on the qualitative aspects of selection and training may result in a small further decrease in total army strength as we work toward increasing flexibility and mobility and a more compact and effective army, but taking the regular army and the militia together we have and expect to continue to have a force of something between 85,000 and 90,000 men.

Perhaps I should also add that the cadet component affiliated with the army has for some time been close to its ceiling of 65,000 and we have recently authorized an increase in this ceiling to 75,000, thus bringing to 107,500 the total ceiling for cadets of the three services.

There is only one other point that I would like to make at this time. When you look at the size of the regular forces in particular, you must also take into account our civilian establishment. When we take on civilian employees to cover off positions formerly filled by service personnel, those service personnel are freed for other duties. Apart from some economies involved, this has also been a factor in decreasing the pressure to revise service maximum strengths upward. But our objective for both service and civilian personnel is to employ only that number of persons who are required to meet this country's defence needs and to do it by achieving that balance between the military and civilian which results in the best interests of over-all efficiency. Perhaps I might add that our ratio of approximately one civilian for every 2·1 servicemen compares favourably with the setup in the United States and the United Kingdom.

The Leader of the Opposition referred at some length in his remarks and with great gusto—more gusto than conviction, I thought—to some allegations in a magazine article written recently by the former chief of the general staff. When I asked the Leader of the Opposition whether he was quoting from this article with approval he stated, as reported at page 5250 of Hansard:

> Mr. Chairman, I am not giving blanket approval to this article; I disagree with many opinions expressed by General Simonds.

This was, I suspect, the voice of caution checking the ardour of enthusiasm.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, I think it is appropriate that at this moment I interject that what I had said was that there had been articles written by senior officers who had just recently left their duties and that there should be an opportunity to examine those statements and that it was not the responsibility of any hon. member to say whether or not they were correct, that we could not know.

Mr. Campney: Well, I am not trying to requote the hon. member's speech but the impression that he very clearly gave me was the one I just expressed that he was not too sure how choice a political morsel this might prove to be.

Mr. Drew: That, of course, is not a correct interpretation at all of what was said. I might say, Mr. Chairman, it is dealing very lightly with statements made by senior officers who were recently relied upon by this present minister. What I was pointing out is that we should have an opportunity to examine the accuracy of those statements before a committee and I asked for that committee at a time when it still could have been appointed.

Mr. Campney: If the Leader of the Opposition will let me continue with my remarks I will deal, I think seriously enough, with these observations.

May I say at once that I have no quarrel whatever with the former chief of the general staff now, nor did I have one in the past. As I have already stated, I believe he was an able and efficient chief of the general staff and so far as I am aware our relations were of the best. He has now retired and as a Canadian citizen he is free to write what he chooses. Canada is still a free country. That does not mean, of course, that I or anyone else must agree with what he writes. He is simply expressing his own personal views as he is, of course, absolutely free to do, and I might add that these views are merely expressions of opinion and not necessarily statements of fact. I would call that particularly to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition, who apparently from his remarks was seeking to create an impression otherwise.

I think it might perhaps be helpful to the committee if I were to outline the duties of the chief of staff of any service and his relationship to other chiefs of staff and to departmental officials in the larger setting of the department and its responsibilities to the government and to the country.

A chief of staff of any service must be intensely interested in his own service. He must be zealous for the welfare of his own service and he must be eager for its development. If this were not so he would hardly be fitted to be a chief of staff of that service. Under such conditions he might like to be left alone without controls or restrictions, unhampered to pursue the administration and development of his own service along his own lines. Unfortunately for that point of view the situation is not as simple as that. The pressure of events defence-wise, the complicated nature of present-day defence, the necessity of establishing defence priorities, the complexity of defence problems pressing in day by day, the interrelation of service planning and of NATO planning have made it increasingly necessary—very necessary indeed—that chiefs of staff work closer and closer to each other, that each has a fuller knowledge of what is going on in the other services than was once the case, and that they co-ordinate their efforts more and more.

I think it was the hon. member for Calgary North who suggested that the army and the air force might eventually be amalgamated, adopting a view along the line of that of Lord Montgomery.

The pressure of these events has also made it necessary that the moneys available are properly allocated as between the services because the present-day costs of all items of equipment are very great indeed and that priorities be established in respect of defence projects with the knowledge and understanding of all chiefs of staff.

With the advent of the defence research board the chairman of that body, in view of his duties affecting all services, obviously should be a party to any discussions of military policy. Arising out of the necessities of the case as I have briefly outlined, the chiefs of staff committee, following the last war, was reorganized with an independent chairman. It was also considered desirable for obvious reasons that the deputy minister of the department, a representative of the Department of External Affairs and the secretaries to the cabinet should be members attending meetings of the chiefs of staff committee in order that their respective departments may be kept informed, departmental misunderstandings prevented and wise planning facilitated. However, and this I would emphasize, only the chairman, the chiefs of staff of the three services and the chairman of the defence research board tender military advice to the minister; the others who attend have only watching briefs and in fact attend only when requested.

The chiefs of staff committee has proven highly useful and its efforts have been very successful. This is true to such an extent that last year our setup was taken as the model for the establishment in Great Britain of a chiefs of staff committee similar to our own. Of course, the establishment of the chiefs of staff committee has interfered to some extent with the independence of individual chiefs of staff, in my view necessarily and desirably so, because defence today is too large, too complicated and too expensive a matter for it to be otherwise. I think that must be obvious to all hon. members who have participated in the discussion of our estimates and who follow our activities.

But, and I again want to emphasize this, the various chiefs of staff are not in any way interfered with in the internal conduct and administration of their own respective services, nor indeed are they limited to their activities outside of their own services to their places on the chiefs of staff committee as regards their influence on the formulating of military policy. They can always see me as minister individually with respect to their problems, and they do so in fact very frequently.

Moreover, the chiefs of staff are all members of the defence council. The defence council is a body over which I preside as minister and which formulates and decides interservice administrative policy. The views of the chiefs of staff are always given the fullest consideration by the defence council.

In addition, the chiefs of staff all attend meetings of the cabinet defence committee. The cabinet defence committee consists of several cabinet ministers, including me, under the chairmanship of the Prime Minister, who meet with the chiefs of staff and other senior officials and service members to discuss matters of major military importance so that it may make suitable recommendations to the full cabinet. The chiefs of staff are free to participate and do participate very fully in the discussions at meetings of this committee of cabinet.

Then, too, the chiefs of staff are represented by their vice-chiefs on the permanent joint defence board which is made up of representatives of Canada and the United States. This board since its formation in 1940 has contributed greatly to the solution of military problems affecting both Canada and the United States and has built up an excellent record of achievement through the years. It is a purely advisory board, not concerned with policy but only with working out joint arrangements once policy has been settled by the governments concerned. I am in fact surprised that anyone would criticize this board in view of the yeoman service it has rendered in the field of Canadian-United States relations.

It supplements but does not interfere with direct contacts between the chiefs of staff of the two countries. Any chief of staff of this country is free to meet and discuss matters with his opposite number in the United States whenever and as often as he desires to do so, and the converse is equally true. Such meetings as a matter of fact occur frequently. No closer or better relationship would be possible than that between our chiefs of staff and those of the United States collectively and individually.

I thought it desirable under the circumstances to take this much time to outline the position of the chiefs of staff of the services under our system of government in order to make clear that while they are responsible to their civil chief—me at the moment—and I would not expect anyone would wish to change that principle, they are still clothed with very wide power and responsibility in their respective services and they are consulted at every turn in respect to the development of military policy.

May I say in concluding my observations on this particular matter that speaking from my own experience I have found national defence headquarters to be well organized and efficient in its operation. I believe it would under the strain of hostilities, if they should ever occur, meet such strain without any difficulty and carry on thereafter in the manner that would be expected by the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Calgary North complained that the arms of the army are almost as they were during the last war. That charge is really incorrect. In saying that, I might point out that there are very few areas of army equipment in which we have not made improvements since the end of the second world war. We have a complete new range of combat vehicles; a new range of greatly improved wireless equipment; a new tank; a new mortar; a new anti-tank rocket; new field medium and anti-aircraft artillery; a new flame thrower; and we hope shortly to be producing or purchasing new hand grenades and a new submachine gun, and of course will shortly be taking into use the new FN rifle. I think it can be said that seldom has so much progress been made in the short span of ten years.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris complained of a lack of information. Knowing of his desire always to be fair I was rather sorry to hear him say that, because since I have been minister of this department one of the things which I have zealously tried to carry out is to provide information in answer to all questions which have been asked. In fact I can recall only two occasions when information was withheld and that was for security reasons. I may say that I have always endeavoured to answer hon. members' questions, not only fully but promptly. I would have thought that my efforts in that direction might at least have been noted.

However, the hon. member made up for his lack of observation, if such it was, by the interest which he expressed in the Royal Canadian Air Force, and particularly his reference to incentive pay, which he will be pleased to know is under active consideration at the present time, and also with respect to his remarks about the radar network. So perhaps I can leave his remarks for the present with the honours evenly divided.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked why we should be developing the CF-105 interceptor. Very briefly I may say that even when the intercontinental missile era has arrived, which personally I think will be much longer from now than some of the columnists think, it is not anticipated that aerial warfare will be exclusively a guided missile war. Guided missiles are very difficult to make and to use, and a great deal of development is still required. The continued development and production of manned long-range bombers in Russia as is going on now will constitute a serious threat to this continent for the period of operational usefulness of such bombers, whether we have intercontinental guided missiles or not. Our problem is how to assist in meeting that threat.

It is to meet this threat that the CF-105 is being developed and we are confident that it will be an effective part of our defence. I might say that the Royal Air Force and the United States air force participated in exhaustive studies from which we concluded that, for the special needs of this country, to proceed with the CF-105 was the best thing to do because no comparable British or United States aircraft under development will be available by the time we need it.

At this stage I should like to comment on a matter that it seems to me is the subject of a good deal of misunderstanding. As I read the comments by various critics and commentators in the newspapers and so on, there seems to be a tendency to take the present-day fighter and compare it with the bomber which is expected to be in operation five or ten years from now. In other words, instead of comparing today's fighter with today's bomber as far as it is in production in numbers, they take the fighting element and compare it with some future bomber development which is not yet in production in operational numbers. That tends to cast reflection upon our present-day fighter. I think that is a general statement as to a condition which exists generally in the public mind.

The Deputy Chairman: May I interrupt the minister to indicate that he has gone over the 30-minute limitation, but of course he may continue with the consent of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Campney: Thank you. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra asked as to the cost of the Velvet Glove project. Our first expenditures were made in 1950-51 and the total to date is just under $24 million. This money has been well spent. It represents Canada's contribution to the build-up of know-how in this field, for what we have done has been done in conjunction with other work by the United States and United Kingdom research teams. As a result, here in Canada we have some 400 scientists and specialists in industry and in the forces who have acquired practical experience in the air-to-air guided missile field. Therefore Canadian industry today has the capacity and the know-how to produce such weapons and is able to undertake contracts for producing a Sparrow type of air-to-air missile for use in our present and future aircraft, and this would not be the case if we did not have ample scientifically trained people to carry on. We have also developed the Cold Lake missile range with the use of the Velvet Glove, and we have acquired therefrom in the past year a great deal of very valuable information.

The hon. member also commented on the increase in the defence research board estimates from $52½ million last year to $79 million this year, an increase of about 50 per cent, and he asked for some details about the increase. This increase is made up of an additional $6·8 million for the air-to-air missile program, $11 million for the CF-105 project and an additional $7·3 million for the PS-13 engine for that aircraft. These are three items accounting for just over $25 million of the increase, and the remainder is for increases in various development projects for the army and the navy.

The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace complains that the department is operating a substantial number of schools for children of service personnel. Surely he would not dispute that we have an obligation in that regard. What we try to do is to provide the best education we can by the most economical methods. The policy in that respect is clearly set out at page 23 of our annual report for the fiscal year, 1954-55—the very book from which, I suspect, the hon. member must have got the information he quoted regarding numbers of schools, pupils and so on. It reads as follows:

> Wherever possible, dependents of service personnel attend local civilian schools and the department undertakes financial responsibilities to a level agreed with the civilian educational authorities concerned. Where no civilian facilities are available the department provides schools by using existing buildings or, as necessary, by constructing buildings for the purpose.
> In Canada such schools are operated in accordance with the educational standards of the province in which they are located. Departmental schools overseas, for dependents of personnel of the Canadian brigade and air division serving in Europe, are operated according to Canadian practices and standards, and teachers are obtained by arrangements with school boards from across Canada with the co-operation of provincial education authorities.

Surely this constitutes a sensible approach to the problem, and I may say that it works. I may say further that the observations of the hon. member in connection with our schools are the very first words savouring of criticism that I have ever heard in connection with what I regard as the very fine educational work we are carrying on.

With respect to married quarters, the hon. member suggested, I believe, that we ought to leave it to private enterprise to build such accommodation for service personnel. Of course, the actual construction is carried out by private enterprise, but I think that the hon. member was suggesting that the department should stay out of the housing field entirely, or at least in urban areas. Such a suggestion overlooks completely the very obvious fact that because of the very nature of military life, training courses, rotation of personnel and so forth, service personnel are not in the same position as civilians, and I find it difficult to believe that the hon. member would seriously suggest that we should do nothing to help our service personnel in this regard. As a matter of fact, if we were to do so, conditions would very quickly become chaotic.

Then the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace got down to a few minor matters. He made some reference to the Royal Canadian Air Force hockey pamphlets. These pamphlets, as a matter of fact, were written by a service officer and printed by the queen's printer at a cost to the R.C.A.F. of $397.50. They are available for sale to and are being sold to the public. If these booklets had not been made available for sale to the public, the cost to the R.C.A.F. would have been much more. The booklets will, of course, be on sale within the R.C.A.F., and they are being sponsored in certain circles by the Department of National Health and Welfare, but limited free distribution will also be made to each station of the R.C.A.F., chiefly to assist volunteer coaches who contribute so much to the R.C.A.F. recreation program. Perhaps if I quote one paragraph from the foreword by the air vice-marshal for personnel it will give the hon. member a clear idea of what is intended:

> To assist the recreation specialists and the many volunteer leaders on whose services the extent and quality of recreation programs depend, and to assist participants to improve their skills, the R.C.A.F. prepares and distributes special guidance and instructional material concerning the many aspects of recreation. The R.C.A.F. series of sports booklets are also intended to assist service personnel and their families to enrich their leisure time in service life by increasing their interest in sports and improving their playing ability within the best rules of sportsmanship.

I am sure that no one would disagree with that.

Finally, as far as the hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace is concerned, whilst he was professing in his remarks to be concerned about individual rights, he appeared to desire to expose to ridicule a number of young men in the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps because they were taking instructions in dancing at a private school. I should like to advise the hon. member that these young men are not cadets, as he indicated, but are young army apprentices and, further, that they attended these dancing classes in their own time and at their own expense. I commend them for their initiative.

I think it is rather cheap that they should have been singled out for criticism and held up to ridicule for their activities when off duty, particularly when our own activities in the field of apprentice training represent, I am sure, one of the finest youth movements in Canada today.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings mentioned a number of civilian personnel matters at defence establishments in his constituency. I might say that the Department of Labour reviews all hourly wage rates for employees of the Department of National Defence at least once a year. Such a survey is being carried out this summer in the area to which the hon. member referred. As a result of surveys in recent years, the wages of labourers in that area have been increased by 50 per cent, and wages of electricians by 33 per cent. When revisions in prevailing rates are recommended, we put them into effect as quickly as practicable.

On looking into the case of the prevailing rate employee mentioned by the hon. member as earning $39.60 per week, I find that he was, as the hon. member suggested, for a time responsible as a maintenance mechanic for the work of a number of seasonal firemen-labourers. The classification of the maintenance mechanic position is under review. Although the position recently advertised for Camp Gagetown, to which he also referred, is similar, its level of duties and responsibilities has been assessed by experts of the civil service commission as that of maintenance craftsman, grade 2, which is a somewhat higher classification than maintenance mechanic.

Lastly, the hon. member for York West indicated that he felt that more information should be made known generally. I have made reference to that phase of his remarks in commenting on those of other hon. members. He particularly asked with regard to the unit costs of aircraft, engines and so on. I should like to say to him, as I have already said, that since I have been minister I can recall only one parliamentary question about aircraft costs, and the information requested was given, but perhaps the hon. member would be interested in the following figures as they illustrate a few of the problems in this field.

Take the Sabre project. First, on May 28, 1951, as shown on page 3443 of Hansard for that day, we tabled the initial development costs for the F-86 project. For some time thereafter the unit cost of a Sabre was about half a million dollars. Although we made a number of improvements in the Sabre, our aircraft industry also managed to work out substantial production economies and the current unit cost of a Sabre Mark VI, complete with spares, is now about $340,000.

Similarly, in the case of the CF-100, development costs prior to the production of the first plane were given last year as being around $122 million. The current unit cost, with spares, is a little over $700,000. But as to comparative costs, the real point here is that the only reason that Canada undertook to develop the CF-100 was that there was simply no comparable aircraft being developed anywhere in the free world. We undertook the CF-100, and now the CF-105 primarily because the area over which we have to carry out interceptions is far greater than in the case of almost any other country in the world with the possible exception of Russia, and the distance between suitable airfields in this country is great, also when compared with Europe or the United States. The cost of a multitude of new airfields for shorter range fighters would equal many times over what we have spent on the CF-100, with less closely spaced airfields.

Perhaps the most significant thing about our military aircraft industry here in Canada is that we have a good record in the military aircraft projects we have undertaken. As everyone knows, it is possible to work on a new type of aircraft for several years and then have to scrap the whole project. But so far Canadian-built Sabres with the Orenda engine and the Canadian-built CF-100's with the same engine have been very successful and are giving fine service for the tasks they have to do at this time. From what I have seen so far we have every reason to expect—and that is all I can say at the moment—that the CF-105 project will be a success.

That concludes my comments up to the present time. I think I have covered most of the questions raised by my hon. friends in the three days of debate last month.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Just before the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich speaks, may I make this observation. At some stage of the discussion of the first item there is always a point where we get away from defence policy generally. In order to keep the discussions orderly and in order to enable the minister to have the proper officials before him, we start calling for discussion the subheadings in the details. The item, of course, is carried as a whole. I am entirely in the hands of the committee. I wonder whether the committee would indicate whether we have reached the stage at which they would prefer that I start calling the various services by the subheadings or whether there is to be further general discussion on the item as a whole?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think we have quite reached that stage yet where we can go on to the discussion of the various items. However, I agree with you, Mr. Chairman, that at the present time we should confine our remarks to general defence policy and general defence organization rather than deal with the various items of the defence services.

I have really only a brief comment to make in reply to what the minister has said, and it is more in the nature of a request for further information with regard to the position of the chiefs of the general staff. The minister compared our system with the system which was introduced in Great Britain last year where, for the first time, a chairman of the chiefs of staff committee in Great Britain was appointed. But there is a slight difference that I think should be pointed out, namely that the chiefs of staff committee, through their chairman, on all matters of policy and strategy report to the Minister of Defence but—unlike our system here in Canada—in Great Britain each service has its own minister. Hence the chief of staff for the army has the opportunity of reporting directly to his own minister, the Secretary of State for War at the war office on all matters dealing with administration of the army. Of course, in our organization, on matters dealing with strategy and policy, the chiefs of staff will report to the Minister of National Defence; and on details connected with the administration of the various services they also report to the same minister, namely the Minister of National Defence. There is that difference.

I had rather hoped that the minister, when he was explaining the duties of the chiefs of staff, would emphasize the corporate responsibility of all three of them—or all four of them if you include research—in the preparation of what one might call a tri-service policy for national defence. It is in that respect that the chiefs of staff of the British services have a dual responsibility. They have not only a responsibility for the administration of their own particular service but they have a joint responsibility as between all three services in submitting to the Minister of Defence the defence policy that the three of them, as a trinity, recommend to the Minister of Defence. I thought perhaps the minister might have stressed that responsibility. No doubt he referred to it, but his reference was a brief one. I think that is one of the major responsibilities of the chiefs of staff. They must at a certain time subordinate special pleading for their own service in order that there may be produced the best possible defence policy for the country.

At a latter stage in the debate I hope to make some comments in connection with the army. I had the opportunity of visiting the brigade in Germany only last week and I have only a few comments with regard to that matter. However, I prefer to make them when we come to the army estimates. I appreciate the remarks made by the minister in explaining the position of the United States and Canadian joint committee. I think that was something that required explanation in view of some of the comments which have been made outside of this house.

There is one point to which the minister did not refer and which was raised in a question I had asked. I had referred to the term "stockpiling" with regard to CF-100's. Now that the role of the auxiliary squadrons has been changed, quite obviously there will not be the same need in Canada for the same number of CF-100's as were originally designated. I asked whether it was not possible to dispose of some of our CF-100's to some other NATO countries. If we do not take the opportunity to sell to NATO countries some of our CF-100's now, it will not be very long before NATO countries will say that CF-100's are obsolescent, and they will not be as anxious to purchase CF-100's as they are at the present time.

I understand that there are certain NATO countries who have been very anxious to purchase the CF-100. I am told that one of the reasons why the CF-100 cannot be sold to NATO countries is that there are certain pieces of equipment in the CF-100 which are under a ban of security. They are classified highly, and at the moment they are only being released to the United States and the United Kingdom. If that is so, I think it is unfortunate because we have got to have confidence in our NATO allies. As one representative of a NATO country said to me only last week, are you having two classes of membership in NATO? Are you having second class NATO countries who are only to be allowed to have certain types of equipment, whereas there will be first class NATO countries who will have the latest and most up to date equipment? The remark was made, but you still expect our men to serve with the forces of the first class NATO countries in western Europe, and surely you are not going to deny them the most up to date equipment. I think there may be some justification in that complaint.

One may well realize that the forces of some countries have not proceeded far enough with their training to enable them to use or to entitle them to use the most modern of equipment. I can understand that point of view. But I do suggest that stage with respect to the CF-100 has now passed and the CF-100 should be made available to any NATO country who may desire to use that particular type of aircraft. If we do not sell the number that are surplus to our requirements of CF-100's, the time will soon have passed when they will be in demand.

Mr. Drew: Before we proceed to the general remarks, I just want to refer to one point raised by the Minister of National Defence. Any suggestion that the reference to statements made by senior officers identified either myself or others with those statements is entirely out of keeping with the way in which the argument was presented at the time. What was pointed out to the minister, as he himself indicated some considerable time ago in this session, was that senior officers, including the gentlemen who formerly held the offices of chief of the general staff and adjutant general, had severely criticized the organization of the Department of National Defence and various aspects of our defence preparations.

I pointed out at that time, and I repeat now, that hon. members of this house are not in a position to judge the accuracy or otherwise of those statements. Those statements have been made, however, by senior officers upon whom the Minister of National Defence and the government were relying until a short time ago. I pointed out at the time I mentioned those statements that the minister himself had emphasized the dependence of the government upon our senior military officers in their expert capacity. This dependence has been emphasized by what he has again said this morning. He has emphasized his own agreement, in most cases, with the former chief of the general staff, and doubtless that applies to other senior officers who were, until recently, associated with the government, and who have expressed different views.

My reference to those statements, and they were statements which were directed to fundamental weaknesses if they do exist and if those statements are correct, was that those statements seem to justify the demand for a standing committee on national defence. Either those statements were right or they were wrong. The place where that could have been found out and the place where the facts could have been obtained was before a standing committee on national defence. The Prime Minister made a strange statement in answer to my suggestion to this effect, that we do not operate under the same system as in the United States. This assertion had no relevancy at all to the suggestion. We already have a standing committee on external affairs where there must, certainly, be questions of security just as high as in the Department of National Defence. We have standing committees on other subjects.

Before those standing committees, under the rules guiding the direction of the affairs of those committees, it is possible to call for witnesses and the production of documents. My contention was that the way we could find out what the facts were in the light of the statements that had been made was to set up a standing committee on national defence so that all of us could have the real facts in regard to that department, which has been spending more money than any other single department of government. What the minister has said this morning in regard to this whole subject, where he has reviewed things that could have been under consideration before a committee, merely supports the demand that was made earlier that there should be a standing committee on national defence. I believe the government is shown to have failed in its duty in not appointing a standing committee on national defence when that was requested long ago. I believe what has been said justifies it still further. I hope it will be realized by those who read the reports of what takes place here, that there are none of the facilities before a committee of the whole house which would compare, in any way, with the facilities offered by a standing committee; where the individuals themselves could be brought forward, where documents could be produced and where the information could be obtained upon which well informed decisions could be made in regard to this vitally important subject.

Mr. Thomas: I agree wholeheartedly with the statement just made by the Leader of the Opposition. These statements that have been made to the press, these magazine articles and so on, have left not only the members of the house but the whole population of Canada undecided as to whether or not Canada is carrying out her defence program in the best interests of security. I think the only possible way that we, as members, could dig into those statements to find out whether or not they are correct, find out whether or not they are responsible or irresponsible statements, whether or not they come about as a result of prejudice and a certain liking for a certain service, is to set up a committee on defence and to call these men as witnesses. We could call in any other witnesses we might be able to find who might agree or disagree with those statements. In such a committee we could get hold of the documents to determine whether or not the arguments were valid.

In addition, I think we could do a great deal of general good in digging into these defence estimates, being able to question the different officials, the different people, the different army officers, and get right down to sincere discussion of the entire realm of defence spending. I am not going to say any more about it at the present time, but I would urge that the government consider this very carefully and set up this defence committee because I think it would save a lot of worry and dissipate a lot of misapprehension on the part of the people and on the part of members of parliament. It is long overdue. We need it. Let us have it, and if we do have it we can do a good job on these estimates.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a few words in support of the position that it would have been a good idea, and would still be a good idea, to have these estimates referred to a committee of this house. That has already been requested by this group, and I hope that even yet the government might give consideration to the suggestion.

The further word of support that I offer at this time for the proposal that reference be made to a committee relates to the way in which these estimates have been presented to us. You have called, sir, for consideration by the committee, item 235, which is one of 10 items under the heading of national defence. Those 10 items include six items to be voted and four items that are statutory. Although there are 10 items in all, it will be noted that the item we are now discussing, item 235, represents 97 per cent of the money to be appropriated for the Department of National Defence. This item is for $1,722,797,717 which, as I have already suggested, is 97 per cent of the total of $1,775 million.

Other speakers have drawn attention to the strange coincidence that the grand total asked for this year is precisely the same as the grand total asked for last year. I suggest that that coincidence is even more glaring when one takes a moment or two to look at the composition of the figures. As I have said, there are 10 items, four statutory and six to be voted. We are dealing with one in which there has been proposed a reduction of $6,487,477. We have indicated that we feel the reduction might have been much greater. The point I am making at the moment is that that is an interesting figure to look at. It prompts the question, how was that figure arrived at? It is a reduction from $1,729,285,194 last year to $1,722,797,717 this year, a reduction of the odd figure of $6,487,477. What is passing strange, what is the kind of coincidence that I am sure would not happen more than once in a billion times, is that that figure is exactly equal to the amount by which increases have been made in the other items.

As I have said, there are nine other items. In two of those other items no change has been made. In seven of the other items changes have been made. In two instances there have been slight decreases of $520 and $250, or a total of $770; but the other five changes were increases varying from $200 to a figure of over $6 million. The increases add up to $6,488,247. The net change with respect to those other items, other than the one we are discussing, when you subtract the small decreases from the larger increases, is that you have an increase in all the other items, believe it or not, of precisely the same figure by which this large item has been reduced.

The changes made in the other items, the seven changes, are changes which I have examined. All of them have a logical basis. Some of them arise from provisions in statutes; some of them arise because certain civil service salaries have been increased; some of them arise because of changes in positions or the death of a particular pensioner. At one place there is an increase because the Newfoundland rifle association has been brought in along with similar associations in other provinces. In other words, it is clear from examining the makeup of the estimates that any changes made in the other smaller items—there are seven cases where changes have been made—are changes that can be accounted for. It is therefore quite clear what was done with the larger item now before us. It certainly cannot be denied that all that was done with this major item was to change it, to reduce it, by precisely the same odd number of dollars by which the other items were increased. I wondered if perchance that meant that that decrease had been made in two or three lump sums in various places in the estimates, but as I go through them I find that there are some 17 main sub-totals in the estimates in the latter part of the book that we shall be getting at in a moment. I find most of them have been changed; some are up, some are down. The changes are in some cases very small decreases of a few thousands and in other cases decreases of hundreds of millions.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, what a marvellous coincidence it is that with all of those changes made all through the details of this larger item, some up and some down, the grand total results in exactly the same number of dollars by way of a reduction that the grand total on the other side amounts to by way of increase and the figure again is the odd figure of $6,487,477. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the evidence is very clear that we are not presented with what can really be called estimating; we are presented with a juggling of figures to make them balance, to make them come out the same. It looks as though a directive must have gone out, let us have the same total this year as we had last year, for that is the way these figures are presented to us. I think the case has been well made from this side of the house that these estimates should even yet be referred to a special committee of the house for a thorough examination.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Churchill: The Minister of National Defence this morning has revived the discussion of the estimates of this department which were started late in June. I suppose because of the fact that there has been such a long intermission from the start of these estimates to the present time there will be a certain prolongation of the discussion. It is unfortunate that we cannot start a department like this and carry on for three or four days in order to complete it all at once.

I do not wish to repeat arguments or statements that have been advanced by other hon. members but I would like to say a few words in general consideration of the policy of the Department of National Defence. I notice in the white paper and in the earlier statement of the minister that Canada's objectives in national defence remain the same concerning the defence of Canada, our commitments under the NATO alliance and our obligations, if any, under the United Nations. There has been no change from the past several years but nevertheless the world situation has altered rather materially and I wonder whether the minister and his officials have taken that fully into account.

Other people have drawn attention to the fact that the estimates for this year do not vary by a dollar from the estimates for last year. It is a little surprising in view of the necessity for making a reappraisal of the world situation each year. It is again a bit surprising in view of the action taken by other countries within the NATO alliance with regard to their defence expenditures. I would have thought there would have been some change in the total amount made available for national defence. Surely it is not just a revolving fund that is going to remain unchanged from year to year.

There must be some alteration one way or another when one recalls that it is only a few years ago, in 1950, I think it was, that our expenditures for national defence were running at about $435 million; and then with the outbreak of war in Korea and with the necessity of assisting our allies under NATO and the necessity for stockpiling and preparing for a possible third world war the estimates for national defence jumped and have remained at a high figure from that time forward. They are now in the neighbourhood of $1,775 million.

From the minister's statement of several weeks ago and his statement today I am not clear that his appreciation of the world situation is the same as that expressed by other people charged with similar responsibilities in other countries. The impression I get from reading magazine articles and newspapers with regard to defence thinking in other countries is that the threat of a thermonuclear war, a third world war, has diminished but that we still have to take precautions and not let our guard down, but nevertheless I do not see that world opinion considers that a third world war is imminent at the present time.

On the other hand I gather that anyone who is thinking of warfare is of the opinion that if trouble breaks out again it will be of a limited nature and conventional arms will be used. Under those circumstances the policy of the Department of National Defence must be rather nicely balanced.

We as a country are not in a position to enter into competition in the development of thermonuclear weapons. We have to be dependent upon our more powerful allies. We apparently are not in a position to do very much in regard to the development of missiles and there again we must be dependent upon those who have greater financial resources and who are ahead of us in experimentation. I wonder if it would not be wise for Canada to place a greater reliance upon our larger allies in these matters and perhaps give our attention to other matters.

The minister has pointed out that it is worth while developing a team of experts who will have some knowledge of the construction of missiles. That is all right as far as it goes, but perhaps greater reliance should be placed upon those other countries who have gone further in that field. There is nothing to prevent the Department of National Defence of this country from keeping well up to date and in a fine state of efficiency the three fighting services as we have known them in the past, and keeping them supplied with the necessary modern equipment for the type of warfare that has been carried on since the second world war.

I think it is an open question as to whether that is being done. I feel we have not yet received an adequate answer from the minister with regard to the great amount of money that has been expended over the last five or six years in strengthening our defences. We are not yet assured that we have forces in being ready to take action on short notice either in this country or elsewhere. We are not yet assured that air transport is adequate to lift a substantial portion of the army. We are not yet assured from the standpoint of mobility that the army is equipped in modern fashion so that it can be not only transported but supplied by means of air.

And yet what has happened to all the money that has been spent over the last half dozen years? I have no objection to the development of a camp such as Gagetown.

We saw the necessity for that at the time of the Korean war when our troops had to go into the United States to receive their training. I have no objection to the better facilities which are now available for service personnel at the various stations across Canada; that is all right. We have raised no serious objection to the stockpiling of equipment which was the major point of policy a few years ago. However, some of those things must surely have been completed now, and throughout it all there is a doubt as to whether our forces in being are capable of immediate action. That may be true of the air force which is stationed in Germany; it may be true of the air force in Canada; it may also be true of the naval forces, although they are not complete. But I wonder if it is true with regard to the army? The minister has not cleared up that point. The difficulty in discussing defence estimates is that the curtain of secrecy descends just about every other second and you cannot get a great deal of information.

I noticed that in his opening remarks on June 20 the minister referred to what he described as a major change within the army. This is a matter which we have discussed from this side of the house on many occasions. It is a matter concerning which I was rather critical of the minister last year. I refer to the substantial increase in the armoured corps within the Canadian army. This is indeed a concession to opposition criticism and is an acknowledgment of the existence of modern thinking with regard to balanced forces within the army. The minister has told us that a third armoured regiment is to be activated. He did not say when; he did not name the regiment and he did not notify us whether the three armoured regiments which would then be under command would be brigaded or whether they would simply operate as independent units.

I was glad to discover that the minister had arrived at a conclusion that something should be done with regard to a subject which I have discussed so many times in the house, the armoured personnel carrier, the finest protection for the infantry soldier that has been brought about in modern times. I should like to quote the words of the minister as reported on page 5212 of Hansard of June 20 as follows:

> Another important new development on which the army is working is an armoured amphibious 9-ton tracked carrier.

This will be capable of mounting field guns or of moving 10 or 12 infantry men and will be resistant to small arms fire and to splinters from shell fire. The minister stated that the army was working on this development. I do not know whether that means it is just drawing up plans, whether this vehicle is on the production line or whether it is in use. We shall certainly watch with interest the development of vehicles of this nature. Last year we were informed that the army was watching with interest the development of vehicles of this nature in the British and United States armies, but that is as far as that information went. I think the minister might very well give us information later on as to how far this development has gone. I certainly welcome it and am glad to hear that our authorities are going to make provision for the protection of the infantry along such a well tried line.

I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that in the army being developed in West Germany there is a marked emphasis on armour. In the NATO letter of January 1, 1956, at page 13, reference is made to the 12 divisions which will comprise the German army as follows:

> Half of the twelve divisions will be armoured divisions while the remaining six will be grenadier divisions, that is to say fully mechanized infantry divisions (as far as possible on tracked vehicles) with strong armoured support.

Profiting from their experience in the last war and being now able to start afresh with their special sagacity in military matters, the Germans are balancing their army most carefully as between armour and infantry and are planning to have the infantry in tracked carriers, thereby creating mobility to move across the country and not be tied down to roads as the army was in the second world war.

The Germans are particularly efficient in military matters, as they have shown in the past. When they plan an army on that basis I think it is well worth the attention of Canada. Our army should be planned along similar lines with sufficient armour to balance the infantry forces which should be in position where they can achieve mobility with protection and to permit crossing the country which can be done only with tracked armoured vehicles. I would hope that in the exercises now being conducted at Gagetown some emphasis will be placed on this method of using the infantry and that the tactical exercises being conducted there will utilize the experience of the past and be in line with modern developments.

In connection with the general over-all allocation of funds, the minister has discovered that he requires the same amount of money this year as he sought in past years. Although he has made changes up and down within the various groupings in the Department of National Defence, the grand total remains the same. I notice that in making any reductions that are made the axe is used on the army to the extent of $24 million.

I wonder why the army was selected as the service which should have to suffer this reduction. If there was to be an over-all reduction perhaps each service should have been affected. If it was to be a temporary re-allocation of funds so that the research end could be supported, as happens in this case because they get this money, why do not the other two services make contributions toward that end? But no, it is the army which has to bear the brunt of this change to the extent of $24 million.

In any war in the immediate future which is not a world war the army will play a major part. It played a major part in Korea. A recent publication of the historical section gives the story of Canada's army in Korea and indicates that of Canada's 1,557 battle casualties, all but 14 were suffered by the army. The air force participated in that war by supplying a certain number of pilots to the United States air force and by using its transport squadrons to ship supplies and men overseas. The navy participated in Korean waters, but the brunt fell upon the army. In any war similar to Korea the brunt will again fall on the army. So I wonder why in effecting reductions the minister should select the army as the place where they will be made.

What will it mean? The minister might tell us what it will mean to the army. Is it going to mean something different in the way of equipment? Will there be a shortage of guns or transport? Will there be a delay in providing tanks for the newly activated armoured regiment? Will there be a delay in providing these specially designed armoured personnel carriers? Something will have to be curtailed in so far as the army is concerned. Yet, if trouble breaks out as it did in Korea, and the decision has to be arrived at within 24 hours or within a week, I am sure that it will be the army that will be called upon to play its part, because none of these wars are fought solely by navies and air forces. The army has to get in there on the ground. The experience of Korea is an indication that the air force alone cannot win a war. Air superiority was enjoyed by the United Nations forces in Korea, and yet the North Koreans and the Chinese were able to bring that war virtually to a stalemate. In the closing year of the second world war in Europe, although we enjoyed air superiority, the Germans were able to put up very effective defensive operations.

So we cannot be dependent just on air, and certainly not just on the navy. We come back finally to the army. The army has to be there and has to take over, run the risks and endure the casualties. The army must be kept in as good a state as either of the other services. I wonder whether that is in the plan of the minister as regards this reduction he has proposed this year.

There is another point. I should like to know from the minister whether he has been drawing upon the experience of the past in order to make the army a more effective fighting instrument. Perhaps the minister has heard sufficient—he may hear more—with regard to the criticism offered against his department by recently retired generals. I have here a publication by Major General Burns dealing with manpower in the Canadian army, a very fine study of the situation that prevailed in world war II concerning the utilization of manpower by the Canadian army. I wonder whether the minister has given attention to that and whether the present forces of the Canadian army are built up with the experience of the second world war in mind, as brought to our attention by Major General Burns.

He points out in his study that in his opinion about 6 per cent of the strength of the Canadian army in Europe in world war II could have been utilized—or saved, as he puts it—for fighting purposes, that is, in his opinion, far too many of our troops were engaged in the rear areas and in administration and on staff, and more should have been available for the fighting edge or fringe of the army. He makes a comparison with other forces in that war and indicates that in the Canadian set-up we exceeded the British and the United States forces in the number of people that we had behind the lines in the supply line, in the administrative echelons and so on. If his conclusions are correct, that lesson should be applied to the formation of the Canadian army at the present time.

What is the effective fighting strength of the Canadian army now? Are there too many people behind that fighting edge? Is it top-heavy in the wrong places? I do not know; I have not had a chance to check Major General Burns' figures against those of other nations, but he is of the opinion that percentagewise the Canadians had far too many men in the pipe line. I hardly like to use that word nowadays, but in wartime it was used to indicate those who were coming along from the depots and so on up to the front. It may be that we have not profited by the lessons of the second world war and still have too many people back of the fighting fringe; and it is the fighting fringe that is the important element. Perhaps at Gagetown, where the troops are now assembled, there may be more men in the rear areas than there should be. I should like to hear what the minister's comments would be with regard to that.

I do not wish to prolong this aspect of the discussion, Mr. Chairman, but in general I think that the Department of National Defence faces a tremendous problem. We admit that. Although we feel it is necessary to offer criticism of that department, we recognize the tremendous problem involved. We recognize the fact that the department has to keep in mind two types of warfare, the third world war with thermonuclear weapons and the brush-fire type of war where conventional weapons will be used. We recognize the fact that more importance is being attached to air than was the case years ago, and so on. Nevertheless a department which is utilizing about 40 per cent of the taxes collected by the dominion government must be submitted to close scrutiny, and I think an accurate accounting of the use of all this money is certainly required.

From my standpoint, the vital factor is whether or not we have efficient forces that are capable of being used immediately they are required. We cannot overlook the fact that in 1950, when the Korean war broke out, we were not prepared to send a force to Korea and had hastily to assemble a large number of men, and there was a great deal of wastage. To keep 8,000 men enlisted, well over 10,000 had to be brought in even before the brigade sailed for Korea; and 1,500 were discharged because they were unsuitable for active service; they should never have been taken in. Is that type of wasteful use of manpower going to occur in the future, or what protection have we against that?

That is the type of criticism that I think should be aimed at the Department of National Defence. There should be a strict accounting of the use of all this money that is available, to indicate to us that we are enjoying the protection we want and that we are able to take part at any time we are required to do so under our commitments with regard to NATO or the United Nations.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was glad that the minister took time at the beginning of the discussion today to reply to some of the comments that had been made when his department was last before the house. In those remarks he made one or two references to me, particularly on the subject of my comments concerning the importance of Canada's radar screen. I was glad to see that on that point there was some degree of agreement in regard to this important subject. However, whilst he quoted with some degree of relish my remarks in that regard, I think he still failed to get the point I raised when I was referring to the importance of the radar screen. At page 5266 of Hansard of June 21, I concluded my discussion of that subject with this statement:

> Therefore I am one of those who believe that the radar installations are a very necessary and important development in any comprehensive program of air defence at this time.

I should like to stress the words "in any comprehensive program of air defence at this time". I still agree with that statement, namely that in a comprehensive air defence program it is imperative at the present stage of air power development that we have a radar screen capable of giving sufficient advance warning to make it possible for the United States strategic bomber air force to carry out its role of massive retaliation and to make it possible for the Canadian air force to carry out its major role of defence of the North American continent. However, he did not include the proviso that I have made to the effect that I did not feel that, at the present stage of development, Canada had a comprehensive air defence program nor, for that matter, an over-all clear-cut comprehensive defence program generally. If we are to put my statement in the proper perspective, I think it is necessary to include that proviso.

The minister stated further, Mr. Chairman, that in making my observations the other day, I seemed to have a fair degree of information, and he suggested that that fact more or less rebutted complaint that we in this house lack sufficient information to deal intelligently or adequately with the discussion of defence matters generally. Last year I think I complimented the minister. He had just taken over the department, and I think I complimented the minister on a change in emphasis in so far as this particular problem was concerned. I suggested that the minister had been more free with his information and that statement was true at the time. But as he has acquired experience in the office, he seems to have been returning to the former policy of reticence which makes it extremely difficult for the private member in this house to have an adequate grasp of defence matters. It is because of that fact that I would agree heartily with the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that we need a committee that can discuss matters of defence which, by their very nature, tend to be concerned with a classified kind of information, and thereby put ourselves properly and adequately into the picture. If I seem to have any grasp of the problem at all I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that it is largely as a result of information that I have been able to acquire owing to my own service experience, and particularly by examining the more detailed information that is available from United States sources. If it were possible for a private member in this house to read and to analyse carefully the information, for example, that is placed on record before the various hearings in the United States, we would be completely informed on defence matters. However, with all the other responsibilities resting on us, time does not make it possible to carry out that exhaustive analysis. We are able to get only the highlights of those discussions from the publications that appear from time to time. Those publications have largely been the source of my information on the general problems relating to air defence in Canada and air defence in North America.

Having dealt with those two particular references by the minister to my previous remarks, I want to carry on with a subject that I was not able to deal with the other day because of lack of time. One of the deficiencies in our air defence program as well as in our defence program generally relates to manpower. As I said in my closing remarks on June 21, I want to make some reference to the subject of the utilization of reserves and auxiliary personnel in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Back about four or five years ago, before we had any fully operational permanent air force squadrons available for the defence of Canada, the idea used to be put forward that the auxiliary squadrons were our front line of defence and that they were sufficiently well trained and that their numbers were sufficiently large to assure an adequate defence of Canada and this continent from any possible approach from the north.

I can remember taking issue with that thesis at the time. Others from relatively high level sources in the auxiliary also disagreed with the thesis. I think Wing Commander Rohmer of Toronto, for example, disagreed rather heartily in a public statement with that particular theory. By reason of the obsolete equipment supplied to our auxiliary squadrons, it was not possible for them to cope with any challenge that might come to this continent at that time. This year quite obviously the minister agrees that we were a little bit overoptimistic in those days concerning the ability of the auxiliary and reserve units adequately to defend this country. But unfortunately the pendulum seems to be swinging too far the other way, and there is now a tendency to underestimate completely the ability of the auxiliary units of the air force to serve in any defensive capacity. For example, in his initial statement the minister gave us the information that a general reorganization of our auxiliary units was under way, and that reorganization included the disbanding of 424 squadron and the reassignment of 420 squadron in London to new duties as was announced at the opening of today's sitting. Further, it has been announced that the participation of auxiliary flying units in actual defensive combat is to be strictly limited. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that that is carrying the reaction much too far to the other extreme. From the information I have and from the personal contact I have had with auxiliary work, I am quite prepared to state that our auxiliary units are in a position to cope with any kind of defensive role to which they may be assigned in this country.

Before world war II I remember there was a lot of criticism concerning the functions of the university squadrons that were operating in the United Kingdom. At that time they were the backbone of a numerically very weak air power. It was felt that the types of aircraft were advanced in those days at least; the Hurricane and Spitfire were much too complicated and hot for the week-end university squadron fliers to cope with. As it turned out, during the battle of Britain these so-called week-end fliers became the first few who met the first onslaught of the formidable German luftwaffe. Some of our thinking from that period has carried over into the post world war II period, and we have the idea that advance jet aircraft are much too complicated to be coped with by part-time fliers on a week-end basis.

It seems to me, from the information I have been able to glean, that is not the heart of the difficulty. It is not a lack of qualified aircrew personnel, both pilots and navigators, which makes it difficult for our reserve units to continue operational in their defensive role, but rather it is a shortage of ground and maintenance personnel. It is very difficult to get reserve auxiliary people to put in the necessary time to keep themselves up to operational requirements on a short-term basis. If that is the difficulty, I am sure the recent action taken by the Department of Defence, as announced by the minister in this house, to reorganize the role of auxiliaries is not going to contribute in any positive way to the solution of that problem. Rather, the abrupt manner in which No. 424 squadron is being disbanded peremptorily, and it would seem without any preliminary warning, is going to have a further detrimental effect on morale and esprit de corps amongst auxiliary personnel.

I was surprised, speaking just for a moment to the difficulty faced by No. 424 squadron at Hamilton, at the degree of protest that was generated by this rather arbitrary action. For instance, in the eleven o'clock T.V. news roundup on C.B.C. they showed rather extensive pictures of a parade of protest that had been organized by the citizens of Hamilton because of this rather high-handed action on the part of the defence department. Now, that aroused my curiosity and I made some inquiries as to the reason for this enthusiastic response. I had it confirmed that the squadron was all prepared for its period of summer training. The majority of the squadron personnel had made arrangements to get leave of absence from their various businesses for the period. They had had no preliminary warning at all that flying operations were going to be discontinued. They had had an outstanding record, as incidentally have all auxiliary squadrons, with reference to safety. They have had, I understand, an accident-free flying record, which is an exceptional record when we consider the accident rate even in the best trained civilian aviation circles.

Furthermore, I understand that all the flying personnel were operational on T-33 jet type aircraft. Enthusiasm was high, morale was high, esprit de corps was high. They were a model auxiliary squadron, prepared to move into action immediately in the defence of the vital Hamilton industrial area. Suddenly, without warning, without previous contemplation, they found themselves abolished. Now, that is hardly the type of action that is going to overcome the reluctance that is manifest from time to time in getting Canadian civilians to spend time as part-time fliers or maintenance personnel in auxiliary squadrons. It is very bad for morale. If we have had difficulty in the past in keeping auxiliary maintenance personnel up to strength, that problem will only be aggravated by this particular action.

Now, other than the experience of No. 424 squadron, I have had some personal experience down through the past five or six years in this matter of serving in auxiliary or reserve capacity. I have brought this subject up year after year. We have an active air force association in my city of Brandon, an air force association that has repeatedly taken honours because of its enthusiastic participation in the activities of the air force association of this country. Recently, I received from that association a circular which was rather disconcerting. This group of veterans who have since the end of the war been trying to find a niche in Canada's defence scheme of things in an auxiliary have, in all instances, been turned down. I have recited the procedure before. They hoped to have an auxiliary flying unit in the first instance. Then, they moved to the ground observers corps. Then, they hoped to have a radar light warning unit, but in each case, according to official information, there was no possible niche into which they could fit in the auxiliary scheme of things. However, they continued to thrive largely as a social club. You can only continue to operate on that basis successfully for so long, and now the interest is waning. The circular was in the form of a questionnaire asking a couple of hundred members of the association whether they considered it worthwhile to continue as an organized unit. I mention that again because it seems to fit into the general attitude which has been felt towards the role and function of auxiliary units in Canada. I think the attitude towards No. 424 squadron has been outstanding in this respect.

Let me be somewhat more positive regarding auxiliary functions. One of the most worth-while projects of the department has been the M.A.T.P., mobilization assignment training program. On April 24, in answer to a question, I received the information that since the inauguration of this scheme in 1951 the officer personnel serving under the M.A.T.P. plan, that is understudying permanent officers in various roles in the air force, have increased from 78 in 1951-52 to a total of 481 in 1955-56. There was a slight decrease in figures, as a matter of fact there was a decrease of some 14 in the number serving from 1954-55 to 1955-56. Therefore, I would take it from these figures the minister and the department concluded that this is a very worth-while project.

Let me turn to the N.C.O.'s scheme of things. Here again is where we have difficulty with maintenance personnel. Your maintenance personnel are going to be drawn largely from the N.C.O. ranks. I believe it was in 1954-55 that the scheme was first opened to senior N.C.O.'s and in that year 60 served, but in 1955-56 the total went down to 57. We are not doing so well in interesting the N.C.O.'s in this worth-while auxiliary service capacity. I do not know where the problem is there, but I do believe that because of the tremendous expense involved in supporting a large enough air force in Canada to carry out our primary defence role, the difficulty that we have been having is obvious. All that is necessary is to look at the newspapers that almost plead for our young people to become interested in serving Canada. The bands of the air force are busy all year round visiting high schools in an attempt to interest our young Canadians in a career in the air force, and yet we seem to ignore the most fruitful source of manpower, and that is the underlying interest of the veterans in serving in an auxiliary capacity. As I said in the opening part of my remarks, I feel that the auxiliary branch of the air force, if the proper approach is made by the department, is capable of serving in every way in the various parts of Canada's defence operations.

There is one specific point that might be raised which could probably explain the lack of interest of N.C.O.'s as well as the decline, so far as officers are concerned, indicated in the past two years. No way has as yet been devised whereby both officers and N.C.O.'s serving in the M.A.T.P. scheme can receive promotion. I have raised this problem before. It is not uncommon, for example, to find a flying officer understudying a squadron leader. He is learning the job that in the permanent force is handled by a squadron leader of the permanent force. This flying officer returns year after year, four, five or six years, to understudy the squadron leader, and so far as he is concerned that is the highest level to which he can rise in the air force scheme of things. There is absolutely no incentive from a promotional standpoint.

During the war when a man served as a wartime member of the air force and occupied a certain position he was elevated to the acting rank of that particular position. When he no longer functioned in that capacity he was demoted to what they called their substantive rank. I feel it might be a further source of incentive for officers, and particularly for N.C.O.'s, if it could be made possible for them, as they accumulate experience in the air service, to move gradually toward the equivalent rank that they are understudying. There is more than the status of rank involved, there is also the difference in pay; and when you are taking time off voluntarily from your civilian occupation—and in a good many cases civilians do not have a long enough holiday period to cover the basic 15 days required in this type of service—it would be a relatively inexpensive way of bringing the strength of the air force personnel up to the numbers required to carry out adequately Canada's defensive role. On this point, Mr. Chairman, I think our civil service is the worst offender so far as making it possible for members of the civil service to obtain leave of absence to serve in a reserve or an auxiliary capacity is concerned. I have bumped into this complaint specifically from acquaintances I have in the civil service. If the minister makes an inquiry he will find that it is extremely difficult for a civil servant to get the necessary time off to serve his country in this additional way, and certainly the public service should be the first in establishing the pattern, in setting the example for private employers and private industry.

This is all I have to say on the auxiliary and on the reserve at this time. I feel it is one of the deficiencies in a comprehensive air defence policy in Canada. It is fine to have an expensive radar screen spanning the continent at three levels, but it remains only as a Maginot line unless you have the personnel, the aircraft and the other aspects of defence necessary to carry out an adequate air defence role.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, this matter of national defence is a most complicated field, probably the one in which greater doubts can be expressed and questions raised than in almost any other field with which members of parliament have to deal. And, certainly, one is not speaking with any professional knowledge of the subject when one attempts to speak this afternoon. Any experience that I had was in a war many, many years ago, whose practices and weapons have been completely outmoded.

However, I do not feel too bad about dealing with this matter at this time because I understand the minister himself in his opening speech—and I think quite properly—admitted and said—and perhaps this is one of the more encouraging things that we have found from the minister's approach to his department—that he himself did not know the answers to many of the problems with which he was confronted, and he felt quite certain it would be a long time before all the answers were given. With that I quite agree. In approaching the matter this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, I am doing it in that spirit, not in one of criticism as such except perhaps on one particular approach; that is, I feel that because of this doubt, because of the uncertainties, the request that has been made by this party, and particularly by the Leader of the Opposition, that the whole matter should be referred to a committee for investigation, is entirely justified, although I realize it cannot be done at this session at this late hour. Anything I do say about these problems I hope will be directed toward the end that in another year that will be done.

The problem of war is very different now from what it was at one time. Originally, I suppose, people went to war to get food and possibly to get slaves; some tribes went to war to get wives, and gradually they went to war to capture land. Wars were therefore at one time profitable, or at least our ancestors must have thought so.

I remember a former speaker of this house, the late Mr. Rhodes, telling me once of a trip he made to Britain during the first world war. While he was there he was entertained at a luncheon by the Vickers Armstrong Company, I think it was, the great armament manufacturers. During the course of the luncheon he said he assumed they had solved all the problems with which they were confronted and they said, "No, we have only one problem with which we still have to deal, and that is to find a shell that will pierce the strongest armour plate and conversely find an armoured plate that will resist any shell."

I presume that problem is still with us. Perhaps, however, it does not have to be solved today, because I suppose you could have the strongest armour plate in the world; but a battleship with the greatest thickness of armour plate cruising the seas does not have to be struck by a shell. A bomb bursting 5,000 feet or more above it, or perhaps several miles away, could reduce the armour plate to scrap and everyone within the ship to a burnt crisp in a matter of seconds.

We have reached the stage, Mr. Chairman, where one sometimes wonders if these discussions concerning war are—I will not say archaic, but are hardly realistic in one sense of the word. We have all heard a great deal of talk about whether we are going to have a brush fire war or an all-out war. Who is going to draw the line between a brush fire war and an all-out war? I do not think anyone can answer that question. For instance, if Hitler had had a thermonuclear weapon in the latter part of the last war and had realized he was losing the war, who would question the fact that he would not have hesitated to use it even though there might have been an understanding at the beginning of the war that it would not be used?

We talked a great deal about the other side not using gas in the last war, but to a large extent that was perhaps a tactical weapon. I am sure that in the last few days of the war Hitler would not have hesitated to use gas if he had felt that by doing so the war could have been won. I do not think there is any real value in our hoping that certain weapons will not be used, nor in our hoping that we will have a brush fire or a conventional war rather than an all-out war. One can start off with that hope and with that plan, but when one side realizes it is losing the war and hopes that by using some other weapons the loss of that war can be avoided, I think one can expect that such weapons will be used.

The ultimate aim of all these things, of course, as the minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs realize, is to create a state of disarmament wherein there can be some real hope that neither brush fire nor thermonuclear warfare will be engaged in at all. I think what we have to do in the meantime until that situation develops is to work out some modus vivendi whereby we can maintain our own way of life and stand prepared to defend ourselves against an attack should it come. That, of course, as the minister said, constitutes the problem with which we are confronted.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris in justifying the expenditures on radar lines a few moments ago said that after all—and this is a point which I think the general public does not appreciate—their real purpose is to give the strategic air command a chance to get its planes off the ground. Their purpose is not to protect the public, as I understand it, but is rather to give the bombers a chance to get into the air so they will not be destroyed on the ground and in order that they can launch a counter measure of massive retaliation about which we have sometimes heard in the past. Well, if that is the hope and the only hope to be derived from them it does not hold out much comfort for the rest of us, because we are probably going to be burnt to a crisp anyway. If we reach that stage of crisis where we are under attack and are launching a retaliatory attack, the world will be in that state that has been caricatured by a monkey scrambling over the rocks overlooking the devastated countryside and commenting to himself that no one should ever start this foolishness all over again.

We do not want to go that far, yet apparently that is the degree of desperation to which we are forced when we talk about these radar lines. Several hundred years ago when our ancestors came to this country they erected stockades and withdrew behind them every night. Then gradually they spread out over this continent and the pax Britannica spread over the world. We had several centuries on this continent and one century as far as the world was concerned of prosperity and relative peace. At least any wars that occurred were on a tribal basis.

I sometimes wonder if we are reverting to the stockade mentality in this country, withdrawing behind the stockades of the radar lines in North America as our ancestor withdrew behind their stockades in order to protect themselves from Indian attacks. The only thing which occurs to me in this connection is that perhaps the stockades which protected our ancestors against the Indians were more effective than the stockades we are erecting on this continent today.

When I come up to this house in the morning and return at night I cross the Rideau canal, and it is forcibly impressed upon me that it was the distant early warning line of the past because we were then guarding ourselves against attacks that might have been launched against us from the south. We know from our reading of history that the canal was built from Ottawa to Kingston in order that we could move our troops into the great lakes and ward off an attack from the aggressor which would come from the south.

That D.E.W. line, if I might call it that, may have served a useful purpose; it may have protected us against aggression, I do not know. I really doubt it. Nevertheless it certainly involved the expenditure of terrific sums of money in those days which may have been all to the good in expanding the gross national product. It undoubtedly serves a useful purpose today because it is now one of the beauty spots of Ottawa, and young boys and girls can paddle up and down there at night in canoes and whisper sweet nothings and make love to one another. It therefore really serves a tremendously useful purpose.

I sometimes wonder if the radar lines in the north will ever serve a useful purpose. It is not possible to sit on them and hold hands and whisper sweet nothings. I have been informed that it is too cold up there, even for the birds to do that, so I wonder whether the expenditure for the stockade of today will have the same justification as the expenditure which was made for this D.E.W. line of a great many years ago. In any event, we are told it is necessary as a part of our defence machinery, and there is a great deal one has to accept on faith. I presume the statement of the experts to that effect falls into this category.

But there is one thing one learns in this country, and I suppose in any country, and that is that it is advisable to know what the public are saying. I think generally we who believe in the democratic system, although we may violently disagree with the results that are sometimes expressed, also believe that the verdict of the people is something that has merit and something to which one should listen. I think the trouble with a good many people today is that they cannot listen. If you go into the average home you will find the television set blaring and you are not able to have a conversation. If you travel on a plane you find that it travels at such a vast speed and makes so much noise that it is impossible to be heard by your travelling companion and it is equally impossible to listen to him.

I prefer to travel by train and take it leisurely. If one does that one can sit in the club car or the smoking lounge and talk to people and listen to them, and one can learn what the average businessman and the ordinary citizen of this country are thinking. There are many of these ordinary Canadian citizens who wonder just what justification there is for the expenditure of millions of dollars on the various radar lines. We hear of hundreds of millions of dollars being paid out for all this, yet in the next breath we hear that the I.C.B.M. will be developed within a few years. Apparently all we have to learn is how to bring it down from the air without it burning up, and how to make it hit its target. If we can do that we will have mastered everything and will have a weapon capable of blasting us into kingdom come.

The minister told us that he thought that weapon was further removed than the columnists seemed to suggest. I hope he is right. However, I do not think anyone expects, and I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs will suggest, that there is any danger or likelihood of war breaking out in the immediate future, a conventional war with planes and all the rest of it. At any rate these questions are being raised by the public. They know that something must be done and no one is particularly critical, yet there is that reserve of doubt which is increasing as time goes along.

That is not good. Apparently we are in for a long-term pull in this world in which we now live. We have seen the difficulties which the secretary of state and his associates have had in trying to work out even an approach to disarmament. We hear of the evasions, the committees, the adjournments, the postponements and I am sure the utter frustration that comes from it all. The fact is that we have to maintain a high degree of preparedness and defence for many years to come. To do that we must have a spirit of acceptance by the Canadian people and the public generally. No one is going to refuse for one moment to pay out money if it is necessary and if the expenditures are justified, but sometimes there is the thought that perhaps we are living in two worlds. At one moment we are told that war is an impossibility, then at the same time we are asked to prepare for war.

We have heard a great deal in this country about co-operation among ourselves and other countries. The public are becoming a little alarmed about this. We do not seem to be able to even co-operate on the manufacture of our rifle. I think there must be a greater degree of co-operation, of mutual trust and of working together than anything which has been indicated in the past. This morning the minister told us, I think in answer to a question, that we had spent $24 million on the "Pussy Willow" or the "Velvet Glove" or the "Puss in Boots", whatever it is, this mysterious weapon which we tried to develop and then had to drop.

There is some question as to the degree to which a country such as ours should embark upon scientific work of that kind unless we are assured that there has been close study, that this work is closely integrated with that of other countries, and that they are prepared to co-operate. One country should not try to take more credit than it deserves because of national pride or the ambition of someone to carry out work which should be spread more evenly across the board.

From what the minister has said, from this expenditure of $24 million we at least got some negative benefit or perhaps constructive benefit, in that we found out how it could not be done. That is quite a high price to pay for such negative results. It reminds me of the college mathematics professor who stood up before his class and put a great many algebraic and geometric designs on the blackboard. Finally he stood back and scratched his head. One of the students asked him what that proved. The professor replied, "My boy, that proves we cannot do it that way." If that is all we got from the $24 million expenditure it may be hard to justify it.

The unfortunate part, and here one can be more critical, is that quite often it has been necessary to go to the records of the United States in order to get information on these things. I believe the minister was sincere when he said this morning that he had never refused to answer a question, that he had given all the information it was possible to give. He even convinced me at the moment that he believed that statement when he made it. But certainly the newspaper editors of this country do not believe that. They do not doubt the minister's word per se, but they certainly doubt that we can get the necessary information. Members of parliament do not believe that. We do not get the information we want. It is impossible in a bulky committee of 175 members, or whatever the number is, in a short period of three or five days—

An hon. Member: It appears to be less.

Mr. Nowlan: After all there are four other committees sitting at the moment, which makes it all the harder for one to explore these matters and get the background and the, shall I say, philosophic approach to the problems with which the department is confronted. I suggest that that cannot be done in a committee of this kind in the short time which is available to us. It is just utter nonsense to think it can be done.

The minister may say that he has given us all the information he can and all the information for which we have asked, but that is not the case. Since the Korean war and up to the end of this year we will have spent in Canada over $10 billion on national defence. I venture to suggest that the great majority of Canadians know much more about the Einstein theory of relativity than they do about how the Department of National Defence spent that amount of money during the last few years.

Year after year we were denied information because it was classified, particularly by the minister's predecessor; yet the Leader of the Opposition spent 15 minutes one day reading into the record evidence given before a Senate committee of the United States where everything which had been denied to us as being classified was exposed. Only lately we had a general from the United States air department giving criticism of the CF-100, our inadequate radar screen and all the rest of it. Unfortunately it seems that we can get more information from the proceedings of a committee of the United States Senate than we can from our own department.

I could go on giving illustration after illustration, but I do not propose to take the time of the committee to do so. I simply want to say again that I believe and I think we all believe we are in a long, long period of tension during which this country and other freedom-loving countries will have to spend much more money than they want to spend. They will have to do it in order to preserve their freedom. If you are to do that you must have an educated and instructed public opinion to give you its support.

There are many ways in which the communist menace can be met, and I do not think it is going to be done by picket lines. I do not think it is going to be done by bayonets alone. It has to be done in other ways. We have to maintain our financial strength. We have to maintain public opinion. We have to have the zeal, the determination and the belief that we are doing the right thing and that we are working together toward the right end.

We read what is written by perhaps a fifth columnist; we read what is written by experienced newspapermen like Norman Smith or by industrialists like James Duncan; but whichever way you turn you read how the Russians are working with zeal, with determination and with interest which everyone suggests puts us to shame. If we are going to work as we should, I say again that we have to mobilize public opinion as much as we have to mobilize our manpower. I think one way in which that can be done is by the setting up of a defence committee such as has been urged by the Leader of the Opposition.

As I said earlier, I know it cannot be done at this late hour in the session if it is to serve a useful purpose, unless it is allowed to sit after the house rises, but I suggest that the minister take this suggestion seriously. When this house reconvenes next year, whenever that may be, he owes it to the Canadian people and he owes it to himself that there should be a full and searching inquiry into all these matters to which I have made vague references this afternoon.

We know that the one key to our survival is that we have the power to defend ourselves, to retaliate, to deter others from acts of aggression because we have the power to strike back if they strike us. We are in the unfortunate position, with our way of life, that we have to sit back and be prepared yet not take any aggressive steps ourselves. That requires a great deal of thought and development of the proper approach psychologically and socially in a nation. As I said before, and I do not wish to repeat myself, one way in which that can be done is by the appointment of this committee. I certainly believe that should be done when this parliament reconvenes.

Mr. McLeod: At the outset I should like to endorse wholeheartedly the remarks of the previous speaker. I think he hit the nail on the head when he spoke of the need for public opinion and the determination of the people not only of Canada but of any nation to defend themselves and equip themselves for that defence.

A few days ago, when these estimates were previously before the house, our leader, the hon. member for Peace River, spoke of the struggle being waged to spread communism throughout the world and the battle between two great ideologies. I think all of us agree that this has divided the world into two great camps of which the dividing lines are constantly changing. In a state of fear, the democracies are spending billions of dollars to put themselves in a position for the defence, not only of themselves but of all friendly peoples, against the military might of the nations behind the iron curtain. These nations seem determined that the ideology of communism shall prevail not only in their own countries but shall spread throughout the world.

Today this small nation of 16 million people is faced with estimates of $1¾ billion for the purpose of defending itself against this threat, and we in this parliament are properly quite concerned. We do not begrudge the money, and we are certainly in accord with the first sentence of the white paper:

> The aim of Canada's defence program and planning is to provide for the security of Canada.

We agree with that wholeheartedly. We have read this white paper through quite carefully and we are in agreement with the ideas expressed therein. I do not believe there is a single Canadian who will question the fact that it should be the aim of Canada to provide a program and plan of defence for the security of Canada; but the time has passed when we must accept these estimates blindly. I agree with every speaker who has spoken thus far and suggested that these estimates and the whole problem of defence should go before a committee on defence. I believe this committee should be permanent and should be sitting not necessarily only while the house is in session but as need arises throughout the year. The Leader of the Opposition made a moving demand for such action, and I am sure the thinking members of this house will support that demand.

The minister himself expressed the wish that we should ask questions so he could add to the information he has already given in his speech and in the white paper, but how can we ask questions when there is nothing concrete placed before us on which to base our questions? What facts have been given to us? Are we still at the stage where we are put off with the old eyewash that it is not in the national interest to make these things public? I claim that the only enemy we can think of at the present time knows more about our military defences than any member of this house, and I am not excepting the Minister of National Defence himself. Since coming to this house I have been made to feel that I would be disloyal if I questioned these estimates in any way, but I believe the day for that type of thinking is passed. The time has now come to get down to brass tacks and study in a businesslike manner the expenditures with which we are faced.

There is one thing we ask, and I think it is the important thing in the minds of most people. Are we getting value for the dollars being spent? The people of Canada have a right to know the answer, and we as their representatives have a right to get that answer for them. We want facts, not literary gems as we were handed in the white paper. I refer to paragraph 6, wherein we are told:

> Canada's principal support of the west's retaliatory striking power is our contribution towards early warning and air defence on this continent.

I should like you to visualize a map of Canada showing these warning lines on which we have spent so much money. We have the "Pinetree" system, the mid-Canada supplementary warning line and the distant early warning line. When we see these on the map we are lulled into what may be a false sense of security. I know that the defence department feels justified in having these lines and in feeling that it is the only way to provide what they hope these warning lines will provide. But we read articles in our press and periodicals, supposedly by experts, who tell us that these lines are obsolete. What are we to do? Whom should we believe?

There I think is another reason why we should have the opportunity of calling these experts before a committee and getting the facts. Millions have been spent on these lines. I hope they have been wisely spent, and I hope the plan to continue to spend many more millions will also be wise. But, on the other hand, if it should be proven that those lines are obsolete, why continue spending millions of dollars of our taxpayers' money on this system of defence? The taxpayers would certainly like to know.

Then in paragraph 7 we speak of our navy and the defence of our sea lanes. The minister recognizes our responsibility with respect to the naval service, but is recognition enough? In the same white paper, at page 6, we see a listing of our naval strength. It looks very imposing and I hope it is very effective. However, we should like to be assured by naval experts that the strength and the composition of our navy will allow it to do the job that will be required under conditions that will exist in a future war.

Then we come down to paragraph 9, which reads in part as follows:

> 9. As a result of the build-up in defence strength and organization during the past several years, Canada's armed forces are now more effective than ever before in our peace-time history.

That is certainly good news, Mr. Chairman; but then is it enough? It is not a question of whether these may be more effective than they have ever been before in our peacetime history. The question is whether they are effective in comparison with what we know is the standard today in the nations that may be our enemies tomorrow. That is the kind of information we want to get. Experts who profess to know something of the science of modern warfare contend that we lag far behind. I am not going to stand up here and put forward any opinion as to who is right or who is wrong. However, I would still say that we want to know the facts, and that the only way in which to get those facts is to have these experts before a committee set up to study the whole problem.

There is a controversy over the mobility of our forces and there is also a controversy in the old country at the present time over the same problem. I notice that there is a difference of opinion as to whether we should have fluid mobility on the ground or whether our defensive troops should be airborne. We see that the trend is toward airborne troops, and I am personally inclined to believe that that is the proper procedure. But then, in the light of the fact that experts have said it is unwise to neglect ground mobility, I would say that we should again ask ourselves the question, are we neglecting ground mobility for airborne mobility?

I am perfectly satisfied that, with regard to getting into the northern areas of Canada, we have not the roads by which we could transport troops. Instead of depending on air mobility, might not the smart thing be to build access roads into those areas? I can quite agree that if troops were landed by an enemy power in those parts of Canada, once they had occupied their position on the ground, in any attempt to meet that threat by means of airborne strength our forces would certainly be at a great disadvantage in landing, especially when within reach of an enemy who was already settled in those areas. Hence it may be that ground mobility still has a large place in the make-up and in the consideration of providing defence for our remote areas.

Of course there is another reason why we should have a committee, namely to get the considered findings of the experts who should know. We are not questioning the ability of any official of the Department of National Defence. I hope the plans that are being followed are the best plans that the brains and the know-how of our people can provide. But I believe that all doubt raised in our minds by these noted authorities not only in Canada but in the United States and Great Britain should be cleared away; and again I would say that the only way to do that is by means of a committee of this house.

I now come back to the first sentence in this white paper:

1. The aim of Canada's defence program and planning is to provide for the security of Canada.

The whole emphasis is on military defence, but I just wonder whether that is the all-important thing in connection with the problems which we we are facing today. The only enemy, of course, we have in mind is Russia and the iron curtain countries, but I sometimes wonder whether it is just wise to concentrate on warfare conducted entirely in a military manner. We think of world war III, the war about which we talk so much and hope will never happen. We visualize a rain of devastating destruction delivered by the Russians, something which may never happen yet could happen.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that we have been at war. This world war III has been going on for some years. In fact it has been going on ever since the communist leaders decided to spread their doctrines throughout the world. You can call it world war III, the cold war or the battle for men's minds—it makes no difference what you call it—but as yet there has been no clash of the armed forces and so far our defences are geared entirely to meet that clash that we are expecting to happen.

Yet there have been battles. We do not like to say that they have been wars. We like to refer to them as incidents. There has been the Korean incident. There has been the incident in Indo-China. There has been the incident in Morocco. There have been the Israeli-Arab border clashes. We have the Algeria incident, and we have the Cyprus incident. All this is similar to what was happening before the actual world war II broke out in full force. As you will remember, before that happened we had the Ethiopian incident and we had the Saar valley incident. They were similar to the incidents that are taking place in the world at the present time.

Then after world war II was actually under way in earnest, you will remember the months that the German army stood motionless before the Maginot line. You heard and read of the phony war. We could not understand what was going on or what was taking place. Yet actually what was going on? The same thing was going on at that time, Mr. Chairman, as is going on today. The nazis were no more idle than are the communists in this day and age. The nazis were softening the enemy from within. When this had been done, what happened? The German juggernaut rolled on into France almost without opposition. Laval and his gang had softened or had broken down the French people's will to resist, the will to defend themselves. Then we had Quisling in Norway.

I do not blame the local people or do not pretend to say that Quisling and Laval were set up there at the wishes of the Norwegian and the French people. These traitors, Mr. Chairman, were put there and encouraged to gain control of their people by the nazi agents, just the same as we have communist agents working in the various countries of the world today. This gives us something to think about. We do not like to even suspect that there may be a Quisling in Canada or in any of the other free nations of the world, but then who would ever have thought there would be a Quisling in Norway, a country we knew for generations as one of the most democratic and freedom-loving? Yet Quisling came to the front in Norway. The same thing could happen here. We have planning and scheming to weaken our people from within and to destroy our determination to stand for individual freedom and to defend our democratic way of life. In this struggle, Mr. Chairman, we can ask ourselves, will communism survive or will freedom prevail?

In this struggle I have mentioned these are incidents or steps in the greatest battle the world has ever known. There will be more leading up to the final clash. If it comes it will mean the obliteration of one of the great forces in the world. Will it be communism or democracy that survives? That is the question that thinking men and women of the free nations of the world are asking themselves as they look into the future. If the armed clash never comes it will be the greatest victory the free world has ever known. If it never comes it will mean that the communists know they have lost the battle for men's minds. It will mean that Canada and the other free nations have provided for their security, not by military preparedness but, as the hon. member who just spoke mentioned, by building up the determination and the will of the peoples of the free world to defend themselves against communism on the home front.

Communism, Mr. Chairman, is the enemy against which we must defend ourselves. It cannot be done with armies, ships and planes. It must be done by education, by leadership, by giving our people and all the free peoples of the world, as well as those people who would like to be free, a way of life and ideals that communism cannot give. That is the answer to communism both from without and within. It cannot be done by any one department. It cannot be done by the department of defence. It cannot be done by the government of Canada. But I will say that it can be done by all the governments and all the free nations co-operating in a plan to give the free peoples everywhere something better to live for, and something better to die for if need be. It will not be an easy struggle. It will take billions, but I am satisfied that the free world including the people of Canada will not be averse to spend their billions if they see they are winning in this fight against communism.

Mr. Fulton: Speaking earlier this morning, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence said he felt he had given all the explanations for which he had been asked, with one or two limited exceptions which he listed, and that he found it rather hard to understand why members criticized him or his department on the basis of being unable to get full information about national defence policy and activities. There is one outstanding matter for which I do not believe the minister will contend for a moment he has given adequate explanation or information, and that is the fact that the total asked in the estimates for national defence this year is dollar for dollar with the amount asked for last year, notwithstanding that there is in this country a large body of opinion which feels that our defence program should be substantially revised, and notwithstanding that in other major western countries there have already been substantial revisions of the defence program.

We have had nothing in the way of an adequate answer to the criticisms that have been made of the old look of Canada's defence program and of the concrete suggestions that have been made for revising and altering the character and composition of our defence program so we might have a new, up to date look with respect to our defence efforts. It is within that general framework of inability to get concrete, down to earth discussion of defence policy that the detailed criticism arises of the minister and his department for not furnishing adequate information. It is because of that sense of frustration, if you will, resulting from the inadequacy of the discussions and answers which are given here, that the demand for a committee on defence estimates has arisen. We have not had an adequate answer from the minister as to why that demand should not be met. It met with a substantial body of support in the press and from other informed critics in Canada. We have not had an adequate reply from the department.

It is also in that framework that I want to make certain criticisms of the department and of certain things which have taken place. It may be said that these incidents to which I shall refer are in themselves minor matters; at least of some of them that might be said. I am quite prepared to admit that one or two of them are small matters, primarily of local significance. However, the only explanation I can find for the incidents to which I shall refer is that the policy of the department and the minister's grasp of the department lack cohesion and lack a central co-ordination. It is the multiplication of this sort of incident which gives rise to the general criticism and the feeling that until we get some adequate method of discussing and coming to grips with defence policy, we shall not be able to improve the situation.

Reference was made earlier to certain unsatisfactory conditions with respect to civilian employees of the department. The minister in reply this morning told us that the Department of Labour carries out an annual study of the prevailing rates of wages in areas where the department employs casual or prevailing rates employees, and an attempt is made to keep the scales of pay of those employees of the department in conformity with the prevailing rates in the area. Well, we accept the minister's word for that, but I do not know why it is that there is so much dissatisfaction and such discrepancy between the rates paid to civilians in the department and those paid in comparable civilian employment in the area itself. I have annually, some cases more than annually, complaints from the employees of the naval ammunitions depot near my own city, particularly from the fire-fighting personnel in that depot. They had facts which they laid before me and which I passed on to the department, and they certainly substantiate their claim that they are not in receipt of remuneration comparable with that received by those in similar employment in strictly civilian capacities in that area.

Just recently I have had correspondence with the minister with regard to the situation at the former No. 37 ordnance ammunition depot at Kamloops, particularly with respect to the provision of fire-fighting personnel to protect that depot. There exists here a state of absolute confusion, confusion confounded, as I shall indicate to the minister by his own replies to me which are apparently at variance with what the department itself is doing there with respect to the employment of fire-fighting personnel.

We had three ammunition depots at Kamloops, a naval depot, an army ordnance ammunition depot and an air force depot. It was recently decided to close down the air force depot and move the personnel and I believe the ammunition to Edmonton, and that the army ordnance personnel should take over the air force depot. That move has now been completed and the former ordnance depot—that is the magazines and the physical installations—are no longer manned on a full-time basis by the ordnance corps personnel. I should of course observe that each of these ammunition depots naturally enough requires not only civilian guardians but adequately trained fire-fighting personnel ready at a moment's notice to deal with an outbreak of fire, should it take place. The situation is that the fire-fighting personnel formerly in charge of the work at the ordnance depot have been moved out to the former air force depot which the ordnance has taken over; but in the magazines of the former ordnance depot there is stored, and I am told will be stored permanently a very substantial amount of ammunition, though the personnel by and large have all been moved out to an area at least some 12 miles from where the former ordnance depot is. All that is left at the old depot to protect the magazines full of ammunition are five guards who are on a 24-hour basis, which means that there are three in the day watch, one in the evening watch and one at night.

I should point out to the committee that those magazines are near a growing area which was first built up by the Veterans Land Act authorities. It is just outside the city limits, and beyond it lies this Veterans Land Act settlement where there are now, I should think, at least 150 families and, as you will appreciate, Mr. Chairman, families in the nature of things with an increasing number of young children. I am told that the experience of the guards there has been that on an average of three times a week they have found those young children wandering about and getting into the area of the magazine. You will appreciate the concern that causes the parents, when they know that large quantities of ammunition are stored under what I submit definitely is inadequate care, and in an area back in the hills where children are in the habit of wandering about.

I brought this matter to the attention of the minister because I learned that the fire-fighting personnel previously in charge of these physical establishments had been laid off during the period of the move, and those at the former air force depot were now being laid off. Upon learning that and also upon learning of the concern felt by the residents of the district for the safety of their children and their own homes, I got in touch with the minister on June 18 and outlined the situation to him, and asked him a question in the house on June 20. In reply to that question the minister said, as recorded at page 5206 of Hansard:

> I have looked into the situation and according to the advice I have received there is a permanent staff of five civilian watchmen at No. 37 ammunition depot at Kamloops. They are all well-trained in fire prevention methods as laid down by the Royal Canadian Ordance Corps regulations. In addition, of course, the navy has a fire-fighting detachment on the other side of Kamloops which is on duty in three shifts 24 hours a day and is therefore always available.

I do not know whether or not the minister has been given the full information, though I would hope he would make it his own concern to get it because, as I told him, this is a matter of very great concern to the people of that district. The answer that there are five civilian watchmen at the depot gives a wrong impression. There are five there, yes; but they are, as I say, on three shifts. There are three during the main daylight watch, but in the two other watches there is only one to guard an area of a score or more of acres, if my impression is correct. There is only one telephone at the old entrance to the camp, and this one man, when there is one man on duty, has to make a tour of the area. If he should find any trouble he may be a matter of half a mile or a mile away from the telephone. When he is there all alone it would take him a matter of some minutes, at any rate, if not an appreciable number of minutes, to get back to the telephone and get word to anyone to come to render any assistance. This one man could not do anything with respect to fighting a fire, should a fire break out.

The minister says there is a naval fire-fighting staff. They are some three miles on the other side of the city. They would have to go right through the city to get there, and it seems to me to be courting disaster to say that a fire brigade which is still necessary on the basis of a constant 24-hour watch at the naval depot is going to be relied upon to travel about two miles, and then one mile through the city of Kamloops, and half a mile on the other side of the city and then deal with a fire out there. How long does the minister think it would be before men could be got to it, and what would happen to the naval depot in the meantime? Yet the minister apparently has been told, according to what he said to me, that his department thinks that adequate safeguards, adequate care and fire protection, are available at the old naval ammunition depot. He went on to explain the situation with regard to what I had told him in these words:

> I think probably what the hon. member refers to is that recently there was a fairly large amount of ammunition supplies being transferred to the depot at Rayleigh.

That is the former air force depot which the army took over. I continue:

> A number of civilians were engaged on a temporary basis to assist in this movement and to ensure safe handling. They were classified as watchmen or fire-fighters. When the transfer was complete they were released.

Well, I have written the minister again since this question and answer took place, pointing out to him some of the facts I have laid before him and before the committee, and I pointed out to him that it was an odd thing that he would tell me on June 20 that a number of these personnel had been released, notwithstanding what I had told him as to the necessity of fire-fighters at this former depot. Yet I have in my hand a poster put out by the civil service commission of Canada dated Vancouver, British Columbia, June 15, reading as follows:

> Civil Service of Canada Requires Fire-fighters—
> Department of National Defence—
> Kamloops, B.C.

On the one hand the department tells me on June 20 these men were laid off because their services were no longer required, and on June 15 the same department puts out a poster advertising for fire-fighters.

Mr. Campney: That was for the naval depot, as far as I am aware.

Mr. Fulton: Why were not the men transferred? One of the complaints I brought to the minister was that these men were being left without jobs. Why should there be this involved process of laying them off because they were not required at one depot—a statement with which I disagree—and then the expense of a poster and an examination or competition to take fire-fighters on at another depot? Does it not strike any ordinary person as being a sensible course of action, if these men were really not required at one place, to simply transfer them?

Mr. Campney: According to my information the men laid off were not actually fire-fighters, and I think I explained that when the question was raised in the house.

Mr. Fulton: They performed duties in the nature of fire-fighting and guard duties.

Mr. Campney: They were classified as fire-fighters, but they were actually movers of ammunition. I think that is the information I gave to the house.

Mr. Fulton: Some of them were, but my information is that others who are now without work were certainly involved—I am not able to say whether or not they were definitely classified in this way—and were performing the duties of fire-fighters before the move and during the time the move took place.

There is a twofold difficulty that the magazines not now in active use but in which a large quantity of ammunition is stored are without adequate guard and without adequate fire-fighting protection; these men have been laid off, and at the same time the civil service advertised for fire-fighters for the Department of National Defence at Kamloops.

I would ask the minister now to look into the situation himself and find out what are the facts. I am confident if that is done he will agree with me there is a need for another look at the situation. I believe there is some conflict of opinion in his own department concerning the matter. I believe that if he investigates the matter and gets to the bottom of it he will agree with me there is a confused and unsatisfactory situation in this connection.

I would also like to refer to another situation which is causing concern to the people of Canada, and that is in connection with the radar line installations. I have a twofold criticism here, both a general one and a particular one. We are very much concerned both over what Canada is spending on these radar lines from the point of view of whether we are getting value for the money. Others have discussed that and I do not need to deal in any detail with that problem. We are also concerned as to whether Canada has in fact parted with its sovereignty particularly with respect to the D.E.W. line, and to a lesser extent in connection with the "Pinetree" line, and whether the basis upon which the handing over of the installation and the manning of these lines to the United States was justified.

In this connection I would refer the committee to a thoughtful though critical article by Mr. Ralph Allen, the editor of Maclean's magazine, in the May 26 issue, entitled "Will D.E.W. line cost Canada its northland?" On page 17 of that issue of Maclean's, referring to the D.E.W. line installation, Mr. Allen said this:

> It is the charter under which a tenth of Canada may very well become the world's most northerly banana republic. For a sum of money that has been officially estimated at four hundred million dollars we have at least temporarily traded off our whole northern frontier. In law we still own this northern frontier. In fact we do not.

In the illustration on page 17 the approximate locations of the three lines are traced out and the following wording appears:

D.E.W. line, cost $400 million. United States pays all.

Mid-Canada line, cost $170 million. Canada pays all.

Pinetree line, cost $450 million. United States pays two thirds.

Judging from many of these articles and other comments I have heard and read the justification for the situation on the D.E.W. line is that it is of primary benefit to the United States. It is going to cost $400 million; therefore it is only fair that the United States who wanted it built as a crash program should pay for it. I have also seen suggestions to the effect that it is extremely questionable whether Canada had either the physical resources to build it or the trained and skilled personnel to man it, and therefore it is said again it is quite appropriate to have the United States build and man it on the basis they are doing.

Mr. Allen has some interesting comments on that aspect of the matter at page 69 of his article. This article is based, I should say, on a personal tour he made under arrangements made by our defence department and that of the United States government, in conjunction with a number of other newsmen. He says:

In return for the luxury of not spending money on the D.E.W. line we Canadians have surrendered something that for the last generation we have regarded as our greatest necessity: our independence. For a sum of money that during the approximate construction period of D.E.W. line—roughly 1954 to 1957—will be somewhat more than equalled by the taxes we will pay on tobacco, we have delegated the effective working control of at least 10 per cent of our land area to the United States air force.

Mr. Allen makes a sincere and conscientious effort to be fair about this, and he does pay tribute to the United States personnel who are manning these installations and those in charge of them at United States headquarters for their concerted effort not to be irritating to Canadians and to do everything possible to avoid any personal breaches or anything which would give rise to a feeling on the part of the Canadians that the Americans are in fact bossing the situation up there. He does point out, however, that the existence of the situation makes such a feeling inevitable despite how conscientiously the Americans may try to avoid it, and he gives these examples of the feeling that has been engendered.

The following incident occurred on the way up to the R.C.A.F. station at Frobisher bay on Baffin island. In referring to the incident on page 70 the author says:

Later the station commander explained the exact division of functions on the base between the U.S. and Canadian air forces. "The USAF," he said, "is responsible for administration and operations. The R.C.A.F. is responsible for policy." Walking back to the mess, I asked a fellow reporter what he made of these distinctions. "It's easy", he said. "If you want to fly airplanes around here, you ask Washington. If you want to open a saloon you ask Ottawa."

A little later on he says:

But no amount of rough-hewn, new-world courtesy can conceal from anyone the simple facts that our basic allegiances—

He was referring to the two allegiances as between Canada and the United States.

—though nearly parallel, are not exactly so and that a good and loyal Canadian and a good and loyal American are not necessarily good and loyal in precisely the same manners and directions.

I am going to quote at some length from this because it is a revealing article. He refers to the feeling which is engendered as between Canadians and Americans out of the D.E.W. line and the inevitable feeling of annoyance which comes to Canadians. I continue:

In this confusion and mistrust there may lie unsuspected threats to the shadow of Canadian dominion over the Canadian north. The substance has already begun to disappear.

The most experienced and responsible Canadian I met in the north was a man I'd rather not identify more closely than that. I asked him bluntly: "Do you and your friends resent the presence of the Americans here?" "No," he said sadly, "it's the other way around. They resent our presence here."

Then he sums it up as follows:

How many dollars equal how much independence? How much independence have we really lost and how much of it could we have saved? How much more will be lost as our comfortable acceptance of the presence here of U.S. military commanders, U.S. military troops and U.S. military installations becomes as naturally ingrained as our acceptance of U.S. business capital and U.S. television, books and movies. To make any comparison, however remote, between what a few Canadian NATO squadrons might mean to the national identity of France and what a U.S. military base 2,500 miles long within Canada's geographical limits might mean to the national identity of Canada is to invoke one of the largest and sickest red herrings in the history of debate.

Under the original agreement Canada still has the right to take over the operation of D.E.W. line on "reasonable notice". To do so might represent a decline in the quality of our bookkeeping but there are good reasons to believe it would also represent an improvement in the quality of our statesmanship.

That is the sort of situation which makes Canadians question the policies of the Canadian government with respect to national defence the way we intend to defend our country, to do our part in defending Canada, as we say we do from time to time, according to the statements of the minister in the house and as contained in the white paper. The question is whether this money we are spending is being spent wisely and efficiently.

The other experiences which have occurred in connection with these radar installations give rise to the same outlook. These experiences have to do with the readiness of the department to hide its actions under the cloak of security considerations. It is disturbing to the Canadian people to learn that these things are being built, and they want to find what they are being built for and how much they are costing. You cannot get that information because of the so-called security.

I should like to relate a couple of experiences I had which reinforce this feeling. There is a radar installation in the northern part of my riding. I am quite certain that its location is known not only to our potential enemy but to hundreds of my own constituents. It was supposed to be a secret. Suddenly a large number of United States service personnel began to move into the area with bulldozers, trucks and other equipment. Contractors began to move around and considerable construction took place at a point some 60 miles from the nearest substantial centre of population.

I was up visiting this area one day and found people waiting for me at the hotel. They wanted to know what they could do about getting compensation from the government for the damage they had suffered because of the construction of this radar station. I told them there was not much point in my trying to obtain anything because I knew nothing about it. They asked me if I did not know that the United States was building a big radar station at a point which I shall call X. I told them I knew they were building a radar line, but I did not know the exact location. I told them that when I went back I would take it up with the department. I was given the details of the damage suffered.

The minister's predecessor was then in charge of the department, and when I came back I outlined this situation to him in as strong language as I could use and still be polite. I told him I felt it was absolute folly that the last person to learn of the installation of a radar station in a constituency should be the member who represented that constituency. I said that a member should not be placed in the position of going up to an area and having people ask him how they would go about getting compensation, and having to say that he did not know the station was there.

I pointed out to the then minister, as I point out to the present minister, that these things cannot be kept secret. You cannot instal a radar station and bring in Americans with all their construction equipment and keep it a secret. Members of parliament, whether on the opposition side or the government side, should be in a position to be of assistance to the department in smoothing the way for the installation of these things, in smoothing the settlement of claims and in explaining to their people who are annoyed at what is going on, that the installation is necessary and justified. A member should be in the position of being able to assist the department in explaining these things to those who from time to time are resentful and critical.

The minister of that day agreed. He said he felt that was a reasonable point of view, that perhaps it was not wise that these things should be kept secret from members, especially when knowledge of them was bound to become widespread.

Recently I was taking my family home for the summer, and after spending two or three days in Kamloops I returned to Ottawa. At that time I was not making any extensive tour, but my next door neighbour asked me about the radar station that was being constructed up at a place he named not very far north of Kamloops. He told me that United States servicemen were moving in in large numbers. I said that I thought this was the same old story, that this was supposed to be a security matter and I asked him what he knew about it. He told me that they could not find out very much about it, as they were told it was secret. But some United States servicemen had come in along with construction machinery. This was all taking place on a favourite ski slope, but the area was fenced off and they could not get in there. Yet no one was supposed to know anything about it. You go home and you have your neighbours asking you about these things and you have to give the foolish answer that it is a security matter and members of parliament cannot be told about it; and all this notwithstanding the conversation I had with the minister's predecessor, when I thought the point had been established.

On the way back to Ottawa on the train I picked up the Winnipeg Free Press at Winnipeg as I always do, which contained the following article:

Four Die in B.C. Crash

Kamloops, B.C. (CP)—Four Vancouver men, on a top-secret survey mission for the federal government, died Wednesday in the unexplained crash of their amphibian aircraft.

A transport department investigation has been ordered.

Carl J. Baxter has been identified as the pilot. Also aboard were Don McVeigh, a construction superintendent and Ron Grierson, both employees of Bennett and White Construction Co. Ltd., of Vancouver.

The fourth man was identified as W. J. Sckyra of Defence Construction, Ltd., a crown corporation operated by the Department of Defence Production.

The plane, a twin-engine Grumman Widgeon, was owned by Bennett and White but company officials declined comment on the nature of the survey, stating:

"It is classified—we can't tell you everything."

The article said "everything" but I think they should have said "anything" because that is the attitude of the department. In a later press story I saw that the crash had taken place on the mountain near Kamloops on which this radar installation was being made. How absolutely ridiculous it is. Not only are we not told in this house the particulars of the cost and purposes of these things, we are told that we cannot even be told where they are located. We go home and are asked by our constituents about it, and we are the last people to find out about it. Then an airplane crash takes place practically on the site, and it is reported in the press, but they say, "We still cannot say anything about it or what is going on up there." We are not able to get information when United States servicemen are being brought into the area and say, as they have in the past on occasion said to our Canadian consituents, "You can't come in here, bud; this is security." We are told this is all supposed to be secret, that these things are to be installed and the Americans are manning them.

No wonder the Canadian people are critical of the attitude of the department and the way it spends their money, and no wonder members of parliament are unable to do anything but agree with the Canadian people in that attitude. I feel no false personal pride as a member of parliament. I am only saying that because I am a member of parliament I should be told, because one of the things that members are for is to obtain knowledge on behalf of their constituents of what goes on. What the government overlooks so often, it seems to me, is that members of parliament have a right to know and that the people also have a right to expect their members to be informed so they can tell them what is going on, and so the members can exercise their proper function of ensuring that the people's money is spent wisely and that the people are getting value for that money.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exceeded his time. However, with the permission of the committee, he could, of course, conclude his remarks.

Mr. Fulton: I am just concluding. The situation I have outlined makes it impossible for members to discharge that function or to draw any other conclusion than that the people's money is being wasted and that attempts are being made to hide a good deal of the waste behind a veil of so-called security.

Mr. MacLean: Four or five decades ago wars were small operations engaged in by a few professional troops. War itself was probably looked upon as an extension of diplomacy. It was something to be used where diplomatic methods failed. Up to the first world war, the nations of the world had war departments as departments of government. Then, with the last two world wars, people began to realize that wars were no longer something engaged in only by a few professionals. They were no longer matters that were not the concern of the whole population, because a modern war required the efforts of the whole population and could be a national catastrophe. Then it became the custom to call certain departments of the government "departments of defence" or "departments of national defence". War departments became defence departments.

Since the second world war there has been a great acceleration in this evolution. It may or may not have been progress, but in any case we in this age find ourselves in an entirely new set of circumstances. It is my contention that under the present circumstances what we need in reality is not a department of defence but a department of survival or, better still, a whole segment of government which in close co-operation and co-ordination tries to discover a means whereby we as a people and as a nation can survive.

I am deeply worried by the fact that, instead of that, we seem to have not even a government with certain departments concerned directly or indirectly with defence but a government made up of compartments which should together be concerned with defence, compartments which see their own problems and try to meet them conscientiously but without seeing the significance of the over-all picture. This set-up reminds me of the six blind men of Indostan, who went to see an elephant so they—

Mr. Dickey: That was in your leader's speech the other day.

Mr. MacLean: —could have a first-hand view of the situation—

Mr. Dickey: The same elephant.

Mr. MacLean: It is the same problem, and it is an elephantine one anyway.

Mr. Dickey: You must have got the same script.

Mr. MacLean: Now that the senior member for Halifax has finished, I shall continue. We have the situation where the Department of National Defence is carrying on programs, I think conscientiously, trying to meet the problems of defence as it sees them from a professional soldier's point of view. We have the Department of Defence Production claiming that it has no concern except to supply what the Department of National Defence requires, regardless of whether or not it makes sense from a production point of view. As a result of that, we also have the Department of Defence Production doing most of its producing in our large cosmopolitan areas. The result is that our large cities are growing larger every day, and to house the growing number of workers congregated in these areas we have the Minister of Public Works helping to build more houses in these congested areas. From there the problem is tossed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is responsible for the matter of civil defence. These problems are being created by one department to be solved by another.

We have the situation that our cities have become so large and congested that it would be impossible, or at least impractical, to evacuate them in case of an atomic attack. That is why I likened the situation to the six blind men of Indostan. The minister of defence could be likened to the second of the six:

> The second, feeling of the tusk,
> Cried, "Ho! what have we here
> So very round and smooth and sharp?
> To me 'tis mighty clear
> This wonder of an elephant
> Is very like a spear!"

That illustrates in a homely way the situation of defence if you look at it only from the point of view of professional soldiers. There was a fifth man also, the one who happened to grope against the ear, but to save the minister embarrassment I shall not mention him further.

I say this not in a spirit of ridicule or of jest but because I think it is a suitable homely illustration of what the situation actually is. We have ministers apparently living like hermits within their own departments, thinking only of the immediate problems that come to those departments. There seems to be a lack of over-all review of the situation and a lack of co-ordination, so that the efforts of one department will not create problems in another.

A moment ago I mentioned the problem in connection with our growing cities. As far as I can see there is no conscious endeavour by the government to curtail or to direct in a different direction the tendency of our large metropolitan areas to grow even larger. To me, if an atomic war should ever occur this is a problem of major importance. I think it is fair to say that at the present time there is no means of defending large cities 100 per cent against atomic attack, even against aircraft let alone against other means such as the intermediate range ballistic missile or the intercontinental ballistic missile of the future.

I think perhaps there is a tendency to take large cities for granted. Not only is there that tendency, but there is a tendency to brag about the fact that our cities are growing larger all the time and are surpassing other cities in population, area and that sort of thing. To me that sort of thing is something like a hypochondriac boasting about the magnitude of his ailments. Cities now are obsolete.

Cities were first created for three principal reasons. It was necessary that they be congested because a wall had to be put around them for defence. Second, in previous ages communication was a great problem and could be accomplished only by sending a messenger from one person to another. Third, there was the problem of transportation.

In this day and age of instantaneous communication cities are not justified on those grounds. On the ground of transportation they are not justified, because our cities now have become so large and congested that we are obliged to tunnel through the earth to get from one place to another, and it is impossible to find a place to park in most of them. Then in the third place, from the point of view of defence modern cities are a detriment and a handicap rather than an asset because, as our cities grow larger, a larger and larger percentage of our population and of our potential production can be knocked out by a minimum number of atomic bombs. It is therefore my belief that large cities, perhaps even cities over 50,000 in population, are as obsolete as are medieval castles in this day and age.

I feel that we have here a huge problem—an elephantine problem,—as I said before. I feel it is one that must be attacked with a brave new way of thinking, with the realization that progress is not something that just happens by accident and is not something that is inevitable, but that it is something that must be brought about by hard work, conscience and sound thinking. We as a nation at this time need real, inspired, and dedicated leadership. We require men of great ability to find the thread that leads to progress in the tangled skein of problems that are before us at the present time.

The lack of such leadership has left us like babes in the woods, like children lost in the countryside, not knowing what direction will lead to escape. Sometimes we wander in the direction of progress and sometimes we wander by accident in the way of retrogression, thinking that we escape. Real leadership can correct that situation.

Speaking of babes in the woods reminds me that I used to notice, in England during the last war, that when one was on the ground one had the impression that the landscape of England was very confused and irregular, and that every landmark led to nowhere in particular. But those who flew over England found that once you got up above the tangle of the situation you realized that there were straight lines radiating in all directions across England, especially from the old Roman camps, and that those lines were made up perhaps of a road here or a mark of a different colour across a field or something of that sort. That is the sort of situation we are in at the present time. We need leadership that will see the whole problem and coordinate our effort in one direction so we can make progress, and so the progress will be real, not something that is painted as progress but which in actual fact may be retrogression.

I think at the present time there is a real necessity for all leaders in all fields in this country to have a real appreciation of the problem before us. It is no longer something that can be left as a problem to be met only by professional soldiers. The problem is wider than that. As a step in this direction I should like to see set up in this country a defence college to which leaders in all phases of life would go in order to get an appreciation of what the problem is. Such a plan should include leaders in industry as well as our top-ranking military men. It should include political leaders and our top scientists. The problem of survival is a complicated one that involves all these fields.

If we are trying to look into the future and see what are the immediate possibilities, we can see that there are a number that are open to us. By some happy combination of chance we might in the near future embark upon a future of real peace. If that were the case, defence would become a secondary problem. But as far as I can see at the moment there does not seem to be any likelihood of that happening in the immediate future. We may find ourselves engaged in a period of small wars like the Korean war and others. Only in such a situation would our present defence efforts meet the problem because, generally speaking, our defence concept is based on former wars rather than on what may occur in the future, although I grant that in many directions attempts are being made to meet the problems that may arise in the future.

Then of course we may be obliged to live through a prolonged period of cold war during which we will have to spend large amounts on national defence. If we fail to meet that threat it is not because we are not spending large amounts of treasure and great amounts of energy and endeavour in national defence. For example, this year it is proposed that we spend $1,804 million on defence; that includes defence production and civil defence. This amount is 37 per cent of our national budget and about 7 per cent of our gross national product. Hence if we fail to survive it will not be because we have not spent enough money. But on the other hand we should realize that the spending of money alone will not guarantee survival.

There are many lessons to be learned from history in that regard. Only recently the French nation spent vast sums to build the Maginot line. Further back in history you have similar examples. It was not lack of endeavour or lack of funds that prevented them from defending themselves when the war came. In a condition of prolonged cold war, in our very effort to defend ourselves we may defeat our ends. We may lose some of our liberties; we may strain our resources in other directions so we cannot compete commercially in world markets and our economy will suffer. I think it was Nietzsche, the famous German philosopher of the last century, who said that simply by being compelled to keep constantly on his guard a man may grow so weary as to be unable any longer to defend himself. There is a real danger that the western world in general might find itself in that position if the cold war continues.

Then there is the theory, of course, that we can dispense with most of our expensive defences of a conventional nature and bank everything on massive retaliation, and in that way scare any potential enemy out of attack on us. This, in my opinion, is a dangerous gamble at best. It is only a type of Russian roulette, and some day if that is continued, though it may be justified on a short-term basis, someone is going to pull the trigger and have his brains blown out. If that should happen we would be engaged in a full scale atomic war, something that is more horrible to contemplate than the average person realizes.

There is a tendency for humans generally, I suppose, to have a blind faith that this cannot happen to them. Most of the peoples of the past who fell into tragedy and were eliminated believed it could not happen to them. They lived on in blissful ignorance until the catastrophe was upon them. There are those people who feel that a full scale atomic war would be too horrible to contemplate and therefore it cannot happen. If we look at history at all it does not show that just because a thing is horrible it will not happen.

I am not one who tends to give much credence to prophecy; nevertheless I would not be so callous as to suggest that such a thing is impossible. If one reads through Tennyson's "Locksley Hall", which was written about 115 years ago, he will be struck by the accuracy of some of the prophecies there. For instance, one verse reads:

When I dipt into the future far as human eye could see;
Saw the vision of the world, and all the wonder that would be.
Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales;

We in our lifetime have seen that prophecy fulfilled, not only in general outline but even to the extent of the way in which it is presented.

Mr. Philpott: Why not recite the optimistic part?

Mr. MacLean: There are optimistic parts, but I am going to give the next verse which is not an optimistic one, and if it proves to be true it is something rather horrible to contemplate. This verse reads:

Heard the heavens fill with shouting, and there rain'd a ghastly dew
From the nations' airy navies grappling in the central blue;

I am not suggesting that the policy of the defence department should be based on Tennyson's poems or anything of that sort. Nevertheless that lays before us a picture of what may be in store for us. A responsible senior officer of the United States recently gave evidence before a committee of the United States Senate, and estimated that in a full scale atomic attack on Russia as many as 800 million lives might be wiped out, depending on the direction of the wind. Most people do not realize that the hydrogen bomb is measured in megatons, the equivalent of a million tons of T.N.T. A modern hydrogen bomb could wipe out a city entirely, leaving nothing in its place but a huge crater. In addition there would be great destruction from atomic fall-out for a long distance down wind. Those of us who live in the extremities of the country have concern and pity for the people who are forced to live in the large urban areas of this country for many reasons, and that is only one of them. If we wanted to be selfish about it, I do not think I could imagine anything less desirable than to have atomic fall-out land on my farm which consisted of the debris of and ashes of the inhabitants of a city like Toronto; but it is something that would be a reality if full scale atomic war were to come about.

There is a tendency for us to take a narrow view of things, not only so far as the general concept of the problem is concerned but to put a special importance on the small period of time in which we happen to be living. We are in the position that we have very little knowledge of the life of the earth except for a small period of recorded history. We are in the position of the weaver who can only see the last thread in the carpet in the loom. We would appreciate our own insignificance if we were in a position to unroll the carpet and see the full pattern from which we might be able to determine where we go from here. We should realize that for vast eons of time before man was ever seen on the earth, life went on in the form of lower animals and insects.

It is believed, as a matter of fact, that for a long period of time insect life was the major form of life on the earth and that a higher form did not evolve at that time because radioactivity was still so intense the higher forms of life could not survive. It is a scientific fact that insects can stand a much higher concentration of radioactivity than the higher forms of life. It may well be that if a full scale atomic war should ever come the results may be more devastating than we even care to contemplate. But the fact that that is so will not prevent it. As a matter of fact, it could well be that after such a war the human species might be found only in remote islands in the Pacific or down around Cape Horn, or somewhere like that.

Of course, I have been asked to look at the optimistic side, and there is a long-range optimistic thing about this. That is that radioactivity also causes an acceleration in evolution by mutation, and after a long period of this, after a full-scale atomic war, it might be that a more intelligent form of human being might evolve, a form of human being that could find the means of solving the problems that to us have been so insurmountable, a type of human being that could even learn to find a way whereby nations could live in peace with each other. To satisfy the hon. member who interrupted I shall quote, though I did not intend to, a more optimistic verse from the same poem:

There the common sense of most shall hold a fretful realm in awe,
And the kindly earth shall slumber, lapt in universal law.

That is desirable, no doubt, but I should like to think there is a more direct way of achieving it that we do not have; that even not we have arrived at the position where we shall learn, without having to learn the hard way, because the hard ways to learn are getting harder all the time and more destructive all the time, and the chances of survival are becoming less and less.

I would like to think that we can have some real leadership in this problem of defence, this problem of survival, and that some attention will be given to those wider aspects of the whole problem. I have avoided, and intentionally avoided, speaking about the particular problems of the minister's department at this time, but I may talk about some of them as the individual items are called. I make no apology for that, because I believe it is good once in a while to stop looking at the individual trees and stand back and try to have some conception of what the whole forest looks like. Only by that process can we meet these problems that the human race has never met before, has never been confronted with before; problems that cannot be solved by old methods, problems that require decisive action, the best brains available and concerted dedication to their solution. Only if that comes about can we hope to suggest that Tennyson was justified when he said:

> Yet I doubt not thro' the ages one increasing purpose runs,
> And the thoughts of men are widen'd with the process of the suns.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to delay the committee but I do think a number of things have been said in the debate this afternoon that call for some comment. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings and the hon. member for Kamloops and others have spoken of the danger of our defence planning taking on the aspect of a "stockade mentality", which was the term used by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings. This arises out of the very large expenditures and the very great and extraordinary efforts that over the past few years have gone into the construction of the radar warning lines that are now taking shape in Canada's northland.

Of course the question of one's mentality and one's approach to these things is a matter of individual responsibility, and I cannot speak for the hon. members who have expressed this view. All I can say is that I have not been able to find in anybody with whom I have discussed these things in the defence department or in the other departments of government that are dealing with them, or among the public, anything that indicates that there is any kind of a "stockade mentality". I think these early warning and other warning lines are properly understood and their function is quite reasonably well appreciated. They are what the term implies, warning lines.

The hon. members opposite who speak on matters of defence generally have some experience in one or other of the armed services, and I am sure they know and realize that in military matters the most important and the most essential thing is to know where your enemy is and what he is doing. In modern warfare, in a situation where we must foresee and where we may be faced with the possibility of aerial attack over the vast uninhabitated northern areas of Canada, I cannot imagine any other way in which the essential information of where our enemy is and to where he is going can be secured except by using these modern developments of radar and electronic communication to get that essential information.

Nobody believes that simply getting that information is any defence, any more than to pick up a spyglass and see the armada coming over the horizon in the English channel was any defence against the armada in that day. It is a matter of getting the information about your enemy's movements in the best and the quickest way possible and getting it when the enemy is as far away from his objective as is possible, and then communicating that information to the vital defence centres and taking the necessary remedial action.

If the expenditures that are being made and the very extraordinary efforts that have been put out by the contractors and the people who have been working on these lines are going to be misunderstood and represented purely as building up a Maginot line across the northern part of this country, I think a good deal of the value of these things will be wasted. I believe it would be well for all hon. members of this house to take a more realistic and more fundamental approach to these problems.

Most of the hon. members who have spoken in the debate this afternoon have, in one way or another, repeated the suggestion which has been heard so often inside this house and outside of it that there is a lack of information in this country about defence. Before we take this repeated assertion as proof we should look for a moment at the information that is available, not only to our members but to the Canadian public generally, and see just what are the facts.

First of all, the basic facts of national defence are very easily available to all hon. members and to members of the general public. In the first place there is the annual report of the department. That is a publication which is simply crammed with facts about national defence, about the three services, about what has gone on during the year and about the general policies which are being followed by the department and the success that is being achieved in meeting the defence objectives we have set up.

Then there is the white paper which is prepared by the department and tabled in the house annually by the minister prior to consideration of the defence estimates. That is also a publication that is put out to explain the basic policies of the department, outlining the particular achievements which have been realized during the year and setting out tables showing the strength of the forces and detailed information of that kind which is thus available to the house and the public.

In connection with matters of policy within the department and of defence policy more generally in the international sphere there are statements made from time to time in the house by the Minister of National Defence, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and by the Prime Minister which clearly set out the matters with which the department is dealing, our relations with our NATO allies, the projects that we undertake either in general association with other NATO countries or in special association either with the United States, the United Kingdom or another of our allies and related subjects of that kind.

Then concerning the question of expenditures there are 110 pages of details of the expenditures of the Department of National Defence in the public accounts this year. Every year a similar number of pages, which are very closely printed and full of facts, are contained in that document which is readily available. In the book of estimates that is before the committee at the present time there are over 40 pages of details of the expenditures which we are presently considering.

Finally, the Minister of National Defence and other ministers concerned with the more general aspects of defence are in the house every day the house is sitting and are subject to questioning by hon. members opposite.

The hon. member for Kamloops raised a question about security and the denial of information on that basis, and the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke raised very briefly the same problem. It is a problem. I am sure nobody claims that any system of security can be perfect. I am equally sure no one claims it is possible by classifying a particular project or subject and saying that information relating to it cannot be published can in every case prevent information getting out into the public domain that is either helpful to potential enemies or which is capable of being helpful to them.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, all hon. members must agree that a department dealing with so many matters which are of a secret nature of which the confidential nature must be kept through some system of security, must lay down some rules which the department itself must to the best of its ability respect, not only in our own national interest but also in the light of our duty to keep faith with our allies, who share very confidential information with us in the belief that we will make a reasonable effort to see that such information is treated with the confidence it deserves. That is all that is implied in those rare and unusual cases when it is said in this house, in committee or some other place that information on a certain subject must be denied publication because of the consideration of security.

In addition to what I have already said, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of common knowledge to everybody in the country that Canadian newspapers, newsreels and radio and television programs contain a great mass of information about our armed forces and about what is taking place in matters of defence.

Many hon. members of this house during the last few sessions alone have visited radar stations of the kind referred to by the hon. member for Kamloops, and have visited air stations and the defence centre at St. Hubert, for example. They have visited army camps, naval depots and ships as well. In other words the integral parts of our defence set-up and of the three services are open for inspection.

It may be that some particular development of a confidential nature with respect to armaments or something of that kind may have to be kept confidential, but one might say that 99 per cent of these installations are open for inspection, and the greatest facilities are given by the minister and the department for members of parliament—and at times when it can be arranged for members of the public—to visit these places and see for themselves what is going on and understand as best they can what our defence system comprises.

Let me review very briefly what are the main facts about Canadian defence that are so well known. First of all it is well known that we have an air division and an army brigade in Europe. At least 20 hon. members of this house in the last few years have visited either or both units of the air division and the army brigade. A number of hon. gentlemen have reported on their visits in this house, and I have yet to hear any hon. member report that he was not permitted to visit freely and was not given every facility for inspecting these overseas installations to see how things were going, to talk with the officers and men involved and to see their equipment and all that sort of thing. What more could be done to disclose to the members of this house and the Canadian public what we are doing in connection with our contribution to NATO? I think very little further can be done, and I have heard no suggestions as to exactly what more could be done.

We have three army brigades and a mobile striking force in Canada; that is well known. The camps at which the army units are stationed are known not only to hon. members of this house but to the public, and many people who are interested secure access to these army installations. They see what is going on. In many cases they have friends amongst the officers and men and they receive a great deal of information. Information of this nature is freely available to every hon. member of this house. Any hon. gentleman in this house can visit these locations, as I am sure many of them have done, and if they find anything they think is wrong or anything they think is not being done in accordance with proper policy they are free to bring it up in the house, either on the estimates or as a question on orders of the day.

Then with respect to the navy, in which I am particularly interested, we have two main and substantial naval installations located in Nova Scotia and another substantial installation on the west coast. These installations are on exactly the same basis as the army installations all over the country. People who are interested in what is going on can find out. Civilians work in these places along with service personnel, and there is no lack of information about the things being achieved in the naval installations.

We have 40 fighting ships serving on both coasts. While those ships are not generally open for inspection, they are open at regular times when the public are invited to come aboard. I know that quite often hon. members when on the east or west coast take advantage of the opportunity to visit these ships, and often go on short cruises at sea.

As far as the air force is concerned, it is well known that we have nine CF-100 squadrons in Canada on an operational basis and that altogether we have more than 3,000 aircraft which are operational. The R.C.A.F. stations both at home and overseas are open in the same way as are the naval and army installations.

By reason of all this anyone who is really interested in our defence spending and policy can look around if he wishes to do so. On the basis alone of information that is so widely and generally available, any hon. member has ready access to much factual material, and if he desires additional information he can put questions or inform himself in any number of ways.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings repeated and supported the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition with respect to the type of defence committee the Leader of the Opposition now thinks should be set up by this house to look into defence matters. Of course this is based on the incorrect assumption and repeated assertion that information on defence is not readily available. I submit that that is not correct, but in any event that is the basis of the request for a committee.

The hon. member went on to explain the kind of information he would like to get through such a committee. Actually most of the information is just as easily available when the estimates are being considered as it would be in such a committee.

However, it is interesting to look at the history of these requests by the Leader of the Opposition for committees on defence. Most hon. members will remember that in 1950 after the defence program got under way as a result of the Korean war the Leader of the Opposition started to ask for a committee on defence expenditures. The presumption then was that the very large amounts of money that were being spent on defence were being spent to a large extent improperly and wastefully. So the request was made for a committee on defence expenditure.

That request was considered by the government and was granted. My understanding of the matter is that the Leader of the Opposition was consulted with respect to the terms of reference to that committee, and that as a matter of fact those terms were drawn up in what he considered to be the proper wording in order to bring about the result he wanted in connection with the examination of defence expenditures.

That committee sat during three sessions. It sat first in the short session of the fall of 1951, when it held five meetings. But even then it received a tremendous amount of information which was asked for by members of the committee. The committee was set up again at the next session, that of 1952, under the same terms of reference. It held 17 meetings and received a correspondingly greater mass of information on defence expenditures and defence matters which I do not think has been equalled by any other committee of this house and so far as I know not equalled by a similar committee anywhere else. Then the committee was set up again in 1953, and during that session held 26 meetings.

During the three sessions the committee held a total of 48 meetings and there are three volumes of the proceedings. The first one is rather small but the other two are quite substantial indeed. The way the committee operated was to ask the opposition members on the committee what features of defence expenditure they wanted to examine, and arrangements were made to examine those features in which they were most interested. You have only to refer to the minutes of proceedings to see the steps which were taken to consult with members of the opposition as to particular features at which they wanted to look. You can follow the proceedings right through and see how they were given every possible facility to question the officials who were dealing with the particular matters that they themselves had selected.

What was the result? The result was that the opposition members did not find what they thought they were going to find. They did not turn up the kind of mismanagement of defence expenditures and extravagance and the various things which they had stated in the debate before the committees were set up they were sure were there.

Mr. Dufresne: What about the horses?

Mr. Sinclair: They did not even turn up at most of the meetings.

Mr. Dickey: The hon. member who was not in the house at the time should be the last member of the opposition who at this stage should bring up any reference to the so-called horses on the payroll which were proved to be non-existent.

Mr. Harkness: No, they were not; they were proved to be there.

Mr. Dickey: In any event I would have thought that this business of horses on the payroll would be such a sorry memory for the Tory party that its members would not dare to revive these non-existent horses. The facts that came out so clearly as a result of this defence expenditures committee was that the opposition were not looking for facts. What they were looking for were facts that would conform to their preconceived ideas of what the facts should be. When the facts were proved to be different, then they were not facts.

Mr. Harkness: A completely incorrect statement.

Mr. Dickey: No, it is not an incorrect statement.

Mr. Harkness: Completely incorrect.

Mr. Dickey: In addition to the various publications I have referred to and the long list of means which I have submitted the department takes to put facts before the house and the country, we have the three volumes of facts which were presented to this committee. The Leader of the Opposition and members of the opposition say that these are not facts. Why do they say they are not facts? Because they do not happen to agree with them. The facts as proved did not agree with what they hoped they would find.

Mr. Harkness: You are absolutely wrong.

Mr. Dickey: I submit that in reality this is the situation. Hon. members of the opposition are really searching around not for material on defence but for political material. That has been only too obvious in the past.

There has been some criticism about the armed forces in general. The point that should be emphasized in this debate is that anybody who has had occasion to look at the armed forces of Canada either at home or abroad has reported most favourably on the way in which those armed forces perform, their morale, their training and their general excellence. Some people who have made these statements—and I may say that I refer to members of this house—go on to say, in spite of this excellence that everything is wrong with the Department of National Defence. They say it is poorly organized, that the minister is not doing his job properly, that there are too many civilians hanging around, that they are not doing a good job, and direct these criticisms at the department.

How can a department which could be in any way described in the way hon. members describe the Department of National Defence possibly produce the excellent results that they admit are produced? It is the three armed services that are the real testimony to the organization of the Department of National Defence and the way the department is carrying out its purposes and its policies. I certainly am more than prepared to rest any defence that the minister and the department might need on the record of the three armed services of Canada, a record of which, I am sure, even hon. members opposite are proud.

Mr. Hahn: I promise the committee that I shall not hold them as long as the previous speaker. It is not my purpose to deal in generalities with statements made by others in this debate. I would agree with the statements by other members of this group with regard to charges, made by respected leaders, that have gone unanswered. As the minister said today, some of them were opinions and not facts, I feel that possibly we should have these men before a special committee set up for the purpose of discussing defence so we may arrive at our own conclusions as to whether they are opinions or facts. These men could answer the charges, and we could decide for ourselves.

The question I have in mind, however, is one of which I am not too sure the minister is completely aware. It has to do with the demoralizing effect on our civil service and casual employees of the Department of National Defence who are concerned with the labour pay question on the Pacific coast. I speak more specifically of the Chilliwack area.

The question I have in mind is that of rates of pay offered by the department for certain jobs as compared with the current rates of pay effective in the Chilliwack area. I am using as an illustration the rates for a certain project that was undertaken by the Department of National Defence on September 1, 1955, as compared with the current rates of pay in the Chilliwack area for the same jobs, effective on February 15, 1956. Whilst there is a slight discrepancy in the period, the minister will recognize that there is not enough difference in time to compensate for the difference in pay.

I begin by mentioning the wages paid to carpenters in each instance. The Department of National Defence pays $2.22 per hour for carpenters employed in the Chilliwack area, and the current rate of pay in the same area is $2.22 for other employees working at carpentering. Of course these two are comparable, and this is the only instance, I may say at this time, where the wages compare in any way.

Chauffeurs and truck drivers in the Department of National Defence are paid $1.45 per hour; in Chilliwack chauffeurs and truck drivers get $1.60 per hour. Heavy equipment operators in the Department of National Defence get $1.75 per hour; others working in the same area get $2.45 per hour. Those are men employed on drag line crane and bulldozer work. The ordinary labourer in the Department of National Defence gets $1.40; the labourer not working on defence projects gets $1.60. Plumbers' and steamfitters' helpers in the Department of National Defence get $1.55, as opposed to $1.85. The plumbers and steamfitters themselves get $2.10 in the Department of National Defence; otherwise in civilian jobs they get $2.35 per hour.

[Mr. Hahn.]

Pipe layers, caulkers and solderers get $1.65. Pump operators get $1.82; that is the current rate paid in the Chilliwack area. Brush painters get $1.80 working for the Department of National Defence, as opposed to $2.16 for those working in civilian jobs. Those who work with spray guns at painting for the Department of National Defence get $1.90, as opposed to $2.26. Sheet metal workers get $2 per hour in the Department of National Defence as opposed to $2.35 in civilian jobs. Welders get $1.75 as compared with $2.

My time is limited, and I should like to finish if the committee would be kind enough to give me a few minutes more. I shall not be more than three or four minutes, you may rest assured, but I wish to point out this. The wages for carpenters in the Department of National Defence and for carpenters in civilian jobs are the same, but that is the top wage paid by the Department of National Defence for workers in that area. However, in civilian jobs, the bulldozer operator gets $2.45 as the top wage. The lowest wage paid by the Department of National Defence is $1.40 per hour, which is the wage for a common labourer, whilst in comparison truck drivers get $1.60, which is the lowest wage paid by private industry in the area.

My plea is that the rate of pay by the Department of National Defence should compare with the wages paid in the surrounding community, so we would not have this demoralizing effect upon the unions and upon the workers within the area itself. Those who are working as casual employees in the Department of National Defence are entitled to the same wages as those in other employment. I am sure the minister can understand that if his department is getting wage earners for a similar job in his department at from 20 to 30 cents per hour less than is paid in the civilian field, that is bound to have some effect upon the civilian employees as well as upon departmental employees. I think the government should set an example by maintaining wages in keeping with the wages in the communities themselves.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Campney: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with consideration of these estimates and then take those of defence production and northern affairs if they are reached.

CRIMINAL LAW

STATEMENT AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION RESPECTING CRIMINAL SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have leave to revert to motions in order that I might make a correction in a statement I made this morning.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Garson: This morning the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Lennard) asked me, without notice, to say how soon I thought the report of the inquiry concerning criminal sexual psychopaths would be available. In a mistaken recollection of a conversation which I had had with my deputy before my recent illness I said that majority and minority reports were being prepared in connection with this inquiry. This is not correct. It is the other commission presided over by Chief Justice McRuer in which a minority report is in course of preparation.

I think it might be helpful for me to put on the record the present standing of both these commissions. The commissioners appointed to inquire into and report upon whether the criminal law of Canada relating to the defence of insanity should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent, are Chief Justice McRuer of the high court of justice of Ontario; Dr. Gustave Desrochers, assistant superintendent of St. Michel's hospital at the city of Quebec; Her Honour Judge Helen Kinnear, county court judge of the county of Haldimand, Ontario; Dr. Robert O. Jones, professor of psychiatry at Dalhousie University, Halifax; and Joseph Harris, Esquire, president of the Great-West Life Assurance Company of Winnipeg.

The draft majority report of this commission is complete. The majority report will be presented later simultaneously with a minority report which is now in the course of preparation, unless in the meanwhile the differences of opinion between the majority and the minority can be resolved. We hope that the commission's report or reports will be available this autumn.

The commissioners to inquire into and report upon the question whether the criminal law of Canada relating to criminal sexual psychopaths should be amended in any respect and, if so, in what manner and to what extent, are the aforesaid Chief Justice McRuer, Dr. Gustave Desrochers and Her Honour Judge Helen Kinnear.

The hearings of this commission have been completed and on the basis of information which my deputy secured from Chief Justice McRuer this afternoon we hope that the report of the commission will be presented this autumn, but it will not be before September 15.

It being five minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

P.F.R.A.—FLOOD CONTROL CONSTRUCTION, SASK.

Question No. 539—Mr. Castleden:

What construction is proposed by P.F.R.A. for 1956 on the Saskatchewan portion of the Assiniboine river in order to control flood damage on that river in 1957?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture):

Surveys are being made which may result in construction.

BLIND PENSION PAYMENTS

Question No. 547—Mr. Follwell:

1. What were the total payments under the blind pension legislation in each of the years 1953, 1954 and 1955 (a) in Canada; (b) in each province; (c) in the constituency of Hastings South?

2. How many recipients of blind pensions were there in each of the above years (a) in Canada; (b) in each province; (c) in the constituency of Hastings South?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1. (a) and (b). Under the Blind Persons Act the federal government pays to the provinces 75 per cent of the total blind persons payments in each province. The following figures show the federal payments to the provinces; the provincial share would be about one-third of the federal payment.

Province	1953-54	1954-55	1955-56
Alberta	$ 135,586	$ 140,148	$ 145,707
British Columbia	174,964	170,796	166,772
Manitoba	148,244	145,014	145,547
New Brunswick	263,726	256,748	258,432
Newfoundland	121,952	119,970	126,038
Nova Scotia	250,567	247,788	254,604
Ontario	602,041	607,709	609,974
Prince Edward Island	28,126	30,516	32,279
Quebec	1,057,842	1,028,750	1,036,243
Saskatchewan	125,796	132,670	135,219
Northwest Territories	4,537	5,175	6,330
Yukon Territory	720	900	1,350
Canada	$2,914,101	$2,886,184	$2,918,495

1. (c). Federal records are not maintained on a constituency basis.

2. (a) and (b).

Number of recipients of blind persons allowance as of March 31, 1956

Province	1953-54	1954-55	1955-56
Alberta	400	409	415
British Columbia	488	474	475
Manitoba	411	405	411
New Brunswick	731	706	717
Newfoundland	336	338	353
Nova Scotia	718	706	726
Ontario	1,710	1,731	1,719
Prince Edward Island	90	95	96
Quebec	2,949	2,866	2,905
Saskatchewan	366	374	389
Northwest Territories	13	16	18
Yukon Territory	2	2	6
Canada	8,214	8,122	8,230

2. (c). See answer to No. 1 (c) above.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, July 19, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Ninth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REMISSION SERVICE—TABLING OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will find on their desks this morning, I think, at least I know I found it upon my desk, a copy of the tabled report of the committee appointed to inquire into the principles and procedures followed in the remission service of the Department of Justice. As hon. members will see, this report covers most comprehensively the subjects referred to the committee. Some of its recommendations can only be implemented under federal jurisdiction, while others can only be implemented under provincial jurisdiction. We have already instructed the officials of my department to present their views to us as to the best method of implementing those recommendations which come under our authority. After we have had an opportunity of considering the views of the justice department officials in this regard, it will probably be necessary for us to confer with the provincial governments as to how those recommendations which we will implement federally can be best integrated with any recommendations which the provinces may see fit to recommend within their sphere of authority.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice a question in connection with the report of the committee on remission which he has just tabled. While I appreciate what the minister said regarding the studies that have been carried on by his department I would like to ask him whether the department has yet been able to form any views with respect to the recommendation for a national parole board contained in chapter 11 of the report, and I ask that particularly because of a case which we have discussed before and which I still regard as important, the Clifford Williams case.

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, I think that even a cursory examination of the Fauteux report would indicate it is so extensive and so comprehensive that any government which would attempt to reach an opinion concerning it within a short period of time from the date of its release would be unwise. Indeed I do not imagine we would be able to get a report from our departmental officials for some little time. When we do receive this departmental report, the recommendation for a national parole board to which the hon. member refers will doubtless be treated by our officials as a part of the whole and as integrated with the whole Fauteux report. We will have to consider it as such and that consideration will have to be extremely thorough, just as thorough as the report has been.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the minister two supplementary questions? I notice that the letter of transmittal from the commissioners is dated April 30, 1956. Perhaps the minister might let us know when in fact he first received a copy of the report. Second, is the minister able to give us any further information with regard to the disposition now being made of the Clifford Williams case?

Mr. Garson: Mr. Speaker, with regard to my hon. friend's first question I am afraid I cannot remember exactly the actual date on which I received the report but it would be within a few days after the date which appears on the letter of transmission.

Mr. Fulton: You have had it, then, for two and a half months?

Mr. Garson: That is right. When we received it it was a very large mass of typewritten material and not in the form in which it appears now. The interval has been taken up by having it translated into the French language and printed; and having regard to the fact that the queen's printer has had other onerous obligations there has been some delay attributable to that fact which has contributed to the lateness of the Fauteux report in reaching us here. We tabled it as soon as we received it from the printers.

With regard to the Clifford Williams case, I cannot do other than go over the statements which have already been made in this house to the effect that the heavy sentences—that is in toto, because they did not run concurrently—that were imposed upon Mr. Williams do not deter us in any way from granting remission of his sentence. That is to say, I think they added up to 20-odd years—

Mr. Fulton: Twenty-nine years.

Mr. Garson: Yes, 29 years. Perhaps this is a case where we would be warranted in cutting down materially the 29-year sentence. Our judgment to remit would be on the basis of imposing what seemed to us to be a fair term of imprisonment, in relation not so much to this long period of sentences as to the prospects of rehabilitation of this man when he gets out of prison. That would depend in part upon his conduct in prison.

AIR TRANSPORT

D.E.W. LINE AIR LIFT—REPRESENTATIONS BY AIRLINE PILOTS' ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? My question has reference to the documentation sent to him by the Canadian airline pilots' association with respect to its earlier report on the distant early warning air lift. My question is this. Has the minister taken note of the statement made by this association that as recently as the month of May of this year a D.E.W. line carrier operated a pilot in excess of 300 hours and several other pilots in excess of 200 hours? Has the minister given consideration to the suggestion of the Canadian airline pilots' association that there should be legislation governing flight time for pilots?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): As hon. members know, some time ago the Canadian airline pilots' association made a report to their own members on the air lift in connection with the D.E.W. line, and after this had been published it was transmitted to my department where it received the closest study. After that study had been completed a reply was sent to the association, and I think it is a fair statement to say that the reply showed that many of the criticisms that had been expressed by the association were without foundation.

This week I have received a further brief from the association, which is quite voluminous, and as it was a rather technical matter I referred it to the officials of my department for consideration. I have not read the brief myself; consequently I do not know whether the incident to which the hon. member has just referred is one that has come to the notice of my department or not. At all events, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should come to any judgment as to the representations made by the association until my officials have read the brief and studied it carefully.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO AVAILABILITY OF PIPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited sufficient 34-inch pipe on hand and on order, guaranteed for delivery during the summer and fall, to enable it to complete the line to Winnipeg by December 15?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, but naturally the guarantee is subject to force majeure, and a strike constitutes force majeure; therefore the guarantees under the contract for pipe will be subject to such delays as occur through the strike.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): If I may ask a supplementary question, did the minister not tell the house during the progress of the pipe-line debate that one of the reasons that Trans-Canada was the preferred instrument was that it had available and ready to be delivered the 34-inch pipe?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member will find the reference in Hansard and quote me on that subject. I did not say that. I said the Trans-Canada company had the pipe; in other words, they had part of the requirement for pipe manufactured and other pipe on order. If my hon. friend had any conception of how much territory it would take to pile up 650 miles of 34-inch pipe he would not jump to the conclusion that all the pipe was already manufactured and piled up. A fair amount of it was then manufactured.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister said it was ready. Was that just a pipe-dream?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The hon. member has made his statement. Will he please look up Hansard and find the quotation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Look it up yourself; you made the statement.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. I understood members of the opposition to say when the debate was on that there were several companies in Canada that could make this pipe. Now is the time for them to do it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO BROADCASTING GOVERNMENT "FAIRY TALES"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is to give television coverage to the incredible sea serpent Ogopogo of Kelowna, British Columbia, will the corporation consider broadcasting some of the other fairy tales which the government has attempted to publicize about its own activities?

Mr. O. L. Jones (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question just asked concerning the Ogopogo, I would like to point out that hundreds of citizens of reliable character have vouched that they have seen the Ogopogo—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is why I called it incredible and not mythical.

Mr. Jones:—and I resent the suggestion that it is mythical.

An hon. Member: What time of day did they see it?

FREIGHT RATES

LUMBER—INQUIRY AS TO PROTEST AGAINST INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received any protests from the lumber industry of British Columbia with respect to certain unsound and illogical rate increases applied by the railway companies recently?

Hon. George C. Marler (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will not accept the adjectives which the hon. gentleman has just used with regard to the rates.

I have received recently no representations from the British Columbia lumber industry although some were made some time ago when a hearing was held in connection with a proposed increase in rates on lumber. My understanding is that the board of transport commissioners recently rendered a judgment in that matter and since then I have received no representations. And, I might say at the same time, I have received no particular commendation of the increase.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a supplementary question following the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West. Will the minister look into the report that the change in the freight rate structure on British Columbia lumber moving eastward has resulted in an increase from 3 cents to 6 cents per hundred pounds in the differential on lumber from Vancouver island mills and that this is a disproportionate increase to that on lumber from other points?

Mr. Marler: I shall take note of what the hon. gentleman has said and examine the record to see whether consideration should be given to the matter.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

TEESWATER, ONT.—CONSTRUCTION OF NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Robinson) asked a question about the new post office at Teeswater, Ontario. In reply I may say that the plans and specifications for this building will be completed next week and it is expected that tenders will be invited early in August.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE TO ALLEGED MODIFICATION OF "HANSARD" OF JULY 16

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on going over the official report of yesterday's proceedings, I note that the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dufresne) attempted to make a mountain out of a molehill. In fact, it seems to me to be a case of an elephant in labour bringing forth a mouse.

When speaking to the resolution on federal-provincial fiscal relations last Monday, I spoke extemporaneously. The hon. member, who was not present, as so often happens with him, but that is his business—

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): I can read, though.

Mr. Caron: Well, if he can read, I will have occasion to talk to him about that in a moment.

I spoke extemporaneously, then, and I was convinced I had spoken of distributive justice. Still I am told that the newspapers mentioned "charitable gifts". I am prepared to admit that the press was not mistaken and that it accepted the words I had spoken.

When the reporters' first copy reaches us, we are entitled to make changes, not of substance but of form, a practice which has been followed by practically all members of the house, especially those of the opposition. It may be that I had the opportunity of making this change, in the belief that it was a more appropriate expression under the circumstances. If my hon. friend had had a better knowledge of French, he would have realized that there is only a shade of meaning between the words "charitable gifts" and "distributive justice", as used. Besides, distributive justice, properly so called, is an act of justice whereby God rewards good and punishes evil. By extension it is an act of justice meted out with charity. The word charity means "love of God and neighbour", a concept which seems unknown to the hon. member for Quebec West. In a wider sense—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Hull is of course entitled to answer the charge I made yesterday that he had made an unqualified change in Hansard. However I deny him the right to make the statements he just made, especially when they reflect on my character. The hon. member has no right to bring accusations against me in a devious and so contemptible manner, and I ask him to withdraw at once.

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Quebec West is right, up to a point, when the hon. member for Hull, while speaking on the definition of the word charity, adds that apparently the hon. member for Quebec West does not know what charity means. In explaining his attitude on the point raised by the hon. member for Quebec West he may plead his own case, but he should not go beyond what is necessary for the purpose of his argument.

Mr. Dufresne: He has strayed rather far afield.

Mr. Caron: I recognize that the member for Quebec West understands charity—

Mr. Dufresne: And practises it.

Mr. Caron:—and that a reference to charity implies, in a wider sense, an act inspired by love of neighbour, an act of kindness, of assistance towards those in need. As you can see—

An hon. Member: He is in need of it.

Mr. Caron: As you can see, Mr. Speaker, there is only a slight shade of meaning and, if I were Cyrano de Bergerac, I would say that if the hon. gentleman had had more wit and a greater knowledge of the humanities he would not have set up this tempest in a teapot.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, first I would ask the hon. member for Hull to be good enough to withdraw his last words to the effect that I lack wit. I surely have as much as he has.

At the beginning of his remarks, the hon. member stated that he had been speaking extemporaneously. He did, and so much so that he was talking nonsense; that was precisely the burden of the reproach I addressed to him yesterday in the house. He made a statement which was taken down by the able reporters of the house and which was also reported by parliamentary correspondents.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, if this matter is up for debate, I claim the right to answer the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that the statement made by the hon. member for Hull was reported by parliamentary correspondents, and I maintain that I am sufficiently conversant with the French language—even if the hon. member for Hull does not think so—to appreciate the difference between "distributive justice" and "charitable gifts". I therefore maintain the charge I made yesterday and I feel bound to demand that the words actually used—

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would hon. members be kind enough to allow the hon. member for Quebec West to conclude his sentence?

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: So I am simply asking—as I believe it to be my duty under the circumstances—for leave to demand from the hon. member for Hull that the very words he used in this house be written into the record exactly as they were spoken.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to be merely a matter of interpretation.

The hon. member for Quebec West is asking that the hon. member for Hull refrain from rectifying an expression he thought he had used when speaking in this house. Today, at the request of the hon. member for Quebec West, the representative for Hull explained the position. Apparently, the representative for Quebec West does not accept it. Therefore, if this is an infringement of the privileges of the house, the hon. member has only to propose the necessary motions to the effect that the matter be referred to the committee on privileges and elections.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION OR CONFERENCE ON ECONOMICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the Prime Minister what attitude the Canadian government would take in general to the proposal now being considered in Britain for the calling of a British commonwealth economic conference or royal commission similar to the Gordon royal commission so that the economic wealth and potential resources of the commonwealth might be considered in the same way as they have been nationally in the Gordon commission, to the end that the communist economic world offensive might be more effectively met. What would be the attitude of the government to the setting up of such a royal commission?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the government will be to consider any proposal that comes forth but not to declare in advance in a hypothetical case what its attitude might be should the hypothesis be realized.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is indefinite enough.

PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO GENERAL INCREASE AT PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the government aware of the growing demand in the country for an increase in the amount of the pensions paid under federal legislation? Will something be done about this matter at this session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is aware that there are a great many demands which the amounts that can be raised through taxation are insufficient to satisfy. The government has no intention of introducing at this session any general legislation to increase the amount of pensions that are paid from the federal treasury.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

235. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $143,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,470,423,461 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,675,484,744 will come due for payment in future years), $1,722,797,717.

(Translation):

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of unduly delaying the debate on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. However, I believe it is important at this time that I make a few observations and suggestions first in the interest of the department, and also in the interest of all those who take part in its formation.

When we look at the various items which make up these estimates, we realize, Mr. Chairman, that what has happened this year is exactly the same thing which we have criticized last year. Last year we requested a substantial reduction in the amounts earmarked for national defence whose estimates make up nearly half the total budget of Canada. It seems that our requests and protests have not been heeded because this year we find in the estimates exactly the same amount as last year. There have been some changes here and there, and a few amounts have been changed, some decreased, others increased, but when you look at the total amount for the Department of National Defence, you come to the conclusion that it is exactly the same as the amounts submitted to the house last year.

In other words, the national defence budget which is submitted to us this year is exactly the same as that submitted last year. I therefore come to the conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that it is an insult to the intelligence of Canadians and to the intelligence of the taxpayers. There have been no efforts to lower expenditures and to put an end to waste and extravagance, while various other countries of the free world were making some effort to lower their expenditures on national defence and thereby alleviate the burden of their taxpayers. Surely, here in Canada, no way has yet been found to cut down on administrative expenditure, especially not in this department. England is reducing her budget. So are the United States. Other countries, which I will not mention, have done likewise.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, why Canada should not strive to reduce expenses to an amount much lower than that submitted to us last year and again this year. I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that we still have to face a potential enemy, who has no respect for peace nor freedom. I understand that we must remain on guard because of the behaviour of those conquerors from the Soviet union. But I believe that on looking at the international situation, as it is now and as it has been for some time already, we come to the conclusion that we are now engaged in a cold war, one still wanted by Russia, but which is waged on an economical basis. That is their change of attitude. It seems that Russia is trying today by all possible means to control the economic field and to invade markets hitherto under the exclusive control of democratic countries.

I would therefore urge, Mr. Chairman, that for the balance of this year and before the next estimates are tabled, an effort be made to reduce to some extent the expenditures of this department and, at the same time, as I have said, to lighten the Canadian taxpayer's burden, which is already too heavy.

I would go even further and suggest that an inquiry should be made as a result of the statement of General Guy Simonds and those of other high-ranking Canadian soldiers who are glad, today, to have recovered their freedom because it allows them to express their opinions. Even though this request was turned down in the house, the other day, I believe that an inquiry is urgently needed, so that the various military men who have occupied key posts at the head of our armed forces may testify and thereby throw some light on the various accusations and statements made since they left the Canadian Army.

National defence, Mr. Chairman, must not come to mean national expense. National defence must not be for the Canadian taxpayers a highway to ruin.

More than ever, the time has come when those who have to pay for the upkeep of this enormous defence budget should know exactly what use is being made of their taxes by this important department. At this point, Mr. Chairman, and in the light of the damning evidence of those who leave the services to reenter civilian life, it would seem that inefficiency, extravagance and waste are constantly on the increase throughout the department whose estimates are now under review.

I would like, in a few words, to give two examples. About two months ago, I had the privilege to take part on the C.B.C. French network, in a television program entitled "Les idées en marche", where questions of national defence were being discussed. The topic we had to deal with on that particular program was whether our national defence was costing too much.

I do not wish to repeat what was said, one way or the other, on that program but I would point out that, at that time, I dealt with a particular point which, I believe, I should again bring up this morning.

Everyone of us knows that, in the province of Quebec, especially at Sorel, guns are being manufactured for the American as well as for the Canadian navy. It seems however—those are not my own conclusions but they are based on a report submitted to the cabinet by none other than Mr. Watson Sellar, Auditor General of Canada—that guns made in this country are costing Canada $112,000 more per unit than those exported to the United States.

Well, Mr. Chairman, it will be said, I know, that the planning, the assembly, the machinery, and some of the engineers who were responsible for the development of that unquestionably very useful gun, came from the other side of the 45th parallel.

I also realize that our neighbours to the south were doubtless put to some expense in getting this production under way. However, what is beyond my understanding is that the cost has been so heavy that Canada has had to pay $112,000 more per gun produced at home.

Let us imagine what this would amount to if, within a few years, hundreds, not to say thousands, of guns were so produced.

I believe—I am sure that this opinion is shared by all hon. members of this house—that it is a bit ridiculous to have to pay so high a price for something produced in this country when we are able to sell that same product to other countries, to our very neighbour, at a price which, in my estimation, is about a third, or 33⅓ per cent cheaper.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that inquiry will also be made into the production of these guns and that the department will give it all the attention it deserves so as to bring some measure of relief to the burdened Canadian taxpayer who has to foot all the bills.

(Text):

Mr. Dickey: If the hon. member will permit me, on a point of order, might I suggest that this subject with which he is now dealing is really principally a matter for defence production, and I think he would get a more satisfactory discussion of it on the estimates of the Department of Defence Production. So far as an examination of the matter is concerned, I presume he understands that this transaction has already been examined during this session in the committee on public accounts.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Defence Production raises the question of a point of order, saying that it would be more appropriate to deal with this question on the defence production estimates. I hope he does not forget that if the Department of Defence Production is looking after the fabrication of these guns, nobody else but the Department of National Defence buys them and we are now dealing with the estimates of the Department of National Defence. Therefore I think I am quite in order in speaking on the matter now. Nevertheless, that is all I have to say and I am concluding my remarks on this very subject.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter which I would like to bring to the attention of the house. There is a great deal of talk about reducing the budget. I have mentioned that fact today. Now, when I speak about reducing expenses, I am by no means suggesting that it should be done in such a way as to endanger our security. On the contrary, we are merely trying to impress upon the government the necessity of controlling expenditures very closely so as to prevent extravagance and useless spending.

My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey), following an interjection of mine, referred to the Petawawa horses which I understand were carried on the payroll at that time, as was well demonstrated by the Currie report.

However, if there were horses on the Petawawa paylists, we, in Quebec, have a billy-goat on the paylists. The Royal 22nd Regiment at the citadel has a mascot which is nothing more or less than a billy-goat. Some say it is in fact a nanny, but I have not carried my investigation that far. I cannot say whether it's a he or she-goat.

Mr. Villeneuve: Can our hon. friend tell us whether this mascot draws any pay?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He does not seem to know.

Mr. Dufresne: The hon. member for Portneuf is not prepared to deny its existence, however.

Mr. Villeneuve: The mascot draws no pay.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I say that there is at the Quebec citadel a mascot, which is a billy-goat—

Mr. Villeneuve: Or a nanny-goat.

Mr. Dufresne: —and for which the Department of National Defence has caused to be built a private residence or headquarters at a cost of something like $1,500. To this billy-goat are attached some military personnel, a corporal and two privates who are obviously not paid by the billy-goat, but by the Department of National Defence.

(Text):

Mr. Lesage: The hon. member is now making a goat of himself.

Mr. Dufresne: If the minister will look at himself in the mirror I think he will see two goats.

Mr. Lesage: And he might regret it.

Mr. Dufresne: He might look like two goats.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am going to suggest to both hon. members that we are not discussing agriculture or animals; we are discussing defence estimates.

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, I think I will put you on the right track right now and tell you exactly what I was discussing when I was speaking. A couple of years ago we spoke about horses on the payroll in the Department of National Defence. I am now speaking about a goat on the payroll of the Quebec citadel. It has nothing to do with agriculture. I will not discuss agriculture here because I do not think I have the competence to do so.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I come back to that expense which, it seems to me, is ridiculous, preposterous, unnecessary. Here are three servicemen whose sole duty is to look after a billy-goat. The corporal probably orders the two soldiers to curry it down in the morning, to wash it, to tidy up its headquarters and to summon the vet when required.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind, that amounts to downright waste.

Waste might seem funny to some hon. members but, after all, we must remember that the Canadian taxpayers are footing the bill for this waste, and that is why I protest at this time against this condition.

For those few reasons, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that a serious inquiry is absolutely necessary and that it should be carried out by people who, by no manner of means, would be interested in protecting those who are guilty of that waste of public moneys.

Coming back to my billy-goat, Mr. Chairman, there are sometimes complaints in the Quebec district that the advertisements appearing in the papers and inviting our fellow-citizens to enlist in the armed forces do not give the expected results. However, when a young man eager to make a career in the Canadian army, or wishing to spend some time in the army to learn a trade that will help him to earn a decent living later on, in business or industry, is told by the senior officer of the recruiting office that his work from now on will consist in looking after billy-goats, I do not think that that is one of the best ways to prepare his future.

That again, Mr. Chairman, is one of the serious reasons why that waste must be prevented. Instead of spending money on the upkeep of a mascot, of a billy-goat, it might have been better to keep in the reserve army some regiments that have brought glory to the whole of Canada in the past, and perhaps particularly to French Canada, such as the Quebec, Levis and Montmagny regiments, reserve regiments which were the pride of our district.

Mr. Chairman, I have another matter to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Campney). Quite often people complain, and possibly not without cause, that French-speaking Canadians do not care for positions that might be offered to them in the Canadian army, in the military profession. However French-speaking Canadians should get more attention from the department. Like Canadians of other racial origins, they are known for their ability, their efficiency, their loyalty, and most of them have one great qualification which is not to be found among their neighbours: they are thoroughly bilingual. There should be a higher percentage of French Canadians in high and responsible positions, and occupying ranks in keeping with those important positions.

If a new war were to break out there is no doubt that the services of a large number of well trained French-speaking officers would be needed and necessary. Their contribution would be, as in the past, most welcome. To promote the enlistment of French-speaking Canadians we should promise them a fair deal and positions in keeping with their ability and their efficiency. That, I think, might be a still more concrete way of cementing national unity in Canada, that unity which is essential to harmony and good understanding between Canadians of different racial origins.

Mr. Chairman, before I sit down, may I suggest to the minister that, when there is a transfer from one military camp to another, an effort should be made, especially when the training laid down for the different French-speaking soldiers or servicemen is over, to send these people back to the locality they came from or, at least, to some place not too far removed from their homes.

I realize that when French-speaking Canadians from the province of Quebec are sent into Ontario, for instance, or to a western province, it is done with the best of intentions; it is a tremendous help to bilingualism, which is becoming extremely and increasingly important in Canada. The government is also to be congratulated for taking English-speaking people and moving them, in due time, to the old province of Quebec, so as to enable them to learn our mother tongue.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, when these people have stayed for a time in any province not their own, it would seem right to take the necessary steps to maintain a family spirit which is mainly to be found in our home province, so that it may actively survive.

I therefore ask the government to provide for the return of those servicemen nearer to their homes when they have completed their training.

Those are the few remarks I wanted to submit, Mr. Chairman. I hope they will be taken in the right spirit, because my sole purpose in making them was to fulfil the task assigned to me and make an effort to ease the ever-growing fiscal load which the Canadian taxpayer has to carry.

Mr. Boisvert: Will the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Dufresne: Certainly.

Mr. Boisvert: Could the hon. member tell me the name of the billy goat, what wages it is getting and where, in the public accounts, we could find evidence of his statement that a billy goat is on the army pay roll?

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Nicolet-Yamaska wants to know if I can tell him the name of the billy goat. Well I must say I was not present at the baptism of the goat; I was not invited—

Mr. Villeneuve: If it is on the payroll, it must have a name.

Mr. Dufresne: My hon. friend from Roberval might inquire from the authorities and the man who baptized it. I was not there, nobody invited me.

Mr. Villeneuve: Neither was I.

Mr. Dufresne: Secondly, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska wishes to know what pay the goat is getting.

Mr. Boisvert: Yes, the wages it gets.

Mr. Dufresne: The wages it gets? Well my hon. friend knows very well that those things are not to be found in the public accounts, because the matter would now be too widely known of the public, and I do think that it would not be in the interest of the government that such scandals be given too much publicity. Therefore the amount of the allowance granted to the goat in question is surely nowhere to be found in the public accounts.

Now, if my hon. friend from Nicolet-Yamaska is free some week end, he might go to the citadel and find out for himself how much it costs to keep that billy goat.

Mr. Boisvert: Mr. Chairman, I put that question because my learned friend had stated that the said goat was getting wages, at the expense of the army, and was listed on its pay roll. Therefore, the proof of it must be somewhere. If my hon. friend has no evidence to produce, I am taking his word for it.

Mr. Dufresne: I simply maintain that monthly or periodical amounts are spent for the upkeep of the goat and the maintenance of the goat's headquarters.

Mr. Villeneuve: May I address a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Dufresne: That is always possible.

Mr. Villeneuve: He referred to three members of the army personnel who were looking after the goat. Can the hon. member for Quebec West tell us if those three men look after the goat as a full-time job or only on occasion?

Mr. Dufresne: The goat needs constant attendance, so the three army men I mentioned are especially attached to the goat. I shall even tell my hon. friend that one morning last fall, one of the goat-keepers arrived somewhat out of temper, and bullied the beast a bit. He was disciplined. I don't know and I would not care to say to what extent he was disciplined for handling his nibs somewhat roughly.

Mr. Villeneuve: Could you name the soldier concerned?

Mr. Dufresne: Well, as my friend from Roberval is on the government side, he might ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) to have a mounted police look into the matter, so as to supply my hon. friend with any names he requires.

(Text):

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Maybe the parliamentary assistant could answer.

Mr. Hellyer: There are now so many questions I would not know which ones to answer.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, a number of widows and mothers in Canada who have lost their loved ones in the armed services were extremely disturbed by a press dispatch of July 7 which was forwarded by Mr. Dave McIntosh, Canadian Press staff writer in Germany. I might say that several of these women have asked me to bring this matter to the attention of the house. The press dispatch reads as follows:

Kurt Meyer now Beer Salesman—

German SS. Major General Kurt Meyer once sentenced to death for responsibility in the mass shooting of 18 Canadian prisoners of war, now sells beer to the Canadian army.

Army sources here disclose that Meyer, who spent 9½ years in jail as a war criminal, is a beer salesman in the province of Westphalia in West Germany, where the 2nd Canadian Infantry Brigade is stationed.

As a salesman for a reputable brewery he often calls at brigade messes to make beer sales.

One army informant said Meyer is accorded the same privileges as any other beer salesman. However, he is not invited to join officers in a drink in the mess—

That is very thoughtful.

—and as a rule he talks only with the messing officer.

The army decided not to bar Meyer from the brigade area. As far as the Canadian army is concerned, the source said Meyer has served out his prescribed sentence as a war criminal, and is a German civilian who happens to sell beer.

Meyer was convicted December 28, 1945, of inciting his troops to deny quarter to allied soldiers in the battle of Normandy, and of responsibility in the execution of 18 Canadian soldiers who had been taken prisoner.

I think anyone who doubts his responsibility has only to read the book "The Trial of Kurt Meyer" by Lieutenant Colonel B. J. S. Macdonald, O.B.E., Q.C., who was the official prosecutor of war trials on behalf of the Canadian government.

We know this man has served his sentence, but that does not alter the situation and I think we have to consider the sensibilities and feelings of the mothers and widows of Canadian veterans before we consider the sensibilities of a former war criminal. I bring this to the minister's attention because I have spoken to a number of people who are quite concerned about it and I would ask him if he would issue instructions to the commander of our brigade in Germany to have some other beer salesman deal with the Canadian army rather than Kurt Meyer.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, in the minister's fine survey of the debate which had occurred previously and which he made yesterday he referred to the remarks which had been made by various members of this house, including those by the hon. member for York West. One strange thing about the minister's reply to the speech of the hon. member for York West was that he disregarded completely quotations placed on the record by the hon. member for York West from an article by Lieutenant General Guy Simonds. I think what the Minister of National Defence might have done on that occasion was to deal with the various charges. Of course he might say that those charges were not made by a member of this house and consequently he was not called upon to answer them. I grant that such a reply would be a palliative but it would not constitute a really satisfactory reply.

May I refer again to the quotations which the hon. member for York West put on the record and which were taken from Maclean's magazine of June 23, 1956. As I say, the article is by Lieutenant General Guy Simonds, C.B., C.B.E., D.S.O., C.D., which I think would be enough to qualify any man. I quote from the article:

Our organization for higher direction is designed, and operates to provide military excuses for political expedients rather than offering objective military advice and sound execution of realistic planning.

That to my mind is a very serious condemnation of the Department of National Defence. I am not saying that the present minister should assume full responsibility for that—he could not possibly do so—but it is the Department of National Defence as it now stands. I quote further from this article so the people in the country may know what this man is saying:

Whatever the intention in the minds of its designers, it is the opinion of the author that this expensive overhead is not evolving sound and objective defence policies.

Because of this cumbersome system of direction, the responsible military chiefs of the three armed services are denied an opportunity to confront those responsible for political decisions with objective military advice and alternatives upon which decision must be made. Senior civil servants can, by deliberate and unwarranted stalling, defeat the recommendations of the armed forces, even though those recommendations have been approved by the cabinet.

That is dreadfully serious.

The organization of the defence department as a whole is cumbersome and lacks flexibility. To operate effectively in a major crisis it would have to undergo radical changes which would paralyse efficient operation at a time when it should develop its highest efficiency.

The whole passage fills me with the deepest concern. Let me revert to that one sentence concerning which I made an interpolation.

Senior civil servants can, by deliberate and unwarranted stalling, defeat the recommendations of the armed forces, even though those recommendations have been approved by the cabinet.

There comes to my mind a most serious instance which occurred in the United States in 1948. Chiang Kai-shek was faced with his last chance of effectively throwing back his foes. In April 1948 the United States congress passed the China aid act of 1948 which provided for $1,250,000 worth of small arms and ammunition to be delivered to Chiang Kai-shek. The government of the United States were unable to check on whether those goods had been delivered until late in the year when on November 9, after all possible chance of using that China aid in throwing back the communist foe and stabilizing Chiang Kai-shek's position in China had passed, it was found that that material had not yet been delivered.

That indicates a most serious situation in the United States government, and from this evidence right here it looks as though a somewhat analogous situation obtains in the government of Canada, especially in the Department of National Defence. No one in this house with any responsibility can pass by such a situation, and it becomes my duty, in spite of every kind of disinclination I may have to interfere in matters pertaining to defence in connection with which I have never had any experience except through my sons and brothers in world war II, to raise this matter and urge upon the minister the most serious consideration.

I should like to read to hon. members a statement which covers the whole continent of North America and the western world. This is another statement which cannot be disregarded. It is made by Dr. Louis F. Budenz, who is probably the greatest authority on communism and the communist high command on the American continent. At one time he was editor of the Daily Worker but he repented of his ways as a communist and became of great assistance to the United States in its effort to deal with the terrible situation which has developed and which threatens to drag the United States to utter destruction, and all the rest of us along with it. The publication in which this appeared is dated June, 1956, and the article reads:

> Speaking before the Loyola College alumni association in Montreal recently, Dr. Budenz referred to peaceful co-existence as instalment plan suicide, stating:
> "Unless those who are in charge of the governments of the so-called western world are able, very shortly, to turn back the course of the past 20 tragic years in our international history, we are writing the downfall of the entire non-Soviet governments. We are writing the second chapter in the achievement of the world Soviet dictatorship with the hammer and sickle over Ottawa and Washington before the next generation has expired."

Before the babies now being born get out of high school.

> Describing the west's catastrophic losses in the cold war, Dr. Budenz warned "that some of the greatest victories of the Kremlin were won in the western world . . . Poland was not lost in Poland, it was lost in Washington, D.C., and at Yalta."

That is all I shall quote from a most terrifying article called "Instalment Plan Suicide". I am sure that every person who listens to that or reads that will realize that we are in one of the critical periods in the whole world's history. It affects us here and now, and particularly it affects our Department of National Defence which is charged with the responsibility of protecting us against the very evils which Dr. Budenz says are just rolling in upon us.

I have another document, and I think everybody in this house has a right to hear some excerpts from this document. It is the June 15, 1956, issue of what is called the Economic Council Letter, published in the United States. The heading is "Shall Other Nations Tell us What to Do?" Some may ask, "Why bring in things about the United States?" It is quite clear that we are bound up with the United States inextricably in our defence, and consequently what affects them affects us immediately. Here are some quotations from that letter:

> But in the past 40 years we have forgotten George Washington—have engaged in three foreign wars, no one of which had anything to do with vital American interests. Communism had to do with all those wars—and was the only victor.

That is just as true of Canada except for the fact that our vital interests were more eminently concerned because we were part of the British Empire. Another quotation:

> We are faced in the near future with utter disaster—unless we resume control of our own destiny.
> In 1945 American military materiel, estimated at 35 billions, was surreptitiously destroyed—a fact almost never referred to in press or radio. A dying President at Yalta ceded Soviet Russia large areas in Asia; and presently, through machinations in our state department, all China was lost to communism.

When the minister introduced his defence estimates he said something which this rather contradicts:

> After three years of war in Korea, during which 30,000 American youth laid down their lives, and while our state department connived with the enemy, we made an ignominious peace. That peace lost face for America throughout Asia. It may lead to the communizing of all Asia.
> In Germany we joined Russia in dismantling manufacturing plants, many of which were shipped to Russia, . . .

I hope that Canada had very little to do with this disastrous occurrence. From my own personal study, I can vouch for the truth of all of these statements made here, as far as I have been able to find the truth. This is another quotation:

> President Truman forced the United Nations to partition Palestine—which lost us the good will of 400 million Moslems. At the present moment, barring a miracle, this will lead to the loss of the Middle East with its vast oil deposits, and the entry of Soviet influence into Africa. In Spain in 1946, we joined Soviet Russia in withdrawing ambassadors, thus isolating Spain.

I am not sure what we did in Canada, but that is what the United States did. Again:

> Let's take a look at certain things in the United States. The same element that for a dozen years has made our foreign policy, in 1945 set up the United Nations. The American people weren't told then that the U.N. was to become a supergovernment, and was to shape our foreign policy. But that is just what has happened—at least so far as those behind the U.N. have been able to make it so.

I believe that is absolutely true.

No longer is the stress in most schools, colleges and universities laid on loyalty to America: it is loyalty to internationalism, represented by the U.N. and its specialized agencies, that is preached. Literally millions of persons, especially students, are brought to New York and shepherded through the U.N. buildings. Our great national holiday, the fourth of July, is played down and United Nations Day is played up. Some of the big foundations are in on this.

I think a good many members of this house will reflect with considerable concern on the fact that in Ottawa on July 1, our great national holiday, you would have hardly thought that it was any different from, say, March 1, judging from the decorations that we had.

An hon. Member: Why March 1?

Mr. Blackmore: Well, March 1 is a date quite a long way away from it. Where were the bands that might have performed? Where were the decorations along the streets? Where was the celebration we saw in our childhood every time Dominion day came along? That celebration just was not there. Why? Because it is the day of the United Nations that we are celebrating. You can see that what is being said here applies to Canada in no small degree. Let me give another quotation:

. . . the internationalists set up GATT (general agreement on tariffs and trade), which has functioned without any authority from Congress. The present administration is now trying to pass the OTC (organization for trade co-operation) bill, which would constitute a back-door recognition and officializing of GATT. So far has alien propaganda gone, that efforts by the economic council to interest manufacturing associations in certain states to protest against OTC have disclosed that some of the larger manufacturers in those states are in favour of it. So gradually the United States is losing trade to cheap foreign competitors. A wage of $1.76 an hour (the average American factory wage) cannot compete with 15-cent labour in Japan.

Pro-communist activity is being supported through the churches. Dr. J. B. Matthews stated that in 1952 three per cent of the Protestant ministers in the United States were members of communist fronts. So the left-wing press and radio saw that he was retired as director of research of the Senate permanent subcommittee on investigations.

The left wing press and radio—with whom behind them?—saw that he was retired as director of research of the Senate permanent subcommittee on investigations.

Here is another quotation:

Implanted right in the center of New York city is the U.N. headquarters. Many of those employed there by other nations are communist sympathizers; yet they have diplomatic status. They come and go in the United States as they please. They can even park their cars in violation of traffic regulations and thumb their noses at the police—and they do. . . .

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The softened attitude of the administration, beginning with the Geneva conference a year ago, has cost us friendship and respect throughout the world. The Russian leaders after Geneva saw to it that iron curtain peoples understood they no longer had any hope of rescue by the United States. Had not Khrushchev, Bulganin and Eisenhower drunk vodka together—and martinis?

What a terrible blunder Geneva was. You may ask what this has to do with defence. It has everything to do with defence, because if we are selling this country down the river by the back door what is the use of shovelling billions of dollars through the Department of National Defence to protect it through the front door? Indications are that we are making quite a lot of progress in that direction, selling Canada down the river by the back door. I can back that up if I have the opportunity but I do not know whether I will take the occasion to do so this year. Here is another one:

Moreover, it is now expected that the general assembly of the United Nations will vote for the admission of red China, that red China which General MacArthur and several of his successors wanted to destroy and could have destroyed had it not been for that strange influence that has controlled the last three administrations.

I do not know whether or not that is true, but I heard the other day that at the recent empire conference of prime ministers the general idea was that we would work towards the recognition of red China. I hope that was not so. If it is so, it is a very serious matter. Unless we have some ulterior motive like trade, it means that as an empire we have lost our sense of right and wrong. Here is another quotation:

Why is it not possible for the United States, as long as it remains in the United Nations, to have delegates who are first and foremost for America?

How interesting that is. When they appoint delegates to go to the United Nations these people, every single one of them, are against the interests of the United States and congress appears to be unable to exercise any influence over the matter. Here is its next quotation: "The answer would seem to be that those back of the White House mean to force through the admission of red China."

The next quotation is:

Why has the present Republican administration, elected on a conservative American platform, become as internationalist and un-American as that of either Truman or Roosevelt, both of which in general placed American interests last?

That is a serious question. What causes these things to happen? We are coming to it after a while. We have already had reference to influence of some sort. What is that influence?

An hon. Member: What has this to do with Canada's defence?

Mr. Blackmore: We are right on defence, 100 per cent. Just as sure as you live, as I said a minute ago, there is no use pouring billions of dollars into the defence department if we know beforehand that the representatives of this nation are going to sell us to communism.

Mr. Hansell: Defence on our home ground.

Mr. Blackmore: Of course. For example, suppose the representatives of this nation go and use their influence to get red China admitted to the United Nations. You would have 450 million additional communists in the United Nations to exercise control over the United Nations, an organization which is now under the control of communism.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Blackmore: It is nonsense to those who do not know. My young friend just does not know. That is all. He just does not know. These matters are very important. Here is another quotation:

> The Republican national committee, which dictates the policy of the Republican party, appears to be interested, not in available facts, which show that the American people are not internationalists, but in instructions handed to it from behind the scenes.

By whom, I interject? I continue:

> It has acted on hunches. One major hunch has been that the only way to beat the Democratic party is to out new-deal the Democratic new dealers on foreign policy.

Mr. Philpott: What has that got to do with Canada?

Mr. Blackmore: I am fighting for the defence of Canada. I happen to have some children and grandchildren growing up in this country and I do not want them under communism, whether my hon. friend does or not.

Mr. Philpott: Let the Republicans fight their own campaign.

Mr. Blackmore: Never mind a lot of these cheap remarks.

An hon. Member: Don't say the United Nations is controlled by communists.

Mr. Blackmore: Here is another important quotation:

> Great numbers of Republicans stayed away from the polls in the congressional elections of 1954. In many mid-western districts, a third of the registered voters stayed home. Inquiry has disclosed that this was due to resentment at the administration's successfully blocking by a single vote the adoption of the Bricker amendment, and to the administration's going all out to destroy Senator McCarthy, an outstanding foe of communism and one of the ablest political campaigners the Republicans had.

This is all strange. Take this one:

> Yet officials of the Republican national committee, including chairman Hall, have refused even to look at the work charts and studies of the Dunn survey in spite of the compliments his survey has received from congressmen, commentators and editorial writers.

There is one more indication that the thing that is guiding the Republican party is not what the people think but what someone behind the scenes thinks. Then there is this passage:

> The conclusion seems inescapable that the actual thinking of voters is largely unheeded by the Republican national committee. Republican new dealism, of which we now see so much evidence, does not reflect the opinions and wishes of the people. It reflects the views and ideas of men working behind the scenes—

Who are they?

> —and passing on their instructions to the committee.

Then there is one more quotation, and this is all I will give at this time:

> The Republican national committee aims to have all funds that are to be contributed to Republican candidates for congress channelled through the national committee. In this way they can control the candidates. We are reliably advised that in the state of Illinois, for instance, in the congressional election of 1954 the Republican national committee sent word to Republican candidates for congress that not a dollar would come from the committee to their campaigns if they invited Senator McCarthy to speak for them. As a result, several Illinois Republican congressmen and the Republican nominee for the Senate lost the election.

I have quoted these words to indicate what kind of thing it is that is getting control of governments. We have been told by Lieutenant General Simonds, and let me repeat it again:

> Senior civil servants can, by deliberate and unwarranted stalling, defeat the recommendations of the armed forces, even though those recommendations have been approved by the cabinet.

Who is it who can do that? For whom are they working? Why do they do it? Why does the government not know about it? Why does the Minister of National Defence not do something about it? All I am concerned about is that there are hidden forces in Canada and hidden forces in the United States.

I pointed out in my speeches of the day before yesterday and the day before that hidden forces have evidently been acting in support of the Bank of Canada and the Rowell-Sirois commission report to the detriment of the Canadian people and in the interests of alien people abroad. I do not think the conclusion can be successfully questioned.

I wish to quote a passage from the Ottawa Citizen of some days ago. I think everybody in Canada has been impressed with the fact that somehow or other and for some reason or other we shut Gouzenko up. Why shut Gouzenko up? Because there were evidently people in Canada who were more interested in the advancement of communism than they were in the advancement of Canadianism. All this man was doing was revealing the terribly dangerous situation which existed inside the Canadian government and the Canadian country. That is all, but we did not want to hear about it. Is it not strange? The government shut him up by the simple device of conveying to him that if he did not keep his mouth shut he would not have protection any more such as he now enjoys.

Mr. Philpott: He had an article in Liberty magazine last week.

Mr. Blackmore: Well, he was shut up, was he not? Perhaps his article was about a different thing entirely.

An hon. Member: And he has written a couple of books.

Mr. Blackmore: I suppose it is alright to write books as long as they do not reveal where the spies are, who they are, and call for an investigation of the spy rings. Certainly there is no objection then. But if Gouzenko wanted to adopt measures which would find out for us who the top ranking communist leader in Canada is, what his race is, whether he is Anglo-Saxon, Celt or alien, he would be shut up in a hurry. That is the information that everybody in Canada ought to know.

An hon. Member: Why don't you tell us?

Mr. Blackmore: I could tell you, but I prefer to let my hon. friend do his own investigating. It is his responsibility to do it, just as it is mine. I have discharged my responsibility and my hon. friend has not; that is all. I tell him that right to his face. I quote excerpts from an article in the Ottawa Citizen, page 16, November 23, 1953, headed, "Gouzenko says Canadian government ignored his attempts to expose U.S. spy rings."

> On no occasion did I (Gouzenko) ever say that I had new information which I did not already give to the Canadian government. "I believe a meeting (with U.S. officials) would be useful since I can give advice which, if properly put into effect, would have good chances of bringing exposure of present Soviet spy rings in the United States in comparatively short time."
> "That, of course, would be a great help to Canada, too. That advice I gave already to the Canadian government, during my first days under protection of the Canadian government, but I am sorry to say that it was ignored."

Now, why was it ignored?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member but it is my duty to advise him his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: May I read just one sentence as I sit down?

> Serious and energetic adoption of this advice many years ago might have had important results by now. However, it is never too late . . .

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member wants to ask me a question, and I want to answer him.

Mr. Hollingworth: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Is he presenting his own view or the view of his party when he makes the very serious allegation that the United Nations organization, and I assume all its affiliated organizations, are controlled by communists.

Mr. Blackmore: I am speaking entirely for myself.

Mr. Weaver: I always hesitate to take part in a debate on national defence. It is not because I do not feel qualified to do so or at least as qualified as other members, but the complexities of the subject are such that I never know just where to start or where to end. The purely military aspects of our defence have been, and must be, decided upon by those who are qualified through years of careful study in their particular field. They have received and studied detailed and intimate facts on which they have to base their decisions. These are things which we, as members, cannot do unless we have the time, which we certainly have not got, to go into the subject as deeply as the officials responsible.

With regard to the actual amount of the estimates which we are asked to vote, the other day the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seemed to indicate that there was something odd in the round numbers of the total estimates of national defence. I do not see anything odd in these figures at all. For the last several years my understanding of what the government has been doing, and I am sure that is the understanding of other members, was that in the light of the knowledge they had of the economy they allotted as much as they felt could safely and wisely be allotted to national defence, and tailored the other items to that over-all figure. After all, defence is the most important single thing we have to face in the country, and other things certainly ought to be tailored to that amount.

The degree of priority of the various items within the departmental estimates must also be determined in the same way. However, those are things, as I said, that require a great deal of information upon which to base any decision. I wish to move to a field in which I feel I can make a contribution to this debate, and that, generally speaking, is the two great radar lines that have been built in our north.

Before dealing with them, I want to call the attention of hon. members to some of the physical facts relating to our country. Canada is a country that is larger in territory than the United States and Alaska combined. The constituency which I represent comprises about 175,000 square miles right in the heart of this country, yet it lies in the southern half of Canada. I represent nearly two-thirds of the province of Manitoba, which lies to the south of the Northwest Territories. Churchill, on Hudson bay, our northern port, is just about the geographical centre of Canada. Now, that is an amazing thing, but if you look at the map you will realize how much of Canada lies to the north of that. In my constituency, which is really a fringe constituency with regard to population, there are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 60,000 people. There are more people there than in all the Northwest Territories and the Yukon combined. When you think of the large territory that has to be covered, and that is the area we must defend, you will see some of the problems that enter into it.

I might refer to the solution of one of those problems. Our aircraft industry, in this small nation of 16 million people, has had to develop one of the outstanding aircraft in operation today, the CF-100. The problems related to its development were due to the size of the country and the distance it has to travel. I do not know of any other comparable problem anywhere, and for the same reason we have now to develop the CF-105. These are the problems that we, a small people, have to meet, and I am very proud of the way they have been met in the past.

Speaking of this tremendous area that I have mentioned, we have lying in that area possibly the richest resources that any country ever had under its charge. We have not fully coped with that area. There are many reasons why we have not, and one of the chief reasons is the small population and the services that have to be built and developed before we can properly cope with it. But when people get up and glibly say we are not properly looking after the sovereignty of that area or that the Department of National Defence is lax in looking after the sovereignty of that area. I wish they would take a look at the map, take into consideration some of the things I have said and try to realize the tremendous problems involved. The amount of money necessary to do these very large jobs has to be squeezed out of the economy which is developing, fortunately, at a very rapid rate. If we do not develop at that rapid rate it will make that defence job all the more difficult; so that if it is a battle of priorities between development, which fortunately does not come out of the estimates but does come out of the economy, and other developments and the protection of that economy, which has a valuable part to play in our everyday life, and the choosing of which has the higher priority, I have no doubt as to what the choice will be.

When faced with this problem some people have said that it is a waste of money; that this area cannot be defended. Well, let us suppose for a moment that it is a waste of money. I do not for a moment agree with that. I think it is a defensible area, or the people charged with those decisions would not have made them. I am leaving the military aspect for the moment. The country that those two lines run through is important; it is rich country; it is country that must be occupied by us as fast as we can occupy it or other people on this globe will occupy it in spite of us. The Canadian construction crews who have gone out and worked in the construction of those lines are getting a knowledge of their country that they never dreamed existed. They are finding out something about the country in which they are living and of which they are a part, and that will be of tremendous value in itself in making the rest of Canada aware of the lands within their borders.

There is only one regret I have in connection with the development of these lines and the development of the north that goes along with it, and that regret is that it has been the action of another country that has forced us to take the close look at our country that we have been taking. These lines will have a tremendous impact on our country in the future. Even if we admit they are not militarily worth while, every dollar spent there will be economically worth while because it will place an umbrella over the whole nation and it will assist tremendously in the prospecting, in the pioneering and in the developing of that northland.

I am afraid I have not given the picture as I should like to give it because it is such a large one to give. It is ridiculous to say that because our neighbours to the south are paying for the construction of the D.E.W. line, and are looking after the military aspect of it, we have lost our sovereignty over it. The mid-Canada line runs along the 55th parallel, roughly, and I can remember in my school days hearing the slogan "54-40 or fight". We all know now how ridiculous that was and how ridiculous it is to say that the Americans are going to control us or have any influence on us that we ourselves do not agree to or recognize as being part of our geography or part of the facts of life that we live on their borders. Therefore, I feel that these fears are quite illogical and are only part of the general lack of knowledge that we as Canadians have of our own nation.

Now, as I said, it is true that many of our preparations may in the future prove to have been unnecessary—again I am speaking of military preparations. They might prove to have been unnecessary and I am sure that everyone here hopes that they will prove to have been unnecessary; but I cannot think of any military decision taken in the past that was unnecessary within the scope of the facts on which it was based.

There has never been such a time of uncertainty in our history, uncertainty as to what we should or should not be doing in many fields; but in the midst of that uncertainty I do not think we have ever been better served by those whom we have charged with the responsibility of our defence.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, first, I should like to comment on the speech made yesterday by the senior hon. member for Halifax, in which he sought to establish that there was not any need for the committee requested by the Leader of the Opposition because great masses of information in regard to defence had been provided. Now, I can only describe the speech of the senior hon. member for Halifax as a collection of half truths, inaccuracies and words which added up to complete misrepresentation of the facts of the situation. It is quite true, as the hon. member said, we have had a lot of information in regard to defence matters, but a great deal of that information was in regard to details which were not of very great importance and did not assist us very greatly in discovering what the real facts are in regard to our defence situation.

On the other hand, the information which would place us in the position of knowing to what extent our defence forces are efficient and effective and whether we are getting value for the large amounts of money which we are putting into defence—those facts have very frequently been denied to us.

The hon. member for Halifax said that as far as the opposition is concerned everything is wrong with defence. We constantly say, "Everything is wrong with defence". Nobody on this side of the house has ever said everything was wrong with defence, or anything like that. We have throughout always been willing to admit and, as a matter of fact, to state that the officers and men in our defence forces are of high calibre, the morale is good and they have produced some efficient and effective units. The fact that we have made a considerable number of complaints in regard to the way in which the defence department has been carried on, and a great many criticisms on the general policy followed, and so forth, does not add up to saying that everything is wrong with defence. Nobody has ever maintained that everything was wrong with it.

I was particularly surprised that the hon. member for Halifax should have taken the proceedings before the defence expenditures committee of 1951, 1952 and 1953 as an example of the enormous amount of information on defence which was given to members on this side of the house, as an example of the fact that a defence committee such as that asked for by the Leader of the Opposition is not required. I think the hon. member showed a great deal of effrontery in even referring to the proceedings of the special committee on defence expenditure as an example of how much information was given to us. I have only one volume of the proceedings with me whereas I think the hon. member yesterday had the complete proceedings. If you go through the proceedings you will find instance after instance where information was denied to the members of that committee. In other words, rather than being an example, as the hon. member tried to indicate, of how much information was given it is a great example of exactly how much information was denied us.

It is true that a great deal of information was given to that committee but a vast portion of it was extremely irrelevant information. As a matter of fact, I believe the tactic pursued in that committee was an attempt to overwhelm the members of the committee with a tremendous number of figures and statistical lists of the number of pairs of socks on hand and things of that kind so that the committee would be bogged down in details and unable to obtain the information it desired.

When it came to requests for vital information, on the other hand, we were denied information. I will refer to only two instances which I think illustrate the point quite well. On April 29, 1952 at page 83 of the proceedings of the special committee on defence expenditure the following appears:

The chairman read the second report of the subcommittee on agenda, as follows:

Your sub-committee on agenda met on April 24 and 28, to consider the following notice of motion of Mr. Harkness, namely:

(a) That the Department of National Defence be asked to bring before the committee at its next meeting officials who can give us the general administrative set-up at Petawawa.

Then paragraphs (b), (c) and (d) are set out containing details of the particular witnesses we sought to have appear. Then it goes on to say:

Your sub-committee recommends that the above notice of motion be not entertained at the present time.

Mr. Harkness moved that the committee proceed with his motion as contained in the above report.

After debate, Mr. Applewhaite moved in amendment thereto

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

In other words, the entire motion for the production of witnesses and papers was struck out. That was voted on and of course my motion was voted down. The proposed amendment was carried and the committee was denied the right of calling witnesses and investigating what had occurred at Petawawa.

Mr. George S. Currie, of course, carried on an investigation subsequent to that which disclosed a number of facts which have never been very palatable to members on the government side of the house.

Another similar instance of denial of information occurs in the proceedings for June 12, 1952 as recorded at page 412 thereof. I was asking a series of questions and here is one which appears about one-third of the way down the page:

Mr. Harkness: In connection with 87(a) which is the big item in this whole thing—

This was a list of the expenditures for equipment as far as the air force and army were concerned.

—being far more than all the rest of these items together, the note at the bottom says supplier includes A.V. Roe—CF-100, Canadair—F-86 Sabre I presume, and probably other aircraft. Now, could we be told that it is these two aircraft that the item takes in or whether there are other aircraft?

We then proceeded to discuss the matter of security which was brought up and the discussion continues for two or three pages. The net result was that we received no information whatever concerning that item which, as I say, was larger than all the other items put together. That is typical of the way in which that committee was conducted.

It is all very well to say that all kinds of information was given in this committee and in other ways, but the important point is that the information we obtained was a mass of minute details which were not important and the really important questions which would have enabled us to obtain a picture of the situation were left unanswered and the information was denied us.

From this point I would go on to comment on the speech made by the minister yesterday and I think the same criticism applies to his speech. In other words, the minister answered some of the small specific questions which were brought up in considerable detail but he did not answer the general criticisms raised with regard to policy and organization and things of that nature. He simply did not answer the important questions which were posed in the speeches made by hon. members during the course of this debate.

The minister made an attempt to answer the statements or allegations or whatever you want to call them which are contained in the article written by General Simonds which appeared in Maclean's magazine and which has been referred to here so frequently. In connection with that I will just read an account of his remarks which appears in this morning's Gazette:

Mr. Campney said General Simonds' views are "merely expressions of opinion and not necessarily statements of fact."

Well, I think I could agree with that comment but I would say that the minister's remark also applies to the statements he made yesterday. In other words, he offered statements of opinion which were not necessarily statements of fact.

When it comes to statements of opinion concerning the subjects General Simonds dealt with in his article, I am more prepared to accept his opinion than the minister's. Having been the chief of staff and having spent his lifetime in the Canadian army, General Simonds I think is perhaps better qualified than is the minister to express an opinion as to the efficiency of Canadian defence headquarters. I think he is better qualified than is the minister to state an opinion as to whether defence headquarters could operate efficiently and effectively in the event of war.

In his statement yesterday the minister said he was convinced that national defence headquarters here was efficient and effective and would do a good job in the event of war. That was his opinion and that is all it is. The opinion of the minister is the complete opposite of the opinion expressed by General Simonds and I think the General's opinion on that subject is much more valid than is the minister's opinion.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, before the luncheon recess I had been commenting upon the reply made yesterday by the Minister of National Defence and had pointed out that while he had dealt with some of the smaller specific criticisms, such as the publication of books on hockey by the department, he had failed to deal with many of the more far-reaching and important criticisms by hon. members and also in magazine articles and other places by two high-ranking officers recently retired, General Simonds and General Macklin. I should like to ask the minister to deal specifically with some of the statements which appeared in the article by General Simonds in Maclean's magazine which have not been dealt with so far. They are summarized at the beginning of the article on page 22, and the following are three points which I do not think he touched upon:

1. There is no co-ordinated effort to evolve a sound and comprehensive defence policy.
2. The Canadian chiefs of staff committee is "packed" to protect the government against the receipt of unpalatable advice.
3. Senior civil servants can, by deliberate and unwarranted stalling, defeat the recommendations of the armed forces even though those recommendations have been approved by the cabinet.

When I spoke on these estimates before I had gone into this matter of general policy or lack of general policy as far as defence is concerned and had asked the minister to say something about that. I had also in some detail gone into the necessity for a reorganization of Canadian defence forces in view of the completely different circumstances which now exist owing to the development of thermonuclear weapons. In doing so I had paid some attention to the necessity, as far as the army was concerned, of developing more mobile and better protected forces which could operate in smaller units or forces where small units and sub-units could if necessary operate by themselves which undoubtedly would be necessary in the event of thermonuclear war. I also had something to say about the necessity for the unification of the armed forces and for a unified policy as far as all the forces are concerned, and the probable necessity, in order to accomplish that, of having an over-all chief of the defence forces as was found to be necessary during the second world war.

In the past few years since the war we have heard a considerable amount of talk about the integration of our three services. I am sorry to say that most of that talk I think has been eyewash. What it really comes down to is that the same branches of all three services as far as headquarters are concerned are in the same building. All that that really has accomplished is to waste people's time because when the people in A branch of the army, we will say, want to talk to the people in G branch of the army, they must take a long walk to a different building. It is true that the people in A branch of the army, navy and air force are located in the same building, but I understand that they really have very little to do with one another. In other words, it shows some outward signs of integration but actually it does not accomplish that purpose.

In addition to that we have three tri-service colleges which are quite good as far as they go, for cadets that is. We have the defence college at Kingston which I think is a good institution and where you have people from all three services as well as from external affairs and I believe other departments attending as students. I think it is an extremely good institution. We have the same rates of pay in the three services, but apart from those things nothing else in the way of integration has been accomplished that is really of any value as far as I can see.

I think everyone admits that the old concept of sea power, land power and air power being separate entities having little or no connection with one another is now completely invalid. No one of those forms of military power is of any use or avail by itself. In other words, they are totally interdependent. However, very little if anything in the organization of Canada's defence forces has taken place to show that these facts have been realized and taken into account.

The second world war showed the necessity for singleness of command and direction at the top for all forces in each theatre of war. It was not until that singleness of command in each theatre of war had been put into operation that we secured victory in the last war. But in spite of this, when the reorganization of the Canadian forces took place after the war this principle of unity of planning and direction was disregarded, and it still is.

As one example, the army and the air force each operate separate staff colleges where different concepts and doctrines of war are taught. The navy has no staff college at all. I think it would accomplish a great deal more and be much more important to have tri-service staff colleges for the training of staff officers than it is to have tri-service colleges for cadets. What was done to give some outward semblance of unity was really a clumsy and expensive attempt. A very large civil service was superimposed on the already extremely top-heavy staffs of the three services, duplicating the administrative machinery of the armed forces and thus duplicating the cost and slowing down action with of course a consequent loss in efficiency. I think one might properly ask this question. If the quartermaster services of the forces are doing a proper job, why does all this work have to be done over again by civil servants? The thing seems to be completely without reason.

In my opinion the first step which should be taken as far as reorganizing Canada's defence set-up is concerned is the complete reorganization of national defence headquarters in order to secure efficiency and economy at that level. I have spoken on this subject before; perhaps it may be said that I have harped on it during the past seven or eight years. I have made speeches on the subject when the defence estimates were up going back to a period of two or three years after the war. In speeches I have made from that time on I have referred to the top-heavy organization at defence headquarters, and the large proportion of service personnel in administrative and desk jobs as compared to those in fighting units.

The former minister of national defence attempted to minimize this situation. At one time he produced some figures which purported to show that we were no worse off in this regard than the United Kingdom and the United States. I should like to point out that the worth of such figures depends upon what you take as fighting units. If you took the actual fighting units at the time mentioned and compared the number in them with the number in the services generally you would find the proportion to be very poor. The fact that we were very deficient in fighting units was shown up strongly when the Korean war broke out. We were not able to send a single battalion to the Korean war at that time. There was a terrible rush to recruit enough men to send one battalion, and about six months later we were able to send two more battalions. When the war came we did not have any troops to send, in spite of the fact that the minister kept assuring the house that we had adequate military forces to meet any foreseeable or likely contingency.

In any event it has been my contention for several years past that defence headquarters is top-heavy and as a result wasteful and inefficient. I now have two very powerful witnesses to reinforce that claim. General Simonds has said in this article that the headquarters is top-heavy. The minister, of course, said that was only his opinion. I think that that opinion is a very weighty one and it is reinforced by General Macklin and every other retired officer with any experience with whom I have ever spoken in regard to the matter. General Simonds said that in a real crisis national defence headquarters would come to a grinding, shuddering halt. I claim that is probably correct, in spite of the minister's opinion to the contrary.

General Burns in his book on Canadian manpower, which was mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre yesterday, points out what a terrific waste of manpower there was in administrative jobs during the war, and he points out that, contrary to what the general opinion was, that wastage was greater in the Canadian army than in the United States army, which everyone was holding up as the greatest institution for providing ice cream for the troops and other services which were not too essential in getting soldiers on the field. Our wastage in administrative jobs was greater than in the United States army and considerably greater than in the United Kingdom army. That situation has continued in peace time. I am quite convinced that we are still wasting a terrific amount of manpower. This national defence headquarters is perhaps the prime example of this.

The situation there of the multiplication of staffs inevitably leads to waste of manpower and money and loss of time and efficiency. According to the Department of National Defence report for this year, there were 4,330 civilian staff here in Ottawa at the end of 1955. The number of service personnel at national defence headquarters was not given but it is very large, and as a matter of fact I should like the minister to give later the figures for the number of service personnel here at defence headquarters.

However, a few examples show the unnecessary duplication, triplication and quadruplication of staffs. I would take as the first of these the medical services. There are three directorates of medical services, one for each service, and in addition a civilian advisory board. There is a brigadier or equivalent rank at the head of each of these services. As a matter of fact, at the moment I think the navy has a captain at the head of its service. I do not think there is any doubt that one directorate of medical services would be sufficient for the three services. There is no necessity to have one for the army, one for the navy and one for the air force.

When you look at the dental services you will find that there are not three directorates of dental services but only one, with a director at the head of it. The dental service looks after the army, the navy and the air force and does it very efficiently and effectively, as far as I can determine. There is absolutely no reason why the same situation should not prevail as far as the medical services are concerned. The triplication of directors and their staffs there is completely unnecessary.

When we look at the chaplain services we see an even more ridiculous situation. Mr. Chairman, perhaps you could hardly credit it, but there are six directorates of chaplain services, each one headed by a colonel. There are six full colonels, and whom do they look after? According to this same report, at the end of 1955, there were only 246 chaplains, with these six directorates to run them. There is no doubt that two directorates, one for the Protestant and one for the Roman Catholic chaplains, for the three services would be ample, with two staffs instead of six staffs.

Another example is the directorate of military training in the army. When we look at the telephone book here we see that this directorate of military training has grown and flowered and has a multiplicity of full colonels as directors of various branches, each one with a considerable staff, each one with a G-2, majors, captains, lieutenants and goodness knows how many other personnel. We have a director of military training; we have a director of militia and cadets; we have a director of the Royal Canadian Armoured Corps; we have a director of the Royal Canadian Artillery; a director of the Signals; a director of the Royal Canadian Infantry Corps. In addition to that there are many other directorates of staff duties, military organization, planning and so forth, but the first ones I mentioned, the director of military training and these five directors for different corps, do the work that was done before the war by the director of military training and two staff officers.

It is admitted that the number of people in the army has increased very considerably, but I do not think there is any doubt that the increase has not been such as to warrant such a terrific multiplication of staffs as has taken place in these circumstances. The work of people of that kind consists to quite an extent of supervising training, putting out training pamphlets, issuing training directives and so on. The fact that we now have upwards of 50,000 people in the permanent army as compared with, say, 4,000 or 5,000 before the war, with a smaller number of people in the militia than before the war, does not warrant such an enormous multiplication of staffs, as far as training duties are concerned, as this shows.

As another example, each service has a personnel or manpower branch, and in addition to that there is another on the civilian side dealing with civilian personnel. In other words, there are four personnel agencies or directorates, or whatever you wish to call them, all dealing with the question of manpower. One would be sufficient. Of course, one of the results of having these various personnel directorates is that you have recruiting stations for all three services in each province and each city of any size. When you walk down the street in most of our cities, you will see an R.C.A.F. recruiting station; somewhere else you will see an army recruiting station; and somewhere else you will see a naval recruiting station. In other words, there are three recruiting stations, each with a staff and each paying a high rent in the downtown parts of our cities, to do the job that one recruiting station could do for all services and perhaps do more effectively.

Another example is with regard to pay services. There is a separate pay service for the army, navy and the air force. One pay service could handle the whole thing quite readily.

These are just some of the examples of the duplication, triplication and quadruplication of staffs and of the effort that goes on at national defence headquarters and is multiplied right across the country. I should like to refer now to one of the criticisms General Simonds made and it is to be found at page 66 of Maclean's magazine for June 23. It reads in this way:

> Power without responsibility is the theme that permeates the whole Canadian organization for the higher direction and control of defence.

That is national defence headquarters, of course.

> The Canadian chiefs of staff committee is "packed" to protect the government against the receipt of unpalatable advice, rather than present the military case objectively and fearlessly on its merits. The deputy minister of national defence, the permanent chairman, chiefs of staff and the chairman of the defence research board are all members of the chiefs of staff committee, yet none of these has any definite responsibility either to parliament on the one hand or for the end result as represented in the operational capability of each service on the other.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Chairman, I had decided not to take part in this debate and I would have preferred to continue to listen to the very interesting speeches coming from the other side of the house but as I heard a very silly speech delivered this morning by the member for Quebec West I thought an answer should be made to that speech. If the member for Quebec West was trying to get somebody's goat, he certainly put his own neck on the block. I have information given to me about the goat of the 22nd regiment, and during the recess a few of my friends to whom I have spoken have asked me the same question: Why in heaven has the member for Quebec West picked on the glorious 22nd regiment to make a farce of it?

I have received information on the question of the goat. It comes from the department and I also have further information coming from newspapers. I shall only refer to two of them. The goat referred to by the member for Quebec West was presented by His Excellency the Governor General on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen to the Royal 22nd Regiment last October. I should like to see every member of Her Majesty's loyal opposition in his seat to listen to that and to take the matter more seriously than the member for Quebec West did when he was here. I am sorry he is not here at the present time.

This goat was specially selected from a herd in the United Kingdom maintained by the crown. The goat is looked after by one corporal who has volunteered for this duty in addition to his regular duties as N.C.O. of the top platoon. All the costs concerned—and this should be noted by every member of the house—in the upkeep of the goat are met from regimental funds. From their personal moneys the members of the 22nd regiment pay for the upkeep of the goat.

Just before the hon. member for Quebec West came in I was saying that the famous goat which he spoke about before the recess had been presented by the Governor General on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen—

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Dufresne: —will the hon. member—

An hon. Member: You are the goat.

Mr. Dufresne: —allow me—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Dufresne: —just one word? I did not question the gift of the goat. I was only questioning the expenses incurred in the keeping of the goat at the Quebec citadel.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): If the hon. member—

Mr. Dufresne: I might be a goat but you are a bunch of sheep.

An hon. Member: That is what you think.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I would answer the hon. member on that but I am too charitable to do so.

An hon. Member: Go and have a quick one.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I was saying that all costs concerned in the upkeep of the goat are met from regimental funds.

Mr. Dufresne: No.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Yes. All concerned in the officers' mess and the N.C.O.'s mess are providing the funds for the upkeep of the goat, the mascot of the regiment. Most of the regiments in Canada have mascots and most of the sports associations in the world have mascots. Even the Tory party has a mascot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Dufresne: That is the best mascot of all.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I am going to tell the hon. gentleman one thing and I hope he will never forget it. When I was practising medicine I used to tell my patients—

An hon. Member: Did you have a certificate?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Yes, I have my certificate and I can treat you for mental disease if you like. Come again. I used to ask my patients to be patient and to take their pills and swallow them without saying a word because it would have a much better effect on their systems. Why don't you take your pill?

Mr. Dufresne: I do not need one from you.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You need a few.

Mr. Dufresne: Not one you would prescribe.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): A small building was constructed to house the goat and the only charges in this regard—listen to this; it is far from the figure given by the member for Quebec West—were some $120 met from regimental funds.

Mr. Dufresne: No.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why don't you be silent?

Mr. Dufresne: I am doing the same thing you do when I rise.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Why don't you be silent for once?

An hon. Member: Who wrote that speech?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Nobody. I can make my own speeches, and I do not read them. I am simply giving information that comes from the Department of National Defence and I have other information from newspapers, from a Tory newspaper, the Ottawa Journal, if you like.

Mr. Dufresne: That is not proof.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): There was also a somewhat smaller sum met by the crown—this is the sin—for electrical fittings which were installed by army engineers on the station. They do not give the amount but I presume it must be very small. The Royal 22nd Regiment is affiliated with the Royal Welsh Fusiliers which by ancient tradition has been privileged by the crown to have as its official mascot a goat from the royal herd. That is the story about the goat. Now, who is the goat?

Mr. Dufresne: That is your story about the goat.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You have not swallowed it yet? Then, there is an article in the Ottawa Journal of October 1955 which is headed, "Massey presents royal goat to famed royal 22nd". It reads:

Quebec, October 3:—The 1st battalion of the Royal 22nd regiment marched proudly along historic Grand Allee Saturday with a new mascot—a specially-trained goat presented to the Quebec army unit by Governor General Vincent Massey.

The parade was in the character of a farewell demonstration by the 800 men who embark here Tuesday—

These 800 members did not find it so funny. They were proud to parade with the goat given by the Queen.

—for Germany, where they will join the 2nd Canadian Infantry Brigade. The men's families will travel separately to Europe about one month from now.

Canada's 1st Infantry Brigade will soon return to Canada after serving two years in Germany.

More than 1,000 men of the famed "Van Doos"—

My hon. friend knows that the English speaking people call the 22nd the "Van Doos".

—gathered on the plains of Abraham for the goat presentation ceremony.

Mr. Massey—

After all, he is the Governor General of Canada. He is as high up in the hierarchy as the hon. member for Quebec West.

Mr. Massey presented the spotless, white-horned animal to Major General Georges Vanier, honorary colonel of the regiment who was its officer commanding when it was affiliated with the Royal Welsh Fusiliers in 1927. The mascot of the Fusiliers is also a goat.

The trained animal wore a silver insignia of the Royal 22nd on its horn and an inscription in French naming Mr. Massey as its donor.

Goat Corporal Albert Gagnon, 21, of Grand'mere, Quebec, wearing a scarlet gala uniform and bearskin cap, led the animal in the parade by a leather leash.

When the goat was brought close to Mr. Massey for the presentation ceremony, it rose on its hind legs and placed its front paws on the Governor General's chest. A crowd of onlookers applauded.

They were not ashamed of it. They did not make a fuss about that. They were quite pleased and honoured by the gift given by Her Majesty the Queen and the Governor General.

[Mr. Dufresne.]

Mr. Dufresne: Until then, there was no cost of any kind.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You do not know anything about the cost. You gave the figure as $1,800 this morning.

Mr. Dufresne: I knew what I was talking about.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It was $120.

Mr. Dufresne: That is your own figure.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You have a lot of your own. I continue reading from the article:

In a brief address Mr. Massey said he had cherished the hope of making the gift to the Royal 22nd for some time because of its affiliation with the Royal Welsh Fusiliers.

"It seemed appropriate—

That is the Governor General speaking.

—that you would share with the Royal Welsh Fusiliers one of their old traditions, that of counting among their members a goat from the royal flock," he said.

They were not ashamed of it. They did not make any fuss out of it. It was the hon. member for Quebec West who made the fuss. I am sure of this, that the hon. member has members of the Royal 22nd in his county, as I have in mine, and they will remember his outburst.

Mr. Dufresne: I did not say anything about the 22nd.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): There is an article in the Windsor Star which is about the same thing as reported in the Ottawa Journal, so why pick on the 22nd?

Mr. Dufresne: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Dufresne: I rise on a point of privilege.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): There is no point of privilege there.

Mr. Dufresne: Now, shut up a minute.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent, as the hon. member well knows.

Mr. Dufresne: On a point of privilege—Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): He is the mascot; he has certain privileges.

Mr. Dufresne: I am proud to be the mascot of a great party like mine.

An hon. Member: What have you got on your horns?

Mr. Dufresne: Quiet, children. My question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, is that the hon. member for Portneuf just said, why should the hon. member for Quebec West pick on the 22nd regiment? Never at any time have I mentioned anything regarding the 22nd regiment. I am proud of this regiment and many of its members are in my constituency. I do want to tell the hon. member for Portneuf that he has to withdraw those words.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dufresne: If I did pick on someone, I picked on the goat with all the expenses incurred. I am still sure the figures I gave were the right ones.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I would rather not withdraw, Mr. Chairman, because I have another epithet to replace the first one and my hon. friend will not like it. Shall I withdraw?

Mr. Dufresne: Do whatever you wish to do.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Shall I withdraw?

Mr. Dufresne: It is not up to me to decide; I am not the chairman.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I am positive—oh, I forgot one thing. He says he is proud to be the mascot of a great party. I wonder if it is reciprocal? I hope they get a leash and bring him back on the line.

I was really sorry to hear the hon. member this morning. Of course, he never thought—

Mr. Dufresne: You do not have to.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You do not have to think? Well, that is funny. He never thought that would be like a bouncing ball after the recess. I have read newspaper clippings from the Ottawa Journal, and surely he must believe in those if he believes in anything—I mean politically speaking.

Mr. Dufresne: What about the expense?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I gave the expense, $120, and it came from the personal funds of the N.C.O.'s and officers mess. Is that enough? Is that clear?

Mr. Dufresne: That is your own version.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): It is my version and it is the version of all those who have been in the army. We must not forget, Mr. Chairman, that the—I will not say attack but I would say unhappy intervention of the hon. member for Quebec West about that goat is now a thing of the past, but I am sure the members of the "Van Doos" will not like it and will not forget it. When we are in the army and away from our families we must have something like this to keep up the esprit de corps, to enjoy ourselves and to make the army more pleasant. That is normal; that is a tradition.

Mr. Dufresne: You should have a goat in your own ranks, too.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): If we have to have one we shall choose it. Mr. Chairman, I think the matter of the goat is cleared up by the Ottawa Journal and by the information coming from the Department of National Defence. When the hon. member retires tonight and is on his knees with a good book in his hand dealing with the past, the present and the future of the Conservative party he will have time to meditate on what he did this morning.

Another thing he mentioned this morning was the Petawawa horses. On January 22, 1953, the hon. member for Hamilton West asked these questions in the house:

1. Were any names of persons listed on Petawawa payrolls which did not represent living human beings?
2. If so, how many?
3. At what rate of pay were they listed?
4. Was remuneration in cash or by cheque?
5. If the latter, who cashed the cheques?
6. Were deductions made for income tax purposes at source?
7. If so, what claims, if any, were made for exemption because of (a) married status; (b) other dependents?

The Prime Minister answered that question as follows:

Mr. Speaker, as this question concerns matters in which the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Justice are all three interested, I believe it would be appropriate that I answer it. The answer to the first question is "no" and therefore the remaining questions are not applicable.

Mr. Dufresne: You should read the Currie report.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I continue:

As this answer will appear to differ from a two-line statement in the Currie report tabled on December 15 last, I think I should state the facts in this connection so far as it has been possible to ascertain them.

It is very long, Mr. Chairman. I will not put it on Hansard. If the hon. member would like to consult my scrapbook he will find very interesting things in it—

Mr. Dufresne: I read the Currie report.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): —pertaining to my hon. friend.

Mr. Dufresne: I read the revised one.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): I continue:

The names on the payroll were the names of labourers who actually existed and who worked as teamsters. There were no false names on the payroll and no horses on the payroll.

This question was settled long ago. After all, a majority of the Canadian electors settled it once and for all in 1953.

Mr. Jones: As an officer who served in the Welsh Fusiliers in the first war, I feel I must get into this discussion. I served from August 14 with the Welsh Fusiliers until I was knocked out, and actually any time a goat is mentioned it is a fighting word to the Welsh Fusiliers. I am sure the hon. member for Quebec West would not say what he said anywhere near the present members of that regiment. It is probably the oldest mascot in military history. It was adopted soon after the Crimean war. Queen Victoria gave the Welsh Fusiliers the first goat and, ever since that, as one goat dies it has been replaced from Windsor Great Park.

There is only one thing we have against the goat as a mascot and that is the smell. We have always arranged so that the dirtiest battalions and the dirtiest companies that have not been looking after their camps march immediately behind the goat. That was the punishment; and naturally they tried to do better the next time. While in France the goat got dirty and possibly did smell. Whenever a member of royalty made a visit to the regiment we would, in order to entertain him, have the goat in the mess and so we had two men wash and scrub all day to try to remove the smell of the goat, but, when royalty came in, it did smell.

I would suggest that these mascots are a wonderful incentive to the men. I know on long marches in France the colonel would turn around and say, "Damn you fellows, the goat can march, can't you?" And certainly the men would say, if the goat can do it, we can. Actually, we took a pride in the goat.

There are one or two matters I should like to mention while I am on my feet. My criticism of the Department of National Defence is their complete failure to assist rifle associations to get equipment. I have tried and tried through the present minister to get targets for a group in Penticton, a purely voluntary group of men—

Some hon. Members: Baa, baa!

Mr. Dufresne: We know where the goats are.

Mr. Jones: —who have purchased land areas suitable for target practice. All the members of the rifle association are young men. Some belong to local military units, and there are others, and they are anxious to be prepared in case of an emergency. We have the experience of the last war of the Pacific coast rangers who drilled themselves and conducted themselves in such a way that they could be of use in the event of an invasion of the Pacific coast. The government appreciated the excellent work they did on a voluntary basis. This rifle association is willing to do the same thing. I am making a request of the minister. They were turned down completely. These targets are available. I believe some of them are at Armstrong and at the rifle range at Vernon. The department has condemned the range at Vernon; the targets are not being used. They are left to rust. They could be used by these people and they would use them if they had them. The department would be getting something for nothing. These young men are willing to train themselves to be of service to the department should the occasion arise. I hope the minister will change his attitude and go out of his way to help these men.

There is one other thing I should like to mention. I hold in my hand a copy of Roundel. I think the minister is probably aware of what it is. It shows a tight formation of jet aircraft. I am going to suggest that a tight formation of jet aircraft or of any aircraft is a real folly; it endangers life and makes useless a lot of our equipment in the form of jet planes. I do not have to refer to the accidents that took place in France where these jets were flying 500 or 600 miles an hour, or whatever rate they go, wing-tip to wing-tip. They are subject to human error; they are subject to mechanical error and all the errors that follow the mechanical age; and yet we take this unnecessary risk with our equipment, and more so with valuable trained pilots and others who may be on the planes. I think it is time the department called a halt to these tight formations. They are very pretty, we love watching them; they are really spectacular but they are highly dangerous. In a war, if you flew planes in tight formations like that it would be an ideal target for the enemy. The only way to fly in war is to scatter the planes as far as possible and your ground troops and your air troops to make the target as hard to hit as possible. In view of the impractical use of tight formations in war, I would suggest to the minister that it should be discontinued in peace to give those young pilots a break.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, I have to go to the banking committee in a minute. I know you are going to start questions pretty soon. I have one that I want to leave with the Minister of National Defence which I hope he will not find too tough. First I want to congratulate him in that he has handled the problem with which he deals better than they did in Britain where they had the famous battle of the bloomers which has just been concluded.

I notice in the latest annual report of the Department of National Defence they are now giving a monthly clothing allowance for uniforms to the personnel of the armed services and I observe that the women receive $2 a month more than the men. My question to the minister is this. I hope he is not going to run into trouble with the Minister of Labour in view of his new bill concerning equal pay for equal work for women. I also hope he is not going to embarrass the hon. member for Hamilton West who for so many years has been asking for equal pay for women in that this is not going to degenerate into a policy of extra pay for women.

Mr. Brooks: Very clever.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, in the last few minutes this debate has been a strange one in that we have gone from goats to bloomers. We have had an explanation as to the expenses incurred over the goat mascot of the "Van Doos" and we found out that the trouble with the Tory party is that they have too many mascots and not enough party.

Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, the senior member for Halifax, as he does on occasion, set himself up as the hatchet man for the government and said that the committee on defence expenditures which sat for about two years or more found absolutely nothing wrong with the department and that the opposition was extremely disappointed because they were unable to verify any of the charges that had been made concerning the Department of Defence Production.

I would like to remind the hon. member for Halifax that his memory must be pretty short. Surely he has not forgotten all the evidence that was brought out in that committee with regard to Penhold, Cold Lake, Namao and the other defence construction enterprises. Surely he has not forgotten the price of $13,258 a well that was paid to drill the wells at Penhold. One of them was 105 feet deep and cost something over $100 a foot.

Surely he has not forgotten the $664,000 in change orders that came about as a result of changes in decisions and so on after the contracts had been let. Surely he has not forgotten the $28,200 speed-up payment that was given to the major construction company engaged there because they were lagging in the time element of their contract. At the same time, during that speed-up period when they had asked for an expansion because they were unable to live up to the time limit the company was given another $4,900,000 contract at Cold Lake.

Surely he has not forgotten the $5,000 that was given to the contractor in order to pick up the cement slabs that were apparently covered by snow when the tenderer went there to make the tenders in spite of the fact that the tender definitely states that the tenderer has investigated into the circumstances, has looked over the site and is basing his tender on that ground.

I am not going to say anything more about that because those are things that could probably happen in any department of any government; but for the hon. member to stand up and say we were unable to discover anything wrong in that committee is surely folly.

How well I recall that when speaking in the debate after the committee had finished sitting the hon. member said almost tearfully that he had not heard any of the charges in committee that were being made on the floor of the house. The fact remains that we could not make any charges in committee because every time we opened our mouths to say anything the hon. member for Halifax would get up and say, "Mr. Chairman, I object. The hon. member is making a statement, he is not asking a question".

The very fact that immediately following the debate that took place the committee was closed off and has not been able to reconvene again is the best indication I know of that we must have found out something. That committee did a wonderful job. We touched upon only one phase of defence contracts. We should have been allowed to go on because I think the government gained a good deal as a result of the probing that was done in that committee.

I am not going to speak about that any further except to mention that the hon. member told us yesterday how much information the members of this house were allowed to receive here in the house and he pointed out that we could go anywhere at any time and go aboard any ship or enter any defence establishment. He took great pains to point out that even the public was allowed to go on board these ships and enter these establishments at fixed times. All I can gather from that comment is that the hon. member was trying to tell the public of Canada that their members of parliament are entitled to have exactly the same kind of information as is the public. Unless we as members of parliament have the opportunity of digging in and thoroughly investigating all phases of national defence we cannot possibly do the job we were sent down here to do.

After all, that department of government is spending more money than any other department, about $2½ billion of the taxpayers' money. Surely to goodness we should be given practically all the information we want concerning these expenditures so we can determine whether or not the money is being spent in a proper way.

We want to find out whether or not there has been any waste or extravagance. I am not accusing anybody of any crooked dealings or anything of the sort but I do think the attitude the government has taken, that it is almost a sacrilege to question anything having to do with defence, is wrong. We have a duty to investigate these things and I think we should be allowed to do so.

I have two more points to draw to the attention of the minister, one of which I brought up last year, and that is the question of ground to air guided missiles. Apparently the department has practically given up any idea of proceeding with an investigation in this field. I would like to point out to the minister that ground to air guided missiles working in conjunction with the radar lines could be of the greatest assistance in protecting this country against air attacks because these missiles would be ready in advance bases in the north long before any alert could be answered by any of our aircraft. They would serve as the first line of defence against any air attack coming from behind the iron curtain across the polar wastes.

I urge the minister to give serious consideration to this point. I know of no cheaper and more effective way of protecting ourselves against possible air attacks.

My last point is one about which I feel very strongly and although I mentioned it to the minister last year he did not deal with it at all. I have no doubt the minister will remember that I asked him what the possibility was of asking the press to withhold news of air crashes and military fatal accidents until such time as the next of kin have been notified. Time and time again throughout the years you hear the same old story that so many men of the armed forces were killed and that the names are being withheld until the next of kin have been notified. I cannot think of anything that would be harder to bear than for the people back home to have to sit and wonder if their boy or father is the one who has been killed. I would not want to have to sit by and wait until it was published in the newspapers.

I am not asking for the forcible suppression of news or anything like that, but I suggest to the minister that he ask the press to co-operate in this. I think the newspapers and radio bureaux of this country are humane enough to want to ease the suffering that would come about as a result of publishing that type of news. I have never been placed in this position, but no doubt many hon. members have. No doubt they have had to sit back and wait for 24 or 36 hours after someone had been killed at a station and not be able to learn if it was their son. A wife should not have to suffer when her husband is on such a station until the news is finally published in the newspaper or over the air.

I put this to the minister in all seriousness, as I think a severe strain is placed on these people by having to wait for definite news as to who has been involved in a fatal accident.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to preface my brief remarks by saying that I am going to ask a number of questions which I do not expect the minister to answer at the moment. I had expected to ask these questions on the particular items, but unfortunately I must leave the house and will not have that opportunity. I shall ask the questions now and possibly the minister will answer them later on.

When the debate on the estimates of this department opened some time ago I asked a number of questions. In his remarks yesterday the minister answered some but not all of those questions. It may just be my interpretation, but to me the minister's answers were somewhat evasive; therefore I intend to ask the questions again.

First of all with respect to the cruiser Quebec, yesterday the minister stated that the Quebec has now been placed in reserve. I am glad to hear that, because a cruiser is an expensive ship to operate. I understand that the cruiser Ontario is being converted for the training of junior officers at sea. I should like to know the normal complement of officers and men on H.M.C.S. Ontario and what is the annual cost of maintaining and operating this ship.

Yesterday the minister said that one reason the Quebec was being put in reserve was that a sufficient number of other ships are now available for training. It would seem to me that since we are going to have an anti-submarine destroyer navy it would be much better to train junior officers on destroyers or similar types of ships rather than on a cruiser, which in all likelihood will never be used and which is most expensive to maintain.

The next thing I should like to deal with briefly is the destroyer escorts. I do not think the information given by the minister is definite enough, and I should like to know how long it will be before the St. Laurent class of destroyer and the Crescent destroyer escort will be in service and what the cost of these ships is expected to be. My understanding is that the cost of the prototype of this class, namely H.M.C.S. St. Laurent, was nearly $18 million. Naturally it costs more to produce a prototype, but I should like to know if the other units of this class will cost less, the same or more per unit.

I should like to ask one question in connection with the Crescent and Tribal class destroyers which are being converted. Yesterday the minister told us that the cost of conversion and refitting will run to $4 million in the case of the Crescent class and $5,500,000 in the case of the Tribal class. He stated also that the life expectancy of these ships is something over 20 years, and this is also the case with the frigates. I should like to know the life expectancy of both the Tribal and Cresent class destroyers after being converted and refitted. Will it be five years, ten years or what? I expect that the minister will be able to give us that information, and also information with respect to the original construction date of these ships.

I think it is quite important to know how long these ships are going to be in use after we have spent $4 million refitting one class and $5,500,000 refitting another class. I should like to know the original cost of the Tribal class destroyer and also the Crescent class.

I have some questions that have to do with frigates, of which we apparently have about 20 in the Canadian navy. I believe there are 10 in operation, 3 on loan to Norway, 6 in reserve and 5 undergoing conversion. Yesterday the minister told us that the cost of conversion was approximately $3,500,000. I should like to know if any of these frigates were built after the end of world war II, or were they all constructed during world war II? What will be the life expectancy of these frigates after this rather expensive conversion job? I may be wrong and I hope the minister will correct me if I am, but I believe the life expectancy is about three or four years after this conversion which will cost about $3,500,000. I should like to know the original cost of these frigates and when they were first built. Unless my memory serves me poorly, it is costing a great deal more to convert them than it did to build them in the first place. It may be that I am mistaken, and I have no doubt the minister will give us the figures.

I asked earlier what type of engines these ships have. I do not expect the minister to give the details because naturally that information is classified, but I would like to know whether they are fitted with turbine or reciprocating engines? I do not think it would be out of line to ask if these ships are capable of overtaking a modern Russian submarine. My understanding is that a Russian submarine can travel at the rate of 25 knots under water, and I understood that these frigates were not capable of that speed. It may be that alterations are being made to bring up the speed of these ships to equal that of Russian submarines. I would certainly be delighted to hear that was so. That is another matter which I hope the minister will clear up.

I know these are questions which are in the minds of the Canadian people and of those who were formerly connected with the naval services. In my opinion they are of great importance.

There is only one other question I should like to ask in regard to the matter of frigates. If these frigates are being reconverted at a cost of $3½ million each and they cannot carry out the task of overtaking potential enemy submarines, I should like to know just what is the purpose of having them in the naval service and particularly of spending all this money on them. I understand that the general view, not only in this country but elsewhere, is that the new St. Laurent class destroyers are probably the most up to date and efficient type of anti-submarine vessels at present afloat, and I am glad to hear we are going to have a number of these; I believe it is 14. That is excellent, and they should make our anti-submarine navy, at least in quality if not in quantity, the finest afloat. But the thought occurs to me, what is the purpose of spending all this money on reconverting these frigates if they are not going to be used for any great length of time and if they are not capable of overtaking potential enemy submarines? I shall be delighted to read the minister's answers when he gives them.

If their speed is presently sufficient to enable them to overtake an enemy submarine, that is fine; and if they are going to have a considerable life expectancy I think the cost would be justified. Otherwise I think it would not. It has been suggested to me that these frigates are just a temporary stop-gap until all the new St. Laurent class destroyers are built. If that is the case possibly the expense might be justified, but unless they are capable of catching an enemy submarine I still do not think it would be.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Before the first item is carried there are two or three questions I should like to ask and a few remarks I should like to make. I do not intend to go into all the ramifications of the Department of National Defence.

I said the other night that because of all the far-reaching angles of national defence—for example, the D.E.W. line is so far away that Canadians are not able to see just what they are getting for their defence dollar—of all the dollars that are spent we have actually less to show for those spent on national defence, and that is partly because aircraft particularly and defence items in general become obsolete about the time when they go into production. Consequently it is an expensive operation.

Ever since the earliest days the city of London has been a military headquarters. Western Ontario and the city of London particularly, to put it mildly, were very much disappointed when the minister announced the disbandment of 420 squadron. With the changed flying conditions I do not suppose we could expect these things to continue indefinitely, but I think the city and I myself felt that here was a group of men giving time to the 420 auxiliary squadron.

I read very carefully the minister's reply yesterday to my question of the day before on what the plans were to use these personnel of 420 auxiliary squadron. I think that what actually will happen is that many of these men will be disappointed. They were going there in their spare time and flying those planes, but they are going to say that they are not interested in ground work and will give it up, not all of them but a great many of them. I was, shall I say, shocked to read in today's Montreal Gazette these words:

> Montreal's week-end pilots in the R.C.A.F. are on the job full time this week and next.

It says that the two auxiliary squadrons, 401 city of Westmount and 438 city of Montreal will be equipped with Sabre jets and T-33 trainers, and each squadron will retain two propeller-driven Harvards. At the very time they are washing out 420 squadron, there in Montreal apparently they are equipping the squadrons with better equipment. The minister more or less says—perhaps he does not say it in so many words but he indicates by his actions—that it was an obsolete operation in London. Yet I find that in Montreal two of these auxiliary squadrons are being retained and equipped with better aircraft.

I think I suggested earlier that the minister should consider using 420 squadron personnel at London for transport and duties of that type. I know the minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that there is a shortage of heavy duty transport facilities, both civilian and military, in Canada. This is a use that could be made of the airport facilities and the personnel there, and they would be flying the type of aircraft with which they are familiar. It seems to me that better use could be made of the knowledge these auxiliary squadrons have. I could not quite follow the minister.

[Mr. White (Middlesex East).]

I understand that the disbandment order on the Hamilton squadron was lifted but not the one on 420 squadron at London. They are not going to be treated alike.

Mr. Campney: The ban has not been lifted on flying for 424 squadron.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Then I understand that both squadrons will be treated in the same manner?

Mr. Campney: That is my understanding also.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): A question was asked this morning about the brief submitted to the Minister of Transport by the Canadian airline pilots' association. I hope the minister will not interrupt and say that this is a transport matter, because I have just one reference to make. In their presentation regarding transportation they have this to say:

> . . . there is a grave deficiency in Canadian air transport capacity and that there is no plan to meet Canadian responsibilities in an emergency.

That is not the first reference I have seen regarding the need for transport aircraft. In this modern age we need practically an airborne army, in my estimation, to move troops quickly from place to place. This is the very type of work that I think this auxiliary squadron could assist in doing. It could train men for that very purpose.

I am not going to burden the minister and the house with the entire contents of these two resolutions. I hold in my hand a resolution from the city of London regarding 420 squadron and toward the conclusion it says:

> Therefore be it resolved that the council of the corporation of the city of London petition the dominion government, through the Minister of National Defence, to give serious consideration to the retention of the London airport as a flying station and that if it is impossible to retain No. 420 city of London squadron, another flying training unit be located at the London airport.

Later they suggest that a transport training unit be established at London if the present 420 squadron is not to be retained. I do not know what else I can add except to say, as I did at the beginning, that the city of London all down through history has been connected with national defence as a headquarters for military operations, and the citizens of the area rather feel that they are being let down at this time.

I have a couple of other questions I should like to address to the minister. I notice on pages 312, 321 and 334 of the details certain expenditures for fire-fighters in the armed forces. On page 312 there is an item of $1,405,040 for fire-fighters in the navy. On page 321 there is an item of $926,660 for fire-fighters in the army and on page 334 there is an item of $437,360 for fire-fighters in the air force. These items total $2,769,060. That seems to me to be a terrific fire insurance policy to pay. The number of men are listed. How many fires have there been in each of the last five years in military establishments in Canada and what was the amount of the loss in each of the fires?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I think the general debate is fast drawing to a close. I wonder whether the minister could clear up one or two of the questions which have already been asked before we proceed with the details.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I have followed the debate with a good deal of interest and have received a good deal of advice on things past, present and to come, and even some advice on other departments, but I do thank hon. members for their observations.

Mr. Brooks: Do you think you will profit by them?

Mr. Campney: I also thank them for their attention to this subject, which we all agree is of very great moment to all of us. There are a few matters I could deal with now. I know that a considerable number of matters will come up on the detailed estimates for the different branches, but there are a few subjects that I could possibly deal with now before we proceed with the consideration of the details of the estimates.

Yesterday the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich made a remark about the difference between the chiefs of staffs committees in Great Britain and Canada. I must agree that he extended my remarks to complete their accuracy, and I appreciate that. He also asked a question about the stockpiling of CF-100 aircraft and made some further remarks leading from that. I should point out that we do not have and probably will not have a stockpile of CF-100 aircraft in any permament sense of that word, because the rate of production is being reduced, as the hon. gentleman knows, and out of the rate of production as it now stands plus accumulated CF-100's our requirements will be to replace CF-100's in the four squadrons of the first Canadian air division in Europe, which has already been announced, to provide CF-100's for the three additional interceptor squadrons for air defence in Canada, which I have already announced, and to have a continuing bank for normal aircraft attrition and for spares.

Indeed, the CF-100 program is now ready to be phased into the development and, we hope, production of the CF-105. Therefore in effect we will not have, looking into the future, a stockpile of CF-100's surplus to our requirements. That does not mean, of course, that they could not be produced if other nations of NATO wish to acquire them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre asked for an explanation of the decrease of $24 million in the army estimates for this year. He was as usual apprehensive for the welfare of the army, and wondered whether this indicated a trend or a decision to reduce the army's status or its equipment. This decrease, I may tell him, is almost wholly attributable to the fact that the stockpiling of certain ammunition and vehicles has been largely completed, and that stockpiling involved large sums.

He also asked for further information about the additional armoured regiments to which I referred on June 20. There are a number of matters still being reviewed in that regard, and I am not in a position to give details about particular regiments. However, I can say that the intention is that the armoured regiments will normally be brigaded in brigade groups of all arms within the division and it will be possible, should the need arise, to use all the armoured regiments in combination after the manner of an armoured brigade as well as separately with the brigade group. That is part of the flexibility that we are trying to achieve.

I should like to assure him and also the hon. member for Calgary North that I think it is fair to say, and I am glad to note that some other members did say it, including the Leader of the Opposition, that our army, navy and air force are in first class fighting condition. I would not ask hon. members to take my word alone for that, but we have had the repeated assurances of General Gruenther and Sir Richard Gale, who has commanded our armed forces in Europe, with regard to the Canadian brigade in Europe. Other NATO commanders have spoken very highly of the fitness and capability of our brigade and air division as well.

I might mention in that connection that I find it a little difficult sometimes to reconcile the fact that we do listen to eulogistic remarks from members opposite with respect to our armed services and at the same time considerable criticisms of the department as such. Eulogistic remarks with respect to the service should be, and I think are, the principal test of the effectiveness of the department itself and of its whole organization. But I would not want the impression to go abroad that the end product is good but that the method of achieving it is bad. I do not think that adds up too well.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris, in speaking about the auxiliary air force in which he has such a continuing and deep interest, referred to the way in which the auxiliary force had been dealt with by the Royal Canadian Air Force as being arbitrary, high-handed and without previous consultation. I should like to say that before any decisions were taken with respect to the auxiliary air force the matter was given very careful study and consideration by the planning officers of the air force, and some months ago we brought in all the senior officers of all the auxiliary squadrons, had a long conference here in Ottawa and explained our problem and studied theirs. Since then we have endeavoured to the best of our ability to make sure there was not any arbitrary action taken or any decisions made without the ground for them being well known and appreciated.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, in his philosophic discussion yesterday which was very enjoyable, mentioned that probably the main usefulness of the early warning radar lines is to enable the strategic air command of the United States to get off the ground. I do not dispute that that is the principal reason, but I should like to keep along with that in the public mind the other subsidiary aims which are of very considerable importance. A secondary deterrent purpose of this line is to alert our defence forces so they may, in turn, counter-attack the attacking forces. This may blunt any attack that may be made. We know—I think the percentage is correct—in the German bombing raids in the second world war that when the losses got up to something like 15 per cent of their planes the bombing raids practically ceased. The fact that we have this line and the fact that we would be enabled, we hope, to inflict great losses on any attacking forces, must have a deterrent effect on the plans of any potential enemy.

The other secondary object of the radar line is to alert the civilian population and the civil defence authorities.

I notice the hon. member for Kamloops is not here, so I shall not attempt to add to his confusion about the three ammunition depots at Kamloops and the two fire brigades, but I will be able to work the situation out with him. As a matter of fact it is under consideration, and I had hoped to have a detailed answer.

Mr. Pearkes: He is attending another committee this afternoon.

Mr. Campney: Yes, I understand that. The hon. member for New Westminster gave some figures yesterday. I had no advance notice of them, but I have asked to have them looked into. We try to keep the pay for our civilians in line with the going rates in their locality. It may be that, although that is the target toward which we strive, in some cases we fall behind before picking up the slack. On the other hand I notice we have not had much trouble getting all the people we want. They seem to regard our service as not too bad.

A little while ago the hon. member for Calgary North referred to the number of civilians at defence headquarters, and asked for the number of service officers and other ranks there. The total figure for service officers and other ranks at national headquarters is 2,845, comprising 1,657 officers and 1,188 other ranks. I should like to observe in that connection, because I noted his critical remarks about headquarters, that, after all, headquarters does have to look after not only the 116,000 to 117,000 service personnel and the 54,000 civilians, but they also have the reserve forces of some 56,000 in the three services; a ground observer corps of over 80,000, and over 100,000 cadets. Altogether, therefore, in our many activities there are more than a quarter of a million persons being supervised by headquarters, and that requires a substantially larger staff than one might have if there were just the regular forces. We must also recognize that it would be a very poor attempt at economy, shall I say, if we were to try to make small savings at headquarters to the detriment of this vast number of people we have to oversee.

With reference to his remarks about tri-service activities, I can assure him I recognize some of the points he has mentioned and we are trying and are succeeding rather slowly, perhaps, to get improvement in tri-service activities. I think it is generally recognized now that the tri-service principle is a good principle. Events are probably pointing more and more to the principle, but we have to assimilate changes as we make them.

The hon. member for Calgary North, who has served in one of the services, knows that if you want to get full support of the services they have to be convinced that any change is in their own best interests as well as in the best interests of defence. I am not pessimistic in my feelings about tri-service development. I noted his suggestions with respect to certain specific cases which he thought should be expedited. We are working on one or two phases at the moment, and we shall continue to work on them. I hope we will achieve some results.

Mr. Churchill: Since the minister is answering questions, will he answer my question regarding the armoured personnel carrier? Is it a figment of the imagination, or is it on the drawing board, or is it in production?

Mr. Campney: I made inquiries about this and I have not a detailed or final statement, but I think it is approaching the prototype stage. Work has been progressing on it for some time.

While I am on my feet there is another matter in which I know the hon. member is interested, because he mentioned it last year. He expressed the view that we ought to have a one-volume history of world war I. Now that the editing and writing of the second world war history is practically complete, I have given instructions to Colonel Stacey to prepare a one-volume history of world war 1.

Mr. Churchill: I had a speech ready on that, so I shall file it away.

Mr. Herridge: I was called to the phone for a minute and unfortunately did not hear the minister's reply to the questions. Did the minister reply to the question I raised this morning?

Mr. Campney: No, I have not as yet.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): There is one matter I should like to mention in this debate and draw to the minister's attention, and that is the equipping and dressing of cadets throughout Canada. I bring this up because I have received a letter from the principal of the high school in Kincardine. It is a very short letter, and I should like to read it:

> Almost every high school in Ontario which has a cadet corps is experiencing the same problem as we are in the Kincardine district high school. Each cadet corps is assigned a quota of cadets and all equipment is issued on the basis of this quota. The assignment quota is very frequently slightly higher than half of the number of boys in the school. Thus it is difficult to outfit and equip all the boys who take the cadet training.
> For instance, in the Kincardine district high school we have 108 boys, while our cadet quota is 67. Thus you see that our issue of 67 uniforms is insufficient to dress all the boys of the school. Other schools are affected similarly.
> This situation exists for the following reason: Army headquarters in Ottawa decided that there would be a fixed number of cadets in Canada, (65,000 I believe) and finances are provided to equip and train only that number. This national quota of cadets has not been increased to keep pace with the increased inrolments of the secondary schools in Canada.
>
> Knowing that you are vitally interested in the defence of Canada and knowing that you are aware of the value of cadet training in maintaining this defence, may I suggest that you request the Department of National Defence to have army headquarters increase the national quota of cadets to such a number that all high school boys in Canada can be properly equipped to take the cadet training.
>
> Yours very truly,
> (sgd.) G. V. Thornicroft.

I might say that our district is in rather a unique position in that in two world wars we sent many men to the army, navy and air force. We have had a unit in Bruce since the old 32nd regiment was there at the time of the Fenian raids into Canada. But in the reorganization a few years ago our unit was taken away and at the present time our armoury, which was a good one compared with the average, has been sold. In view of the fact that the enrolment in the secondary schools has increased, this principal is not asking for anything out of the way. I know we all agree that cadet training is something that can be very valuable to future service in the army, navy and air force.

I would ask the minister to give consideration to raising the quota. I would not suggest that 100 per cent of all who want to serve should be admitted, but I do say that a quota of 65,000 for the Dominion of Canada at the present time is not large enough.

Mr. Campney: I might just observe that the ceiling on the number of cadets has recently been raised from 65,000 to 75,000.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): That is a little better, but it is still not enough.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, the minister mentioned a matter on which I would like to say a few words, namely the selection of the armoured regiment. We have an armoured regiment in my own town of Sussex with which I am sure the minister is familiar. I refer to the Princess Louise Hussars. I doubt whether any regiment in Canada—in fact I know there is no regiment in Canada—has as splendid a record both in war and peace as the Princess Louise Hussars. It has become a yearly habit of theirs to win trophies at camp, both for the quality of their training and also for the number of men they have taken to camp.

This regiment has a very long history. It is one of the oldest regiments in Canada. It was previously a cavalry regiment, organized a good many years ago. It was changed into an armoured regiment just before the second world war. They sent large numbers overseas in the first war; they were overseas in the second war as an armoured unit and gave a splendid account of themselves. They have carried out their training since the reorganization after the second world war.

As I said a moment ago, at Petawawa and in other camps in which this unit has been training every year, they have won practically every trophy which has been given for excellence in training, and I hope when the selection is made the minister will keep in mind what is undoubtedly the best militia armoured unit in Canada today. At the present time this unit is well officered. I know most of the officers; they come from my constituency. The unit has a great tradition and a great record.

I should like to have the minister's attention for a moment because this is a very important matter so far as I am concerned and so far as the unit is concerned. They have a great tradition and a great record. I know of the enthusiasm of the men. I should like the minister to intimate just when the selection will be made and tell us what units are under consideration, or how the selection will be made when it is made.

Mr. Campney: I cannot think of anything from the point of view of my own peace of mind in the future that would be less desirable for me to say.

Mr. Brooks: I should think it would be a very easy choice.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say one or two words following the remarks made by my colleague the hon. member for Middlesex East, and arising out of the statement the minister gave on June 20 having to do with the reorganization of the auxiliary squadrons of the air force.

At the outset I would like to say I recognize the practical problems which the minister and the department face and faced up to. Certainly we cannot expect to have auxiliary squadrons flying the latest types of aircraft in every small city, town and hamlet across the country and at the same time hope to reduce our defence expenditures. But I would like to reinforce the remarks made by my colleague to the effect, as is no doubt recognized by the minister, that London has been a garrison town for many years, ever since the days of Simcoe and before. Only this past spring the minister himself was invited to be present at an anniversary parade and gathering of a very famous regiment which is one of several with headquarters in London. Just previous to, during and since the last war, the air force came into its own and became a power in the London district. As a matter of fact this airport, which houses auxiliary squadron No. 420, is still the first port of call in Canada of many of the young men who are sent here for air force training by our NATO partners.

I should like to suggest to the minister only one thing. By taking this active flying unit and turning it into a squadron for aircraft control and warning he has done something which if he carries it out, will discourage all those who have participated in the flying training of that squadron, and he will discourage to a great extent the interest of the young people who have grown up in London with the knowledge that at a certain time in their career they could offer their services to that squadron in a flying capacity. Aircraft control and warning, as I think the minister will agree, is perhaps not the most interesting or enticing type of work to which we can attract the youth of our country who are interested in flying.

I would suggest that one of our greatest needs is transport squadrons. That was recognized by the minister in his speech on June 20, when he announced at page 5210 of Hansard that the Calgary squadron will become a light transport auxiliary squadron. We have the facilities at Crumlin airport to operate a light transport auxiliary squadron. As a matter of fact, the minister will recall certain conversations which have been going on among his department, the Department of Transport and the minister responsible for T.C.A. with respect to that self-same airport. It was as a result of the intervention of the Department of National Defence, in fact, that the runway was extended at some considerable expense to enable 420 squadron to land its T-33 trainer.

I am not going to press for one minute for the continuation of 420 squadron as a jet training squadron, but I suggest it would be most suitable to become a light transport auxiliary squadron, so we can maintain the flying interest that exists in London. The minister is well aware that not many miles to the north there is a regular flying training base to which not only Canadians but persons from all the NATO countries come for their flying training. May I therefore just add my word to the many words that have already been addressed to the minister in the hope that we may retain 420 squadron on some basis as a flying training squadron.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we proceed to the discussion?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I was disappointed that in his reply the minister did not make any real attempt to meet the criticisms which have been made with regard to the necessity for the reorganization of our forces, and particularly the reorganization of national defence headquarters. I refer to the criticism that it has become a cumbersome, overblown organization which is inefficient and ineffective and would be completely useless to carry out its activities in the event of war.

Mr. Campney: I do not think that is the case at all.

Mr. Harkness: Earlier today the minister merely said that in his opinion that was not the case. However, it is the opinion of people who should know and who have given evidence in regard to the matter.

As I said earlier, it has been the opinion of every retired senior officer who has served at national defence headquarters since the war with whom I have talked concerning this matter. I have not spoken to a single retired officer who has served there who did not agree that there is a terrific waste of manpower and a terrific duplication, triplication, quadruplication and multiplication of staffs, with the result that a great deal of paper is simply passed from one department to another. They are kept busy taking in each other's washing. They have indicated it is the type of organization which because of the very form in which it is organized cannot function effectively.

The minister made no effort whatever to meet that criticism. He has not even given us an indication that he would undertake an investigation of defence headquarters with a view to making it a better type of organization. I mentioned five or six instances of triplication or quadruplication of staffs which exist there at the present time, and which I do not believe anybody can defend by saying there is any real need for them. One of these is the medical service, where we have three directorates with a brigadier or the equivalent at the head of each. When we come to the dental service there is only one directorate and one staff instead of three, and they carry on the whole dental service for the three forces quite effectively and efficiently. I see absolutely no reason why the same thing cannot be done as far as the medical and pay services are concerned, as well as the other services I mentioned, which I shall not take time to repeat.

The minister has made no effort whatever to give any answer to the criticism or to give any assurance that a study will be undertaken. When we discussed these estimates before I suggested the possibility of the appointment of a royal commission such as the Otter commission of an earlier day, or the Esher commission in Great Britain, to make a study of the defence set-up and offer recommendations to the government and parliament as to the changes which could be put into effect in order to make a more efficient and better functioning organization.

I strongly deplore the fact that the minister is apparently prepared to let this matter drop. He pays no attention to our requests and disregards the criticism as far as his replies are concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we proceed to the calling of the headings?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask again if the minister really has nothing to say with regard to what I consider is perhaps the most serious consideration of the general national defence set-up and organization at the present time?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the strongly held opinion of my hon. friend, with which I do not agree, I may tell him, if it will help to satisfy him, that the civil side of national defence headquarters is always under study, and if he looks at the figures I think he will see the numbers are down a little this year; not much, but slightly. We have committees studying the matter; we have the civil service commission and the treasury board and our own committee; therefore the civil side is constantly under surveillance. I am just as anxious as the hon. member that we save money without producing inefficiency.

Now, with regard to the service side, the creation of a tri-service group, one group functioning for the three services, is desirable and has every merit but it is not as easy as it sounds, because there are many different factors which obtain in different services in respect of their respective classifications. One of them is in regard to the medical service. We are having studies made concerning this. I do not wish to have the hon. member give the impression to this house and the public that I have no interest in these things. I know they are being studied and that work is being done on them. I do not know how the hon. member can say he knows that what somebody else says is correct and what I say is wrong; I do not know how he arrives at these conclusions. I do say, however, that I feel if national defence headquarters were put to the test, having in mind the quarter of a million people who are more or less under its jurisdiction it would be found adequately and properly set up to meet the test. Perhaps it could take care of its obligations with some fewer people. That is a thing we are always anxious to establish; but I just cannot allow the hon. member to get away with the statement he has made that everything is out of line, because I do not think it is.

Mr. Harkness: Well, Mr. Chairman, all the minister does in this connection is to state his opinion.

Mr. Campney: All you have been doing is stating your opinion and other people's.

Mr. Harkness: He continues to state his opinion that everything is all right. Of course I am stating my own opinion and I have been stating it in regard to this matter for years, but I am also stating the opinion of General Simonds, who should know about these things better than anybody else; and his opinion is made quite clear in the articles he has written on the matter. I am stating the opinion, too, of General Macklin, who has also written articles with regard to this matter. I am stating the opinions of a number of retired senior officers who have had considerable experience at national defence headquarters. As I have said, I have not spoken to any one of them who did not hold the opinion I have expressed. Therefore I am prepared to accept that as being the fact rather than accept the opinion of the minister.

In addition I have mentioned half a dozen specific instances to which the minister has been able to make no reply whatever concerning the duplication of staffs and the wastage of manpower and money with the resulting lack of efficiency. For example, there are six chaplains, as I mentioned, with about 240 chaplains to look after; but we have a full colonel and staff for each service in the Protestant and Roman Catholic denominations. Although there are six directorates, I think any reasonable man would say that two would be more than ample.

Concerning the medical services, the minister says there are difficulties in amalgamating them as has been done in the case of the dental services, but we have not heard what the difficulties are and I do not think they would be very great. As a matter of fact, until not very long ago the medical service for the army and the air force was carried on by the army. At one time they were united; then they were split up for no good reason, as far as I have been able to learn. The same thing applies to the pay service and other services. The minister just says that in his opinion there is not much that can be done. That is no answer to these criticisms, and particularly it is not an answer to these specific cases.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, might I suggest a specific case where I think amalgamation of the three services could be very easily worked out. That would be the provost corps, where we have provost marshals in the three services and we have shore patrols carrying out the same sort of duty that is carried out by the military police. I suggest to the minister that there is a service where I do not think any serious difficulty would be experienced in bringing about amalgamation.

The Deputy Chairman: Do I take it that the committee is agreeable to proceeding to the calling of headings? In order that we may understand the procedure, may I point out that item No. 235 is one item in the estimates and has to be carried or finally disposed of as one item. If it is generally agreed by the committee I shall call each subheading in the details, and when the discussion on that has been exhausted we shall proceed to the next. After we have gone through all the details item 235 will then be submitted to the committee. Hon. members will find the details commencing on page 305 of the blue book, and I would propose to call each heading and subheading in the order in which they appear. Under defence services the first item is departmental administration.

Mr. Pearkes: I notice there is a new appointment of a superintendent of manpower and establishments with a salary $9,000 per year. Would the minister indicate the duties of this officer, who I presume will be a civilian? While on the question of manpower, because I imagine the superintendent of manpower and establishments will have something to do with the adjustment of the various establishments in the different services, I should like to quote the remarks made yesterday by the minister, as reported on page 6119, of Hansard as follows:

> To begin with, a peacetime maximum strength figure is not a target to be reached as an end in itself. Rather, it is a means to an end, a planning limit within which the services agree to work out the details of their programs to enable us successfully to carry out our commitments.

I would assume that in the past agreement was reached among the chiefs of the general staffs in connection with the manpower ceilings, because I presume they would be the only ones who could advise whether the numbers which were authorized would enable them to carry out their commitments. I should like to ask whether it has been the practice in the past to consult the chiefs of staff regarding the ceilings set on the three services, whether this was discussed by the cabinet defence committee when the chiefs of staff were present, and if they gave their concurrence in the decisions reached.

Mr. Campney: I shall deal first with the position of superintendent of manpower and establishments to which the hon. member referred. This is not an entirely new position, it is a consolidation of two senior administrative positions which were established some years ago. As they were established, one of these positions co-ordinated all matters relating to pay and allowances while the other had to do with the financial aspects of the establishments. One man is now doing these duties which are related to the economic and financial aspect of the manpower employed by the department other than those on the military side. This gentleman is concerned with ensuring that the ceilings for the use of manpower, particularly civilian manpower, are adequate. He is primarily concerned with the civilian units at headquarters.

Mr. Pearkes: He does not deal with the actual military establishment?

Mr. Campney: No. Dealing with the second question having to do with ceilings and my statement which the hon. member quoted, the ceilings are arrived at, first, by taking cognizance of what we regard as our obligations to NATO, to ourselves, the mobile striking force and various other factors in our defence. The number of people required for the carrying out of these duties is considered and in that connection the chiefs of staff are consulted. There are discussions with them and with departmental officials concerned.

The hon. member will appreciate that each service is anxious to have considerable leeway, and that is the point at which I enter into the picture. We finally arrive at the ceilings. The background behind them is to try to determine—this does not mean that they cannot be changed—the number of people required in each service to fulfil what we consider would be their obligations to the Canadian people, their commitments to NATO and so on. It is the result of a combination of studies. Sometimes there has to be a reconsideration of the over-all picture, but we have not had very much trouble about it. It has been worked out pretty unanimously.

Mr. Pearkes: Do I have the minister's assurance that the final figure reached for the various services would be presented to the chiefs of staff, who would have an opportunity of expressing their opinions to the minister or to the defence committee of cabinet that the figures given were either adequate or inadequate?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): On page 26 of the white paper, paragraph 89, is to be found the following:

> In order to enable station commanders and senior officers to devote more of their time to the operational duties at R.C.A.F. stations, a special administrative course has been organized at London, Ontario, for junior officers.

The University of Western Ontario located at London has a business administration course which is considered one of the finest in Canada, and I am wondering why a special administrative course has been organized by the R.C.A.F. at London. Is that carried on as part of the university work? How many men are attending that course?

Mr. Campney: I visited London a couple of years ago, and my recollection is that the course is not connected with the university. It is a course especially organized by the R.C.A.F. to meet its needs. I am sorry I cannot at the moment give my hon. friend the number of people attending, but when I was there the number was substantial.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Would the minister look into this and advise me definitely?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): As the university already has a business administration course I think that should be taken advantage of.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, perhaps the committee will permit me to read one paragraph of what I said last year when we were discussing defence estimates. I quote from page 4895 of Hansard for June 16, 1955, as follows:

> I would think as well that there could be considerable savings in the defence estimates. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said that at no time did we advocate a cut in defence expenditures at the risk of our national safety, but we appear to be continuing the well-defined program that is ever present in the defence services. In looking over the estimates it would appear we are holding the line on top level appointments, but the empire builders are still at work. The estimates disclose a continual increase in the number of office boys, stenographers, cleaners, helpers, clerks of all grades, chauffeurs and messengers. In one place I even noticed an increase in the helper column from 422 to 1,220.

I think it can be said at this stage that although the minister has indicated that some studies are going on, the reductions are so small they can hardly be found. It would appear that any reductions that are being made in the employment of these categories of persons are taking place in the same places where we are reducing the number of military personnel, and there does not seem to be any indication, on looking through this book for this year, of any type of efficiency examination to see whether the proportion of civilians employed to the number of front-line personnel, if that is what you want to call them, is being reduced.

I am not going to mention at this particular point the places where I checked the numbers and added them up. It is true that there is a decrease in the number of civilians in relation to the army but it is true at the same time that there is a general decrease in the number of personnel in the army. What I would like to know is what type of investigation is taking place within the department to ascertain: (a) whether the greatest efficiency is being attained by the civilians who are working with the military personnel; (b) whether there is duplication of effort in connection with the personnel who are employed; and (c), and I think this is quite important, whether the civilian personnel who are being employed are being given all the necessary equipment to ensure that they can do a good job.

The minister has said that some of these things are matters of opinion, and I am giving him mine. Naturally, until such time as we can have a committee and examine outsiders in connection with these problems, we are all going to be talking opinion and nothing else, but I know for a fact—and I am not going to disclose where you get this information—that there are people in that department who still have to write letters in longhand. Why are they doing so? Because the personnel employed cannot take shorthand. The officers there are writing letters still, in 1956, in longhand and then sending them to somebody to be typed. If that sort of thing is rampant throughout the service, then obviously we are going to continue to have more and more of this type of personnel.

Summing up in connection with this particular item, I say that those three points I have mentioned should form part of the terms of reference of whatever group examines the efficiency standard of the department. In connection with their duties, they should be asking themselves at each stage what does this particular person contribute to increase the efficiency of our national defence? That is, are they filling a role which is going to ensure that the Canadian people generally are better off?

I am not going to refer to that incident about the dancing classes, but I say that if you are constructing a certain project, if you are going to build a dance hall somewhere—if that may be used as an example—then we are entitled to know what particular function that construction performs in connection with our over-all safety. If you can come back to us and say it is a question of the morale of the troops, that it is needed for that purpose and that unless you have good morale you cannot have good defence, then you may have a very firm answer; but each expense should be examined on the basis of what contribution it makes to the over-all defence, not to the over-all creation of employment for a great many people with no particular contribution to make.

In closing I should like to ask the minister what does his committee that makes these surveys continually—I think he used the word "continually"—do to see whether improvements can be made? How often do they meet, to whom do they report and what have been their recommendations?

Mr. Campney: The continuing committee consists of a representative of the department, a representative of treasury board and a representative of the civil service commission. They continually assess the material with which they are provided and for which they have asked, the duties and details of organization, and they make their recommendations once a year. I understand that the last complete assessment of national defence was finished in September of last year. They are now engaged on a further study for this year.

I should like to mention one other matter not entirely relevant, perhaps, but I sometimes find it difficult to compare the number of positions year by year. There is a continual change in the nomenclature which I find confusing. I look at one part of the estimates of a particular branch and I find, for example, that last year there were 10 helpers and this year there are 16, and then I find that certain other classes have disappeared. They have been reclassified and this changes the totals of those classes without changing the aggregate. But I feel reasonably assured that the duties that are carried on, on the civilian side—and that is what the hon. member was speaking of—are thoroughly gone over.

The treasury board is very zealous in its efforts to prevent the spending of money. I know that submission after submission that goes from my department—and I understand from other departments, too—to treasury board is referred back for further information, sometimes several times; and sometimes it is turned down completely. They are there for that purpose, and I am not quarrelling with their decisions. Treasury board has a representative dealing with the department, who knows the set-up and the duties people have to carry out in different branches.

Then there is also a member of the civil service commission who is supposed to have expert knowledge of the relative salaries, the duties performed for the salaries and so on. And there is our own representative, who is familiar with the personnel side of the department. That committee is not a rubber-stamp committee in any sense of the word. It works strenuously at its duties and recommends many changes. Sometimes it cuts down staff or recommends reclassifications. What I am trying to say is that the staff is under constant survey.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is this committee continually sitting? Is it a permanent group? Does it have regular meetings?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that last year it had between 25 and 30 meetings. Whenever they have material with which they wish to deal and on which they wish to make some decision, a meeting is called. Last year I think there were 27 meetings of this committee. In the meantime their work is going on, material is being provided, questions are being asked, answers are being obtained.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): This sounds very much like what I would call a house committee, though not in relation to this chamber. It seems to me that though it may come from various branches of the government, that would be a very appropriate term. Industry today pays a great deal of attention to the calling in of people from outside who they believe can assist in improving their efficiency. As long as this is a house committee, I can see that there may be many things passed over, because of jealousy among various people who are on the committee, that might otherwise be attended to.

Has attention been given to the thought of calling in some outside civilian consultants to look over the efficiency of the department and make recommendations? The reason I ask the question is simply this. You say there is a representative of treasury board on the committee, and that those people are very interested in cutting down total expenditures. That is very fine. On the other hand, they may cut it down on the basis of paying $40 a week to an employee who does not take shorthand instead of paying $50 a week to one who does, and you may end up by having two people at $40 a week doing a job that one at $50 might do. This is not something new. It goes on continually year after year, and I think it might be wise to consult some neutral group and ask them to have a look at the situation in order to see what might be done.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, the civil service commission member of this committee has access to all the technical experts of the civil service commission and he is supposed to do what the hon. member has suggested, give expert advice with respect to whether this position should be graded in some other way, whether two jobs should be combined, whether this salary is right, and so on. Throughout the government, of course, the commission has a great mass of information, and that is why it is represented on the committee. The commission is supposed to be the employment counsel of the committee and to make suggestions where it thinks matters could be improved.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we proceed to the next heading?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): No. I should like to ask the minister to have some of his experts inform us how it is that at the bottom of page 306 we find that this year the following items are identically the same: Civilian allowances, $21,500; travelling and removal expenses, $200,000; freight, express and cartage, $150, and postage, $75,000. There is one item here which is different. The item for professional and special services has been raised from $35,000 to $50,000. What explanation is there for the fact that these items are identical with the previous year's allowances?

Mr. Campney: I believe there are 22 items at the bottom of page 306 and the top of page 307, and the hon. member has pointed out that most of them are exactly the same. It must be understood that these are estimates. They are based on the average amount spent over a period of time, and particularly on the amount spent during the past year. If the estimate for the past year has been close to the mark the amount is retained. In other cases there have been changes up or down for one reason or another to meet what we anticipate will be the need throughout the year. I will be glad to try to give the hon. member the explanation with respect to any of those items he may wish. There are what we call bread and butter items that occur year after year, and I have the details if the hon. member would like to have them.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): So that I may tie this right down and be able to use this as an example, you have a total of 776 personnel this year as against 791 in the previous year. That is a reduction of 15. Yet the travelling expenses are identically the same. What method of calculation, having in mind the difference in the number of personnel, brings you to the same figure?

Mr. Campney: Frankly, we do not regard the difference between 776 and 791 as of sufficient magnitude to alter the general figure for travelling expenses, unless there is some other reason. These estimates are only general estimates. Every dollar of that item that is spent has to be properly vouchered within the department. If the amount is of any magnitude it has to go to treasury board and it is, of course, subject to internal audit and external audit. The figure that is shown here, being the same as last year, does not mean that with a reduction from 791 to 776 in the personnel we expect that with 15 fewer people the expenses will be exactly the same, certainly not.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Possibly I might be allowed to pursue this, because then I will not have to ask the same question every place it comes up. I want to use this as an example. I referred specifically to this type of thing in my opening remarks, when the estimates were considered previously. Surely in connection with this or any similar figure the ordinary commercial practice in handling a budget for a coming year would be to work out on a per capita basis the average amount which must be set aside, that amount having been proven to have been spent for travel over a period of years. Unless your experts just put down $200,000 and did not use their pencils too freely, surely they would have calculated a per capita amount and come up with some figure like $185,500. If you are running a business on an efficient basis that is the way you would calculate the budget for the coming year.

These lump sums are dumped in here all the way through. They come up not just in this item but time and time again. That is why I ask the question now whether there is any particular reason why the ordinary method of calculating something for a coming year's budget cannot be used here also?

Mr. Campney: Take the item to which the hon. member referred, travelling and removal expenses. That is set up to cover the travelling and transportation expenses of the minister, the deputy minister and the other departmental administrative staff when they are required to travel. It is broken down into three subitems in the department. Minister, deputy minister and general administrative staff—except audit—is allotted a figure of $50,000. The main item in this amount of $200,000 is for the staff of the chief auditor, and that amount is $134,000. In recent years that amount has been demonstrated as coming pretty close to the mark for him and his staff in doing the travelling audit. Then there is an item of $16,000 for the people of the bureau of current affairs.

Those are the three heads under which this sum is broken down, and the amounts are based on experience. We have to take two things into consideration. The first is the program envisaged in these items, which are all broken down into many subitems. The second is the experience of the past few years. We then take, based on those considerations, a rough figure approximately what is likely to be spent. With the scale of our operations and the complicated nature of our activities, I think it would be pretty much time wasted if we were to try to change this to a figure built up from detailed figures.

[Mr. Campney.]

In many cases we have a little of the item left over. We try to set up these items so they will approximate what the expenditures are likely to be in the best judgment which the people who make up the estimates can muster. For example, many of these items are more or less constant, but a great many others are not. When we get further along with the items you will see that in the army we rotate a brigade one year and the next year we do not. There are many such factors that enter into some of these items. There are expenditures that recur year after year, and the people who make up the estimates in the first instance have a pretty fair idea of what is likely to be required. They may not get as much as they want, but they tell me first what they think is necessary.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In concluding this subject may I say that I have checked the general expenditure for travel with regard to the army and I notice that it is down from $19 million to $14 million. I suppose we can assume that is because a brigade is not moving at a particular time. However, I think it is safe for us to say that some warning should be given that somewhere along the line these general figures are not going to be acceptable year after year. The minister said that it was a difference between 791 and 776, but if this policy is pursued I assume it will be the same figure next year when it may be 791 as against 750. In other words there must be a tie-in somewhere between the personnel, the jobs they are doing and the amount of money that is set aside for those various items.

I would think we could safely say this, and it has been commented upon by many members in connection with the discussion of the first item; here we have been asked to sign a blank cheque so far as the total amount being spent by this department is concerned. I think it would be reasonable to say that next year when we come back to take another look at these things some consideration should be given to ordinary accounting practices, figuring out your next year's budget and tying that in some way to the numbers you have employed, the types of jobs they are doing and the amount of money you require for this purpose.

Mr. Harkness: In connection with this matter which the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich raised about the director of personnel, which I think the minister said was an amalgamation of two positions which had existed previously—is that correct?

Mr. Campney: Yes, sir.

Mr. Harkness: In addition, there are directors of personnel for the navy, army and air force. It is one of those cases to which I referred in speaking generally, a quadruplication of effort. In order to try to get at the specific point of view so far as a specific matter is concerned, and to find to what extent they duplicate each other's efforts, I should like to know how much has been charged against each of these four offices during the past year for recruiting purposes. This will, of course, involve a considerable amount which was spent for recruiting during the past fiscal year. How much of that was spent by each of these offices, the director of personnel, which we have just mentioned, and the directors of personnel for the navy, army, and air force.

Mr. Campney: I am not too clear as to whether the hon. member is dealing with civilian personnel or service personnel?

Mr. Harkness: I am dealing essentially with service personnel. This director of personnel which the minister mentioned deals, he said, with both civilian and service personnel.

Mr. Campney: No, I said he dealt only with other than service personnel.

Mr. Harkness: I understood you to say he dealt with service personnel.

Mr. Campney: No, certain personnel on the civilian side; not service personnel.

Mr. Harkness: He has nothing to do with recruiting at all?

Mr. Campney: Nothing at all. His job is to evaluate the jobs, see that they are being adequately carried out and see that there is no waste effort; that people are working in the field in which they are supposed to be, and so on. It is felt that by combining the two positions to look after the two sides of this matter, the one official can get a better picture of the civilian side. This is purely a civilian matter. I would be glad to deal with the hon. member's question about service personnel when we get to that subject.

Mr. Harkness: I misunderstood the minister. He said "certain" and I thought he said "service". I shall be glad to deal with the question when we come to the military item.

Mr. Pearkes: There is a new item, acquisition and construction of buildings, $200,000. Are you building a new headquarters?

Mr. Campney: Practically all of that sum is for preliminary planning for the new headquarters we hope to build some day.

Mr. Pearkes: Have you decided yet on a location?

Mr. Campney: No; we are labouring on that, and it is considerably mixed up with the green belt at the moment.

The Chairman: Is departmental administration completed?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): No. I wonder if the minister is in a position to answer my question regarding the $2 million expenditure for fire-fighters?

Mr. Campney: The hon. member asked two questions, and probably I could deal with both of them now. He asked about the junior officers' course at London. I answered part of it, but I could not give him the number. Apparently it averages about 40; it does not involve the university. We do, in addition, send one or two senior officers there for special courses each year.

The Department of National Defence fire losses was the other matter about which the hon. member asked. Would the hon. member want to have the figures by years or the average?

Mr. White (Middlesex East): By years.

Mr. Campney: They are as follows: 1950, $1,171,515; 1951, $1,471,709; 1952, $3,077,362; 1953, $1,539,329; 1954, $5,132,914; 1955, $4,330,956, or an average yearly loss of $2,739,964.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): Is there any insurance carried on military establishments?

Mr. Campney: No, we do not carry insurance.

The Chairman: Is departmental administration completed? Inspection services.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I wonder if the minister might outline for us the liaison which exists between this branch of his department and the Department of Defence Production which ordinarily lets the contracts which I assume come under the scrutiny of this inspection service.

Mr. Campney: The chief of the inspection services, Mr. Chairman, assures me that there is not only complete liaison but continuous liaison between the two at all levels and in all types of work, for the simple reason it has to be so. An inspection takes place of an aeroplane, for instance, that is being constructed, and it has to be acceptable at each step of the work. Our inspection staff, of course, is the group that finally inspects the product we have to pay for and follows the project with the inspectors of defence production.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Who sets the specifications for the contracts which are required by the department and which are let through the other department?

Mr. Campney: The Department of National Defence sets the specifications, and then the Department of Defence Production procures, at the cheapest possible cost, materials in accordance with those specifications.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I assume that practically all the work of defence production is tied in with obtaining, facilitating and moving along the contracts for the Department of National Defence. The minister mentioned working with the inspectors of the Department of Defence Production. Is that an indication of duplication, or what particular reason would there be for inspection by defence production and inspection of the same specifications by national defence?

Mr. Campney: I am in error there. I understand now that our inspectors do all the inspecting, but they work in conjunction with the employees of defence production. So there is no overlapping. Our people do the inspecting.

The Chairman: Inspection services are completed. Royal Canadian Navy, regular force and general.

Mr. Pearkes: Is the minister able to answer some of the questions which were put to him regarding the Royal Canadian Navy by the hon. member for Oxford? The questions were of general interest. The hon. member had to go away to another committee this afternoon.

Mr. Campney: I am sorry but I have not the material to answer these questions offhand. I shall get the answers. A number of them involve considerable detail. If I do not have them ready before the committee deals with this item I shall be glad to see that the hon. member gets them, and anybody else who wishes them. I think there will have to be quite a little searching done to answer some of the questions asked.

Mr. Pearkes: The minister would not have the answer to the one regarding the speed of the frigates, which is of very general interest?

Mr. Campney: I can give some of this information now. It is not quite complete, but it appears to cover most of the points. The original cost of the frigates was approximately $2 million each; that is, for those built during wartime. We do not give out the speed of naval vessels, but frigates have a speed above that of ordinary enemy submarines now in service but probably not above that of the ones which are just being prototyped. Their engines are reciprocating engines.

As for Tribal destroyers, their life after conversion is estimated to be from six years to 10 years. They were constructed during the period from 1942 to 1947. Each Tribal destroyer cost something over $8 million, about $8,180,000.

The hon. member for Oxford asked about the complement of the Ontario. The complement is 50 officers and 550 men. The average time spent by junior officers training on board the Ontario is three months per year for each cadet, in groups of up to 100 cadets on each trip. There are three cruises a year covering the cadets. The annual cost of operating the Ontario is $2,533,000, including personnel. We expect that of the remainder of the 14 destroyer escorts, the last will be commissioned in 1958. We estimate that their ultimate unit cost, outside of armament and electronic equipment, will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $17 million each.

To come back to the frigates again, they were all built during world war II and their life expectancy is from six years to eight years. I think that covers the hon. member's questions.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask a question regarding the reserve fleet? What number of vessels have we now in the reserve fleet but not activated and not likely to be activated in the near future, but still kept under a sort of care and maintenance basis?

Mr. Campney: Page 6 of the white paper sets out the strength of the fleet, both commissioned and in reserve. In reserve there will now be—and it is not shown in the book—one cruiser, the Quebec, six frigates, 21 coastal escorts, five patrol craft, one repair ship, and 63 auxiliaries and small craft.

Mr. Pearkes: Is not the number of 21 escort vessels rather excessive? There is a good deal of expense in connection with the maintenance of these vessels in reserve. I understand these escort vessels are not likely to be recommissioned again. Could they be declared as surplus to establishment?

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the question of the reserve fleet—and I have not included in these figures the three frigates on loan to Norway—is now under study with a view to determining, bearing in mind the cost involved in maintaining the reserve fleet, whether some of them should not be disposed of. We have not as yet come to any conclusion; it is still under study.

Mr. Pearkes: I would suggest that these considerations be proceeded with, because not only do they require a certain amount of maintenance but they also take up a good deal of space in our harbours, and there is no use in keeping them.

Can the minister give a brief description of the cruises which have been undertaken by vessels of the Royal Canadian Navy, because I am of the opinion that those cruises are of very definite value in helping to fight the so-called cold war. Naval vessels go to far-away ports, and from what I know of the ships' companies of these vessels, I am sure they give a good account of themselves.

Mr. Campney: I am sorry, I have not the particulars of cruises that were made last year. They were fairly numerous. We are not unmindful of the fact the hon. member has mentioned. We wish to keep our ships known on the oceans of the world and in the capitals of other countries. It is just a case of balance as to how many of these cruises should be made, because the cruises are useful for the training of cadets and men. Another thing; if we had too many cruises it might prove too expensive. But we are not unmindful of the fact that it is desirable sometimes to show the flag in other parts of the world.

Mr. Pearkes: I think it would be interesting if the minister could at some later time give us that information. I want to ask a question regarding the magazine at Rocky Point. No doubt the minister is expecting me to ask some questions regarding the construction of the jetty at that magazine. I put some questions on the order paper earlier in the session. I was given advice as to the cost of that jetty, which was very considerable.

It was also pointed out in the answer I received that no Canadian naval vessel is capable of berthing at that jetty. All ammunitioning and de-ammunitioning has to be carried out by lighters which have to be brought from the port of Esquimalt, and during stormy weather it is impossible for those lighters to carry out the task they are required to do.

It does seem ridiculous to establish a magazine in which naval ammunition is stored—and the expense of that naval magazine was very heavy, running into millions of dollars, I believe—and not to have a pier or jetty at which naval vessels can tie up and carry out the simple process of ammunitioning or de-ammunitioning. It is almost prehistoric to think of putting ammunition from a vessel into a lighter and then bringing the lighter alongside the jetty and handling the ammunition again. I have seen the jetty myself; it is an expensively constructed jetty with cement piers and that sort of thing. I would ask the minister what are his plans in that respect, and if we are to write it off as simply having been a bad choice of site or bad construction?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, the Rocky Point ammunition jetty is not inoperable; it can be tied up to by small vessels. It is not unusable all the time, but under certain weather conditions ammunition has to be handled by lighters.

Mr. Pearkes: May I interrupt at this point. From the return I received I learned that no Canadian vessel has ever carried out the task of ammunitioning or de-ammunitioning from the jetty.

Mr. Campney: The information I have is that it can be done.

Mr. Pearkes: But apparently it has not been done yet.

Mr. Campney: I think the trouble basically arose out of the fact that when the jetty was constructed, it was found for engineering reasons to be so expensive that it was not built to the full length anticipated. Since the ammunition depot has been established the senior officers at Esquimalt have been making a study of the matter. They have evolved several alternatives, and they are making that study with cost figures as well. When that has been completed I shall take a new look at it and so will the officers at headquarters. I think at the moment the situation is substantially as it has been described by the hon. member, but I do not think it can be left in that state.

Mr. Pearkes: Does the minister recall the cost of that jetty?

Mr. Campney: $234,421.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Chairman, can the minister give the committee details of the transactions within the special account which are expected for this year, the special account being that one which has to do with the transfers under mutual aid?

Mr. Campney: Perhaps the hon. member would leave that until we get to the army and mutual aid element, because the army accounts for most of the money.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Yes, I know that; and the air force, too. If I can obtain the answer later on, that will be all right.

Mr. Thomas: A few minutes ago, Mr. Chairman, the minister was giving the facts concerning the destroyer escorts and the light cruisers which I presume are expected to be commissioned sometime in 1958. I would like to ask the minister how many of the 12 destroyer escorts that are being commissioned at the present time are actually operative at the moment?

Mr. Campney: They are all in commission.

Mr. Thomas: Last year when discussing these estimates the minister indicated that the department was experimenting with helicopters as an anti-submarine scouting weapon. Would the minister care to report whether or not they have been found successful, and what have been the results of those experiments?

Mr. Campney: A considerable number of experiments have been carried on throughout the past year and they are still being carried on, particularly from smaller ships, which is rather a new departure, so I am able to report that the testing of helicopters for naval operations is going on.

I may say that we also have under way a study with respect to helicopters for the three services in order that we may try to avoid duplication in the services of the same type of helicopter. We are trying to determine in what particular field of each service they can be used. We hope to arrive ultimately at a decision as to how many we should have in each service. Of course in this connection the navy is being given every consideration.

Mr. Thomas: So far, then, you have not come to any definite conclusion as to the value of helicopters as an anti-submarine weapon?

Mr. Campney: We have not come to any final conclusion, but I think I can say the experiments up to date have been very encouraging and we anticipate there will be a use for them.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, a short time ago I think the minister said that the cost of destroyers of the St. Laurent type was $17 million, excluding armament and certain electronic equipment; is that correct?

Mr. Campney: Yes, sir.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if the minister could tell us what the armament and electronic equipment will amount to; in other words what will be the total cost? I think that was the question asked by the hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Campney: I am informed that the total cost of armament and electronic equipment for the destroyer escorts will be somewhere around $6 million for each.

Mr. Harkness: The total cost will therefore run to $23 million each?

Mr. Campney: Approximately.

Mr. Harkness: Referring to the matter of the frigates, the minister said they were equipped with reciprocating engines. Are these new engines or the same engines that were in the frigates before, to which certain modifications have been made?

Mr. Campney: They are the same engines that were originally installed in the vessels. I am informed the theory is that the life of the engines and machinery is usually just about the same as that of the hull.

Mr. Harkness: Is there any possibility of increasing the speed of the engines and thereby increasing the efficiency of the frigates so they would be equal to the task of chasing the most modern Russian submarines?

Mr. Campney: The question of boosting the engines—I think that is the term used—is one which is under study.

Mr. Harkness: There is some possibility that the speed could be further increased, is that correct?

Mr. Campney: There is a possibility, but I would not want to hold out that hope because we do not know yet; we have not had our study carried sufficiently far to have determined this fact.

Mr. Harkness: If there is such a possibility I think the situation would be better than it appears to be at the present time, when we have these frigates which will have a life, as I take it from what the minister said, expiring perhaps between 1962 and 1964 or somewhere in that neighbourhood. They have been reconditioned at a cost of between $3 million and $4 million each. It would seem to me if they are not capable of being further increased in speed that has probably been a waste of money to quite an extent.

Mr. Campney: I am told that the greater part of the cost of modification of the frigates was for new armaments. We must remember that we had to start with what we had in the navy and modernize it, and then work from there into new craft. Most of the money spent on the frigates was spent for armaments and offensive weapons to make them as modern as we could under the circumstances.

Mr. Harkness: I think the situation still exists. It would be somewhat comparable to the air force spending money to modify a Hurricane, which would be a complete waste of money. I do not say that the modification of these frigates is as bad an example as that, but if it is not possible to increase their speed to the point where they can overtake or at least go as fast as a submarine, it seems to me that we have been sort of throwing good money after bad in modernizing and refitting these ships.

Mr. Campney: In addition to our obligations to NATO and other obligations, and in order to have our complement filled, it was felt some years ago that it would be desirable to make these changes. I think they are justified, as the ships still have several years of life. It is true they are not the most modern or fastest ships, but at least their equipment and armament is modern.

Mr. Harkness: Are they capable of taking a helicopter on board, or using helicopter as a sort of arm to go out from them for submarine surveys?

Mr. Campney: Officials of the department are working on one frigate to test the use of helicopters to see whether it will prove effective. There is some doubt as to whether it can be used, but we are going to find out by rule of thumb.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad to hear that that experiment is going on, because that may well justify the expense.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think the answers we are getting here justify the suspicion of the opposition as to the answers it has had previously. The minister stated there was little reluctance in giving us the answers we want. I understood that the minister's first answer was that these ships were fast enough to take care of any present submarine, but that they might not be able to take care of those now under development and being produced. Then later on we got an answer which would indicate that all this is being done to fulfil commitments to NATO. Then we are told that we cannot be given the information as to how fast these ships can go. I think it is fairly well known that if the reciprocating engines are still in them, and I understand they are, they will do about 22 knots. The information to be obtained from Time magazine, if you like—you can get it there when you cannot get it from our department of defence—is that Russian submarines now in operation will do about 25 knots.

I think we are entitled to know if that is the case. As was stated a moment ago, we are spending $3 million or $4 million to modernize these ships. What are we spending it for? Are we spending it to live up to a commitment to NATO to have X number of ships in the Atlantic, or are we spending it to produce something for the defence of this country? That brings me back to my basic remark that for each dollar spent we should have some return. If the figures I have given are not correct we should like to know what they are.

I cannot think of any particular security measure that should prevent us from knowing this. It would not put any prospective opponent in a position to know exactly where we stand. I would be inclined to believe that if other nations knew that this type of engine was still used in these ships, and we were told today that it is, they would know exactly how fast they can go. What is the true situation? Did we spend this money to make it possible for these ships to deal with submarines that we know are in the water now? How long will they be useful? It has been stated here that the natural life of a ship such as this is from six to eight years.

Mr. Campney: The whole situation is not as simple as my hon. friend claims. We read that the Russians have submarines that will do so many knots, but we can only surmise that that is so. I think we have gone quite a way toward indicating the general condition of the rejuvenated frigates and our various craft. It is not a case of secrecy for secrecy's sake, but I do not think it would be good business to say that we have so many ships which will go so many knots, that we have so many ships of a certain type that will go so many knots, and thus confirm our whole naval picture. I would be really hesitant to do that.

No other nation does that. We have to surmise from the best intelligence we can get just what is the case, and so do they. If I were to state the speed of such and such a ship as it has been rejuvenated I would be providing excellent confirmation. I do not think that is a desirable thing to do. I have tried to give as much information as I could about our naval ships and I have been glad to do that, but I do not think it would be in the best interests of NATO or of our other obligations to give details of the speed and armament of our ships.

We have to be a little careful about things like that. To give that information would be simply confirming beyond peradventure what information other nations may have about these ships. I am not enough of a technical man to say that you can determine the speed of the ship by the fact that it is fitted with reciprocating or some other type of engine. I do not know whether there is a formula that would give that information. I think I have gone quite a way, and I have tried to meet hon. members in regard to the particulars of these ships. I would not care to get into the question of speed.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It seems to me that if we pursue this line continually we are eventually going to arrive at the point where defence will be a matter for the government only and not for parliament. It is just another spoke in the wheel. It simply backs up the argument of the Leader of the Opposition that it is time we had a committee where certain of this information could be obtained which might not be made available in the house. I think the opposition should be placed in possession of information which would indicate whether the money is being spent for useful purposes.

To a great extent these things are generally known. The minister said something about a formula. I am sure if the hon. member for Oxford were here there would be no necessity for a formula. Any officer who had served on one of those ships during the last war and who was told that the same type of engine was being used today would be able to give this information. I realize that the ship has been renovated, and it may be that it can handle second-line submarines, and there must be plenty of them in the ocean. In the case of aircraft, we cannot always have a plane to take care of the fastest bomber, but the fastest bomber is not going to be used in quantity. There will be many secondary bombers which will have to be handled.

I say to the minister what I said last year, that I am extremely disappointed in being able to get many answers out of news magazines published in the United States that apparently I cannot get here. I certainly hope that condition does not continue.

Mr. Campney: I do not want to get into a controversy about this matter but I would ask the hon. member whether he puts complete credence in the answers on these matters that he reads in United States newspapers, or any newspapers. I am sure those are inaccurate figures in many cases. All kinds of speculation and all kinds of material are published, but the information is not necessarily official and not necessarily correct.

The hon. member made some reference to the fact that apparently the government is the only group that could be fully cognizant of government policy on defence. I do not see how it could be otherwise. The government has to take the responsibility for its policy on defence and it has to be the judge, I should think, of how much information of the type for which the hon. member is asking it is proper to make available. That applies in every country. It may be a disability from the point of view of members, but if we had a committee examining the defence picture, matters of policy would have to be withdrawn from the committee for reasons which I think are highly justifiable. Otherwise our defence picture in relation to these matters would be an open book, and we would certainly be a unique country if that became the case.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I certainly do not mean to imply that we had a place in the formulation of government policy, but I certainly think we have a place in the approval of the expenditure of these funds. Unless we know exactly what is being accomplished we cannot be expected to vote or not to vote for the appropriation asked for.

All I am saying is that in true cases of security I do not think there is any suggestion from this side that we should know what is going on, but the minister has said, "Don't believe everything you read in these United States publications." I do not think we do, but what is happening there is this. They have a committee in which representatives of the Senate and the House of Representatives have an opportunity of examining these people, and that is where most of the information comes from. It may be that their intelligence is no better than anyone else's and they do not know exactly at what speed Russian submarines can go, but at least they get some information that would enable them to draw a conclusion as to whether in a case like this the money was justified in being spent for this purpose.

The only other thing I should like to ask in connection with these previous questions is this, now that we have found that the cost for destroyers of the new class mentioned totals, I think, $23 million. Are comparable class destroyers being built elsewhere? Have they been designed from the keel up, as I understand these were—and we are properly proud they were designed and built here that way—and have we comparable figures to show whether in this case we are getting value for our dollars in a ship that will do a certain job? I should like to know from the minister whether he knows of any cases like that. If we cannot get the information, it is another argument for a committee to enable us to get it.

Mr. Campney: I am advised by the naval officials that there are no ships comparable to the new destroyer escort. I am advised that it is the product of a good deal of our own original designing and the best that we could learn from the Americans—as they make their designs available to us—and the British. Out of the three we have built this new destroyer escort which is, we think—and not only we think, but officials of other countries think—well in advance of anything else now afloat.

I should like to make one other observation about the cost of these destroyers. The hon. member will know very well that the costs of shipbuilding in Canada are very high, relative to the United Kingdom at least and to most other countries, so that, to answer his question shortly, I do not know of any comparable ship against which it could be set in the way of cost.

Mr. Thomas: I should like to say that the picture we have been given this afternoon, as far as the navy is concerned, is pretty bleak. One does not have to read newspaper reports or listen to conjectures or anything else to know that unless these frigates have increased their speed tremendously they cannot possibly cope with any of the more modern submarines or even most of the outdated ones. I can remember very well in the early spring of 1945 listening to one of the ships in our escort group sending back a running account of a chase with a submarine and saying at that time, "We can't shoot it, because we can't catch it." That is exactly the position in which these frigates are at the present time. They have put new armaments in them, new guns, I presume, new depth charges, and so on, but if they can't catch it they can't shoot it. Under those circumstances I cannot see how we could consider those ten frigates as first-line ships by any stretch of the imagination. That would leave us with one light fleet carrier and 12 destroyer escorts as front-line ships at the present time. In the event of hostilities, if we were given the same job we were given during the last war, that would mean we would have just about enough escort vessels to escort two convoys across the ocean. That is a bleak picture.

I would suggest that, rather than spending $3 million or $4 million in putting new armaments, new depth charges and new guns on outdated, outspeeded frigates, it would be better to try to throw that money into something that could do some good. The frigates, unless the speed has been packed up tremendously, cannot hope even to catch up to a submarine of 1945 vintage, and if they could not do that you can see how far they would be left behind at the present time.

I must say that I was in hopes when I saw this that we at last had a few cruisers, ten frigates and so on to rely on if hostilities should break out, but we are told today that one of the cruisers has been put into mothballs, the other is used as a training ship and ten of the frigates cannot possibly be operational, which leaves us with a grand operational navy of about 13 ships. That is a disheartening thing to have to look at.

Mr. Campney: I cannot admit that because the frigates cannot overhaul the fastest submarine we know of they are not operational ships. We are working toward a navy where the balance will be in favour of the fastest destroyer which will take care of any submarine that exists. When we get our destroyer escort program finished we shall have 25 destroyers. I do not think any navy in the world has all its navy in first-line ships. It is a progressive growth from one stage to another. These frigates, which had quite a few years of life in them, were refitted so they would be more modernly armed. I think they could play a very useful part in any hostilities that might arise, even though admittedly they probably could not catch the fastest submarine, if we have the right figure as to its speed. However, I think the hon. member is deprecating the picture a little too much.

Mr. Thomas: Perhaps I was minimizing things, but I should hate to be on one.

Mr. Bell: I should like to refer to two specific matters with respect to the navy item. The first is our shipbuilding program. I appreciate that the Department of Defence Production and also the maritime commission have certain responsibilities in connection with this matter, but I should like to know why it is that our naval construction program cannot be lined up on a year to year basis instead of month to month. We have a shipbuilding industry in Canada, and in the case of the area around Saint John we are dependent on that industry to a large extent. It employs about 1,500 men. This business of handing out contracts every month or two, then causing a serious reduction in employment in the area through cutbacks, and then providing further employment is a drain on the entire community. It may be that some of the larger shipyards do not feel it to the same degree.

I appreciate there are tough decisions that have to be made as far as future plans are concerned, and they have been pointed out this afternoon. But I notice that the minister had this to say, as found at page 6119 of Hansard of yesterday:

> There have been no naval developments which were not foreseen reasonably accurately when that figure was agreed on.

He was referring, of course, to the total amount for the navy. I could make a long speech about what I think is wrong with our naval plans. As has been said here and as I mentioned this afternoon, I cannot figure out for the life of me why we are building such a large escort fleet when we have not got a bloody ship to escort. But that is another story. That is a matter of NATO commitments and of what is going to be done with our deplorable merchant marine. I do want to say that we have to line up the plans we are going to make for our navy on a year to year basis, so that contracts will not be handed out piecemeal from month to month.

A destroyer escort or some other small vessel is allocated to a certain shipyard. We have good shipyards and shipbuilders in Canada for a small industry. They complete the project and the job is done satisfactorily. Then the men are laid off, 500, 600 or 700 men on occasion. They wait around and if they are lucky and the lobbying is successful at Ottawa there is another handout next month. The men are rehired, and so the thing goes on. If what the minister says is true, that they can make plans on a year to year basis and there are no substantial changes, then there is something wrong with some department, maybe defence production or the maritime commission. We have to re-examine this matter if we are going to bring about a proper perspective with regard to our plans for naval shipbuilding, something so necessary in the cold war.

I also want to refer briefly to the seaward defences, particularly on the Atlantic coast. I have brought up this subject for the past two or three years and I do not want to go into the details. We do not have too many details. I understand that the plans are pretty well completed at Sydney, and I have read in the white paper this year and in previous years that Halifax and St. John's, Newfoundland, have been considered. I make a plea for the port of Saint John because I think it is one of our major problems today. We have the new Camp Gagetown in that area, a vital new factor from a defensive point of view.

We all know the importance that our ports are beginning to assume in modern warfare. I have an article here, and there are many others, pointing out the fact that with the modern submarines referred to again this afternoon and the nuclear weapons that will be aboard those submarines, the problem of defending our ports by modern methods has become increasingly serious and important.

I do not have any more to say, but I would appreciate it if the minister would take a moment to comment on the shipbuilding problem and to suggest if there is any way the work can be laid out on a more definite basis over the full year, so those who are looking to that industry for their future will be able to make their plans. I should also like him to take a minute to say something about what our plans are going to be for the winter ports on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. Pearkes: Before the minister answers that question, may I revert to the problem of the speed of the frigates. We do not have to refer to the United States magazine Life in order to ascertain the speed of the various frigates. I have before me what is recognized by all navies as an official publication, "Jane's Fighting Ships", which gives the speeds of all the vessels of all the different navies, including the frigates about which we have been talking. It also gives the speeds of the submarines and the speeds of various British vessels.

It points out in the foreword that in the case of British navy frigates, ranging from ships of 1,000 tons to 2,000 tons, they have a speed ranging from 16 to 36 knots and widely differing armament. When you turn over the various pages you find a description of the tonnage, armament and speed of the various ships. I think "Jane's Fighting Ships" is considered more reliable than Life. I do not see why the minister needs to be so frightened of that.

Mr. Campney: I would agree with the latter statement of my hon. friend, that "Jane's Fighting Ships" is more reliable than Life, but my advisers tell me that nobody would rely on Jane's either; that the figures are very approximate and that they are not technically relied upon by any naval people.

With regard to what the hon. member for Saint John-Albert said, when we decided to engage in a shipbuilding program—I am speaking entirely from the point of view of the navy—with the Department of Defence Production we did, as everyone knows, plan our construction in certain yards and certain areas some years ago, and it was proceeded with on that basis and is being completed on that basis.

As far as the navy is concerned, when it comes to repair work that is something that is very uncertain. Except for major overhaul you cannot program it, because you do not know when a destroyer is going to collide with a dock or one ship is going to run into another ship, and so on. There is a great element of uncertainty. In addition, there is the fact that on each coast we have our own dockyards which ordinarily take care of most of the work of maintenance and repair, though not all. When we have a congestion of repair work we utilize the services of private yards.

I am not talking about merchant ships, but of the navy. In the first place there is not a great deal of repair work to do, thinking in terms of the number of yards available; second, it is very hard to program what there is, as there is such a big difference between ship construction and ship repair and maintenance.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: Have we completed the discussion on the Royal Canadian Navy, regular forces and general?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): There are just one or two further questions on the navy. Would the minister repeat, if he has said once before, the expected cost of the aircraft carrier Bonaventure?

Mr. Campney: The estimated cost of the Bonaventure, without her planes, is $26·5 million at the moment. The planes may run close to $15 million, maximum.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Do I gather from the minister's answer that it is intended to use the newer type jet planes for this job?

Mr. Campney: Two planes, one a jet and the other propeller driven.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I wonder if the minister might comment on reports which are circulating in the United Kingdom that the ship has had trial runs and there is some tie-up with the necessary speed of the ship for the utilization of jet aircraft? There seems some doubt now as to whether the ship will have sufficient speed for the utilization of this type of aircraft. It may be that some report has been received by the minister, but there seemed to be rumours to this effect in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Campney: I think the hon. member has had information in advance of mine, because I am informed she has not had any trial runs yet.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Would the minister check up on that to see if there have been reports of that kind, because I have been informed that there have been reports to that effect.

Mr. Campney: Yes, I will be glad to do that.

The Chairman: The next section is royal Canadian naval reserves, on page 317.

Mr. MacLean: Can the minister give the committee some indication of the progress that has been made in the construction of divisional headquarters for the various naval reserve divisions across the country, with perhaps a special reference to the new headquarters being built at Charlottetown?

Mr. Campney: There are two naval division headquarters approaching the point where they will be constructed. One is at London, Ontario. I think that one is out to tender, and with respect to the other at Charlottetown the plans are being prepared. If the money is available I would expect that tenders will be called either late this year or early next year at Charlottetown.

The Chairman: Royal Canadian naval reserves completed? Royal Canadian sea cadets, on page 318?

Mr. Bell: I wonder if it would be all right if I asked a question here about the navy benevolent fund?

Mr. Campney: Well, we are not directly concerned with the operation of the naval benevolent fund, although we are very much interested in its usefulness. I have no objection to the hon. member asking a question, but probably I would not be in a position to answer it.

Mr. Bell: I wonder if the minister could tell me if the amount of prize money which it was decided to put into the naval benevolent fund was completely accounted for; that is, was the entire amount of prize money earned by the Canadian navy generally during the war placed in this navy benevolent fund? I understand there was a statute a few years ago covering this, and I just want to know if the entire amount was placed in the fund?

Mr. Campney: My information is that all that money has been placed in the fund.

Mr. Robinson (Bruce): Can the minister tell us, offhand, how many royal Canadian naval cadets are allowed throughout the dominion? I understand the army were allowed 65,000.

Mr. Campney: I am not too sure of the number, but I will get the answer in a few minutes.

The Chairman: Sea cadets completed, subject to that answer?

Mr. Campney: The number of naval cadets is 10,000.

The Chairman: Canadian army, regular and general, on page 319.

Mr. Pearkes: I would crave the indulgence of the committee, Mr. Chairman, to make a few remarks regarding the Canadian army, with particular reference to that portion of the Canadian army which is now serving in Europe. I crave the indulgence of the committee in making these remarks and taking up time, because it is exactly a week ago that I spent the whole day with the Canadian brigade in West Germany.

The first message I should like to bring to the committee is one of which I feel all Canada will be proud. It is a message from the civil authorities of Soest. I met during the evening representatives of the town and the province, and I should like to inform the minister that these civil authorities were loud in their praise of the conduct of our Canadian troops and of the very happy relations which existed between the Canadian armed forces and the civilian population in Westphalia where they are stationed. It is obvious that when troops are stationed in a foreign country many difficult problems are presented, but by the co-operation of the German authorities and the good judgment used by the commanders of our brigade, these little difficulties have been reduced to the very minimum.

Second, I should like to pass on the messages of thanks which were given to me by a senior officer of the newly created German army, who expressed his appreciation of the manner in which the Canadian forces were making available to this army, which is still in the making, their instructors and the advice they might give. We are now working with West Germany as a partner in NATO; therefore it is encouraging to know that old soldiers have been placed on the same side. Officers of the new German army frequent our Canadian messes and discuss their problems as soldiers of armies the world over talk about their kindred problems, which are so similar no matter what nationality the army may represent. Also in that same neighbourhood there are stationed units, in fact a whole division, of the Royal Belgian army, and the same happy relations exist between the Belgians and the Canadians as I have described as existing between the Canadian forces and the German civilian population.

I was asked by representatives of those groups to convey those sentiments to the parliament of Canada and I should like, inadequate though my words may be, to assure the minister that the expressions which were made to me were full of sincerity, and that Canada can be proud of the work her forces are doing in the very difficult circumstances under which they are now soldiering in West Germany.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Then I should like to pay my own tribute to the apparent efficiency of the brigade. I make no apology for saying that our Canadian troops are good. I have been associated with Canadian fighting men all my life, and I know that Canadian troops can be extremely efficient. I am glad to say that our Canadian brigade is well led, that the men are in good heart and well trained, and that the contribution we are making by this brigade group in Western Germany far exceeds the size of the formation for many reasons which I hope to explain later. Not only do Canadians themselves and their commanders consider that they are the very key of the western defences, but that same high regard is held by senior officers of the British and other armies with whom I conversed. I cannot speak in too high terms of the high regard in which our troops in Western Germany are held. There are reasons for that, and I hope I shall be able to explain why it is that our Canadian forces are in such a favourable position.

I do not wish to enumerate particularly the units I saw. Of course I visited my old regiment, the Patricia's, and they were in good heart, but in that brigade there are other units. Unfortunately the Royal Canadian regiment was away on manoeuvres and I was able to see only a very small detachment of them. I did have the privilege of meeting the officers and men of the Royal 22nd regiment, which has a particularly soft spot in my heart. I was closely associated with them during the fighting on the Somme when they gained immortal glory by their attack on the sugar factory at Courcelette, and I had them in my division during the second world war. I was proud to refer to them as my Royal 22nd regiment. They did not have their goat with them, but they had very cherished memories and a very proud and high morale.

After all is said and done, it is the battle honours which are carried on the colours rather than the mascots of a regiment, and it is the names of battalion commanders of bygone days who inspire the esprit de corps of the unit. Names such as Tremblay, Vanier, Percy Flynn, old man Poirier, Bernatchez, Triquet, are household names not only among the Royal 22nd regiment but also throughout the whole of Canada. If by any chance the remarks made from this side of the house earlier today were interpreted as in any way casting any reflection upon the Royal 22nd regiment, I must say that those remarks are not shared by the majority of members on this side of the house or anywhere in the house.

The efficiency of the brigade, which I refer to as being of a very high order, I attribute to certain facts. Remember, they are the only volunteer formation in western Europe, and a volunteer soldier assimilates training more readily than an unwilling soldier who may have been pressed into the service by any form of national conscription. They are also the highest paid troops on the western front. Their units have been maintained at full war strength, with a small reserve immediately to replace casualties. Those are conditions which do not exist amongst the other NATO units which are stationed in the west. The British units are on a lower establishment than our Canadian units. Their units are not even up to the strength of those reduced peacetime establishments, and a high percentage of the men serving in British units are men who perhaps are rather unwilling soldiers, counting the weeks that remain before they will be released to civilian employment.

That is not so with our Canadian soldiers. A high percentage of our Canadian soldiers are men who have served more than one term of enlistment. They apparently are keen on their work and are only too anxious to take part in the numerous exercises which are carried out, and are bursting with pride at being Canadian soldiers.

Regarding the actual quarters and camps in which these men are located, these camps have been constructed, I think I can say, without regard for cost. I do not mean that there may have been unnecessary expenditures, or that care has not been exercised in seeing there was not waste and extravagance. But they are extremely good camps, in which the Canadian soldiers must feel comfortable and at home, and they offer quarters which are in keeping with the type of troops we are sending to Europe.

Of course I may be accused of eulogizing our forces, as has been suggested by some hon. members on the other side of the house. They have expressed surprise that hon. members on this side of the house should compliment or call attention to the efficiency of our troops. I make no apologies for doing this. The only thing I question and call attention to is the fact that if you pay the price you can have practically the best of anything in this world, and Canada has been paying a heavy price for providing the excellent type of troops we have with the splendid facilities they now enjoy.

How long we should continue to keep up this great national effort is something I think the government must take into very serious consideration. There are great expenses connected with the maintenance of that brigade. Not only have we provided excellent unit camps but perhaps I might say extravagant unit camps, extravagant in the extent of ground that the various hutments occupy. A unit camp in West Germany today would be almost comparable in size to a brigade camp during world war II. There are large lawns between the various hutments, and they are kept closely trimmed. Grass grows very quickly in that wet German climate, but the lawns are well cared for by German civilian gardeners whose services are paid for, I presume, by the Canadian forces. There is ample accommodation and no crowding whatever in the hutments.

The married quarters are spacious and the average man in the ranks probably never before lived in such spacious accommodation as he enjoys there. I talked to the wives of some of the private soldiers and they were most enthusiastic regarding the accommodation. They only have to keep their homes clean. There are no chores to be done around the house, and that presents a little difficulty in connection with some of the growing children, who in Canada would be required to perform certain chores around the house. Those chores are not available to them in Germany because they are all performed by civilian help.

Quarters are provided for the majority of the families and there is an increasing number—one might almost say an incredible number—of children attached to all the various units. Remember, those families and those children are transported from Canada over to Germany and are brought back again. While they are in Germany special arrangements are made to provide them with the kind of food they have here in Canada. Special arrangements are made to import pasteurized milk rather than being required to use the milk which is available locally. Schools are provided, and school teachers are sent to Germany from Canada.

I mention these things because, as I said earlier, we can have the best of everything if we pay the price; and we are paying the price for the accommodation and for transporting and maintaining the families who are now in Europe. I do not know what the actual figure is, but I am going to ask the minister if he will supply this committee with accurate figures regarding the cost of transportation not only of the men, the units and their equipment from Canada to Europe, but also the cost of transporting the families from Canada to West Germany and bringing them back.

I am also going to ask the minister if he can give the committee the figures regarding the cost of either the construction or rental of these various camps in order that we may have some indication of what it is costing the taxpayers of this country to make the contribution to NATO which Canada has been making in the past.

I am not particularly happy about the location of the camps. I do not know whether or not we had any say in the matter. The camps of the brigade are widely distributed. The distance from brigade headquarters to the camp of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry is something in the nature of 15 miles, and it takes more than an hour to motor from brigade headquarters to that particular unit. That is an indication of the wide distribution which exists amongst the units of the brigade. That scattered distribution may have some advantages, but it certainly increases the difficulties of administration for brigade headquarters, and it also increases the cost.

The area is in a highly developed agricultural district. It consists of a number of small towns and practically every acre is under cultivation, thus restricting the availability of training areas which have to be used not only by our Canadian brigade but also by the Belgian and some British troops, and now the German regiments which are being organized. In fact if the squadron of the armoured regiment wishes to do some tank training the regiment is required to drive its tanks down the road, put them on trains and take them for a considerable distance before they can reach a driving area. The same applies to artillery units and all firing ranges as far as the brigade is concerned.

Those are conditions over which I imagine we had little control. Possibly a few years ago there had not been the development in West Germany that there is today, as many of the present refugees from East Germany had not moved into that area and there was not quite the same demand for housing accommodation that exists today. The demand for housing accommodation by the civilian population has been accentuated by the closing down of several of the rest camps and hostels which were established by the British and United States forces in the area. There is still a steady stream of refugees from East Germany coming into West Germany, and in spite of the tremendous building program which has been carried on there is an acute crowding which is continuously cutting into the training areas and the limited accommodation available for Canadian families who cannot find accommodation in the quarters provided by the government.

These are some of the problems which face the brigade commander, who not only has to train and administer his brigade but must settle innumerable problems in conjunction with the other armed forces serving under NATO and also in connection with the civilian population. I think Canada can be proud of Brigadier Rowley, a native of Ottawa, who is in command of our brigade and who with the assistance of Colonel Spencer is doing excellent work in the difficult task to be done in that area.

We made our commitments to NATO some five years ago. At that time the situation in Europe was quite different from what it is today. When I was speaking here before I went over to Europe I quoted some remarks by General Gruenther, who explained how very limited were the forces of NATO when he assumed command about five years ago. As I say, conditions today are entirely different. During those five years we have seen the development of thermonuclear weapons. When I spoke on the first day these estimates were introduced I pointed out that the general opinion seems to be that it is extremely unlikely that either the west or the Soviet union will use thermonuclear weapons with the idea of carrying out strategic bombing either in the west or the east. Both sides seem to have reached the realization that the use of that terrible weapon means the destruction of civilization.

We have provided through the United States strategic bombing force and the medium bombers in the United Kingdom a deterrent which I think it is fair to say the majority of informed people believe will be effective. A few years ago there was the feeling that the Russians might not use the thermonuclear weapons but might start a war in western Europe and use conventional arms. For that reason the commanders of NATO—this government, supported by this side of the house, agreed—were able to provide a strong deterrent of ground troops in western Europe.

I think conditions are changing. Not only does it appear that Russia is changing the emphasis from a war of arms to an economic war, the events of the last few weeks have highlighted a condition which has been known for some time, namely that the satellite countries in western Europe are extremely dissatisfied. It was put to me this way by one speaking for the satellite countries: "When the Russians first of all advanced we were staggered and stunned. Then came a period of optimism when the Russians promised to raise our standard of living. Then we realized that those promises had failed, that Russia was not able to provide the improvements in the standards of living that had been promised." So discontent is now more rampant among the satellite countries than ever before. If Russia started to march across Europe I am convinced there would be a general uprising in many of the countries behind those marching armies which would completely upset their lines of communication. To use a familiar expression, it would be a stab in the back which would be most effective. For that reason the danger of war without the use of thermonuclear weapons seems to be receding.

I mention these things because it is quite obvious that other NATO nations are thinking along the same lines. We have read and I heard when I was in England of very considerable reductions which are being made in the armed forces and the expenditures being allocated for defence. While I was in England there was a reduction of £50 million. Hon. members will probably have noticed in today's papers an indication of further reductions in the near future.

That seems to me to demand that the government reassess the commitments which have been made and the contribution which Canada is making to NATO at the present time. I say, and I am quite certain that it cannot be contradicted, that our contribution to NATO today in proportion to the contributions which are being made by the other NATO powers is greater than it was five years ago. As I have pointed out, our brigade is more efficient than it was five years ago. I do not think I would be biased on the part of Canada if I say I honestly believe that our brigade group is the equal in fighting efficiency to a division of any of the other forces which are there. So in effect we are now providing perhaps a small division but the equivalent of a division, whereas when we first went over there five years ago it was only a brigade.

I feel that in the light of the changed circumstances it is imperative that this government review its defence policy. The emphasis is being changed from a war of arms to a war of trade. Whilst it is essential that we keep up defences in this country and in western Europe, I feel that we have to be quite certain that we are not over-insuring at the present time.

I am not suggesting that there should be any cuts or reductions made in this year's estimates, but I think between now and the time the minister presents his estimates a year hence he must review the whole situation in a most thorough and comprehensive manner. That will have its reactions on the overhead and general structure of our forces in this country. If it is desirable to make changes, then we must be quite certain that we are not spending large sums of money in providing permanent establishments for units of various forces which perhaps a year or even five years hence may not be required under the changing conditions. We need permanent quarters for our regular units, but we do not want to have an excess of quarters; we want only those for the pattern of defence forces that will exist not this year but five years hence.

We have just come to the end of a five-year era, which was an era of building and creating. It seems to me that we are now entering another five-year period where we have to reorganize our forces to meet changed conditions. It seems to me that it holds up to the minister a challenge to review his whole organization and to accept the new concept, and not slavishly follow along the lines which were initiated five years ago, which have proved efficient up to this time but which might prove very extravagant in the future.

I have only one other comment to make. I would call the minister's attention to the organization, which I believe is being developed in the United States, of what might be described as light divisions. I understand that the United States is carrying out experiments with the idea of establishing two light divisions which can be used for NATO commitments anywhere in the world, and can be transportable entirely by air. It may mean that we shall have to have two kinds of divisions or perhaps two kinds of groupings; one which can be transported by air, similar to the airborne force that we have for the defence of Canada, and other formations which may be supported by armour and used in conjunction with the forces of NATO, should the forecasts of the NATO authorities prove incorrect and by some unusual event war short of a thermonuclear war break out in Europe.

To meet that kind of war, as the minister pointed out earlier this afternoon, the British army is allocating its armour to brigades, each brigade having its regiment of armour, a line which I believe it is the intention of the Canadian army to follow, having flexibility so that if at any time it is required the armoured regiment may be placed in one formation working as an armoured division.

I have submitted these remarks not with any intention of being provocative in any way. I trust that in some small measure they may be constructive, but I ask the minister to give this committee some idea of the cost of that very fine formation we have in Europe. We can have the best of anything if we pay for it. The taxpayer of Canada has a right to know how much he is paying for the very fine brigade that is now in Europe.

Mr. Campney: I should like to thank the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, and I am sure that in doing so I shall be thanking him on behalf of all the members of this house, for the very comprehensive and complete report he has made immediately following his return from visiting Europe on the Canadian brigade located there. I should like to do more than that. I should like to thank him not only on behalf of us in this house but I am sure on behalf of the people of Canada for the very fine tribute he has paid to our troops overseas. As the voice of a very experienced and understanding general who knows something about troops, I think it carries all the more weight. Without labouring the point, I am very grateful to him for all he has said in regard to our troops. I should also like to thank him for conveying to us the views of the German and Belgian civil and military authorities.

After all, NATO is a joint effort. It is the effort of a collection of nations who believe in freedom and are willing to pay a price in an effort to sustain it. I am sure that all the people of this country as well as the members of this house will be grateful for the fact that we know now how well our troops have been received and are being received in Europe.

I should also like at this moment to give him such information as I can, as requested in his speech. I have several items here. I have first the cost of rotation of troops, that is the transport of one brigade group over and another brigade group back. For the troops themselves the cost is $2,510,000; for the dependants, $2,652,000, or a total of $5,162,000 for transportation on one rotation over and back.

With regard to married quarters, we have 1,400 married quarters in Germany. These married quarters were built by arrangement with the Germans, who provided the capital. On a long-term arrangement we pay for the use of these quarters $1,185,000 annually in rent, or approximately $65 a month each. I think that includes lighting and heating too. The rent is paid by the occupant of the premises personally, against allowances which we make. The cost of the construction of these 1,400 married quarters is to be paid through the rent, and the amount I have indicated per year is on the basis of 10 per cent of the capital cost each year.

The other elements in the military camps besides the married quarters are provided by the Germans. They were constructed by them and I suppose that ultimately they will be returned to them in any event if we should withdraw. The over-all cost of operating the brigade group in Germany, including pay and allowances, food, all the elements that we pay as a government, totals $33½ million per year. I think that covers the figures requested.

Mr. Brooks: Did the minister give the cost of the educational facilities?

Mr. Campney: I have not the actual figure at hand, but I will try to get it. I suppose the hon. member wants to know the cost of the schools, the teachers, and everything involved?

Mr. Brooks: Yes.

Mr. Campney: I will try to get that.

Mrs. Fairclough: Would the minister say how many are covered by this $33½ million?

Mr. Campney: Something between 6,000 and 6,500 men, and probably 4,500 dependents.

Mrs. Fairclough: Did the minister say 6,500?

Mr. Campney: Between 10,000 and 11,000 with the dependents.

Mr. Brooks: How many of those would be in reserve? That seems a very large number for a brigade. How many would be in reserve?

Mr. Campney: There are supporting units amounting to 600 or 700 but I understand that the remainder of the 6,000 or 6,500 are all on war establishment and are part of the brigade group.

Mr. Pearkes: When I referred to reserves I was referring to the first line reserves which are carried with the unit. Of course there are certain headquarters units which are elsewhere, in Amsterdam and other places. That would appear to be about the figure that one would expect to have, somewhere between 6,000 and 7,000 in a brigade group.

Mrs. Fairclough: With regard to those persons who are serving in overseas posts, do those who are listed in ancillary positions enjoy the same facilities as those who are in the active force?

Mr. Campney: I am not sure I clearly understand the question, because once they are sent overseas they are all part of the brigade group. While some might be called ancillary personnel they are part of the brigade group as such, though they may not be what you might call front line fighting troops.

Mrs. Fairclough: But they still have the same access to accommodation, the same access to all the services which are available to our forces overseas? Is that right?

Mr. Campney: So far as they are available. I would point out, as the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich mentioned, that there are not enough married quarters by quite a good deal even with the 1,400.

Mrs. Fairclough: But how are they divided? Do some people have preference?

Mr. Campney: The preference is established on the basis of what is called a point score based on the service of the individual, number of children, etc. There is a system of computation on a point basis, and the allocation of married quarters is on that point basis. In other words the greater the claim you have on account of points awarded for length of service and various things the more opportunity you are likely to have to get one of these quarters.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not think this is very clear, because the minister has told us that there are between 6,000 and 7,000 persons—

Mr. Campney: Between 6,000 and 7,000 troops.

Mrs. Fairclough: All right. What constitutes a brigade; 3,500 to 4,000?

Mr. Campney: The brigade group, including the first reserves and the ancillary troops, completely absorbs the 6,000 to 6,500 men I have mentioned. They have been permitted to take over their wives and children who constitute approximately 4,000 more persons. Therefore the total brigade group with their dependents runs somewhere between 10,000 and 11,000.

Mrs. Fairclough: With respect to the 6,500, is there any division made so far as eligibility for accommodation is concerned, or for any other services which are given to our troops overseas, or are they all considered to be members of this group?

Mr. Campney: Certainly; yes.

Mr. Pearkes: To elaborate on that point, perhaps it might be of interest to say that with the exception of the very senior ranks there is no difference in the allocation of quarters for married personnel as between the more or less junior officers, captains and below, and the other ranks.

Mr. Campney: That is correct.

Mrs. Fairclough: As a matter of fact, last year when we were overseas I was quite impressed with the accommodation available where married quarters had been supplied. Of course in some places it had not yet been developed, and I would hope that it would develop in very short order. I hope the situation with regard to these people is even better than it was a year ago, but I did wonder whether, within the group mentioned by the minister, there was any differentiation between those who are actually members of the brigade and those who perform ancillary services.

Mr. Campney: No, I think that distinction does not exist. As outlined by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, with the exception of the very few senior officers the junior officers, non-commissioned officers and men are on an equal basis with regard to claims for accommodation.

Mrs. Fairclough: That was the impression we received when we were overseas. We saw the facilities which were available for officers of a given rank and below that rank. I may say that one of the things that impressed me overseas was the fact that from a private up to a certain rank of commissioned officer the facilities were the same. Even the furniture which was included in their living quarters was exactly the same. I was quite impressed with that. But that does not alter the question I put to the minister. Is there any differentiation between those who are actually members of the active forces and those who perform ancillary services?

Mr. Campney: Perhaps the hon. member is thinking of the communications personnel. There are no quarters built for them, and they have to try to get their own. That is not due to their rank or position but due to their location. There are not married quarters for everybody, and they are in groups near places where there is a congestion of troops. There are people who are on lines of communication, you may say, who have to shift for themselves because we do not provide houses in those small areas. That is what the hon. member had in mind?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes, thank you very much.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): One of the things I noticed last year when I was visiting Europe with other members of parliament was the obvious lack of news from Canada. It was something which was felt by everybody there. To the people at home perhaps it is not so important, but when you are thousands of miles away you want home news. You want to find out what is going on, whether you live in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto or Montreal. I was told in more than one place that newspapers received from Canada were three to five weeks old.

I do not think that is good enough. I think the provision of adequate, up to date news for the troops is part of the considerations of morale. I realize there is a radio station now in operation, but the radio station does not supply home town news which so many of these men and women crave. What steps have been taken to see that Canadian newspapers are sent to the various areas as rapidly as possible?

Mr. Campney: On the question of expediting the delivery of newspapers I am afraid I have no up to the minute information. This has been a source of some difficulty everywhere we have had troops. We have tried to take care of some of the difficulty by establishing, as he knows, a new radio station of 250 watts which covers the whole of the brigade area. It gives a continuous series of rebroadcasts from the C.B.C.

That may not meet the local situation of individual troops but I think it is a vast improvement, and has been very well received. I am sorry I cannot tell the hon. member the position with respect to newspapers. I know it has been a perennial headache every time we have sent troops away because it takes so long to get newspapers from here to wherever they are to be delivered. I am very much interested in keeping people away from home still at home in their thinking and their approaches to life. I shall look into that.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): May I say something at this juncture. This business may not loom too large in the minds of many of us here. The minister knows as well as I do that it is a very important thing to the men over there. The provision of this radio station and the excellent programs the C.B.C. are giving do help, but it does not overcome the fact that these men want home town news. The minister may remember that when I returned from Germany I telephoned him and said this was one of the things which were lacking, one of the things the men wanted, and I think they have a right to it. It may be a headache, but I submit the minister might perhaps get some aspirin to restore himself and return refreshed to the task of seeing that these people who are upholding our prestige as Canadians, and who are interested in their home towns, get the news which they so badly need.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to support the hon. member who has just spoken, because it is true that the one complaint we heard was the lack of up to date news from the home towns. Even in cases where members of the forces overseas were receiving their local newspapers as a result of subscriptions, they came in bundles containing the copies for two months at a time. Obviously these men could not begin to digest them. I know that if I am away for a week I cannot begin to read all my home town newspapers for a week, because I just have not the time.

[Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North).]

Obviously that is the problem with which these men are faced. Yet they want to know what is going on at home; their ties are at home. They would like to know what has happened, even if it is the accidents on the local streets. They like to read this news. They do not get it until it is quite old, sometimes not for two or three months.

Those of us who were overseas last year found that the main question that was asked of us by the men who were serving from our own home towns was, what has happened at home? What changes have there been? It seems to me there should be some way of getting these newspapers to them within a reasonable length of time, and particularly so when they have subscriptions and are supposed to receive copies by ordinary mail.

Mr. Campney: There are two points I should like to make in that respect. One is that in a brigade, of course, there are people from every locality in Canada. I do not think there is any particular complaint, at least it has not been brought to my attention if there is, about the general news, especially since we started the radio station. I think the complaints are about their own local news from the little towns and villages. I do not know how the department or the army can expedite that or deal with that, because it is a particularly personal matter.

There are only two ways in which newspapers can be sent to Germany. One is by air and the other is by ship. A ship may be delayed, not I think quite as much as the hon. member has said, but still there are delays. The cost of sending newspapers by air is rather high for the ordinary family so this is a disability that is very difficult to overcome.

I have said on a number of occasions that the best hope of removing the difficulty is through letters from the people at home to the people overseas, and secondly by sending the local paper to them. I remember that in world war I I got the local paper every week, except when I got lost upon occasion. It was a local paper and was not of any interest to anybody else so far as I know. But it was of interest to me. I think it should be pointed out that the families who have someone overseas might very well develop some sense of responsibility for keeping that individual informed. I believe, taking that with the general information we are able to give them, plus the radio service we are able to provide, should meet the situation.

I agree there is quite a bit of complaint about it, but I do not see how the army itself could meet this particular situation without the co-operation of the relatives and friends of the people who are in the services.

Mrs. Fairclough: That is the very thing I am talking about, Mr. Chairman. In several cases which were drawn to my attention those people who were subscribers to local newspapers did not receive those newspapers because they went, I suppose, as newspaper mail; I do not know how they got them, but they were getting bundles of newspapers at one time which were anything up to a month or two months old. They had no news in the meantime, yet they had subscribed to that newspaper. It seems to me there must be some things the department could do to see that this second or third class mail reaches them in a reasonable length of time.

Mr. Campney: I am told by the postal people that the average transportation time for air mail to the brigade—

Mrs. Fairclough: That is air mail, though.

Mr. Campney: I will give you both—from Montreal to the brigade is three to four days. The average time for surface mail is from 12 to 18 days. There may be some delays, but generally speaking that is about the time that can be counted upon.

There is another thing—I do not suppose this meets the local situation—but I know when I was last over there a great many of the units whose men came from certain areas subscribed to a number of papers from that area and they were used by all members of the units. In other words there are the costs, and so on. I am very cognizant of the situation, but I do not think there is really very much more we can do than we have done to expedite things.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps I might say a word on this subject. When I was over and saw the brigade and the air division last year the only complaint I heard, I think, in connection with this matter was the lack of news. The radio station will no doubt have corrected that to some extent as far as the brigade is concerned; it will not have corrected it as far as the air division is concerned.

The minister has said he does not think there is anything further the army could do, and I take that to mean anything the department could do. I think there is. As a matter of fact I asked two or three commanding officers whether it would help, or be of any particular assistance, if newspapers from the home station of the unit were flown over as part of the regular cargo of the skid run, I think it is called, of the air force which goes over, I think, twice a week or something along that line. They were of the opinion that it would be of very considerable assistance.

An artillery regiment which was there at that time, for example, came from Winnipeg, or that was its home station, and they considered that if they got four copies of the two Winnipeg papers in their regular delivery by the air force scheduled run, two for the men's mess, one for the N.C.O.'s mess and one for the officers' mess, it would be of very considerable importance and would help the situation materially. The same thing would apply as far as the P.P.C.L.I. is concerned whose home station at the time was Calgary, and the same would apply to other units. It does seem to me that the department could ameliorate this situation without any undue cost by that particular means.

Mr. Campney: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that the newspapers from the home stations of the units would be enough, because I think what the members of those units are concerned about are their home towns. This has been looked into, but I shall be glad to have it looked into again. The difficulty, I think, really arose, when I looked at it last time, and when we canvassed the areas of the different units very thoroughly, especially in regard to daily papers. We found that the weight was a formidable barrier expense wise. On the scheduled run we have to be very careful with our space. However, I shall be very glad to have it looked at again.

Mrs. Fairclough: As the minister said, if you had to send a newspaper to every man over there obviously you just could not do it; but if you tried to send, as the hon. member for Calgary North said, a couple of newspapers or four newspapers from each major centre from which the men come it would help. The units that are overseas have headquarters; they have a domicile in Canada, and if you tried to provide them with the newspapers from the Canadian domicile of their units it would at least ameliorate the situation to some extent.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I want to revert to the question of married quarters. On page 28 of the white paper is given a summary of the situation with regard to married quarters. As of December 31, 1955, we are given a total of 30,000 married quarters, of which 3,217 are for personnel in Europe. I think the figure the minister gave was 1,400. I suppose the remainder is made up of married quarters for the air force, and the number under construction or in the planning stage. What I should like to know is, during the current year roughly how many additional married quarters will be available in Europe?

Mr. Campney: The difference is, of course, as the hon. member says in Grostenquin and Marville, in France, and Zweibrucken and Soest in Germany. I understand that all the married quarters contemplated in Europe will be completed this year.

Mr. MacLean: There are two other questions which I propose to ask. I notice recently there has been a competition advertised for what seems to me a large number of vacancies on the staff at the Royal Military College at Kingston. What is the explanation? Is there an addition to the staff, or has there been considerable rotation of the staff? Perhaps the minister can give some indication of the total number of positions. These are civilian positions. One came in today from the civil service commission. I am wondering whether these are additions to the staff or replacements for professors who have resigned their positions.

I have another question that I should ask while the minister is finding the answer to the last one. I notice at page 20 of the white paper is given a summary of the number of civilians employed by the armed services in the different categories. I wonder what the explanation is as to why the army seems to employ a much higher percentage of civilians than either of the other services? In the classified bracket the army employs over 12,000 civilians against the air forces under 8,000, although the strength of the air force is actually greater.

Mr. Campney: Dealing with the first question raised by the hon. member, the number of professors at the Royal Military College has been increased by two, so to that extent they are new appointments. Altogether I think there are over 40 professors and the number has been increased this year by two. Therefore the applications mentioned by the hon. member, except so far as they refer to these two, would be replacements. I think it is quite common in academic circles for civilian professors and lecturers to move about fairly often to different positions, and I think that is exactly what has happened at R.M.C.

Mr. Brooks: I notice that at page 319 of the explanation of the estimates reference is made to professors, assistant professors and lecturers at the Royal Military College. What about the professors and assistant professors at Saint Jean, Quebec? Where are they included?

Mr. Campney: They will be shown in the air force section when we come to it. They are tri-service colleges. Royal Roads is operated by the navy. R.M.C. is operated by the army and C.M.R. is operated by the air force.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. Brooks: Is the majority of students at Saint Jean army students?

Mr. Campney: They are all tri-service colleges. The administration of each college is given to one service: Royal Roads to the navy, R.M.C. to the army, and C.M.R. to the air force.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I wonder whether we might go back to the question of the dependents who are overseas with the brigade. I think the minister said that probably about 4,500 people are there, and some concern has been expressed about their being over there from the standpoint of their own safety. I think we are all very glad that they are there and I am quite sure it contributes greatly to the morale of the brigade, but I am wondering what type of program the department has for the evacuation of those people in a time of crisis? Have we the necessary shipping laid on? Is there a crash program to insure that these people are evacuated immediately? Otherwise it would appear they would only contribute to a great deal of confusion at a very vital part of the campaign.

Mr. Campney: This, of course, is primarily a NATO problem and one that has not been completely solved. During the past year, and ever since I became minister of this department some quite extensive studies have been going on, and in that connection we are working with other departments in an effort to set up a procedure and a policy to be followed in the event that evacuation becomes necessary.

I may say we have not come to any final conclusions. This is quite a difficult problem, as the hon. member will realize, but it is a problem I think we have to continue to consider until we reach what we believe is a satisfactory solution. I am sure that in the end we will reach a conclusion, but we have not as yet because the studies are not completed.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think this is probably the most important point in connection with the whole procedure of having dependents overseas, that is outside of the morale question in relation to the troops. I understand that we take them over there and assume the responsibility for their transportation there and back during ordinary times. Surely we are not going to fall back on some type of NATO program for these people in a time of emergency.

It would seem to me, sir, the very least the department should know at this time is the port of embarkation and the availability of shipping. It seems to me that the brigade and their dependents have been over there for a sufficient length of time for a program covering their evacuation to have been mapped out. I would think the minister's statement will leave a lot of uneasy minds in Canada when it is read.

Mr. Campney: If we have a reasonable period of warning that is, notice of ten days or so, our program is worked out. But if it is a sudden thing that might come out of the night there are problems which have not been completely settled. For example, the hon. member says we ought to know what port will be used. We do not know what ports will exist following a sudden attack. Shipping will depend on the ports that are available to us. This raises very grave and difficult problems, because there cannot be any certainty in the process of evacuation. We are trying to work out alternatives and a scheme of things that will take care of any situation. I hope we shall have reached final conclusions before too long but, as I said, we have reached the point where if we have some reasonable notice I think we can handle the situation, but we are not yet at the point where we can say it is complete.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): May I suggest that the minister certainly seems to be grasping the point in connection with this question. I think he might put some of his experts to work in connection with this important problem, because it appears to me to be extremely urgent. If we are going to go along without having a program lined up then I think the dependents of these people and their relatives here should be made well aware before they leave that there is no concrete program for them in connection with their return.

If I may remain on my feet, Mr. Chairman, because it is extremely difficult to get here in the first place, I should like to raise another point. I am wondering if the experts in the department have made any decision, as has been done in the United States, concerning which branch of the service will handle the intercontinental guided missile if and when it is available to our forces, and the intermediate range ballistic missile.

Perhaps it is because of differences of opinion in the services and because of an attempt in the United States to settle this, but I understand in that country the intermediate range ballistic missile has been handed over to the army for development and use and the intercontinental guided missile has been handed over to the air force for development and use. If we are properly planning for the future it seems to me there should be a decision at an early date in connection with the use of those weapons if a decision has not already been reached. I think we are entitled to know from a policy standpoint what is going to be done in this country concerning those weapons.

Mr. Campney: Well, Mr. Chairman, the question of ground to air guided missiles other than in an experimental sense has not yet arisen in Canada. We are studying ground to air missiles, but we have not yet committed ourselves to any, so we have no definite program as to which service will deal with them when we do have them. Concerning the question of air to air guided missiles, there is the "Sparrow" to which we are committed, and that is in the jurisdiction of the R.C.A.F.

As far as the intercontinental guided ballistic missile is concerned, I am one of those who think it is very far in the future, and it is not within our purview to deal with any particular one at the moment. So I would not hazard a guess with respect to who would look after it. There will not be anyone who will care to look after it, I fear.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): In connection with the intermediate range guided ballistic missile, have we had any technicians attached to the United States forces to study their developments in that country, and have we made any progress in determining whether our artillery or air force will be using these weapons? It seems to me these are questions that should be answered at this time. If we are attempting to keep abreast of developments, I think in co-operation with the United States forces we should have men there on the ground today learning the use of these weapons and the technical features of their development in order that we will be abreast of everything that is new.

Mr. Campney: As the hon. member will know, in the way of ground to air missiles there is the Nike and the air force has air to air missiles but, as I say, the intercontinental guided ballistic missile, whether intermediate or final, is quite a long way in the future. I think we have ample time before it becomes fully developed in spite of what is said by certain newspaper columnists.

I wonder if I might now fulfil an undertaking I gave to the hon. member for Winnipeg North with regard to the question he raised concerning the special account. He referred to the special account item listed on page 318 of the blue book as item 34 under the navy estimates, where there is a nil entry for this year. The same account also appears on page 331 under the army estimates and the reason item 34 of the air force estimates on page 338 does not include a reference to special accounts will become evident from what I have to say in a moment.

In the past year the value of equipment acquired to March 31, 1950, that has been given as mutual aid to our NATO partners has been credited to this special account for procuring more modern equipment for the Canadian forces. Since April 1, 1956, no further credits will be made to this account and at that time the credit balance stood at $281,933,743. I think I may take some credit or blame as the case may be for that decision, because I do not like carrying these things along from year to year and complicating the ordinary accounting system. The only charge to this special account proposed for the fiscal year 1956-57 is $72,141,000 by the army.

There are relatively small quantities of equipment remaining in Canadian stocks that were acquired prior to March 31, 1950, and where such equipment is transferred in future it will be valued for mutual aid purposes at approximately the cost of repairing and shipping. Consequently these transactions will be on a current disbursement basis, and the charge to mutual aid will be deducted from the expenditures of the service that incurs them rather than credited to the special account.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): What is going to happen to the surplus in that special account?

Mr. Campney: We are running it down by $72 million this year. In other words it will not grow; it will be run down on the usual basis until it disappears.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): In other words it is being used to supply new equipment to the services?

Mr. Campney: That is right.

Mr. Brooks: How much money has been expended already on the Gagetown camp? How soon is it expected to have the camp completed? How many accounts in connection with land taken over by the department are still unsettled?

Mr. Campney: I had better have my figures checked before I answer. I shall get the information and give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Churchill: The minister told us earlier that we should not place too much reliance on press reports, so perhaps the minister will give us a statement with regard to the manufacture of the Belgian rifle and bring us up to date on the program.

Mr. Campney: The contract for the production of the FN-C1 rifle, as we call it with our modification, was awarded by the Department of Defence Production to Canadian Arsenals Limited in September, 1955. Tooling has now been virtually completed and the purchasing of all production materials is now well advanced. Deliveries are expected to commence in the autumn of this year. Based on the above forecast of production it is anticipated that sufficient rifles and ammunition will be available to permit introduction into the Canadian army as follows: To the Canadian army, regular, between May, 1957 and July, 1958; to the Canadian army, militia, between July, 1959 and January, 1960.

Mr. Churchill: I assume ammunition for that rifle is in production now?

Mr. Campney: Yes, it is.

Mr. Churchill: According to a press report I have here it is estimated that 72,000 of these rifles are to be produced for Canada, and I should like to know what will be done with the Lee Enfield rifles which will be replaced.

Mr. Campney: No specific decision has been taken with regard to them, but of course they might become valuable for mutual aid if any country should want them, or they could be disposed of in some other way.

Mr. Churchill: I hope the department will not forget what happened in 1940 after Dunkirk, when rifles were in such short supply in all the western nations, and will keep a sufficient quantity of Lee Enfield rifles in store for emergency use. I hope they will not end up in the crown assets corporation and finally go on the international market as sports rifles.

Mr. Harkness: I note on page 326 of the details under "Major procurement of equipment" an item covering tanks and armoured fighting vehicles, where the amount this year is $590,000 as compared with $5,769,000 last year. This is a great reduction in the amount for tanks and armoured fighting vehicles, and is hardly in accord with the minister's announcement that a new armoured regiment was to be constituted and that the army was to be supplied with a considerable number of amphibious armoured vehicles which could be used for a variety of purposes. I wonder if the minister would explain this apparent discrepancy between that announcement and the amount of money being voted for armoured fighting vehicles.

Mr. Campney: I am informed that we have available enough tanks to equip the new armoured regiment except for some minor parts, and therefore further purchases are not necessary. I did not get the second part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Harkness: The minister announced that amphibious armoured vehicles would be used for a variety of purposes, and I presume they would come under this item.

Mr. Campney: I think the hon. member is referring to the same vehicles to which I referred this afternoon. I said that we were approaching the prototype stage of development, but the vehicle is not in operational production.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, it is not anticipated that any of these vehicles will be completed during this fiscal year?

Mr. Campney: We hope to have a number of the prototypes during this fiscal year.

Mr. Harkness: I am rather disappointed, because when the minister made his initial statement with regard to these particular vehicles I understood him to say that they would be in the course of being supplied to the Canadian army during the present year.

Mr. Campney: I did not say that.

Mr. Harkness: The minister says that he did not say that, but he certainly left that impression with me and I would think with the majority of his listeners. The minister has said that there are enough tanks on hand to supply the new armoured regiment which is going to be constituted. I wonder if he can tell us how many extras that will leave to replace the casualties which constantly occur in the use of tanks, in the same way as automobiles are constantly being piled up on the highways. Furthermore, what about the reserve army as far as the supply of Centurion tanks is concerned, which I understood was to go forward?

Mr. Campney: I understand from my officials, as I have said, that we have an adequate number of Centurions to equip the regular army with a sufficient reserve for an appreciable time if they were called into service, but there are not on hand at the moment a sufficient number of these tanks for the militia.

Mr. Harkness: Can the minister give any indication how soon the militia armoured regiments may expect to receive a sufficient number of Centurion tanks with which to carry on training?

Mr. Campney: No, I am sorry that I cannot at this moment give any date.

Mr. Harkness: Is there any hope of having these vehicles within the next year or two? In some cases these regiments are getting a little fed up over the lack of equipment and with what you might call continued promises, which are not met, that they will be supplied with this modern equipment.

Mr. Campney: I am sorry, but I cannot give the hon. member any data. I understand that the militia units are fairly well equipped with Sherman tanks, but there are no figures I can give him with respect to the Centurion.

Mr. Brooks: Could the minister give me the information I asked for?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I waited so long that somebody got in ahead of me with the same question, but there is one further question. I notice an increase from $1,900,000 to $2,500,000 for architects, engineers, land valuation and legal fees. Is there any particular reason for that increase this year? That is on page 325.

Mr. Campney: Apparently the work of this particular branch, architects and engineers, has lagged behind. I might interject that this is administered by Defence Construction Limited. The estimate for the current year was prepared before we realized last fall that the figure was low and would not be adequate, and the additional sum of $600,000 was put in to cover what we estimated would be the eventual requirements beyond the original estimate.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I do not think that answers anything. Is there any particular special project in any of the four categories mentioned that requires an additional $600,000? Perhaps the minister might tell us what method is used to pay these people. Are these evaluators on contracts of some kind? Are they individually employed in the various districts, and if it is for legal fees what special project is involved? I think we should know that.

Mr. Campney: These are consultants who are hired by Defence Construction Limited for our account. I might say that in the last two years we have instituted a small branch in the department to correlate and further our construction program. It has been very successful, and it has had three results. In the first place we have had far less replanning and changing than was formerly the case. In the second place it has meant planning further ahead than was heretofore possible. In the third place, and probably partly as a result of the two factors I have mentioned, in the current year construction has been stepped up very materially. Whenever construction grows in volume we naturally have to have more architects, legal people and consultants. I think it is also directly as a result of the changes we have made, which have been very effective in these other particulars.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I expect that in future years, if this is to take care of a more prolonged program, this item should not be jumping again by $600,000.

Mr. Campney: I should not think so.

Mr. Harkness: I notice that armament equipment has increased from $7,760,000 to $10,227,000. I wonder whether the minister could indicate to us briefly what that increase is intended to cover in the way of armaments.

Mr. Campney: This increase is attributable principally to the introduction of the new rifle, which is to be produced in Canada, the tooling and commencement of production, and also to the deliveries of 105 millimeter howitzers for which we have provided funds.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think the minister finished giving his answer. He said that money was provided for 105 millimeter guns but he did not say what it was.

Mr. Campney: The figure with respect to the 105 millimeter howitzers is $3 million in this vote, and with respect to the FN rifle it is $2¾ million.

Mr. Harkness: In other words, the other $5 million is more or less for replacements?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Harkness: Could the minister tell us how much the department is paying for these 105 millimeter guns?

Mr. Campney: That probably could be answered by my colleague the Minister of Defence Production, when his estimates come up. I did know the price, but I do not recall it now, and I would not care to guess.

Mr. Harkness: Does the minister know how many guns he got for the $3 million?

Mr. Campney: We do not give out figures as to quantities of armaments. We never have, and I do not think we should start that now.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think that answer is very satisfactory. As a matter of fact we have mentioned a number of guns of various kinds on frequent occasions, both here and in the defence expenditures committee, and I would ask the minister to what extent the Canadian army has been rearmed with 105 millimeter guns.

Mr. Campney: The regular army has been fully rearmed with these guns. These are for the militia.

Mr. Harkness: To what extent is the militia being rearmed with these 105 millimeter guns?

[Mr. Campney.]

Mr. Campney: We hope eventually completely, but this is a start in that direction.

Mr. Harkness: Then might I ask how many guns per militia regiment have now gone out?

Mr. Campney: As far as I know none of them have gone out.

Mr. Harkness: That is my information, that none have gone out; but the minister says these guns are for the militia regiments.

Mr. Campney: They are being purchased. They are being built for that purpose, but they are not yet available.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): They have not been built yet.

Mr. Harkness: May I ask once more how many are going to be supplied to each militia regiment, and how soon?

Mr. Campney: I understand that the scale is about eight per regiment. I certainly cannot give the date for the production of the guns. I would not give a date of production of anything after two years in this department, because there are all kinds of production problems, and we are now in the middle of a steel strike.

Mr. Harkness: This great reluctance or inability on the part of the minister to give such information as how many guns are covered by this $3 million order, on the basis that it would break security to give it, is a good example of how little necessity there is for security of that sort, because the number of field regiments in Canada is quite well known. It is published in various publications, and anybody can get the information. If these guns are being purchased for the militia regiments on the basis of eight for each, no consideration of security enters into the matter at all.

I think this is a good example of the fact that we have been denied information very frequently in this committee, in the defence expenditures committee and in other places as far as defence matters are concerned on the excuse of security, when there was no real security reason whatever. It was either the fact that the people concerned did not have the information or they were afraid to give it because they thought there might be some unfortunate consequence politically from doing so.

Mr. Brooks: I asked the minister several questions with reference to Camp Gagetown and he said he would have the information.

Mr. Campney: The information has not yet come to hand, but I have not forgotten it.

I can assure the hon. member he will have it, but I do not know that I will have it before ten o'clock.

Mr. Brooks: I want the committee to have it.

Mr. MacLean: I asked the minister for an explanation, and perhaps he has it now, of why the proportion of civilians to servicemen is so much higher in the army than in the other two services.

Mr. Campney: I am told that one of the principal reasons the number of civilians in the army is higher than in the other two services is the type of work for which they are used. For example, the transport situation is far greater in the army than in the other two services and a much larger civilian staff can be employed to service vehicles. The same applies to ordnance. Much of our R.C.A.F. repair work is done by the aircraft industry. To put it shortly, a great deal more maintenance and repair work can be done by civilians in connection with army operations than in the other two services. It is cheaper to do it that way and equally effective, and in the interests of economy we try to use civilians wherever practicable.

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister a question which, while it affects comparatively few men in the regular force, is of great importance to them. He will remember that two or three years ago there was one regular battalion made up of four highland companies. One of these companies was from Vancouver, the Seaforth Highlanders. For some reason or other a change was made and the whole battalion was converted into a Black Watch battalion rather than a Seaforth battalion, which I think should have been done.

However, the young officers from the Seaforths were compelled to buy completely new highland outfits with the Black Watch tartan. Unless it has been done recently, I believe no help has been given them to meet that expense. In view of the fact that they were forced to get these new uniforms I suggest that they should at least have been given some allowance by the army to help with the purchase of the uniforms.

Mr. Campney: I may say that I am entirely sympathetic with the hon. member in this matter. I made two different submissions to treasury board, and I am not sure whether there may not have been more. I do not want to shove the matter off on treasury board, but I must exonerate myself. I have not the power to take the remedial action that I think should be taken. The members of treasury board have different views, as they have a right to have, but I agree with the hon. member. These changes having been made in the natural course of evolution of the army and through no fault of these personnel, I believe there should be some assistance. But I must admit that up to now I have not been able to get a satisfactory solution.

Mr. Green: Has that suggestion been turned down by treasury board? If so, will the minister again place it before treasury board; because I think here is a case where, since there are so few men involved, treasury board is not being fair. These young men have a good claim for help in the purchase of these expensive uniforms. I hope the minister will again put the case before treasury board and that this time the suggestion will be met. Can the minister give the committee the assurance that he will again take it up with treasury board?

Mr. Campney: Yes, I will be glad to do that because, as I say, there is no difference in our opinions on this matter.

The Deputy Chairman: Does that complete the discussion under this heading?

Mr. Hees: I was amazed at the answer given by the minister to the question asked him by the member for York West about the evacuation plan for the relatives of married personnel in Europe. Perhaps I did not understand what the minister said. Would he explain just what the plan of evacuation is in case the balloon goes up over there? How are these people to get out in safety?

Mr. Campney: If I may repeat, these matters are under consideration not only by us but by the NATO authorities and by other departments. I think I am right in saying that such matters are not publicized, that no publicity is given to what plans we may have in mind or maybe trying to evolve. It is of course, as everyone knows, a very important matter. I do not know that any good purpose would be served by discussing publicly the plans that have so far been evolved nor, in fact, the plans when they are finalized.

Mr. Hees: Why does the minister not say there are no plans and cut it short?

Mr. Campney: Because that would not be in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Hees: Is there a plan? I am not asking what it is. I want to know if there is a plan or if there is not a plan.

Mr. Campney: I answered the question before the hon. member came in. I said the plan had been evolved to a certain point. I was asked whether the ports of debarkation and the methods of assigning those ports had been settled and I said no. I said there were a number of problems in connection with evacuation that had not yet been settled. I said that plans had been partially formulated but not completed.

Mr. Hees: How long does it take for the government or this department to work out plans for a brigade that has been in Europe a number of years? Is it going to take another two or three years before you finally get a plan worked out? Just what is the process of the department's thinking? How much more thinking has been done during the past year than the year before, and when do you expect to have a plan worked out?

Mr. Nicholson: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hees: All right, we will call it ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Does that complete the questioning under this heading?

Mr. Hees: No, it does not. I call it ten o'clock.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Campney: Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with these estimates tomorrow and when they are finished, as I hope they will be, we will proceed, I think, with defence production—

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Defence production, then agriculture.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

R.C.M.P. BUILDING, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 556—Mr. Lusby:

Question

1. Have tenders been called for construction of a new Royal Canadian Mounted Police detachment building at Amherst, Nova Scotia?
2. If not, when are they expected to be called?
3. Is it intended that the building shall be constructed during the present year?

Answer by: Mr. Bourget, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

1. No.
2. August, 1956.
3. Yes.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 20, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Tenth report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. McCulloch (Pictou).

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Third report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Anderson (for Mr. Jutras).

HOUSING

CALGARY—EFFECT OF CREDIT RESTRICTIONS ON BUILDING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister aware that yesterday Calgary's largest building company had to lay off a quarter of its labour force because of lack of mortgage funds, and other companies there are in the same position? Is the government now prepared to make any change in its policy in this regard in order to enable house building to go ahead?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to answer the last question in the absence of the Minister of Public Works. As to the former, I am unaware of the facts the hon. member states.

VANCOUVER—REPORTED ACTION OF MINISTER RESPECTING LOW RENTAL HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works and in his absence to the parliamentary assistant or the Acting Minister of Public Works. I am sorry I have not given notice of this question and perhaps this will be taken as notice.

Has the Minister of Public Works received a letter from Mr. George F. Edwards, president of the senior citizens association of British Columbia, under date of July 10, relative to a refusal of the minister to consent to construction of low rental homes on property made available by the Vancouver city council for such construction, basing his refusal on the ground that elderly citizens should not be segregated? If this is so, will the minister explain his policy concerning housing for senior citizens and will he review his decision concerning the application of the city of Vancouver?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the minister has received such a letter but he will be back next week and I will bring this matter to his attention.

BROCKVILLE—LANDSCAPING CONTRACT, CHURCHILL PARK PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works or in his absence to his parliamentary assistant. I have not had an opportunity to give him notice but perhaps he would accept this as notice.

Can the minister inform me when Bergstrom Bros. of Clarkson, who received the contract to landscape the Churchill park housing project in Brockville, intend to start the work and when they expect to have it finished? I may say they received the contract in September, 1955, and drew a few loads of dirt—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stanton: —of which part has washed away and nothing has been done since—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stanton: —except that a man cut some weeds a few days ago. My question is this. When does the company expect to start the work and when does it expect to finish it?

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I could not hear anything that was said by my hon. friend but I will take it as notice after reading it in Hansard.

An hon. Member: You did not listen, the whole bunch of you.

Mr. Stanton: I would like to direct a supplementary question to the parliamentary assistant. I can quite understand why the assistant did not answer my previous question. Is the minister aware that Island City Greenhouses Limited, a Brockville company whose tender was only $25.50 higher than the tender of Bergstrom Bros., have finished landscaping this spring more lawns and yards than are contained in the Churchill park project?

PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF JULY 19

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister comment on the report in last night's Ottawa Journal, attributed to the highest authority, that the government is planning to increase old age pensions and other federal social security payments? If it is the government's intention to do this, is it not an admission that an increase is needed? If so, why not do it at this session?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There is no foundation for the report that the government is planning to do it either at this session or at the next session.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Knowles: May I direct a question to the Prime Minister, supplementary to the question and answer of a few minutes ago? Before the government closes the door to a possible increase in the old age pension, will the Prime Minister consider the needs of our senior citizens and also their hope that even this government will do something to meet those needs without further delay?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): The government considers all these matters and the many other matters that put a strain on the financial resources of all governments at all levels in these days.

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask one supplementary question in connection with that. Will the Prime Minister not take into consideration the fact, in connection with the pensions payable to members of the civil service, the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police whose pensions were fixed some time ago, that adjustments have been made under similar circumstances in the United Kingdom and in the United States and that consideration here would seem to be overdue in regard to people who are suffering very greatly as a result of the level being fixed at a time when the dollar was worth much more than it is today?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Consideration has been given to that problem many times and will continue to be given to the problem. Accurate information as to what has been done elsewhere has been obtained and will continue to be obtained and studied.

FINANCE

EGYPT—INQUIRY AS TO LOANS THROUGH WORLD BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since I was unable to give him notice, perhaps he will take it as notice now. Will he comment on the recent developments with regard to the loans to the Egyptian government and inform the house whether Canada's representative on the world bank will receive instructions to press for the continuation of world bank participation?

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): I will take it as notice, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL PARKS

INGONISH—REPORTED OUTBREAK OF SPRUCE BUDWORM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister had his attention drawn to a severe outburst of spruce budworm in the national park at Ingonish? If so, can he inform the house as to any steps that have been taken to deal with this infestation?

Hon. Jean Lesage (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Buchanan) drew my attention to this fact two days ago and I obtained a report from the forest biology division of the Department of Agriculture to the effect that there was no real, sudden outburst. There might have been some infestation in Cape Breton Highlands national park. It was nothing that was extraordinary. Anyway, our people there are looking into the matter at the present time.

Mr. Drew: Then may I take it from the answer of the minister that this subject is actually being examined and that if action is deemed advisable proper steps will be taken?

Mr. Lesage: Definitely.

TRADE

UNITED KINGDOM—NEGOTIATIONS FOR PURCHASE OF URANIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A radio report this morning indicated that representatives of the United Kingdom government would probably be coming to Canada next month to negotiate the purchase of quite large quantities of uranium. Can the minister give the house any report concerning these negotiations?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the negotiation has been under way for some time. I was not aware that a party is coming from the United Kingdom but I am not at all surprised. We anticipate that a contract will be signed and after the contract is signed I shall be glad to advise the house of its provisions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN MOSCOW BY MR. IRVINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can secure from the Canadian representative in Moscow something in the way of a transcript of the remarks attributed to Mr. Irvine which were most eulogistic of the democratic system in the U.S.S.R.? Can the minister secure something in the way of a record of the remarks that were made in that regard?

An hon. Member: Who is Mr. Irvine?

Mr. Coldwell: I would ask the minister to supply me with a copy as well.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if there has been printed in Moscow a transcript of what Mr. Irvine is reported to have said we will be glad to try to secure it.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Who is he?

An hon. Member: Is he the president of the C.C.F. party?

ISRAEL—REQUEST FOR FAVOURABLE CONSIDERATION OF SHIPMENTS OF SABRE AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement that Canada is making a free gift of 75 Sabre jets to Germany, will the Prime Minister now give consideration to at least selling 24 Sabre jets to the friendly country of Israel?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that matter has been and still is under serious consideration and the transfer under mutual aid to Germany of Sabre jets will have no effect whatsoever on the decision to be reached in respect to the other matter.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Prime Minister state why the policy he has now outlined is to give these aircraft to an ex-enemy and not even sell them to a friendly nation?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Because of the fact that the country to whom this mutual aid has been extended is a member of NATO and it is part of the usual transfers which Canada has been making to its NATO partners under that agreement.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister give some general outline of the mystery connected with this matter in so far as the expression he used the other day, that Canada would join with other countries in deciding whether or not these aircraft should be supplied, is concerned? Who are those other countries which are to co-operate with Canada in this regard?

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Those other countries are the other members of NATO and the western powers with whom we are associated in doing our best to maintain peace in the world. We do not think it would be appropriate for Canada to take the responsibility of making a decision that it would be proper to do something to which the other western countries do not seem disposed to take the responsibility of agreeing to contribute.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—SUGGESTIONS AS TO SOURCES OF PIPE SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether in view of the difficulty in obtaining pipe for the trans-Canada pipe line the minister would consider approaching Frank McMahon with a request that he make available some of his supplies of pipe to Trans-Canada? Is the minister prepared to answer my question?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I assume my hon. friend is intending to be humorous and he was rather funny. I do not think his question calls for an answer from me.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): As a question supplementary to the one I asked a few minutes ago of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, is the minister aware that a major source of supply of pipe for Mr. McMahon was in Great Britain, where a steel strike is not now in progress?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I am well aware of that fact. I am also well aware of the fact that Mr. Frank McMahon is just as much in need of pipe as is Trans-Canada Pipe Lines. I am also aware that his pipe is 30-inch inside diameter, whereas the requirement for Trans-Canada is 34-inch inside diameter. I am therefore of the opinion that we can get no help from that particular quarter.

NATIONAL REVENUE

LETHBRIDGE—COST OF OPERATION AND CASES DEALT WITH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct two questions to the Minister of National Revenue, notice of which I have sent him but probably so recently as to render it not possible for him to answer immediately and he may have to take these questions as notices. Will the minister tell the house how much the maintenance of the Lethbridge income tax office has cost his department during each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954, 1955 and 1956 to date? Will he tell the house how many income tax cases the Lethbridge income tax office has dealt with during each of the years 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954, 1955 and 1956 to date?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I received these questions just as I was coming into the chamber and I shall have to take them as notice to be answered next week.

CANCER

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE RELATIONSHIP TO AIR POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister in a position to make any report on the investigation being made by his department into the possible relationship between air pollution and lung cancer and can be say whether those studies include an investigation into the part played by diesel fuel in possible air pollution?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that on matters of health and welfare the hon. gentleman is now directing his question to the responsible minister.

Mr. Knowles: Is the Prime Minister not a responsible minister?

Mr. Martin: I said that I was glad that in matters of health and welfare the hon. gentleman was directing his question to the responsible minister. I do not take back in any way what I said in that particular. With regard to the question which my hon. friend has asked I may say, as he probably knows, that under the national health program funds are provided to the cancer institute of Canada which is the body that determines what research in the field of cancer shall be undertaken with federal funds. This matter is part of the research cancer program under study.

THE MINISTRY

REFERENCE TO PORTFOLIOS OF POST OFFICE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George H. Hees (Broadview): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government that the departments of post office and veterans affairs shall continue, as a permanent state of affairs, to be headed by one minister, or is one of these portfolios being held over until Mr. Gordon has finished his report and can enter the cabinet?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): There is no portfolio being held over until Mr. Gordon has finished his report. As for the other part of the hon. gentleman's question, the government's decision in the matter will be announced as soon as it is reached.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

235. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $143,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,470,423,461 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,675,484,744 will come due for payment in future years), $1,722,797,717.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening, the discussion was taking place under Canadian army (regular) and general. Have we concluded our discussion on this item?

Mr. Campney: Last evening the hon. member for Royal asked for some information in respect of two matters, which I shall be glad to put on Hansard. His first series of questions was with respect to Camp Gagetown. Our expenses at Gagetown to date for construction and for the acquisition of some 425 square miles of land are in round figures $60 million, of which about $12 million was for land. There were 1,228 individual claims involving settlement for land and eight of those are still to be settled. As a matter of fact, I think most of the eight are in litigation. The construction program in the current year will be about $20 million. It is anticipated that the camp will be pretty well in full operation toward the end of next year, although I should like to point out that we are making substantial use of it this year as some 10,000 troops are concentrating there for operational training.

The hon. member for Royal also asked for some statistics with respect to the schools for army dependents in Europe. Last year in Europe we operated four schools, at Soest, Hemer, Werl and Antwerp. These schools were operated by 72 teachers and served 1,691 pupils. The total cost of operation, including rental of the schools, was $410,885.

Mr. Coldwell: Can the minister tell us what is the per capita cost of educating these children, including the provision of the schools?

Mr. Campney: I cannot at the moment but I will be glad to get it.

The Chairman: Is that discussion completed? Canadian army, militia, including Canadian officers training corps.

Mrs. Fairclough: I do not know whether I should have brought this up on the item just under discussion but I should like to ask the minister if any decision has been arrived at with regard to the check-off of amounts assigned for credit union purposes by civilian employees. I understand that an application was made to the department some time ago on behalf of these employees. There are credit unions actively operating in the dockyards at Halifax and Esquimalt and at a great many air stations throughout Canada. Has the minister taken any steps to give permission to the pay officers in these places to deduct from the employees' pay and remit to the credit union such amounts as they have indicated?

Mr. Campney: I have no recollection of having taken any action but I should like to check that to see whether any recommendation has come forward.

Mrs. Fairclough: Apparently application was made to the department early in the year, and in April the credit union association was told that a decision would be made shortly. In the meantime I have not heard any more about it. I understand that the governor in council has authorized regulations to permit officers and men to declare assignments of pay and allowances providing for equal monthly payments for the purposes and to the payees prescribed by the appropriate chief of staff and that at the present time these include the chartered banks and life insurance companies for the payment of policy premiums. The question is whether or not the department will authorize similar payments to credit unions of the employees' choice.

Mr. Campney: I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. Herridge: Is this the item that deals with the cost of staff colleges?

Mr. Campney: It is really not this item. Perhaps, however, the hon. member would like to ask his question.

Mr. Herridge: I would. I have here sessional paper No. 90-D which was tabled on June 21, 1956 in response to some questions asked by the member for Winnipeg North. I find that question No. 3 was:

> How many graduates of the regular officers training plan entered the regular force of: (a) navy; (b) army; (c) air force, during 1954-55?

Then the same question is asked with respect to 1956, 1957 and 1958. I find the answer to that question is:

3.	(a) Navy	(b) Army	(c) Air Force
1954	20	45	34
1955	28	67	43
4.	(a) Navy	(b) Army	(c) Air Force
1956	48	74	52
1957	54	108	95

Then the hon. member asked this question:

5. What was the total cost of operation of the Canadian services colleges during: 1954, 1955 and what will be the estimated cost in 1956, 1957 and 1958?

I find there the answers as follows:

5. The estimated cost of operation of the Canadian services colleges during:

1954-55	$3,433,673
1955-56	4,086,458
1956-57	4,515,336
1957-58	Not available

According to the number that have entered the forces from this training plan and according to the quick calculation I have made here, it appears that it is costing us over $30,000 to train each of these cadets to enter the navy, the army or the air force. Am I correct in my analysis of these figures?

Mr. Campney: I think the figure is approximately correct. I may say in addition, however, that the fact is that these colleges, especially C.M.R. and Royal Roads and R.M.C. as well are just getting into their stride and we expect the number to increase as they do so with very little additional cost.

Mr. Herridge: The minister would agree though that $30,000 for training a cadet in any of the sections of the services seems to be a very excessive sum, and one which is in excess of what it cost to train veterans after the first world war. It is about four times as much.

Mr. Campney: All expenses are undoubtedly up. The cost of training officers in training colleges is up. The cost of training cadets is up. In fact, nearly all the expenditures we have to make are up. That is one of the difficulties we have in operating within our budget and in carrying out all the obligations we must carry out. That is not to say that we are much different from other organizations in the country. However, we have constantly increasing cost in respect of salaries and materials. Then, in addition, we have had to develop these schools; and have had to spend a good deal of money on them. The cost is high, I admit, but I think we can improve the figure and I certainly hope we can increase the output.

Mr. Pearkes: A few years ago the department set up a committee under the chairmanship of retired Major-General Howard Kennedy in order to reorganize and to review the efficiency of the Canadian militia. The minister made only a brief reference to the militia in his opening remarks. Now that one year of training has passed since the implementation of the Kennedy report, I wonder whether the minister could not now give us a review as to the state of efficiency of this important branch of the defence services, and particularly with regard to the numbers to be going into camp this year. I was interested to hear that the militia was going to train more units this year in camp than they had trained in the past. I would like to know regarding their ability to carry out that training, not as far as personnel are concerned but regarding the standard of their equipment at the present time.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, speaking generally, I am advised by my officials, and I have confirmed some of this advice at first hand by observation myself, the reorganization which followed the intensive examination throughout the country of the militia system by the committee to which the hon. member has referred has resulted in very considerable improvement in the quality of militia training. I understand the equipment which has been issued has also greatly improved. The camp training has certainly improved in quality and in numbers. If I recollect correctly, in 1954, 16,000 attended summer camp; in 1955, approximately 20,000. This year there are approximately 23,000. The strength is down slightly. I have not the figures before me at the moment but it is down very little. I am told that the number of active members in the militia is really up. In other words, there was some internal reorganization. The elimination of what might be termed nominal members of the militia will improve the quality, because the only members of the militia who will profit from the reorganization or from the training are those who are actively interested. I understand further, as regards the arrangements which were made with respect to pay, the arrangements to give assistance in public relations and the arrangements to take care of a good deal of the staff work locally, and generally all the other matters that were dealt with by the committee, while each of which in itself may not be important, their cumulative effect has been such that there is a better training standard, a better feeling and a much greater activity within the militia.

We are trying to improve their equipment as fast as we can, and generally speaking I would say that the appointment of this commission was well worth while. In regard to the numbers of people participating in militia training under present conditions today, we must remember that we are in a very active industrial period. There is a high level of employment, and notwithstanding the inducements that are offered and the benefits of the training, it requires some determination on the part of individuals to devote the time and the energy, which they do, to the carrying out of their duties as members of the militia.

Mr. Pearkes: As a result of the recommendations of that committee, have certain militia units been allocated as third battalions to regular units? Is it the intention that those personnel of those third battalions should act as third line reinforcements to the regular units of those regular battalions of those regiments, or is it expected that those militia units affiliated with the regular regiment would be considered as operational units themselves, or are they purely units to reinforce regular battalions?

Mr. Campney: Several militia units are affiliated with regular battalions of the R.C.R.'s, the Royal 22nd and the P.P.C.L.I. They are not regarded as fully operational units, but they would certainly be a source of support if necessity arose, because they work in very close association with the regular battalions.

Mr. Pearkes: I notice in the total amount of the estimates here there is an increase of approximately $3 million. I notice that practically the whole of that amount is taken up in pay and allowances to personnel. I presume the pay and allowances of the militia have been increased in the same way as the pay and allowances of the regular forces have been increased?

Mr. Campney: Yes, they have; they have been increased at the same rate and in the same way as the pay and allowances of the members of the regular forces, although none of the increases in rates of pay of the forces, either regular or militia, is reflected in these estimates because they took place long after these estimates were presented to the house.

Mr. Pearkes: We may assume, then, that the increase of approximately $3 million in the pay and allowances is to enable more men to be trained this year?

Mr. Campney: That is correct. Incidentally, I might mention that their pay relates very closely to the amount of training so that if they train more they get more pay.

Mr. Nicholson: Last night the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich gave us a very interesting report, and he made a few suggestions that I think should be emphasized before we pass on to some other item. May I say in passing that when the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and the Minister of Labour went to London recently I checked the Parliamentary Guide to find out, if I could, something about the gallantry for which the hon. members received one of the most prized awards in the commonwealth. I find that both are very modest. No mention whatever is made of the gallantry, but I am sure members on all sides of the house are very proud to have some association with these distinguished holders of the Victoria Cross.

The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich mentioned, when he spoke earlier on the defence estimates, that it seemed to be extremely unlikely that either the west or the Soviet union will use thermonuclear weapons with the idea of carrying out strategic bombing either in the west or in the east. Both sides seem to have reached the realization that the use of that terrible weapon means the destruction of civilization.

In the next paragraph he said, as reported at page 6206 of Hansard:

> A few years ago there was the feeling that the Russians might not use the thermonuclear weapons but might start a war in western Europe and use conventional arms. For that reason the commanders of NATO—this government, supported by this side of the house, agreed—were able to provide a strong deterrent of ground troops in western Europe.
> I think conditions are changing. Not only does it appear that Russia is changing the emphasis from a war of arms to an economic war,—

Later in another paragraph he went on to say:

> I feel that in the light of the changed circumstances it is imperative that this government review its defence policy. The emphasis is being changed from a war of arms to a war of trade. Whilst it is essential that we keep up defences in this country and in western Europe, I feel that we have to be quite certain that we are not overinsuring at the present time.

I think the suggestions made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich have not received sufficient consideration by the Minister of National Defence. In this morning's paper we read that the United States has withdrawn its offer to help Egypt to build the dam. It seems to me the western nations are not facing up to the real challenge that the U.S.S.R. is presenting to the world at the present time. In the mail this morning I received a pamphlet entitled, "Education and Professional Manpower in the U.S.S.R." I gather this has been sent to all hon. members. It is a reprint from "Chemistry in Canada", written by Dr. Garnet T. Page, general manager of the Chemical Institute of Canada. This presents some information that I think has not received sufficient consideration in Canada. There is a picture of the university in Moscow. It gives tables describing the courses for different fields of engineering in Russia, a typical Soviet curriculum in chemical engineering and chemistry, and then it gives tables for Canada, the United States and western Europe.

I have not had time to study these tables at all but it seems to me that since Russia is spending so much of her gross national product in the field of training scientists and engineers we should take careful note of the words of Dr. Page. In one paragraph he says:

> The Soviet educational system has been developed into a major arm for ideological and economic world conquest. Thousands of well-trained and politically indoctrinated engineers, scientists, teachers and technicians are being produced for export, to assist in developing the resources of countries outside the present Soviet orbit; and hundreds of thousands more are being prepared to meet domestic industrial needs.

When Mr. James S. Duncan, president of Massey-Harris, spoke to the Canadian Club a few weeks ago he pointed out this challenge. I have a copy of the press release in which he described the new university in Moscow which is situated on 1,100 acres of land on the banks of the Moskva river, and he describes the facilities. According to Mr. Duncan these are the most extravagant university buildings anywhere in the world. He goes on to point out that in 1954 Russia graduated almost 53,000 engineers compared to 23,000 in the United States. These students on graduation, he indicates, had put in 50 per cent more study hours than our students here. It seems to me that poses a challenge which we are not considering as we should.

The minister last night gave us the total amount it is costing us each year to maintain our forces in Germany and if you add on the total amount we spent for the planes that were recently given it seems to me that represents a very large investment. As Dr. Page points out, I think we are falling behind in Canada in the training of sufficient numbers of engineers and scientists and in making them available in our country and others that require the technical know-how we have available.

I read in the newspapers that last winter the Department of Labour called a meeting of all responsible agencies to look at this problem. I wonder if the minister could make any report to the committee as to what conclusions, if any, were reached by the advisory council or the interdepartmental committee that was established to consider whether or not we are graduating sufficient engineers and scientists in Canada to meet our own needs and to meet the challenge that Russia is presenting to the world today.

I would think that if the Minister of National Defence is able to have all the funds he needs, and without any question he has been able to do that, the suggestions made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich last night should be given the most careful scrutiny. If the best authorities are now coming to the conclusion that neither the west nor the east is going to start a thermonuclear war and that the Canadians are not going to be required in Europe indefinitely, it seems to me more consideration should be given to seeing that Canada will not be handicapped in the years to come by having insufficient engineers and scientists to staff our high schools and universities.

Could the minister give us some report on the progress of the advisory council on professional manpower?

The Chairman: Order. I did not interrupt the hon. member while he was speaking but hon. members should recall that the committee itself has agreed to the manner in which resolution 235 shall be discussed. We have agreed that the chairman shall call the headings and our discussion shall be limited to what is relevant under those headings. I do not see any way in which the hon. member's latter remarks could be called relevant to the militia of the Canadian army and I would therefore suggest that we confine ourselves to the manner in which the committee itself has regulated its work.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, in the light of the most useful remarks made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich last night and in view of the comments I have made and the fact that this department does worry about the problem, if the minister prefers to answer later it is quite all right with me, but I think at some point he should be prepared to answer the question I raised.

The Chairman: May I point out that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich made his remarks while we were discussing the heading "Canadian army, regular and general".

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting to take part in this debate. I understood we were still on that item. There was a great deal of noise in the house this morning.

The Chairman: The discussion under the heading "Canadian army, regular and general" was completed by mutual consent some considerable time ago and several members directed questions to the minister under the heading we are now discussing, "Canadian army-militia, including Canadian officers training corps", before the hon. member for Mackenzie rose to his feet. Now, I did not interrupt him but I am convinced that hon. members would feel his remarks are not relevant under the heading we are now discussing.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I certainly did not hear the proceedings. It has been very noisy in the chamber this morning. I have been waiting since last night to follow the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and I took the first opportunity that was presented to me but before we finish the item there will be an opportunity for me to repeat this and I am quite prepared to do that.

The Chairman: Is the Canadian army militia completed?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): No, Mr. Chairman. I, too, was very pleased to hear some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich last evening. In one case he referred particularly to the excellent food the overseas brigade was receiving. It came to me as somewhat of a surprise to read an article in the Hamilton Spectator of July 12 written by a well respected writer, Mr. Kingsley Brown. This article deals with the conditions in connection with food so far as the militia camps are concerned.

I know, sir, that you do not like these things being read so I may have to follow the legal method of saying that I will adopt these words as my own, but I think at least a few paragraphs of this article might very well be read into the record. Here is what this writer says:

> Down at Camp Niagara, where several thousand citizen-soldiers of the militia are taking their annual summer training, it was taking more than an orderly officer's bark to stem the flood of complaints we heard early this week about the food and the way it is served.

You know how the orderly officer goes around and inquires if there are any complaints and dares anybody to speak up. The article continues in this way:

> Having spent several days living at camp Niagara we can say that the complaints were justified. Food was of a poor quality—we were served black potatoes that had obviously been frozen or diseased —the coffee—when it was available to those who turned up during the first hour of the mess period, was so cold it wasn't worth drinking. If you did drink it, the effect was more emetic than stimulating.
> Glassware and dishes weren't clean. They may have been dunked swiftly into water and then put out to dry, but they certainly weren't washed. Not those we sampled, at any rate.

The writer goes on in a very serious article and concludes in this way:

> There is simply no excuse whatever for Canadian soldiers, at a home training camp in peacetime, being served in this fashion.
>
> Canadian militiamen in training aren't looking for any fancy catering. They don't expect French chefs. They don't look for more than the normal camp mess furnishings.
> But they have a right to expect good wholesome food, served up promptly in clean utensils. If the Canadian army is really interested in having its militiamen come back to camp next year, it will have to see that they get it.

That is an article which appeared in the Hamilton Spectator of July 12, 1956, written by Mr. Kingsley Brown. I agree with the rules which state that we should not quote directly articles like this, but if there is no committee we must hammer and hammer away in order to get direct factual evidence in connection with conditions of this kind. I say that the opposition is left with no alternative but to bring forward the best evidence we can get.

This article by a respected writer is an indication of a condition which I think is no credit to the department. I submit it is something which demands an investigation and it certainly warrants a reply. As I said last night, I am pleased that this type of condition did not prevail overseas according to the reports we have, but apparently it does exist here. The important factor is that these men are part-time volunteers and many of them give these services at considerable inconvenience to themselves. If there is a real desire in the department to make use of the militia as a really active group within the defence set-up, then this type of condition should not exist. I ask that the minister consider some type of investigation so that there will be no necessity for articles of this sort appearing in our newspapers.

Mr. Philpott: Mr. Chairman, surely we do not take any unsupported statement by a writer in the press as being the gospel truth. A lot of plain, downright nonsense appears in the press from coast to coast. I have contributed a good deal of nonsense myself in the 33 years I have been writing for the press, but I think my batting average may not be too bad.

The evidence presented by the hon. member for York West certainly does not tally with information I have had from people who have gone to the same type of camp. It may very well be that the cooks in Ontario are backward, dirty and messy people who do not clean up the cook room, and perhaps the cooks whom we have in British Columbia and Alberta camps are of a naturally higher order as one would expect in western Canada, but certainly the information the hon. member has given does not tally with the information we get in British Columbia with regard to militia and other types of army camps. I saw some of them last year. I see my old friend, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, who will remember what the conditions were like in some of the army camps during the first year of the first world war. The cooks in all types of army service camps today are just so much better than they were 33 years ago that no one is warranted in opening his mouth about them.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should have to sit and listen to that type of reply on behalf of the Department of National Defence. As a matter of fact, the statement by the hon. member for Vancouver South is the best evidence we could have that we need a committee on national defence to investigate these things firsthand. I prefaced my remarks by saying that I was not sympathetic to the practice of reading information of this kind into the record, but it is the only weapon we have, it is the only method available of getting information across to this committee. I am surprised that the hon. member for Vancouver South should stoop to slandering a member of the profession to which he belongs.

Mr. Campney: I may say that the observations of the hon. member for York West aroused nostalgic memories of the days when I was a private in the rear ranks and of the food that we used to get at that time. I am surprised at the report he has read because I have had no complaints of any such conditions obtaining, either in the regular army or the militia camps.

I know from personal experience that the rations, the cooking and serving of food today are extremely good, whatever branch of the service is involved. I understand also that the same rations are issued to the militia when they are in camp as are issued to the regular army. I sampled the food in Korea and Europe and various other places and had to do some strenuous reducing as a result of that sampling.

There is one difficulty which is sometimes encountered in that the militia do not have the same access to thoroughly trained army cooks as does the regular army. This may be one occasion where that has happened and where the cooking staff has been below average. I shall look into it, because it is something I do not approve of and do not want to see continued.

Mrs. Fairclough: The writer quoted by the hon. member for York West is known to me. He is a highly reputable writer and I know he does not colour his article. If he reported in that way I take it that what he reported is true. The minister has said that as far as the militia is concerned they do not have the trained cooks they have in the army. Are these services not supplied by commercial caterers and, if so, what firm is doing the catering at Camp Niagara?

Mr. Campney: I understand the army does use caterers on some occasions and in some camps. I do not know who is doing the catering in this particular camp but I shall look into it.

Mrs. Fairclough: If there is a caterer, would the minister's statement still hold that the rations available to the militia are the same as those available to the regular army? Would the caterers be instructed as to what they were to serve or would they use their own judgment?

[Mr. Hamilton (York West).]

Mr. Campney: The rations are issued by the army. A caterer would be provided with the rations which would be the same as those issued to the regular force.

Mrs. Fairclough: Then it would appear to have been bad preparation?

Mr. Campney: I would think so.

Mr. Nicholson: I assume that since the item we are now on includes the C.O.T.C., my remarks were in order although previously I did make reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. The minister told us last year that it costs around $65,000 to train a pilot for the air force. This service is very attractive to a large group of young Canadians and I should like to know what consideration has been given to the problem which apparently is occurring in various parts of Canada in connection with an apparent shortage of trained scientists and engineers. The C.O.T.C. is in very close touch with problems in the universities. The minister's department is attracting a very large number of the ablest young people in the education field in Canada. Would he indicate what progress has been made in the discussions of this advisory committee regarding this problem?

Mr. Campney: I am sorry, but the committee to which the hon. member has referred is not associated with my department. We are naturally concerned with the number of scientific people available in Canada, in two ways: first, as engineers and technicians in the services; and, second, as pure scientists, if you will, and applied scientists in the defence research board. We get a fair share of these people, but as to the numbers who should be trained in Canada and how many are being trained in Canada—the second part of the hon. member's question—I am afraid I am not in a position to advise him, nor as to what general steps are being taken, what are regarded as possible or what the need is.

We are in touch with these matters at the two points I have mentioned. The defence research board is doing a good deal in this field to provide scholarships and to induce people to carry out work within its jurisdiction. We are educating a number through the officers' training plan and the various plans at universities, but that is only a small segment of a very large picture, and I do not think I am competent to make observations or draw conclusions on the larger picture.

Mr. Nicholson: Could the minister indicate what considerations are given as to whether there is a growing need for pilots, for example, in the light of the change in the world situation as described by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich? If we are not going to be engaged in the type of warfare experienced during the first and second world wars, it seems to me that at some point consideration should be given as to whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare should not be given a larger percentage of the personnel who are being trained in Canada. I understand that all the departments of government were called in to have a look at this problem last winter, and there should be some report at some time as to whether any shift in emphasis is going to be made.

Mr. Campney: I think the committee to which the hon. member referred and the research program to which he referred are under the jurisdiction or guidance of my colleague, the Minister of Labour. If I may be permitted, I shall make a few observations about the other part of his speech, the part in which he referred to the remarks of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich last night. We are, both as a government and as a department, very much concerned, of course, with the developments that are taking place today in the world, though it is probably too soon to evaluate them thoroughly. We have established our position, along with the other members of NATO, on the basis that the deterrent effect of our own capacity to reply in kind is the best defence we have and probably the best defence we can have. It is one thing for our possible opponents to launch an attack, either with thermonuclear weapons or without, as was indicated as a possibility by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, if they know there is no great defence against it or no great retaliatory capacity to meet it. If they do launch an attack, however, they know that they will get two for one or a very heavy counter-attack. We must not forget that.

They are seeking now to shift the conflict into the commercial, economic and political fields, but I suggest that we should proceed very cautiously in accepting that. I also suggest that, as we have built our strength through NATO, we should consider any change in our attitude through NATO. Individually we may have different views to some extent within NATO, but I believe very strongly that the events of the past few years have amply demonstrated that we must keep NATO operating as one unit, whether it is in the field of defence or whether it is in the field of economics and associated activities. I think that our strength will depend on the extent to which we are able to do that.

NATO is not static. It can change its emphasis and its approach if the facts warrant. I would conclude by saying: First, we should be very sure that the facts warrant any change; and, second, such change should be made only through NATO.

Mr. Patterson: It was not my intention to enter the debate on the estimates of this particular department. My military experience is very limited. In fact, the only knowledge I have been able to glean in the matter was in my high school days when we took rifle drill with the old Lee Enfield rifles and were instructed in the niceties of bayonet warfare by a military sergeant-major whom most of us feared and some of us sincerely disliked. So I do not feel qualified to speak on this particular matter.

However, I should like to commend the minister for the expression of opinion to which we have just listened. Having listened to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich last night and to the hon. member for Mackenzie this morning, we appreciate of course their viewpoints, and we appreciate the splendid record of the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich; but certainly I feel we ought to be very careful in the appraisal of the situation at the present time.

With regard to the suggestion that it may be time to withdraw troops from Germany, I realize that there may be something desirable in that, but certainly we ought to take a look at the other side of the picture. It may be true that the Soviet union is changing its strategy and moving into the field of economic and political warfare, but personally I am not convinced that they have given up the idea of military aggression and expansion. If they can divert our attention, get us to lower our guard and get us to neglect our defences, I should say that is exactly what they want us to do. Certainly if there is any suggestion that we let down on the military aspect of this proposition, I would say that we ought to approach that in a very cautious manner.

In an article in this morning's Globe and Mail, I believe, Chancellor Adenauer of West Germany expressed his views regarding the possibility of the withdrawal of the NATO forces from his country. He was very much perturbed over the situation. Certainly I should like to state again that, in any thought along this angle, this matter should certainly be studied very seriously lest we succumb to the temptation to take an easier route and thereby let down in our defence system.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure that no one in this house is more qualified to speak on this subject with which we dealt last evening than the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich. Indeed, I am of those who believe that the statement he made last evening has been rather more loosely interpreted than the actual wording of his remarks based on his recent experience. Certainly there is no one in the house who will be misled by the smiles that have taken the place for the moment of the snarls of communism, but no one can lose sight of the fact that some change or detour has been made by the U.S.S.R. in recent times. The question of defence still remains pre-eminent, and as I understood the hon. member's remarks last evening in no way did he take a contrary view. Nevertheless he did suggest that in the change that has taken place in the U.S.S.R. there is a challenge to free enterprise and private enterprise everywhere in the world on the part of the U.S.S.R. in its new trade policy.

In order that the people of this country will not be misled by communism our newspapers make a commanding and important contribution to the building of public sentiment. I should have liked to hear the hon. member for Mackenzie comment on the reported speech of Mr. William Irvine, a former member of this house, who, if reported correctly, made an irresponsible speech, a speech dangerous because of its nature, a speech in which in fulsome words he warmly commended the U.S.S.R. for its high grade democracy. I hope we shall have a copy of that speech, for it is one of those things that will be used by the U.S.S.R. as a propaganda means to indicate how wonderful things are under communism, however divergent that view may be from the actual facts.

Sir, I rise for the purpose of paying a particular tribute to the foreign language press of this country. Other than the 15 or so communist papers that are published, the remainder of the 140 foreign language papers are making a wonderful contribution in their stand against communism and also in meeting the kind of propaganda to which I have just made reference. I should like to ask the minister this question. What was the total amount expended last year on advertising by the Department of National Defence? I have a question on the order paper in that regard and I should like the minister to give me an answer thereto. It is question No. 551.

I believe that the non-English and non-French press of this country, other than the communist press, deserves a fair and more reasonable share of the national advertising than it has been receiving in the past. The foreign language press has a reading public among the peoples of the various languages represented by that press and it deserves at least a reasonable and fair share of the national advertising done by the government of Canada. I do not mean by way of a subsidy or honorarium, but it would give that press the means of continuing the work it is doing to meet the infiltration among foreign language groups in which communism is continually engaged.

I should like the minister to say first of all what was the total amount spent by his department on national advertising, recruiting advertising, during the last year, or in the last two years if he has the information, and how much has been paid to the foreign language press. Personally I feel that the foreign language press, the non-communist group, and I re-emphasize that, is doing a great and valuable service to Canada and also for the preservation of the democratic way of life. Believing that, I feel that every consideration should be given not only by the Department of National Defence but by other departments of the government to preserving this press in the work it is doing, not by handouts or by assistance but simply by the allocation of a reasonable and fair share of national advertising.

Mr. Campney: I am sorry that I have not been able to answer in detail the question asked by the hon. member because it is taking a good deal of time to collect and check the information, but for the calendar year 1955 the total amount of the advertising for recruiting purposes which we placed in the press was $1,605,000 for the three services. I have not got the figure in front of me but my recollection is that the estimate—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Approximately the same the year before.

Mr. Campney: I think so, and during the fiscal year in which we are now engaged I think we reduced the total by something like $400,000. I will try to expedite the other phase of the answer in which the hon. member is interested.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like to revert to the matter of messing as far as militia camps are concerned. My information with respect to Alberta, contrary to that of the member for Vancouver South, is that where caterers are employed there have been a considerable number of complaints. The army rations are extremely good and adequate, and if there are reasonably good cooks they can prepare extremely wholesome and good meals from those rations. However, I rather doubt whether the minister's information is correct that these caterers are all issued with army rations and then go ahead and prepare the meals from them. If my information is correct, in some cases at least they receive a per diem allowance and then feed the men out of that. I think it is under those circumstances particularly that complaints and difficulties arise as far as messing at militia camps is concerned. In any event, it seems to me that where there have been complaints and difficulties with respect to feeding of men at militia camps the caterers who have been in charge where these complaints arise should not be re-employed.

I do not know upon what basis these contracts are entered into. I do not know whether or not the contract is given to them for the whole course of the camp and, no matter what kind of food they put out, they continue to have the messing contract. But if that is the case, it should be issued on the basis that if the food is not satisfactory they are finished and somebody else goes in. I wonder whether the minister can just tell us what the provisions are in that regard. As has been indicated by other members, in order to attract members of the militia to these camps, it is absolutely essential that the best possible meals that can be prepared and given to the men under camp conditions should be provided. These people are taking their holidays when they are at these camps. Certain it is that if they are not reasonably well fed they are not going to come back the next year.

Mr. Campney: I may say that I agree entirely with the hon. member for Calgary North. I am told that what I observed a few minutes ago is true, namely that we supply the rations from the army in each case to military camps and that they are the same as the regular rations. In many camps we have a catering contract. When we want a catering contract entered into we make a requisition on the Department of Defence Production who call for tenders in the usual way. Probably the per capita amount to which the hon. member has referred is the figure for service, supplying equipment and doing all the things which must be done to prepare and serve the food. In view of the observations that have been made here, the matter should be looked into. From my own experience I certainly agree that if you want men to go to camp, you must feed them well. That situation obtains in any camp, whether it be a lumber camp or any other camp where people do strenuous outdoor work. If you do not feed them well, you are going to have dissatisfaction. I shall certainly be glad to have this matter reviewed.

Mr. Harkness: There is one other question I should like to ask in this connection. If the rations are in all cases supplied to these caterers, is there any means to ensure that the rations are actually served to the people there in the camp and that this catering company does not take part of those rations off in order to feed some civilian workers for whom they are also catering? That is something which is quite possible.

Mr. Campney: I understand that in each camp there is a catering officer from our services whose job it is to see to it that just that thing does not happen.

Mr. Blackmore: Since the chairman, I think very wisely, has allowed us to revert to discussion of a former matter, and since the question of what the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich said last night has been given some consideration and perhaps has had placed upon it an interpretation which he had no intention of having placed upon it, I think it is only fitting that I draw to the attention of the house and of the people throughout the country this important statement which appeared on September 19, 1955. As others have already said, I think the great danger is that we shall begin to "take things too easy".

This is a statement by Nikita S. Khrushchev, secretary of the communist party in Russia, as reported in the New York Herald Tribune of September 19, 1955. I am quoting from a book entitled "An Idea to Win the World" by Peter Howard. The only authority I have is this book but I am quite confident that the book is correct. Here are the words:

> Russia's smiles are sincere, but this doesn't change our conviction that Communism will triumph throughout the world.
> We will win, but we will not have to go to war about it.
>
> We told Dr. Adenauer very frankly that Western Germany was going the way of capitalist decay. The way of the future is the way of the German Democratic Republic (Communist East Germany). Eventually all Germany will see the right way.
>
> They say in the West that something has changed since the Geneva conference. They say that the Soviet leaders smile, but that their actions do not match their smiles. But the smiles are sincere. They are not artificial. We wish to live in peace. But if anyone thinks that our smiles mean that we abandon the teachings of Marx and Lenin or abandon our Communist road, then they are fooling themselves. You might as well say that Easter always falls on Tuesday.
>
> We are for co-existence. But we are also for the growth of Communism. The only reason we are for co-existence is that in actual fact we are confronted with the reality of two different systems. You capitalists go your way so long as you do not see that it is the way of the blind.
> Victory for Socialism? We don't have to go to war to obtain this victory. Peaceful competition will be enough. We will see who is right. If you really think (addressing the capitalist world) that your system is not too old and rotten, if you believe that it is really possible to keep in the race, go ahead and try and compete. But the truth is on the side of our people. Our people do not depend on your love or your hate.

Now I should like to draw a matter to the attention of the people throughout the country and of those in the house who have not had this fact impressed upon them. If Khrushchev were speaking as a Russian in that speech and if he represented Russia, we might say, "Well, the Russian people will probably change their minds". But Khrushchev is not speaking as a Russian. He is speaking as a member of the communist conspiracy. There are not more than seven million or eight million of these people in Russia, I am told. However, they dominate the whole of Russia with its 200 million people, they dominate China and they will dominate every area that will come under their control.

Who are these people? They are peoples whose minds will not change. They are people who are not of our race. They are alien people. Someone asked me yesterday if I could give an idea of who they are. May I say that two years ago I clearly implied who they are. They are Turko-Mongolian Reds. There will be those who will laugh, but the laugh will be on the other side of their faces when they get a little bit more knowledge. So many people, because they do not happen to know the facts, assume that nobody else knows them. In all our dealings in Canada as a whole and in this house, let us just bear in mind the fact that we are not dealing with a people whose blood to any extent resembles ours at all but that we are dealing with a group of alien people who are definitely aiming to rule the world.

Mr. Philpott: I hope the hon. member makes it clear that he is not referring in any way to Turkey, because he knows very well that he has already given offence to Turkey in that regard.

Mr. Blackmore: I do not know that I have ever heard of the Turks calling themselves Turko-Mongolians or Turko-Mongolian Reds. Let us be realistic. The hon. member raised that matter last year. Two years ago I did not say "Turks". I said "Turko-Mongolian Reds". That is an absolutely different thing.

Mr. Philpott: As long as everybody understands that, I am content.

Mr. Blackmore: I hope everybody understands that now. I have put it just as clearly as words can make it here on the floor of the house. You find such groups as that of Chinese Turkestan. Turks are all over the place. But these are Turko-Mongolian Reds. That means, Mr. Chairman, that they are descendants of Esau. I hope that is perfectly clear. I am not going to take the occasion to show that fact from Scripture, but it is just as clear as can be, to a person who knows the Bible.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Just before we go any further, I wonder whether I might make a suggestion to the committee. We all know that item 235 is an all-embracing one and that, if we get very technical, we can say that any discussion dealing with defence is in order on item 235. However, I think it was agreed by the committee, for its own convenience, that at a certain stage we would discuss the matter item by item. I also pointed out at the time that the item itself will subsequently be referred to the committee. As found at page 6190 of Hansard I said this:

If it is generally agreed—

—and I think I had tacit consent—

—by the committee I shall call each subheading in the details, and when the discussion on that has been exhausted we shall proceed to the next. After we have gone through all the details item 235 will then be submitted to the committee.

My purpose in interjecting these remarks is that if we are dealing with a specific heading such as the army militia or the sea cadets, I think the whole committee will find it simpler if we confine our remarks to that, and then if we have any general remarks at the end, the item must still be submitted to the committee before it can be carried.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there anything further under army militia?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the situation of the militia artillery regiments, and I wonder whether the minister can tell us what equipment those regiments have at the present time? I refer, of course, to medium regiments, field regiments, light ack-ack and heavy ack-ack.

Mr. Campney: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I cannot give the hon. member the information unit by unit or class by class. I shall endeavour to get that. I can give him a general statement as to some of the equipment the militia has.

Mr. Harkness: I am referring to the guns that these regiments are supplied with and the quantity of those guns.

Mr. Campney: Well, generally speaking, I understand we have available for the militia at the present time approximately 200 field artillery guns, including 35 105-millimetre howitzers. The remainder are mostly 25-pounders, and these are gradually being replaced now by 105-millimetre guns.

As to the breakdown between regiments, I am sorry I have not that available but I shall try to get it for the hon. member. We also have a considerable number of 90-millimetre ack-ack guns, probably 150.

Mr. Harkness: What I should like to know is how many guns on the average each medium regiment has in its possession for training purposes, how many 25-pounder guns each field regiment has and how many each light ack-ack regiment has of whatever guns it has at the present time—I presume they are Bofors—and how many of those 90-millimetre heavy ack-ack guns a heavy ack-ack regiment has.

Mr. Campney: I understand the issue of those guns depends on the general officer commanding, and is generally referable to the number of people training and the amount of training done. The present scale of 25-pounder entitlement is four to a regiment in one battery locations; six per regiment in three battery locations; eight for the regiment in four battery locations; and 10 for the regiment in five battery locations.

Mr. Harkness: Then, in connection with field regiments, what is the situation so far as medium regiments are concerned.

Mr. Campney: I will have to get that for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Harkness: Has not the minister the figures in regard to the heavy ack-ack and light ack-ack regiments?

Mr. Campney: No, I have not that here but I can get it.

Mr. Harkness: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that these figures should be available when this committee meets. There should be no difficulty so far as supplying the information is concerned. One of the difficulties in carrying on the artillery training in any sort of realistic manner has been the fact that the artillery regiments have not been supplied with a sufficient amount of equipment and a sufficient number of guns, and so forth. Before the war when we were equipped with the 25-pounder and the 4·5 howitzer guns, each battery had its full complement of guns and there was no difficulty, as far as the battery was concerned, about going out to the nearest piece of vacant ground and doing the deployment and going through the general artillery procedures, in other words, training, so that in the event of mobilization for war the unit could go ahead and operate. That situation has never prevailed since the second great war as far as the artillery is concerned. A battery has been supplied with two guns, or one gun, probably, and it just could not carry out its training in any sort of reasonable, practical or realistic manner. I had hoped that this situation would be corrected. Apparently the 25-pounder is now being withdrawn and is to be replaced when they become available, from what the minister said yesterday, with 105-millimetre guns. In the meantime, I would be interested to know what the situation is if it should become necessary to mobilize any of these militia artillery regiments? Are there sufficient 25-pounder guns; are there sufficient 4·5 or 5·5 medium guns to enable those regiments, or really any number of them, to mobilize and go ahead with training at least with that equipment?

Mr. Campney: I understand that generally speaking it is felt by the officials that the current mobilization plan could be met with respect to guns if mobilization were required.

Mr. Harkness: Might I just pursue this a little further? We have shipped overseas to our NATO allies very large numbers of the 25-pounder guns which we held at the end of the second great war. How many of those 25-pounder guns do we still hold? In other words, what is our reserve of these field guns, which are the only ones we have so far as the militia is concerned?

Mr. Campney: I think the hon. member knows that we do not give out and have not given out the number of items of any particular part of current equipment. I think that has been generally accepted in the past; it has ever since I have been here.

Mr. Harkness: We have the information on the number of those guns that we had at the end of the second great war. For a considerable time now the number has been gradually reduced, and the minister apparently thinks it is a breach of security to give out the numbers that are left. I think in this committee we should be given the number of those guns that we have in order to know whether those militia artillery regiments, in the event of mobilization, could be equipped with guns or could not. I have been rather alarmed for some considerable time. As a matter of fact, I pointed out in this committee that since the second world war we have been constantly reducing the amount of our army equipment by shipping it to our NATO allies and at the same time not replacing it with what was looked upon as more up to date equipment, and this has been particularly the case in so far as artillery equipment is concerned.

The Deputy Chairman: Does that conclude discussion on army, militia? We shall proceed to the next item, Royal Canadian Army cadets.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring up a matter which I think should be brought to the minister's attention. There is in Hamilton at the Westdale collegiate a Major H. A. Inman, who may be known to the minister, who has for many years trained the cadets there in rifle shooting. He has had a remarkable amount of success with those boys, and in the last three years eight of the 12 cadets who have gone to Bisley have been trained by him. Last year some of his cadets shot on the senior Bisley team. He has had a long and notable record in training these young people to go over to the Bisley shoots. It has been suggested to me by some of the citizens of Hamilton, inasmuch as an officer goes with these cadet teams, that in considering the appointment of someone to go with the team another year the minister might very well take into consideration sending with the team this outstanding officer who has such a fine record in training these young men.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we pass on to the next heading?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Northwest highway system.

Mr. Barnett: A short time ago there was a report about a serious washout on the northwest highway caused by flooding, I understand. I wonder if the minister would give us a brief report on that situation and indicate to us perhaps in a specific manner the situation that did develop and what was done to cope with it.

Mr. Campney: I know that each year we have a series of these surprise floods and washouts. I frankly was not aware that they had started yet; usually it is a little later than this time of the year. I am unable to report on the specific case to which the hon. member referred. I understand a report is being prepared for me but it has not arrived at my desk as yet.

We have 132 bridges on the highway and since 1946 the army has been replacing them with permanent structures. We estimate that 98 bridges will require replacement within the next 20 years. Two large ones are under construction now, the Slims river bridge which is 966 feet long and the Nisutlin bridge which is 1,750 feet long. Until we get permanent bridges we are likely to have these recurring washouts.

I understand that flash floods in the area of the northwest highway are about as bad as any that occur anywhere on the continent. It is only with great difficulty that the army engineers are able to keep the highway open practically all the time but every midsummer we do have these recurring washouts. As I said, I am sorry I do not have a report on the specific instance in question.

Mr. Barnett: I take it from the minister's remarks that the washouts that are reported are not more than what are normally expected during certain seasons of the year?

Mr. Campney: Yes. A couple of years ago I think we had a greater number than for some years before or since but I have had no report that there is likely to be an unusual amount of this sort of thing this year.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Chairman, because in certain quarters I have been regarded as the parliamentary assistant to the Liberal member for the Yukon and because it is impossible for him to be in his seat at the present time, I know he would like you to know that he feels the highway is being run in a very efficient manner and he is very well satisfied with it. As a matter of fact, I am not making this statement to get in good with the minister because I will probably have a brick for him later on.

The Deputy Chairman: Does that conclude the northwest highway system?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Northwest Territories and Yukon radio system; shall we pass it?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Royal Canadian Air Force—regular and general.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I have a few questions under this heading. First of all, the minister in a passing reference the other day made the statement that active consideration of an increase in the flying pay for members of the R.C.A.F. aircrew is under consideration. I am wondering if at this time the minister could give us more information as to the nature of this increase in flying pay?

Some reference was made yesterday to the fact that the Canadian army is the highest paid army of any of the NATO forces. The strange anomaly in the military pay scheme of things has been the failure to bring flying pay into line with general post-war developments in aviation and with increases in the United States air force in particular as well as the R.A.F.

I hope that if the matter is under consideration we are thinking of the problem of our being close to the United States border. Our aircrew is serving under somewhat similar conditions and that situation is more than likely to increase as we move toward the closer co-ordination that would be necessary under the continental air defence plan for North America. Is it possible at this stage for the minister to give us a further insight into the nature of that proposed increase?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, the subject matter of the hon. member's question has been under consideration for quite some time. We have made studies of the comparable figures in the United States air force and in the British air force and have weighed and considered factors which obtain in our own air force. We have practically completed the submission to the treasury board in respect of this matter. I do not want to be held in contempt by the treasury board which still has to deal with the matter by disclosing our proposed figures and also because of the fact that before the rates come into effect there may be changes, but I can assure the hon. member we are approaching the point of action after a long and intensive study in which all these factors have been very carefully weighed.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I have a related question here. I notice that on page 19 of the white paper in the last paragraph, paragraph 61, reference is made to the problem of retaining in the services certain categories of personnel and a hint is given that action is being taken to rectify this problem.

I wonder if the minister has under active consideration some means which would reduce the wastage in the services especially of professional men. My understanding is that qualified engineers in particular do not feel their financial situation is in any way comparable to their opposite numbers in civil life. This situation, of course, is aggravated by the fact owing to industrial development and other things there is a scramble in industry for qualified engineers and this automatically creates a very great problem for the services in retaining qualified men especially in this branch.

I would like to think that some definite step is being taken to meet this problem, even perhaps employing engineers as civilians with special rates of pay or else by introducing a scheme of professional pay which would give them a rate somewhat comparable to their opposite numbers in civil life.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could give some consideration to a grievance I have at Gimli in connection with the maintenance crew. They put in 44 hours a week. They work 44 hours or six days and then they have two days off. That is, they work 44 hours or they work 6 days and then get two days off. If they have to work in any other part of the service they get holidays off. When this man works his 6 days, if Dominion day comes in that week it is not recognized, while another employer who has to work will get time and one-half.

The whole thing is quite complicated and I do not want to take up the time of the committee in explaining it, but if any of the minister's officials will get in touch with me I will be only too glad to give them details and perhaps I can do a more effective job that way than I can here in committee.

Mr. Campney: I shall be very glad to arrange for suitable officials to meet the hon. member, or I shall meet him myself. I am always glad to see him. We will see if we can get to the root of his trouble and determine what can be done about it.

Mr. Barnett: I have one or two questions I would like to ask the minister in respect to the rates that are paid to civilian employees. There was some discussion under the general item as to rates paid to prevailing rate employees and whether they are in line with those currently being paid in various areas, but I thought I would defer my questions until we got to the air force because that happens to be the branch of the service with which I have had the most contact.

What is the principle that is followed to decide whether people in certain occupations shall be considered as classified employees or as prevailing rate employees? For instance, diesel foremen, diesel mechanics and diesel operators are in the prevailing rate category while stationary engineers and telephone operators are in the classified category. I would point out to the minister that there seems to be a monotonous regularity in the appearance of advertisements for stationary engineers and watchmen and caretakers in the stations on the westerly and northerly parts of Vancouver island. I do not know just how many of these advertisements have appeared in the course of the last month or so, but the reason for this may be that these people are in the classified category whereas the rates they would receive if they were in the prevailing rate category might be higher. While the government has been tardy at times in bringing up the prevailing rates to meet those paid in the area, it might be that the rates are still better than those paid to classified employees doing the same work. I should like to know how this line of demarcation is arrived at.

Mr. Campney: As I understand the position on the civilian side, the prevailing rate scale is usually easy to determine. We try to keep up with the rates paid generally in the area. But there are certain people who may be doing the same work—this is a bit confusing—and yet their positions are handled through the civil service as permanent positions in the classified category.

I must confess that there have been a number of occasions when I have found it difficult to determine the line where one begins and the other leaves off. In connection with the prevailing rate category, the Department of Labour makes surveys of different areas and advises us what we should pay in those areas. If we are paying that rate, that is the end of it; if we are not paying that rate, we bring it up to the rate recommended. It may be that some of the movement of tradesmen to which the hon. member has referred is due to the fact that possibly we are a little behind the going rates in certain areas. They are always fluctuating and while we do not try to lead the parade, we do try to catch up and eventually we do.

Mr. Barnett: Am I correct in assuming that as far as classified positions are concerned the same rate is applicable in all points in Canada?

Mr. Campney: That is correct.

Mr. Barnett: In the case of stationary engineers, the general rate paid in British Columbia might be a little higher than that paid in other parts of Canada and that might be one reason why there seems to be a recurring problem in connection with the employment of stationary engineers. I am using that as a concrete example as they seem to be always looking for this type of employee.

Mr. Campney: One reason why we are looking for stationary engineers is that we have been doing a great deal of construction work. Classified positions are supposed to pay the same salary anywhere in Canada but probably the rates are lower in some localities. There is another factor which confuses the issue further and that is still the number of grades in each classified position. Then there are supervisors who include in their work work of other categories as well. The schedules are very complicated and I certainly do not pretend to be an authority on them.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Philpott: I see the hon. member for Prince Albert in his seat. I have some remarks that may affect him, and I want to make them while he is still in the house.

[Mr. Campney.]

I think it was a great privilege for those of us who were on the trip last year overseas to the NATO parliamentary conference to be able to go on afterwards to our troops in Germany and particularly to visit our air division in southern France and southern Germany. I confess that just about this time last year I played hookey and neglected my duties here for about three weeks before that conference to travel in different parts of Europe, and I was very fortunate to be in western Europe at the time of the biggest sham battle, as we used to call them when I was younger, in the history of the world. That is the one that they call "Carte Blanche", in which the whole action was fought under as nearly realistic warlike conditions as it was possible to make them. It began with a simulated attack from east of the iron curtain, and the minute it began everything went into action right across the continent of Europe from Norway to the Mediterranean and the Black sea. The fighting was all carried out under service conditions.

As the hon. members for Calgary North and Prince Albert will remember, when we were privileged to visit our forces in Germany and southern France we had the great privilege of being briefed by the commanders of our first Canadian air division. I also had the great privilege of taking a good deal of time off and studying the actual reports of this carte blanche manoeuvre, and I think it was one of the most instructive things of modern times. I shall not trespass on the good will of the house today except to say that, from the official reports published, if it had been a real war and not just a pretending war, at the end of 48 hours no military formation of any kind by land, sea and air would have been able to carry on as an organized military entity.

But the part that particularly impressed me, as a Canadian M.P. visiting our first Canadian air division, apart from the natural attraction of having that wonderful visit with those very wonderful men, was to find the actual results of what took place in that carte blanche exercise. The actual statistics show that, whereas the Canadian air division competed with all other allied air divisions on a basis of equality, man for man and plane for plane our R.C.A.F. men and our R.C.A.F. units did 20 per cent better than any other NATO unit. When we asked the commanders and the staff officers responsible for that really wonderful performance what the reason was, they said with characteristic modesty that they thought that the Canadian was just as good as anybody else fighting on either side of that pretended battle line but they thought that the Canadian planes were a little better because they had found that the Orenda engines stood up better under actual combat conditions and were so much easier to service that our men were able to get back in the air for 20 per cent more sorties than similar units of any other allied country.

As I see my old friend the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich there, I might say that I raised somewhat the same point as he raised yesterday of the possible future withdrawal from Europe of some of the forces that we had there.

Mr. Pearkes: May I rise on a question of privilege? I never mentioned withdrawal, and you will not find that word once in the Hansard report of my speech.

Mr. Philpott: Perhaps I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. Perhaps I should say progressive reduction of the number of forces. In any event, whatever the word was or whatever the idea was, I remember discussing the same idea with one of the people who for my money is one of the finest military leaders in the whole world today, and that is General Norstad. I have met a great many generals, admirals, vice-admirals, air vice-marshals and what not, but I have never met any single individual that gave me a greater feeling of confidence than that NATO commander that we have right now.

I might say that I was tentatively suggesting to General Norstad that perhaps the time might come when we Canadians would have to move some of our people home and station them up in northern Canada so that the Americans would not have to move in there. I did not find any enthusiasm on the part of General Norstad to that idea. He wants the Canadians right where they are today for many reasons but above all for reasons of morale.

So I say, without trespassing any more on the time of the house on that particular point, I think that every Canadian who visits our actual fighting forces overseas will come to exactly the same conclusion as did the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, that we are extremely well represented, indeed that we are getting excellent value for our money and that we never had a finer fighting force outside Canada to represent Canada than we have at this particular moment.

As the hon. member for Prince Albert is still here and as we are discussing the first item on the air force, I may say that a very live question in Canada these days is the disposal of surplus aircraft. Among other things we have the proposal to turn over to Western Germany a certain number of aircraft we are now using, and from time to time in this house this year we have had the question of whether or not we ought to dispose of surplus aircraft to the state of Israel.

I must confess that, this morning and on recent days when the hon. member for Prince Albert rose and in tones of righteous indignation put the government on the spot for not more quickly making up its mind whether or not to sell these aircraft to Israel, I could hardly believe my own ears. I remember very well on January 31 when that very same gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert, in tones of even more fervent and righteous indignation moved the following resolution, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition:

> In view of the present critical situation in the Middle East, this house expresses its strong disapproval of the government's policy of authorizing the shipment of munitions of war to countries in that area not within the NATO alliance; and also condemns the government for the lack of candour with which the matter has been dealt with in this house.

I have seen some very clever military manoeuvres in my time. I have seen some very good generals in action, including the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, who knew how to throw up a good smokescreen when he had to retreat, but I have never seen a cleverer smokescreen thrown up than by the hon. member for Prince Albert in trying to disguise the back somersault that the Conservative party is trying to accomplish with this business of aircraft for Israel.

I will say that my hon. friend from Vancouver East cannot in any way be criticized for this, because we all know he was absent from the house when this matter was discussed. I have been looking up the names of the people who voted for this absolute embargo on the selling of any planes to Israel, and among others who voted for that is the same gentleman who is now rising and in stentorian tones criticizing the government for being so slow. The following names are shown as voting for that:

> Aitken (Miss), Argue, Barnett, Bell, Bennett (Miss), Blair, Brooks, Bryce, Bryson, Cameron (Nanaimo), Cardiff, Castleden, Charlton, Churchill, Coldwell, Diefenbaker.

—and so on down the line.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You will notice that the resolution had to do with the complete lack of candour on the part of the government.

Mr. Philpott: If you look at the list of members in this particular vote you will find a very significant thing. The astute old member for Vancouver-Kingsway voted on the C.C.F. subamendment just previously, in favour of the C.C.F. He rose and hurried from the house before he had to vote on this Conservative amendment moved by the hon.

member for Prince Albert, which would have had the effect of depriving Israel of the right to defend herself in any possible war with the Arab states.

I happen to know a little about this remarkable conversion of the hon. member for Prince Albert. During my Easter holiday I, like himself, was on a sort of fireman's holiday, and both he and I were invited to make speeches in Edmonton during that Easter recess. It so happened that by accident he made his speech one day before I got there. So, when I got to Edmonton on my way back to Ottawa from Vancouver, what did I read? I read that the same hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert, who had moved this very resolution in the house for an absolute embargo on the shipment of war planes to Israel, had, like Saul on the road to Damascus, been stricken by a great light when he got to Edmonton. When he got there he said that it might be a good idea if we supplied all sorts of planes to Israel so that they could have the means to defend themselves.

All I should like to point out is that what the hon. member for Prince Albert saw in the Easter recess we on this side of the house saw on the 31st of January and the first of February when he was trying to get an embargo imposed. Therefore my advice, for what it is worth, is that the government of Canada should no longer defer too much to the objections from the opposition and should pay no attention to the strong protestations from the Conservative opposition or from the majority but not all of the C.C.F. but should, without further delay and without waiting for the decision of any other country, do the very opposite of what the hon. member for Prince Albert said should be done, namely, sell Israel enough planes to make sure that she can protect herself against any possible attack.

Mr. Enfield: Mr. Chairman, before we leave this item, I have one or two questions of a rather simple nature with regard to the air force, in which I am particularly interested. They are prompted by the statement of policy on page 3 of the white paper where it says that the defence of this continent rests with strong strategic bomber forces which can go into action immediately under any circumstances. With regard to strategic bomber forces, I should like it confirmed that our role is confined almost wholly to the provision of early warning of enemy attack through our participation and co-operation in the establishment of radar installations. In the last war we were able to mount quite a sizeable bomber force. My particular interest arises because I took part personally in that effort, and it always struck me that the training of the personnel to man heavy aircraft is certainly a highly technical matter requiring very intensive training indeed.

Despite the fact that policy, as I have stated, seems to have set a limit on our role in the strategic bomber effort, I would ask whether we have any training program to familiarize pilots and other aircrew members with heavy aircraft such as the four-engine types that are commonly in use. I realize in asking that question that it may not be practical from our point of view to have a large force of such machines in use but at the same time I would also ask whether, if such is not the practice, we have a nucleus of highly trained people who are able to familiarize themselves with and keep up to date with advanced flying techniques in heavy aircraft, advanced techniques in navigation, which of course change constantly, and with advanced aircrew training techniques.

It seems to me that the provision of at least a nucleus of such people might be very beneficial indeed. I realize that we are concentrating our efforts on radar detection and, of course, fighter interception and the training of fighter pilots for the lighter aircraft, but I do not think this other branch of flying training should be completely ignored. I also raise this question because in paragraph 86 of the white paper we find that so far as training of pilots is concerned all of our training seems to be concentrated on aircraft such as the T-33 jet trainer, the Chipmunk, the Harvard, single engine aircraft. It seems to me that with some effort, perhaps not too great an effort or with too great an expenditure, we could provide some means to train a certain number of aircrew in other fields of activity.

I would be pleased if the minister would say whether he thinks such a program would be worth while, whether he believes it is necessary to have such a nucleus of trained men and whether, as a matter of fact, we do have any such training activity.

Mr. Campney: In reply to the hon. member for York-Scarborough I would say that as far as the heavy four-engine planes are concerned we have no operational planes in that category except, of course, in transport command and in maritime reconnaissance command. We do train and develop pilots to supply our needs in those two commands. I would also point out that we are part of a whole set-up comprising NATO in which each nation has its own particular part to play and we are not called upon to provide either strategic bombers or bomber fleets of four engine planes. Our role, as the hon. member has inferred, to the extent that we participate is in the fighter field, other than the two commands I have mentioned. Therefore we have no bomber command pilot training unit or the nucleus of one.

The hon. member asked, possibly anticipating that answer, whether it would not be desirable to have some small group taking training in that direction who would also be able to train other personnel. The answer to that is that any training scheme for any type of plane is an expensive business and we could not afford to have a training unit or the nucleus of a training unit for bomber planes when we do not have bomber planes. It would just be too expensive a luxury.

I think it is better that we conform to the NATO idea and try to achieve the very best results we can in the fields where we are expected to operate. The last thing I would say regarding heavy bombers is that we do not, of course, have any thermonuclear weapons in this country, and that is the type of weapon for which the modern, heavy, four-engine bombers are designed.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to ask the minister a question or two concerning a phase of air training in which it is my impression there has been some improvement. I refer to the fact that a year ago we were greatly disturbed over the large number of crashes that had taken place in connection with the training program, particularly crashes of T-33's. As I say, it is my impression, although I have no figures to support it, that the number of crashes this past year has not been anything like what it was the year before. I am sure we all take the position that any crash, even one, in which there is loss of life is very serious and most regrettable.

I wonder whether the minister has any comparable figures to tell us how many training crashes there were and what loss of life there was in the year preceding the last discussion of the estimates and how many crashes there have been in the last year up to the present time. In that connection I am interested in what is said in paragraphs 86 and 87 of this year's white paper. Perhaps the best way to indicate the part in which I am interested is to read a few sentences from these paragraphs. Paragraph 86 reads in part as follows:

> 86. As a result of the continuing appraisal of training methods required to keep pace with modern developments in modern aviation, the R.C.A.F. altered the pilot training program in 1955 to provide all pilots with initial jet training prior to reaching wings standard. Students now receive basic flying training on Chipmunk and Harvard piston-engined aircraft and advanced flying training on Silver Star (T-33) jet-engined aircraft before being awarded pilot wings.

Then in the next paragraph there is this sentence:

> 87. Chipmunk aircraft were introduced at one basic flying training school as a pre-Harvard trainer to improve the sequence of training and to help reduce the number of student failures.

In addition to the questions I put to the minister and which he might answer by the giving of figures if he has them, I should like to ask whether it is a fair assumption to draw from paragraphs 86 and 87 that changes in the training program were made in order to try to cut down the number of student failures, as they are called or regrettably, as I think it might be referred to, the loss of life. He could also say whether any other reasons were found for the large number of crashes, whether they were mechanical reasons or whatever they may be. This is a matter that certainly was of great concern to us a year ago when more crashes were taking place. It is still of concern when any crashes are taking place. I am sure that any comments the minister might make would be listened to with interest.

Mr. Campney: I have not the figures of the number of crashes but probably this figure will convey the information required. I know that the accident rate for T-33's has fallen about 25 per cent in the last year.

May I now deal with the question of the change in procedure and the utilization of the Chipmunk, and the reference which was made by the hon. member to the paragraphs in the white paper. This change in training routine has nothing to do with the accident rate. As a matter of fact it was introduced for one principal purpose and so far it has proved to be quite successful. It was introduced because, by utilizing the Chipmunk in the early stages the unsatisfactory type—that is the person who for some reason gives evidence in his training that he is not going to be able to make the grade as a jet pilot—can be eliminated much more quickly and with much more economy by the system now followed than by the old system. It is therefore a method of early determination of the type of people who will likely get to the stage where they can fly jets.

As to what has caused the diminution in the accident rate, the air force have been able to find no specific cause. It was not structural defect nor has it been narrowed down to any particular cause. After the accident rate became fairly high a year ago, as the hon. member has pointed out, an intense study was conducted of every phase of jet training with the T-33. An exhaustive study was made because the officials thought they might find some specific cause, but they were unsuccessful in that. No specific cause was found. All the training technique was tightened up. Just what the factor was which caused the great improvement in results, nobody knows. But it is not due to the change of set-up in training.

Mr. Knowles: It looks as though the attempt to tighten up the training program has had some bearing on the reduction of the accident rate.

Mr. Campney: We think so; yes. Then besides that, I suppose I should say this. As time has gone on, a great deal more experience has been gained with the jet trainer, the T-33, and more has been learned about it. That knowledge has been put to good use in the method and procedures adopted.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask whether investigation as to the possible causes of these accidents is still being carried on.

Mr. Campney: Yes. We now carry on an intensive examination in respect of every accident, not only of the plane but of the circumstances, where the pilot has been killed in the accident. Every factor having to do with the flight of jets is examined into.

Mr. Harkness: I have one or two questions to ask on this same subject but on a somewhat different line. I wonder whether the minister could tell us how many crashes there were of CF-100 planes during this past year as compared with the number the year before? What has been the loss rate with respect to CF-100's? I refer to the loss of planes.

Mr. Campney: Again, I have not the actual figures with respect to crashes. However, I can give the improvement in the accident rate with respect to the CF-100, comparing the two years. It is about one third better this year than it was last year. The improvement is even greater than with the T-33.

Mr. Harkness: Has the minister not any figures to show the number of CF-100's lost through crashes this past year? That figure must be there.

Mr. Campney: No, Mr. Chairman; we have not the figure. We have other figures but we have not that particular set. I have the actual number of crashes.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder whether the minister would get that information and give it to the committee before consideration of the estimates is completed.

Mr. Campney: I will try to do so.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear from the minister that the plan to return to the three-stage training for pilots is at last being implemented. I was one of those who thought the attempt to streamline training and to have pilots moved directly from Harvards to the more advanced type was false economy. Now that we are moving back to the elementary trainer, I think I would agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that it would serve the purpose of improving the grasp of elementary flying principles on a type of aircraft much less difficult to handle than is the T-33 jet. I was also pleased to hear the minister, in reply to the hon. member for York-Scarborough, emphasize the fact that Canada's important role in the NATO scheme of things and in continental defence is the provision of air defence squadrons. I agree with him that it would be almost impossible financially for us to participate in any worth-while way in the costly program of providing bombers for the strategic air command. But on this matter of air defence and fighter defence, it would appear that the CF-100 is going to bear the brunt of defence by the R.C.A.F. in the next three years, namely 1957, 1958 and 1959, or until such time as the CF-105 comes off the assembly lines.

We are hoping to have—at least information suggests that we might have—a prototype off the assembly line next year, and I imagine it will take a year or so to get the supersonic CF-105 into operation. But coming back to the CF-100, some statements were made in certain hearings in the United States of a rather critical nature, and I should like to have the minister's reassurance on this matter. For example, General Partridge, appearing before the subcommittee of the senate examining air force matters on April 30 and May 1 of this year, in part III, page 248 of the evidence, said this:

He said of the R.C.A.F.'s CF-100 jet interceptor, Canada's main defence weapon:

And this is a direct quotation:

"It is very good for their (Canadian) purposes in that it has long range. The only difficulty is that the aircraft is of postwar design and it is quite slow. It is as slow as the aircraft which we have in our inventory at the present time".

Now, I noted that attempts have been made to increase the operational capacity of the CF-100, and we are now into the Mark V, the CF-100 with extended wing tips. I am wondering whether there are any plans on hand further to modify the CF-100 to cope especially with the problems of speed, increase of speed, and the problems of increased altitude?

As a result of information that has come recently out of the Soviet, particularly since the visit of General Twining to the air show, it is now revealed that the new bomber types of the Russian air force are capable of much higher altitude than is our present CF-100.

I have heard rumours that there is to be a Mark VI version of the CF-100, and that they hope to attain increased altitude by adding small jet motors to the wing tips and also to increase the speed sufficiently to meet the additional challenge of any bomber threat from the U.S.S.R. Since it appears it will be three years before the CF-105 is operational, it seems to me that these modifications would be rather important. Can the minister give us any additional information on that score?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, the CF-100 is and has been under continuing development all its life and we have taken a number of steps year by year, and they are continuing, to give it more height and more speed. We do not think we have reached the limit of those steps yet, and the aircraft is constantly improving. When General Partridge said it was quite slow, I think that is a term that is relative to a lot of other things he had been saying. Quite slow in relation to what? Of course, it will be slow in relation to the prototypes of bombers that are presently beginning to be manufactured in Russia; it is slow in relation to the prototype of new fighters that are not yet operational. But, generally speaking, we feel that the CF-100 is still operational and very useful in every sense at the present time. I do not care to go into details, but we have done a good deal of development which has greatly enhanced its possibilities both in height and in speed and these developments are continuing.

Mr. Dinsdale: Can the minister say whether a Mark VI version is contemplated?

Mr. Campney: Well, I do not know whether we should call it a Mark VI, or whether it should be designated as a Mark VI, because, "Mark" on an areoplane, as the hon. member knows, means quite a major revision of the plane. We are turning out planes, and all the planes as they are being turned out are incorporating the new developments that are taking place. Whether we should call it a Mark VI or not is open to question.

Mr. Dinsdale: It appears that the report I read still has to remain in the rumour stage but I think if it is contemplated that small jet engines be added to the wing tips it would be a change sufficient to qualify it for a further extension of the Mark. But I shall be satisfied with the reply.

I want to carry this discussion just a step farther. Yesterday the minister made reference to the guided missile program, and he was of the opinion that prospects of the international ballistic guided missile, I think the official title is, are so remote that it is still in the realm of fantasy.

Mr. Campney: No, that goes a good deal farther than what I said.

Mr. Dinsdale: Well, the development is so remote that we have not given much attention to the problem from the Canadian standpoint. A week or so ago we were discussing this same question on the estimates of defence production and at that time the minister suggested that I had been reading too many detective novels, Buck Rogers stories. The comment of the Minister of National Defence yesterday and the Minister of Defence Production a week or so ago suggests that Canada has not given too much attention to this problem. I quoted at that time some rather pertinent information from the Alsop brothers on this score appearing in the press, which suggests that the advent of this formidable weapon is not as far away as we might be led to believe. I think it was the Globe and Mail which just a few days ago headlined a story that the Americans were in a position to launch the equivalent of the intercontinental ballistic missile from ships at a range of some 1,500 miles. Now, a new story on General Twining's visit to Moscow is very interesting. He was exchanging information with Khrushchev, I think it was, and the Russian military authorities. In a fit of good humour, so the report says:

> Mr. Khrushchev slapped his knee and roared, "Well, we want to see yours".

Twining had been asking to have further access to Russian air power and Mr. Khrushchev said:

> Well, we want to see yours. Show us your planes and we'll show you our ballistic weapons.

This was as recent as June. The United States general replied:

> You can read all about ours in our journals.

That is quite true. As I say, we go to the American journals if we want to get information as to what is happening in Canada, even.

Mr. Campney: Do not rely too much on it.

Mr. Dinsdale: I continue:

> "That's old stuff", the communist boss retorted. "We can show you old stuff, too. The question is who has the better missiles, you or we . . . but we won't show them to you today. Today is too early. We'll do it at some future date. Meanwhile, you keep yours and we'll keep ours. We'll show you what competition is".

Now, that suggests that there is considerable rapid development in this field to which, according to the statement of two ministers of the crown, Canada has not yet paid too much attention up to the present time. Aviation Week magazine for June 18, 1956, a United States publication, contains the following information:

The United States is ahead on short range defensive missiles while the U.S.S.R. is ahead on long range ballistic missiles.

From all the evidence I have been able to glean through diligent reading and research it would appear that the advent of a formidable intercontinental weapon is not as far away as we in Canada expect at the moment.

We have given some attention to missiles and it would seem that back in 1950 Canada was thinking very seriously of this next stage in weapon development because in that year we launched our "Velvet Glove" program. That program was wound up last year at a cost of some $24 million according to the statement of the minister. It has since been scrapped in favour of the use of what would appear to be a more effective air to air guided missile, the United States "Sparrow".

The expenditure of the $24 million has been justified by the fact that it has provided us with approximately 400 people, research scientists and so forth, who have acquired valuable experience working on this important type of missile. However, I feel that an expenditure of the sum of $24 million, which is quite a substantial amount, had a much more serious purpose when the scheme was first launched than merely providing training for Canadian scientists. I suspect there has been some discussion in defence circles concerning the threat of the guided missile era of warfare and the steps that Canada will take to offset that threat.

I do not know to what extent I can expect the minister to comment on these remarks but I do hope greater interest is being taken in this subject than that indicated in his very general reference to events that are still a long way off in the future. Certainly the fact that we have invested $24 million in a project which eventually had to be scrapped indicates to me that quite serious thought is being given to this next stage in weapon development. I wonder if the minister could make some comments on these observations.

Mr. MacLean: I just wanted to make a remark on the same subject, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the interpretation of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris of the minister's remarks might have been somewhat exaggerated but nevertheless I think the minister's estimate of the time before which guided missiles or short range ballistic missiles may come into use may be somewhat longer than the estimate given especially by authorities in the United States.

I have here a report of the evidence given before the United States Senate subcommittee on the armed forces and the following appears:

The air force estimate of the guided missile was given by Major Robert P. Lukeman, of the war plans branch, strategic air command. Present Russian strength in jets and intercontinental bombers, he said, would be enhanced by "the two new conditions of war starting in 1958,—

That is just two years from now.

—the intercontinental ballistic missile, and the intermediate range ballistic missile . . . I do feel that they do inject one aspect into aerial warfare that is new.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to leave the impression that we are not interested in the development of the intercontinental guided ballistic missile. Everyone who has anything to do with defence or with matters pertaining to that department in any country and all the civilians in those countries in fact must indeed be interested because it is a development of great moment.

I think the observation I made the other day was that from such information as I have been able to obtain I did not think operational intercontinental guided ballistic missiles would be available for quite some years.

I think one must keep quite a difference in one's mind between the prototype of an individual missile and an operational missile because, as the hon. member knows, there is a real difference in time lag between the two. I am told that the problems attending the long range guided missiles are in no way solved as yet. It takes a long time to develop a guided missile. I think the Nike was something like 10 or 12 years in development.

All I was wishing to emphasize was that I thought that it would be quite some years before operational intercontinental guided ballistic missiles would be available in operational quantity. I do not want to get into a technical discussion and I do not think I would be competent to do so in any event, but I understand that one of the greatest problems occurs when the missile comes down from above the atmosphere into the atmosphere. These are problems that are proving very difficult to solve.

I would also like to point out to my hon. friend that we do not regard the "Velvet Glove" as being either a dead loss or as being wound up. What I intimated the other day was that the "Velvet Glove" was the initial missile on which we have developed several hundred technical people and two or three plants which now have the know how and are in position, or will be, to commence the immediate manufacture of the "Sparrow" which we have adopted for the present. Therefore it cannot be regarded as a dead loss. The fact is that when we reach the stage where we need an air to air guided missile we would not have been fulfilling our duty unless at that time—not several years ago but at that time—we had looked over the field and selected the one we thought would be the most useful as of then.

I think the experience we have had with the "Velvet Glove" is going to shorten the time element in providing the guided missile here in Canada which time otherwise would have been taken up with the development of a new missile.

The sum of $24 million represents a lot of money but I might point out to my hon. friend that the guided missile field is a very expensive field in which to operate either experimentally or operationally. The costs are very great indeed. Relatively, therefore, the sum he has mentioned in relation to the field is not as great as it might seem. We do not feel that the money spent on "Velvet Glove" has been wasted. Indeed, we feel we are now on the way to providing a missile for our planes that will be the equal of any in this field.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister if he is continuing with this research leading toward the development of guided missiles?

Mr. Campney: We are diverting to the "Sparrow" the work which was being carried on on the "Velvet Glove". I mention again what I said yesterday, that the Cold Lake range which we have developed and which was used in connection with the "Velvet Glove" will be used in connection with our experiments on the use of the "Sparrow". The two phases will proceed together. I think we have a pretty fair set-up to begin making air-to-air guided missiles and training our service people in their use.

Mr. Churchill: That would be to carry on with the "Sparrow" already designed by the United States?

Mr. Campney: That is right.

Mr. Churchill: The United States is considerably in advance of us in the development of guided missiles and it would perhaps seem wiser for us to adopt a missile which they have produced than to attempt to design our own. It seems to me that that was the weakness in the "Velvet Glove" program. I have another press dispatch from Washington which I think is quite reliable which appeared in the Globe and Mail of July 16. Referring to a guided missile having a range of 500 miles and which is apparently in use in the United States, it says:

> They said 10 ships now are equipped to launch the 500-mile Regulus missile with atomic or hydrogen warhead. They said a longer range Regulus with a speed equal to or faster than sound has already been flight-tested.

The article states that they are going ahead with the development of the 1500-mile Jupiter. They are so far ahead of us in the design of these missiles that we cannot do more than accept their design.

Mr. Dinsdale: The minister's remarks would indicate that there is rather close co-ordination between the Canadian and United States efforts on this score. I was unable to obtain from the reading room the particular copy of Collier's but it contains an article by General Quesada, the retired leader of the ninth army air force during world war II. He indicates that there is a lack of co-ordination among the United States forces in connection with their guided missile program and points out the wasteful expenditures which have been made by the army, navy and air force through pursuing their own respective courses in the development of their own distinctive air-to-air guided missiles. I was wondering when there is that lack of co-ordination in the United States whether it has been confirmed that Canada will be permitted to manufacture the "Sparrow" under licence.

Mr. Campney: The intention is to manufacture one of the Sparrows under licence from the United States.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is that confirmed?

Mr. Campney: It is confirmed and my colleague tells me the licences have been obtained.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have some reassurance from the minister in connection with the findings reported to have been made by a United States Senate subcommittee as follows:

> The D.E.W.-line radar chain across the Canadian arctic is ineffective as at present planned; by the time it is adequate it will be obsolescent, and a few years later it will be useless.

I should like to think that the D.E.W. line will be useful for some years to come regardless of development, and that through modification it might be used for the direction of ground-to-air guided missiles or something of that sort. I should like some reassurance on this matter.

Mr. Campney: I think perhaps I should refrain from getting into the area of assurances and reassurances. We hope and anticipate that the radar warning system which has been set up will be effective, not only immediately but for a considerable time to come and that depending upon what developments take place in that field that it will be, subject to adaptation, in the future. But I am not bold enough to look into the future and certainly under the responsibility of my present position I cannot give assurances. I do not know the answers to many of the questions in this field which we are now discussing, and sometimes I think neither do some of the columnists who write such certain and definitive statements.

From such knowledge as I have, and it is not complete by any means—I prefer to take the advice of scientists and people who really have an appreciation of these things—I do not think I can go further than that. I do not want to be unfair to those who write these articles to which I have referred, but conjecture and speculation seem to be rampant. I do not suppose we can help that and probably we should not, but I do not think we should take as gospel truth all these things that are being printed or even that are stated before senate committees of the United States.

Mr. MacLean: In the details I find the item covering construction of buildings is increased from roughly $69 million to $99 million and I should like the minister to give an explanation of this large increase. Perhaps he could also indicate what progress is being made in the program of building permanent hangars in the various stations across the country of the cantilever, arch or any other type. I think this is of vital importance although such construction is extremely expensive. Perhaps the minister could indicate the cost of a typical cantilever type hangar.

Mr. Campney: Practically the whole of the increase in the construction of buildings and works is attributable to expenditures on the mid-Canada line, which last year were something in excess of $16 million and this year are estimated at something over $45 million. The cost of a cantilever hangar is close to $6 million. A number have been completed and hangar construction is progressing and continuing. I do not know at what percentage point we are in the whole program at the moment, but I should think we are over the top on the gross expenditure each year.

Mr. MacLean: I notice that in the item for procurement of aircraft there is a decrease of almost $100 million. Perhaps the minister could explain that. While he is getting the figures, I have a few related questions. I should like to know whether the maritime squadrons are fully re-equipped with Neptune aircraft and, if not, when is it expected they will be? When is it estimated the first Britannias will be available to the maritime command?

Mr. Campney: Perhaps I might answer the two last questions first. The re-equipping of the maritime squadrons with Neptunes is complete. It is expected that the first plane based on the Britannia will come off the production lines at about the end of next year. The major portion of the decrease in the item is in the fighter-interceptor aircraft category. Sabre production will be continued in 1956-57, but at a reduced rate from that of the previous year, as the foreseeable needs for this aircraft begin to be fulfilled. The production rate of the CF-100 will be maintained at about the present level, which has just been reduced, and will be somewhat below, of course, the program originally planned. The stretch-out of the CF-100 program is designed to maintain production of these aircraft at an economic level which will keep pace with what we hope will be the eventual production of the CF-105. It is the readjustment of these manufacturing processes that accounts for the reduction.

Mr. MacLean: Could the minister give some indication as to when it is expected the modifications will be completed on the two Comet aircraft owned by the air force that have been flown overseas for modification, and what is the estimated cost of these modifications that will make the Comets serviceable?

Mr. Campney: We expect that the Comets will be reconstructed and back in service in slightly over a year. I think one is now in England and the other one left for there this week. The cost of reconstruction is estimated at about $400,000 each.

Mr. MacLean: I have one other question regarding the supply of aircraft. My understanding is that four squadrons in Europe have been re-equipped with the CF-100. I believe I am correct in thinking that one squadron with each wing will be a CF-100 squadron. I should like to know whether it is tactical considerations that dictated this change and, if so, will the CF-100 be the permanent equipment for these long-range squadrons, if I might call them that, in each wing, or is it expected that they will be replaced by some other type of aircraft manufactured perhaps in some other country?

Mr. Campney: There are four squadrons of the air wing that will be equipped. They are not equipped now, but they will be equipped with CF-100's. It is expected that one of them will be equipped this year and three next year, and it is intended that one will be attached to each wing, superseding a Sabre jet squadron in that wing. The reason for the introduction of the CF-100 into the air wing is the request by the military authorities of NATO.

Mr. Thomas: On page 337 there is an item for construction of buildings and works, $99 million. I wonder whether the minister could give us a breakdown by provinces of those expenditures.

Mr. Campney: I have the totals only:

Alberta	$ 5,981,000
British Columbia	2,314,000
Manitoba	3,800,000
Newfoundland and Labrador	3,036,000
New Brunswick	4,303,000
Nova Scotia	2,043,000
Prince Edward Island	1,177,000
Ontario	9,279,000
Quebec	11,921,000
Saskatchewan	1,463,000
Yukon	1,846,000
Europe	2,837,000

The total is approximately $50 million.

Mr. Thomas: I might point out to the minister that the item is for $99 million, which leaves a discrepancy of over $40 million.

Mr. Campney: There is also $45 million for the mid-Canada line. I think that makes up the difference. The remainder, to bring the two figures together, is for rehabilitation and running maintenance. The figures I gave the hon. member are for new construction, totalling $50 million.

Mr. Thomas: Underneath that there is an item for repairs and upkeep of buildings and works, including land, of $11,900,000.

Mr. Campney: That is right; there is a vote for maintenance. The smaller items which I said should have gone into the other vote are in this vote. The maintenance items are in this vote.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, there are three questions about which I should like to have a further explanation by the minister. The first has to do with the mid-Canada line. In the white paper at page 5 we find this reference to that line:

> Construction of the mid-Canada line under Canadian direction and of the D.E.W. line under United States direction is proceeding according to schedule. Arrangements are now being worked out for civilian personnel to undertake the bulk of the maintenance and manning for both lines. The costs for building and manning the mid-Canada line are being met by Canada; the R.C.A.F. will be responsible for the operational aspects of the line.

Then on page 41 there is a further explanation reading as follows:

> Construction of the mid-Canada supplementary warning line in the vicinity of the 55th parallel of latitude constitutes one of the most challenging and complex projects ever undertaken for the armed forces as an all-Canadian project. The R.C.A.F. has the over-all responsibility for the project and the combined effort involves close co-operation by a number of government departments and agencies and many private companies and contractors in all parts of Canada. The resources of the trans-Canada telephone system are being utilized, this system having named the Bell Telephone Company of Canada to act for it as management contractor. A special division of the Bell Telephone Company was formed to undertake the building of the line.

Are we to understand from these explanations that this line is being built by the Bell Telephone Company? Furthermore, I should like to know who constitute the trans-Canada telephone system and whether the line is to be operated by the R.C.A.F., as indicated on page 5 of the white paper, or by some civilian agency and, if the latter, what agency is to operate it. I have one or two more questions about the mid-Canada line, but perhaps the minister could answer those.

Mr. Campney: I think this particular question could perhaps be more effectively answered by my colleague. The basis of the situation, as I understand it, is that the Royal Canadian Air Force is responsible operationally for the line but the maintenance and the day to day carrying out of the physical activities will be done by civilians when the line is in operation.

The set-up for building the line is fairly complicated and could probably be explained better by my colleague the Minister of Defence Production when his estimates are under discussion, because the matter comes under that department. We prepare the specifications, and collaborate in the designing, but the actual requisitioning to procure the building of the line is done through the Department of Defence Production, and I would prefer not to get involved in the inter-relationships of the people with whom that department is dealing in the various phases of constructing the line and putting it into operation.

Mr. Green: It is evident that the R.C.A.F. has charge of the whole project. Is the line to be operated by R.C.A.F. personnel or by civilian personnel? We were told some months ago that the distant early warning line was to be operated by United States civilian personnel. The minister has intimated that the mid-Canada line is to be operated by the R.C.A.F. Surely he should know just exactly what the picture is to be, because it is one of his arms of the services that is in charge of the over-all project.

Mr. Campney: There is no difficulty about that. The position is that the Royal Canadian Air Force takes over the mid-Canada line and at all stations and places on the line where activities are going on the R.C.A.F. will be in charge and will have representatives present. But the actual carrying out of the day to day duties of the operation will be under civilians. There is a difference between the physical operation of the line and the responsibility for the line fulfilling its purpose. That responsibility remains with Royal Canadian Air Force personnel.

Mr. Green: Then the actual physical operation of the line will be by civilian personnel; is that right?

Mr. Campney: That is intended now, yes.

Mr. Green: Are those civilian personnel to be found by the Bell Telephone Company?

Mr. Campney: I think that phase of the matter had better be left to my colleague because he is much more conversant, as I say, with the relationships of the various parties inasmuch as the organizing has been done by his department. I know the responsibility of the Royal Canadian Air Force in the matter, but beyond that I am not too familiar with the division of authority, the securing of people and logistic support and all the different factors that enter into it. I have a general idea of it but it is not my business. I know that my colleague has spent a good deal of time working on the matter, and I think these questions might better be addressed to him.

Mr. Green: The minister's own report contains this sentence, which I read:

> A special division of the Bell Telephone Company was formed to undertake the building of the line.

It appears that the Bell Telephone Company is in charge of building the line. Is that company also to operate the line? The Minister of Defence Production is here and no doubt the Minister of National Defence could ascertain from his colleague the proper answer to that question.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You will have that opportunity presently.

Mr. Green: Well, we may not. In any event, the Minister of National Defence has the main responsibility for this project, and I submit that he should ascertain the answer and let us know.

Mr. Campney: I do not think I should be participating in this discussion, and I do not think the hon. member should be pressing me on it because I have given him the answer that the physical construction, the physical arrangements for operation, logistic support and so on are in the hands of another department. In my department we are only responsible for the planning of the line, co-operating and collaborating in the construction of the line and the operation of the warning service when it is finished. I do not know whether the arrangements are completed yet for providing the civilian personnel. I do not know just exactly what stage the construction has reached.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): When the proper officers are on the floor we will be able to answer these questions. My hon. friend must have some idea of how estimates are dealt with, surely.

Mr. Green: I do not want any advice from the Minister of Defence Production as to how my questions should be asked. He and I have both been in the house for nearly 21 years and I have no intention of taking any abuse from him today or any other day. We have crossed swords before—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Don't get sore.

Mr. Green: —and on certain occasions he can be very discourteous.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Keep your temper, my friend, keep your temper.

Mr. Green: I have my temper under perfect control, but the minister might as well know once again today, as he has been told on other occasions, that I do not propose to be insulted by him.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Don't threaten.

Mr. Green: I am asking the minister who has admitted he is responsible for the operation of the line, who in fact has just admitted it within the last minute. I want to know whether that operation is to be carried on by the Bell Telephone Company or, if not, what civilian agency is to do that work.

Mr. Campney: As I understand it, the contract has not been let for the civilian side of the operation. I understand it is being negotiated now. That is why I cannot answer. I would be glad to answer anything I can that comes within my purview, but I do not think I should be required to try and answer questions on stages of this matter which are not my primary responsibility, because my answers would be more or less hearsay. I keep in touch in a general way, but if I am going to answer a question categorically I want to be specifically right. There are many phases to that particular side of the matter with which I am not familiar, and I would hesitate to make definite answers.

Mr. Green: With what company are these negotiations for the operation of the mid-Canada line being conducted at the present time?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You wouldn't know.

Mr. Campney: I am told that they are being conducted with the Bell Telephone Company. I am not conducting them.

Mr. Green: I guess I can take it that the Bell Telephone Company is the company in the field. What about this mid-Canada line in so far as channels are concerned? Will there be more channels than are required for defence purposes? In other words, will there be channels that can be used for civilian purposes?

Mr. Campney: I take it that the hon. member is referring to the communications system.

Mr. Green: That is right.

Mr. Campney: I understand that it was not designed to do more than handle the activities of the warning system.

Mr. Green: Of the which?

Mr. Campney: Of the warning system. I understand that the channels that have been designed for it are just ample to meet that need.

Mr. Green: It may be inaccurate but I have been told that there will be sufficient channels, or whatever the technical word may be, in this warning line to enable it to be used for civilian purposes as well as for defence purposes. Is that correct?

Mr. Campney: If that is true I am not aware of it. I have not heard that. My understanding has always been that the design was to make a composite whole that was sufficient with communications to handle it and that it was a separate entity; I refer to the whole system. Of course it might be capable of expansion, but as originally designed, it is referable only to the whole system. I have not heard of any intention to have extra channels, if we may call them such, for civilian use. I cannot say any more than that.

Mr. Green: Can we take it that the system is not to be used for civilian purposes as well as for defence purposes?

Mr. Campney: As at present planned, that is my understanding.

Mr. Green: Then the next subject is the permanent joint defence board. Will the minister tell the committee who constitute the Canadian section of this permanent joint defence board and which of these men is the chairman?

Mr. Campney: General McNaughton is the chairman of the Canadian section; the three vice chiefs of staff of the three services, namely army, navy and air force; the secretary who is from the Department of External Affairs and there is one other representative from the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Green: Who was the last one?

Mr. Campney: A representative of the external affairs department; and defence production, I believe, send a member when required, when matters under consideration are such as affect that department.

Mr. Green: Then in fact the permanent joint defence board, in so far as Canada is concerned, is comprised of General McNaughton as chairman, the three deputy chiefs of staff and a representative of the Department of External Affairs. Is that right?

Mr. Campney: Yes, plus another official of the Department of External Affairs as secretary.

Mr. Green: How often does that permanent joint defence board meet?

Mr. Campney: It meets quarterly, regularly, and at any other time it may be called to meet.

Mr. Green: I raised this question when I spoke on June 21 and the minister replied on July 18, his remarks being found at page 6121 of Hansard. He had this to say:

> This board since its formation in 1940 has contributed greatly to the solution of military problems affecting both Canada and the United States and has built up an excellent record of achievement through the years. It is a purely advisory board, not concerned with policy but only with working out joint arrangements once policy has been settled by the governments concerned.

When that board was set up in 1940, my understanding was that its primary function was to make recommendations on policy. But according to the minister's statement, at the present time the board has absolutely nothing to do with policy or with recommending policy but merely helps to work out the details of policy once that policy has been decided by some other authority. Is that correct?

Mr. Campney: I presume the board can make recommendations to the government if it chooses to do so. However, it cannot decide any matter. It can make recommendations to the governments concerned. But usually most of its work consists of taking projects or developments that have been agreed upon and working out the mechanics as between the two countries, as to how the work will be done, and generally taking such steps as are necessary to put an agreed plan into effect.

Mr. Green: Why could that not be done a good deal more effectively by the defence department itself, or by the officials of the defence department aided, if necessary, by officials of the external affairs department and of the Department of Defence Production? Once policy has been decided, why is it necessary to drag in this outside board to help carry out the details?

Mr. Campney: It is a joint board of the two countries, and they are not dragged in at all. They are given a very appreciable amount of work to do. The agenda of this board is always quite heavy. The board meets for several days at each meeting. The fact is that it is a joint board—I have given only the names of the Canadian section, and there is a corresponding United States section—and it is more or less a clearing house. A great deal of work must be cleared through the Department of External Affairs by the board; and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and some services are sometimes involved in the matters in hand and others are not. The board can work with the service in each country that is involved.

I think probably the best commentary I could make is that the board has now been in existence for something like 16 years—15 anyway—and it has proved its usefulness. It has proved especially that it had great usefulness in the period of the cold war. It affords a very ready and available instrument to carry into effect joint decisions by the two countries, to take cognizance of the problems involved and to formulate methods of meeting those problems.

In practice, just as a matter of fact I can say that in my time, which has not been too long, it has proved to be very helpful and very useful and a very ready means of getting things done. Otherwise each problem might involve a different group of people and you would have numerous committees all over the place. This board is in the nature of a clearing house to deal with decisions which have been taken.

Mr. Green: Why should the chairman not be a member of the minister's own department. I ask that question because quite a serious charge was made on this question, as the minister knows, by General Simonds. The general had this to say:

> The existence of the permanent joint board on defence adds further confusion to the direction of our military affairs. This organization came into being during the period of world war II when Canada was a belligerent and the United States was still neutral, and at that time was a useful instrument for obtaining some co-ordination of measures for North American defence. Now it simply acts as a barrier to closer liaison between the Canadian and U.S. chiefs of staff, and is redundant in so far as its military activities are concerned.

Then he went on to say:

> But the chairman has a more ready access to senior cabinet ministers than have the chiefs of staff. Whatever the terms of reference may be, many of the expressed views of ministers bear the unmistakable imprint of the influence of an intellect more remarkable for its bias toward pseudoscience and gadgetry, than for its record of sound military judgment.

Why is it that the chairman of the Canadian section of this joint permanent defence board is not an official of the Department of National Defence? It would seem that by making an arrangement of that type the weaknesses claimed by General Simonds would be removed.

Mr. Campney: Well, I do not know why a member of the Department of National Defence was not made chairman. I was not involved in administrative proceedings at that time. I can make only two observations. One is that having worked with the board for two years, I would not have thought of having a chairman from my department for the reason that the board deals with so many departments and has so many responsibilities and detailed activities that are not completely within the purview of my department. It seems to me that the founding fathers who set up this board did a very proper thing when they picked an independent chairman. The same thing has applied in the United States. Their section of the board is built the same as ours and the chiefs of staff have their representatives on the board the same as ours. I think when the first board was instituted Mayor LaGuardia of New York was appointed by the President of the United States to head their section.

I cannot agree with the comment the hon. gentleman has made. My experience only covers two years, but I have seen no indication of any of the circumstances he has outlined in my relations with the board. I have heard no criticism of the board before this from anyone, including other chiefs of staff who were on the board. Therefore I just have to take my own point of view, which is that I think the board is useful. It does excellent work and it fills a real need. In my experience it has not, as far as I know, slowed up any consideration of matters as between the two countries. On the contrary, it has expedited matters. Nor has it interfered with the existing rights of the chiefs of staff of the two countries concerned. The chiefs of staff here and the chiefs of staff of the United States can go back and forth and converse or meet with their opposite numbers at will. That goes on all the time. There is no let or hindrance about it that I know of.

This board deals with a wider field, including some defence matters in which they are interested. The reason that the three vice chiefs of staff are there representing their chiefs in each nation is to have continuity and a continual appreciation on the part of both countries of all the problems that are being worked out by the board. As I say, I have found the board very helpful and very useful, and I have not seen any necessity to criticize it nor, so far as I know, has anybody else except General Simonds. Probably that is quite all right, because in all these things we have critics and supporters and so on, but I have not had any criticism at all conveyed to me.

Mr. Green: May I take it from the minister's remarks today, then, that when he stated on the 18th that this board's functions were purely advisory on matters other than policy, he was not strictly accurate. In other words they do advise on policy?

Mr. Campney: Well, I suppose so if you want to narrow it down to matters which may become policy, but it has no executive authority to determine any policy. I suppose the board can advise on anything. It can give practical advice, but it carries out duties that are given to it when the governments decide.

Mr. Green: Was it this board that advised the distant early warning line and the mid-Canada line?

Mr. Campney: The policy was decided by discussions between the two governments. The joint defence board was brought in on matters of negotiation and discussion and to clear up certain points, but the decisions, as usual, were taken by the two governments, not by the board.

Mr. Green: Who made the recommendation? Was it this permanent joint defence board or not?

Mr. Campney: That is going back again a little before my time, but I understand the matter was dealt with at the government level, and that the board was given instructions to proceed on certain lines. Its advice was asked on the matter and it passed on it, and so on, but it was on the recommendation of the two governments concerned.

Mr. Green: Then the recommendation did not come from the joint permanent defence board?

Mr. Campney: No, that is not my understanding.

Mr. Green: My final subject is a matter of administration of the air force. Apparently provision is made for the payment of a gratuity under certain conditions to officers who have served in the air force, but there is the restriction that if they are discharged or released on medical grounds, then they do not get the full amount of the gratuity. They have deducted from that whatever is taken out of the regular pay for pension, what is called deferred pay. Thus if a man's gratuity amounts to $1,500 and he has deferred pay accumulated, which of course is being accumulated to go toward his pension when he retires, if he drops out for medical reasons he does not get the full $1,500 but only $1,500 less the amount of his own deferred pay. That is done, I am told, under Q.R. (air) article 206.23 (6) (a). It seems to me unfair that he should not get the full gratuity as well as the amount that has been deducted to apply to his future pension. Can the minister have that situation checked?

Mr. Campney: I understand the situation is that when a man enrols for a short-service commission he contracts to serve for a certain period of time, which I think is five years. If he completes his service in accordance with the contract he gets his gratuity. If during that time he is pensionable and becomes ill by reason of his service, he receives a pension. If he does not complete his term he receives only the amount he has paid in himself toward a gratuity but not the portion that would be put up by the government. In other words, he has failed to complete his contract and while he does not lose by that so far as his own contributions are concerned, because he gets those back, he does not get the added sum that would be put up by the government to complete his gratuity.

Mr. Green: But if he suffers a disability as the result of a flying accident why should—

Mr. Campney: Then he is pensioned.

Mr. Green: Pardon?

Mr. Campney: If he suffers a disability by reason of an accident within the scope of his employment he receives a pension.

Mr. Green: He would receive a disability pension?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Green: But why should that have anything to do with his gratuity? Why should that reduce his gratuity? We have always understood that a disability pension is intended to bring the man who has suffered a disability up to an even starting point with the man who has not been disabled.

Mr. Campney: That is true, but the pension compensates for the fact that he has not been able to complete his contract because of what has happened. The fact is that it more than compensates him for the fact he has not completed his contract, and therefore he gets back what he has put in but he does not get the additional gratuity.

I suppose we should look at the picture as a whole. He is paid his pension because he has not completed his contract for a valid reason, in this case an accident. The matter is fairly administered, as I see it. He cannot have the full gratuity unless he has completed his full contract, but he can always get back what he has paid in. If the hon. member has a specific case he would like me to look into I should be glad to do so, but I have stated the general rule as I understand it.

Mr. Green: Let us suppose an individual is unable to complete his full five-year term because he has been disabled in the service. Nobody would argue that he should receive a gratuity for the full five years; but if the injury took place after four years then surely he should get the full gratuity for the term he was in the air force, which would be four years, and also a refund of the money he has paid in toward his service pension which, as the minister knows, is entirely distinct from a disability pension.

I wonder if the minister would look into the situation further because I am afraid there is an unfairness, in that the disability pension is being linked up with the gratuity and I do not think that should be taken into consideration in arriving at the gratuity.

Mr. Campney: I will be glad to do so.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would give us a number of details showing the breakdown of responsibility as between his department and the Department of Defence Production in obtaining supplies and equipment for use particularly by the air force, because my subsequent observations will apply to that. The type of material I have in mind is piping, tubing, and all the other mechanical purchases which are made for supply purposes.

We know that the Department of Defence Production acts as purchasing agent for the minister's department in that respect, but I would like to know who has the responsibility for such things as auditing these parts and making sure that the material delivered is the same as that which has been requisitioned. Who has the responsibility for describing the material required and making sure it is the proper material and that it is given the proper coding? Who has the responsibility for ascertaining the quantities required, the point at which orders should be given and that type of thing?

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, this is a subject on which I would not attempt to go into any great detail, but generally speaking we as the Department of National Defence, subject to some small exceptions, are not permitted to purchase for our requirements. If the purchasing involves land for the construction of airports our agent is the Department of Transport. If the purchase is for commodities or construction or to meet other needs we have we make a requisition on the Department of Defence Production for what we want. The specifications for what we want are our responsibility. We have to lay down specifically and carefully the type of thing we want. We then send that with a requisition to the Department of Defence Production and they take such steps as they deem advisable—usually by tender or on a contract basis—to procure the thing we want at a proper price. That is their responsibility.

If it is something that has to be manufactured or built, our inspection staff follows the matter along until it is ready for delivery. We are responsible for having received everything we ask for because we have planned or specified it and have inspected it. We follow the process along and have to take the responsibility of seeing that we obtain what we have ordered and then we pay for it. That is a very simple outline but I think it is essentially a correct one.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Chairman, how about my final question regarding the point at which it is decided to reorder, the quantities that are ordered and the quantities required? Is that a decision of the Department of National Defence or the Department of Defence Production?

Mr. Campney: If I understood the hon. member correctly I think under the circumstances he mentioned it would be a service decision. In other words, if we said we wanted X number of something and could only get Y, we would have to decide whether we would take none or all. In other words the Department of Defence Production is our agent, and in matters of the kind just mentioned it would be our decision.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The minister in his reply has not mentioned any audit or check on this purchasing procedure, but he has specifically accepted the responsibility of his own department for stating the specifications of commodities required, for establishing the quantities required and determining the point at which the order is to be placed; that is, when the stock is low enough to require an order.

In order to be helpful to the minister I would like to give him a few contracts that he might look at to see just how well his current procedures are working out. The difficulty here, I might say, is in some respects that of assessing the responsibility as to where certain errors occur. If the minister will go back and look at a particular requisition which ended up as tender B-18/28/16, he will find included in that a requirement for a part which showed on the contract as No. H-2320-30. That was a bolt. The original order placed by the Department of Defence Production was for 1,995 at a cost of approximately $16 each. The interesting thing about this is that if that part had been properly quoted as VS-2320-30 it would have indicated that it was manufactured by a company in California, and that company retails this bolt at $2.02. As far as I know it could have been brought into Canada duty free.

The main point is that here is a case where the department appears to have paid several times what they should have paid for the same article. There was a slip-up somewhere in the ordering system, and I would assume also in the specifications sent out by the department.

Again on the same contract there is another item designated 2319-27, also a bolt. Again the initials "VS" were left off and the result was that this article was purchased in Canada at approximately $4 each rather than from the company which manufactures and sells it retail at 82 cents. I want to point out that in these particular instances the article had been imported into Canada by an intermediary and there was no question of placing an order in Canada as against placing it in the United States.

Another thing which should be watched more carefully is the checking of merchandise against specifications. There were certain specifications that called for new material, but in these cases which I shall mention I think the minister will find that surplus material was supplied while new material prices were charged. The contract numbers include B18-28-NA2; B18-28-NS1 and B18-28-NA1. I give the minister these numbers so he can follow up this matter if he is sincerely interested. It was suggested by the person who is conversant with this situation that if this material had been carefully inspected it would not have been accepted.

I have a few other cases here having to do with quantities. I have referred to numbers being left off in the specifications; I have referred to the need of checking material when it is received, and I should like to deal now with quantities. One contract demand I have in mind is No. 511,301, which became contract B18-38-196. This contract was given out back in 1953 and the department ordered 5,000 pieces of AN839-16, which was an elbow tube to tube. According to the latest information I have the great majority of these items are still in stock and they cost $25,000 three years ago. It has been suggested that this material actually was not required.

I have various bits of information of this type but I am not going to spend undue time exploring every last item. However, I think it shows two things; first, the need for the minister to investigate carefully his relations with the Department of Defence Production and the information he is supplying; and second, the need for a much more adequate audit system on parts and supplies than that which exists at the present time. All the items I have referred to have to do with the air force, which is why I have brought up the matter at this time.

It seems to me that various parts of the minister's department are not operating in the most efficient manner. There would appear to be a definite tendency to order unduly large quantities of many items in a haphazard fashion without any relation to previous use and consumption or to proposed use and consumption. There is as far as I can see, and the minister has given no indication today, no attempt to audit these items. The Department of Defence Production operate simply as a purchasing agent, and I gather they will purchase anything asked for by the minister. That department makes no attempt to check, so therefore the responsibility must lie with the minister. The ordering practices and the contract demands which have been met I believe represent many hundreds of thousands if not many millions of dollars worth of material which is simply being left in stock with no sign of immediate usage.

Mr. Campney: I shall be glad to look into the matters which the hon. gentleman has brought up. I am not familiar, and I know the hon. member would not expect me to be familiar, with the specific cases. We do have a pretty comprehensive check and audit. There is the service audit, the deputy minister's audit and the over-all audit of the Auditor General. I shall be glad to look into these particular cases and see what are the causes of the results which have been indicated.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): The minister referred to the deputy minister's audit and the audit by the Auditor General, which I assume have to do with dollars, but I should like to know if there is any audit of supplies.

Mr. Campney: The service audit and deputy minister's audit both deal with items as well as with dollars.

Mr. Harkness: Has the minister the number of CF-100 crashes for which I asked some time ago?

Mr. Campney: Of course the figures should be referable to the number of hours flown.

Mr. Harkness: I also asked for the rate of crashes in comparison with the number of aircraft in service or the number of sorties, whichever happens to be available.

Mr. Campney: In the fiscal year 1954-55 there were 14,982 hours flown and 14 crashes. Of course not all of them were write-offs, but they were what you might term crashes. In 1955-56 there were 43,142 hours flown, or something over three times as many, and there were 20 crashes. I have not the other figures here.

Mr. Harkness: How many of these aircraft were lost as a result of these crashes?

Mr. Campney: The figure of the total losses were 9 in 1954-55 and 13 in 1955-56.

Mr. Harkness: There is one other matter which has rather surprised me in these estimates with regard to the civilian personnel. We note on page 336 that there are 1,970 messmen in the R.C.A.F. this year as compared with 1,949 last year. One might have thought this included cooks, but on the previous page there is shown some 700 cooks in addition. This seems an incredibly large number of messmen, particularly when you look at the army details and find that the army, with approximately the same number of personnel—as a matter of fact I think they had more during a good deal of the period under consideration—has 870 messmen. I wonder whether the minister can explain the necessity for such a very large number of messmen in the R.C.A.F., especially as compared with the number in the army. I also wonder what the duties of these messmen are that require such a large number. As a matter of fact there would appear to be almost one messman for every 20 people in the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Campney: I understand that the increase arises from the restriction of hours at radar stations and the 24-hour operation of those stations. It has been necessary to augment staff in various cases. In addition, there have been a very substantial number of additional facilities opened during the past year.

As to what constitutes the duties of a messman, I should think they would be persons who do almost anything pertaining to the housekeeping for the mess, the kitchen work, the cleaning up and so on. I cannot authoritatively say just what the scope of their activities is, but as a matter of fact I should think the increase of 21 must mean that in the over-all picture there have been also some reductions. I know that the new facilities that have been opened in the past year would on the previous scale require more than 21 more people, especially at the radar stations, where we have had to make considerable changes in addition.

Mr. Harkness: My question was not so much with regard to the small addition of 21 but as to why there were approximately 2,000 of them in any event. Why are so many messmen needed in the R.C.A.F., considerably more than twice as many, nearly two and a half times as many, as for the army with the same type of personnel?

Mr. Campney: For one thing I think it is probably attributable to the fact that we have a very great number of small units in the air force, more than we have in the regular army. Of course the more units there are to serve, the higher percentage of people required. There may be another factor. I am not sure whether the term "messmen" means the same thing in both services or whether in the air force it embraces other duties. I do not know that, but it is apparent that the air force has many more small units where messmen are required, and I am sure that would add to the total number.

Mr. Harkness: Whilst the difference in the number of units might explain some of this difference, I do not think it would by any means explain all of it. There are numbers of small units in the army as well as in the air force. I think the total number of units in the army, according to the list the minister gave, was 500 odd. Some of those must be very small units. It seems to me there is far too great a disparity. It is a matter the minister perhaps should look into. It looks like poor administration somehow.

Mr. Campney: I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I shall only take a few minutes, and it is more to get myself oriented for the debate that may come later in connection with defence prodution. The hon. member for Notre Dame de Grace asked what type of liaison there was between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production. I am thinking of probably something much wider in policy than the items he was mentioning, in connection with the over-all procurement of aircraft and the natural worries that we have in keeping our aircraft plants in production.

Has the minister, along with the Minister of Defence Production and perhaps the Minister of Transport, considered at all the advisability of sponsoring the production in Canada of a military transport plane? I have spoken about this in previous years, and I have indicated that all planes of this type in other countries have first of all been of military origin and then carried on as a civil type transport. It appears to be of vital necessity, if we are not going to have our aircraft plants in a boom or bust cycle, that we have some continuity in production. Now I shall tie the question right down to the remarks that were made by the minister in connection with the emphasis that he thought might be placed in the future on the carriage of airborne troops, as distinct from the paratroops on whom the emphasis has been heretofore. These were his words at page 5212 of Hansard:

> For example, if aircraft such as the C-119 were used, apart altogether from the cost of ground facilities and air crew, but allowing for reserve aircraft, it would require 148 planes, at a cost of about $150 million, to provide a one-up lift for an army brigade without its heavy equipment.

Have there been any discussions between the minister and the Minister of Defence Production and perhaps the Minister of Transport as well as to the feasibility of using a requirement such as this to create a very strong and adequate civil reserve of aircraft?

Mr. Campney: The answer is no. In our department we are studying for our own purposes the question of the provision of transport, but to my knowledge there has not been any conference of the nature mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It seems to me that the least that should be done is to study the plan used in the United States. As I say, much civil transport has resulted there from the original production of a military type plane and the fact, as I understand it, that the civil aircraft authorities and the government have made leasing arrangements with civilian operators under which the planes that have been produced are being operated by the regular cargo carriers and are on a 48-hour recall basis. It is particularly noteworthy that they are on a recall basis with crews supplied. It seems to me that the minister is maybe hesitant here about $150 million to produce 148 transport planes, but at the same time he has indicated that we have spent $120 million odd on the pre-production costs for the CF-100. That is a plane which is very necessary but has no place in civilian use.

I am not going to blame the minister. I think perhaps some sort of liaison is required, and that possibly two or three of the gentlemen on the treasury benches should be called to a meeting. It probably would be called by the Minister of Defence Production. I do believe that some serious thought should be given to this problem. I will only say, and I may have to repeat it tonight, that if such a plan is not put into effect we will have a constant repetition of what I have termed the boom and bust in aircraft production.

If we are having stretch-outs, as we are now, then I assume we can possibly say there is nothing to fill in to keep the production line going, to keep the engineers on the job and stay abreast of technical developments. If that is not the case, then possibly we have been slow in the development of the replacement aircraft, the CF-105, and I do not believe that because I think it has come along as fast as it could come along anywhere. Frankly, I think we may be a little optimistic when we talk about two or three years. It may be longer than that, but even at that it is keeping pace with developments in other countries.

If these two reasons are not the reasons for the stretch-out, and I think the first one can be corrected, then I can only assume that the minister cannot recruit enough pilots to put in his machines, that he can build them faster than he can get men to fly them. Last year I asked for a return along this line. I have not the figures before me, but I think we had something like 5,000 applicants for aircrew enlistment. Somewhere along the line we dropped 4,000 of them, whether by reason of physical disability or inability to meet flying standards after training had commenced. We ended up with about 1,000, and as I recall it that number was only enough to meet the replacement program.

If the two other reasons are not the real reasons here, and I think one of them can be corrected, then we should take a very serious look at the manpower question. The matter of personnel for aircrew in the air force may be only part of the problem. It may be that we have to look farther afield than that and assess manpower requirements in all branches of industry and the forces. But something should be done. Whether through liaison among those on the treasury benches or liaison as to the methods used to establish a regular production line in other countries, action is required in either case.

Mr. Churchill: Just before we conclude this discussion I have a brief question with regard to administration, concerning the problem of low flying aircraft at Stevenson field adjoining the city of St. James and the city of Winnipeg. Periodically complaints come in with regard to too many aircraft flying low over built-up areas. Periodically complaints are lodged and there is an abatement of the noise and trouble, and then periodically it recurs. Just now in St. James and Winnipeg complaints are being made with regard to low flying aircraft.

There is a division of responsibility between the R.C.A.F. and the Department of Transport and the matter will have to be raised again, I suppose, on the other estimates, but I should like to ask the minister if the R.C.A.F. is conducting night flying from that field at low levels and if the regulations are not sufficient to prevent too much of that low level night flying. No one objects to the odd plane coming in at a low level. Wind and weather conditions compel that on occasion, but objections are raised when there is a great deal of low level flying over built-up areas. There is an element of danger there and if the flyers are student flyers people naturally get nervous. The noise is a troublesome thing.

I should like to compliment the night flyers on the success with which they complete their circuit with regularity and the accuracy with which they keep on course, because they go right over my house from eleven o'clock at night to 12.30 or from 11.30 to one o'clock. I would not object to it in Ottawa but my habits at home are much more regular and I find it a bit annoying. I appreciate the complaints raised by other citizens of St. James and Winnipeg with regard to low flying aircraft, particularly at night. What is the situation so far as the Royal Canadian Air Force is concerned?

Mr. Campney: There is no necessity at night or at any other time at Stevenson field or any of our airports, except in connection with aproaches and landings, for the amount of low flying that seems to be indicated by the hon. member. All I can say is that in view of what he has just told me I will have the situation investigated. We have not had very many complaints from very many places, and if there is some peculiar situation at Stevenson field that should be rectified we will see that it is.

Mr. Churchill: I might mention that this came to my attention through articles in the Winnipeg Tribune of July 9 and the Winnipeg Free Press of July 4, indicating that the matter had been taken up with the city council. I presume that complaints will be registered with the authorities.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Can the minister tell us if his department is within its rights in abrogating the regulations governing civilian flying and having its planes pass over built-up areas at lower than the heights which the Department of Transport considers safe?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Campney: I am told that we invariably follow the transport regulations. Whether or not we are bound to, we do.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Earlier this week the minister, in dealing with a particular complaint which had been referred to me, wrote and said that two of his jet aircraft which had been practising for an air show at St. Hubert airport had been instructed to fly over St. Lambert, which is a city and a built-up area, at not less than 1,000 feet. To the best of my knowledge the minimum established by the air regulations over that area is 2,000 feet. It seems to me this particular case is one which directly contradicts what the minister has just said. From my own experience I think most of us would find that there are occasions—in some areas quite often—on which military aircraft go over built-up areas at an extremely low level, one substantially below that set by the air regulations. We all realize that on certain occasions there may be an urgent necessity for that procedure, but I think we should realize also that the department are flouting these regulations in the instructions they are issuing to their pilots.

I think it should also be brought to the attention of the minister that when they flout these regulations they cause a good deal of inconvenience to the people in those areas. The minister may be fortunate in that he does not have too many aircraft going over his own place of residence at low levels. I do not know just where he is located, but he would be concerned, I think, if he had this experience on a continuing basis, and if he were subjected to the fairly regular flow of complaints in this connection that come to me from areas in the Montreal district. They apparently can get very little satisfaction from their own local representative in this house, so they refer the matter to me. It seems to be a fairly constant situation. It would be a good idea if the minister could take some steps to rectify it.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we proceed to the next heading?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: Royal Canadian Air Force (reserve).

Mr. Dinsdale: Extensive reorganization is taking place in our air force auxiliary and reserve programs this year, according to the information supplied by the minister in the white paper. As has been typical of the activities in our air force reserve, I find it somewhat difficult to understand the logic in all the changes that are taking place. During the past ten years in Canada, since the end of world war II, the air force reserve has had a rather chequered career and from time to time in this house we have had statements of a somewhat contradictory nature.

For example, as I have said before, at one time we were told that the reserve was the backbone of our defence program in this country and that eventually they would be supplied with CF-100 all-weather fighters. We raised some objection as to the feasibility of that scheme because of the nature of the training difficulties, and we recommended that the personnel might be more suitably employed on a less complex aircraft from a navigational standpoint, namely the F-86. In 1954 the then minister of national defence, in reply to suggestions of that kind, as reported at page 4991 of Hansard of May 21, 1954 said this:

> There is another reason, and that is that these Sabre fighters are really not well suited for the air defence of Canada. They have a relatively short range, they have only one pilot; they have not a complete set of navigational instruments, and if they went into the air and got into a dogfight in Canada they might have great difficulty in getting back to their airfield.

Notwithstanding that statement of two years ago we have received the information that six, I think it is, of our reserve squadrons are going to be equipped with F-86 Sabres for the defence of Canada. I would agree that this is a good move, as we suggested some two or three years ago, but certain aspects of the reorganization are difficult to understand. In the white paper, in reference to the Canadian army, the minister says there is to be emphasis on the air portability of our army. If that is to be the emphasis so far as the army is concerned, it would seem to me that the demand for reserve flying personnel will be larger than it has ever been hitherto.

That consideration gives rise to the querying of the disbanding of a fully operational squadron such as the 424 Hamilton squadron. I should like to ask the minister how it is anticipated that we are going to move toward the objective of air portability and mobility of the army if we continue to disband reserve air crew who are fully operational.

In the white paper there is also some reference to the necessity for developing a mobile striking force—and I think these are the words used—which would be able to deal rapidly with any enemy lodgments in Canada. It seems to me that here again is a function that could be adequately carried out by air force reserve people. The de Havilland Otter which is being used extensively by the United States air force for air portability purposes is capable of carrying 10 fully equipped combat troops and, in cases of airborne operations as contrasted with air portable operations, it is possible to carry out paratroop dropping at speeds of between 60 miles per hour and 140 miles per hour. To summarize this point, in the face of these growing needs particularly in connection with air transport responsibilities, I find it difficult to understand the action on the part of the Department of National Defence in disbanding fully qualified air crew and fully operational reserve squadrons.

I might also refer to the possible use of reserve people in carrying out international army exercises. Some comment has been made today concerning the necessity for maintaining large numbers of Canadian troops in Europe. In this day of rapid air transportation there is no reason why we could not make the army reserve more attractive by carrying out international exercises by means of an enlarged R.C.A.F. transport command. The further difficulty was raised last evening as to how our personnel already in Europe might be evacuated in the event of necessity.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, shall I report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day, if necessary?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR FRIDAY EVENING AND SATURDAY SITTINGS

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I have leave to make a motion? I move:

> That on Friday, July 20, 1956, and on every Friday thereafter until the end of this session, in addition to the sittings now provided for by the standing orders, the house shall also sit from eight to ten o'clock p.m.; and that on Saturday, July 28, 1956, and on every Saturday thereafter until the end of this session, the house shall meet at eleven o'clock a.m. and adjourn at six o'clock p.m., with the usual intermission from one to 2.30 o'clock p.m., and the order of business and procedure on Saturdays shall be the same as for Thursdays; and that the provisions of standing orders 2 (1) and 6 (3) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Applewhaite): Private and public bills.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF STATUTORY HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 441, to provide for pay for statutory holidays for employees and for pay for work performed on statutory holidays.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated when this bill was introduced and given first reading last Monday, it is a companion to Bill No. 211 which was under debate at the second reading stage on May 11 of this year. I believe that in the case of both of these bills, this is the first time their subject matter has been presented to the federal parliament in the form of actual bills. The proposals contained in these two bills have frequently been presented to parliament, but as I have already indicated, I believe for the first time they are before parliament in legislative form.

As hon. members will recall, the purpose of the other bill, Bill No. 211, is to make provision for at least two weeks' annual vacation with pay for all workers in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction. The purpose of this companion bill, Bill No. 441, is to make a parallel provision for these same workers, namely the provision of at least eight statutory holidays each year with pay.

Perhaps I might indicate at this point the actual holidays suggested in this bill. They are: New Year's day, Good Friday, Victoria day, Dominion day, Labour day, Thanksgiving day, Remembrance day and Christmas day. I would point out that these are holidays which are observed to a greater or lesser extent in all parts of Canada. There are, perhaps, other holidays which are celebrated in different parts of Canada. For example, in the western provinces, here in Ontario and in some other areas there is observed in August what is known in urban areas at any rate as civic holiday, and in the province of Quebec there are holidays like St. Jean Baptiste day, and others. That is indeed the reason that this bill provides for a minimum of eight statutory holidays; for it is part of my thinking that there are other holidays in different areas which could be covered by provincial legislation.

To say a further word as to what is actually provided in this bill, may I point out that it requires that every employee under federal labour jurisdiction who is permitted—by virtue of working conditions or on any other basis—to be off work on the eight statutory holidays shall receive his regular pay in full for each of those eight statutory holidays. The bill also provides that if anyone is required to work on any of those statutory holidays—this is a recognition of the fact that there are certain services that have to be performed every day the year round, and therefore some people will have to work on some of those days—he shall receive his regular pay plus overtime pay for the work he does, at what is known as double time.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Another provision, Mr. Speaker, is that nothing in the bill shall affect any provision, so far as statutory holidays with pay are concerned, in any legislation, contract of employment, or custom that is better than is set out in this bill. In other words, salaried employees or persons in a managerial capacity who already have, by arrangement or by custom or by contract, statutory holidays without any loss of pay, do not suffer any loss of whatever provision they now have by virtue of this bill, and that is spelled out in one of the clauses. On the other hand, the bill also has a clear-cut provision that its minimum requirement shall supersede any provision that is less favourable to employees than those set out in this bill.

There are various other detailed provisions worked out in Bill No. 441. I will not take the time of the house to go into them now, for they are the kind of details that could be discussed either in committee of the whole on the bill or in the industrial relations committee, to which I would hope that this bill might be referred for study after second reading. However, I invite hon. members to study the detailed provisions of Bill No. 441, as indeed I invited them to study the details of Bill No. 211, so they will realize that there is before them not just a general or pious resolution but a concrete piece of legislative machinery to make possible the immediate putting into effect of the principle of statutory holidays with pay for all employees who come under the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament.

As hon. members realize, it is not a great period of time since for the average industrial worker there was no such thing as pay for any day on which he did not work, either in terms of an annual vacation or in terms of a statutory holiday. None of us, in taking part in debates in this house, like to be at all personal, but I am sure my experience is like that of many other members here, namely that I can think of persons whom I have known who were industrial workers, persons close indeed to me, who through the whole of their lives never knew what it was to have a vacation with pay or to get paid for statutory holidays on which they did not work.

It is good to know that we are moving on and that slowly but surely the pattern is changing. In the old days industrial workers got time off, all right; they got statutory holidays because the shop was shut down, but there was no pay for them for those days. They also had vacations, but either they took them at a loss of pay or they were because of unemployment, and one would not exactly call such periods vacations.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, we have moved on and the pattern is beginning to take shape, namely that industrial workers—indeed, all workers in a community such as ours—should as a matter of right have both the vacations with pay covered in the other bill and the statutory holidays with pay provided in this bill, second reading of which I am now presenting to the house.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, for a considerable period of time there was something of a division which I think was not good for our society, in that salaried people seemed to get statutory holidays without any loss of pay. In other words, people who were on monthly or annual salary did not suffer because certain days were declared to be public or statutory holidays. On the other hand wage earners, industrial workers and those on hourly rates of pay have had quite a struggle trying to achieve recognition of the fact that they, too, should be paid their regular pay for statutory holidays.

I remind hon. members that the request for legislation to provide these two items—annual vacations with pay, at least two weeks in that case, and also at least eight statutory holidays with pay—is part of the program of the new Canadian Labour Congress. As a matter of fact the new Canadian Labour Congress in that respect is simply carrying forward what were the requests of the constituent organizations which came together to make up that congress. It seems to me we now have a chance in this House of Commons to recognize this new era in Canadian labour history, an era marked by the birth of the Canadian Labour Congress, by dealing favourably with this bill and with the other one which taken together lay before parliament a major item of policy in the platform of the new congress.

I hope hon. members will give serious consideration to the representations that have been made in this connection by organized labour, and that they will recognize that it is hardly fair, in view of the fact that we as a parliament are responsible for some of the statutory holidays being observed—for example, Victoria day and Dominion day as well as some others, are holidays by virtue of federal statutes—for us to require that these holidays be observed and not take cognizance of the fact that the result is that some people in the observance of those holidays do not lose their pay and others do. Surely the way to get around that unfairness is to pass what might be called ancillary legislation such as is contained in these two bills and make it clear that the holidays which we require to be observed—indeed, all of them as set out in this bill—shall be days when all those who contribute to the economy of this country, whether they be salaried workers or wage earners on hourly rates of pay, shall have those holidays without loss of pay.

Mr. Speaker, it has been an argument I have used with respect to some other pieces of legislation in the labour field which we in this group have presented from time to time that the provinces were already giving us a lead and that the federal government was falling behind. That is the case with respect to some of the other matters we have placed before parliament at this session. So far as this item is concerned, the fact is that the provinces are rather slow in coming forward with appropriate legislation. I suggest that perhaps for once, instead of the federal government having to be prodded to get in step and having to be prodded to put on its statute books legislation akin to that which is on the statute books of most of the provinces, in this case the federal government might take the lead.

In other words, I am admitting that the picture in the provinces is not as progressive in this field of statutory holidays as labour generally and we in this party feel it should be. I find on reference to a document prepared by the Department of Labour entitled "Provincial Labour Standards", published under the authority of the Minister of Labour in December, 1955, that there are six provinces in which there is some legislation regarding statutory or public holidays.

Those six provinces, to take them in geographical order from east to west, are Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. However, in two of those provinces the only effect of the legislation regarding statutory or public holidays is that a certain number of holidays shall be observed. I might say with respect to these various provinces that have some legislation in this field that they vary as to the number of holidays declared to be public or statutory holidays. In some cases it is seven and in some it is eight, and various other figures are established in different provinces.

However, of the six provinces that have some kind of legislation respecting statutory or public holidays, there are four that make provision for what rates of pay employees are to receive if they are required to work on any of the statutory holidays set out in that provincial legislation. Those four, and again I take them in geographical order starting in the east, are Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Hon. members will note that I have now had to leave out Newfoundland and British Columbia, both of which were in the previous list of six which I gave. Those are the two whose legislation merely prescribes that the holidays shall be observed. However, in the case of these four—Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—there are varying provisions as to the rates of pay that employees shall receive if they are required to work on statutory holidays.

It would be a confusing picture indeed if I tried to spell it all out, but I might just indicate that the rate varies from straight time to time and a half and perhaps more in some cases. There are also provisions in some instances for compensatory time off rather than extra pay. Some provinces make a distinction between one group of workers and another, and in some instances better protection is given to women than to others so far as statutory holidays are concerned. However, those four provinces go at least as far as to make some provision as to the rate of pay to be given to workers if they are required to work on statutory holidays.

There is only one province in the whole of Canada which takes the further step and requires that all workers shall receive pay for statutory holidays even though they do not work. I trust hon. members get the distinction. The three provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and Nova Scotia make no provision for pay for statutory holidays if you do not work. They provide what you get if you do work, but Saskatchewan is the one province which is unique in this field because it has taken a further step and makes all three provisions; first, that there shall be observed certain statutory holidays; second, that those who work on those statutory holidays shall receive pay at an overtime rate; and third, that all employees, even those who do not work, shall receive pay at their regular rate for statutory holidays.

Mr. Enfield: This legislation would have no effect on the field normally covered by provincial statutes.

Mr. Knowles: Not at all. I thought I made it clear at the start that this bill, like other bills in this field, relates only to employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction. I am sure the hon. member will realize from the discussions we have had on other labour bills that every time we discuss labour conditions the question arises as to whether we are behind or in front of the provinces in that field. I have suggested that in some of the other fields the federal government is behind the provinces, and I am suggesting that in this field we are behind them as well. I am not saying that nothing has been done by the provinces, but very little has been done and it would not be very hard for the federal parliament to get out in front and give a lead.

[Mr. Knowles.]

It is my thought, and I am sure it is also the thought of some hon. members on the government side of the house, that if a lead were given in this matter by the federal parliament in connection with those employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction it might prompt some of the provinces to come along and do likewise.

There have been such instances. As a matter of fact the first jurisdiction in this country to pass legislation protecting the pension rights of workers against loss due to strikes was this federal parliament, which passed legislation in that field in 1948, after it had been asked for by some of us for many years. It was not very long after that step had been taken by the parliament of Canada in 1948 that that particular item of legislation was copied by a number of the provinces and pension rights are now pretty generally protected against loss due to strike or lockout, right across Canada. Similarly it is my conviction that if the federal parliament were to take a lead with respect to statutory holidays with pay it would set a goal at which the provinces might aim. I would hope that progress would be made in that field with a minimum of delay.

Before the hon. member for York-Scarborough interjected his question I was coming to the conclusion of that part of my remarks in which I was trying to indicate the picture in the provinces, namely that something has been done but that much remains to be done in all provinces except one, namely the province of Saskatchewan, where eight holidays, the same eight that are spelled out in this bill, are declared to be statutory holidays and where it is declared also that those who do not work on those days shall receive their regular pay and that those who are required to work shall receive pay at overtime rates.

In addition to the interesting information which I gleaned from pages 8 and 9 of this departmental document entitled "Provincial Labour Studies", I also gleaned certain information from some interesting tables which the economics and research branch of the Department of Labour supplied to me. I am grateful to the minister's department for the receipt of this material. As a matter of fact I think I might take a moment to say that the people in the minister's department do a particularly good job in terms of collecting statistics and making them available. This may be a bit of a digression, but I want to say also that those who edit the Labour Gazette do a very good job of keeping people who are interested in labour matters informed on what is going on in the labour field. I suppose after having said that, a report of this debate should appear in the next issue of the Labour Gazette, but that was not my purpose in putting in that word of compliment.

I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to a couple of the tables which appear in this collection of material I received relative to working conditions. One is table No. 29, which indicates the number of paid statutory holidays enjoyed by office employees in manufacturing establishments across Canada. What interested me is that the largest single group receiving statutory holidays, receive eight of them a year. Indeed, 61·1 per cent of office employees in manufacturing establishments, receive that many paid statutory holidays a year.

It is difficult to get corresponding figures for hourly-paid workers, hence my reference to the position enjoyed by office workers. I suggest that it indicates something as to a goal which it might be desirable to achieve. The number who receive seven paid statutory holidays is 10·7 per cent, and those who receive nine or more is just about 20 per cent. In other words, the great bulk of that group of office workers who receive pay for statutory holidays, receive it for eight such holidays. It is on that basis that I suggest we are justified in asking this parliament to approve the principle of eight paid statutory holidays for all employees who come under the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament.

This same set of tables which I obtained from the minister's department deals with the question of rates of pay given to hourly-paid industrial workers when they do receive extra pay for working on statutory holidays. Hon. members will understand that when reference is made to hourly-paid workers who get extra pay for working on statutory holidays, we are talking not about something which they get by virtue of legislation but of something which they get by virtue in most cases of collective agreements. That would apply except for the provisions in the labour legislation in Saskatchewan. There is no other province in Canada in which the right to paid statutory holidays is protected by legislation.

Nevertheless, by virtue of collective agreements some paid statutory holidays are enjoyed by workers. One of the struggles in which the trade union movement is engaged all the time is to obtain that provision for more workers, and to get for those who enjoy that provision an increasing number of paid statutory holidays. In some agreements the number starts at four or five and gradually the number gets to six, seven or eight. But I am also interested in the question of the premium rates paid to those who work on statutory holidays in manufacturing establishments, bearing in mind that most of these have been established by virtue of collective agreements between management and trade unions.

I find that according to table 23 in this group of tables I have in my hand, 9·4 per cent of those for whom there is a specified rate as to what they will get for working statutory holidays get time and a half as the premium rate. I find that 32·9 per cent get double time for working on statutory holidays, and that 39·1 per cent get more than double time. The table I have before me does not specify how much more, but in view of the fact that 32·9 per cent get double time and 39·1 per cent get more than double time, it seems to me that we are more than justified in asking in this bill that the rate of pay to those who are required to work on statutory holidays be their regular pay plus a premium rate of double time.

There are those, of course, who will probably produce in this debate the same argument that is produced every time we introduce legislation regarding labour matters, namely would it not be a good idea to leave this to collective bargaining? We have had that with regard to the check-off. We used to have it years ago when some of us were fighting for that other provision to which I referred, the protection of pension rights against loss due to strikes. We had it in the debate on Bill No. 211 a few weeks ago, and I suppose we shall get it again today. Frankly, I sometimes am surprised that members who put forward that kind of argument accept any labour legislation of any kind. After all, the logical conclusion of that sort of argument is to leave everything to collective bargaining, to leave everything to the struggle between management and labour.

Hon. members are fully aware of the importance of collective bargaining in labour relations and that importance is recognized by all parties in this house. But we have also recognized that step by step and stage by stage the point is reached where some things have to be protected, where pegs have to be established so the rights won by labour will not slip below those pegs.

Labour itself, the trade union movement, which defends the principle of collective bargaining and which is opposed to compulsory arbitration, nevertheless is continually seeking from the legislatures of the country and from this federal parliament legislation protecting certain of those hard-won rights. It is on that basis that labour has sought from parliament in years gone by laws to protect the right to organize and laws to protect the practice of collective bargaining. It is on that basis that labour has sought measures such as I now lay before this house, namely annual vacations with pay and statutory holidays with pay for all workers in this country.

I hope the day is not far off when the argument that we must leave these things to collective bargaining, which is another way of saying with respect to this sort of thing that we leave it to the struggle between the worker and the boss, will not be heard but rather that we will recognize that there are certain social rights that should be enjoyed by all the people of Canada. Though we do not have it by legislation in this country, except in the one province of Saskatchewan, there are many Canadians today who because they are salaried employees, because they are monthly rate employees, because of collective agreements or for other reasons, enjoy statutory holidays with pay. There are statutory holidays. The provinces declare that some of them should be observed and this parliament declares that certain others should be observed. Yet we leave a great many of our people without the benefit of knowing that when they enjoy those statutory holidays their pay for those days will continue.

I say again that this is an important year in Canadian labour history, with the birth of the new Canadian Labour Congress. I should hope that the parliament of Canada, even before this session ends, might yet do something significant, something substantial, something that will recognize the birth of that new congress, something more than just words in the fine speeches that were made to the delegates when the congress was formed in Toronto in April. I suggest that one of these substantial, worth-while gestures that this parliament could make would be to pass these two bills. I mention them together because they are companion bills, the other one calling for two weeks' annual vacation with pay and this one calling for eight statutory holidays with pay for all workers in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction.

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has brought in for second reading the companion bill to Bill No. 211, and in presenting it to the house this afternoon he has presented with eloquence his appeal for those who come under the federal jurisdiction, that their conditions of work should be improved by act of this parliament. I know that it is always a very pleasant thing to sponsor something that one is sure a great many of the people directly concerned want to have done. Without a moment's hesitation I agree with him that this and Bill No. 211 were among those matters that were discussed at the great Canadian Labour Congress held in Toronto a short time ago.

In spite of his remarks criticizing my habit of bringing up the virtue of collective bargaining on these matters, nevertheless I bring it up in this connection without making any apology for doing so. My comments must of necessity be along the same lines as those which I applied to Bill 211. This bill deals with a matter that is normally —and even more normally than what is asked for under Bill 211—a matter that is subject to collective bargaining. I stress again that the employees of industries which come under federal jurisdiction are in very truth highly organized unions. They are not of that weak and incapable nature that might be inferred from some of the words of my hon. friend, in that they require from time to time the bolstering of legislation by this parliament to uphold their hands. Their collective agreements have referred to items right across the board in the conditions of work and more particularly, as he has pointed out, in recent years to the items contained in this particular bill. For instance, there are the observance of certain statutory holidays, the pay that is to be given for those holidays and the premium pay for work that may be done if instructed to work on those holidays. In some industries, particularly the transportation or railway industries, the nature of the work calls for continuous operation of the service and rather specialized types of work scheduling have to be worked out. In order to do that, statutory holidays are dealt with in collective agreements covering some groups of employees, and they are not a consideration of any great importance among other groups.

As examples of that I refer to the results of recent negotiations that have been going on. In the first example, statutory holidays were a very important factor in the collective bargaining during the last few months involving the 130,000 non-operating employees of the railways. On the other hand, in the dispute involving locomotive engineers statutory holidays were not a factor in the settlement arrived at, because in the view of the workers other things were more important than statutory holidays.

This indicates, I think, particularly in the transportation industries which come under federal jurisdiction, that there should be a flexibility to a degree not provided by this cover-all bill, in order to enable management and labour to work out a settlement. The bill makes no exception for any groups of workers whatsoever. The people who are to come under it are listed in the usual fashion in the first part of the bill and include everybody coming within the jurisdiction of federal labour laws. I contend that the passing of the bill would do away with a necessary flexibility in working out their collective agreements.

When the two parties work out an agreement they look over all the working conditions that exist in the industry. One extra paid statutory holiday may be looked upon as as important or more important than a few cents in extra pay or vice versa, and for parliament to require by law a fixed number of holidays and the conditions of pay for those holidays would be to some extent an intervention in the collective bargaining process of a fairly serious nature in some industries.

In many parts of the world, of course, collective bargaining does not play the important part that it does in Canada. There the conditions of employment are laid down by the government in fairly rigid terms, but in Canada we hold the view that the role of labour legislation that deals with economic issues, as this bill does, is to provide for a basic standard. I contend, as was clear in the summary of statistics and reports given by my hon. friend, that Bill No. 441 goes quite some distance beyond a basic standard in this year 1956.

Some very important gains have been made in this field in recent years, but even with the gains that have been made the terms set out in the bill go beyond what labour law administrators in the provincial or federal jurisdiction consider to be a basic standard. There is some evidence that unorganized workers have shared in the gains and improvements that have been made in recent years. Out of about 380,000 employees coming under federal jurisdiction, some 90 per cent now receive some paid statutory holidays. As my hon. friend said, about 40 per cent of the workers receive eight or more statutory holidays and most of the remainder receive six or seven. Therefore, while my hon. friend may not be away out in the vanguard with regard to the total number of holidays, I do contend that with respect to the pay for such holidays, the overtime rate, with the exception of one province, the province of Saskatchewan, to which he referred no jurisdiction reaches the high point which my hon. friend has reached in the bill.

I should like to refer again to the transportation industry in this year 1956. I am going to take four examples of settlements. Three are in the transportation industry and one happens to be in the radio industry. Employees of radio station CKLW, Windsor, achieved seven statutory holidays with pay through collective bargaining. With regard to the operating railway employees, the locomotive engineers to whom I referred a moment ago, the statutory holiday factor played no important part in the settlement of their dispute. In the case of the C.P.R. dining car employees' dispute, the employees had four statutory holidays prior to this year and they will have seven after this year under the new agreement. In the case of the non-operating railway employees' dispute, prior to 1956 they had gained five statutory holidays through collective bargaining. In the recent settlement they gained a sixth statutory holiday in 1956 and a seventh commencing in 1957. That settlement affected about 130,000 workers.

These four settlements of recent date indicate the great variety of desires on the part of workers in reaching their collective agreements, and the great variety of opinion that exists on the topic covered by the bill. If the provisions of the bill were made law and came into effect on the 1st day of September next, the industries to which I have referred and others to which I have not referred would have to adjust their hard-sought and hard worked-out agreements to conform to the terms of this new legislation, and it would certainly create a situation that I would not want to be a party to bringing about.

I made some reference to the situation as it exists in the provinces. I have no dispute whatsoever with the interpretation that has been placed upon the information by my hon. friend. He has given a fair summary of the situation, though I do contend that as far as this matter is concerned we should not be in the position of prodding the provinces. If we feel it is essential within our own jurisdiction, we should do it on that account only. We should not set ourselves up as advisers, and should not give ourselves the special task of prodding the provinces to do something they do not want to do.

Bill No. 441 provides that there are to be eight specified public holidays for which an employee is to receive his regular wages even if he does not work. The sponsor made that very clear. If he does work he is to receive his regular wages plus a sum equal to twice that amount. In other words he will receive triple wages for that particular statutory holiday if he works. In the light of what we know about collective agreement provisions and provincial legislation, it is clear that this is well beyond anything we have at the present time.

As to the principle of the bill, the question of whether or not legislation to deal with the payment of wages on statutory holidays is necessary, I can tell my hon. friend that my department will continue to study that matter. The possible need for legislation such as the bill presents will be looked into. I welcome the fact that the hon. member has brought the matter before the house at the present time, but if it comes to a vote I shall not be able to support the bill for the reasons I have given.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gregg), as I always do when we come to the discussion of topics of this nature. As he himself indicated, some of the arguments he advanced had a familiar ring.

I may say at once that, as far as I am concerned, I find myself heartily in support of the bill which has been introduced in the house by the member for Winnipeg North Centre. When we consider a bill of this kind or a bill which has been described as a companion to this one and on which we had discussion a short time ago, I feel that those of us who are members of the federal parliament of Canada have a responsibility to think a little bit about the kind or nature of society in which we are moving in Canada, the kind of society in which we hope our children and children's children will find themselves able to live.

I am not able to boast of a great number of years as far as my own span of life is concerned, but even in the relatively short period over which I am able to look back I think I can honestly say that I have seen quite a transformation in the attitude which a great many people in Canada take toward the kind of conditions under which the Canadian people should live and work. I agree that in the legislative field we cannot advance beyond certain reasonable minimums in the standards that are set by legislation; we cannot attempt to achieve the impossible by legislation. Nevertheless when one thinks of the tremendous change that has taken place in our ability to produce goods and services in the last 10, 15, 20 or 25 years, if one assesses the matter fairly I think one must come to the point of admitting that a proposal of the nature of that advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in this bill is not beyond the realm of reasonableness.

The minister suggested that there were grounds on which we could concern ourselves with the setting of certain minimum standards. As far as I am concerned, I would be prepared to argue here or anywhere else that the proposals which are contained in this bill do not go beyond the setting of reasonable minimum conditions which, in this day and age, all Canadian citizens should, by right, be able to enjoy.

It may be perfectly true, as the minister says, that this legislation in the federal field would affect only a relatively small percentage, those coming within federal labour jurisdiction. If that is the case, even in part, I would submit that fact in itself is an argument in favour of the passage of this bill. I would agree with him that it is not particularly the duty of this parliament to try to force the provinces into the position of being obliged to pass certain legislation. I am quite sure that was not what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had in mind when he made some reference to that aspect of the situation. We all recognize the fact that in their own jurisdictions the provinces are supreme. However, I would suggest that there is nothing to prevent us taking upon our own responsibility, in the field of social legislation, action which we consider to be for the welfare of the Canadian people as far as we have legislative concern for it, and to hope that our example may be considered worth copying.

It is not a matter of telling anybody what to do or of intimidation. It is merely a matter, under certain circumstances perhaps, of setting a desirable lead which may be followed by legislators in our provinces or in other parts of the world. I believe that legislation which has come into being in most of the democratic countries from time to time has been materially influenced by what has been done by other powers. I believe that we learn—and I think rightly so—from what the parliament of the United Kingdom does or from what the parliaments in the Scandinavian countries do or, generally speaking, from what is done in parliaments in countries where the people have a somewhat similar outlook to that prevailing in this country on matters of this kind.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that in the time that remains, I will not have the opportunity of saying all that I perhaps might like to say in this phase of the debate. I feel that the basic principles of the bill were set forth quite completely in the introductory speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. From a study of the subject matter of the bill itself and from what he has said in his speech I feel that the members of this house, after a little reflection, will perhaps come to realize that this is a measure which should receive the stamp of approval of this parliament at an early date.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Barnett the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume consideration of the business under discussion before five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Robinson (Simcoe East) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

235. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $143,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,470,423,461 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,675,484,744 will come due for payment in future years), $1,722,797,717.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at five o'clock I was dealing with the present state of the air force auxiliary units and posing the question why, with all the increasing demands for air transport facilities, heightened by the new emphasis on an airborne army and the necessity for mobility of troops; and I think the last point I was raising was the situation relating to the presence of Canadian troops in Europe, who would be faced with the necessity of rapid evacuation if hostilities ever developed on the continent of Europe. We had some discussion about this last night, in which it was suggested that plans for the rapid evacuation of those Canadian service personnel and their dependents are still in the process of formulation, and we are diminishing our air transport facilities. No doubt any comprehensive plan would require the use of air force transport facilities.

To bring these remarks to a conclusion in the form of some concrete questions, I should like to ask the minister why it is that with these increasing demands for air force transport we seem to be diminishing our transport facilities rather than enlarging them. This is the case with the auxiliary squadrons as well as with our regular transport squadrons, or it would seem to me to be so. On May 10 of this year I received an answer to a question about the number and kind of aircraft operated by transport command. Unfortunately I was not too specific with my questions and in reply to the following question—

What aircraft are operated by the R.C.A.F. transport command?

—I got merely a listing of the types of aircraft, such as Lancaster, North Star, C-119, and so forth. I am wondering whether the minister can complete the answer at this time by indicating the number of aircraft of each type that are operational with transport command at the present time? I think it would help to make the answer much more meaningful than it is in the present form.

Finally, returning to the main burden of my presentation at this time, I find it difficult, with the increasing need for transport facilities, to understand why the decision has been taken to disband a squadron as efficient as 424, which has expressed its desire to serve in any capacity. I understand in its representations it particularly mentioned that it would be happy as a transport squadron to supply light transport which would meet the need for a mobile striking force which could stand in an emergency as a unit of civil defence activity, or which could serve in any general role in a transport capacity.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Middlesex East in which he presented the case of 420 London squadron to the minister. That squadron is not being disbanded; it is being reorganized as a radar unit. Again I have had some contact with the personnel of that squadron; I know it is fully operational as a flying unit, and it is their wish that they remain operational in a flying capacity. It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that with the rapidly increasing demands for transport facilities the reserve squadrons, instead of being decreased in flying duties at this time, might well be expanded.

One reason the minister gave in justifying the reorganization of those particular auxiliary units was economy. I hardly think that is a justifiable contention, because as I look at page 338 of the estimates and consider that for the past 10 years the reserve squadrons have been regarded as the backbone of Canadian defence, I think we have been receiving that protection at extremely reasonable cost. Compare it, for example, with the expenditure of $24 million for experimental work on the guided missile we were discussing this afternoon, the "Velvet Glove". I look at the total expenditure for all the auxiliary squadrons last year and I see it was $4,500,000, and this year it is up slightly to $4,750,000. In the light of the total defence expenditure of almost $2 billion, I think that is a very economic way in which to maintain the necessary air force defensive strength of this country.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, I can assure the hon. member that the decisions we have taken with regard to the reserve air force, as I have already said, were taken after a great deal of study, a great deal of consideration and after consultation with the senior officers of all the squadrons whom we called in some time ago.

The reserve air force has given very fine service throughout its history. We have come to the point in defence where we have to look for economies and to consider the results obtained in relation to the moneys spent. One of the things that became evident as we made a study of this problem was that it was very expensive to operate air auxiliary squadrons in places where there were no other air force flying activities, and particularly in those places where there was no other flying activity, as in the case of Hamilton where, as I have already said in the house, it cost upwards of $1 million to provide an airfield for flying for the pilots and air crew of the auxiliary squadron on week ends.

Now, having come to that conclusion—and I do not want to go into all the details of the financial aspects—the question was how could we utilize the services of the persons in the auxiliary squadron most usefully, having regard to any other air force activities in the community and having regard to the territory from which they might draw and the number of people we might expect to continue active in their services? And here I would like to interject, because I do not think there should be any secret about it, that the Sabre jet is not being put into certain auxiliary air squadrons as a major item in the defence of the country. The objections which were quoted by my hon. friend still obtain; Sabres were given to six of the twelve squadrons because they were located in areas where the population was great enough to support squadron activities.

Now, the situation was different in respect of each of the several squadrons. Take the Winnipeg squadron for example. Navigational training is a very important factor. A very expensive school is maintained at Winnipeg to train regular force air crew in navigation. It was felt therefore that the auxiliary squadron there could very usefully participate in training navigators.

As regards the Hamilton squadron, I have mentioned the fact that it was located at an airport which we had to operate solely for the purpose of maintaining week end flying for an auxiliary squadron. As far as London is concerned there was no air defence control and warning unit stationed there and I can assure the hon. member that the assistance of auxiliary personnel there in this role will be very important to the R.C.A.F. It was felt that having regard to the set-up with which the squadron in London could be associated, it could very usefully serve in the role of an aircraft warning and control.

In regard to Calgary, for various reasons it was felt that a small transport training squadron could be usefully located there in addition to other activities being carried on. They were all considered together and then each one was considered separately. These decisions which have been taken represent as I have already said, a good deal of study by the air force, who should be expected to know the most useful functions the auxiliaries can perform from now on, in the foreseeable future. It was with great reluctance that we made the changes we did make, but they were not made haphazardly and without consideration. As regards the general set-up, we will still have six auxiliary squadrons flying. The other six will assume other duties which to the air force seem useful and necessary.

The hon. member asked, with regard to the transport squadrons, the types of planes we have and the numbers of each type. I have them here by squadrons, with the number of aircraft listed. At No. 426 squadron, based at Dorval, there are 12 North Stars. At No. 412 squadron, based at Rockcliffe, there are nine Dakotas, three Expeditors, two North Stars, and one C-5. At No. 435 squadron, based at Edmonton, there are eight C-119's. At No. 4 transport, based at Trenton, there are three North Stars, three C-119's, three Dakotas and one Expeditor. At the R.C.A.F. station, Lachine, there are two Expeditors. At the R.C.A.F. station, Goose Bay, there is one Dakota and one Otter. At the R.C.A.F. station, Churchill, there is one Otter. At No. 436 squadron, Dorval, there are six C-119's. At 108 flight at Rockcliffe, which is a helicopter flight, there are 22 helicopters.

Mr. Dinsdale: I want to thank the minister for that additional information but I cannot entirely agree with his conclusions concerning the reassignment of duties of the particular squadrons we have mentioned. I think perhaps I can press the query by putting it this way. The white paper announces that we are moving toward air portability in our army; and just looking quickly at the list of transport aircraft available which the minister gave the committee just a moment ago it would seem there is going to be a great need for rapid expansion in our air transport facilities.

If this is to be done through regular squadron channels it seems to me it is going to be a very expensive proposition because, as already indicated by the total cost of our reserve operations last year, there is no comparison between the expenditure for the maintenance of reserve air force squadrons as compared with permanent force air squadrons. I quoted the total figure of $4¾ million which, in the light of today's astronomical expenditures, particularly for air defence, is a mere bagatelle. That, of course, is for the reserve only, and it is a mere trifle as compared with the whole defence expenditure.

Referring again to the reply I received to my question of May 10, I inquired as to the number of multi-engine aircraft that would be required to make a fully equipped infantry brigade air portable. The reply was it would depend on the type of aircraft used, of course, but an example could be given. If the C-119 aircraft were used the number required would be 148. As I look at the number of C-119's in service with the transport command at the present time they come to 17 or 18 aircraft, which means we would be short some 100 planes in meeting the requirements for air-lifting one infantry brigade.

I said at the beginning of my remarks concerning the functions of auxiliary squadrons that we have had constant changes of policy in regard to reserve squadron activities. In the first instance they were responsible for the total defence of Canada. We criticized that concept and now, as I said in my remarks of yesterday, I believe it seems that we are beginning to minimize the effectiveness of auxiliary squadrons.

I do not think Canada has sufficient funds to maintain an adequate air defence force on a full time permanent basis. The minister has announced that that is the essential function of Canada's role in the defence of North America; and if we are going to justify the expenditures for the three radar lines we must have adequate aircraft to back up the billion dollar expenditure. I think the total expenditure for the "Pinetree", mid-Canada and D.E.W. lines comes to about $1 billion. That is money down the drain unless we have the personnel and the aircraft to back it up.

While I have defended the radar policy in this house to a limited extent, I know it has been under severe criticism from rather responsible and authoritative sources in Canada as well as in the United States. If we are going to minimize the function of the auxiliary squadrons by arbitrarily disbanding and reorganizing as we have in recent days, it is certainly not going to have a very stimulating and beneficial effect on morale.

We have sufficient difficulty as it is interesting young Canadians in devoting their time to the defence of the country on a permanent basis. I do not think it is in the best interests of the over-all defensive role that Canada is obliged to assume in the defence of North America to allow the pendulum to swing from one extreme where we are dependent on the auxiliary for our total defence to the other extreme. We were told many times that we were adequately defended because we had those ten auxiliary squadrons equipped with Mustangs. Now we are moving in the opposite direction. The minister has stated that there were consultations with the senior officers affected, but I understand that one of the complaints of both 424 and 420 squadrons—I have the information before me—is that the first intimation they had was the minister's announcement in the House of Commons, which came in the midst of their preparations for summer camp operational flying.

Mr. Churchill: I think the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has made out a strong case with which the minister must deal. The minister said there had been consultations with senior officers, but it is interesting to hear that the officers actually connected with the auxiliary squadrons were not taken into conference at all. It reminds me very much of what took place two years ago in connection with the reorganization of the militia. At that time a team of senior officers crossed the continent and then presented a report with regard to the reorganization of the militia. I was in command of a militia unit in Winnipeg and the senior officers appeared in the city, but the first I knew that they were there was when they were leaving. It would appear that the air force people have been treated in exactly the same way.

We have been working for years to make our army a mobile force, and this will require air transport. Why not make use of the trained pilots in the reserve force for that purpose? I think the minister should give us more information about this.

Mr. Campney: Mr. Chairman, what are we talking about? We are really talking about two auxiliary air force squadrons, as there are only two squadrons which are being taken off flying.

Mr. Dinsdale: Four or five hundred personnel.

Mr. Campney: The hon. member gave a figure of $4·75 million as being the cost of the auxiliary air force. That is only a portion of the cost, the pay of the civilians and the service personnel. These squadrons have to have a very substantial and expensive back-up from the regular air force. The figure of $4·75 million represents only a part of the total cost of the auxiliary air force. Then we must consider the cost versus the number of hours flown, which is the only real comparison; and by its very nature the number of hours flown by the auxiliary air force is quite small when compared with the hours flown by the regular force, because the auxiliary aircrew put in only week ends and short-term periods.

Then the hon. member suggested the auxiliary force should be used for air transport purposes in connection with the portability of our infantry which is now under study, and for the needs of the air force. Unquestionably transport work would have to be done by the regular force, because the auxiliary force is only what its name indicates. I hope no one will take my remarks as having any reflection on their ability, because they have done excellent work within the limits of their opportunities.

I do not think the problem is as widespread or as deep as is indicated. It is apparently important locally, as the hon. member has pointed out, but I do not think the provision of transport flying by the auxiliary could ever be the answer to the needs that may arise. And there are still ten of the twelve auxiliary squadrons flying.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister would indicate what is to happen to the young men who belonged to these squadrons, particularly to squadron 424 in Hamilton, who would like to continue their work in the air force reserve but who now have no facilities available? What is to happen to the units which formerly carried out gunnery practice at Mount Hope? Where are they to carry out that practice? Is it to be continued at Mount Hope despite the fact that the squadron is no longer to fly? What is to happen to the experienced pilots to the number of around 30—the minister can correct me if I am wrong—who were part of this reserve unit?

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Campney: As far as Hamilton is concerned, there is in that area a control and warning unit similar to the one we established in London. This has been in existence for quite some time and is at about half strength. I would expect that the personnel of the flying squadron who wished to continue their association with the air force and who chose to do so could very well take up further training in this important field of air force operations. That was given consideration as a supplementary operation when we were discussing the other question. There is a lot of activity in the air force of great importance besides flying. I admit that flying is the spectacular element, but there is much technical work which provides excellent support to the other activities of the air force. I would hope that the personnel in Hamilton would bring this unit up to strength and thus be usefully and I hope with great interest employed on a voluntary basis.

Mrs. Fairclough: What happens to the units from outside Hamilton, which were in the habit of coming to the station at Mount Hope for gunnery practice?

Mr. Campney: I understand that there is no gunnery range at Mount Hope. There is a gunnery range in lake Erie and planes may have stopped off at Mount Hope on the way to that range. There are various other places, and there should be no problem to gunnery practice.

Mrs. Fairclough: The information we had locally was that units from Toronto and other places came to Hamilton to carry out part of their training.

Mr. Campney: I do not know of any gunnery practice being carried on at Mount Hope.

Mr. Dinsdale: As far as the economy plea of the minister is concerned, this appears to be a case of locking the barn door after the horse has been stolen; and I use the reference to horses in a broad sense, of course. I understand that in the past few years large sums of money were invested in the aerodrome at Mount Hope to make it operational for jet flying purposes. The information I have is that millions of dollars have been spent in the past four or five years in preparing the Mount Hope aerodrome for the operations of these squadrons.

It would seem that the idea of air portability is in the early planning stages, and the hope is that the job will be done by the permanent force squadrons. However, judging by the difficulty there is in maintaining recruiting, particularly ground personnel, for our existing permanent force squadrons it would appear that there is not even the remotest possibility of those squadrons being able to carry out these functions. If I were a prophet I would venture to say that when the plans are completed and the department decides to move ahead, it will necessitate some more crash planning and reactivating of auxiliary squadrons that have now been disbanded.

Mrs. Fairclough: Am I to understand that the disbandment of 424 squadron has been deferred pending reconsideration of the whole picture?

Mr. Campney: No, I would not want my hon. friend to take that inference. The decision has been taken and the decision stands as of now; but we have received representations, both myself from civilians in Hamilton and the air force from the reserve officers. The reserve officers have asked whether they might make certain other submissions, which are being made, I presume, shortly. Of course that request was granted, because if there were further submissions we would want to hear them, but there has been no change in the original decision.

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to make just one more plea to the minister on this basis. The city of Hamilton has always been very proud of its military men in all branches of the services; its militia has been a source of great pride to Hamiltonians generally, and it has a good auxiliary naval force. It seems too bad that one arm of the services should be left out of active participation. I know it is a matter of great regret to Hamiltonians generally and those who were members of the 424 squadron in particular.

In all seriousness I ask the minister to give great consideration to this matter, because it is not a light thing to discourage so many persons who are actively engaged in military exercises of this sort, particularly when their activities have been a source of pride and a matter of interest for a quarter of a million people in that district.

Mr. Churchill: I do not quite follow the minister in his remarks concerning air portability for the army, which he suggests is in the planning stage, and then his argument that the reserve air force, for reasons of economy and other reasons, must be reduced in size. He is having great difficulty in keeping his present air force up to strength. According to the Globe and Mail of July 6, 1956, the air force recruited 8,153 in the course of the year, for a net gain of 1,580. However, we are constantly hearing about the loss of air crew and changes in personnel. In the case of pilots, age rapidly plays its part, and they have to be retired.

The minister says he is planning for transport by the permanent air force. Yet according to the figures in the answer provided to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on May 10, 148 aircraft would be required to airlift an infantry brigade. How many men in the air force would be required to man and service 148 transport aircraft, and how is the minister going to provide those? Is he going to enlarge the permanent air force to that extent in the face of the present troubles he is having in keeping up the strength of the services? Surely the intervening period while this planning is going on would be the time for the utilization of the reserve air force. Experience would be gained by utilizing pilots and men in the reserve air force, and within a year or two perhaps a clear picture would be presented with regard to a major plan for air transport for the army.

The Chairman: Defence research and development.

Mr. Green: There has been some discussion concerning the missile project known as the "Velvet Glove". The minister said on July 18 that the total cost to date is just under $24 million. Can he tell the house whether that project has been concluded or whether there will still be further money to be spent in connection with it and, if so, how much?

Mr. Campney: There will be some further expenditures—we do not know exactly how much, but not a great amount—in phasing in the "Velvet Glove" project to the "Sparrow" project, which will be taking place as an operational exercise because we shall be making "Sparrow" in Canada. All the know-how and research and so on is being directed from the "Velvet Glove" into the development of the "Sparrow". Where one will begin and the other leave off is still uncertain as to cost, so that there will be some further expenditures identifiable with the "Velvet Glove" project to bring it into phase with the other, but the major expenditures are all as a result of the "Velvet Glove".

Mr. Green: What would be the approximate figure?

Mr. Campney: It would be very difficult at this stage to give a definite figure with any certainty, but it is a matter of probably $2 million or $3 million. I am not stating that as a fact, because we have not the fact.

Mr. Green: What is the total amount to be spent on the guided missile program during the present fiscal year? The minister said on July 18 that the portion of the increase in the vote for the defence research board for this year to be spent on guided missiles would be $6·8 million; but what is the total expenditure, including of course that additional expenditure?

Mr. Campney: We have estimated it now at something approximating $10 million to $11 million.

Mr. Green: That is including the $6 million?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Green: Is that money all to be spent on the "Sparrow" type of guided missile?

Mr. Campney: That sum will all be expended either in connection with phasing in the "Velvet Glove", as I have mentioned, or in the development of the "Sparrow", related to that project.

Mr. Green: The "Sparrow" missile, as I understand it, is a United States production. Is that right?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Green: How much of this money is to be spent in purchasing these guided missiles from the United States?

Mr. Campney: I am not able to tell the hon. member at the moment just what will be purchased from the United States. The other phase will be the tooling up to make the missile here in Canada. These missiles, will be made in Canada under licence by my colleague from the owners of the rights in the United States. Before we get into production, and it will be some time before the plants are tooled up, we will be purchasing some. The exact number we will purchase has not been determined yet.

Mr. Green: Can the minister give us the approximate division of expenditures for guided missiles during this fiscal year as between money spent in Canada and money spent in the United States?

Mr. Campney: The best estimate we can make at the moment would be probably $1 million to $2 million in the United States and the rest in Canada.

Mr. Green: When the estimates of the department were under consideration on June 21 I dealt briefly with the question of making some arrangement whereby parliament would have some check on the money being spent by the defence research board. As I understand it, and the minister can correct me if I am wrong, hitherto parliament has had absolutely no idea of how this money was being spent by the defence research board. There has never been a committee of any kind investigate the activities of the board, though they have been spending many millions of dollars. As it now turns out, the $24 million spent on the "Velvet Glove" project went largely down the drain.

Mr. Campney: No, I would not agree with that. We can differ on that.

Mr. Green: Certainly a good many million dollars went down the drain on the "Velvet Glove" project.

Mr. Campney: If you look at it from that point of view then I suppose that in the development of any guided missile program one can say that money goes down the drain, but this is an experimental business and I think in most of the great countries much greater sums of money have been expended on similar types of projects, sometimes without success.

Mr. Green: Well, it was an expenditure that did not pay off very well. Let us put it that way. Has the minister any suggestions as to a method by which parliament would be able to check the expenditures of the defence research board? As he knows, during the war there were committees on war expenditures in different sessions, and I think no harm was done to the country and no important secrets were divulged. That practice did give parliament some check on the large sums of money which were being spent. Has the minister any suggestions tonight as to ways in which parliament can be brought into this picture so there can be some check on the expenditures being made by the defence research board?

Mr. Campney: The details of the item are set up in exactly the same way as in other branches of the department, as the hon. member will see if he will look at page 339. As to the projects in which the defence research board is engaged, a considerable number of them are classified, though not all. I did try in the white paper this year, as I think the hon. member may have noticed, to describe much more fully the work and the projects of the defence research board in general terms than has been done heretofore.

With respect to whether there should be any different method of investigating these expenditures than the usual method that applies to the rest of the branches of the department, I do not know that I have any suggestion. I do not know whether any suggestion is required. It is part of our department. It is true that it deals largely with technical and scientific projects, a great number of which are classified, but I think the details as set out here and the comparative details—I have amplified them with relation to the increases—show generally the operational picture of the defence research board.

Mr. Green: This year there has been a special committee of the house investigating the activities of the government in the field of non-military research. Of course that committee had no power to delve into expenditures for military research. Would the minister have any objection to a committee of some sort being set up during the next session with power to inquire into expenditures for military research? As the minister knows, these expenditures have doubled within the last three or four years. In 1954-55 the amount asked was $50,400,000. In each of the two preceding years it was only $42 million. This year we are being asked for over $79 million. Would the minister have any objection to the setting up of a committee of the type I have mentioned during the next session?

Mr. Campney: I presume this is a problem that is common to all countries engaged in defence research, and I certainly would not want to give an answer to the hon. member now. I would want to consider the situation and I would also want to discuss it with the head of the defence research board in relation to the activities of the board. I shall be glad to look into the matter, but I would not want to make any commitment at the moment.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, some time ago I directed some questions to the minister with regard to the security guards at the defence research board. At that time I believe he said he hoped that a more suitable classification would soon be established for the security guards which would remove some of the discrepancy involved in the situation in which they find themselves by reason of having been placed on a 48-hour week compared with a 42½-hour week formerly worked, and with no increase in remuneration to compensate for the additional time.

As I understand the situation, the matter of compensation is of considerably less importance to these men than the extra time spent on duty. I wonder whether the minister has any further information on this subject. Has any consideration been given to it, and just what is the outcome of the consideration?

Mr. Campney: I remember the hon. member's question very well and, as I said I would, I asked the defence research board to review the situation. The last report I had was a couple of weeks ago, and it was that the defence research board personnel section and the civil service commission were engaged in a study to see what could be evolved in relation to the point. I have had no recommendation yet, so the matter is still under consideration.

Mrs. Fairclough: I understand these men do not come under the civil service commission. The minister probably can tell me if that is right. It seems to me that the minister himself told me they did not come under the civil service commission. I believe some of the difficulty has arisen through an effort on the part of somebody somewhere to try to classify these men as watchmen. I am sure the minister must know that the work they do is of a different nature from that of an ordinary watchman in any of the other public buildings wherever they may be situated.

This is a matter that has given rise to considerable dissatisfaction, and I must say that I do not blame these men. Their rate of pay is not very high. I believe that even now it is somewhere in the neighbourhood of $2,750 a year, and the last raise they received, at the time the increase was given to the whole civil service, was only a matter of some $150 a year. Yet they have had an increase in their working hours of about 11 per cent. As the minister knows, in the ordinary course of procedure in this house it is not possible to explore a situation like this and gain any positive answers to questions.

I would think the minister should now be able to assure the house that these men are going to be considered—and properly considered—and not just simply dumped overboard in an effort to even up an employment situation which may be troubling the defence research board. If these men properly fall in a class which should be classified as watchmen, there might be some excuse for it; but I understand they are taken off their regular duties and are assigned to special work on occasion by reason of the fact that they are classified as reliable officers—or maybe I could use the expression "extra reliable"—who have been assigned to that particular duty.

If the minister is not prepared to answer this question tonight and give some reasonable explanation, or to assure the house that these men will be considered, I think there must be some place where, during the course of this session, this matter can be brought up again, apart from just on the orders of the day where a simple question does not permit the sort of reply that would be a reasonable reply to the question asked.

Mr. Campney: I can assure the hon. member that not only will the situation to which she refers be considered but that it is being considered at the present time. However, I have not had any final recommendation. Until I have it is difficult to deal with the matter any further.

Mrs. Fairclough: It has been really some time now, has it not? It has been a matter of a month or more than a month. It has been a matter of six or seven weeks since it was first brought up in this house. How much time does the minister need to consider a matter like this?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mrs. Fairclough: No; I want an answer.

Mr. Campney: I do not know how much time I need. I have put the matter in hand and I have asked for a recommendation. I have asked for a review by the board and the relevant experts of the commission who have yet to advise us on these matters. Whenever I get a recommendation I shall certainly be prepared to deal with the matter, but I cannot set the time limit as to when that recommendation will come forward. I shall do my best to expedite it, in view of the observations just made.

Mrs. Fairclough: Will the minister advise the officers who are in charge of this matter that he does not want it placed at the bottom of the heap, to come up four or five years from now?

Mr. Campney: Will do.

Mr. Harkness: The last of these details under defence research and development is entitled "all other expenditures" and is in the amount of a little over $6½ million, or upwards of twice what it was last year. An item of this sort I think can only be described as a sort of grab-bag item. I wonder if the minister can explain why it is necessary to have an item of that kind in the amount of $6½ million for which the estimates do not indicate any real reason? Can he tell us what is the purpose of it?

Mr. Campney: This sum is for expenditures in connection with special and classified projects of both the army and the navy.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Chairman: Mutual aid.

Mr. Harkness: Under mutual aid, at page 340, there are two questions I should like to ask in connection with transfers to NATO countries of equipment from service stock. The first is in connection with tanks and armoured fighting vehicles, $1,169,000. I wonder whether the minister can tell us what tanks or other armoured fighting vehicles those are and to what country they are going. Will he give us the same information with regard to aircraft and engines, which come to over $43 million? What aircraft and engines are these and to what country or countries are they being sent?

Mr. Campney: I have not definite particulars about the tanks. I presume they are the older type, such as the Sherman. To answer the second part of the question, I may say that these items indicate what we propose to offer; they have not necessarily yet either been offered or accepted in all cases. The aircraft and engines include the 75 Sabre jets which are being allocated to Germany, together with about a $4 million carry-over to complete the spares which were allocated last year to Greece and Turkey.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): At what value are the 75 Sabre jet aircraft put in this estimate?

Mr. Campney: The value is $39,092,500.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Is that the value of the aircraft as transferred? I know what heading it comes under, but is that the value of the aircraft as transferred?

Mr. Campney: I understand that is the value after they are reconditioned.

The Deputy Chairman: Does that complete the discussion on mutual aid?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: Item 235 is now before the committee.

Mr. Green: Does this NATO air crew training come under mutual aid?

Mr. Campney: It is at page 340, a little more than a third of the way down the page.

Mr. Green: That is the figure of $53,055,000?

Mr. Campney: Yes.

Mr. Green: Has the government given any consideration to extending the air training plan to include young men from the other nations of the commonwealth? According to the reports by the department there have been men from several different countries which belong to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, including Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Italy, The Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Turkey and the United Kingdom. But, as I understand it, there is no provision whatever for permitting young men from other parts of the commonwealth except the United Kingdom to take part in this program. Has any consideration been given to extending it so they can participate?

As the minister knows, one of the key factors in winning the last war was the training here of young airmen from all over the commonwealth. It seems strange to me that Canada has never made any provision to permit these other parts of the commonwealth to take part in this scheme. It probably would not cost us anything, because the governments of the other commonwealth nations would have to pay their fair share. Why should this scheme not be extended to include the other nations such as Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and for that matter also India, Pakistan and Ceylon?

Mr. Campney: As far as I know the idea put forward by the hon. member has never been considered since the end of the second world war. Certainly I have no knowledge of any requests from any of the commonwealth nations in the short time I have been minister. I presume that the reason is that they have their own facilities for training. At any rate, it has not been considered since I have been minister.

Mr. Green: Has Canada ever offered these training facilities to any of those other nations?

Mr. Campney: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Green: Is there any way in which Canada is co-operating today in defence matters with nations of the commonwealth other than the United Kingdom?

Mr. Campney: We have liaison with all the commonwealth nations, I think, in all the services, and we do co-operate particularly in matters of defence research.

Mr. Green: Is there any active co-operation with the other nations of the commonwealth?

Mr. Campney: I do not know what the hon. member means by "active co-operation". We all keep in touch with each other and with what each other is doing, but there is no financial assistance if that is what the hon. member has in mind, or working our defence forces in unison or in work of that nature, so far as I know.

Mr. Green: Is there any exchange of officers between the forces of the different commonwealth nations? The minister will remember that before the second war there was close co-operation in defence matters among all the nations of the commonwealth, and conferences were held at different times to promote that co-operation. If it had not been for that the war might very well have been lost. For practically a whole year the commonwealth stood alone.

It does seem to me a shame that 11 years after the war most of that co-operation has vanished. Would it not be possible for Canada to help restore it by extending the provisions of this air training plan to make it possible for the airmen from the other nations of the commonwealth to get their training here?

Mr. Campney: I am not sure that any suggestions along that line would be well received, not because they would not be appreciated but because, as I have said, these countries all have their own air training schemes.

Reverting to the other observation made by the hon. member just a few minutes ago, we do have a good deal in the way of communication and visits. For example, I can think of two instances and there may be a good many more. I know in our army staff college there are some Indian officers. The army exchanges some officers with Australia. A good many things of that kind are going on all the time. We have visits from the senior officers of the other commonwealth nations, and we make return visits. There is a general liaison, but no specific relationships such as the hon. member has now suggested, namely an air training scheme. There is nothing of that nature.

Mr. Green: Would there be any serious handicap in the way of extending the air training plan to cover those other nations?

Mr. Campney: Well, that raises a lot of questions. I am not sure what is in the hon. member's mind, whether he means on basis of payment by those nations or whether he means it would be free. All these questions would have to be considered. So far as I know there has never been any suggestion about it since world war II. There is no question about the advantages accruing during the war. As I say, the period of my personal knowledge is two years, and there have been no developments of that nature during that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before this discussion is completed would the minister tell the committee the basis upon which the determination is made relative to the share to be paid by each of the NATO nations for a given purpose in connection with mutual aid, for instance, and the recent gift by Canada to West Germany of some 75 aircraft? Will the minister explain what actually takes place in the NATO organization, how the determination is arrived at and how the designation of a particular country is made? That is something that has never been clearly placed before the committee at any time.

Mr. Campney: The amount of mutual aid and the nature of the commodities which make up mutual aid is entirely within the jurisdiction of the donor countries; in other words, we say we have certain elements of our defence equipment we would be willing to give for mutual aid. The standing group which, as I said the other day, consists of a subcommittee, I think, of the military committee, on which there is a representative from the United States, one from the United Kingdom and one from France, has made known to it the equipment available. The subcommittee is supposed to canvass the situation and recommend who it thinks should receive this equipment, and usually that is carried out. We have the final decision, but the recommendation comes from that subcommittee. If the hon. member would care to look at page 19, paragraph 64 of the white paper for 1955-56 he will see what is set out there outlines the procedure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. Campney: I might read this into the record. Paragraph 64 of the white paper of 1955-56 sets out the following, which is a short summary of the procedure that is carried on:

> To ensure that materials and equipment transferred by Canada as mutual aid do go to the nation or nations able to use it to the best advantage of NATO as a whole, offers are made initially through the standing group or the NATO secretariat. These bodies evaluate the relative needs of prospective recipient countries and make recommendations as to the most effective allocations. Canada normally accepts the recommendations of these NATO agencies and the equipment is then formally offered through diplomatic channels to the nations concerned. For their part, individual member countries, when indicating a requirement for specific items or groups of items, undertake certain financial obligations relating to costs such as those for transfer and, as applicable, for installation and maintenance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Possibly I did not make myself exactly clear. What is the basis for determination as to the total contribution to be made in this connection by each of the countries? Is it determined on a per capita basis, or how is it determined? How does this NATO organization determine that Canada, as one of the member nations, should make a contribution, or could make a contribution, of 75 aircraft to West Germany? Why would Canada be placed in the position of a country able to make their contribution, rather than any of the members of the NATO organization? That is what I want to know.

Mr. Campney: Well, the decision as to offering 75 Sabre jets is a decision within the jurisdiction of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is it suggested to Canada that Canada might do that?

Mr. Campney: No; we look over our situation and, in the light of our needs, the changes in our position and so on, we decide that we have certain material that we could dispose of and which might be useful to other NATO nations, and we make that known to NATO. That is the first time the NATO standing group or secretariat comes into the picture at all. They advise us what they think we should do with the material. We ordinarily take their recommendation and carry it out. Through diplomatic channels we find out whether the nation recommended is willing to receive the material, but the decision as to what constitutes our mutual aid is ours solely and completely.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the minister has announced that 75 Sabre jets are being supplied to the West German air force. I wonder if he could tell the committee whether any suggestion has been made that the airmen who will fly these jet aircraft will come under the NATO training scheme and be trained in Canada?

Mr. Campney: The question of the training for the pilots of these Sabre jets is now under study and no decision has yet been reached with respect to it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Does the West German air force have its own training facilities?

Mr. Campney: They are just being constituted now.

Mr. Green: The minister must know whether the West German pilots are to be trained—

Mr. Campney: Why must I know? I do not know.

Mr. Green: Pardon?

Mr. Campney: Why must I know?

Mr. Green: Goodness gracious, surely the minister must know. West Germany is a partner in NATO and surely the problem has been discussed; if it has not been discussed it should be.

Mr. Campney: It is being discussed now.

Mr. Green: Is there any suggestion that West German pilots will be trained in Canada?

Mr. Campney: There is no decision as yet.

Mr. Green: Are we going to be put in the position that Canada will be training West German pilots when she will not train pilots from other parts of the commonwealth? Is there any danger of that happening?

Mr. Campney: I cannot answer that categorically, but I have already pointed out that we are cutting down our training for NATO and not building it up.

Item agreed to.

236. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $249,175.

Mr. Dinsdale: Item No. 236 seems to cover all the general services and special grants to military associations and organizations. There are two associations closely connected with the air force that are not mentioned under this item, and I am wondering if the minister could inform the committee what is the status of the air force association and the air force benevolent fund association in the regular air force set-up? They are housed in Beaver barracks. There would seem to be some connection with the air force organization, but nowhere in the estimates of the Department of National Defence do I see any reference to the activities of the air force benevolent fund association.

I noticed that the hon. member for Queens tried to get some information concerning the activities of the air force benevolent fund on the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs. The minister concerned informed him, as recorded at page 5900 of Hansard, that this particular benevolent fund along with the navy benevolent fund had no connection with the Department of Veterans Affairs.

I receive regularly the report of the army benevolent fund and I find it extremely useful information, because from time to time I have ex-servicemen in my constituency who require the assistance of this particular fund. I have not been able to get any inside information, nor have I been able to obtain a report on the activities of the equivalent air force benevolent fund. Has the minister any information on this subject?

Mr. Campney: I have in my hand the thirteenth annual report for last year of the air force benevolent fund, which I think is replete with information which my hon. friend might like to have. The organization has no official connection with the air force. It is an incorporated group which under its charter has powers to handle certain funds which have been built up over the years, as the hon. member knows. We have no jurisdiction with respect to it, so far as I know; in fact I am sure we have not.

Mr. Dinsdale: Could the minister indicate whether any services are provided for the benevolent fund or does it operate purely as an autonomous body?

Mr. Campney: We do work in co-operation with them, I understand, and furnish them with information about cases and so on, but we have no official responsibility for the handling of their funds or the allocating of their loans or gifts. They have a board which deals with that.

Mr. Dinsdale: Who pays the rent for them at Beaver barracks? Does the air force provide that service?

Mr. Campney: We do small things like that. We give them space here and there and we co-operate with them because we feel they are doing very useful work. I believe we do give them some space at Beaver barracks.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the Department of National Defence. We come now to the Department of Defence Production, item 85, to be found on page 16 with the details commencing on page 168.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

85. Departmental administration and payments to Canadian Commercial Corporation and other corporate agencies for services provided in connection with defence purchasing and production, $6,145,727.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, when I retreated from the position of quarterback in the last debate I did not realize I was going to be the fullback in this debate commencing at 20 minutes past nine.

I would like to say in the beginning that there seems to be considerable concern about the situation which confronts our aircraft industry in this country today. I think that concern involves not only the question of employment but it involves as well the question of the maintenance of adequate facilities. In times of emergencies it also involves the maintenance of qualified trained technical personnel to meet such emergencies.

In the discussion which took place in connection with the defence estimates I questioned the minister along certain lines, because I felt quite sure there would be some question raised at a later date as to whether my remarks referred to the Department of Defence Production or whether in fact they referred to defence or transport. I said at that time, and I still feel, that if we have to cross these lines this seems a logical place for such a discussion, because I think everyone in the house would look to the leadership of the Minister of Defence Production to bring about any liaison that is required to deal with problems of this kind.

First of all let me say this. I cannot accept the theory as I heard it expressed in one way or another by the minister that the government has no responsibility in connection with employment in defence industries. I have heard him say, for example, that A. V. Roe is a private company, that they manage their own affairs and he does not interfere.

It may be true that in many industries the government does not have to play any particular role, as there may be possibilities of diversification of one sort and another. That would apply even to industries within the aircraft industry. A manufacturer of electronic items in connection with control apparatus for the CF-100 may also be making hi-fi sets. But when you get down to the companies actually involved in the production of aircraft you find it is most difficult for them to diversify, to manufacture other things which will keep their production lines rolling.

This industry certainly has reached fairly important proportions in so far as our total production capacity is concerned. I think the minister said that at the present time the aircraft industry ranks ninth in value of production and third in employment. That is readily understandable when we realize the various projects being carried on at the present time.

There is the CF-105 being manufactured by A. V. Roe at Malton. There is the continuing production of the CF-100 with its various marks, the latest being mark VI. We have the CL-28, which is the Britannia maritime reconnaissance plane, a revised version of a British transport plane which is to go into production at Canadair. We have the CS2F anti-submarine aircraft being manufactured by de Havilland at Toronto. There is the development by Orenda of the PS-13 turbojet engine, which gives indications of having the most powerful thrust of any engine in the field today. There is the R18-220 engine to be used in the CS2F, which I understand is being manufactured under licence. As far as the engines for the CL-28 are concerned, they are being purchased. The minister stated that the quantity required was not large enough for us to become involved in manufacturing, that it was cheaper to buy.

One of the chief concerns today is the indication of a slow-down in the production line at A.V. Roe at Malton. I said this afternoon, and I think I may be permitted to repeat, that this could be caused probably by any one of three reasons. It may be that the CF-105 program is not advancing rapidly enough. After having inspected the facilities and seen the aircraft my personal feeling is that it will not come along just as fast as was expected, but it seems to be making very rapid progress. I would say that any slow-down there is not the result of any failure on the part of the company to go along with the development of this very radical plane.

That leaves a couple of more ideas why there may be a stretchout in this program.

[Mr. Hamilton (York West).]

It may be that there are not enough men being induced to join the air and ground crews of the air force. That is a very serious situation and is one with which the Minister of National Defence will have to grapple. According to the information given to the house there is every indication that this may be a serious problem in the future. It may be that one reason there are not enough men coming along to man these fighter planes is that we are not fitting them basically to fly the type of plane they would be called upon to fly in peacetime. They may be expecting to get full training in the armed forces to equip them to do that job.

I think there is real reason for concern over this slow-down. There is nothing to fill in during what might be called the bust period in connection with the wartime type of production. It seems to me that there is a responsibility upon the government to work out the solution of that problem in industry, especially when it is almost impossible for the industry to diversify their production lines.

What is the result of the failure of the government to accept responsibility for looking into this? What is the result of the lack of continuity on the production line? One thing we can be sure of, the taxpayer is the one who is going to pay. Notwithstanding the information we have had here, notwithstanding the indication that there are various types of contracts which may be entered into —I have heard them referred to as a cost-plus plan, a target price with incentive features and a negotiated price—there can be only one result, and that is that the taxpayer must pay more money for the individual item which is bought. I say that notwithstanding the types of contracts we have heard about, that will be the result. At page 14 of the report of the department we find the following:

> A continuing increase in production efficiency resulted in decreased costs for the CF-100. Further development of this aircraft was undertaken during the year to obtain more powerful armament, greater altitude, and improved manoeuvrability. Series 11 and 14 Orenda jet engines for both the Sabre and CF-100 continued to be produced satisfactorily, but at a reduced rate reflecting the reduction in aircraft output.

Similarly we find this statement by the Minister of National Defence at page 6124 of Hansard of July 18:

> Similarly, in the case of the CF-100, development costs prior to the production of the first plane were given last year as being around $122 million. The current unit cost, with spares, is a little over $700,000.

The minister went on to deal with the Sabre and his words there were as follows:

> Although we made a number of improvements in the Sabre, our aircraft industry also managed to work out substantial production economies and the current unit cost of a Sabre mark VI, complete with spares, is now about $340,000.

There is one point that is missed. The A. V. Roe plant in Toronto is set up and equipped to produce 25 planes a month of the type we are talking about. When the production is cut down to 10, whether it is a negotiated price or a target price with incentive features, you are still going to pay more money for your plane. A formula has been worked out to cover the over-all picture which indicates that $1 must be spent on the actual production of the plane as against $1.35 for administration and general overhead. That is considered a good ratio if you are producing at your full production rate. But if you cut your production rate down from 25 to 10 then obviously you change the ratio in so far as your administrative expenses are concerned as compared with the actual money spent in producing the plane.

The Minister of National Defence said today that a plane of this type now costs about $700,000. It is conceivable that because of this cut-back in production we are paying a few hundred dollars more for a plane than if the production line were in full use. Of course there is the further problem of employment, and I think it is a very serious one. I have here a copy of the Globe and Mail of Friday, June 29, 1956, with the heading:

"Breach of Faith".
Union Criticizes Howe Over Malton Layoffs.

We might read this and we can see exactly what the situation is in connection with employment in a case of this kind. It says:

The federal government yesterday was charged with a breach of faith following an announcement that an estimated 500 workers will be laid off at Avro aircraft's Malton plant. The charge was contained in a telegram sent to defence production minister Howe, whose departmental request that the production rate of CF-100 jet interceptors be stretched out, resulted in the lay-offs. . . .

In January, 1955, the company laid off 1,100 workers, cutting the monthly production of CF-100's by 40 per cent. Three months later, another 1,000 workers were given notice of a gradual layoff.

It is no wonder there is a feeling that it may be impossible to maintain that type of production line to which the minister has referred as avoiding the troughs or periods of low activity.

There were attempts in connection with this particular company to produce other types of aircraft, and apparently they did not meet with the entire approval of the minister. I know that during the course of this debate reference was made to the production of the jet liner. I think the minister said that was a closed book and need not refer to that again, but it seemed to me that the indications from his answers were that it was not so much the start of the Korean war that had resulted in the closing of this production line, which I think might have been the salvation from the standpoint of maintaining a clean-cut through-put in connection with that production line, but the fact that he had decided that the plane was not going to live up to expectations. As a matter of fact it might be wise to see what he said about it:

My hon. friend referred to our first attempt at building a jet liner. It is true we had the manufacturing capacity and we wished to keep a nucleus staff working at Malton. Therefore we undertook to produce a jet passenger plane. We brought it to the prototype stage; and while it is true it flew, there was everything wrong with it. It had to carry sand bags in the tail to fly properly.

Mr. Dinsdale: Not according to reports.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I get my reports and the hon. member gets his. I have to trust mine and I am sure his are not accurate. Nevertheless, we spend the money allocated to us for specific projects, and we get reports which we believe are accurate. It so happened that the Comet was being developed at the time, and although the Comet did not come into production until two or three years later there was nothing encouraging about the results of that prototype at Avro on which we had spent $6·6 million.

I thought all along that there was an indication that we interrupted this particular production because of a crisis in the Korean war but, if I am to believe this type of evidence, it was because the minister had no faith in the aircraft itself. But I want to tell you this, that apparently the company did not feel that way, and the people who worked on the project did not feel that way.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Why did the company not keep on with the jet liner? We did not stop it. We were paying 75 per cent of the cost as a joint venture, and we said we would not contribute our 75 per cent any more. We did not stop the company. It was their jet liner, and they could have carried on.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I should think the minister would know the answer to that very easily. He happens to have under his control, as one of the many features, Trans-Canada Air Lines. If he says he does not like the plane at Malton I am sure he is not going to like it anywhere else, and the company would have been very foolish under those circumstances to put any more funds into it.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I thought they had customers for it all over the United States. That was your statement the other day.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It was not my statement, but I should think that anyone producing here would have a basic loyalty to a Canadian product, and I think in this particular case that was lacking in the minister. The article in the Toronto Telegram of June 30, 1956, says:

Company Denies Charging Politics Grounded Plane

Avro aircraft officials still think their jet liner is a wonderful airplane. But defence production minister Howe today insisted that the prototype "was hopeless".

At the same time Avro vice president Fred T. Smye denied any Avro official had claimed there was political interference on the jet liner project, abandoned in 1950 to put the company's full production weight behind the CF-100 fighter.

"You would have to be out of your mind to say that," said Mr. Smye.

I suppose you would if you were dealing with this government every day of the week.

Mr. Howe said in a telephone interview that his inspectors had told him the prototype, Canada's first commercial-type jet aircraft, had not passed inspection and never would.

"That plane was hopeless," said the minister.

Mr. Howe told the House of Commons yesterday the "plane had to carry sand in the tail to fly."

Avro argued the sand was ballast in the wings to make up the weight of equipment not installed in the test model.

"Sand in the tail—sand in the wings," said Mr. Howe. "Inspectors told me they would never pass the plane. Besides, the whole thing is a dead duck so why bring it up."

Avro, aided by an $8 million government loan, built the prototype in 1949. However, there were no bidders for the first jet air liner built in North America.

Mr. Howe said lack of buyer interest and increased production of CF-100 jets for the Korean war were other factors which had killed the jet-liner project.

Avro feels Mr. Howe should regard the plane more highly. "It is still a wonderful airplane," the company said.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): May I interject that the abuse I am getting from my hon. friend and the Toronto press for stopping the building of an airplane in Toronto does not compare in any way with the abuse I got for carrying one on in the city of Montreal. I may say that in those days the Globe and Mail knew how to write bitter editorials and they certainly gave us the full dose. I fought the Conservative party all through an election for trying to blame the government for building an airplane, so I guess I can take with some equanimity any mild abuse my hon. friend can hand out for stopping the building of an airplane.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): If I have abused the minister I will say that it is the first time I have done so.

Mr. Dickey: No.

An hon. Member: The minister is sensitive.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It may be that I have hit a sensitive area for the first time. It may be that I myself have a feeling of loyalty to a plant in an area with which I am closely identified, which has made me say the things I have, but I still think they are very important. Although I did not take part as a candidate in the campaign the minister mentioned, I think he is a little off base when he says that we argued over the efficiency or stability of an aircraft. I think the major issue at that time, and apparently people still do not see it, was the machinations of the Electric Boat Company and the sale of the plant in Montreal.

Mr. Dickey: Oh, no; it was the North Star aircraft.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): You were too young to know what the debate was about. It was not about that at all.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That is what it was about, but you tried to make it appear that it was not about that.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I will read you some clippings. It was whether or not the North Star was safe.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): At least at this hour in the house on a Friday night we apparently have some interest in a particular problem. I am duly grateful for that if I have contributed anything to it. But this is not the only plane of this type that has had trouble obtaining the official sanction of the minister. I think he possibly had something to do with another one. I do not know, but he can answer me later. I do not want to be interrupted at every stage of the debate, but I noticed in the Toronto Telegram of January 20 of this year that Mr. Notman indicated that the government had killed a new plane project at Canadair. Which particular project it was and what particular part the minister played in it I do not know, but it is an indication, as I say, that there is a fairly heavy hand exercised in this business.

What could be done in a case like this? We are always accused of standing up and criticizing and we are told, "You do not have to worry, you are in the opposition. We are the people who worry nights whether or not the money is spent wisely." If you want to look for a solution of some kind I think you can find it right in the statistics. We have had some of them before us in discussing the estimates of the Department of National Defence. At that time I read from the statement by the Minister of National Defence concerning the question of the all-up air transport of a brigade as far as our armed forces are concerned, and I shall read it again. He said, as found at page 5212 of Hansard:

> For example, if aircraft such as the C-119 were used, apart altogether from the cost of ground facilities and air crew, but allowing for reserve aircraft, it would require 148 planes, at a cost of about $150 million, to provide a one-up lift for an army brigade without its heavy equipment.

This certainly is the direction toward which all armies are heading at the present time, and is a swing away from the parachute type of troop to the airborne transport troop. The minister referred to 148 planes and $150 million. Well, that might have staggered me when I came here first, but when I saw a defence budget two years in a row of $1,775 million it appeared to me something that we could easily handle by cutting out some of the waste and extravagance that exists; and $150 million spent on the production of this type of aircraft and stretched over a three or four year period would produce the wherewithal to transport an army brigade.

There is nothing remarkable about this type of production. As a matter of fact it is used regularly in the United States. There is not a civil air transport that has not been the result of some prior type of war transport and, as a matter of fact, the civil authorities have gone one step further in the United States. They have provided a leasing plan whereby when the plane is produced and if the government has taken any part in the original order a leasing arrangement is made with the civil air transport companies. By doing this they have a ready made reserve civil air fleet. As a matter of fact, as I said before, one of the provisions of such leasing agreement is that the plane is subject to recall on about 48 hours' notice, and the crew must be supplied.

If anyone says we do not need anything like this I think they are really whistling in the dark. If such a plan had been inaugurated at the time the jet liner was first conceived I am quite convinced we would not have been reading headlines like these: "Pilots Say D.E.W. Lift Craft Are Obsolete, Dangerous"; "Pilots Blame Ottawa for Airlift Bungle"; "York Type Transports Grounded".

If you want to know how we stand in connection with the civil air picture you might take a look at a return I received, as found at page 3608 of Hansard of May 4. There you will find that when the D.E.W. air lift started we had 286 multi-engined planes. Sixty-nine of them belonged to Trans-Canada Air Lines and there were 148—

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It may be time but I will certainly have plenty of opportunity to continue. There are now 454 such planes. I am not going to tell you all about those planes. You can read the return for yourself. However, there were none manufactured in Canada. They were imported from Great Britain, Italy and chiefly from the United States. It might also be of interest to hon. members to know that there were only 39 that were new and 129 were used. That gives a fairly clear indication of the position of civil aircraft in Canada. It gives a fairly clear indication that there is and will continue to be an opportunity to utilize the production lines of our aircraft factories in building transports of the type we can make use of in the northern areas of this country.

Someone may say that 148 planes are not very many. I can tell you that in the Avro brief before the Gordon commission it was stated that they could successfully develop and build on an economic basis and compete anywhere if they had an order for 100 planes. I am not going to read that to you tonight, sir—

Mr. Hosking: Your time is up.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): We have a new timekeeper.

Mr. Harkness: Your time has never started.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): He has the voice of a major league umpire and about as many brains. The Avro brief before the Gordon commission has this to say about civil possibilities:

> Military aviation is a matter of survival. Civil aviation is primarily a matter of economics in its role in the growth of our economy and in keeping pace with other countries in commerce and industry. To maintain her position as a major trading nation and to continue the development of national resources Canada particularly will need commercial aircraft of the most advanced types in use anywhere. . . . Also there is one Canadian area in which aviation stands virtually alone—the north.

Further on the brief has this to say:

> The great need in this northern push, even today, is an all-purpose aircraft designed to meet northern conditions—rigorous climate, long ranges, remote airports with short runways. In addition to its commercial role it would have a military function as a troop and supply transport. A transport of this kind would be ideal on the D.E.W. line and other radar line projects.

As for production costs the brief has this to say, and here is the comparison:

> As for production costs, the CF-100 and the Orenda, which are as good if not better than anything available elsewhere, have been delivered at prices below what we would have had to pay elsewhere. The CF-100 costs substantially less than a comparable United States aircraft while the Orenda is several thousand dollars cheaper than its United States counterpart. This is on the basis of production of more than 400 CF-100's and over 3,000 Orendas.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Chairman, I shall reply very briefly. It was stated that Canada had not built civilian aircraft. Canada is building civilian aircraft and a good many of them. The de Havilland company, with works within a few miles of Malton, are building civilian aircraft. They are getting civilian orders and they have not asked for any government help in designing these planes or, at least, very minor government help.

The hon. gentleman suggests that nobody can design a plane here unless the government supplies the money. I think that is something that is slightly out of tune with the practice in any country of the world that I know about. I do not know of any country where the designer of a civil plane goes to the government to get money to bring it into production. However, I will say this to the hon. gentleman, in spite of the lay-offs to which he refers. The lay-offs are purely a matter of protecting the great body of labour in the plant by stretching out the program to cover a gap between one type of production and another. There are over 10,000 people working in Avro at Malton. There are some 5,000 people working for de Havilland at Malton. I do not know what the number is at Canadair in Montreal but I should think it is about 8,000.

My hon. friend may be optimistic enough to think that force can be carried through the years and that we can keep that labour force building aircraft in normal times. I hope he is right. I am doing my best to hold the line steady and to produce the planes that seem to be required to meet the present-day situation. Anything I do is along that line. He says that I say I have no responsibility for aircraft. I do not go into a privately-owned plant and tell them how many men they need. However, I try to allocate such work as the government has in such a way that we can maintain reasonably steady employment. When we move out of a period of build-up of production of aircraft into a period when that build-up has been completed, I do not know of any way in which you can hold the maximum staff required for the build-up in order to carry on operations to meet normal requirements of a military type in this country. If the hon. member knows, I think perhaps he had better give me the pattern, because I thought we were doing quite a scientific job in meeting military demands, cutting down as the requirements are cut down and maintaining reasonably steady employment in our aircraft plants.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): As there are only about five minutes left, perhaps I might ask the minister if he really compares the development and manufacture here of aircraft of the Beaver or Otter type with the type of aircraft which we have seen imported here in quantities—it looks like a couple of hundred—over the period of the last year to year and a half? Does he know of any comparable aircraft of the type of which I am speaking which has been built in the United States without assistance from the government in its original development as a military aircraft?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): I do indeed; many of them. The DC-6 and the DC-7, Douglas planes, were built without military assistance. The hon. member talks about jet transport aircraft now being built. As a matter of fact T.C.A. has an order for four or five. That aircraft will cost between five and six million dollars. It is being built on civilian orders and without any government assistance whatever. I could go on and mention others such as the Lockheed Lone Star, which is a turbo-prop plane being built to fill civilian orders. As a matter of fact, in the case of the stratocruiser—that is the Boeing stratocruiser—that was built as a civilian plane and was later taken over by the army and developed as a tanker to supply jet aircraft in the air. But there are more modern planes brought into production in the United States on civilian orders than there are adaptations of military planes.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): The minister, of course, would admit that in about three of the five instances he gave the aircraft in question has been a subsequent development. When he talks about the DC-6, that is a line of aircraft which was developed, I think, during the last war.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Oh, no.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It may be that they comprise the next step along the line, but certainly they got assistance in the first instance in order to get into production.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Monteith: No. I should like to make a statement on this matter, but as it is practically ten o'clock I should simply like at this moment to ask a question about item 85. I notice that telephones and telegrams are down from $175,000 to $130,000. I am just wondering why.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): The result of an economy drive put on in the department.

Mr. Harkness: That is the first one.

Mr. Dickey: The most recent of many.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): We keep whittling away every year. Perhaps you have noticed that our estimates are being cut down every year. They have been cut down every year since 1953.

Mr. Monteith: That is wonderful. I am just noticing an item of a somewhat similar type, namely office stationery, supplies and equipment, which is up from $190,000 to $204,500. I am just wondering, if they are really economy-minded, why they should be cutting down so considerably with regard to telephones and telegrams and then increasing with respect to office stationery, supplies and equipment. Does that mean they are cutting down on telephones and telegrams and writing more letters? I think many government departments should do so.

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That is the answer, yes; plus a slight increase in the cost of fine paper.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall I report the resolutions, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall take second reading of the bill with respect to fiscal arrangements with the provinces and will continue on Tuesday, if necessary. However, any part of those two days that may be free will be taken up with consideration of the bill to amend the Indian Act, the bill to amend the Supreme Court Act, and the resolution in the name of the Minister of Transport with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway authority. On Wednesday we shall take interim supply, and then the estimates of defence production, northern affairs, health and welfare, C.B.C., and transport.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COAL—PRODUCTION CURTAILMENT, MARITIME PROVINCES

Question No. 557—Mr. Balcom:

Is there any indication that there will be curtailment in coal production in 1956 due to the lack of markets for maritime coal?

Answer by: Hon. George Prudham (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

No. As stated in Hansard on page 5739, it has been estimated that the existing subvention provisions would enable the Nova Scotia coal mines to find outlets for their production in the 12 months ending March 31, 1957.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

235. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $143,000,000, under provision of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection 3 of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection 3, and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,470,423,461 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,675,484,744 will come due for payment in future years), $1,722,797,717.

236. Grants to military associations, institutes and others, as detailed in the estimates, $249,175.

237. War museum, $25,440.

Pensions and other benefits—

238. Civil pensions, as detailed in the estimates, $2,457.

239. To authorize in respect of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force on leave without pay and serving as instructors with civilian training organizations operating under the British commonwealth air training plan who were killed, payment to their dependents of amounts equal to the amounts such dependents would have received under the Pension Act, as amended, had such service as instructors been military service in the armed forces of Canada, less the value of any benefits received by such dependents under insurance contracts which were effected on the lives of such members of the Royal Canadian Air Force by or at the expense of the civilian organizations, $3,890.

Defence Services Pension Act—

240. Government contribution to the permanent services pension account, $46,351,821.

732. To authorize loans to be made in the current and subsequent fiscal years in respect of housing projects constructed, pursuant to an agreement with the Minister of National Defence, for occupancy by members of the Canadian forces; such loans to be at interest rates and in accordance with such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, $5,000,000.

733. To authorize, under such terms and conditions as the governor in council prescribes, a capital assistance loan to the town of Oromocto, New Brunswick, to be covered by town debentures, for the purpose of assisting in the completion of the physical development of municipal works, $2,000,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 23, 1956

The house met at eleven o'clock.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SUCCESSION DUTIES ON PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES, TIME COUNTED FOR PENSION, ETC.

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act to provide for the payment and recovery of succession duties payable on pensions and allowances; also to extend in certain cases and under certain conditions the time and service that may be counted for pension purposes; and further to provide the funds for the additional liability to the R.C.M.P. pensions account resulting from general pay increases.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

HOUSING REDEVELOPMENT, MONTREAL

Motion No. 94—Mr. Richardson:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Public Works and the premier of Quebec, the mayor or any other officials of the city of Montreal, regarding the proposed housing redevelopment project in Montreal since July 1, 1956.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS CORRESPONDENCE

Motion No. 95—Mr. Diefenbaker:

For a copy of all correspondence which passed between the Department of Public Works and/or Defence Construction (1951) Limited, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and Builders' Exchange, in Halifax, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, since the 1st day of June, 1956.

Mr. Dickey: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would let this motion stand for today. I want to have a word with him about it.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Agreed.

Motion stands.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF FOREIGN AID PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question arises out of an article in this morning's Montreal Gazette which is headlined "Nasser caught in own ruse".

Will the government review its current foreign aid program in the light of apparent double-talk going on in Egypt and elsewhere?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our foreign aid program is covered by the United Nations arrangements for technical and other assistance and the Colombo plan. These two matters are continually under review and I do not think there is any necessity for carrying that review further at this time.

ALLEGED COMMUNIST INVESTMENT IN UNITED STATES THROUGH CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him if he is now in a position to comment upon the fantastic statement made by Mr. Armstrong of the securities and exchange commission of the United States to the effect that Canada is being used as a base for the infiltration of communist investment in United States corporations, particularly those manufacturing secret material?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have made inquiries of all departments and branches of the Canadian government in order to ascertain whether any complaint has been received by any agency in connection with this matter and the advice is that no such complaint or inquiry has been received from Washington. It seems a little surprising that the chairman of the securities and exchange commission, if he has any anxiety in regard to this subject, should not take it up through the appropriate channels with the Canadian government at the same time he mentioned the matter to the internal security subcommittee of the United States Senate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When Mr. Armstrong made his statement was it supported by any evidence or was it just a generalization?

Mr. Pearson: From the reports we have received it was merely a generalization not supported by evidence.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EGYPT—POSITION OF CANADA AS TO FINANCING OF ASWAN DAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) invited me to comment on the situation arising out of the withdrawal of the United States and British offers of financial help to Egypt in connection with the Aswan high dam project and asked whether I would instruct the Canadian executive director of the international bank to press that institution to finance the project notwithstanding this change in the situation.

I am sure that the house will agree that the offer of aid by one country for a particular project in another country or the withdrawal of such an offer are not matters on which it would be appropriate for me to comment. It may, however, be useful to the house if I recall some of the main facts connected with the role of the international bank in the Aswan high dam project.

The project itself is a very ambitious one consisting of three main elements: First, the construction at Aswan of a dam 400 feet high and three miles long to store the waters of the Nile; second, the use of the stored water to extend perennial irrigation to some two million acres of land, which would raise by one-third the amount of irrigated land in Egypt; and third, the installation of hydroelectric production and distributive systems of a capacity which would more than double the hydroelectric power available to Egypt. The estimated cost of the project and ancillary works is $1,350 million, of which $400 million is represented by private investment, leaving $950 million to be publicly financed. Of this $400 million is represented by foreign exchange requirements and the balance of $550 million by local expenditures on goods and services.

Mr. Eugene Black, the president of the international bank, and members of his staff have been engaged in discussions with the Egyptian authorities and studies of this important and complicated project during the past two or three years. At the end of 1955, Mr. Black indicated that, given the existence of certain conditions, he would be prepared to recommend to the bank's board of executive directors a loan or loans to Egypt for the Aswan high dam. After a careful study of Egypt's economic prospects, the management of the bank concluded that the maximum external debt which the Egyptian economy could be expected to service in respect of the project would be of the order of half the foreign exchange costs, or approximately $200 million. Accordingly, if the project was to be executed without prejudice to the Egyptian economy, it would be necessary for the Egyptian government to find elsewhere the remainder of the needed foreign exchange without imposing additional debt charges on the economy.

The house will be aware that the governments of the United States and United Kingdom had indicated their willingness to provide together on a grant basis some $70 million toward the foreign exchange cost of the first stages of the project and that they would be prepared at a later date, in the light of the then existing circumstances and subject to legislative authority, to give sympathetic consideration to financing the later stages of the project as a supplement to bank lending.

With the withdrawal of United States and United Kingdom offers of assistance, it would appear that the availability of the total foreign exchange requirements of the project on a basis which will not unduly encumber the Egyptian economy can no longer be regarded as assured.

The international bank has issued no statement with regard to this matter. I would not wish to suggest that with regard to any particular project the management of the bank should depart from the normal lending criteria which have been established not only in the interests of the bank itself but of the borrowers. I think the house can be certain that if at some future time a proposal for a bank loan for the Aswan project comes before the executive directors of the bank it will be given careful and sympathetic consideration.

POLITICAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN—INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF CONVENTION BY CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada yet signed the United Nations declaration on political rights of women? If not, is consideration being given by the government to signing this convention?

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my impression—but I should like to check and make sure that my impression is correct—that we have not yet signed. If we have not yet signed, I am sure consideration is still being given to signing.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WEST GERMANY—ALLEGED INADEQUATE RATIONS OF CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of an article which appeared in the London Free Press of Saturday, datelined Chatham, Ontario. According to the article Private Tunks, on compassionate leave from Germany, had this to say:

> If it were not for the parcels of food from home there would have been mutiny long before now. Canadian troops were on British rations and they are not used to getting bully beef day after day. We might get two eggs a week.

Has the government any knowledge of these allegations? Are Canadian eggs, bacon, cheese and other Canadian products being used for Canadian troops overseas or are they being purchased elsewhere?

Hon. R. O. Campney (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard from Private Tunks. His comments on the food are not in accordance with my views with respect to the food I saw issued to the army during my visits to Europe. However, in view of the fact that he has raised the matter I shall look into it and see whether the commodities in which the hon. member is interested are being issued as rations.

TELEVISION

MOORE-PARKER BOXING BOUT—INQUIRY AS TO TELEVISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister in a position to satisfy the curiosity of a lot of people in the city, including members of this house, as to whether the Moore-Parker boxing bout to be held in Toronto will be televised?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that it was not possible to make arrangements. The Toronto papers carried an advertisement this morning to the effect that there would be positively no television.

CRIMINAL LAW

CAPITAL AND CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—INQUIRY REGARDING INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether it is the intention of the government at this session to introduce any legislation based on those matters on which the joint committee on capital and corporal punishment and lotteries has reported?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The matters upon which that joint committee has reported and will be reporting are tied into a larger subject with which the recommendations of the Fauteux report are also concerned. Our thought was that we would give careful consideration in the Department of Justice and in other interested departments of the government to all these matters, before we confer with the provincial governments, by which many of the aspects of law enforcement and administration of justice will be administered, and before we bring any legislation into this house. So I do not think there is any possibility at all of our bringing in legislation in the present parliamentary session.

Mr. Fulton: With respect to those portions of the Fauteux committee's report which lie exclusively in the legislative competence of this parliament, such as the changes recommended with respect to those sentences which have an option of fine, would it be the intention to introduce legislation on such matters at this session?

Mr. Garson: No. This is, as I am sure my hon. friend will appreciate, a very large subject; and all these various parts of it are closely related to one another. We think the wise policy is to consider it as a whole, by ourselves and also in concert with the provincial governments.

GRAIN

WHEAT—BOX CARS, QUOTAS AND MARKETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that just one week remains before the end of the crop year, will the minister say what report, if any, he has as to what is being done to accelerate the number of cars available for the shipment of wheat so that farmers, particularly in those areas where quotas are low, will be able to market a reasonable amount? Will he also say whether or not consideration has been given to permitting the farmers to market wheat they still have on hand from the 1955-56 crop after the beginning of the new crop year?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the last report I had was dated last Wednesday night. It indicated that the number of points on the 4 bushel quota had been reduced to 30. I am sure those will be cleaned up, and I think that most 5 bushel quota points will be cleaned up by the end of the crop year. All C.P.R. cars are being concentrated on the low quota points.

A new development is that as of last Friday the quotas were removed from oats so that all oats can be shipped now free of quota restrictions. The reason for that is that the demand for oats is considerably larger than the visible supply. Stocks in store at ocean and lake ports are low. There is no hold-up as far as unloading box cars is concerned, and I think another week will improve the situation. Quotas will end at midnight of the 31st of July. However, in the new crop year which will begin on August 1 an effort will be made to give first preference to points that did not ship their fair quota during 1955-56.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I want to thank the minister.

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa): May I also ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if it will be possible to give special consideration in the new quota arrangements to those areas that have suffered crop failures in the last two or three years and in the ordinary sense are deserving of an even greater opportunity to deliver this year?

Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I stated some time ago that a special effort would be made to give prompt attention to the island country north of Winnipeg which has had two successive crop disasters. I think I can assure my hon. friend that a special effort will be made to extend that preference to all areas that have had crop failures during the past year.

CIVIL DEFENCE

MONTREAL—RESULTS OF TEST EXERCISE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Was the absence of a civil defence organization in the city of Montreal estimated to increase greatly the casualties in that area in the test exercise just completed?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I would say that the umpire, General Hatton, has given an answer which I may use on this occasion, and that answer is in the affirmative.

[Mr. Howe (Port Arthur).]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED RECOMMENDATION OF MEDICAL ADVISER TO GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of a recent press and radio report. Has the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hees) been recommended to the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet as a medical adviser?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend did not give me notice of his intention to ask that question but I do not think I require much notice. In view of the importance of the question, however, I would want to give it further consideration.

AGRICULTURE

ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR CROP INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or, in his absence, to his parliamentary assistant. In view of the loss experienced by farmers of Ontario owing to late seeding and of the present difficulty experienced by them in haying and harvesting operations, all caused by wet, backward weather, is the government considering some type of crop insurance similar to that operating in the western provinces under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for Wellington-Huron that all these matters are taken into consideration. If the provincial government will discuss the matter with us, we will see what we can do with respect to it.

TAXATION

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Hon. W. E. Harris (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 442, to authorize the Minister of Finance to make payments to the governments of the provinces and to authorize the government of Canada to enter into fiscal agreements with the governments of the provinces.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the minister to make a statement on the motion?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I spoke twice at the resolution stage, on one occasion at considerable length, I think, or at greater length than I usually speak. Having in mind my earnest request to hon. members opposite that, if possible, they might find it desirable to state their party position with fewer speakers than has been the custom up to the present time, I feel that I should not speak now but I shall probably wind up the debate.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, we are now dealing with the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) that Bill No. 442 be read the second time. In reference to the entire proposal of the dominion government as contained in the bill, our position was stated by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) at the resolution stage on July 16. That resolution was passed on division. The house is now asked to carry into legislative form and effect the formula which was the essence of the federal government's proposals. We are asked to do so with full knowledge that no provincial government has yet given its approval to those proposals and indeed with full knowledge that there has been widespread disapproval of the government's proposals on the ground of their inadequacy. I therefore say, Mr. Speaker, that the effect of reading this bill the second time would be, as I understand it, to give effect to a principle that the formula contained in the bill is adequate and ought to be adopted.

The question that we ought to ask ourselves is similar to that which my leader put before the house when he spoke a week ago. To paraphrase it, I would say the question before us is whether or not at this time there is evidence that the proposals of the government, and in particular this formula, will satisfactorily meet the demands which are actually now imposed upon provincial governments, municipal councils and boards of education throughout Canada and particularly whether they will be adequate over the five-year period during which the new scheme is intended to be in effect.

I point out at the outset, sir, that this is enabling legislation. If it is adopted, it will vest very wide powers in the Minister of Finance, and the powers vested in him include the power to legislate in the form of regulations.

As to the details of the formula, suffice it to say at this point that it is an actuarial maze to most people. The formula itself would undoubtedly confuse most citizens. Talk of tax equalization payments, provincial revenue stabilization payments, tax rental agreements, gross national product, average personal income, and other expressions in which this formula abounds make it very difficult for the average citizen to appreciate the niceties of the formula. Indeed, it would be interesting, particularly in the light of the fact that no Liberal member spoke on the resolution, except the Minister of Finance, to put some of them to a test on the grasp of the details of this formula which they are now asked to approve. Every citizen, however, is interested in the result.

I propose to look at this formula in terms of the results that will follow from its adoption in legislative form. Surely, that is a fair test. Let us then put the new proposed formula in its proper perspective. It is estimated by the government that it would make available to the provinces in return for certain forms of revenue now constitutionally open to the provinces to collect on their own behalf a total this year of $653 million, which represents an increase of $115 million or 20 per cent over the sums that would have been paid to all provinces under the type of agreement now in effect if all the provinces were parties to it this year. It is evident at once that, so far as the provinces themselves are concerned, the new formula, in relation to the scheme which has been in effect for the past nine years, does represent an improvement. It is better. But, sir, we must go farther and ask ourselves if it is good enough, good enough today and good enough to be carried into legislative effect for the full period of five years commencing in the spring of 1957.

The problem, as everyone knows, arises from the fact that there are certain fields of taxation which under our constitutional division of responsibilities are common to both the dominion and provincial fields. If we look at the constitution with regard for the history of the intervening 89 years we must recognize at once, as fairminded men and women, that the provinces in these common fields of taxation have at least equal rights with the dominion.

Indeed, there have been times when it was argued that, because the provincial authorities were confined to taxation in its direct form, there was a constitutional priority created in their favour in that field. But at any rate, sir, whatever may be the validity of that argument, it is undeniable that constitutionally the provinces have at least an equal right and an equal status with the dominion in the fields of direct taxation.

Historically the provinces have claimed a priority because they were the first to occupy those fields.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not correct.

Mr. Fleming: Well, the statement of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration can not change the facts.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, but the facts are—

Mr. Fleming: The facts are these, that the provinces were in those fields. When did the dominion go into the field of direct personal taxation? It came in in 1917.

Mr. Pickersgill: When did Ontario—

Mr. Fleming: And when it did it came in with the assurances given by the then minister of finance that this entry into the field of direct taxation—of course, the personal and corporation income tax—was to be for the duration of the war only.

Mr. Harris: That was his hope and expectation.

Mr. Fleming: And the name given to that act was the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman say when Ontario—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Fleming: If the hon. member will sit down he will have an answer. I am dealing with the point raised and if he will refrain from further interruptions I think he will receive his answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will see.

Mr. Fleming: The federal government gave that statement at the time in 1917. I have drawn attention to the fact that the name given to the act indicated that it was a temporary entry, and that name survived the revision of the statutes in 1927. It was only in 1948 that a new measure was brought in bearing the name of the Income Tax Act to replace the old Income War Tax Act, and recognized that the federal government is in the field of income taxation to stay.

And, sir, look at the field of succession duties. The federal government entered this field during wartime, only in the year 1941. The provinces had been in this field and in the other fields long prior to that time.

At any rate, sir, we have this position, that constitutionally the provinces have at least an equal right in the field of direct taxation and historically they were the first to occupy it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. Fleming: I would make this statement in conclusion.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question now?

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps the hon. member would be good enough to let me make my concluding remark. The dominion has no priority in these fields. Let it be made perfectly clear and categorical that in these fields of direct taxation with which we are concerned in this measure, the personal income tax, the corporation tax and the succession duty, the federal government has no priority.

Mr. Harris: Has anyone asserted that it has?

Mr. Pickersgill: No one has ever asserted it.

Mr. Fleming: I will be glad to have the question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration now.

Mr. Pickersgill: The question I should like the hon. gentleman to answer is this. In what year did Ontario and in what year did Quebec first impose personal income tax? Let us settle this question of history.

Mr. Fleming: The answer, so far as Ontario is concerned, to the self-satisfied grinning Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, is this, that the Ontario legislature had enacted a corporation tax before—

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked about personal income tax.

Mr. Fleming: Will the minister sit down and wait for his answer.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is evading my question.

Mr. Fleming: The minister is bobbing up all the time and he cannot wait for his answers.

Mr. Rowe: Make a speech later yourself.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister wishes to make his speech let him rise and make it like a man at the proper time and refrain from his endless, everlasting and senseless interruptions. I am trying to answer the hon. gentleman's question and if he will remain quietly in his seat without interrupting when I am half way through he will receive an answer.

The Ontario legislature clothed the municipalities of Ontario with the right to levy a personal corporation tax before the federal authority entered this field. Thus the field had been occupied by the provinces.

So far as the province of Quebec is concerned, I have not the answer here, but as the minister appears to lack it I shall be glad to obtain it for him.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I would like to know is, what is a personal corporation tax?

Mr. Fleming: When this field is entered into or when negotiations are entered upon with a view to arriving at understandings or divisions of the fields of taxation between the dominion and the provincial authorities, let us remember, as the dominion government is prone to forget, that the provinces are in those fields not by leave of anyone; they are there as of right. It is their constitutional right. When there are suggestions from the dominion government about allowing the provinces to occupy some of this field, referring to that as a concession, we have a measure, Mr. Speaker, of the error in the federal government's thinking.

Now, sir, the first subject I think we should refer to in assessing the adequacy of the formula proposed in this bill is what has been the answer of the premiers of the ten provinces of Canada. They are the spokesmen not merely for the provincial governments; they must constitutionally be the spokesmen for thousands of municipalities in this country as well. They have this problem to wrestle with all the time, the problem of inadequate revenues and expanding responsibilities. Every provincial government in Canada has it and every municipal government I have ever heard of has it as well.

What then do these spokesmen for the provincial and municipal levels of government have to say about the federal government's formula? Well, there is not one province that has given approval to the federal government's formula.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true either.

Mr. Fleming: There is not one province that has said this provision is adequate. Indeed, there have been provincial premiers who have drawn attention to the fact that the formula now presented in the present bill is almost identical with the formula originally presented last year. There are only two modest changes made in it, an increase from 8½ per cent to 9 per cent in the permissible corporation tax levy deduction and then permission, as it was put,—or allowance; I think "allow" was the word the Minister of Finance used in speaking a week ago today—allowing the provinces to enter into the field of taxing insurance premiums, which is a small matter in relation to the total amounts under discussion.

Mr. Harris: They are allowed to enter by reason of our withdrawal from the field.

Mr. Fleming: That is a cute way of putting it, I must say. The fact is that the minister used the word "allow". It was a condescending sort of permission given by the federal government to these provinces to enter fields which they are constitutionally as much entitled to occupy as is the federal government.

Mr. Harris: They can occupy them.

Mr. Fleming: And indeed, there have been denunciations on all sides about the rigid take-it-or-leave-it attitude adopted by the federal government with reference to its formula.

Sir, there have been premiers who have said that so far as the so-called conference this year was concerned it was really no conference at all. Some of the premiers were called here in the midst of sessions of the provincial legislatures. They absented themselves from them or those sessions were suspended in order that the premiers might attend the conference and all they were faced with was the rigid take-it-or-leave-it attitude of this government. I wish to say at once, sir, that while there are federal rights and interests that must be protected and safeguarded—no one denies that—nevertheless this rigid and inflexible, this hard take-it-or-leave-it attitude, is foreign to the spirit of confederation, and there has been altogether too much of that rigidity and inflexibility in the attitude of this government all through the years during which the problem of dominion-provincial fiscal relations has occupied the attention of all those governing the dominion and the provinces. So it was amazing indeed to hear the Minister of Finance a week ago today say in the most cooing terms in reference to the treatment of the provinces that "we have not reached and would not expect to reach unanimity of agreement on the proper division of these tax fields." What an impressive statement, indeed what a monstrous understatement of the facts in the light of the statements which provincial premiers have made about the inadequacy of this present federal formula!

We do not plead that the provincial governments have any absolute veto in regard to federal proposals, but the unanimity of the attitude and expressions of the premiers speaking for all the provinces and all the municipalities in Canada must be deeply impressive to anyone who approaches this problem with a desire to see a sensible Canadian solution found.

Mr. Pickersgill: There was no unanimity.

Mr. Fleming: There goes the babbling Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who is physically incapable of restraining that tongue of his. If he wishes to speak, let him rise like a man in the ordinary course in debate and make his speech and not be throwing in these twitterings.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just—

Mr. Fleming: He is still at it; he just cannot stop doing it because he has absolutely no control.

Mr. Pickersgill: Stick to the facts.

Mr. Fleming: He is still at it; he cannot help it. I suppose we should feel sorry for him and deal with him rather in pity and sorrow than in anger. I do not deal with him in anger at all. I deal with him in very good humour.

If there had been any question at all about the attitude of the provinces I am sure it was more than eloquently evidenced by the outcome of at least three provincial elections which occurred recently in Quebec, New Brunswick and Saskatchewan. There certainly is no approval found in the results of those provincial elections for this federal formula or the high-handed and hard attitude taken by the federal government in its approach to the problem of dominion-provincial fiscal relations.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) seems to have forgotten and as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Pickersgill) seems never to have known what the provincial premiers have said about this federal formula, let me remind the house of some of the statements which these premiers have made from time to time. Here is a press statement of January 31, 1956 quoting Premier Hugh John Flemming of New Brunswick as saying that the January 1956 proposals:

> . . . come as a disappointing culmination of a now long series of meetings and submissions of various kinds rising eventually to the level of a federal-provincial conference.

He went on to say:

> No consideration is being given to our special needs and responsibilities at this time in our history.

Mr. Duplessis is quoted in the following month as having said:

> Just as long as the people in Ottawa insist on trying to make the people believe that they are doing the provinces a favour and that they are making a gift to the people of Quebec, then relations between Quebec and Ottawa will remain as they were.

Mr. Duplessis went on to say that the whole question is bigger than dollars and cents.

Premier Frost of Ontario was quoted at that time as saying:

> —we feel strongly that a formula that provides a special payment to all provinces except Ontario fails to meet the special needs of this province.

Premier Bennett of British Columbia is quoted as saying:

> In so far as they apply to a province like British Columbia which is not dependent on fiscal subsidies, is experiencing an unprecedented growth and requires a greater allocation from the cultivation of income tax fields to keep pace with a development which apart from its provincial worth will yield vast returns to the nation.

Mr. Harris: Why do you not quote the other sentence he used?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Fleming: The minister may quote Premier Bennett as much as he wishes, but I doubt if he will derive much comfort from that.

Then Premier Campbell of Manitoba is quoted as saying:

> However Manitoba was still disappointed that so little attention had been paid to the question of the actual financial requirements faced by the provincial governments in the next few years.

And again:

> It is our recommendation that before any new pattern in federal-provincial relations is adopted a thorough reassessment of the relative responsibilities and revenue sources of the various governments in Canada should be undertaken.

That is the Liberal premier of Manitoba speaking about the formula that this house is asked to approve today.

Then in March Premier Frost of Ontario dealt with the proposal of the federal government as a take-it-or-leave-it proposal. Speaking of the federal government he had this to say, which I am sure will be recalled:

> They were wrong in 1945, they were wrong in 1952 and they are wrong today, and they will find out how wrong they are in about five years when they come face to face with the realization that today's lack of foresight will bring this country to the brink of economic disaster.

Those are very serious words. Then concerning the one-day re-convened conference of that time he had this to say:

> I have never seen a dominion-provincial gathering which had less purpose than the one which ended today at four-thirty.

I would remind the house that the provincial premiers left important responsibilities at home in their legislatures in order to attend that conference.

It is not amiss to recall that the voice of Nova Scotia was heard. Speaking in January, the then premier of Nova Scotia, now Senator Connolly, is reported as saying:

> So few people in Canada are aware of what really is involved in these tax-freezing agreements. This is the greatest jackpot, the greatest distribuiton of wealth in our history.

Later on he said that since the provinces are reluctant to impose their own taxes on the people they must continue to forfeit by agreement their tax rights and eventually, especially if national health insurance comes in, may yield these rights altogether and make Canada a unitary state.

Those are serious words.

Mr. Garson: Do you approve of them?

Mr. Fleming: I think those words ought to be very carefully weighed by the government which has adopted such a high-handed, rigid and inflexible attitude.

Mr. Garson: Do you approve of them?

Mr. Fleming: These provincial premiers have stated in so far as the provisions of this bill before us are concerned—

Mr. Harris: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member saying that he disagrees with what Senator Connolly said or is it a question of the amount which the provinces get or a question of the surrender of their autonomy?

Mr. Fleming: Both questions are involved and always have been. There is no secret about that. Those questions have always been involved. In the present case we say, as we have always said, that the federal government has not given proper recognition to the constitutional position of the provinces, and in reference to common fields of taxation, where the federal government has made proposals, it has done so without regard for the constitutional position of the provinces or the needs and burdens of those provinces.

The premiers of the four Atlantic provinces have met recently. Just a fortnight ago the premiers of these four Atlantic provinces assembled at Fredericton, and out of their meeting came a demand on the part of the spokesmen of those four provinces for a recognition of the fiscal position of those provinces, which this federal government has not yet at any time given to them. They demanded assistance in the development of natural resources, and to Premier Smallwood of Newfoundland is attributed in the press statement this expression of his views:

> As an example of the profit which goes from provincial development to the national government, Premier Smallwood cited the Labrador share of the Ungava iron ore development. A project which cost Ottawa nothing, he said, would eventually provide $100 million a year in revenue. Newfoundland would gain only $1 million a year in increased revenue.

Where do the other $99 million go? They go to the federal government, this government which persists in saying that it will not depart by the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" from the formula that it has put forward and on which it has taken this senseless "take-it-or-leave-it" attitude.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Fleming: I suppose we might as well have it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman quote what the premier of Newfoundland said about this proposal on the day of that one-day conference? It has been made public, and he will find Mr. Smallwood accepted it.

Mr. Fleming: I do not happen to have it at the moment, but if the minister has it and wants to read it he will have his opportunity in the debate if he adheres to the rules of the house and makes his own speech for a change.

Mr. Pickersgill: I accept the rulings of the Chair.

Mr. Fleming: It is about time he did, because no one has deviated from them as often as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. He has broken every one and he has bent every one almost beyond recognition, and he smugly snickers about them all the time because he thinks it smart to do so and get away with it.

I have dealt with the attitude taken by the provincial premiers as spokemen for the provincial and municipal governments in this country. I now ask the question, is the unanimous attitude taken by the provincial premiers—

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not unanimous.

Mr. Fleming: Is it reasonable?

Mr. Rowe: The minister says it is not unanimous.

Mr. Fleming: If the minister says so, that does not change the facts. The fact is that there is not one provincial premier in this country who has expressed approval of this formula.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true. The premier of Newfoundland has.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, are we to have any order?

Mr. Speaker: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration not to ask any questions unless the member who has the floor accedes to his request, and not to interrupt the member while he is speaking.

Mr. Fleming: Questions are one thing, but these statements smuggled into the speech of the member who has the floor are another.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

An hon. Member: He is spoiling your speech.

Mr. Fleming: I should hate to think my speech is so bad that it could be spoiled by senseless and inane interjections by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Pickersgill: What I said was true.

Mr. Fleming: He cannot hold himself. I suppose we should feel sorry for a man who cannot stop that tongue wagging.

As I said, having dealt with the position taken in public statements by the provincial premiers, I come now to ask the question, is the attitude that the provincial premiers have taken reasonable? We have to ask ourselves the question, in weighing this issue, whether we are entitled to overlook the position taken by these provincial premiers and blandly and blindly legislate this formula into statutory effect.

Let no one underestimate the importance of the provinces and municipalities in the field of government of this country. They are the governments that are closest to the people. Anyone who has had experience of municipal government and has entered the federal field is well aware of the fact that is the form of government that is closest to the people. It is a form of government much older than our federal form of government in this country.

Today Canada is facing a period of very rapid development. We have talked freely in this house about the rapidity of the development of resources in this country today. The development of all the resources of this country except those in the territories is constitutionally vested in the provincial jurisdiction, and it is relatively little help that the provinces are receiving from the federal government in the form of conservation of resources or other forms.

New enterprises are created by individual effort and initiative, and then what happens? What is the result on governmental responsibilities and revenues? Let us take an example or two. When a new mine is opened up and development begins, the first thing that is called for is the construction of roads into the mine and the provision of the other services which in unorganized portions of the province are the responsibility of the provincial government. Then, when staff comes in and the little community is established, what is the form of government that then must assume the burdens? It is the municipal form of government. The demand at once is made for the construction of streets, and the provision of schools, police and fire protection, health and welfare services and municipal administration. The cost of every one of these municipal services, all of which are demanded by the people, is rising in astronomical proportions at all times.

But what is the government that derives the first revenue from this new enterprise? I say to you, sir, it is the federal government. The first time a pay cheque is given by that enterprise to an employee, the federal government steps in to receive its first cut on the first pay cheque.

The figures that I ascribed to Premier Smallwood in the extract that I read from his statement indicate the tremendous benefit that the federal government derives in respect of revenues from the development of new enterprises. But it is only at a later stage that the municipal and provincial governments begin to derive their revenue benefits.

[Mr. Fleming.]

In the meantime the burden of providing the services that are required in that particular municipality falls on the municipal government and also on the provincial government.

Take another example: the construction of a new industry in a town or a city. On whom does the burden fall of providing the services that are required for such an industry and for the employees of that industry? It is the municipal government. The first burden falls on the municipality. But what level of government derives the first revenue benefit? Again it is the federal government. Out of the first pay cheque comes the federal cut.

There is a situation which must be recognized and, in my respectful submission, has not been recognized by the federal government in its relations with the provincial premiers. Sir, Mr. Harvey Perry, director of the Canadian Tax Foundation, has summed that situation up in these words:

> Given peace and prosperity the provinces and municipalities will henceforth bear the brunt of the cost of providing expanded government services and facilities for a rapidly growing country, whereas their revenue sources, being less elastic, will rise more slowly than those of the federal government. It is also becoming clear that barring war and depression the relative needs of the federal government for revenue to support functions in its own sphere will decline in the foreseeable future whereas the federal treasury is the one that will reap the greatest share of the benefit from an expanding economy.

If you want any further example of what an increase in population in an expanding municipality means, just take the experience of the city of Edmonton. In the brief it recently submitted to the Gordon royal commission it gave the estimate that if an increase of 175,000 takes place in the city's population over the next quarter century it will be necessary to construct 500 miles of streets and sidewalks and 450 miles of sewers and water mains and to connect 180,000 utility services of all kinds. The brief pointed out that 1,100 schoolrooms and 3,200 hospital beds will have to be provided for this increase in the population. The brief concluded:

> Such a program suggests expenditures in the nature of $300 million over the next 25 years for schools, hospitals and general capital requirements.

Sir, statements of that kind are entitled to be taken with the greatest gravity. When there is talk about "rich provinces" people usually think in terms of the stage of development that a province has reached in regard to its resources, but here in a debate of this kind what we must concern ourselves with is the burden cast on all such provinces as well as those that are not classed in that category, the burdens that are increasing so rapidly with the pace of development of resources.

A word now about the outlook of the provinces and municipalities in relation to their revenues and fiscal future. The proportion of the tax dollar that is going to the three levels of government is always a fruitful source for study. In 1939 the dominion collected 47 cents out of the total tax dollar in this country. In 1955 it collected 68 cents. In 1939 the provinces collected 23 cents out of the Canadian tax dollar, and in 1955 the provinces combined collected only 17 cents of that dollar.

Mr. Harris: You have not taken into account the transfer payments.

Mr. Fleming: We are speaking now of the revenues collected by the provinces in relation to the tax dollar paid by the taxpayer.

Mr. Harris: But you have not credited the provinces or municipalities with the transfer payments made by the federal to the provincial governments.

Mr. Fleming: The minister speaks of the payments transferred to the provinces and by the provinces to the municipalities. We are dealing now with the tax dollar collected by the three levels of government. In 1939 the municipalities' share of the tax dollar was 31 cents. In 1955 it was only 15 cents out of that tax dollar.

What of the burdens of the municipalities and the provinces all this time? Current expenditures of provincial governments have increased very substantially in the post-war period. Total current expenditure, excluding provision for tax repayment, increased from $402 million in the fiscal year 1946-47 to $1,261 million in the fiscal year 1955-56. Almost every category of provincial expenditure has greatly increased. Between the fiscal years 1946 and 1955 total current expenditure of provincial governments increased 98·6 per cent, while Canada's population increased only by 26·9 per cent. Highway expenditures increased 154·9 per cent. Public welfare and relief expenditures increased 123·8 per cent, and education 102·8 per cent. In other words, sir, the provinces are being called upon today to provide services which are thrice as expensive as the services provided in 1946.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration asked for some enlightenment on the position of the province of Newfoundland. Well, I am glad to give him that needed information. In the brief it submitted to the Gordon royal commission the government of Newfoundland stated that its road program would necessitate an expenditure of at least $5 million annually on capital account, that water and sewerage systems would involve $1 million annually, and schools and hospitals at least $1,500,000 each year for the next 25 years. The brief went on to stress how much below the general level of services those of the province of Newfoundland are compared with those prevailing in other provinces. In discussing the financing of necessary expenditures the brief concluded that the province's "ability to provide the means both for overcoming the present deficiency in social capital and meeting the requirements of prospective growth is very limited." Then the province asked the federal government for substantially increased grants for highway construction and other purposes.

What of the position of the provinces and municipalities in regard to capital expenditure, because every member of the house knows that necessary capital expenditures were deferred during the war by provinces and municipalities and that a tremendous backlog had accumulated by the beginning of the post-war period? The trend in post-war capital spending by both provincial and municipal governments has been sharply upward. In 1946 total capital expenditures of provincial and municipal governments and their agencies amounted to $276 million, representing an increase of more than 80 per cent over the previous year. Since that time every province's capital expenditures have increased many times over, from $138 million in 1946 to $677 million in 1955. Municipal capital expenditures, although rising somewhat less than those of provincial governments, had increased by 1955 to more than four times the 1946 level, from $138 million in the earlier year to $546 million in 1955. While it may not be possible for the provincial and municipal authorities to carry out their total planned capital spending for 1956, there can be little doubt that these expenditures will be higher than in 1955. Provincial governments and their agencies have announced the intention of spending $941 million on capital account in 1956, and municipal governments $603 million.

I turn now to current municipal expenditures. Here we will see that on current expenditure the burden on the municipalities rose from $348 million in 1946 to $873 million in 1955. In the latter year education accounted for 32·7 per cent of the total, general administration, including police and fire protection, 31 per cent, public welfare 14·5 per cent, highways, roads and streets 14·7 per cent, and debt charges, excluding debt repayment, 7·1 per cent.

Every hon. member here knows well the situation with respect to his own municipality. I intend to mention only three in particular before passing on to another subject. In its brief to the Gordon royal commission the city of Montreal, Canada's most populous city, stated that the volume of municipal investment presently necessary, and which the city considers should already have been undertaken to make up deficiencies accumulated since 1934, totals $503,300,000. Included in this huge sum are waterworks, $40,300,000; collector sewers, $33 million; local improvements, $17,500,000; parks and playgrounds, $40 million. A substantial part of the total backlog involves expenditures necessary to relieve traffic bottlenecks in the city: expressways, $147 million; subway, $87 million; parking, $10 million; tunnels or bridges to the south shore of the St. Lawrence river, $60 million.

Or look at the city of Quebec, Mr. Speaker. In its brief to the Gordon royal commission it said:

> Whereas our budget is $12,700,000, including school costs, some cities with approximately the same population (225,000) have at their disposal a budget varying between $15 million and $20 million. As you can see, the margin is a substantial one. The present situation leaves us no alternative but to reduce expenditures more and more, while putting off urgent works until a later date. We cannot act otherwise under the present circumstances without further weakening the financial structure of our city and the economic well-being of its citizens.

The last example I have taken is the city of Halifax which in its brief expressed grave fears that it would be unable to raise the required revenue in future years because of its limited real property tax base. Other municipalities submitted briefs to the same effect, my own city of Toronto among them, drawing attention to the prodigious burden laid upon the metropolitan area by the need for providing new school facilities, new transportation, water, sewerage and other new works required.

Mr. Speaker, education must have a special word of mention because education affects all the municipalities across the country and is today faced with a situation that can only properly be described as critical. As a result of increase in the birth rate and increase in immigration the school population has been rapidly enlarged. The cost of providing school facilities becomes greater all the time. The pressure on existing school facilities has now become so acute that in many schools the facilities are admittedly hopelessly inadequate, either in point of quality or physical extent, to provide for the growing school population. In many schools the children are simply being taken in relays, with all the strains that this imposes on staff and upon administrative machinery and all facilities.

The Minister of Finance and the government have been often urged in this house to recognize the fact that the sources of revenue open to the municipalities and to the provinces are inadequate to provide for the expanding cost of education, as things stand today. In approaching this present renewal of fiscal arrangements between the dominion and the provinces, the Minister of Finance had a golden opportunity to recognize that inescapable fact and to do something to meet it; but, Mr. Speaker, as things stand at the moment, he has thrown away that opportunity. The increase that is offered in the new formula over the amount provided by the existing agreements cannot be pretended by anyone to meet the needs of the provinces and of the municipalities in relation to education. There is in this country no governmental function more important than education. The benefits of education are not confined locally in the municipality or even the province. For example those excellent universities in the maritime provinces which are educating so many in proportion to the population there are doing so not just for the benefit of the maritime provinces. The benefits of the excellent university education available in the maritimes are transmitted throughout the whole of this country as the graduates go elsewhere, as do many of them.

Student enrolment is bound to increase in this country by leaps and bounds at all levels of our educational system. University enrolment in Canada is expected to rise from 66,000 to somewhere between 110,600 and 135,200 by the fall of 1964. In Ontario it will jump from 20,400 last year to 42,700 in the same period. The median of the all-Canada projection is 123,000, an increase of 57,000 over the present, and that is just by the year 1964. In Ontario alone the increase will be 22,000; that is, 40 per cent of the Canadian increase will occur in the province of Ontario.

By and large, I think the provinces have done all they can to assist the municipalities. Indeed, in his comment of July 18, Premier Frost had this to say:

> Education in its primary, secondary, vocational and university phases has added immense burdens, and we have by no means even begun to feel the full weight of the problem. As a province we are not static and our problems continue to grow. Today we have a school population in primary and secondary schools of approximately one million. This population has been built up since the beginning of this province. But the next 10 years alone will see 750,000 children added to this enrolment.

That is an increase of 75 per cent in the next ten-year period. It is a staggering increase and the cost of providing educational facilities for that staggering increase in the school population will be literally colossal. I am sure I do not need to detain the house with more figures in this field.

The plight of the municipalities is desperate. I think the provinces have done all that lies within their power to help the municipalities. In Ontario grants to the municipalities in the last twelve years have risen from $18 million to $185 millions and 45 per cent of all provincial government revenue now goes to the municipalities from the provincial treasury. But it remains a fact that 84 per cent of all municipal revenue comes from the direct levy on real estate which has now become virtually a capital levy and is crushing in the burden it casts upon the home owner.

Mr. Speaker, I leave this subject with this observation. Provincial burdens are bound to increase. Municipal burdens are bound to increase. One could cite many examples of that fact.

I now wish to say a word—and I shall not be long—about the attitude of the dominion government. During the war practically everybody accepted the necessity of centralization. It was done to meet a crisis and legislative jurisdiction was concentrated at Ottawa to an unprecedented degree. Similarly, the tax-collecting functions of government were concentrated to an unparalleled extent here at Ottawa. But much of the mentality that pervaded the federal government's thinking in those war years has been carried into the years of peace. I should be the first to concede that the federal government has assumed increased burdens in this post-war period. But I do say that this increased burden which the federal government is wont to parade has not been commensurate with the increase in its revenues from these common sources of taxation. The camel got its head into the tent, and instead of being content to share the tent with the former occupant has been busy trying to push the camel driver out.

In the present measure, the extent to which the federal government will permit the occupation of these joint fields by the provinces with the dominion, without the unhappy incident of double taxation, is just 9 percentage points out of 47 percentage points that the federal government levies on the taxable income of corporations and just 10 per cent out of the levy on personal income tax and one-half of the succession duties. The way in which the federal government has proceeded through this take-it-or-leave-it attitude indicates they are now proceeding to the next stage in their tactics of divide and conquer. They applied that method in 1946 and 1947 and later, first of all on the provinces with weaker fiscal positions. Their approach, if they repeat these tactics of divide and conquer, in that way will be inimical to national unity. I warn the government of the consequences, though they do not seem to care.

What needs to be done at the outset as a preliminary necessity is that the federal government should recognize the constitutional position of the provinces, but they have not shown a disposition to do so. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who does not seem to be listened to any more by hon. members opposite, long ago drew attention to the dangers of separating the responsibilities of tax collection from tax expenditure. He said that would always lead to extravagance. The late Mr. Mackenzie King, in 1945, had something similar to say to those hon. members opposite who have not completely forgotten him. He said:

> There will, however, be no solution of existing problems which involve financial outlays so long as one government or agency is the taxing agency and another government or agency is the spending agency. In other words we must return as regards our revenues and expenditures as in all else to responsible government in the fullest meaning of that term, whereby the governments that spend public moneys must be the governments which through the agency of taxation raise what is to be spent.

Mr. Harris: Would you mind giving me the reference?

Mr. Fleming: That language, as I understand it, does not preclude the entering into of an understanding between the federal and provincial authorities. I am not suggesting that the language is intended to go that far. But I do draw attention to this. We are not going to have a return to what may fairly be called responsible government unless there is an adequate recognition on the part of the federal government of the constitutional position of the provinces, the heavy burdens and the need for adequate revenues for the provinces and municipalities to discharge these heavy burdens of expenditure.

Mr. Harris: I should like the reference to Mr. Mackenzie King's remarks.

Mr. Fleming: That was in 1935 at the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Harris: There was not one in 1935, as I recall it; or was there?

Mr. Fleming: It was in 1935.

With the recognition of financial responsibilities and the need of revenues to meet them, let the federal government adequately recognize that these fields of common taxation are those that the provinces and the municipalities must depend upon to sustain the revenues or provide the revenues they need to discharge their responsibilities. They do not possess the unlimited sources of revenue that the federal government has.

Now, sir, I come to this concluding observation. I think this formula ought to be judged by the results which it will create. The provisions that will accrue to the provinces from the three features of the formula are inadequate. A new conference between the federal and provincial governments is altogether desirable, if the federal government will not go to such a conference with the same attitude as it went to the conference in 1955 and 1956. There is no use, of course, in having a conference if the federal government is simply going to continue to take this rigid, inflexible, take-it-or-leave-it attitude. On the other hand, if the federal government will give adequate recognition to the constitutional position and the needs of the provinces, and will genuinely seek an understanding to meet their needs, then a new conference should be called.

There is no use, so far as Her Majesty's loyal opposition is concerned, asking us to approve a form of dominion-provincial fiscal arrangement which has not received the approval of a single provincial government. If there could be, on the part of the federal government, a change of attitude, and after that change in attitude they will call a new conference, then fruitful results I am certain could be achieved. It would necessitate a fall session of parliament. We would be quite happy to see a fall session in order to achieve this praiseworthy object. We realize that these agreements are going to run out at the end of the present fiscal year, March 31, 1957 and therefore the legislation, to allow adequate planning by all governments concerned, must be passed this year, 1956. We are quite prepared, if the federal government will follow the course we have urged, to come back if necessary for a fall session. But we say that the provision made by this measure for the provinces is inadequate.

If hon. members opposite ask me what our position is I can say to them that we would do more for the provinces than the federal government has shown it is willing to do in this measure. We believe the federal government can do more and can afford to do more.

Let there be no question about our position in reference to other features of this matter of federal-provincial fiscal relations. We recognize completely the principle of equalization grants, sharing the revenues which if the federal government were not in this field would accrue simply to the provinces. We recognize the claim of the provinces in a weaker financial position; we certainly do. So far as we are concerned that recognition is axiomatic, basic and fundamental in our approach to this subject.

[Mr. Fleming.]

We look upon provinces like the maritimes, which have not the hinterland territory and undeveloped resources, broadly speaking, that are available to most of the other provinces. We say that account must be taken of those differences in the prospects for future development. Those provinces such as the maritimes—and I am not confining this to the maritimes—in a weaker financial position have been neglected by this government far too long.

I say again the provisions made by this formula, which is the only one that this government is prepared to put forward or agree to, will result in either double taxation, the imposition of new or increased sales taxes, bankruptcy or stagnation or, as the former premier of Nova Scotia warned, in a unitary state. So far as we of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition are concerned, sir, we do not wish to see any of these things happen. We believe we have ample warnings from competent provincial sources of the dangers of these results flowing from a continuance of the adamantine attitude of the government opposite in these matters. Benefit will accrue, as it always has accrued, to the dominion and to the federal treasury from strong provincial fiscal positions.

If hon. members are to be told now that the way for the provinces to meet their crushing needs is to go out and levy additional taxes in these fields of direct taxation and in that way create double taxation, I remind hon. members that it is the same taxpayer who will be paying these increased taxes and the plight of the taxpayer in his aggregate burdens is something concerning which we have reminded this government on more than one occasion.

The Minister of Finance knows that he is headed for a huge surplus in this fiscal year; that surplus may run from half a billion dollars to a larger figure, if the government does not dissipate it in extravagance or if it does not hide it, as it has done in other years, by putting great sums of money into various pockets of the government exchequer.

The government apparently has decided that it prefers that the provinces and the municipalities be starved, that they should be compelled to remain in a financial straitjacket, in order that the federal government may put on a grandstand show next spring and use tax reductions following this enormous budget surplus as election bait.

Mr. Harris: Would you oppose it?

Mr. Fleming: I ask the government to take a responsible attitude in this matter and recognize the imperative needs of the provincial and municipal governments. This formula is at best a makeshift; it is no solution of the problem. What is needed is a government with a realistic and sympathetic appreciation of the responsibilities and burdens and problems of the provinces and a wholesome respect for the constitutional position of the provinces and the constitutional rights they possess, as well as responsibilities they bear.

The Minister of Finance in speaking a week ago today said that times and men change. Well, we hope that the men opposite who are responsible for conducting negotiations with the premiers of the provinces can change. If they cannot change, then in the fullness of time, or when the electorate is given an opportunity, there will be an opportunity to change the men; but I do urge with all seriousness upon hon. members opposite that while they hold the responsibility—and I am not discounting the weight of the responsibility that rests upon them—they do take a far broader, far more realistic attitude toward the burdens of the provinces and municipalities and a much more imaginative approach to the need for finding a solution.

Therefore, sir, apart from all other considerations, some of which I have mentioned, I give this house in conclusion ten reasons why, because of its utter inadequacy, we of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition cannot support this bill and why we shall on second reading vote against it:

First, it makes inadequate provision for Prince Edward Island; second, it makes inadequate provision for Nova Scotia; third, it makes inadequate provision for New Brunswick; fourth, it makes inadequate provision for Newfoundland; fifth, it makes inadequate provision for Quebec; sixth, it makes inadequate provision for Ontario; seventh, it makes inadequate provision for Manitoba.

Mr. McCann: Put them all together.

Mr. Fleming: Eighth, it makes inadequate provision for Saskatchewan; ninth, it makes inadequate provision for Alberta; and tenth, it makes inadequate provision for British Columbia.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the hon. member a question? This is just for the purpose of clarification. I understood the hon. member to say, about five or six minutes ago, that the federal authorities had unlimited sources, for revenue, I presume. By what authority does he state that proposition?

Mr. Fleming: The British North America Act which clothes the federal authority with power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation whatever. It is written in the plainest terms in the British North America Act and I am sure my hon. friend has only overlooked it for the moment.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I hesitated to interrupt the hon. member when he was speaking, but I should like to ask him a question at this time. I think the hon. member said in his opening remarks that no Liberal members had spoken in the debate at the resolution stage.

Mr. Fleming: I thought so; if I overlooked any, I am sorry.

An hon. Member: You were not here, you wouldn't know.

Mr. Harris: There were at least two who spoke.

Mr. Fleming: I will check the record again, Mr. Speaker, and if I find I am mistaken I will express my regrets to the two hon. members who spoke.

An hon. Member: You were away at the time so you wouldn't know.

Mr. Fleming: I only hope that if they speak again they will be a little more outspoken.

Mr. Rowe: They were not very important or they would not have been overlooked.

An hon. Member: There were three or four who spoke.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on every occasion when bills are introduced in this House of Commons, it happens that some hon. member will say—and rightly so—that it is an important bill, or perhaps that it is the most important bill to be presented to the house in the course of that session.

As far as I am concerned, Bill No. 442 which we are now discussing on second reading is without doubt the most important bill that can possibly come before this house at this session.

This provides us with the opportunity of what we might term a five-year review of the responsibility of the governments and the financial possibilities of the three realms of government in this country meeting their responsibilities, because Bill 442 gives the power of signing new five-year agreements concerning financial arrangements. It is the time for very serious consideration and review of the situation as it exists governmentally and financially in this country. Because of the importance of these things, this bill is one that should not be discussed with high flights of eloquence or emotionalism but rather it should be discussed in as calm and dispassionate a manner as is humanly possible.

I take the position that there are two fundamental facts we have to keep in mind in considering this bill and all that it means. First of all we must remember that many years ago the fathers of confederation laid down the terms of union. I am convinced that no one of any party or of any sense will criticize the sincerity, integrity and brilliance of the fathers of confederation. They laid down what in effect is the fundamental constitution of this country and the jurisdiction and constitutional rights. I think I am safe in saying that at this time no one would contemplate any revision of the British North America Act which would in any way interfere with, change or abrogate the constitutional rights of the governments of this country. However, as men change and as times change we have to recognize that even with all their brilliance, even paying them the highest compliment for the remarkable job they did, at the time of confederation there could not possibly or conceivably have been any idea of the progress and development which would occur in this country and the changing responsibilities of government. That is something which could not have been conceived so many years ago.

Therefore, those of us who are now members of the House of Commons, I feel, have the responsibility of recognizing the basic principles and precepts, of recognizing the correctness of the jurisdiction and constitutional rights, and we should at this time endeavour when we consider a bill which lays the foundations for a new five-year contract to analyse the situation as it is and to see if we can devise a fiscal policy which will enable all governments to meet their new and growing responsibilities.

I said that there were two basic considerations which we had to keep in mind, and the second is that each one of us loves the province in which he resides and the constituency which he represents. Some of us live in provinces which are wealthier than others and we want to see the best that is possible in our own constituency and our own province, but I am afraid that in discussing a matter of this nature too often we consider it from the provincial and not from the national point of view. I say that as one who has some knowledge of that attitude because I spent 20 years in a provincial legislature.

Mr. Speaker, the lights are out, but hon. members need not worry about that, because I am giving them the light in the sense it is required.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I want to dissociate myself completely from the rumours that are now flying around the corridors of the parliament buildings. I do not believe that the Minister of Finance has taken a page out of the book of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by putting out the lights brought in a new system of closure. The lights went out at 12.45. If my memory is correct, when the war started in 1914, Earl Grey looked out of the windows of the foreign office in Great Britain and said, "The lights are going out over Europe." It may seem a strange analogy, but I want to say that in my estimation the Minister of Finance at this time, in the introduction of Bill 442, had the opportunity of putting on the lights for the Canadian nation by a new alignment of fiscal policy. I am sorry that he failed to throw the switch.

At the time of adjournment, I was pointing out that, although we recognize the thinking of provincial governments, and of citizens in provinces, for the maintenance of their own standards and the utilization of the benefits of their own resources, I thought—and I definitely do—that if we are real citizens we have to recognize that Canada as a nation can only be built up by a national attitude and not a parochial one.

The hon. member for Eglinton, in his one-hour talk this morning gave us the general views of himself and the party for whom he spoke. He concluded his remarks by stating that there were ten reasons why the official opposition was not going to support the second reading of this bill. I realize that it is a general practice to make one's remarks and conclude with points of a specific nature, but I am going to reverse the procedure. I am going to begin with ten points and then deal in general with them later. In doing so we would like to make this point very clear; that is, that the development of Canada and the status of all citizens in Canada is dependent upon our being a nation and not a series of parochial provinces.

This is based upon something which I think should be axiomatic, that Canada is not built up as a nation by the wealth of one, two or three provinces, by the industries in certain sections or by the activity of individuals in certain areas. The national wealth and well-being of Canada is the work of every solitary individual in the Dominion of Canada. It means that, irrespective of our position in various provinces, the work of the pioneers in the far outskirts of Canada, the work of those of what have been referred to as the poor provinces of Canada, make up the national well-being of Canada. It very definitely is the feeling of this group, for whom I am speaking at the present time, that therefore every citizen of Canada is entitled to the best that can be given to him, irrespective of the province or part in which he lives, be it in a city or in a pioneering outskirt of our country.

With that being understood, as I have said, I am going to reverse the procedure of the hon. member for Eglinton. I am going to lay down ten points first and speak to them generally afterwards. I can assure you that our group has given very serious consideration to Bill No. 442. We believe that the following factors deserve the attention of the government and deserve the consideration of the members of this house on the second reading and at the committee stage of this bill:

1. The C.C.F. group in this house is of the opinion that it is both advisable and necessary in the Canadian interests to continue dominion-provincial fiscal arrangements relative to income tax, corporation tax and succession duties.

2. It was found necessary for the federal government in time of war, in the national interest, to ask for a dominion-provincial agreement, and in our opinion it is just as necessary to retain the policy in time of peace, whether it be under an expanding economy or with the possibility of a recession.

3. Our federal group deplores the policy change of the federal government in that their latest proposals constitute a retreat from the basic principles and would appear to indicate a desire of the government to recede from an over-all taxation plan that prevents dual taxation and gives to the federal government a greater supervision of and influence upon the Canadian economy.

4. The government proposals fail to recognize the fiscal needs of the provinces.

5. Under the three plans submitted by the federal government there is no real incentive to the provinces to sign a tax rental agreement as there is no benefit accruing to those that come in as compared with those that stay out.

6. Any dominion-provincial fiscal arrangement must recognize the increasing responsibilities that provincial and municipal governments have without the taxation power to finance the same.

7. A municipality being the child of the provincial government, an understanding must be reached between the dominion and provincial authorities that a degree of benefits granted by the dominion, perhaps outside the taxation agreement, to a fair extent be passed on by the provincial government to the municipal governments.

8. Any dominion-provincial taxation agreement must include as part of the contract, or by declaration of government policy—and I emphasize that—the assumption of a degree of federal financial responsibility in the fields which constitutionally are the responsibility of provincial governments or municipalities, but the cost of which is beyond their taxation abilities.

9. Without change in the provisions of the British North America Act, and recognizing the responsibilities and jurisdictions of provincial and municipal governments, the federal government in outlining the tax rental proposals must include therewith financial aid in the field of education, highway construction and capital participation in resources conservation and development as being for the general good of Canada.

Finally, No. 10. Although Canada anticipates an expanding economy, the dominion authorities agree to plan, in conjunction with the provincial and municipal governments, for joint financial participation in necessary works that can be undertaken in time of recession; and further agree to make available to municipal authorities low interest loans to enable them to meet the commitments required because of industrial development and population increase for which the municipalities must make a heavy capital investment for services and the federal government receives the greatest taxation gain.

The C.C.F. group in the House of Commons put those ten points forward as being the important factors that should be considered in discussion on second reading and in the committee stage of Bill No. 442. I said, sir, that after outlining these ten points I would speak in the time available on the general aspects in support of the same. When the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), spoke at the resolution stage he reminded the house and the government of the contention of the government of the day when the first proposals were made for a dominion-provincial taxation agreement in the three fields that are under discussion. The statement is of such importance that I want to repeat it. The statement of the federal government with respect to the proposals outlined in the green book in 1945 was:

> To do these things fully and without destroying the federal system, the dominion government considers that it should have full and exclusive freedom to tax personal and corporate income and estates so that the restrictive effects of double and competitive taxation may be avoided and so that income earned and wealth accumulated nationally can be fully and efficiently taxed for national purposes and the mutual advantage of all provinces.

Sir, that was an important statement. It is one that I personally agree with completely. Because of the exigencies of war it was found necessary by the federal government to operate as a nation, and they required not only certain controls but the over-all supervision of the national economy if we were to wage a successful war. All the provinces agreed. But, Mr. Speaker, we want to say this very definitely, that it is just as important for Canada to win the peace as it was for Canada to win the war. I know that can be called a trite statement but it is not. Having been blessed with the resources we have and having in mind the capabilities of our people, we should see to it that there is a reasonable standard of living and degree of prosperity for all the people of Canada, not just those in the wealthy provinces. Winning the peace means the development of Canada by applying the abilities, policies and national direction which we employed in winning the war in order to bring about the greatest good for all the people of this country.

In the event of a recession, and nobody knows whether or not we may encounter another one, it cannot be controlled by any province but only by the national government. We feel strongly that the powers and supervision that enabled Canada to play the wonderful part it did in the winning of the war should also be applied to the winning of the peace.

This, of course, takes me back to my opening remarks as to the responsibilities of various governments. The jurisdictions and constitutional rights are laid down by the British North America Act but the responsibilities have increased to an extent not known when confederation took place. It is regrettable that the present bill does not take into consideration the realities of the situation.

At the resolution stage a member placed the facts on the record with regard to the expenditures of government. In case they have been forgotten I should like to do so again. According to the government's own figures federal government expenditure from 1945 to 1955 increased from $4½ billion to $4¾ billion, or 5·5 per cent. Provincial government expenditures increased from $384 million to $1½ billion or 291·9 per cent, and the costs of municipal government went up by 276 per cent.

As pointed out by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) this morning, the municipalities and the provinces have had to make terrific capital expenditures. This, sir, has resulted in an amazing situation because in the proceedings at the last dominion-provincial conference we find this:

It is noteworthy that, in these post-war years of prosperity, the indebtedness of the provinces, municipalities and their agencies has risen from $2·977 billion in 1945 to $5·715 billion in 1953, an increase of 92 per cent, while the federal government debt has actually been reduced from $18·438 billion to $18·276 billion.

It should not be necessary to emphasize the practical implications of these figures. Undoubtedly at the time of confederation it was thought that fiscal policies could be arranged on the basis of increase of population. That no longer applies today. One of the greatest needs in realigning fiscal policies with governmental responsibilities is a recognition of the fiscal needs of the provinces and their children, the municipalities. I think we must also have a recognition of the fact that the revenues of the federal government are dependent entirely on the prosperity of the provinces. They being dependent upon the prosperity of the provinces, we need now a recognition by the federal government of the necessity for conservation of the resources of the provinces. Literally, that matter is strictly a provincial responsibility. But if our resources are depleted and collapse, so will the revenues of the federal government. Some advances have been made but not nearly enough. The economy of British Columbia depends to a great extent on our forest resources. In the past they have been given away or they have been stolen. Our resources have been mined, not forested. In recent years there has been some change in policy, but a provincial government is completely unable to do the kind of reforestation that is required. It is absolutely impossible financially for them to do it. It is to the interest of the federal government to see that reforestation takes place and to see that our forests are not destroyed by fire. As it is in forestry, so is it in almost every other aspect of our national resources. We think it is only reasonable to ask this government, when they consider introducing a bill as they are now doing, to recognize the situation as it exists. If they want to be selfish in their own interests they must play a greater part financially in the conservation or the replacement of the natural resources of all of the provinces of the dominion. They must also play a part in the development of the natural resources. In this modern day and age we are reaching a stage where it is completely impossible for provinces or municipalities to finance required developments. This statement applies particularly in such matters as—and I agree they are within provincial jurisdiction and come under provincial rights—hydroelectric power, the Saskatchewan dam and developments in the maritimes which they need most desperately but which they are completely unable to provide because of the financial limitations. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is reasonable to ask the government themselves not to take a parochial stand as a national government but to recognize that they have now responsibilities for development and for conservation. As pointed out by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), costs in the fields of highways and education are now completely beyond the fiscal powers of provinces and of municipalities.

I come back to this point. I state quite honestly and bluntly that we as provincial citizens need to have an understanding of our national well-being. I say also that we need to have from this government a national picture or understanding of provincial and municipal well-being. It is most necessary that in this proposal embodied in Bill No. 442 the government recognize that it is not facing up to the problems of Canada as they exist today. I believe that the ten points this group has outlined are important ones. I believe that they are uppermost in the minds of the provincial premiers of the ten provinces of Canada. I should like to consolidate the opinion. I have read the proceedings of the federal-provincial conference. I have read as much as I could of the information supplied. From reading the statements of all the premiers, I think the opinion has been very well put in a telegram from one of the premiers at the request of the editor in chief of the Toronto Daily Star. After being asked his position the premier of Saskatchewan sent this telegram which reads as follows:

> . . . new tax proposals as placed before parliament Ottawa almost completely disregard all representations and evidence advanced by provinces supporting our need for more adequate share of direct tax fields jointly occupied by both levels of government. Saskatchewan has consistently argued proposals have three main weaknesses, first level of payments much too low to relieve increasingly serious financial strain on provinces and municipalities with pyramiding costs of education, road building, health and social services, and urban growth. Second, proposals are related solely to revenues from direct tax fields. They make no provision for fiscal needs of poorer provinces struggling to achieve decent minimum services despite scant revenues from alternative tax resources. Third, instead of seeking co-operation of provinces in maintaining efficient co-ordinated tax system new proposals encourage double taxation and may seriously weaken fiscal powers of Ottawa in combatting major economic crisis. Moreover tax proposals advanced in isolation without needed integration in national policies for aiding public investment and economic development, meeting special regional needs, or stabilizing farm income. One redeeming feature of new proposals is that equalization plan for first time clearly recognizes right of all provinces to share more equitably in tax proceeds from personal and corporate income derived from whole country.

From my reading I think that is the consensus of the premiers of the ten provinces of Canada. I want to reiterate this statement, Mr. Speaker. We firmly believe that the interest of Canada demands a new financial understanding between the provinces and the dominion. We believe that, without change in the British North America Act, it demands that the federal government shall give more generous assistance to the provinces and municipalities in meeting responsibilities that were never thought of many years ago. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that in my estimation the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) had a remarkable opportunity at this session and at this time to do a wonderful job for Canada and to do basically what was done at the time of confederation, namely to lay down a plan for the future of this country. I regret that in Bill No. 442 he has not shown any indication that he understands the situation in Canada or the need for revision of fiscal policy so that all governments can meet responsibilities. From all that has been said in the past and what I have read, I think the Minister of Finance should be told of the old Indian proverb that an elephant has two sets of teeth, one for show, the tusks, and one for action inside. I am afraid that this bill, and what has been said in support of it by the government, is for show, for public consumption, but when you get down to the teeth inside, those that mean action, it does not recognize the problems that are facing Canada as a nation.

I sincerely hope—because I see I have only one minute left—that the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, will understand that there is no carping criticism from this group; there is no parochialism. We believe in Canada. We believe in the constitutional rights of the provinces as laid down by the B.N.A. Act. We believe it is possible to produce a plan, a fiscal policy, that will enable all the provinces to come into agreement and thereby not only make it a greater nation but establish more equalized standards in all fields in this dominion. It can be done, and we hope the minister will do something more than is contained in Bill No. 442 at the present time.

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to take just a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to deal with some of the things that were put forward by the speakers who have preceded me. With a good deal of what they have said, I can agree. I find myself in disagreement with some of the things. Certainly, I think we must all agree that the bill that is now before us is one of the most important measures, if not the most important, to come before parliament this year. I hope that it will be treated as an important measure and one that deserves tremendous consideration because from it will devolve the happiness, contentment and welfare of our people for the next five years.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), who just finished speaking, in the earlier part of his address mentioned the necessity for greater supervision by the federal government over the economy of Canada. He mentioned the need for thinking nationally and, it seemed to me, as advocating a greater measure of centralization of authority. As I listened to him develop his topic I could not help coming to the conclusion that he apparently forgets one very important matter, that is that all the material wealth that is produced in Canada, all those things we get and enjoy in what we call the standard of living, come from our natural resources. In the last analysis every dollar of taxation taken by all the governments of Canada has to come out of the wealth that is produced by those natural resources. Evidently that is something that my hon. friend forgot. These resources belong to the provinces. The development of these resources was given as a responsibility to the provinces under the British North America Act. The provinces are certainly entitled to the money coming from the development of their resources, first to pay all the costs of development in the provinces, and secondly to take care of the needs of the people in those provinces for services. Now, those are fundamental things, I think, with which every other province can agree. If the people of any province use the wisdom, vision and care in the development of the resources within its boundaries, then Canada as a whole will be richer and every government in Canada will benefit in some way.

The reverse is true, also. If they do not use wisdom in the development of their resources, if they fail to use care, judgment and efficiency, then everyone in Canada will be poorer. But some benefit must accrue to the people of a province if they do work hard and if they make their resources yield in abundance. If you deny them that benefit of hard work, wisdom and care, then the detriment to development will certainly follow.

While we agree that sharing with the less fortunate provinces in a measure is desirable and is provided for in this bill—it is a principle with which we can all agree—I am sure that if federal supervision of Canada's economy is carried too far or if federal taxation is carried too far, then that great discouragement to the development effort is bound to come and Canada will be poorer and not richer. We have to be careful, therefore, how far we go with these matters. It seemed to me the hon. member for Vancouver East put forward a principle and then argued against it.

I should like to turn for just a moment to what the hon. member for Eglinton said this morning. I agree with him that the three fields of taxation which are now open on a combined basis between the provinces of the dominion belong just as much to the provinces as they do to the dominion. We could argue from now until doomsday and nobody could possibly prove otherwise. You may bring evidence to support a certain view or you may bring evidence to support just the opposite view. But in balance I am sure the evidence will support the contention that the personal income tax, corporation income tax and succession duties belong just as much to the provincial government as they do to the federal government. Consequently, we cannot look upon the formula the Minister of Finance (Mr. Harris) has worked out as doing anything for the provinces, except in so far as the tax equalization and revenue stabilization do help the poorer provinces. I say that the 10, 9, 50 per cent formula is not completely fair. I think that something more than that could be done. I am not going to suggest a formula that would be more appropriate. The Minister of Finance is capable of doing that because he has all the information.

The second important thing the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) mentioned this morning, and with which I thoroughly agree, was that the provincial governments are not happy about the formula. They do not believe it gives sufficient weight to the needs of the provinces in relation to their responsibility nor to the municipal governments in relation to theirs. The main reason why the provinces are not happy is, as has been stated, the very great problems they face in connection with burdens devolving upon the municipalities. I think the provinces could take care of their own affairs quite nicely if it were not for their creatures the municipalities and the heavy burdens they carry.

The hon. member for Eglinton this morning mentioned the city of Edmonton in my own province, a city that has grown so quickly as to have practically burst at the seams. It has seen an almost unprecedented growth. Over the past several years there has actually been incorporated into that city every month a good size town as far as population is concerned. This means that every one of the services has had to be tremendously expanded and the costs of that expansion have been borne very largely by the people in that city who were already established there. Edmonton, of course, is only one example and there are a great many others that one could name. Their plight today is a very serious one and it should be given the most earnest consideration by the minister, as I have already indicated in my previous remarks.

There are two main reasons why we are critical of Bill No. 442. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it proposes to make into law a formula and a set of taxation provisions which the provinces have not approved in conference with the federal government. It is a unilateral proposal placed before the provinces to accept or reject as they wish. If they accept it they go along and take what the federal government is doling out under the 10-9-50 formula. If they reject it, then in order to get revenues they must resort to double taxation which, of course, as the minister knows full well, very few of the provinces would be prepared to do for the simple reason that the people will not put up with double taxation.

The confusion that would result would be monstrous, and that is something we do not want to develop in this country. I look upon this whole proposal as a denial of the partnership principle upon which a smoothly working federal democracy must be based.

I think the time is long past, Mr. Speaker, when any one in Canada with any sense at all could possibly look upon the federal government as the superior and the provincial governments as the inferiors. I think the time has long since passed when we consider that this government has a priority over the provincial governments in the fields of taxation. I think what we have to do is look upon the relationship between the dominion and the provinces as a partnership, and the nearer we can get to a partnership arrangement the better it is going to be.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if the partnership principle is to be observed it must then call for agreements and an approval of a proposal put forward by the Minister of Finance to the premiers or governments of the provinces. If the proposal is not accepted by the majority of the provinces in a good spirit, then it seems to me the best the federal government can do is to say, "All right then, you propose something," and call the provinces together and consider the matter further in the light of the wording of the detailed proposal. When that time comes I am certain that good sense will prevail and that the provinces and the federal government in partnership can work out something that will be acceptable and that will succeed in bringing to the provinces and municipalities what they need in order to be able to carry on.

We stand for partnership, Mr. Speaker, between the provincial and the federal governments and it must be a real partnership. Therefore, the relationship between the dominion and the provinces cannot be satisfactory if there is any thought of their being superior or inferior, senior or junior or a prior claim or this or that in the field of taxation. We have to keep in mind the fundamental need.

We are critical of this measure for another reason, Mr. Speaker. The formula does fall short of providing the provincial governments with a sufficient share of the tax revenues available to the governments of Canada today. The big reason for making that statement, of course, is that the provinces have a terrific problem on their hands in connection with the financing of municipal needs. I am convinced that the major issue in Canada's political life today is the financial inability of the provinces and their creatures the municipalities to perform the duties and carry out the responsibilities allotted to them under the constitution.

I think we have to approach a matter of the kind we are now considering under Bill No. 442 with one question uppermost in our minds, and here it is. Does it do all that is possible to ensure that the provinces and municipalities can fully discharge their responsibilities under the constitutions?

Now, if it does this then we can go forward; if it does not, then we have to oppose it. Does it do all that is possible to ensure that the provinces and their municipalities can fully discharge their responsibilities under the constitution? That is the spirit in which I am trying to consider this measure. The division of powers and responsibilities provided by the British North America Act was, in our judgment, a wise division and I do not think it could have been wiser.

As I consider it, it did at the time divide the powers and responsibilities as wisely as men could possibly have conceived, but over the years since 1867 a great many new situations have arisen which were not foreseen by the fathers of confederation.

A short time ago a study was made in the province of Alberta by some competent people concerning the problem of municipal finances and the relationship between the provinces and the municipal governments. I want to quote just briefly from the report of that study:

> When the constitution of Canada was set up by the British North America Act of 1867 even the most forward looking statesmen could hardly have anticipated the complicated functions of government which were to develop over the years.

Federal-Provincial Financial Arrangements

Almost the total population of Canada was rural. It was an age of individual self sufficiency supplemented by mutual assistance of neighbour to neighbour. The fathers of confederation found this good and saw in this pioneer spirit the future greatness of Canada.

National defence, regulation of international trade, a criminal code, the opening up of the west —these were the concern of government and these could best be handled at federal level. Little was left even for the provincial governments. A member of the legisature for Prince Edward Island sizing up the situation stated "in this house scarcely anything should be left for us to do but legislate dog taxes and the running at large of swine."

The worry was to prevent a government of so little field of responsibility—

Such as the provincial government.

—from becoming unduly costly in administration. To quote Galt in his Sherbrook address, "Every effort has been made to reduce the cost of local governments, so that local machinery should be as little costly as possible for it would not do to affront the intelligence of the people and tell them we had devised an expensive kind of machinery to do a very insignificant amount of work."

Mr. Harris: He did not stay in politics very long after that speech.

Mr. Low: Well, perhaps not, but just the same he had a point of view. It does have a bearing on the present question. I continue:

With such a conception of the role of provincial and municipal governments it is little wonder that the federal government reserved to itself a perfectly free hand in revenue raising by any means of taxation, direct or indirect while it specifically limited the rights of the provincial governments and their creatures, the municipal governments to direct taxation and certain privileges of licensing.

Certain significant trends were soon after to be observed. By 1891 a third of the population was living in urban areas and it was already evident that the local governments must assume new and ever increasing responsibilities little dreamed of by the fathers of confederation. The next half century was to see a continued concentration of urban population with a corresponding decrease in rural population. This trend has continued until in Alberta today there are less than one-third of the people engaged in agricultural pursuits, while in the U.S.A. the rural population is reported to be less than 10 per cent of the total.

I might say that the figures show that the rural population in Canada is something just over 20 per cent. That indicates the trend which has occurred and which places a greater responsibility upon the local government and less, naturally, upon the federal government. We are not overlooking the fact that in time of war or threat of war the federal government must take the prior position; we agree with that. But it seems to us that as peace comes we must recognize the forces which have been at work to change the burden of responsibility largely over to the local governments. That is why I say that the argument that this bill does not sufficiently meet the needs of the municipalities and the provinces is one reason we have to criticize it, and quite severely.

[Mr. Low.]

Let me deal for a minute with what the provincial and municipal governments have done to find new ways of raising revenue. I did not realize how resourceful the municipalities have really been over the years until I read this study. I was amazed to find that all the following taxes have been used by the municipalities in the provinces:

Property Taxes
- Real property
- Personal property
- Frontage tax
- Stock in trade tax
- Animal and vehicle taxes
- Tenant's tax
- Multiple entrance tax

Business Taxes
- Ad valorem tax
- Specific business taxes (e.g. floor space)
- Advertising taxes

Commodity Taxes
- Coal
- Tobacco
- Gasoline
- Electricity and gas

Transaction Taxes
- Franchise taxes
- Insurance premium taxes
- Mortgage taxes
- Telephone taxes
- Telephone toll taxes
- Parimutuel taxes
- Slot machine taxes

General Sales Taxes
Income Tax
Poll Tax
Amusement Tax

Bless my soul, what else is there? I have not heard of a tax on going to the bathroom more than once a day, but that is about the only one which seems to have been overlooked.

It is interesting to note that taxation by municipalities has become a real business. It has developed over the years as a profession to the point where tax commissioners are to be found in municipalities whose sole business it is to hunt up new taxes which may be applied in order to scrounge more revenue out of the pockets of the people. They forget apparently, as do my hon. friends opposite, that every single dollar of taxes must come out of the pockets of the people, and they are the same pockets whether it is the federal, the provincial or the municipal government which does the taxing. Surely they have scraped the bottom of the barrel in many places.

I should like to turn for a minute to indicate what this burden on the municipalities really has been and is now and what efforts have been made to lighten it and what is still left to be done. About six years ago the government of my province approached this matter seriously with a view to determining what could best be done to help the municipalities which were going further and further into debt and finding it more and more impossible to carry on the services required to be carried on.

That province started to increase direct grants and indirect assistance to the municipalities in an effort to lift their burden. The figures I am giving are taken from the budget address of the Hon. Mr. Gerhart for the year 1955-56 in which he indicated the total amount of assistance which had been granted by the provinces to the municipalities in various forms. I am going to calculate it as a percentage of their total revenues and when I do so I think hon. members will be surprised.

During the six fiscal years ending March 31, 1956 the direct financial assistance granted to the municipalities for the purposes of education, public health, highways, grants in lieu of taxes, municipal assistance, and grants for public aid totalled $208,034,734. There were no strings attached except that the money was marked for the various fields indicated. To give a total amount may not seem to indicate much, but I think it indicates much more when you show it as a percentage of the ordinary revenues of the province for any particular year.

I shall take 1955-56, the last year I have. In that year the total direct grants from the provincial government to the municipal government amounted to $59,069,555 or $60 million in round figures. That is more than 38 per cent of the total revenue on income account of the province. I challenge any province in the Dominion of Canada to match that. They cannot.

Let us go further. In addition to the direct financial grants the government of the province of Alberta gave to the municipalities indirect financial assistance by way of free medical and hospital care for old age pensioners and other public health and welfare services amounting to $7,886,400. That was in the year 1955-56. That brought the total direct and indirect financial grants from the province of Alberta to the municipalities up to $66,955,000, or $67 million in round figures. That may not mean very much unless you show it as a percentage. That sum of $67 million approximately, given in direct and indirect assistance to the municipalities of the province, amounted to 44 plus per cent of the total revenue on income account for that year. That is partnership and I think it stands as an example to Canada.

Of course people will say, "Oh, but you have the money." It is true that our revenues have increased. I can remember my first year as provincial treasurer when I was dealing with a total budget of $20 million, and when I compare it with the budget today of $205 million I realize that I was living 40 years too soon.

So also have the responsibilities of the provinces increased. The provincial government is doing its best to help the municipalities carry the burden. In addition to all the direct or indirect financial grants, amounting to over 44 per cent of the total revenue on income account in 1955-56, my province granted to the municipalities $39 million in loans for the purpose of developing and increasing their services to the people in the way of sewers, waterworks and that sort of thing, at rates ranging from 2 per cent to 3½ per cent, and made it unnecessary for them to go into the money markets of the country bidding against each other for the sale of their debentures. That was in addition in one year. Over the six years about which I have been speaking, my province granted to the municipalities low interest rate loans in that form for a period of 20 years totalling $149,433,000.

With those figures before you, you would think the municipalities in my province would be in clover, but the facts were mentioned the other day by my hon. friend from Jasper-Edson (Mr. Yuill), a mayor in a typical municipality, who said that after all this assistance that had been granted by the provincial government to the municipal government, over which he has some jurisdiction, the tax rate on property was 47 mills. Let us stop to think about it. That is a fairly average figure that you would find not only in the municipalities in my province but in every other province. It would be worse in many. I say we have to take those things into consideration when we think about a bill of this kind.

That is one of the reasons I asked the minister, before he brought in this bill for second reading, to get off by himself, take a second look at it, and come back with something that would more nearly meet the need of the provinces and municipalities. I say that a similar picture could be painted in every province in Canada. British Columbia, for example, is looked upon as being a very wealthy province, and will be one without question. As she is now in the throes of a magnificent development, money has to be available for that development. They are trying to build a railway as a Pacific coast outlet for a great part of the country in the north, because the railways would not do it. That is costing them a huge sum of money. They have to build pioneer roads and access roads to ensure the development of their resources.

Education was mentioned the other day. In education what a terrific burden they will have to bear in the next few years because of the large increase in the numbers of students and the need for more schools and staffs and all that sort of thing. They are faced with the necessity for developing power, which is a very costly business. One could speak for hours about the problems they face. I hope some of the boys in British Columbia will see fit to do that. How are they going to do it if the provinces cannot obtain from the development of their resources sufficient money to enable them to finance this expansion? If they have to come here every now and then to plead with the federal government to give them a hand-out, I am sure we are not going to get that development.

I could talk about New Brunswick and the problem they face down there in trying to improve their standard of living by industrialization. They have not many industries, and as a consequence their standard of living has suffered. They need power, and to get power the provincial government feels it has to go into terrific debt. There again development may be retarded because of difficulty or inability to get money for that kind of development.

It seems to me that with all these things the minister would be well advised yet to call in the provincial governments, put the problem before them and let them see the wording of this bill. If they are satisfied with the wording of the bill, and indicate that they are satisfied with it, I shall keep quiet and go along with it. If the minister wants to play the partnership role, he could do no better deed than that. If they are not satisfied; if they feel it is too rigid; if they feel it does not give the minister and themselves flexibility enough to negotiate better arrangements within the framework of the bill, then he should attempt to change it, but I do not believe he should try to put it through and make it law before he has the approval of the provincial governments. Otherwise he is destroying the partnership principle, and that is not conducive to the smooth working of democracy. I am going to leave it at that point for now; I may have something more to say at a later stage.

Mr. W. Ross Thatcher (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take part very briefly in this debate, because I think this is one of the important bills to come before parliament this session.

Hon. members will recall that the original dominion-provincial tax agreements were formulated during the war years, largely as a result, I suppose, of the depression. The objectives of those agreements were threefold; first, to eliminate duplication and inefficiency in taxation as much as possible; second, to give the poorer provinces a more equitable share of national tax revenues; third, to give the federal government sufficient control over fiscal policy to enable it to cope with unemployment and other economic problems.

Generally speaking, prairie residents have always supported the tax agreements and they still support them. We are of the opinion that only by some such financial arrangement can every Canadian citizen be given equal treatment and a minimum standard of social security. At the same time, most of us on the prairies, I think, have realized that there has been one basic weakness in the agreements up to now. That has been the fact that the province of Quebec, with its four million-odd citizens, has not participated. Premier Duplessis, in his wisdom or otherwise, has felt that the old agreements centralized power in Ottawa and encroached upon provincial rights.

Quite frankly, most of us in the prairies have found it rather difficult to understand the premier's attitude. Yet obviously the views of the province of Quebec, particularly when they were held by so many of its citizens, had to be taken into account. The citizens of Quebec after all are just as much entitled individually to receive benefits from federal tax revenues as the citizens of any other province. Under the new agreements they will receive no concession which is not available to any other province. But now the benefits are available to Quebec without obligation, and she can feel that the preservation of her provincial rights is assured, if they were ever threatened. This seems to me to be a compromise solution which is in the interests of national unity and the good of Canada.

What are the criticisms that have been made so far concerning the agreements? The major criticism has been that the financial terms are not sufficiently generous to the provinces. In this debate we have heard the provisions described as "inadequate", "niggardly", "unrealistic" and so on. But what are the facts? Under these agreements the federal treasury will be giving in the first year to the provinces the sum of more than $650 million. That represents an increase of $115 million over what would have been available under the old agreements. My own province of Saskatchewan will receive $6·1 million more than would have been available under the former pact.

I can understand the provincial governments wanting more revenues. That is perfectly natural. Nevertheless I am absolutely convinced this afternoon that federal taxes have reached their maximum level in peacetime, and I am also convinced that a majority of the citizens of Canada want taxes to come down.

This coming year our federal budget will reach the sum of $4·8 billion. Governments at the three levels will be taking about 33 cents out of every dollar earned by the average Canadian. Surely every elected representative, whether he is in the municipal field, the provincial field, or the federal field, must realize that there is a limit to the amount of money which can be taken from any citizen by governments, if his ability to save and keep himself solvent is not to be impaired.

In the past two decades the federal government has assumed new financial responsibilities, and those responsibilities are not of a contracting but rather of an expanding nature. For instance, national defence today is taking almost $2 billion. Who in this house would say, with the international situation as it is, that this expenditure may go down in the foreseeable future? Social welfare expenditures, including family allowances, old age pensions, unemployment insurance and so on, today take $900 million or better, and these expenditures are going up quite sharply every year.

I think it should be remembered that constitutionally some of these measures came within the jurisdiction of the provinces and that frequently they were adopted by the federal government at the instigation of some of the provinces. Over and above the social welfare expenditures I have mentioned, parliament has agreed this year to adopt a national health insurance program at the appropriate time, when the provinces are prepared to enter. That is going to cost at least another $180 million in the beginning and may ultimately mean an expenditure of $350 million.

In view of all these long-term obligations, and in view of other costs, I must say today that I am in complete agreement with the Minister of Finance when he says that for the time being at least the financial capacity of the federal government has been stretched to the limit.

Premier Frost of Ontario has said very flatly that his province must have more revenue, and he wants it from the federal treasury. In view of the fact that under these agreements Ontario will receive $224 million, I simply cannot agree with the Premier.

Personally I view with alarm the steady drive of certain provinces on the one hand, to involve the federal authorities in greater expenditure and simultaneously on the other, to transfer more provincial costs to Ottawa. It seems to me that such efforts are based on a fallacy, an illusion that if the provinces can transfer large burdens to the federal treasury, the taxpayers of those provinces will in some way escape them.

The people who pay provincial and federal taxes are precisely the same, and I do not think Ottawa should be looked upon as a kind of fairy godmother. I think it is parliament's duty to tell the provinces that for the time being at least we have done as much as is financially feasible or possible. If, as Premier Frost believes, his government must have more revenue, then it seems sensible to me that he should raise that revenue by provincial taxation. It seems to me there is always a danger involved when one government collects the taxes and another government spends the money.

I do not say this afternoon that this legislation will solve all the financial difficulties of our confederation. I am sure no one will be completely satisfied because the middle way seldom arouses enthusiasm. Yet I do feel that this is a compromise solution which can be accepted advantageously by all ten provinces, and for that reason I support the principle of the bill.

Parliament, Mr. Speaker, is now ending one of the most contentious sessions it has had since the end of the war. Despite the criticism from this side of the house I must say that this legislation represents one more occasion when I have found myself in agreement with the government on a matter of basic policy. There have been others, of course, during this session. If the house will permit me I should like to take a few seconds to mention them. I recall the pipe-line debate where, despite the acrimony and the bitterness which was caused, I found myself feeling that the government had adopted the most practical course to get the pipe line built. As a second example I think of the government's wheat selling policy, which is so important in my part of the country. We have heard suggestions from opposition groups that the government should have adopted give-away policies.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, if an opportunity is to be opened to refer to earlier debates this session and to comment on them, it will have to be opened for all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: I hear some uncouth members over there—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre was indicating to the house that he has found himself in agreement with the government on several matters during this session. He went on to say that if the house would permit he would take a few seconds to enumerate them. I take it that there are some objections to that course, and I will have to ask the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre to avoid that course.

Mr. Thatcher: Thank you. I had hoped that the hon. member for Eglinton would have given me 30 seconds at this time.

An hon. Member: He is not big enough.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the hon. member stating that he has supported the government, if that is his wish, but he has no right to go on to make comments in detail, as he was doing, on the reasons therefor. That is quite out of order. If the debate is to be opened up it should be opened up for all, and hon. members opposite might just as well save their very uncouth remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thatcher: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the rules of the house, and I must admit that the member who has just spoken is technically correct. I should have liked to mention several other occasions when I found myself in agreement with the government, such as the national health insurance plan and so on.

Mr. Martin: With which the hon. member for Eglinton disagrees.

Mr. Fulton: Which one?

Mr. Thatcher: After a good deal of consideration over many months I have become convinced that the Liberal party, which is built on the cornerstone of free enterprise and the competitive system, has done a good deal in recent years to bring about our present prosperity and to promote full employment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thatcher: As hon. members know, for 15 months I have sat in the house as a member without party affiliation.

Mr. Lennard: Just one more chicken coming home.

An hon. Member: He has a place to roost.

Mr. Lennard: He is coming home. He belonged over there in the first place.

Mr. Thatcher: During that time I have thoroughly examined the platforms and programs of the other groups in the house, and I am convinced that generally speaking my own political thinking is in line with that of the Liberal party. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I indicated this fact last week to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who was kind enough to say that I would be welcome in the party he leads. I believe that by taking such action, in the immediate period ahead I can best serve the constituency and the province from which I come. For that reason I propose to sit as a government member from this time forward.

Hon. James Sinclair (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on dominion-provincial taxation agreements I find that I have not taken part in financial debates during the last four years, since I have been Minister of Fisheries. I, of course, took a very active part during the four years I was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance. They were four very happy years for me. I recall particularly the debates of 1952, when the last tax agreements were before this house.

I propose to do a little recollection of events of those days when I discuss the agreements this afternoon.

But I am sure that just for the moment even the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) will permit me, as the first government speaker since the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre (Mr. Thatcher) made his statement, to welcome the hon. member to the Liberal party. The hon. member in his 11 years here has been an able and active member of this house and a particularly industrious member in the drudgery of committee work, and we are very happy to have him here. If I may be pardoned one personal reference, may I say this. Most hon. members know that since 1945 the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, the former independent member for Comox-Alberni, Mr. Jack Gibson, and I have been very close friends despite our political differences. I am very happy to have had some part in converting both those two gentlemen to the Liberal party.

As I said when I started, this debate this year reminds me a great deal of the debate that took place when I was parliamentary assistant in 1952. There has not been much change in the arguments put forward by the opposition. The cry is that these agreements are not good enough and that the provinces are not getting enough money. So say the premiers. Their point of view is, I think, a little more understandable than the agreement with this view by members of the opposition.

I find, of course, that there is a real change in the new proposals. The most significant one, of course, is the 20 per cent increase in payments promised next year. That is, $115 million more in the first year is to go to the provinces than is provided under the present agreement. As the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) very wisely remarked in his very statesmanlike speech last week, if a trade union leader went back to his union and said, "I have obtained for you a 20 per cent increase in wages" or if a company president reported to his shareholders that profits had gone up 20 per cent, there would be great praise. If a political party were able to increase their vote by 20 per cent the hosannas of praise would rend the skies. So I say there is reason for appreciation of the fact that under the new agreements the provinces are going to get 20 per cent or $115 million more.

My hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party called that sum niggardly. He called $115 million niggardly. That beats even the famous remark which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is once alleged to have made about $1 million. The only remark I can think of that came close to it was when the former member for Fraser Valley, George Cruickshank, asked the then prime minister, Mackenzie King, after he had announced a $5 million grant to Fraser Valley, and 75 per cent of the cost of flood relief, whether that was just a token payment. I think the comment of the leader of the Social Credit party that 20 per cent or $115 million the first year is niggardly is in that class.

Neither the previous minister of finance nor the present Minister of Finance has ever contended that these agreements are the final solution of an extremely difficult problem. There has been much mention today of the difficulties of governing a federal state. In the United States, for example, there are no direct tax payments as between the federal government and the state governments, though there are many grants in aid. Last year the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Drew) and I had the good fortune to have dinner one evening with Prime Minister Menzies of Australia. The talk naturally got around to the subject of federal-state relations. I was amazed to learn that in Australia there is no such agreement or no such bargain. The federal government passes on the budgets of each of the states and decides what money they should be allowed. We have not followed that system. We have tried to negotiate reasonable agreements between the federal and provincial governments.

We Liberals believe in a strong national government. We also believe that in the government of a country of this size it is important that there may be effective local governments both at the provincial and municipal levels. I think most Canadians agree with that statement. As a matter of fact there is only one Canadian political leader in recent times who has disagreed and actually advocated the concentration of all power in the hands of the federal government and the elimination of provincial governments. His name is Colonel George Drew. I refer hon. members to Hansard of 1952, volume IV, page 3564, which contains a great many references to speeches made by Colonel Drew when he was leader of the Ontario provincial Conservative party. Let me quote a speech he made before the Canadian club in London, as quoted in the Toronto Star of February 23, 1935:

> For Canada, harassed by debts, labour troubles, and conflict in company, insurance and labour laws, Col. Drew saw in one strong central government the solution, instead of an utterly mad jig-saw puzzle of ten conflicting governments.

Then listen to this:

> If we were starting all over again who would be crazy enough to set up ten governments in Canada?

There are two or three more. Let us pass on now to what was said two or three years later. On November 10, 1936, he was reported in the Toronto Globe as follows:

> Canada must eliminate the costly inefficiency of ten governments doing, in most cases, the job of one or else sink in the rising tide of fascism.

We have not sunk in the rising tide of fascism. The federal government and the ten provincial governments have done a pretty good job of governing Canada. Even more delightful is this pronouncement in 1938—the years are rolling by—when he was speaking in Montreal on December 10 of that year, as reported in the Montreal Gazette. This time I can tell the hon. member for Kamloops that he was reported by a good Tory paper, namely the Montreal Gazette, since he objected to the quotation from the Toronto Star. Mr. Drew is reported to have said this:

> The way to get back to the ideals of confederation, to the ideal of a strong central government, is for Ontario as the largest province to sit down and say to Ottawa:—

Listen to this; this is Colonel Drew, leader of the Conservative party in Ontario, speaking:

> We have acquired rights it was never intended we should have.

That is the province of Ontario.

> We have duplicated services. We propose to hand back to you all things of necessarily national character and retain only those things necessary for the good functioning of local government.

Then as late as 1941 in Halifax at the bar association meeting he was saying this, as reported in the Halifax Herald of April 25, 1941:

"What we need greatly is to look at government from a business point of view," he said, "paralleling methods that a private business with a head office and nine branches would employ to promote more efficiency. Preservation of a nation's integrity must come from a strong centralization feeling," Colonel Drew continued. Canada's main problem was its decentralized government system, and the speaker declared, "solution of that problem would insure continuance of the national structure."

I think those views are worth remembering because, as far as I know, it is the only expression of opinion by anybody in this House of Commons that all power should be concentrated in Ottawa. Most of us believe in the federal system, with a strong national government and effective local governments; and we realize that in our federal system the problem of finance will be very difficult because of the fact that we still have just the one main source of income, namely the Canadian taxpayer.

In this country the problem of the federal government is especially difficult. If we were an old and static society, most public works would be built; but we have one of the most dynamic and most rapidly expanding economies in all the world. So from every part of this country, at every level of government there are demands for more public services; demands to the federal government from provincial governments and to provincial governments from municipal governments. Not only do governments face demands on them, but business in Canada finds tremendous demand on it for added capital, far greater demands than can be met in Canada. So if they want to continue to expand they look abroad for foreign capital. But we cannot satisfy all these demands, either national, provincial, municipal or in business. What we try to do is work out a reasonable compromise, a moderate way which will give top priority to those things of most importance.

The general advantages of these tax agreements have been stressed many times by many hon. members. They include the avoidance of double taxation, something that is extremely important, and the avoidance of unnecessary waste in having duplicate tax administrations. Another point not so often mentioned is the importance of having equal tax rates across all Canada. Before the war, when each province was in the field, the poorer the province the higher were their tax rates so they could get revenues, and therefore the less likely was industry to go to that province because of the higher tax rates.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

These tax agreements have helped level that out by providing a uniform system of taxation across the country. More than that, it has given the opportunity to have equalization as between the provinces. Not all our provinces are equally endowed with natural resources; not all our provinces have had equal advantages out of confederation and especially out of our tariff structure. These tax agreements are affording a measure of justice there.

There is one great weakness I have always seen in these tax agreements, the weakness of centralization. I am not thinking of the sort of centralization Colonel Drew was talking about between 1936 and 1941. These tax agreements centralize the tax criticism in Canada on the head of the unfortunate federal Minister of Finance. We do the taxing and get the blame and the provinces get the money and spend it and get the credit. As you know, political kudos more often comes from the spending of public funds than it does from the taxing of these funds of out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers.

Again and again in our history it has been said it is a bad principle that one body taxes and another body spends. In some provinces our school boards are set up in such a way that they fix their requirements and the city council has to raise the money. This has always been a source of friction. One of the things which has a great restraining effect on the government levying taxes is that they must justify to the taxpayers the needs which require that money. When one government taxes and the other government spends, there is not that direct connection or restraint.

We have also heard that the power to tax is the power to destroy. I suppose the destruction envisaged is of business. I tell you that overtaxation by government contains in it the elements of destruction, the destruction of that government. I think every government at every level is very careful not to tax any more than it has to do. But today, of course, the provinces naturally clamour for more money as do the municipalities, and as do certainly the members of the opposition. They would like to raise our tax load and have us merely pass that money over to these agencies to spend. Well, we would be not unlike the cat which pulled the hot chestnuts out of the fire for the monkey.

As I say, I feel the new plan is a great improvement over the old. First of all, as I said, it offers 20 per cent more revenue; second, equalization payments raise the revenues up to the level of the average of the two wealthiest provinces, Ontario and British Columbia. This is a recognition of the uneven tax collections which prevailed when the provinces levied their own taxes. It is also a recognition that there is a concentration of industry which prospers out of all Canada but which is concentrated in the two central provinces. It is also a recognition of the fact that the provinces in Canada vary greatly in the resources at their command. The very great advantage is, I think, that there is no compulsion. The provinces do not have to sign these tax agreements in order to get the payments to carry out the equalization process, but can levy their own taxes in these fields.

I think, too, there is something to be said for the simplicity of the present formula. It is easily understood; 50 per cent of the succession duties, 20 per cent of the corporation tax that we collect—that is 9 percentage points out of the 45 percentage points making up the corporation rate—and 10 per cent of the income tax.

The fifth point which is an improvement is that if the provinces do not regard this as sufficient they are quite free to do as Premier Duplessis has done, go out and collect their own taxes. They can still get the equalization payments. Finally there is the stabilization guarantee. This may not be so important now, but it was very important in 1945 as a guarantee that these grants would not fall in the event of a recession or a depression. Our super-optimist here, Right Hon. C. D. Howe, was confident there would be no depression after the war but there were a lot of Cassandras, most of them in the opposition, who foresaw a depression. This guarantee was regarded as very useful then and it is very useful now. Though somewhat in the background it is still an important feature of these agreements.

Let me turn to the criticism now. It is simple enough. We are not paying enough money to the provinces. I can understand the position of the provincial premiers. Theirs is a provincial responsibility, and they want more money to develop their provinces. They do not have the responsibility for federal taxation, so they ask us for more. They certainly have got more in recent years from many sources. Two members, the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) and the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Michener) put on the record figures from a recent statement by the Canadian tax foundation showing that in the 10 years since 1945 federal expenditures have gone up by 5·5 per cent, provincial expenditures by 293 per cent and municipal expenditures by 276 per cent. This is a striking indication to the people of Canada how frugal has been the federal government in that 10 year period, because our expenditures have gone up only 5·5 per cent. It is also a pretty good indication that the provinces and municipalities have done pretty well in raising money to meet their extra expenses.

In addition, of course, the federal government has given large amounts in many purely provincial fields. National health grants since 1948, which have helped out in the field of health, a provincial matter, totalled $188 million, relieving that load on the provinces. The trans-Canada highway, under the old agreement we have given so far $82 million for road building. Social welfare so far has amounted to over $900 million a year. Before the war the federal government spent about $60 million in that field. All this aided the provinces and took part of the load from their shoulders.

Speaking about the 1952 debate, I was reminded of a very fair statement made by that eminent authority, Premier Frost, before the Ontario legislature in 1952, in passing the dominion-provincial tax agreements:

> "It is true the 1945-46 federal proposal was a comprehensive plan, involving besides tax powers, such matters as timing grants for capital works, old age pensions and a scheme of health insurance," he admitted.

Now, listen to this.

> "I am continually surprised at how many people are still unaware of the great extent to which this program has already been implemented."

Mr. Fulton: Obviously somebody over there is surprised, too.

Mr. Sinclair: Surprised that Premier Frost was already impressed in 1952? How he should feel now with the 20 per cent increase I can leave to him to tell you.

As well as the new tax agreements there are other offers of help to the provinces. Our recent offer has been to increase our contribution to the trans-Canada highway from $150 million to $250 million, another $100 million to the provinces for road building. Then there was the unemployment assistance bill put through by my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), under which we agreed to pay half the cost of unemployment assistance for those not covered by unemployment insurance over the base load of ·45 per cent, which would cost about $25 million in a year such as 1954-55. Then there is our offer to extend hospital insurance to the nation, which will cost the federal government about $180 million a year.

This federal government has certainly assisted the provinces since the Liberal party came to power in 1935. As I say, I can understand the provincial premiers asking for more because their responsibility is provincial. I find it difficult, however, to understand the attitude of opposition members in asking for more unless they, with national responsibility, indicate where the more is to come from. Just two hon. members have lightly touched on this.

The federal government has no Midas touch. We cannot create gold and give it to the provinces. There are just four ways that have been indicated for finding the extra millions, the extra hundreds of millions to listen to some of the members, or the extra quarter of a billion to listen to one of the provincial premiers, which have been requested. The first way is to increase federal taxes. There is one thing even the opposition are agreed upon. They will not vote for tax increases. The Canadian taxpayer today does not want an increase in federal taxation. The second method is to cut present federal expenditures and give the provinces the savings. We do not hear very many statements in this house as to how specific savings can be made in federal expenditures.

Hon. members will recall that some years ago, on October 25, 1950, to be exact, the Leader of the Opposition spoke in Saskatoon and as reported by the Canadian Press said he could cut half a billion dollars from the federal expenditures without affecting essential services. Well, I was intensely interested in that speech, because I was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance at that time. When he returned to the house hon. members will recall that I as parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance implored him to help the government by telling us where we could save half a billion dollars a year of the taxpayers' money, to give us specific details. He did not. All he did was babble about a Hoover commission.

He took it to the people in the election of 1953. Hon. members will remember that this claim was the principle plank in the Tory platform. They claimed that if elected they would save the Canadian people half a billion dollars a year. Well, the Canadian people did not believe that; but I would have thought if the Tories were sincere in this claim when they returned to parliament each one would have stood up and suggested substantial savings totalling half a billion dollars to show that they were right. They have not mentioned it in the last three years.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Sinclair: Surely.

Mr. Fulton: Is the minister aware that the new-found colleague he has just welcomed into the Liberal party has supported the statement that substantial moneys could be saved by the appointment of a commission along the lines of the Hoover commission?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Sinclair: My hon. friend knows that the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre has had a long and extensive education since he divorced himself from the academic theories of socialism and embraced the practical verities of the Liberal government. At an earlier time in his innocence he may have swallowed the Tory propaganda, which the Canadian people did not accept—

Mr. Fulton: Answer the question.

Mr. Sinclair: —but he has learned a great deal since then.

Mr. Fulton: You say he is the kind of man who swallows propaganda, do you? That is a fine compliment for your new colleague.

Mr. Sinclair: I just want to go through some of the major items of expenditure. The sum of approximately $1¾ billion is spent on national defence. One of the most vivid impressions I have of my two and a half month visit in Russia is the fact that any Russian respect which exists is due more than any other single thing to the collective strength of the 15 free nations through NATO. Just because things are now easing up I think it would be a tragedy for any of the free nations to relax their defence efforts. We must, of course, meet half way every gesture of friendship which Russia makes, but we must certainly keep our defences up. I do not think any Canadian taxpayer would want us to reduce this expenditure at this time.

The second largest item of expenditure we have is for social security, a sum amounting to over $900 million, which is up from the $60 million spent by the federal government in the pre-war period. Old age pensions come under this heading. We remember, of course, that it was the Tory majority in the Senate which blocked the first old age pension bill brought forward by the Liberal government, but even the Tories have learned since that time that old age pensions have a value, and they would not cut old age pensions.

Concerning family allowances, we remember that John Bracken, then the leader of the Tories, thought this was a brazen political bribe. Premier Drew said he would fight this iniquitous legislation in every court of the land. But today the Tories, like the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, have learned and they support family allowances. I do not think they would want them cut to make more money for the provinces.

Other items are unemployment insurance benefits, pensions to the blind, disabled and health grants; in all these fields the demand from both sides of the house is not for decreases but rather for increases; therefore there is no hope of saving anything here for the provinces.

As far as veterans benefits are concerned, another large item of expenditure, we spend almost one-quarter of a billion dollars a year in that field. Every hon. member without exception will say there should be no reduction of this expenditure for any other group in this country.

Debt charges is another major item. We spend over half a billion dollars a year in interest on our national debt; payments to the people of Canada, either directly to those who own bonds or indirectly because of their collective savings in insurance premiums and bank deposits. There is only one Canadian government in history that ever repudiated interest payments on government bonds. I refer to the Social Credit government of Premier Aberhart, but even they would not do that today, I think, so there is no hope of a reduction in this field.

The next category is that of payments to the provinces and municipalities, an amount of $390 million in the present estimates. Since we are today asked for increases in this specific field, there certainly will be no pressure for a decrease in this field of aid to the provinces.

That leaves about $700 million for all the other expenditures of the federal service, an amount which is about twice the pre-war level.

Everyone who sits in this house knows that we are constantly faced with requests for increases in this field, increases in the Department of Transport, in my own department, the Department of Fisheries, the Post Office Department and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and every other federal department. In fact we have been requested to intrude into fields that are solely under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Therefore there is not much hope of securing extra hundreds of millions of dollars asked for, by cutting down on present federal expenditures. As I mentioned, many hon. members even advocate us intruding into purely provincial fields with aid for education, roads, health and natural resources development.

A third suggestion was made by the Leader of the Opposition, that we take our surpluses and give them to the provinces. That would be a very uncertain way of financing the provinces. The minister of finance makes the most accurate forecast he can of future revenues. Sometimes it is high and sometimes it is low. If it is high we have a surplus and if it is low we have a deficit. I would not like to be a provincial treasurer who tried to forecast his budget of expenditures on the possibility of a federal surplus.

I feel that if we have a federal surplus we should continue to do what our very wise and able minister of finance, Mr. Abbott, did during the eight years he was the minister, reduce our debt with part of it and reduce the burden of taxation on the Canadian people with the other part. During his eight years in office he reduced our national debt over 20 per cent, by $2½ billion, with consequent savings in debt charges, and putting the rest of the money back in the hands of the taxpayers, thus giving them more money. The provinces themselves could tax for this money if they felt their needs were so great, rather than having us tax and pass the money over to the provinces.

A final suggestion was just lightly touched upon in the third speech made by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) during the resolution stage. He reminded us that the Minister of Finance has the power to print money. Well, there may be some old line Social Crediters who think that is the solution, but I am sure that orthodox Tories like Premier Bennett, attorney general Bonner and Mr. Gunderson of British Columbia would be horrified at the thought of turning out a flood of printed money here to help them, because they know it would hopelessly debase the currency they already have.

Mr. Blackmore: Tell the truth for once in in your life.

Mr. Sinclair: I do not want to appear unfair. Perhaps he is not alone in the Social Credit party in requesting the printing of money for the western provinces.

I wish to turn now to British Columbia, since I am the minister from that province.

Mr. Knowles: There are two of you.

Mr. Sinclair: There are two of us now, that is quite right. Our first wartime tax agreement gave British Columbia $12 million. That was in 1942. That was more than we had ever been able to raise ourselves in this field of taxation. This year under the old agreement our province gets $50,715,000, which is four times as much as we got the first year. Next year under the new agreement we will get $55,430,000, which represents a 10 per cent increase over the previous year.

A very curious attitude is held by the premier of British Columbia and his Social Credit colleagues in the house. When facing British Columbia they declare that British Columbia has never been more prosperous.

They report that it has a huge budget of $280 million, and the highest per capita taxation and the highest per capita spending in Canada. The British Columbia budget was only $30 million the year before the wartime tax agreement came into operation. They boast of a surplus of $25 million this year, and proclaim that our province is going to be free of all debt in 1962.

But when they face Ottawa they have a very different story to tell. They tell us that British Columbia is poverty stricken and must have more money. They tell us Ottawa must help not only with tax dollars but that we must move into purely provincial fields such as education, highways, toll bridges, flood relief on a minor scale, and even assist their provincial railway. They tell us Ottawa has to help poor poverty-stricken British Columbia.

Mr. Patterson: You don't mind taking money from it.

Mr. Sinclair: We have a very clever cartoonist on the staff of the Vancouver Sun, a chap called Norris, who portrays with special skill the Victoria Conservative club and the Social Credit party. He has given an emblem to the Social Credit party. He depicts a wild bull with long horns. I think that should be changed. I think the premier would be well advised to take the old Roman god Janus with two faces as his emblem. If the Social Crediters were to adopt that emblem they could perhaps justify the fact that they talk one way facing British Columbia and another way facing Ottawa.

The new hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Patterson) has just interrupted with the cry that we do not say how much money we have taken out of British Columbia. The Social Crediters publicly bemoan the fact that Ottawa takes hundreds of millions of dollars out of British Columbia and gives back only $50 million as a tax payment to the province. Their propaganda was so effective that last year even the editor of the Vancouver Sun fell for it and wrote an editorial along that line.

I am indebted to the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. McCullough) of the C.C.F. group, who put a question on the order paper, No. 237(a), on June 20, 1956, in which he asked how much money the federal government collected in British Columbia and how much money it spent out there. According to this official return to the House of Commons, federal tax collections in British Columbia were $270 million odd while federal expenditures in British Columbia were over $355 million, or $85 million more than the federal government collected in that province.

More than that, this return points out that in this is not included central costs of government and of the national research council and our foreign service. That federal expenditure of $355 million in British Columbia was approximately $75 million above even the record provincial budget of $280 million. This talk by the premier and his followers has not deceived the people of British Columbia, nor has it deceived those who write the editorials for our leading newspapers.

The July 18 issues of both the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province have splendid editorials commending these new agreements. I might note that the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province have not been very friendly to this government in the last six months. The Vancouver Province says that we are standing in the middle of the road with these tax rental agreements, trying to make a good job of our federal responsibilities and helping the provinces to do their job. The Vancouver Sun points out that any federal tax increase to give more money to the provinces will have singularly little appeal to the ordinary Canadian taxpayer, for it is out of his hide that these taxes come. It says that the taxpayers would welcome another dominion-provincial conference, not as to see how to raise more money out of the taxpayers but to see how we can reduce taxes and put more money in their pockets.

I want to say this in conclusion. I hope when other opposition members speak they will be more helpful to my colleague the Minister of Finance by pointing out exactly how this federal government can get the extra hundreds of millions of dollars they are requesting for the provinces, and what tax increases they are ready to support to get these millions. It should be remembered that this frugal federal government has increased expenditures by only 5·5 per cent in the last ten years.

I have been rather hard on the opposition, but I should like to commend the speech made by one hon. member of the opposition, the hon. member for Cape Breton South. It was a wise and statesmanlike speech, in very marked contrast to the speech of his leader, the leader of the C.C.F. party. I have listened to the hon. member for Cape Breton South since I came to this House of Commons. He has a wise and sensible approach to the matters with which he is dealing, and no doubt it will not be too long before he also will be crossing the floor of the house to join the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre.

Mr. J. Wilfrid Dufresne (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, the bill submitted to the hon. members of the house for their consideration violates principles which are absolutely indispensable to the survival of this country. It gives a new interpretation, also temporary, to those principles which nevertheless have been clearly set out in the act of 1867. I am no expert in constitutional law, but I do know that all historians and jurists are unanimous in admitting that the constitutional provisions regarding the financial powers of the federal government and the provinces are extremely clear and precise. In the past when the interpretation of some of the provisions had given rise to any ambiguity they had been referred to the courts either by the federal government or by the governments of the provinces, and even in some cases by private individuals. The courts have handed down their interpretation, which has been duly accepted by jurists and politicians.

On this question of financial relations the federal government has adopted an attitude which to my mind is apt to be highly prejudicial to the future of confederation, whose very basis it is undermining. Since the Rowell-Sirois report there have been a very great number of proposals made by the federal government to the provinces. These proposals have been modified several times because of the criticism to which they have given rise throughout this country. Over this 20-year period all the provinces have in turn expressed their complaints with regard to a policy which leaves their future status highly uncertain. The time at my disposal does not allow me to quote each and every criticism offered on this score by politicians belonging to the main parties of this country, Liberals or Progressive Conservatives, members of the C.C.F. or Social Credit parties.

Each and every proposal submitted since 1937 is contrary to the democratic ideal. They run counter to sound political doctrine, and I am sure that most of the great political figures of the past would be most firm in denouncing them. In a speech which he delivered at Somerset on August 2, 1887, a few days after his appointment as leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfred Laurier stated:

> The principle whereby one government collects revenues and another government spends them is altogether false. It can only lead to extravagance.

This principle, denounced by a former leader of the Liberal party, is at the very basis of every financial arrangement entered into by the federal government and the provinces over the last 20 years.

A little later, at a time when Honore Mercier was preparing to call the interprovincial conference of 1887, Sir Wilfrid Laurier warned him against the danger of requesting an increase in grants from the federal government. He said:

> These successive increases in grants, carried out at random and disproportionately, really constitute a means of corruption in the hands of the federal government. All too often this increase in grants paid by the federal government has been little else but the payment of a bill rendered for political betrayal.

The former prime minister of this country and predecessor of the present Prime Minister, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, speaking in this house in 1930 said:

> When on a previous occasion we were discussing this matter of grants from one treasury to another, I said I thought it was an unsound principle; in fact, I think I used the expression that it was a vicious principle to have one body raise the taxes and another body spend the people's moneys thus raised.

Finally the Quebec Liberal newspaper Le Soleil, on February 13, 1947, published an article whose terms still hold true today:

> The nine sisters of confederation do not all share the same views on this problem. Six or seven would enjoy receiving financial assistance from the central government and would therefore be willing to renounce for a time claim to those powers of taxation claimed by it. Quebec and Ontario still seem firmly opposed to this plan. Their opposition is based on motives which are sufficiently convincing not to be taken lightly. Any concession is difficult to withdraw later, as has been amply demonstrated by recent experience.
> It would be well to remember that the present attitude of the Hon. Maurice Duplessis and Colonel George Drew resembles that formerly adopted by some of their Liberal predecessors. Matters settled by compromise often present both advantages and disadvantages. In the case we are dealing with today, the main cause of the problem is to be found in the federal government's haste to create new provinces whose natural resources are too restricted. They soon found themselves in difficulties either by reason of administrative incompetence or as a result of insufficient revenue. Their situation was further aggravated by the practice of extensive immigration also attributable to the central authorities. There is nothing to justify the statement that such errors will not be repeated. Those conditions make it readily understandable that the defenders of provincial rights should be cautious before being drawn into a project leading to the centralization of powers in the hands of federalists . . .

Such evidence, to which hundreds of other statements could be added, is sufficient to prove that the very principle of these proposals is absolutely false and contrary to the democratic idea. The government collecting the revenue must spend it to fulfil the obligations imposed upon it by the constitution. It is nonsense that a government should collect revenue for the purpose of distributing it to other governments. That is a practice contrary to a principle for which our forebears fought, namely no taxation without representation.

Secondly, to my mind such a policy tends by nature to disrupt the harmony which must exist among all provinces in the Canadian federation. In 1942 a number of provinces felt that they were wronged by the federal proposal. In 1947 other provinces expressed the opinion that they were not treated with justice. This year the same protests are to be heard. This year we even witnessed a meeting of the four Atlantic provinces who wish to join hands for their mutual help and the protection of their interests.

We are witnessing the slow but undeniable formation of a bloc of provinces within confederation. Instead we should have ten provinces closely united and working together for the progress of Canada, with the full co-operation of the federal government. Unfortunately the policy of fiscal agreements will not achieve that unity, because there will always be one or other of the provinces that will feel wronged with regard to its rights, and that is precisely what makes the position of a province like my own extremely difficult in the face of such a problem.

The Quebec government is certainly to be commended for having kept the discussion well above private interests and political expediency. Above all, the position of the Quebec government is a juridical one based upon the soundest constitutional theories. The province of Quebec earnestly wishes to preserve the rights and privileges it was granted by the act of 1867. The province of Quebec is opposed to bargaining, and does not believe that this is a matter to be assessed in dollars and cents. Besides, Canadians of French expression believe this problem affects the rights and privileges they were granted by the act of 1867 and, if we consider the history of financial relations between the federal government and the provinces since 1941, we cannot evade the conclusion that they always endeavoured to safeguard the essential rights of confederation.

Mr. Speaker, you know what the attitude of the Quebec government was in 1937 in the face of the problems set out by the Rowell-Sirois commission, and you know that at the federal-provincial conference of January 14, 1941, the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta were squarely opposed to the implementation of the recommendations of the Sirois report, claiming that that was a peacetime document tending to ruin provincial autonomy. The province of Quebec remained neutral in that discussion and, in April of the same year, the federal government gave up the consideration of the Rowell-Sirois report to ask the provinces, as a provisional arrangement and only for the duration of the war, to vacate the personal and corporation income tax fields. In return the federal government offered to indemnify the provincial governments. As a matter of fact, in the period from September 1, 1941, to 1946, the province of Quebec received slightly more than $102 million, or $20 million a year, to allow the federal government to collect the sum of $2,258 million.

In August, 1945, the federal-provincial reconstruction conference was held in Ottawa. In the course of that conference the federal government made to the provinces proposals similar to those contained in the Rowell-Sirois report, but those proposals were a little more generous. In January, 1947, the government at Ottawa submitted a new proposal for grants which was to serve as a basis for the agreements of 1947. Two provinces, Quebec and Ontario, rejected those proposals. Those two provinces reorganized in part their own systems of taxation and levied a new tax of 7 per cent on corporation income. From April 1, 1947, to March 31, 1952, the province of Quebec would have received, had she signed the agreement, a sum of $378,175,000 and during the same period Ontario would have received $444,688,000.

In December, 1950, the provinces met again in Ottawa to discuss the renewal for 1952 of the fiscal agreements of 1947. On the whole the provincial premiers declared themselves in favour of a renewal of the agreements. The premier of Quebec, Hon. Maurice Duplessis, stated however that, generally speaking, he disapproved the substitution of a system of federal grants for the fiscal powers essential to democratic governments. The premier of Nova Scotia, the late Hon. Angus L. Macdonald, whose government had signed the agreements of 1947, spoke to the same effect:

> I do not believe this problem can be met by means of grants. I repeat what I have so often said, namely that the ideal solution would be to divide the responsibilities of the governments and give each of them the necessary sources of revenue to discharge their responsibilities. That is the ideal. I do not know whether we can achieve that end now or later, but it is the end towards which we should strive. Under the circumstances, grants evidently do not appear to me to be the solution.

During the months that followed negotiations continued between the federal government and the provinces, and finally, in 1952, nine provinces decided to sign with the federal government a fiscal agreement for a period of five years. Quebec was the only province that refused to accept the federal grants.

Yet, owing to its fantastic development, the province of Quebec needed additional revenues. In February, 1954, the legislature decided to levy a tax on personal income. That tax amounted to approximately 15 per cent of the federal tax. Such a step was extremely democratic, because the people of Quebec could accept or reject the government's decision. In fact during the month of June last the electors of the province of Quebec gave a new mandate to the Union Nationale administration and increased its membership in the legislature. I greatly rejoice at the turn of events, which proved to the whole nation that in my province the democratic ideal is still stronger than in any other part of the country. The province of Quebec has not feared to practice the principle of no taxation without representation for which our forefathers fought. It has not feared to base its decisions and actions on that principle.

Today the federal government submits a new series of proposals which would remain in force until 1962. Those proposals are intended to replace the fiscal agreements which will expire next year. In my opinion they are a little less drastic than the previous proposals, and they seem to take into account a little more than in the past the fact that it is a matter of renting provincial rights. They are also more generous because they do not compel the provinces to sign agreements, even of a temporary nature, with the federal government. The signing of a temporary agreement on provincial rights is surely the equivalent of a renunciation, and no government conscious of its responsibilities is happy to abandon its rights and prerogatives.

However, those proposals stem from the same centralizing trend noted in the recommendations contained in the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission. True, the amounts proposed are much more generous than those recommended by the commission which inquired into the fiscal relations between the federal government and the provinces. If we took only that fact into consideration we could say that the provinces acted wisely in compelling the federal government to give them increasingly larger sums over the years. However, the main weakness of that policy is the fact that nobody knows whether those agreements are of a temporary or permanent character. A period of five years is a very short span in the life of a government; in my opinion we must necessarily deal with longer periods.

Those responsible for the federal administration have maintained for almost 20 years that these agreements were temporary, that is, limited to a certain number of years. This may mean that if an emergency arose the federal government could end such agreements, keeping to itself the full tax revenues. That is the interpretation put on those proposals by some public men. Others, on the contrary, feel that these agreements are in fact of a permanent nature even if they are modified every five years. They certainly are permanent in peacetime and such, I believe is the true interpretation of all the discussions which have been held on that matter for the last 20 years.

There is no doubt, however, that this system of grants creates uncertainty in provincial quarters, since the provinces do not know whether or not in fact such agreements are permanent or temporary. No one can settle that matter; only the future will tell. Provincial governments carry very heavy responsibilities, especially in this period of economic development and prosperity. Their commitments in the fields of education, welfare, public works and natural resources development are burdensome. They have very heavy responsibilities, as all of them must undertake important projects of a permanent nature for the implementation of which their revenues are inadequate and which must necessarily be paid for through borrowing. I wonder what would happen if a provincial government were to try to borrow from lending institutions a huge sum of money on the guarantee that it would repay such loans out of federal grants. I am almost sure that the financiers would ask how the government intended repaying the loan should an emergency situation arise in Canada. It is the uncertainty of such a policy which, I believe, causes uneasiness among provincial governments.

I am convinced that the most logical and most simple attitude would be to go back to the very words of the act of 1867 and take them as the basis of our policy. It is at least the opinion of the government of the province of Quebec. I take the liberty of recalling that opinion by quoting an excerpt from the brief submitted by the Quebec government to the Rowell-Sirois commission. In fact the stand taken by the province of Quebec is neither complicated nor equivocal. I quote:

> In its opinion, confederation is a pact voluntarily accepted and which can be modified only through unanimous consent. The province intends to respect every clause of this pact and expects others to do likewise.
> It is at the same time a form of government freely chosen in preference to legislative union, as it can better ensure the protection of the minorities and national development in peace and harmony. That choice was made after careful consideration by statesmen of the two great races and of the two political parties, by statesmen whose unquestionable vision and perspicacity were not obscured by the confusion of a troubled period. The province of Quebec believes that that system is still the best to meet the needs of a large country made up of different races.
> In the last analysis, the province of Quebec is willing to co-operate in any endeavour of common interest provided it does not conflict with provincial rights; to help in the implementation of any appropriate and reasonable reform within the framework of the constitution and, generally to work hand in hand with the federal government and other provincial authorities towards the welfare of the nation as a whole, provided the rights of all concerned are respected.

It is a clear and definite stand. The province of Quebec does not wish to take unfair advantage of the difficulties of other provinces. It has always placed that problem above political contingencies and party interest, on the level of principles, through respect for confederation and responsible government.

The other day, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) was deriding provincial autonomy and from the bottom of my heart I pitied him. I pitied him because in the discussion of this matter he could not rise to the true human values. He could not understand that his province had sacrificed grants of millions of dollars out of respect for the rights won by our ancestors. He could not understand that his province could remain faithful to the past, to the memory of those who fought so that we might enjoy freedom. He could not understand that the real political problems are not money problems but questions of principle. He could not understand that in defending these principles his province remained the bulwark of Canadian confederation.

The people of my province, even though they have launched a campaign to attract industries, are a generous people, a people capable of fighting anew for responsible government and in the defence of minority rights. Our forebearers turned down the money and honours of their victors in 1760, but fought 30 years later to preserve the colony for the English crown. The hon. member for Hull should remember history and also keep in mind the sorry record of Adélard Godbout and Georges-Emile Lapalme. They too had forgotten history but they found that the people of Quebec remember the past and want to be faithful to their traditions. The hon. member for Hull should help his party come back to the letter and the spirit of confederation. His constituents would be most grateful to him if he did.

Mr. Raymond Bruneau (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, for some time now this house has been engaged in a debate concerning federal-provincial relations. I now propose to deal with this subject from the historic, constitutional and economic points of view.

At the time of confederation Sir John A. Macdonald, father of the Conservative party and its greatest man, was in power. A cursory glance at the report of parliamentary proceedings between February 3 and March 14, 1865, suffices to enlighten us on what this great leader had in mind at the time. He was careful to state that he would much have preferred a legislative union wherein all powers would have been concentrated in a single central government and that if he gave up that idea it was only because he realized that confederation would have been impossible under such conditions.

While he had to give up his ideal, Sir John nonetheless stated that confederation should take the form of a centralized federal system so that, unlike what had taken place in the United States, or unlike what was to take place later in Australia, residual powers would be left to the federal government, provincial powers, as set out in a moderate list, being essentially those of a local or private nature and adapted to the position of the provinces as Sir John saw it. The federal government would have the power to designate provincial lieutenant governors or to revoke such appointments. Moreover, the federal government was empowered to disallow or set aside legislation passed by provincial legislatures within the year following their adoption.

Even to this day it is not without some surprise that we note the very few difficulties and little discussion to which this distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments gave rise. Sir John A. Macdonald's explanation was that the delegates had understood the necessity of setting up a strong and powerful central government.

Obviously our political situation has changed a great deal, and for the better, since 1867. To whom do we owe this? First of all to the supreme court and the privy council who, in their interpretation of the constitution, have set things rights by clearly stating the rights of the provinces, by virtue especially of that clause relating to property and civil rights.

It may be of interest at this point to remind the house that in 1867 Hon. Mr. Mercier tried to have the constitution amended to the provinces' advantage, but without reference to the federal government. In that year Mercier, who was then provincial premier, called the first interprovincial conference which met in Quebec from October 20 to 28, under the chairmanship of Oliver Mowat, then premier of Ontario. This conference was attended by the premiers and other representatives of five provinces, that is Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Manitoba. Federal representatives had also been invited to attend, but Sir John A. Macdonald declined the invitation on behalf of the government.

The 18th resolution adopted by this conference reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this conference, the various provinces of Canada, through their respective legislatures should, as soon as possible, take such steps as may be required to obtain from the imperial parliament amendments to the British North America Act consonant with the above resolutions.

As was reported by Professor Norman Rogers to the select committee on the British North America Act, a member of which at that time was the present provincial minister of finance for Quebec:

The conference also decided that those resolutions should be transmitted officially to the federal government in order to request its help in bringing about the amendments which were the subject matter of those resolutions. Sir John's federal government refused to support the proposed amendments. However, the resolutions were transmitted through the ordinary channels to the secretary of state for the colonies, who Mr. Rogers said, officially acknowledged receipt of the resolutions but took no steps concerning them.

It would take too long even to summarize all the resolutions but I should like to quote a few brief excerpts.

Thus, it is stated in the preamble that:

. . . the maintenance of provincial autonomy is necessary to the future well-being of Canada; that, if that autonomy is to be maintained, it is obvious that the constitutional act must be revised and amended.

The following significant words are also to be found:

. . . that several provinces are not in a position to provide, by means of direct taxes or otherwise, for the increase in necessary expenditures and have from time to time requested from parliament and the federal government an increase in the amount of the annual subsidies.

Oddly enough, nowhere was it deemed advisable to request a new distribution of taxation powers in these long and numerous resolutions from the provinces, in which several amendments to the constitution were sought. Not only that, but it seems that the provinces never considered as a threat to their autonomy an increase in their subsidies. They even went further; and mind you, they were the ones who had provincial autonomy at heart. They passed the following resolution:

That, in the opinion of this conference, it is possible to find a basis for the final and unalterable settlement of the amounts payable annually by the dominion to the various provinces for their local purposes and the maintenance of their governments and legislatures.

And the "final and unalterable" amount proposed, should the population exceed at some time one million and a half, was $240,000. Compare the amount proposed with that offered today by the federal government, keeping also in mind the fact that the proposals made today by the federal government are not for a "final and unalterable" amount. They do not involve final agreements, but rather five-year agreements which are moreover subject to review.

Today's problem of federal provincial relations dates back to the financial difficulties experienced by several provinces during the depression years of 1930 to 1935. At that time the western provinces, unable to meet their obligations because of the drought and the fall in the prices of agricultural products, were on the brink of bankruptcy; and all across Canada unemployment placed an intolerable burden upon local governments. The federal government had to give temporary financial assistance to Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It had also to take over the task of solving the unemployment situation as best it could. The Rowell-Sirois commission was appointed in 1937 to study this urgent problem and, without going into details, it may be said that the present agreements are the results of the commission's recommendations.

The commission had, in effect, recommended (a) exclusive federal jurisdiction in the field of personal income tax, of corporation income and of succession duties; (b) full federal responsibility for unemployment; (c) acceptance by the dominion of charges entailed by provincial debts; and (d) payment of subsidies by the federal government so as to put all provinces in the position of providing average provincial services without having to increase the incidence of taxation.

The federal government has since then accomplished more than was recommended in the report, and has done all in its power to come to an agreement unanimously acceptable to the federal government and to the provinces. Far from assuming a rigid and arbitrary approach, as was claimed by some for political purposes, it has on several occasions compromised with the provinces and accepted their suggestions.

I leave now the historic aspect of the question to deal as briefly as possible with its constitutional aspect and, finally, with its economic aspect. Let us see what the constitution has to say in the matter. I shall just read out—without changing anything, of course—part of the text of sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act of 1867: First we have section 91, which says in part:

. . . the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:

3. The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

Then section 92, saying that:

> In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—
> 2. Direct taxation within the province in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes.

What do these paragraphs mean? They mean exactly what they say. First of all, the federal government has the exclusive right to tax, by any method or system it chooses, either direct or indirect, and that only for their own provincial purposes may the provinces resort to direct taxation.

Indeed, were the federal government to exceed its powers, either in levying income tax or succession duties, what would happen can easily be imagined. Thirty-five years ago, that is in 1917, the Conservative party introduced the federal income tax. Is it possible that during this long period, from 1917 to 1952, no provincial government, no individual taxpayer would have raised the so-called unconstitutionality of this act in order to have it declared ultra vires and unconstitutional? Everybody knows that such an argument is absolutely groundless. I need not stress the point any further. There is obviously nothing in this to prejudice provincial autonomy, no more now than in 1917, when the law was first introduced by the Conservative minister of the day, Sir Thomas White.

Whatever may be said today, nobody could convince us that the tax rental agreements between the federal government and the provinces are contrary to the spirit of the constitution, or an encroachment upon provincial autonomy. Is this not the very same sort of agreement that Ottawa concluded with all signatory provinces? Are these agreements not clear and definite? They are in black and white, and anybody who can read should be able to realize it. Are they not strictly and absolutely fair? In other words, is not the federal government guaranteeing each province an amount which not only is equal to the amount of taxes the provinces are losing, but is even more substantial?

The federal government is in no way encroaching upon this provincial field, because under the very terms of those agreements royalties and rights concerning their natural resources are levied and collected by the provinces themselves who also collect income tax on mining or forestry operations. Anyone doubting it has only to read, inter alia, section 3 of the agreement between Canada and British Columbia signed on July 10, 1952. All agreements signed to date have in effect been signed for a period of five years. The fact is that several provinces have been so satisfied with these agreements that they hastened to renew them when they expired.

It has been argued that the effect of these agreements is to place the provinces under the control of the dominion. I believe this argument is quite wrong. Let us not forget that at the time of confederation and during the following years, the federal subsidies represented over 50 per cent of the revenues of the provinces. Let us not forget either that the provinces have constantly asked for increased subsidies, so that in 1907 the federal parliament had to apply to the imperial parliament to have the British North America Act amended in order to increase the subsidies paid under the constitution.

As Dr. Skelton stated before the committee on the British North America Act:

> . . . the dominion recognized that, in its opinion, it was appropriate to prevent any further claims on the part of the provinces, and by dealing directly with the provinces and by using the official amendment procedure, it was aiming at giving the arrangement a more or less permanent nature.

And Dr. Skelton added:

> Its efforts are fruitless.

It is well known, of course, that numerous and reiterated requests have been made during the past 45 years, requests which have not all been without results, for the subsidies to the provinces have been increased many times since then. The provinces spend about $1 billion annually and collect, in taxes or otherwise, practically the same amount since the deficit is some $85 million. As far as the federal government is concerned, its expenses will amount this year to approximately $4½ billion, and taxes provide just about that amount. Those expenses seem enormous, and they are, since they are $1 billion more than in the previous year and $2 billion more than in 1950. But let us not forget that close to half that amount is spent for national defence.

In other words, because of the international uneasiness resulting from Moscow's attitude and because of the necessity of putting a stop to the advance of communism, 45 cents out of every federal tax dollar goes to ensure the country's security. It is all very well to talk against communism, to fight it in our very midst, but we must go further and prevent it from spreading to the rest of the world. Some sacrifices are necessary and inevitable if we are to safeguard the greatest of our treasures, which is freedom, and especially freedom under our Christian system.

Let us add to that another $1 billion for social security, old age pensions, pensions to veterans, family allowances, etc., that whole program which the federal government undertook to implement and which it has actually implemented under agreements with all of the provinces. Let us add about $440 million interest on a national debt incurred almost entirely during the two great wars. Finally let us add $300 million paid annually to provincial governments in grants or under tax rental agreements. That leaves only $700 million for all other services combined.

Now let us consider whence these revenues are derived to meet these extraordinary expenditures; what sources of taxation produce these revenues. A government, to remain in power, must levy fair, equitable and well balanced taxes. Income tax is the main pillar of the whole structure; it brings the federal government more than $2½ billion, divided just about evenly between personal and corporation income taxes. The amount levied through income tax therefore corresponds to our defence expenditures and part of our social security expenditures. Another $1 billion of national revenue is derived from what I would call domestic taxation on commodities, that is the 10 per cent sales tax paid by manufacturers to which, in several cases, is added a special 15 per cent excise tax, and the very high taxes on alcoholic beverages, beer, wine and cigarettes. Over and above all these we have customs duties which yield from $300 to $400 million, and succession duties which, although they yield no more than $30 to $40 million, are most useful in certain cases as a means of controlling income tax.
