ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADA-JAPAN INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

FIFTH ANNUAL MEETING HELD IN VANCOUVER—
REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TABLED

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the report of the Canadian delegation to the fifth annual meeting of the Canada-Japan Inter-Parliamentary Group, which held its meetings in Vancouver from October 15 to 18, 1994.

If I might be permitted a few comments, honourable senators, the agenda at Canada-Japan meetings is always extensive and wide-ranging, and the Vancouver meeting was no exception. The delegates dealt with bilateral topics, such as trade and political situations in Japan and Canada. On the multilateral front, reform of the United Nations, peace-keeping operations and the environment dominated the discussions.

Honourable senators, the range and depth of the discussions which took place in Vancouver went a long way in allowing Japanese and Canadian parliamentarians to better understand issues that concern all of them. The opportunity to put forward the Canadian viewpoint was critical, and the Canadian viewpoint was effectively expressed.

QUESTION PERIOD

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to questions asked by Senator MacDonald on November 15 and 24 concerning Pearson International Airport. The response includes approximately 10 pages of additional documentation from the Department of Transport. I ask that this documentation be included as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—NOMINEES TO CANADIAN AIRPORT AUTHORITY—POSSIBLE NEGOTIATION OF LEASE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Finlay MacDonald on November 15 and 24, 1994)

Unlike previous transfer initiatives, the National Airports Policy (NAP) is part of a broader Air Strategy. In addition to defining the federal role in operation of the country's civil airports, the Air Strategy also involves the modernization of the country's air navigation system as a means of improving the way the system is managed and delivered. The Air Strategy is itself one of several initiatives within the Department of Transport concerned with a better way of doing things to bring a vibrant, healthy transportation system into the next century.

The cornerstones of these initiatives are efficiency, a balance between capacity and demand/capability, and a recognition of the federal government's fiduciary responsibility in the areas of safety and security.

Previous transfer initiatives were undertaken independent of other initiatives within the Department. In some cases, the lack of a coordinated approach led to activities that were at cross purposes.

The major difference between a Canadian Airport Authority (CAA) and a Local Airport Authority (LAA) is that CAAs shall be incorporated in a manner fully consistent with the Public Accountability Principles for Canadian Airport Authorities, which were unveiled on July 13, 1994 by Transport Minister, the Honourable Douglas Young, as a component of the NAP, to ensure a higher degree of accountability to the public. CAA boards of directors will now include federal and provincial and municipal nominees as well as representatives of organized labour and consumer interests. CAA Board members must abide by a Code of Conduct and more stringent conflict of interest guidelines.

There will be public access to all relevant CAA documents including all signed airport transfer agreements as related to the transfer of the airport.

Under the National Airports Policy, CAAs are not-for-profit corporations headed by boards of directors nominated by different levels of government, and by other participating organizations such as boards of trade/chambers of commerce, and consumer and labour organizations. The federal government may also nominate up to three directors. Directors cannot be elected politicians or government employees.

As background information, please find attached a copy of the Public Accountability Principles for Canadian Airport Authorities. The chart attached thereto outlines some of the many other differences between Local Airport Authorities and Canadian Airport Authorities.

The second question is why is Bill C-22, (An Act respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operation of Terminal 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport) necessary in order to proceed with a Canadian Airport Authority.

At this time, there exists a lease agreement between the federal government and T1T2 Development Corporation. Succinctly, there cannot be a second lease concluded for the same property to two different entities. The Minister of Transport has on several occasions outlined the larger questions behind the desire to cancel the agreement with T1T2 Development.

That a lease exists is sufficient to interfere with the options for proper public policy determination of the future of Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

The previous government wanted to give the best assets from the premier airport facility into the control of the private sector. This government wants to ensure that a consistent, logical National Airport Policy is applied at all airports, certainly including Pearson.

The Minister of Transport has recognized the Greater Toronto Airports Authority, including the federal nominees to the Board. He has indicated on several occasions that his department will work with this body in an advisory capacity only, since its true role continues to be hindered by the lack of resolution of Bill C-22.

CRIMINAL CODE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for the second reading of Bill S-6, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (dangerous intoxication).—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, sixteen days between November 25 and December 10 have been set aside as part of an international campaign called "Sixteen Days of Activism Against Gender Violence." The 16-day period begins on the International Day Against Violence Against Women and ends on the United Nations Human Rights Day.

These internationally observed days also have a Canadian element, because this period includes the anniversary date of the Montreal massacre, when 16 female engineering students were killed by a man determined to kill feminists.

In light of this campaign week, it is fitting that I rise to speak on Bill S-6 and the ruling of dangerous intoxication.

I should like to thank Senator Gigantès for introducing this bill and for moving the debate on this controversial issue into the legislative arena where it belongs. Canadians have been shocked by the Supreme Court's ruling on the Daviault case in Quebec last September, and the precedents which have piled up since then in Alberta, Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island. The cases have all been of men assaulting women while under the influence of alcohol or drugs.

The specifics of the bill's wording will be discussed further when the bill reaches committee. For now, I wish to focus my support on the principle of this legislation, and on the implications that this whole debate has had, and will have, on the women of Canada.

The Honourable Mary Collins, the minister responsible for the status of women in the last government, called for zero tolerance on violence against women. It was the recommendation of a national panel on violence against women that travelled across the country gathering evidence, and also of a report released last year by the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General in the other place.

What does zero tolerance mean? To quote the former minister, it means to stand up and say, "I simply won't tolerate violence." It means that we adopt an attitude which says violence is never acceptable behaviour. It means that we back up that attitude with action.

I should like to hear the Minister of Justice commit himself to zero tolerance of violence against women. What I have been hearing instead is that this issue is only a small part of a much larger review of the Criminal Code. That kind of approach raises two important problems which I believe the government must address. The first is that because this is a "women's issue" it does not warrant as high a profile on the government's priority list as the more esoteric questions arising from this historic overhaul of the Criminal Code. Responsibility for so-called women's issues, traditionally, have been shuffled off to a junior minister. That started to change under the last government, and I wish to suggest that the trend continue.

Well over 90 per cent of rapes and incidents of domestic violence happen to women and children. That makes it very much a women's issue. An issue of importance to 52 per cent of the Canadian population is not an issue to be sloughed off to a junior minister. I hope that the Minister of Justice will recognize that, and speak out on behalf of his female constituency.

I would argue for a little common sense to be added to this review process. The government needs to be looking not only at the theoretical implications of the law but also at its practical effects.

A second aspect is the fact that this is an issue which impacts disproportionately on women. It raises the question of the Criminal Code as a whole, and whether or not any attempt is being made to apply gender analysis as a component of the review under way.

A few years ago, Madam Justice Beverly McLachlin gave a speech to the Elizabeth Fry Society on the subject of how the criminal law has discriminated against women. She outlined how, historically, society has made women into victims by its attitudes toward certain crimes, while at the same time doing nothing to change the social practices which impose the commission of such crimes on women.

One example of this double standard is the section on infanticide which still exists in our Criminal Code. The social and economic situations of women have almost always been the reasons for such feminine crimes as infanticide and prostitution. The law cannot always address the victimization of women by conditions not addressed by the law, but that is no excuse for making women's reality irrelevant in considering legal reforms.

When Canadian women cannot feel safe going out to a bar at night with a friend, and when women must carry their car keys laced between their fingers, or a can of mace in their purses when they walk alone, the system is not working and we must ask ourselves for whom we are making these laws.

The recent Supreme Court decision makes the crime itself seem irrelevant. It denies victims any recourse to justice. The intoxication defence sends a message that rape will be tolerated. It devalues women who have been the victims of the crime, and perpetuates the situation whereby the legal system has systematically devalued women throughout history.

It seems to me that we will be taking a step backward if the Supreme Court ruling is allowed to stand. This is particularly true on university campuses. After all the work which has been done to raise the student and public consciousness of date rape, this ruling comes as a real setback for women.

In the past, victims of sexual assault have often felt that they were on trial, rather than the accused, because of the wide-ranging freedom allowed by the law to question the victim's sexual history. This made women feel as victimized by the justice system as they had been by the accused.

According to Statistics Canada, 39 per cent of Canadian women have experienced at least one incident of sexual assault since the age of 16. Last year, there were 13,462 sexual assaults but only 6 per cent of them were reported to the police. This ruling is likely to keep even more women from reporting rape or family violence. A system which keeps women silent and fearful is an unjust system.

While in the past prostitution laws have put the burden of the problem on women's shoulders by focusing on the person offering the services, the law pertaining to rape has also put the onus on women, even though in rape cases women are the so-called "recipients" of the sexual act rather than the ones performing the act. From the point of view of the law, it would seem that if the offence has to do with sexuality, it must be the woman's fault. Only very recently has prostitution started to change from being a feminine crime to one which involves both men and women.

Throughout much of history, the practical effect of the law on these so-called feminine crimes has been to place on women the burden of all the punishments and social stigma attached to these crimes. It has been an easy but inequitable solution to what are admittedly complex social and moral problems. In that way, our Criminal Code has failed to recognize the equality of women.

We have seen the law on abortion evolve from being a female crime to the point where doctors performing abortions take some of the responsibility, and then to the Supreme Court's ruling in 1988 which decided that the abortion law violated women's equality rights and the right to security of the person.

In the same way, prostitution laws have been changed to make those buying sexual services as accountable as those selling the services.

The intoxication defence denies not only any form of equal rights to women victims, but any rights at all. Women's groups are calling for action now, particularly because alcohol is so often a factor in spousal abuse. It is distressing that when men lose control, it is usually women who pay the price in terms of physical beatings and emotional abuse. After years of public education, we as a society have learned that no one has the right to get drunk and then drive a motor vehicle. It is difficult now to see us in a situation where someone has the right to get drunk and then rape a woman.

The intoxication defence essentially says, "The devil made me do it." It erases any form of personal responsibility as if drunkenness were something akin to an epileptic seizure. Without trying to deny in any way the seriousness of the disease of alcoholism, the defence, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, would not be applicable in the case of a person with a history of drinking-related problems. However, voluntary consumption of vast amounts of intoxicants should not, in all fairness, render a guilty person innocent.

Lawyers are arguing that any new law must balance the rights of an intoxicated accused with the rights of a victim. The minister has said that, overall, there should be accountability, but we are now seeing a backlog of cases and appeals dealing with this defence and the prospect of no new law in place for several months.

It has been said in the media that the reason for delay in introducing government legislation is that the bureaucrats from the Department of Justice will need time to deal with their counterparts in each of the provinces. In the meantime, the defence is being used liberally by lawyers across the country.

The minister is quoted in The Globe and Mail of November 2, 1994, as saying that it would be several months before any law would come out of the discussion paper which he has released. "That's the machinery of government," he said. "We're doing the best we can." Canadian people and Canadian women are looking for more than a mechanical excuse. They are looking for real understanding, compassion and leadership from this government.

In a dissenting opinion in the Daviault case, Mr. Justice John Sopinka wrote that one of the main purposes of the criminal law is the protection of the public.

> Society is entitled to punish those who of their own free will render themselves so intoxicated as to pose a threat to other members of the community.

How can anyone explain to a child who has been raped that somehow it was okay because the man was drunk? As a legislator, I would not be able to do that.

On motion of Senator Bernston, for Senator Lavoie-Roux, debate adjourned.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

RULING BY SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS— POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order in connection with the report of the Special Joint Committee on Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy. The point of order is in respect of a ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons which has a bearing on the Senate, and in particular, whether a ruling from His Honour in the House of Commons automatically carries with it the concurrence of the Senate in a matter which is within the joint custody of the House of Commons and the Senate.

I assure you that my comments do not affect in any way the respect and esteem I hold for the Speaker of the House of Commons. However, my point of order is in connection with a very important matter respecting the relationship between the two houses.

Honourable senators, those of you who have looked at the report of the Special Joint Committee on Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy will recall that it was presented in three volumes. The first volume is the report itself entitled, "Canada's Foreign Policy: Principles and Priorities for the Future." The second volume is entitled, "Dissenting Opinions and Appendices." The third volume is entitled, "Position Papers." I wish to refer particularly to volume two, "Dissenting Opinions and Appendices." That volume contains the dissenting opinion of the Bloc Québécois and the dissenting opinion of the Reform Party.

Honourable senators, if you look at the dissenting opinion presented by the Bloc Québécois, you will notice that it is a stand-alone report with a table of contents, an introduction, and six chapter headings with a conclusion.

Chapter 1 is entitled, "Canada in an Evolving Global Context"; Chapter 2, "Canada and Jurisdiction in the Area of Foreign Affairs"; Chapter 3, "Culture, Education and La Francophonie: The Federal Government's Claims," and so on. You will further notice that the total dissenting opinion occupies 26 pages and is, in a sense, a stand-alone report. The Reform Party presented dissenting opinions which occupied three pages.

The co-chairs of the joint committee decided that, in light of the character of the dissenting opinions, and particularly the one from the Bloc, those opinions ought to occupy a separate volume. Thus the main report would be circulated as the report of the committee, and the dissenting opinions would form part of a volume which would include the appendices. If the alternative had been done, presumably we would have a volume of rather large thickness, which is hardly user-friendly.

In any event, honourable senators, the co-chairs deliberated upon this matter, sought the opinion of those who advise on such matters, and concluded that the decision was totally in accord with the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. Whether there is a Standing Order in the Senate covering this subject is another matter.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I hope not.

Senator MacEachen: In any event, the volumes were released. The Reform Party did not complain. The official opposition in this place did not complain. However, the Bloc Québécois vigorously complained in the House of Commons and stated that their dissenting opinion, or any dissenting opinion, ought to constitute part of the main report.

There was then a debate in the House of Commons in which the co-chair from the House of Commons — at that time, Senator Gauthier — participated. His Honour made a ruling that the spirit of the standing order had been observed, but that the letter of the standing order had not been followed. His Honour said, at page 8253 of the House of Commons Debates of November 24, 1994:

> However, I am of the opinion that the report does not meet the letter of the standing order. Therefore, should a reprint be required, I am instructing my officials to ensure that the dissenting opinions of the Official Opposition and Reform Party be printed after the signatures of the co-chairs in the same volume.

Honourable senators, a number of questions arise from this ruling. The one that is of particular importance to the Senate is whether or not the Senate has any authority whatsoever over this matter. If so, why is it that a report which is a joint product is not subject to the authority of the Senate as well as to the House of Commons? I would argue that because the report is the result of a joint study, any decision on this point should be a concurrent decision, and agreed upon between the House of Commons and the Senate.

I have other questions, honourable senators, but I believe that, as co-chair from the Senate, I am entitled to express a view on this matter and to have an opportunity to argue with my colleagues in the Senate why this decision was an appropriate one, and why it may be inappropriate to reverse it at this stage, disassemble the report and produce it in a new format.

I think a reprinting will be required. I was informed yesterday that it is impossible to obtain additional copies from the distribution office and that, therefore, the matter of a reprint may be considered very soon.

I think it would be in order to have both houses decide on this matter, and to have an opportunity for both co-chairs to argue that the decision taken at the time was an appropriate one, and that it ought not to be reversed at this stage.

• (1400)

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, in my first speech in this house, I would not want to give the impression of being someone who challenges the authority of the Speaker, especially not the Speaker of the House of Commons where I spent 22 years.

I think we must deal with this problem once and for all, and I am referring to whether the Standing Orders of the House of Commons apply to special joint committees of the House of Commons and the Senate.

If you look at the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, you will see that Standing Order 108, which was used in this case to support the decision of the Speaker of the House of Commons, does not apply to special committees of the House of Commons and the Senate, at least according to me.

If the Standing Orders of the House of Commons do not apply, then we will have to spend some time thinking about this particular decision. I think we will need the cooperation of both Houses to establish certain rules that will apply to these reports.

I will not repeat Senator MacEachen's arguments, which I endorse, but perhaps I may add a few points in an attempt to persuade this honourable house to act on this matter. It will cost thirty or forty thousand dollars more to reprint the report in the form proposed by the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Bloc Québécois. Since financial considerations are an important factor nowadays, I think it would be advisable to think about that aspect. It will cost quite a lot of money to prepare the plates and send everything to the printers.

There is another point I would like to make. I read the ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons, and I think he was somewhat ill-advised to use the Standing Orders of the House in the case of a joint committee of the House and the Senate. I think discussions are in order so that we can deal with this issue once and for all.

Meanwhile, I think there is a vacuum with respect to these joint reports with the House of Commons.

There are other points I could make, but I do not want to take up too much of your time. I simply want to say that there are a number of things that must be settled. Senator MacEachen mentioned that the report consisted of four volumes. These were distributed together in a single envelope or a folder. Ten thousand pages of testimony were given by Canadians at our hearings and, as the senator pointed out earlier, it was quite impossible to put everything into one volume. We decided to have three additional volumes.

In the Standing Orders of the House of Commons it clearly says that certain opinions should be joined in an appendix. We did this to save money and to avoid making the report too bulky and difficult to handle.

I think honourable senators would be well advised to take a close look at the rules, or establish a set of rules for approval by the House of Commons and the Senate, in order to deal with a matter that, right now, is a very grey area, and which the House of Commons is using to support its position.

I think a rather important principle is at stake here. As I see it, the Speaker of the House of Commons cannot make this kind of decision without consulting with the other house, this one, and obtaining its approval.

[English]

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator MacEachen or Senator Gauthier would agree to a question. It is obviously an interesting and very important question which has been raised. We have a joint committee presenting a report composed by members from both houses of Parliament. A decision has been made by the Speaker of the House of Commons, but not by the Speaker of the Senate.

Presumably the ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons determines the form of distribution of a reprinting, or the form of distribution in that House. I do not see how the Speaker of the House of Commons can influence the form of distribution in the Senate.

Would Senator MacEachen's point be appropriately met, irrespective of how the report is distributed in the House of Commons — one volume or three volumes — if in the Senate the distribution of the reprint were in a three-volume format or the format which exists now? Perhaps honourable senators opposite or former co-chairmen of the special committee would know. Would the point of order be met if the Senate reprinted in the present format? Is part of the honourable senator's point of order that the same format apply in both places?

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, before I answer Senator Ottenheimer's question, I should clarify what the Speaker in the House of Commons said, which was to the effect that what had been done does not meet the letter of the standing order, but does meet the spirit of the standing order.

My direct answer to Senator Ottenheimer is that insofar as the Senate is permitted to determine its own affairs, I would argue that it ought to authorize the reprinting in the present form. If that were done, I could not argue what ought to be done in the House of Commons. It would meet the point of order I raised, namely, that the Senate ought to have a say in this matter, and that the present method of distribution ought to be maintained.

However, having said that, it would be a bit odd to distribute the report of the special joint committee in one form by the House of Commons and another form by the Senate. It would be an unusual result.

However, that would be better than having the wishes of, in this case, the co-chairs, both of whom are now in the Senate, overruled, with the attendent result that the reprint would be rather bulky and the reader would be denied the opportunity of reading these volumes individually, which is the basis upon which they were written. That is my answer.

It would be preferable to reach a solution that respects the role of the Senate and the role of senators in presenting the report and avoid the outcome which has the House of Commons determining for the Senate on a matter which ought to be a joint decision. That is my conclusion.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Where do we go from here, honourable senators? Senator MacEachen has raised a point of order. There should be a ruling on it. I am interested in his arguments and those supported by Senator Gauthier. Have the House of Commons rules prevailed in the determination of how joint committees operate, rather than Senate rules? Is that correct or not?

Senator MacEachen: If that is a question to me, I am not sure that I am capable of giving an answer because I have not met the problem in the past. I have been looking at one or two references. For example, the Twenty-first Edition of Erskine May on Parliamentary Practices, page 665, reads as follows:

> For a joint committee to act on an authority which had been delegated to it by one House only would be ultra vires.

In this case, the joint committee is defunct and all the members have ceased to be members of the joint committee. The joint committee has disappeared. Certainly it would appear that Erskine May would support the contention that both houses ought to decide on a matter of this kind.

We know that the costs of the joint committees, including the printing of reports, are shared between the two houses. However, there is a more fundamental principle than any which I could invoke, and that is that the Senate is a chamber of Parliament. It is equal. Some people call it the Upper House. However, it certainly has an equal role in legislative functioning. No bill can be passed without the concurrence of the Senate. Why should it be possible to have the way in which the work of joint committees is produced determined by the House of Commons and not through a joint exercise?

I, personally, believe that the presentation of the report in three volumes makes a lot of sense to the reader, and it gives the reader an opportunity to deal with these reports in an orderly way.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Corbin will recall that some years ago there was a dispute as to which rules apply to a joint committee. That dispute took place in the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages, of which he and I were the co-chairmen.

The question was with regard to a rule of the House of Commons which stipulated that a quorum necessarily consisted of members of both government and opposition, if I recall correctly. The members on the committee from the House of Commons insisted that that rule should apply to the joint committee. We on the Senate side denied its applicability. The solution which was eventually arrived at was that the joint committee had to pass its own ground rules governing such matters as quorums in the joint committee.

I agree with everything Senator MacEachen has said concerning the problem posed by Speaker Parent's ruling, in view of the fact that we are speaking of a special joint committee. The fact of the matter is, and I think it is worth noting, that the Senate pays, I believe, one-third of the budget of a committee such as that. That fact should be taken into consideration.

I should like to bootleg one opinion into this discussion: Whatever the practice may be in the House of Commons with regard to publishing dissenting reports — and we have no rule here permitting that — I hope that that practice does not creep into our Senate customs any more than it has already done.

On any committee of which I have been a member, and certainly any committee of which I have been chairman, we have tried to accommodate the views of the minority of the committee by stating in the body of the report, with respect to this or that recommendation, that it was supported by a majority, or not supported by Liberal senators or Conservative senators, as the case may have been.

Generally speaking, we have not encouraged or permitted the publication of dissenting "stand-alone" reports. I think it is sufficient to make the accommodation in the body of the report, with the majority opinion carrying. If there are those in the Senate who do not agree with the committee report, they have an opportunity to say so at length when the report is debated.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, if I may make one further comment, stimulated by the remarks of Senator Murray in which he asked the very valid question as to which rules apply, there is a standing order in the House of Commons which provides for dissenting opinions — not minority reports, but dissenting opinions. As I recollect, the standing order provides that the dissenting opinions must be relevant, and brief. Each of us would decide for himself whether the dissenting opinion in this case is brief in relation to the size of the overall report, and whether its contents meet the test of relevancy.

It seems to me that if it is now open to revisit the decisions taken by the co-chairs in authorizing the method of printing, then it is equally valid for someone in either house to raise the question of whether the other standing order has been followed; namely, that order concerning relevancy and brevity, and whether, if there is to be a reprinting, an adjudication ought to be sought from a higher authority as to whether this particular dissenting opinion is in conformity with the standing order calling for brevity and relevancy. It would require a great deal of evidence, which is not presently available to anyone, to conclude that this dissenting opinion is brief. It would require, perhaps, not as much evidence, but some argument to prove that every aspect of it is relevant. In the circumstances, the co-chairs decided to accept this dissenting opinion with their thoughts unexpressed.

If the work of the joint committee is open to review and to the decision that the volumes ought to be reunited, then it is equally open to us to argue that these dissenting opinions ought to be tested against the rules presently in existence.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has asked which rules ought to apply, and that is a good question. I suggest that, perhaps, both sets of rules ought to apply.

Let us take a bill as an example of a joint instrument. The rules of the House of Commons apply to that bill when the bill is in the House of Commons. The Rules of the Senate apply when the bill is in the Senate. The bill does not go forward for Royal Assent until it has satisfied the rules of this house, as well as those of the other House.

In this case, we have a report which was produced by a special joint committee of both houses. It appears that an authority in the other House has undertaken to change that document.

The committee decided on the substance and the form of the report. It now appears that the Speaker of the House of Commons has decided to change the form of the report, thus creating a new document. It seems to me that to present that new document as the report of a special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons is misleading.

Would a bill go forward for Royal Assent having satisfied the rules of only one house? Should this report be put before the public in the form determined by the Speaker of the House of Commons? I think not.

This is a most serious question. I am pleased that Senator MacEachen raised it and that Senator Murray spoke so effectively on it, as did the Honourable Senators Lynch-Staunton and Gauthier. I do not want to suggest that this is the top of a slippery slope. However, I ask honourable senators to consider some of the implications. One implication is that a report produced by a special joint committee can be changed in its form in the other place and yet be presented to the public as the report of a special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada, when, of course, it is not.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I am not at all familiar with the circumstances of the ruling of the authority in the other place. I hesitate to voice any kind of personal opinion with respect to this controversial matter.

However, it seems to me that inasmuch as the Senate in its own right can accept or refuse to join with the other House in a joint standing or special committee, then surely it has control as well over the contents of its report.

Again, I hesitate to voice an opinion, and perhaps it would be better if I did not. However, in the circumstance, I have a feeling that the matter should have been referred to the committee. There are provisions to that effect. In fact, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms comments at length on the procedure and circumstances under which that could be done.

I know that Senator MacEachen may have arguments in reserve with respect to this matter. Having observed him over the years, I know that he does not deploy all his missiles at once. He is a great strategist. Nevertheless, personally, I do not like the idea that someone can meddle with the affairs of a committee.

Of course, once the report is tabled, the committee is defunct and the matter falls within the purview of the House. I think Senator MacEachen is right in this instance in saying that the matter is also before this house. Yet, we are faced with a fait accompli by reason of a decision taken in the other place.

Even though the House of Commons co-chairman is now one of us, nevertheless he can be replaced on the other side. They can choose another co-chairman. The House of Commons or the government could take the initiative to refer the whole matter to the committee, and the committee could take the matter in its hands and report to the house. If, indeed, there is a change in the nature of the report, the matter should be referred to the committee.

Senator Gauthier: Honourable senators, unaccustomed as I am to the Rules of the Senate, I want to make two points.

First, this is a report of Parliament. Parliament is composed of both houses. I object strongly to the result, which may be an oversight on the part of the publishers, or the ones who did the "mise en page," as we say in French.

However, if you read the French version, you will see that it states:

[Translation]

> Le Sénat et le Président de la Chambre des communes accordent par la présente l'autorisation de reproduire la totalité ou une partie de ce document.

In English — and listen to this — all that is said is, and I quote:

[English]

> The Speaker of the House hereby grants permission to reproduce this document...

There is no mention of the Senate. I take it that the document was read in English by those who thought Standing Order No. 108 applied, that being the standing order under which the Speaker of the House ruled.

In his decision, the Speaker said that the decision of the joint chairs to produce the document in that format does not meet the letter of the standing order. I take exception to that. I wish I could have argued this in the other place, but I shall do it here in a brief way.

[Translation]

Let me read you that part of Standing Order No. 108(1)(a) which relates to the report, and which is to the effect that committees are empowered, and I quote:

> ...to report from time to time and to print a brief appendix to any report...containing such opinions or recommendations, dissenting from the report or supplementary to it...

Honourable senators, this is what we did. We included the Bloc's dissenting opinions in an appendix. I do not see any problem with that.

What irritates me more than all this is the fact that the decision was made unilaterally and at least to my knowledge, without consulting this house. I think we must pursue the matter and settle this issue as quickly as possible.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, we have learned from this situation that, should we decide to join the House of Commons on another committee, we must ensure that the rules of neither house prevail over those of the other.

The committee has been disbanded, its function having been accomplished, its report having been tabled. The three volumes are the official report of the committee. If the House of Commons feels, by its own rules, that the report should be reprinted in a different fashion, let them do so. However, this place should not be committed by their orders. At the same time, let them reprint it at their own expense.

Senator MacEachen: Will we have the money to produce ours?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We have paid for ours.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a point of order has been raised by the Honourable Senator MacEachen. It is both extremely interesting and very important. It is indeed a unique event that both co-chairmen have ended up in this chamber; an event which will likely not repeat itself.

Insofar as the specific point raised by Senator MacEachen, I wish to assure the house that there has been no consultation with me by the House of Commons in this regard. To the best of my knowledge, neither was there any consultation with my predecessor. However, the point having been raised, and insofar as the specific point of the present ruling is concerned, I will undertake to find out whatever I can in that regard.

Regarding the broader question raised in the debate, "What controls joint committees?" I assume that would come under the jurisdiction of the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders and not under my direct jurisdiction. With respect to the specific point, however, I will collect all the information I can and report back to the Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF NATURAL RESOURCES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Colin Kenny, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented the following report:

Wednesday, November 30, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-48, An Act to establish the Department of Natural Resources and to amend related acts, has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Tuesday, November 29, 1994, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

COLIN KENNY
Deputy Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Colin Kenny: With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

NATIVE SELF-GOVERNMENT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

By the Honourable Senator Twinn:

21st June, 1994—That he will call the attention of the Senate to the issues surrounding native self-government and the work he has been doing in this area over the past several months.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this inquiry in the name of Senator Twinn has the number 14 beside it, which means that, in the ordinary course of events, it will reach number 15 tomorrow and be dropped from the Order Paper.

As we all know, Senator Twinn has been away convalescing, and is doing very well. He plans to be back here next Wednesday and wishes to speak to this inquiry at that time. I would ask, with leave, that this inquiry be permitted to stand on the Order Paper, in spite of the fact that the 15 days have expired, and I make that request on behalf of Senator Twinn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

LAW OF PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Anne C. Cools rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 24, 1994:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, including its definitions, its exercise and extent, its historical and constitutional development, and its current status in Canada.

She said: Honourable Senators, it is my intention today, in speaking to this inquiry, to present to senators a brief historical survey and definition of the law of parliamentary privilege. In the words of Sir Erskine May, in his famous work Parliamentary Practice:

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions, and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals.

The law of parliamentary privilege is that body of law comprising the ancient and undoubted rights of Parliament; laws developed to serve the rights of the population. They are representative laws which ensure that Parliament is able to perform its representative duties and functions, thus providing its citizens with good representation in governance. The law of parliamentary privilege developed in concert with representative government and its consequent responsible government. While the law is indeed ancient and its history complex, it is a living part of the daily work of Parliament.

The law of privilege belongs to the Senate corporately, that is, to Parliament collectively, and is enjoyed by senators individually. As part of the lex et consuetudo parliamenti, the laws of privilege are a part of the general and public law of the land.

In 1967, the Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom reported in part as follows:

> Insofar as the House claims and Members enjoy those rights and immunities which are grouped under the general description of "privileges," they are claimed and enjoyed...on behalf of the citizens whom they represent.

Viscount Kilmuir, the Lord Chancellor of the House of Lords of the United Kingdom, stated:

> At no time has privilege been accorded as an end itself; it has never been, and is not now, designed to benefit M.P.s personally.

The history of privilege is long and tortuous in the constitutional history of the United Kingdom and in Canada, and has been a matter that hurried many to an early death. Modern privilege is immediately and directly traced to the House of Commons Protestation of 1621 which held that:

> ...The Commons now assembled in Parliament...do make this protestation following: that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of Parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England...
> ...and that every member of the said House hath like freedom from all impeachment, imprisonment, and molestation (other than by censure of the House itself) for or concerning any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the Parliament, or Parliament business...

This protestation began the fierce constitutional struggles of the seventeenth century. These constitutional struggles, between the Stuarts and the United Kingdom House of Commons for the privileges and the powers of the House of Commons, were bloody. These issues were mostly settled in the Bill of Rights of 1689, which declared statutorily the law of privilege. Article 9 of the Bill of Rights reads:

> That the Freedom of Speech, and Debates or Proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any Court or Place out of Parliament.

Accommodation between the Rex and the Lex had been attained.

In pre-Confederation Canada, however, the constitutional conflicts continued. The colonial assemblies fought for the same privileges as the House of Commons of the United Kingdom. It was, honourable senators, a contentious struggle. One legal opinion, by barristers W. Garrow and S. Shepherd to the Hon. Earl Bathurst, the Colonial Secretary, in 1815, determined in part as follows:

> In answer to the second question, "Whether the Assembly is entitled to all the Privileges to which the House of Commons of the imperial Parliament are entitled under their own peculiar Law, the Lex Parliamentaria..." We beg to report, that we think they are not so entitled.

The struggle continued. The benchmark case was in 1842 in Newfoundland. Kielley v. Carson defined the limits of pre-Confederation legislatures in respect of privilege. The issue was whether the power to commit for contempt is incidental to every local legislature. The Supreme Court of Newfoundland found in favour of the Newfoundland assembly. However, in the appeal to the Judiciary Committee of the Privy Council, Chief Baron Parke disagreed and found that:

> The House of Assembly of Newfoundland is a Local Legislature with every power reasonably necessary for the proper exercise of their functions and duties; but they have not, what they erroneously supposed themselves to possess, the same exclusive privileges which the ancient law of England has annexed to the House of Parliament.

An interesting note about this case is that the Newfoundland assembly, by Speaker's Warrant, sent its Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest the judge and the sheriff who had offended the privileges of the legislative assembly.

At Confederation in 1867, the Fathers of Confederation and Lord Carnarvon, the then Colonial Secretary, settled conclusively the issue of privilege in British North American legislative assemblies. They settled it by express and deliberate statutory grant in Section 18 of the new Constitution, the British North America Act, 1867. By grant, the Dominion Parliament was conferred with the full powers and privileges of the lex et consuetudo parlimenti of the United Kingdom.

In 1875, the Imperial Government passed the Parliament of Canada Act amending Section 18 to read as it currently does. This amending act of 1875 was enacted precisely to clarify the powers and privileges of the Dominion Parliament. The amending act was entitled:

> An Act to remove certain doubts with respect to the powers of the Parliament of Canada, under Section 18 of the British North America Act, 1867.

It further stated:

> And whereas doubts have arisen with regard to the power of defining by an Act of the Parliament of Canada, in pursuance of the said section, the said privileges, powers or immunities; and it is expedient to remove such doubts...

Consequently, Section 18 of the British North America Act, 1867, as amended in 1875, now reads:

> The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the Members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, but so that any Act of the Parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities, and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities, or powers exceeding those at the passing of such Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the Members thereof.

Section 18 of the British North America Act conferred on the Senate of Canada the same privileges, immunities, and powers as held by the House of Commons in the United Kingdom.

It was not until 1896 that the privileges, powers and immunities of the provincial legislatures were finally settled in the case of Fielding v. Thomas. Today, we find these privileges confirmed in Sections 4 and 5 of the Parliament of Canada Act, R.S.C. 1985, which is the descendant of the Senate and House of Commons Act. Section 4 of that act reads:

> The Senate and the House of Commons, respectively, and the members thereof hold, enjoy and exercise
> (a) such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as, at the time of the passing of the Constitution Act, 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom and by the members thereof, in so far as is consistent with that Act; and
> (b) such privileges, immunities and powers as are defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada, not exceeding those, at the time of the passing of the Act, held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom and by the members thereof.

Section 5 of the Parliament of Canada Act commands all judicial officers, lawyers, judges of Canada to take judicial notice of these privileges, stating:

> The privileges, immunities and powers held, enjoyed and exercised in accordance with section 4 are part of the general and public law of Canada and it is not necessary to plead them but they shall, in all courts in Canada, and by and before all judges, be taken notice of judicially.

I should first like to enumerate some of these privileges. First, and oldest, among these privileges is the claim of Parliament to the attendance and service of its members. Other related privileges include:

> —the freedom of speech in debates and proceedings in Parliament, as granted in the Bill of Rights. This privilege extends to witnesses before parliamentary committees.
> —the control over publication of proceedings of Parliament.
> —the freedom from civil arrest and molestation by civil process.
> —the exemption from jury service, and exemption from attendance as a witness.
> —the duty of members to maintain freedom of speech.
> —the privilege and power to institute inquiries and to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents. This privilege is known as the "inquisitorial powers" of Parliament.
> —the privilege to exclude strangers from debates, from proceedings, and from voting in the Houses of Parliament.
> —the privilege and power of Parliament of discipline over its members, including the power of expulsion.
> —and the privilege and power to administer oaths to witnesses.

Another of Parliament's fundamental privileges is the regulation of its own internal affairs, precincts and administration, free from outside interference, including from any court.

The Senate, as we know, controls its own security, its own administration, its own precincts, its own staffing, and its own financial management. Parliament enjoys the privilege of controlling the admission of persons to the precincts, even including the management of tourists. Parliament's inherent authority prohibits many activities in the precincts, including the bearing of firearms and the service of legal process in the precincts.

On Parliament's privilege of control of its own business, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms of the House of Commons of Canada, 6th Edition, states clearly in paragraph 33:

> The most fundamental privilege of the House as a whole is to establish rules of procedure for itself and to enforce them.

Parliament also possesses the power and privilege of penal jurisdiction of the houses of Parliament, and the power to punish for contempt of Parliament, including commitment, reprimand and admonition.

Honourable senators, the law of parliamentary privilege does not attach to criminal or treasonous behaviour of members. Parliament is not a sanctuary for criminals, as in the case of Lord Cochrane in 1815.

It is useful to note that each and every one of the provincial assemblies, even the territorial assemblies, has codified their parliamentary privileges and has passed statutes to that effect. To be noted is that British Columbia's statute is entitled the "Legislative Assembly Privilege Act, 1979."

On the law of privileges, in particular the privilege of attendance, the authorities have this to say. Joseph Maingot, in his book Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, stated:

> The concern was to secure the attendance of members and it remains to this day the principal reason for the privilege of freedom from arrest, from attending as a witness in a court or elsewhere than Parliament, and from serving on a jury. This is because the most important body in the country, the Parliament of Canada, has first call on the services of its members and...Parliament will not tolerate impediments to members who are on their way to attend the sittings.

Joseph Maingot further said:

> Since Parliament has the paramount right to the attendance and service of its members, any call for the member to attend elsewhere while the House is in session is not in law a call that need be answered.

Our Writ of Summons from the Governor General appointing us to the Senate reads as follows:

> AND WE do command you, that all difficulties and excuses whatsoever laying aside, you be and appear for the purposes aforesaid, in the Senate of Canada at all times whensoever and wheresoever Our Parliament may be in Canada convoked and holden, and this you are in no wise to omit.

Sir John George Bourinot, a Canadian, stated in his work Parliamentary Procedure and Practice:

> That it is amongst the most ancient and undounted privileges of parliament that no member shall be withdrawn from attendance on his duty in parliament to attend any other court.

John Hatsell, who was for 50 years the Clerk of the House of Commons in the U.K., in his book Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons, stated:

> As it is an essential part of the constitution of every court of judicature, and absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers, that persons resorting to such courts, whether as judges or as parties, should be entitled to certain Privileges to secure them from molestation during their attendance; it is more peculiarly essential to the Court of Parliament, the first and highest court in this kingdom, that the Members, who compose it, should not be prevented by trifling interruptions from their attendance on this important duty, but should, for a certain time, be excused from obeying any other call...

Albert B. White, in his book The Making of the English Constitution, wrote:

> In connection with most early assemblies that were in any way identified with the king, is to be found some idea of a royally sanctioned safe-conduct; the king's peace was to abide in his assembly and was to extend to the members in coming to it and returning from it. Naturally, these royal sanctions applied to Parliament. But as time went on, molestation of members was more likely to be through some process of law than through direct bodily injury or restraint.

Sir Erskine May, on Parliament's privilege of the regulation of its own internal affairs, as expressed in the prohibition of service of court process within the precincts of Parliament, stated:

> The service of a subpoena to attend as a witness has been treated as a breach of privilege by the House...and the parties responsible for service have on occasions been committed to the Serjeant for contempt.

Furthermore, Joseph Maingot, on the matter of the precincts of Parliament, the management thereof, and freedom from interference therein, wrote:

> It is the function of the precincts that is "sacred" and not its location.

That Parliament controls its own administration, its own internal procedures, and its own precincts is a well-established privilege.

Honourable senators, I have given a summation of some of Parliament's privileges. There are others. There is a particular quotation which I would like to share with you concerning the matter of the procedure of raising a question of privilege in this chamber. With regard to raising a question of privilege, our own rule 43(1)(a) states:

> It must, inter alia,
> (a) be raised at the earliest opportunity;

The matters of privilege and the rules thereon have been extensively studied in the United Kingdom jurisdiction. The 1967 report of the United Kingdom Select Committee on Parliamentary Privilege recommended that the wording "earliest opportunity" of the rule be changed. The report stated:

> A Member who intends to make a complaint of contempt will as promptly as is reasonably practicable (but not necessarily, as now, at the earliest possible moment) give to the Clerk to the Committee of Privileges notice of his intention...

That recommendation was repeated in this committee's report in 1977.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret that I must interrupt Senator Cools but her time has expired. May she have leave to complete her comments?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Cools: On the issue of Parliament's right to defend privileges, and to act as a court in the adjudication of its breach and offence, Halsbury's Laws of England state:

> The House of Lords and the House of Commons claim for their members, both individually and collectively, certain rights and privileges which are necessary to each House to maintain its independence of action and the dignity of its position. Each House is the guardian of its own privileges and claims to be the sole judge of any matter that may arise which in any way impinges upon them, and, if it deems it advisable, to punish any person whom it considers to be guilty of a breach of privilege or a contempt of the House.

The law of parliamentary privilege is more critical today than ever. We are living in times of enormous uncertainty and instability. The unprecedented pressures on the nation-state, on governments and on institutions are profound. Even here in Canada, unity is uncertain as we face the second referendum on sovereignty in fifteen years. The existence of our political parties and their ability to form a national consensus is under great pressure, stressed at all levels and under unrelenting attack.

Simultaneously, there are several large interests encroaching on Parliament's jurisdiction, buttressed by other social interests, which are reliant on members of Parliament's timidity and inaction. However, the one interest which is least represented and least advanced is the public interest and their right to representation in Parliament. That is our interest, and that is the interest we must advance. That is our function. That is the function of Parliament. That function of Parliament is made possible by the law of privilege.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I would like to relate an instance in history in 1951 which was seared into my memory, into my psyche, when I was barely eight years old. The context is decolonization throughout the West Indies, Africa and the Empire. That era was extremely significant for my own family, some members of which were founding members of the Barbados Labour Party. They were similarly engaged in that the first general election by universal suffrage that same year returned two of my mother's brothers to the assembly.

The instance is as follows. On February 8, 1951, there was an election in the British colony of the Gold Coast, today called Ghana. During the previous year and during the election, Kwame Nkrumah, leader of the Convention People's Party, was detained in prison serving a prison sentence. From prison, he stood as a candidate in the electoral constituency of Accra Central. Honourable senators, he won that election. His victory was stunning and conclusive. Of the total 23,122 votes, he won all but 350. It was almost a unanimous victory.

Parliament's right to the attendance of its members and "Constitution" governed. The colonial office and the colonial secretary's response was profound. The governor of the Gold Coast, Sir Charles Arden-Clarke, sent for Nkrumah from prison to take his seat in the assembly. The governor asked Nkrumah, in accordance with the Constitution, as leader of the party with the plurality of seats, to form a government. Nkrumah did. Within a few days, he was Leader of Government Business, and within a few months, he was Prime Minister.

This event signalled the victory of "Constitution" in the colonial struggles for representative government and responsible government. It also, honourable senators, represents the victory of parliamentary privilege and the quintessential expression of privilege.

Honourable senators, the law of privileges in Canada is as intact today as it was 125 years ago. I will close by saying that absolutely no act has passed this Senate chamber to rescind or repeal any or part of the law of privileges granted 125 years ago.

On motion of Senator Carstairs, debate adjourned.

STATE OF CANADIAN FINANCIAL SYSTEM

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORISED TO EXTEND DATE OF PRESENTATION OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. Terry Stratton, for Senator Kirby, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 29, 1994, moved:

> That notwithstanding the order of reference adopted by the Senate on Thursday, February 24, 1994, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to present its final report on the present state of the financial system in Canada in the wake of the major legislative and regulatory reform which took place two years ago, no later than December 21, 1995.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

COMPARISON BETWEEN THE NEW CANADIAN AIRPORT AUTHORITIES AND PREVIOUS LOCAL AIRPORT AUTHORITIES (LAA's)

| 1. Part of a comprehensive approach to air transportation (National Air Strategy) | Separate approach to Airports and Aviation programs, resulting in uncoordinated initiatives |
| 2. Pro-active approach with the communities | Reactive to community |
| 3. National consistency with equitable treatment of all airports across the country. | Ad hoc, inconsistent treatment of individual airports |
| 4. Federal government retains ownership of National Airport System (NAS) airports. A continuing federal presence at those airports that are deemed to be nationally significant | Previous LAA transfer principles allowed for possible sale of NAS airports to LAAs, and privatization of major activities on a piecemeal basis (i.e. Pearson terminals) |
| 5. Pro-active in initiating operating efficiencies generating savings for the government and airport operator. | Transfer based on continuation of operational and financial status quo |
| 6. Phasing out of subsidies within a maximum of five years | Continuation of subsidies for an indefinite period of time |

PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY PRINCIPLES FOR CANADIAN AIRPORT AUTHORITIES

Corporate Planning/Airport Transfers (AKZ)
Airports Group
Transport Canada

July, 1994

PUBLIC ACCOUNTABILITY PRINCIPLES FOR CANADIAN AIRPORT AUTHORITIES

The Canadian Airport Authority (CAA) shall be incorporated in a manner consistent with the following principles:

1. Not-for-profit Corporation

The CAA shall be incorporated as a "not-for-profit" corporation under the Canada Corporations Act Part II or under appropriate provincial legislation.

2. Purposes (Objects) of the CAA

The CAA shall be incorporated for the general benefit of the public in its region and its purposes shall be to:

(a) manage, operate and develop the airport(s) for which it is responsible in a safe, secure, efficient, cost effective and financially viable manner with reasonable airport user charges and equitable access to all air carriers;

(b) undertake and promote the development of the airport lands for which it is responsible for uses compatible with air transportation activities;

(c) expand transportation facilities and generate economic activity in ways which are compatible with air transportation activities.

In the execution of its purposes the CAA shall confer regularly with governments and community entities on matters affecting the operation and development of the airport(s) for which it is responsible and shall engage in only those activities that are consistent with its purposes.

3. Definition of "Airport(s)"

The term "airport(s)" in the articles of incorporation shall mean the premises which Transport Canada will lease to the CAA and other airports for which the CAA may later assume responsibility.

4. Composition of the Board of Directors and Qualifications of Directors

The CAA shall be comprised of a board of directors of Canadian citizens nominated and appointed through a process acceptable to the local/regional municipal governments and the federal government;

Note: In this document the expression "Nominators" is similar in meaning to the expression "Appointers" used within the Alberta Regional Airports Authorities Act (Bill 14).

The CAA board of directors shall be representative of the community and, as far as practicable, shall consist of individuals who collectively have experience and have shown capacity in such disciplines as air transportation, industry, aviation, business, commerce, finance, administration, law, government, engineering, the organization of workers, or the representation of the interests of consumers, and who have the business acumen and experience to assist in the management of the affairs of the CAA as an ongoing, viable, commercial enterprise.

The board of directors shall include at least one representative of the business community, one representative of organized labour and one representative of consumer interests, each of whom shall be identified as such.

Directors of the CAA shall not be elected officials nor government employees.

The Chair of the board of directors shall not have been an elected official or government employee at any time during the two years prior to his* election as Chair of the board of the CAA.

5. Acceptance of the Process for Nominating, Appointing and Revoking the Appointments to the Board of Directors

Acceptance of the process of nominating, appointing and revoking the appointments to the board of directors shall be expressed by resolution of the councils of the local and regional governments as applicable and in writing by the Minister of Transport prior to the submission of an application for incorporation of the CAA.

6. Number of Directors

The board of directors shall have no fewer than seven and no more than fifteen members, and may include up to two directors nominated by the federal government and one director nominated by the provincial government. However, the federal government reserves the right to nominate an additional director to any CAA during the period in which it continues to be subsidized by the government. In this circumstance the permitted maximum number of directors shall be sixteen.

7. Appointment/Nomination of Directors

Nominations to the board of directors shall be made formally by a body or bodies corporate. The majority of all directors shall be nominated by local/regional governments of the area immediately served by the airport as well as by the federal and provincial governments as described below. Other directors may be nominated by business or other socio-economic organizations, such as Boards of Trade/Chambers of Commerce, labour councils and consumers' associations. The board of directors shall appoint all the duly designated nominees who meet the selection criteria and the conflict of interest requirements.

The federal government may nominate up to three directors, as set out in Section 6, who shall reside in the province in which the airport is located.

The provincial government shall be invited to nominate one director who shall reside in the province in which the airport is located and, where appropriate, also represent the satellite communities served by the airport.

The board of directors and, prior to incorporation of the CAA, the applicants for incorporation, shall consult with the nominators prior to the appointment of their respective director(s):

(a) to ensure that the candidates for the board of directors meet the qualifications set out in this document; and
(b) to comply with the Declaration provision set out in Section 9 (Conflict of Interest).

The board of directors of the CAA itself may nominate no more than three directors.

Each director shall be appointed by the board of directors to hold office during good behaviour for a term not exceeding four years. No director shall serve for more than two terms or eight years, whichever is longer.

8. Revocation of Directors' Appointments

The board of directors shall, normally at the request of the nominator of a particular director, by resolution approved by no less than two thirds of all directors of the CAA except the director in question, remove that director for cause.

Directors who were nominated by the board of directors of the CAA may have their appointment revoked by a resolution passed by no less than two thirds of all directors of the CAA except the director in question.

9. Conflict of Interest

A. Declaration

Prior to accepting an appointment to the board of directors the nominee shall notify the CAA board of directors and his nominator in writing of any business activity by the nominee or his associate (as defined in the Canada Business Corporations Act) which would pose an actual or perceived conflict of interest in his capacity as a director of the CAA. The nominator may then decide to withdraw the nomination and, in any event, the board of directors itself shall then decide whether the nominee should be disqualified from appointment to the board of the CAA.

Similarly, if a change or anticipated change in circumstances creates for a director a continuing conflict of interest he shall inform the CAA board of directors and his nominator in writing. The board of directors shall then consult the nominator and promptly decide thereafter whether the appointment should be revoked.

B. Code of Conduct

The board of directors shall adopt a Code of Conduct in its by-laws for directors, officers and employees, designed to prevent real and perceived conflicts of interest.

The Code of Conduct shall be provided to the nominators and published in local media at least 30 days prior to the first annual general meeting of the CAA together with invitations for written and oral comments to be submitted by the public. Subsequently, the Code of Conduct and proposed amendments shall be provided to nominators at least 30 days before each annual general meeting.

The Code shall be no less stringent than the rules respecting conflict-of-interest applicable to a director of a company incorporated under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

As a member of the CAA board of directors, each director holds a fiduciary duty to the CAA notwithstanding whatever relationship exists between himself and his Nominator (or the so-called "Appointer").

C. Non Arm's Length Transactions

The CAA shall obtain prior acceptance by the Minister of Transport that the financial terms and conditions of each intended use and occupancy of airport premises which would not be at arm's length from the CAA would produce for the CAA, gross revenue equivalent to that from an arm's length use and occupancy of the premises.

The annual report shall provide information concerning the parties, the financial particulars and circumstances of each such transaction entered into in the preceding year.

10. Public Tenders

To the extent practicable and with due consideration to Canada's international obligations, CAAs, which are private sector "not-for-profit" corporate entities, shall endeavour to optimize Canadian content and industrial benefits in their procurement of goods, services and construction contracts, particularly in the area of high technology services and equipment and construction contracting, in line with good private sector commercial practices where there is sufficient competition for such procurement in the Canadian market.

As a general practice, goods, service and construction contracts in excess of a total value of $75,000 (1994 dollars subject to annual adjustment for inflation) shall be awarded following a competitive public tendering process.

The CAA shall report at its annual general meeting and in its annual report, information concerning the contractor, the amounts and the circumstances of each such contract in excess of $75,000 which was not awarded on the basis of a public tendering process in the preceding year and the reasons for doing so.

11. Audits

The CAA shall cause financial audits to be conducted in accordance with generally accepted auditing practices.

Transport Canada shall at any time have the right to cause a complete audit by an independent auditor of the CAA's entire business affairs, records and procedures.

12. Annual General Meetings and Reporting to the Public

The CAA shall hold annual general meetings open to the public at which audited financial statements and the annual report are presented.

The CAA shall, within 135 days of the end of each of its fiscal years, hold an annual general meeting relating to the management, operation and maintenance of the Airport, at a location on or near the Airport and in premises that are adequate for the size of audience that may reasonably be anticipated.

The CAA shall:

- give at least 30 days' prior notice of each annual general meeting by using appropriate media to ensure public awareness of the meeting;

- afford a reasonable opportunity to the public for the asking of questions and the expressing of views;

- ensure that at least a majority of the members of its board including the Chair (or in the event of his or her inability to attend, the Vice Chair) and the Chief Executive Officer are present at each annual general meeting; and

- present to the annual general meeting copies of its audited annual financial statements approved by the board, together with the auditor's report and the CAA's annual report for the previous year.

In advance of each annual general meeting the CAA shall publish an annual report which shall include the financial statements of the CAA, the annual auditor's report, a summary of its affairs during the previous fiscal year and it shall, as a minimum:

a) report on performance relating to the business plan and objectives established by the CAA for the previous year and, as applicable, the past five year period;
b) explain variances and corrective actions taken by the CAA;
c) present for the up-coming year and for the forecast five-year period a summary of its business plan including specific objectives (measurable where feasible) relating to the purposes of the Authority;
d) report on the remuneration provided to each of the members of the board of directors and either the salary or salary ranges of each of the senior officers of the CAA;
e) report on the CAA's compliance and/or non compliance with the Conflict of Interest principles (paragraph 9).

The annual report shall be provided to each nominator and the Minister of Transport in advance of the annual general meeting as well as to the public on request.

13. Public Notice of Changes in User Charges

The CAA shall give not less than 60 days advance public notice through appropriate local media of planned increases in airport user charges (excluding rent). The notice shall include an explanation of the justification for such increases.

14. Community Consultative Committee

The CAA shall establish a Community Consultative Committee to provide for effective dialogue on matters related to the airport, including:

- the dissemination of information on airport matters and plans;
- the timely discussion of planning and operational matters; and
- the consideration of municipal concerns.

The Committee shall meet not less than twice each year.

It shall be generally representative of the community and shall include persons capable of representing the interests of consumers, particularly the travelling public, and organized labour.

15. Special Meetings with the Nominators (or the so called "Appointers")

At the request of any nominator, the CAA shall cause a meeting to be held with the duly authorized representatives of the nominators at which the Chair and such other directors and officers of the CAA shall be present to respond to questions on matters of public interest concerning the business of the CAA. The request shall state the general nature of the business to be discussed.

16. Reporting to Nominators (Appointers)

A director shall report in general terms to the representative of his nominator, no less than once a year, information on the affairs of the CAA that is not confidential to the CAA. Ideally the board of directors as a whole should report collectively to the representatives of all the nominators.

17. Performance Review

- at least once every five years, the CAA shall cause a review of the CAA's management, operation and financial performance to be conducted by a qualified independent person ("the reviewer").

- the reviewer shall prepare a written report incorporating his findings on the review.

- the performance review shall be conducted on such additional occasions as the board of directors or a majority of the nominators may demand;

- the report of the reviewer shall include but not be limited to:

  a) the terms of reference of the review;
  b) the extent to which the CAA was operating
     i) a safe and efficient service to the public; and
     ii) an efficiently run undertaking in accordance with its business plans and purposes
  c) the extent to which financial and management control and information systems and management practices were maintained in a manner that provided reasonable assurance that
     i) the assets of the CAA were safeguarded and controlled; and
     ii) the financial, human and physical resources of the CAA were managed economically and efficiently and its operations carried out effectively.
  d) any further information that is reasonably required by any nominator or a majority of the board of directors of the Authority; and
  e) any concerns or qualifications that the reviewer has with respect to any matter described in this subsection.

- The report shall be provided to the Minister of Transport within three months of the commencement of the review. The reviewer shall also provide to each nominator both a report and a summary of the report, excluding commercially confidential material or personnel information of a private nature. If issues arise in the course of the review which prevent it being concluded on time an interim report and summary shall be submitted by the reviewer by the due date and a final report shall be submitted not later than six months after the commencement of the review. The summary of any interim report and of the final report shall be provided to the public on request.

Any nominator shall have the right to convene a meeting of the board of directors with the reviewer and the other nominators to determine, with the reviewer, the course of action to be taken to resolve problems disclosed by the reviewer's report.

18. Public Access to Documents

The CAA shall make available to any person, on request, for examination at its head office during its usual business hours and free of charge:

(a) the current Airport Master Plan;
(b) a summary of its current business plan for a five (5) year period;
(c) the most recent and the previous annual financial statements of the CAA and of each of its subsidiaries and of each corporation whose accounts are consolidated in the CAA financial statements, all with the accompanying auditors' reports on them;
(d) its five (5) most recent annual reports each of which shall include a general summary of its affairs during the previous fiscal year;
(e) summaries of its five most recent business plans;
(f) its articles of incorporation and by-laws, including any amendments thereto; and
(g) all signed airport transfer agreements as related to the transfer of the airport.

The CAA shall provide to any person, on payment of a reasonable fee, a copy of any document or portion of any document referred to above.

19. Dissolution or Winding Up of CAA

In the event of dissolution or winding up of the CAA all remaining assets, after payment of the CAA's liabilities, shall be distributed to the Government of Canada or alternatively to a successor organization to the CAA, acceptable to the Government of Canada.

20. Amendments to Articles of Incorporation & By-laws

No changes to the articles of incorporation or by-laws, insofar as they relate to the matters covered in these accountability principles, shall be made without the prior written approval of the Minister of Transport.

These 20 principles will be carried forward in the CAA constating/incorporating documents (e.g. Letters Patent and General Operating By-law), the ground lease or other instruments, as appropriate.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

BOSNIA

UNITED NATIONS—FUTURE ROLE FOR PEACEKEEPERS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have a few brief words to say about the situation in Bosnia.

I am tired of all the criticism being heaped on the United Nations as of late. I wish to emphasize that I am unequivocally proud of our peacekeepers. In spite of the present imbroglio, I remain a very deep believer in the peacekeeping traditions of our country.

We must remember, honourable senators, that we are presently involved in a situation which is infinitely more difficult and dangerous than anything we have previously faced. In a word, Bosnia is an assault on all the conventions we have traditionally associated with our global peacekeeping capacity.

Let us face it, honourable senators, we have a very extensive range of ideas on the table to improve the UN's capacity to deal with peace and security, the best known of which were outlined in the Secretary General's important contribution entitled, "An Agenda for Peace." However, for a variety of reasons we have not had the time or, in some cases, the will to restore and revitalize the institutions of the UN in such a way that it can deal effectively with the sheer enormity of the global crises which presently confront us.

Honourable senators, over the last few years the menu of disaster which the UN has been asked to respond to has been simply too extensive for the organization to bear. I have many thoughts on this. For example, I believe that regional organizations must begin to play their own respective roles in settling local instances of ethnic and national conflict. For the time being, however, we need some breathing space to improve and, so far as it is possible, perfect the machinery of the world body.

Honourable senators, it is important to remember that the Bosnias and Rwandas of this world have been matched by the Cambodias, the El Salvadors, and the Namibias of our time. Disaster, of course, always upstages success. That is a sad reality, but one we must keep in mind while we consider the significance for the United Nations.

Many would argue today that the West should retreat from the Balkans, which is, in a way, reminiscent of the sad retreat at Dunkirk. Those who feel this way do so on the basis that the United Nations has failed in Bosnia; that the dream of UN peacekeeping is now a nightmare; in effect, that the Bosnian tragedy has degenerated in such a way that there is no future role for us to play there.

Let us think about this for a moment, honourable senators, and let us think about it seriously.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt, but the honourable senator's time has expired.

Honourable senators, does the honourable senator have unanimous consent to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I am urging you to think about this matter very seriously. The United Nations has been required to serve in an area where ceasefires have been irregular and cynically violated, and where no front line really exists. I might add that in our present world, the tendency is to take every piece of nasty business to the world body, the United Nations. As I said earlier, the menu of disaster presented to the United Nations is simply too much under the present circumstances.

Honourable senators, if we consider Bosnia, we see that the UN has really become, as one analyst put it, "an insurance policy against disaster." In other words, the UN did what it could to lessen the implications of a brutal conflict on the citizens of that region. It tried to support damaged economies; it was a conduit for food and equipment, which ensured that women and children were sometimes fed and protected, and that some of the disastrous exchanges on battlefields were sometimes less disastrous. I emphasize the word "sometimes," honourable senators, because sometimes is better than never. Honourable senators, one thing is certain: We have saved lives. We must continue to save lives.

If I might put it this way, the United Nations, despite its shortcomings, is today a mirror of sanity in hell. In another way, we can say that the United Nations provides a glimpse of the possible. Without that mirror of sanity, without that glimpse of the possible, the people of Bosnia will lose all hope. What is even worse, honourable senators, perhaps because, for the time being, we in the West must serve as the agents of reconstruction for the United Nations, is that we could lose all hope.

In other words, a psychological crisis of failure will beset western capitals at a time when we need all our collective energies and strengths to fashion better decision-making institutions for the future at both the regional and international levels.

Martin Woollacott of The Guardian put it this way, in what I thought was a brilliant analysis of the situation, in an article that was reprinted in yesterday's Globe and Mail. He was reflecting on the possibility of retreat:

> When the men came home, it would be to a wrecked Atlantic alliance, to a discredited UN and to a Europe undermined by its failure to meet the first post-Cold War challenge to the unity and strength to which it aspires. It would be to a world in which the relations between Europe and America, between the West and Russia, and between the West and the Muslim world could never be the same again.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are you almost finished?

Senator Graham: In some ways, the rupture of relations between the countries of a disillusioned West could, in fact, prove to be more ruinous to our future hopes and aspirations than the Bosnian debacle.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I believe that we must reflect very seriously on the symbolism of a retreat from the Bosnian nightmare, because the mirror of sanity is not only essential to the survival of Bosnians, it is essential — perhaps even more important in these times — to the collective determination of western capitals to get on with the future. Once that mirror cracks, we lose a glimpse of the possible. That, to me, would be the real horror of a Dunkirk-style retreat.

AD HOC PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE ON LIGHTSTATIONS— CONSULTATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Mike Forrestall and myself, I want to give a preliminary assessment on the work of the Ad Hoc Parliamentary Committee on Lightstations which met last week with coastal British Columbians to discuss this government's plans to destaff the lights.

Our committee, comprised of two Conservative senators and three B.C. Reform MPs, heard from 65 presenters in four coastal centres: Richmond, Sidney, Campbell River, and because of the interest, Naniamo. Please note that this is nearly double the 35 originally scheduled to appear before the Senate Transport Committee, which voted to cancel the trips two working days before the hearings were to begin.

These 65 presenters did not include the many opponents of destaffing who have written to us, including the Government of British Columbia, the NDP caucus, the Liberal opposition caucus, six cabinet ministers, the Union of B.C. municipalities, and villages, towns, districts and band councils along the coast.

In addition, petitions signed by more than 15,000 concerned British Columbians, expressing opposition to destaffing, were tabled during our hearings and will be filed in this chamber at the appropriate time.

Angry aviators, fishers, marine pilots, boaters, kayakers and residents of coastal communities appeared before the committee to express their hostility to destaffing in the interests of maritime aviation safety. They came off their fishing boats, their tugs, their floatplanes "looking for blood," in the words of one aviator. One young man sang us his brief in the beautiful museum at Campbell River. A community nurse and mayor drove over from the west coast community of Gold River, and all of them echoed the concern of Campbell River pilot Stan Kaardal who told us:

> I use lighthouse weathers every day and I have to have them to do my work safely. We do not use automatic weather reports for flight planning because they are of no use to us.

Later, I will report our commitee's findings to the chamber, but today I want to list some of the groups and organizations which appeared before us during these lengthy and emotional hearings. These included the British Columbia Aviation Council, the Council of Marine Carriers, the Pacific Trollers Association, the Fishing Vessel Owners' Association, the Pacific Gillnetters Association, the B.C. Federation of Labour, the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway and Transport Union representing towboat employees, Westwater Research Centre, Marine Life Sanctuary Society, Outdoor Recreational Council representing 200,000 British Columbians, the Sea Kayak Association of B.C., Lightkeepers from Nootka Lightstation, Point Atkinson and Entrance Island, residents of Saturna and Mayne Islands, the MLA of Alberni (representing 13 West Coast MLAs), Marine Parks Forever and the Council of B.C. Yacht Clubs, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, Institute of Ocean Sciences, the Director of the Tsunami Warning System, Institute of Ocean Sciences, the Geological Survey of Canada, Nootke Charters of Tofino, Lester B. Pearson College, the B.C. Fisheries Survival Coalition, the B.C. Fishermen's Redress Committee, Pacific Trollers Association, Campbell River Chamber of Commerce, Transport Committee, Meteorologist at Flight Dispatch of Canadian Airlines International, Aircraft Operators Association, Strathcone Park Lodge Outdoor Centre, Gulf Trollers Association and representatives of native groups, the Canadian Aircraft Association, Coastal Communities for Staffed Lighthouses, Save Georgia Straight Alliance, and others.

If other provinces, including Quebec, voice this level of concern, the government in Ottawa will listen. British Columbia demands no less.

HEALTH

COMMEMORATION OF WORLD AIDS DAY

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, throughout the world today we are commemorating World AIDS Day. I notice that many senators are wearing their red ribbons to commemorate this day.

It is important that we reflect on this dreadful disease which has killed 7,200 Canadian in the last 10 years. A number of others, in fact, are now HIV-positive.

This disease was greatly ignored in the early years because it was considered to be a homosexual disease. However, it is not. Indeed, the largest single group now contracting HIV is heterosexual women.

We must not forget those who have contracted the disease from surgery, through blood transfusions, or those who are haemophiliac and received HIV through blood products; nor must we ignore the intravenous drug users, who certainly live on the darker side of our society.

We must not forget those who are homosexual because, honourable senators, in the testimony that has been given in the hearings of the Special Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, the very saddest testimony has been from those who are homosexual and have AIDS, and who feel that they have been deserted, or fear that they will be deserted. They seek assisted suicide or euthanasia because they believe that when the time comes for them to suffer the agonies of this disease, they will not be supported by the health care system, or by families or friends.

No matter what our views are, I do not believe anyone in this country should feel they want assisted suicide or euthanasia because their society or country has deserted them.

Honourable senators, I ask us all to reflect on this agony because it is a societal agony. It is one of which we are all a part.

ENERGY

HIBERNIA PROJECT—CONTRACT WITH SAINT JOHN SHIPYARD

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, politics should never stand in the way of signed legal agreements. No, I am not talking about Pearson, although I could be. I am talking about the Hibernia work recently given to the Saint John shipyard in my province of New Brunswick.

The Prime Minister is now saying that this legal agreement should be disregarded, and the work put out to tender. Should the work have been put out to tender in the first place? Yes, and Saint John would have won, because it has a history of finishing projects on time, and because the board that oversees Hibernia wants the work done in an ice-free port.

However, the contract was not put out to tender, honourable senators, and with a signed, legal agreement now in place, the work must be done in Saint John. To do otherwise would only send one message to the business community: This government does not think that contracts are worth the paper they are written on.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations, which deals with illegal dispensations.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lewis, and pursuant to rule 97(3), report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, December 6, 1994 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, the work program for the next week is as follows: By the middle of next week we will have Bill C-46, to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other acts and Bill C-51, to amend the Canadian Grain Act. Later next week we hope to have Bill C-56, to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, and Bill C-52, to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts.

It is not certain that we will have the last two bills. However, we are as certain as we can be in this business that we will have the first two.

The following committees will be sitting next week: Aboriginal Peoples; Banking, Trade and Commerce; Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources; Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide; Foreign Affairs; Internal Economy; Legal and Constitutional Affairs; and Transport and Communications.

We will give Bill C-57 first reading today and we will debate it next week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-57, to implement the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Petten, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—AD HOC PARLIAMENATARY COMMITTEE ON LIGHTSTATIONS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday, December 14, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the findings of the Ad Hoc Parliamentary Committee on Lightstations, which travelled to British Columbia from November 22 to November 25, 1994, to hear the testimony of witnesses in four centres of British Columbia.

SPLIT LAKE CREE FIRST NATION FLOODED LAND BILL

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Reports from Standing or Special Committees:

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk, Chairperson of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 1, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has the honour to presents its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-36, An Act respecting the Split Lake Cree First Nation and the settlement of matters arising from an agreement relating to the flooding of land, has examined the said Bill in obedience to its Order of Reference dated November 17, 1994, and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

A. RAYNELL ANDREYCHUK
Chairperson

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Petten, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ELECTIONS CANADA

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS—INTRODUCTION OF NEW LEGISLATION—REQUEST FOR PRE-STUDY

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last Friday, November 25, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs presented its fifty-first report, which contains a number of recommendations supported by draft legislation described as "an act to provide for the establishment of Electoral Boundaries Commissions and the readjustment of electoral boundaries."

We can all recall the debate earlier this year surrounding Bill C-18, to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. Bill C-18 was passed only after this side convinced the government of the validity of a number of amendments, which were agreed to with one modification.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us when the government intends to introduce this legislation, or some modification of it, in the House of Commons?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as my friend has indicated, the committee has done its work. The government will undoubtedly bring legislation forward in the new year. I do not anticipate that legislation will be brought forward before the end of this month.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Would the Leader of the Government agree that, because of the particular interest which senators have shown in the important matter of electoral boundaries, perhaps this legislation would be an ideal candidate for pre-study by the Senate?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, indeed that legislation is important. It had somewhat of a rollicking passage through this house. I hope that the legislation will come forward in more than ample time to allow each house of Parliament the fullest possible debate and consideration on the matter.

READJUSTMENT OF ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES BASED ON 1991 CENSUS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Whatever the timetable of the government on this legislation, does it endorse the conclusion of the committee as described in its report, which I quote:

> The committee also believes that it is highly important that the readjustment of electoral boundaries on the basis of the 1991 census should be in place for the next federal general election.

Does the government endorse this statement and will it confirm that, whatever its timetable may be on the new legislation regarding electoral boundaries, everything will be in place in time for the next federal election?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at this point, I cannot foresee the legislation as it will be specifically drafted.

However, as we went through the process of drafting the legislation in the months preceding its return to the House of Commons and the subsequent study by the Commons committee, the intention was clear that the government wishes the electoral boundaries for the next election to reflect my honourable friend's considerations.

DESTAFFING OF LIGHTSTATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT ASSESSMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

First, I wish to explain that when I rose last week to inquire about an issue in Quebec concerning Canadian pilots flying into Mirabel from Canadian cities and having to go through Canadian customs, the issue was resolved within 48 hours. I am hoping that the following issue will be resolved within the same time frame.

In view of the adamant opposition to destaffing B.C. lightstations because it will put people's lives at risk, can the minister ascertain whether environmental impact assessments were carried out and human safety issues addressed before bureaucrats, in their scorched-earth policy, burned down the houses and buildings at Cape St. James in the Queen Charlotte Islands? If such environmental assessments have been done, as required by law under the EARP guidelines, would the minister make the documentation available?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take my honourable friend's questions to the minister and attempt to get a response as quickly as possible.

BOSNIA

CONDITIONS FOR CONTINUATION OF PEACEKEEPING MISSION—
VISIT OF UN SECRETARY-GENERAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, as the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate is no doubt aware, United Nations Secretary-General, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, went to Sarajevo yesterday with the intention of presenting what have been described as rock-bottom conditions for the continuation of the UN mission in Bosnia. My question is this: Does the Government of Canada know whether, in fact, the Secretary-General had an opportunity to present these rock-bottom conditions and, if so, to whom? Does Canada know what the conditions are? Does Canada approve of these conditions?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer for his question. I shall have to obtain full details on the matter to which he has referred. As the honourable senator knows, the visit of Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali did not accomplish what he had hoped for. His visit has been described as perhaps a useful step in the diplomatic process.

The Canadian government's position remains clear, that this dispute or this war be resolved through negotiation. The Prime Minister has been outspoken in his view of the current situation. In the view of the government, the current situation is much more than a disappointment. It is unacceptable that Canada, having played such a strong role in attempting to find a solution to this conflict, should not be part of the contact group as it currently exists.

As my friend will know, the Prime Minister will visit Belgrade at the end of this week. There will be, I am sure, serious and spirited discussion among the countries represented there on the best possible course of action.

Honourable senators, the government remains clear in its view that there should be no lifting of the arms embargo. The Prime Minister will be engaging in talks with representatives of the French government, if he has not already done so during his visit to France, and representatives of the other partner countries on the ground in Bosnia.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, when the honourable minister has had an opportunity to ascertain whether Canada knows the current conditions and whether Canada specifically approves of them, will she give consideration to informing the Senate specifically of those conditions? No one would wish the honourable minister to reveal anything that would endanger the security of our troops or anyone else. That is a consideration, but to what extent it is a factor, I do not know. The government is in a much better position to know.

Honourable senators, there is also the consideration of greater transparency in matters of defence policy. These are things that obviously the honourable leader would have to weigh in making a decision to inform the Senate of the conditions.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Ottenheimer, I will talk to my colleagues, particularly the Minister of National Defence. I will speak as well to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who will be back in Canada next week, I believe. As you know, he has been in Russia discussing this issue with the foreign minister there. I shall attempt to get the fullest possible information under the constraints of the consideration my honourable friend has outlined.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—
CANCELLATION OF LEASE AGREEMENT

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday, I received a response to the questions I put to the honourable leader on November 15 and November 24. She will recall that the Minister of Transport said that before handing over Pearson International Airport to the new Canadian Airport Authority, Ottawa must wait until Parliament had passed Bill C-22. I asked for the reasons why.

This is the reply as printed on page 1012 of the Debates of the Senate of yesterday.

> At this time, there exists a lease agreement between the federal government and T1T2 Development Corporation. Succinctly, there cannot be a second lease concluded for the same property to two different entities.

On November 24, I quoted a letter dated September 20 from the chairman of the Pearson Development Corporation, a letter he wrote to every member of Parliament in which he said:

> Pearson Development has already made it clear that it will not take any action to block the redevelopment of Pearson International Airport.

Honourable senators, if that was not enough, in the Ontario court case T1T2 v. Her Majesty, the Canadian government's statement of defence and counterclaim, which includes the affidavit of John Desmarais, says in Article 172:

> ...the Plaintiff's claim, and the Defendant...

— the government —

> ...admits that the airport contracts were repudiated on or before December 15th, 1993.

Then again in Article 173, the government states:

> ...the Plaintiffs...

— the Pearson consortium —

> ...have conducted themselves consistent with acceptance of the repudiation, and on the basis that the airport contracts are at an end for all purposes other than the claim for damages.

My question is this: Is there not a contradiction here? The government lawyers say there is no impediment. Yesterday, Transport Canada said that there is a contradiction. The Pearson developers have said they will not take any action to block redevelopment of the airport. Time is passing. That being the case, has the minister or any of his officials approached the Pearson consortium regarding the cancellation of the lease agreement between the federal government and T1T2 and, if so, have these negotiations been ongoing?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the honourable senator's question to my colleague to get an expansion on the answer the senator has already received.

TREASURY BOARD

POSSIBLE AMENDMENTS TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The story is making the rounds these days that, sometime in the New Year, Treasury Board President Art Eggleton will place a bill before the House of Commons giving MPs — and I repeat, MPs — the right to opt out of the parliamentarians' so-called generous pension plan.

Does "member of Parliament" in this instance include senators, as I think it should, or is that proposal designed and tailored specifically for members of the House of Commons?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for his question.

As the honourable senator knows, there has not yet been a response on the question of pensions by the government or by the President of the Treasury Board. I will certainly draw my honourable friend's question, and his supporting remarks, to the attention of Mr. Eggleton.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION— BACKHAUL TO THUNDER BAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The backhaul of grain to Thunder Bay from Winnipeg was mentioned some time ago, and the government indicated, through its minister, that that situation would be solved. However, according to the news the other night, it still has not been solved.

This process is not only an embarrassment to all of the grain-handling workers but also to the Wheat Board and to the farmers. People in general on the prairies are concerned that this process is continuing at tremendous expense. What does the government intend to do about this situation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank my friend for his question. Senator Gustafson knows that the Minister of Agriculture also has expressed very strong concerns about this process.

Senator Berntson: He said it would be fixed.

Senator Fairbairn: It is his intention to end that process. As far as timing is concerned, I will seek further information and get back to my honourable friend.

Senator Gustafson: Honourable senators, it seems to me that it would be better even to pay the railroads, and not move the cars back and forth, congesting the system. They must be wearing out the cars, going through the manoeuvre of transporting grain from Winnipeg to Thunder Bay, and then moving it back to Winnipeg. It is quite an operation, let me put it that way. Certainly, a solution must be found; the situation is almost a joke.

Senator Berntson: It is a joke.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I agree with my friend that this is a situation which must end. It does not make sense. The Minister of Agriculture, I can assure you, is very actively cognizant of the situation, and is moving to a solution as quickly as he can.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to questions raised by the Honourable Senator Prud'homme on October 25, 26 and 27, 1994.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PROPOSAL TO STRIKE A SPECIAL COMMITTEE—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Marcel Prud'homme on October 25, 26, and 27, 1994)

The Honourable David Collenette, Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, responsible for the CSE, has stated that he would be pleased to appear as a witness before the appropriate Senate Committee to answer questions concerning the accountability and mandate of the CSE. As for the structure of the Senate committee system, that matter is under active consideration by the Senate's Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders.

YUKON SURFACE RIGHTS BOARD BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Paul Lucier moved the second reading of Bill C-55, to establish a board having jurisdiction concerning disputes respecting surface rights in respect of land in the Yukon Territory and to amend other Acts in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to address Bill C-55, the Yukon Surface Rights Board Bill.

However, before I do so, honourable senators, I would take this opportunity to congratulate Senator LeBlanc, who was appointed our new Governor General, and Senator Molgat, our new Speaker. I would also welcome Senators Bryden and Gauthier to the Senate. They will be fine additions.

I wanted to point out, too, that Senator Molgat has been a great friend of the Yukon in the years I have been here. We appreciated his input into the affairs of the Yukon. He was always very willing to come to the Yukon and to make sure that people from the Yukon were heard on issues of importance to them. We appreciated that.

I am pleased to speak in support of this legislation which will have extremely positive and lasting implications for the Yukon that go far beyond the scope of the bill itself. The purpose of Bill C-55 is to establish a new surface rights regime in the Yukon Territory. This regime will set out clear rules for acquiring access to, and using, land in the territory so that all parties will be aware of their rights and obligations. A key element of the new regime will be a surface rights board which will resolve disputes related to access and compensation.

Honourable senators, the creation of this new regime and board is a condition of the Council for Yukon Indians' umbrella final agreement. Having endorsed the umbrella final agreement and passed enabling legislation, the Government of Canada has both a moral and a legal obligation to establish this new regime. Now we are being called upon to fulfil this obligation by giving approval to Bill C-55.

My honourable colleagues should be aware that Bill C-55 will accomplish much more than simply establishing a new institution of public government in the Yukon. This is a final legislative building block that will allow implementation of the umbrella final agreement itself. Without Bill C-55, the Yukon First Nations Land Claim Settlement Act will not be proclaimed, and the Yukon Indians will not receive the land, financial compensation, and other benefits they so richly deserve.

Without Bill C-55, non-aboriginal Yukoners, the territorial government and Canadian industry will not have the certainty which the settlement agreement brings. This certainty is vital in order for resource development projects to go forward; projects which will create jobs and income for Yukoners and other Canadians.

Without Bill C-55, the Yukon First Nations self-government act will not be proclaimed. This act has also been endorsed by this chamber and will give effect to self-government agreements negotiated with individual Yukon First Nations.

Honourable senators can appreciate that much more is at stake with Bill C-55 than issues of land access. At stake is more than two decades of work by both governments and Yukon First Nations. At stake is the honour of the Crown to implement the umbrella final agreement signed on May 29, 1993, and possibly the very economic future of the Yukon Territory.

The need for a new surface rights regime arises from the changing face of land ownership in the Yukon. As final agreements of each of the 14 Yukon First Nations are implemented, large areas of Crown land will become privately owned by these First Nations. This is a significant change for the territory, and it calls for a new approach to administering surface rights. The political evolution of the territory strongly suggests that this approach should be implemented in the Yukon by Yukoners. This is achieved through Bill C-55, which establishes the Yukon Surface Rights Board as a new institution of public government that will ensure that all sectors of Yukon society will have a respected voice and direct participation in decision making.

As mentioned a moment ago, honourable senators, land claims final agreements will bring certainty of land and resource ownership to the Yukon. This, in turn, will clarify the legal basis for mining companies to begin exercising their exploration development rights. Bill C-55 ensures that these companies, as well as others who need to use the land, will be able to do so based on terms and conditions which are both reasonable and responsible.

The government is confident that, in most cases, developers will be able to reach mutually beneficial access agreements with First Nations and other land owners in the Yukon. In fact, Bill C-55 requires the two parties to attempt to negotiate access arrangements before they can approach the board.

Nevertheless, the government also acknowledges that disputes will arise between the surface owners of the land and the owners of subsurface resource rights. Experience in other jurisdictions would indicate that these disputes generally involve compensation. The Yukon Surface Rights Board will deal efficiently with these disputes. The proposed board is modelled on similar, appointed institutions of government that have been used to resolve such access disputes in the western provinces for several years.

The Yukon board will have the power to resolve disputes related to both settlement and non-settlement lands throughout the territory. These disputes could be related to access or use of land, as well as compensation for such access and use. The board will also have authority to determine compensation if settlement lands are ever expropriated. Its orders will be enforceable through the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory.

I want to assure honourable colleagues that Bill C-55 has been drafted with fairness in mind. It respects the interests of both the land owners in the Yukon and those who need to use the land. This balancing of interests was achieved, in part, through an extensive consultation process that took place over the past year. First Nations, the territorial government, the mining industry, the public and other third party interests have all provided input into Bill C-55. Many of these parties have been directly involved in drafting this legislation. This broad consultation has resulted in agreement on the principles of this bill.

Another way interests have been balanced is through the makeup of the Surface Rights Board. Under Bill C-55, the Council for Yukon Indians will have the right to nominate half the members of the Surface Rights Board, excluding the chairperson. As well, at least one member nominated by Yukon Indians will sit on any panel created by the board to deal with matters concerning settlement lands. The remainder of the board's members will be nominated by government, which will endeavour to ensure that a broad range of Yukon people have input into the important decisions that need to be made.

Honourable senators, this approach to resolving disputes was adopted with cost efficiency and effectiveness in mind. By keeping surface rights issues out of the courts as much as possible, the new board will minimize delays in development projects and avoid costly litigation. It will also encourage negotiation rather than confrontation. I also want to stress that Bill C-55 is fully consistent with the Land Claims Settlement Agreement which has been embraced by virtually all concerned parties in the Yukon.

Honourable senators, Yukoners have heard enough talk and debate about land claims and self-government. Now they want concrete action. They want economic development, a say in decision making, and reconciliation between aboriginal and non-aboriginal people. Bill C-55 will give them that and more. Our colleagues in the other chamber have given their support to this legislation. It is time for us to do our part to live up to the Crown's commitment, not only to the Yukon First Nations but to all Yukoners and all Canadians. We can and must do this by supporting Bill C-55 at second reading.

Hon. Arthur Eric Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while I agree, for the most part, with my colleague on the other side, I do have a couple of concerns relative to Bill C-55.

The quest of native peoples for viable self-governing communities within Canada requires result-oriented government. The recognition of an inherent right to self-government would not, by itself, meet the aspirations of native peoples. It would not by itself break the dependency on welfare. It would not, by itself, end the economic crisis within the reserves. In short, it would not, by itself, solve the challenges that confront natives, nor redress historic injustices. Canadian achievements in the area of native rights have been often remarkable. With the helpful vigilance of native peoples themselves, solutions to complex questions will yield tangible results.

Bill C-55 was introduced after two other pieces of legislation, namely, the Land Claims Settlement Act and the Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, Bills C-33 and C-34 respectively, were passed last June. Perhaps some senators will recall that when the representatives arrived here, there was some confusion related to the bills themselves and to the implicit requests to expedite the legislative process in their favour.

In any case, in early October we received a letter from the Council of Yukon Indians stating that they were very anxious to see the Yukon surface rights bill expedited through the House of Commons and the Senate process. The CYI urged Senate members to assist the process by undertaking a pre-study of the surface rights bill, thus easing its passage. They have not contacted our side since then.

Yesterday, pursuant to Standing Order No. 108(2), the House of Commons Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, carrying out a study on the Kaska Nation land claim, received witnesses from the Kaska Tribal Council, the Ross River Dena Council and, I believe, the Liard First Nation. The members of that committee appeared perplexed by the Kaska's assertion that their land claim would be subject to prejudicial circumstances if Bill C-55 were given Royal Assent. They believed that their land claim negotiations would be put on hold if Bill C-55 were to be passed forthwith.

To illustrate the confusing circumstances before us, allow me to quote from a speech on the subject by Mr. Lyle Vanclief during third reading debate on the bill in the other place. He said:

> Yukoners are virtually unanimous in wanting this bill to pass quickly.

He also said:

> Yukoners want and need the certainty of the economic development opportunities that this bill and the land claims process will bring.

It became apparent yesterday to members of the House committee that the Kaska Dena did not ratify the agreement the Council of Yukon Indians had made with the Government of Canada, but were expected to be subject to the provisions within Bill C-33, Bill C-34 and Bill C-55 vis-à-vis their land claim negotiations, currently stalled because there is not agreement on a mandate for negotiations from the minister's office.

It also became known that only four of the 14 Yukon First Nations ratified the agreement. Most would agree that one of the major selling points for supporting the triumvirate of legislation was the premise that this would create certainty that would allow development of a positive environment for economic development and community development.

The Kaska are saying that their position is at peril unfairly and that it needs to be given immediate consideration. At this point, I cannot pass judgment. I do not know whether I agree or disagree with them.

My hope is that when this bill is considered in the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, these questions can be answered. Some say that aboriginal people have been studied to death. Maybe the Senate committee will help study them back to life, or at least offer honourable senators a comprehensive view of what, for all intents and purposes, has been a complex and confusing development.

Canadians and Yukoners are interested in more jobs and less debt. I imagine that improved access to land, water, resources, education and training will take care of the "more jobs" part. In doing so, perhaps Canada will be addressing, in part, our indebtedness to the native peoples for having welcomed and assisted us in building present day Canada.

Native peoples in the Yukon are asking the government what devolution of jurisdiction to the territory will mean to their future land claims and their shot at survival and prosperity. I believe that these are legitimate questions. I believe that, in the circumstances, the proper forum in which to have them answered is the committee and, therefore, we will not object to Bill C-55.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Lucier, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, for the second reading of Bill S-6, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (dangerous intoxication).—(Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux).

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to take this opportunity to tell His Honour the Speaker of the Senate how delighted I was at his appointment and to offer him my congratulations. I have worked with him on several occasions, particularly on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. He was always a team player and demonstrated very good judgment. I am certain that he will share these same qualities with us in the Senate, and I congratulate him on his appointment.

Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill S-6, introduced by Senator Gigantès, is to put a stop to the defence used before the courts by Henri Daviault, who was too drunk to be held responsible for dragging a 65-year-old woman out of her wheelchair and raping her. The bill proposes the creation of the offence of "dangerous intoxication," which would be punishable by imprisonment for up to fourteen years. In order to be found guilty of this offence, the accused would have to have committed a violent act as defined in the bill while in a state of self-induced intoxication caused by alcohol or drugs.

The Minister of Justice, Allan Rock, has promised to amend the Criminal Code to limit this defence, but only after public study of a working paper on the subject. The discussion paper on reforming Part I of the Criminal Code deals with the question of intoxication as a ground for defence. At the present time, Part I does not provide for a defence of self-induced intoxication. Rather, this defence has arisen under case law and is usually resorted to for offences of "specific intent," but not for offences of "general intent." Intent is a fundamental concept in our criminal system. The confusion around the issue of intoxication as a defence comes from the distinction between specific intent offences and general intent offences.

I am told that the Supreme Court of Canada itself would have contributed to this confusion in 1960 when it stated that intoxication could be pleaded in defence in the case of specific intent offences, but not in that of general intent offences. Under Canadian law, the Crown must establish both elements of the offence: the material element, or actus reus, and the mental element, or mens rea. If an individual's mind is so clouded by alcohol or drugs that he or she is incapable of forming the specific intent to commit a given offence, then this individual shall not be considered as presenting the mental element required and, therefore, shall not be found guilty of the offence. In many cases, even if the specific intent cannot be established, the accused may nevertheless be found guilty of a general intent offence.

In the Daviault case, the Supreme Court tried to abolish this artificial distinction between specific intent offences and general intent offences. If drunkenness can negate mental intent for a charge of murder, why could it not be pleaded in defence for charges of assault or sexual assault? In a majority, four to three decision, the Supreme Court judges found that extreme intoxication could be pleaded in defence of any offence. In their opinion:

> The mental aspect of an offence has long been recognized as an integral part of a crime, and to eliminate it would be to deprive an accused of fundamental justice. The mental element in general intent offences may be minimal; in this case it is simply an intention to commit the sexual assault or recklessness as to whether the actions will constitute an assault. The necessary mental element can ordinarily be inferred from the proof that the assault was committed by the accused, but the substituted mens rea of an intention to become drunk cannot establish the mens rea to commit the assault.

Dissenting judges, however, expressed the following opinion:

> Evidence of intoxication can only provide a defence for offences of specific intent but not for offences of general intent. Since sexual assault is a crime of general intent, intoxication is no defence to a charge of sexual assault. This rule is supported by sound policy considerations. One of the main purposes of the criminal law is to protect the public. Society is entitled to punish those who of their own free will render themselves so intoxicated as to pose a threat to other members of the community.

The court added that the person must be so intoxicated as to be incapable of forming the minimal intent to commit the act. The judges described this defence as self-induced intoxication akin to a state of insanity or automatism.

It is not surprising that this decision by the Supreme Court shocked the general public. People want assurances that those who commit offences while intoxicated are held accountable for their actions. Women's groups and advocates of shelters for victims of violence are convinced that women have the most to lose as a result of this decision, since most victims of violence are women and children. According to some, this ruling is a setback for women because it condones offences committed against them.

While women are not challenging the decision rendered by the Supreme Court in the Daviault case, they do worry about its repercussions. They feel that the ruling was distorted by the media, and that it is a result of sloppy work by lower-court judges who misinterpreted precedents. It must be said in this regard that defence lawyers manipulate the system to get their clients off the hook. This is part of the game, I suppose. Obviously, if the Daviault case is interpreted properly, this defence would be used only in cases of extreme intoxication akin to a state of insanity or automatism.

Following the Daviault ruling, Criminal Lawyers Association president Bruce Durno explained to journalists that this case would not lead to many acquittals. Yet, two weeks later, an Alberta man was acquitted of brutally assaulting his wife after consuming large quantities of drugs and alcohol. The judge in this case said that he had to take the precedent set by the Supreme Court into consideration. Since then, and it is not so long ago, intoxication has successfully been invoked as a defence in two other cases. That is why the public is indignant.

The problem raised by the Supreme Court's decision is complex. There is more than one possible solution and it is therefore necessary to examine each of them carefully in order to choose the best one. Other solutions were considered besides the one proposed. The kind of offence for which the accused could invoke the defence of extreme intoxication could be restricted. For example, it could be limited to offences involving negligence or carelessness such as manslaughter or even sexual assault. Its application could be further limited if sexual assault cases were excluded.

The bill could have taken various forms. Under Bill S-6, if someone is found not guilty of an offence by virtue of being intoxicated, he could be found guilty of the offence of dangerous intoxication. Another way to look at this would be to create a new offence of reckless conduct causing harm. Someone who willingly becomes intoxicated should be held responsible for his acts.

Nonetheless, the approach taken in Bill S-6 raises a number of concerns. For instance, if the prosecution is unable to prove the level of intoxication of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt, there is some concern that individuals may, in the end, be acquitted of both the principal offence and the new offence of dangerous intoxication. Furthermore, the Crown would have to cite dangerous intoxication as a serious offence in all cases where alcohol or drugs are involved, to cover all eventualities with respect to sentencing.

Women's groups like the Canadian Action Committee on the Status of Woman, which also represents other groups under the umbrella of this committee, do not believe this bill is the answer. They are afraid that sexual assault will be dropped as an offence when alcohol is involved, which would have the effect of diluting the gravity of offences of a sexual nature. According to them, the government has no systematic approach to dealing with violence against women. I think we must realize that the search is continuing for a solution to this problem which is so widespread in our society, and it is impossible to make the requisite changes in the present system. They feel that the government will first have to review the provisions on rape and assault and consider the changes that must be made in this respect. That, in their view, should be the starting point.

Considering the foregoing, I think Senator Gigantès has done useful work in bringing this debate before a public forum, because although the Minister of Justice has said he intends to amend the Criminal Code to deal with these problems, it always takes time for good intentions to materialize, and sometimes it takes far too long since, as we saw recently, the Supreme Court's judgment has already been used in two cases in Alberta. From that perspective, I think Senator Gigantès' initiative is an excellent one. However, the bill as such poses a number of problems, as I have tried to explain. This is an extremely delicate and complex issue, and it is clear that the bill will have to be examined very closely.

It is evident that this bill should undergo close scrutiny. I therefore recommend that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bosa, for Senator Gigantès, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

STATE OF CANADIAN FINANIAL SYSTEM

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON STUDY—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the thirteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, entitled "Regulation and Consumer Protection in the Federally-Regulated Financial Services Industry: Striking A Balance," tabled in the Senate on November 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Di Nino)

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I rise to participate in the debate on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I will not repeat the title; it is too long.

Although I am prepared to support many of the recommendations contained in the report, there are some to which I take exception: those that will discriminate against small business, particularly the recommendations dealing with co-insurance, which is the area I will be speaking on today.

Honourable senators, before dealing with the recommended changes to deposit insurance, I wish to briefly discuss the recommendations dealing with stacking. First, the definition of stacking needs to be clearly stated. The report does not do this. I urge the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to do so.

I suspect some abuses in stacking of accounts is taking place. I also suspect that the instances of abuse are insignificant. What concerns me is that, in attempting to fix a small leak, the committee's recommendations may be preventing spouses, children, family members, or sheltered accounts of such family members such as RRSPs and RRIFs from being held at the same institutions.

Honourable senators, surely this report cannot be saying that a person and his or her spouse, having separate accounts in the same institution, would only be covered fully up to $30,000? When I asked Senator Kirby that question last Tuesday, his response was, and I quote:

We did not deal with the related-persons problem.

That, honourable senators, is mainly how stacking takes place. Most of it is quite innocent, regular, and without abuse.

Rather than take the time at this stage, if a colleague has a question on the issue of stacking, I will be pleased to attempt to answer it when I finish my remarks.

Honourable senators, I will now argue against the report's suggested introduction of co-insurance. My arguments are based on the following six considerations: One, it will force smaller financial institutions out of business; two, it will create barriers to entry for new financial institutions, specifically smaller institutions wishing to enter Canada's financial sector to fill a specific market need; three, it will not lead to greater market discipline, as some suggest; four, self-interest motivates some to advocate these kinds of schemes; five, any changes in insuring deposits of federally chartered institutions without corresponding changes to provincially chartered ones will create an uneven playing field; and six, it will create two classes of institutions. It is this consideration of creating two classes of institutions that I find most alarming.

Senators may be aware that two reports were recently tabled in the other place, one entitled "Taking Care of Small Business" from the Standing House Committee on Industry, and a report to ministers from the Small Business Working Committee entitled "Breaking Through Barriers: Forging our Future." Both committees alluded to the idea that the financial system is not responding to the needs of small business, and that we need more competition in the industry. As a result, the report to ministers recommended that the federal government use its leverage to increase competition among these financial institutions. The Industry Committee report went one step further by recommending that the government consider creating a new category of banks with a primary focus on financing small business.

The reason I mention these two reports is to point out that, with the recommendations contained in the Senate Banking Committee's report on the CDIC, new institutions will find it extremely difficult to compete, resulting in less competition, not more. Additional and stronger competition is required to meet the needs of business, especially small business.The recommendations contained in the Senate Banking Committee report violates this principle by, in effect, decreasing competition among financial institutions.

Honourable senators, my argument against co-insurance, risk premiums or other similar schemes should not be construed as an argument against the need to strengthen consumer protection in Canada. On the contrary, I support the ongoing work of the Banking Committee in the area of consumer protection for the simple reason that the willingness of savers to place funds with deposit-taking institutions depends greatly on their confidence in the system and the industry.

Deposit insurance is one of the measurements of the relative strength of financial intermediation in Canada. On that point, at the conclusion of my presentation, I will propose a number of suggestions to strengthen consumer protection in Canada while taking into consideration the need to address problems which have developed in our financial system.

The report deals quite clearly and extensively with the themes and variations of co-insurance. It is unnecessary for me to add to them except where I believe it is flawed.

Honourable senators, co-insurance and other similar schemes put the onus on the consumer to take some of the risk for their decision to deal with one particular institution over another. Attempts to justify these schemes are made on the basis that there is a clear need to encourage market discipline in the system or, in other words, to have savers assess the risk associated with the expected return.

Some have stated that most, if not all, unsophisticated investors deposit their savings in the institution that offers the best rate. Having spent the better part of my life in the financial services industry, I do not agree. In my opinion, most still deal with the institution which is most convenient and/or is best able to effectively market itself.

I ask the question: Is the justification on market discipline correct? The inherent problem with the notion of justifying co-insurance or other similar schemes on the basis of greater market discipline is the assumption that the unsophisticated saver will be able to assess the risk of the institution. In view of the many recent examples of the inability of the marketplace to correctly assess the riskiness of certain institutions and the relative speed with which changes in the value of institutional portfolios occur, I cannot believe that the unsophisticated saver, not to mention the sophisticated investor, will be able to adequately assess the viability of any particular institution. This is simply not realistic, and as such it would not be greater market discipline.

Those of you who will be following this matter will notice that large numbers of senior citizens of this country have agreed with my position.

What will be the likely outcome if risk-based schemes are introduced? The introduction of the schemes would result in the perception of two classes of financial institutions: the smaller, less stable ones and the large too-big-to-fail ones. Those that may be perceived as smaller and less stable will have to offer higher rates to attract deposits. To compensate for these, institutions will be forced to seek higher returns, which would mean taking higher risks, thus increasing their chances of failure. Even if the regulators were inclined to allow institutions to assume a more risky stance, capital adequacy rules would require an increase in capital, reducing the institution's potential profitability. The potential effect of the co-insurance scheme would impact negatively both on large and small financial institutions; however, the greatest negative impact would clearly be on the smaller institutions.

In order to maintain profitability, these institutions will either have to become much more cost efficient, which smaller institutions usually already are, or earn a higher return on their assets, or both. Obviously, to earn a higher return, the institution must take higher risks which, in turn, mean increasing the chances of failure. In short, the likely result of increasing interest rates to encourage deposits in a co-insurance environment will be a reduction in the institution's potential profitability and, as such, the risk of failure will be increased, leading to greater instability in the financial system.

Instability in the financial system is in itself reason enough to argue against the introduction of risk-based schemes. Further instability may result from two limits of financial institutions. First is the inability of financial institutions, specifically but not exclusively smaller institutions, to compete with other institutions such as insurance companies, credit unions, caisses populaires, provincial savings banks, et cetera, which do not operate under such an environment. Second is the inability of federally regulated financial institutions under a new federally regulated risk-based scheme to maintain a balance with provincially chartered institutions.

To summarize, senators should be clear that co-insurance, risk-based or other similar schemes, will create instability, not stability, in the financial system, unless of course the industry is to be restricted to only a small number of mammoth institutions. Even then, we will not be insured against failures, as you will hear in a moment.

If risk-based schemes will indeed cause instability in the financial system and will not lead to greater market discipline, why are some advocating the introduction of these schemes? Clearly, many of those advocates stand to profit from such schemes, such as the large financial institutions. The large banks, for instance, do not need deposit insurance to compete in the markets since they are seen to be too big to be allowed to fail. In effect, depositors in these institutions have 100 per cent deposit insurance. Clearly, the banks stand to gain in market share if the smaller financial institutions were to be put out of business.

Although smaller financial institutions represent a small fraction of total market share of deposits, the dollar amount is by no means insignificant. As outlined in a background document prepared by the Department of Finance, and I quote:

> ...concerns have been raised that the rationalization and deposit-taking sector may lead to undesirable levels of concentration and therefore negatively impact competition given the bulk of the trust company assets that have been acquired have moved to the banking sector. There has been a considerable increase in the overall level of concentration in the deposit-taking sector in the past two years.

Taking into consideration the previous discussions, in my opinion the argument put forward by the banks in support of risk-based schemes, co-insurance, et cetera, tend to be self-serving and do not lend themselves to good public policy.

What does it mean to be too big to fail? This notion of too big to fail refers to Canada's large financial institutions not being at risk because of their size and importance to the financial system in Canada and the world. Rightly or wrongly, history has shown that Canadian governments will not allow Canada's large institutions to fail. This is accomplished by injecting funds from the deep pockets of the Consolidated Revenue Fund or by using the tax system, thereby avoiding a loss of confidence in Canada's financial system, particularly by international investors.

Historically, governments have taken a number of actions to bail out Canada's financial system when it was at risk. In other words, the government has insured through its actions that Canada's financial system remains stable, and I have no quarrel with this at all.

Let me give some examples in this regard, honourable senators. First would be the handling of the problems of the banks, especially the big banks, with loans to Third World countries in the early 1980s. Our government, through the Department of Finance, relaxed the write-off rules to effectively permit banks to write off loan losses to these less developed countries over a longer period of time than was normal. Why? Because if the banks were required to write off these loans at market value immediately, as is required by both OSFI and CDIC, the effects on the banks' capital requirements would have indeed placed some of them in a very precarious position. As well, let us not forget, the taxpayer, because of the nature of the write-off, picked up a large part of these losses which resulted from the banks' poor judgment.

I have a second example. In the early 1980s a major chartered bank found itself in serious financial difficulties because of non-performing loans to Dome Petroleum, Turbo Resources, Massey Ferguson and others, which severely restricted their capital adequacy. As the record shows, the government helped that bank survive at the taxpayers' expense.

A third example is the bail-out of the East Coast fishery for political reasons and, I propose, because of the potential serious exposure of one of the major banks. All this shows that the so-called "playing field" is not level. The large financial institutions, and particularly the six banks, have continually been treated differently than the smaller financial institutions.

Would the government have taken such actions if the financial institutions were small ones? The record shows that they would not. The governments are more interested in rewarding brawn rather than brains or the entrepreneurial spirit. What does this mean? It means there is no risk that CDIC will need to insure deposits from the failure of a large financial institution in Canada because governments will not allow the institution to fail.

If the taxpayers are subsidizing large institutions in the name of consumer protection and the stability of the system — again, I have no problem with that — then they should allow for potential subsidies to smaller financial institutions as well. Then there would be a level playing field in the federally regulated deposit-taking industry.

I wish to propose the following suggestions intended to strengthen consumer protection in the financial sector. First, I disagree with Chairman Kirby over the suggestion that the regulators did not have the powers needed to act. They did have the powers; however, they did not have the courage to use them or were forbidden to use them by governments of the day. It is appropriate for their powers to be expanded.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the honourable senator permit a question at this point?

Senator Di Nino: I will be finished in a couple of minutes, and then gladly answer any question the honourable senator may have.

The following proposals, some of which have been considered by the committee, will strengthen the financial industry: first, ensure that the regulators have sufficient powers to regulate the industry; second, insist that the regulators, where necessary, use such powers or suffer the consequences; third, strengthen the responsibility of the external auditors and make them responsible for their negligent behaviour; four, enhance the role of governance by assigning to directors, legislatively or through regulation, the principal role of looking after the interest of the depositors, not the shareholders, nor management. As well, make them responsible for negligence on their part; five, clarify and strengthen the criteria for entry into the financial services industry.

Honourable senators, it is not enough that the powers of the regulators be strengthened and clarified as I previously proposed. OSFI must have the courage to use such powers. Therefore, we must insist that the regulators use all the powers afforded to them, after proper consultation with the appropriate minister.

In closing, I wish to reiterate that the willingness of savers to place funds with deposit-taking institutions depends mostly on confidence in the institution and the industry. The existence of adequate deposit insurance is an important factor which strengthens financial intermediation in Canada.

Co-insurance, risk premiums or other similar schemes will lead to the potential loss of mainly smaller financial institutions, the erection of barriers to entry into the industry, and will not lead to greater market discipline. In short, I am opposed to any recommendation that discourages small enterprise in any industry, and because of this, the recommendations dealing with the co-insurance industry should not be supported by this chamber. Small business is the backbone of free enterprise and entrepreneurs are mostly small business persons. I will not align myself with those who would penalize small business or, because of legislation or regulation, restrict entry into an industry.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of this chamber, when a vote is called on this report, to stand with me and be counted at the side of millions of small businessmen and women and reject the co-insurance recommendation in this report.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, Senator Di Nino has stated that the superintendent already had adequate powers, but that in certain instances he failed to use the powers. The senator's plea for support from senators would be stronger if he would cite three or four instances where the superintendent failed to use the powers provided.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, when I spoke of the superintendent, I was referring to all the regulators across the country. In some instances, it involves not only the federal regulator but also the provincial regulator.

I am sure my friend reads all these reports. If he does, he will notice that in every one there is some comment or some admission, as was the case with Confederation Life, that plans for the dissolution or for solving the problems in that company were already being considered by the regulators of that particular institution some two years or so before it became public.

Honourable senators, I do not want to mention other companies, although I am sure that parliamentary privilege would offer me protection from being sued. In every failure that has occurred in this country, regulators have admitted fault of one form or another. We wrote an institution a letter two years ago telling them to cease and desist, otherwise their licence would be taken away. In the two years since that letter was written, huge losses have increased to mammoth losses.

The regulators had the power to save taxpayers' dollars in every case. If the honourable senator would like me to check my research and cite examples, I will find the specific instances.

I am sure the honourable senator will agree with me that in the cases involving reviews of failures that have happened in this country, the major ones in particular, there was knowledge within the regulating body that the institutions were in trouble. The regulators have a huge hammer and they can hold it over the head of the institution and tell it to either change or we will close you down.

I agree that maybe there should be some measure in the middle somewhere but, in the meantime, I can tell the honourable senator that, having been a vice-chairman of the Trust Company's Association for some 10 years, I was well aware of what was occurring. In some cases, we were contacted by the regulators asking for information to support some questions that they had. It was always in confidence, obviously. I had some knowledge of what was occurring.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not doubt that the honourable senator has great knowledge. However, he is asking the Senate for support. His plea would be more persuasive if he gave more specifics. He has mentioned only one case.

With respect to Confederation Life, his argument is that the regulator had the knowledge and the power to effect a remedy, but lacked intestinal fortitude to use the power. Is that the case?

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, it was either that or political intervention, I do not know which.

Senator Stewart: Then it is one or the other?

Senator Di Nino: Yes. I am not sure which.

Senator Stewart: The situation developed before the election, so I do not know about political intervention. Let us set that aside. Thus, it was the lack of intestinal fortitude.

The honourable senator should be more precise if he wishes to gain support. I am not saying he should not receive it. I am suggesting that he try to make his case more convincing.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, in the cases of the Canadian Commercial Bank fiasco and the Bank of Western Canada, in particular, there were public calls for action long before action was taken, regardless of which government finally took action.

In some cases regulators did not act, and in other cases governments forbade the regulators to act.

With respect to the majority of the failures of institutions that have occurred in this country, the losses would have been a lot less if action had been taken a lot faster. That is not to say that the failures could have been prevented. I suspect that it was a combination and/or a lack of action on the part of the regulators, or that the politicians did not have the guts to take those difficult actions.

Hon. Michael E. Meighen: Would the honourable senator accept a question from me with respect to this particular area? If my memory serves me correctly, the evidence was that the difficulty lay not so much in lack of administrative guts, financial guts, or political intervention, but because of the fact that there was no intermediary step. It was either close it down or let it carry on.

The natural tendency of any regulator, indeed of any politician — indeed of anyone concerned with the financial health of the sector — would be to hope against hope that a solution could be found, and that the institution would not go bankrupt. Consequently, it was that which led them to be loathe to intervene, since the only way to intervene was to close it down.

If, as the committee has suggested, there is an intermediate step whereby the regulator can intervene so as to effect an ongoing solution, then perhaps your concern would be met. Would the honourable senator agree with that?

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, I certainly agree, as I said in my remarks and in my response to Senator Stewart, that the powers can be enlarged. I say that with some care. One does not wish to get to the point where the regulators are running the businesses, because then you may as well not have a business. Having said that, there are certain things that can be done within the powers of the regulators.

However, that does not take away my main argument. Taxpayers' dollars are at stake. Hundreds, and in some cases thousands, of jobs are at stake. You cannot fool around with a serious problem. In particular, if you are part of an industry, you are probably aware before anyone else is that problems exist. The industry itself always hopes that some intervention will take place, not only to try to salvage what can be salvaged from a troubled company but also to try to salvage what can be salvaged in relation to the reputation of the industry. That reputation suffers every time one of these institutions goes under, whether it is a life company a bank or a trust company, or some other institution. The co-op movement and the credit unions had some difficult times some years back, and the whole industry suffered.

Certainly, when you possess a hammer, you cannot just threaten. I remember a remark by Rosenberg in connection with the Greymac, Crown Trust affair. I think he said, "I put them in their place when they came to talk to me." You see what happened. The regulators and the politicians did not have the guts to deal with the issue at an early enough time to save hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars. This is what I contend.

We are deviating from my argument somewhat. Colleagues of mine have owned small trust companies, and the regulators have gone in and said, "You are not doing things right, and we will close you down," and rightly so. However, they did not allow them the same opportunity, or deal with them with the same care that they would have shown when dealing with this bank in the 1980s. We know which bank it is. Take a look at the losses they suffered. Take a look at its capital base. You can see that it was in trouble. If it had been a small institution, it would have been closed down.

I am saying there is no level playing field, so this notion of co-insurance is nonsense. It is being perpetrated by the big banks and some other individuals who say it will cost us a lot of money and that people should take a risk. We are talking about seniors, just people; folks. The investment dealers and houses were not able to properly assess the problems that existed in companies such as Confederation Life, Royal Trust, and First City Trust. How is my mother supposed to say, "Gee, I better watch it if I put in more than $30,000; otherwise I will lose it." It is totally silly to think that an average Canadian is capable of doing that.

However, if you intend to do just that, then at least admit that the level playing field is not there, and that the major institutions will be treated differently, and rightly so. We cannot have one of the major banks fail. The country's reputation would fail along with it.

That is the argument I am trying to make; not whether they should have more or less power. It is just a mirage. It is smoke and mirrors. The institutions that are too big do not need deposit insurance. If you intend to change the rules, then you must understand that those changed rules will hurt only the smaller institutions.

Here is a committee report that has been made to the other place that says we should start on the Schedule 3 banks so that we can service the small industry. How will that Schedule 3 bank exist as a second class citizen in this industry? It is all skewed against the small businesses and in favour of the large ones.

On motion of Senator Angus, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL PROTECTED AREAS STRATEGY

INTERIM REPORT OF ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented in the Senate on November 29, 1994.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), for Senator Carney, moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DATE OF FINAL REPORT

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eighth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented in the Senate on November 29, 1994.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), for Senator Carney, moved the adoption of the report.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ROYAL CANADIAN LEGION—INQUIRY DEBATED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), calling the attention of the Senate to certain matters relating to the Royal Canadian Legion. —(Honourable Senator Berntson).

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my colleague Senator Macdonald is prepared to have this inquiry considered debated, assuming there are no other senators who wish to speak to it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, then if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

CONSTITUTIONAL IMPLICATIONS OF UNILATERAL PROVINCIAL ATTEMPT TO DECLARE SOVEREIGNTY OR SEPARATION

INQUIRY DEBATED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith calling the attention of the Senate to a letter of June 13th, 1994 from Gordon Robertson to Lise Bissonnette of Le Devoir, copies of which were sent to Le Soleil, La Presse and The Gazette, on the subject of the constitutional implications of a unilateral provincial attempt to declare sovereignty or separation.—(Honourable Senator Di Nino)

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I am a little embarrassed to admit that I adjourned this debate on behalf of one of my colleagues, but I do not remember who it was who asked me to adjourn it. Unless someone comes forth within the next day or so, I think it should be dropped from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF APPROVAL FOR VARIOUS PROJECTS— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Doyle rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, November 29, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the absence of Senate approval for various projects in the purview of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets, and Administration.

He said: Honourable senators, I am grateful for the government's provision of information in reply to a series of questions I asked in this chamber between March 15 and May 12 of this year. Although the questions asked related to various work projects being carried out in the parliamentary precincts, they were not intended to pass judgment on the worth of the undertakings. The questions dealt quite specifically with whether the Senate itself had been properly advised and whether its members were given the required opportunity to vote their approval or rejection. Those questions, I am sincerely sorry to say, remain unanswered.

I am grateful to the "government department of delayed answers" for a detailed explanation of who owns what, who may do which, and how the Minister of Public Works and the rest of us may act or interact in carrying out the good intentions of what is known as "The Long-Term Construction Project." That project, we are told, flowed from earlier studies which concluded there was something rotten in the structures which stand on the Hill.

In 1988, 12 years after the Abbott Commission reported, Treasury Board and Public Works were authorized to develop "The Plan." A draft blossomed two years later and in late 1991, it was "brought to the attention" — and those are the words used — of the Honourable Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, who was Chair of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Smelling the possibility of action, the senator replied to Public Works saying:

> The Senate is prepared to support your plan.

She was grateful that the Senate had been given "equitable consideration in your strategy," referring to Public Works, and promised that "we will do everything in our power," the "we" being the Internal Economy Committee, to assist in implementation of the plan.

It should be noted that no money was available from any source at this time to proceed with the renovation of the 1910 wing of the East Block or anything else. The delayed government answer says:

> On September 17, 1992, Public Works received approval in principle for the Long-Term Construction Project...

> ... on May 26, 1993, effective approval for the 1910 wing.

This, we presume, came from the other place.

At a March 24, 1994 meeting of the Senate Agenda and Procedures Subcommittee of the Internal Economy Committee, the Director of Parliamentary Precincts Directorate, who is from the Department of Public Works, said:

> As the accountable officer, I have indicated to my minister that if we do not repair, I will recommend that we close and seal this particular wing.

This refers to the East Block.

At this point, the government's delayed answer repeats the following portion of the minutes of the meeting:

> It was agreed that your Subcommittee concurs in the recommendation of Public Works and Government Services Canada for the use of office space in the 1910 wing.

The subcommittee report was adopted by the full committee but was neither presented nor tabled in this chamber.

Suddenly, however, the answers given to me by the government last week leaped to this conclusion:

> ...in answer to Senator Doyle's question concerning the right of the Senate and of individual Senators to have a voice in the preservation and development of Parliament Hill and the Senate precincts, the Government affirms those rights.

It goes on:

> ...the Senate, through its Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, has been kept fully informed throughout all stages of development and implementation of the Long-Term Construction Project. Again, it notes that the Senate, through its Standing Committee on Internal Economy, has approved the Long-Term Construction Project both on December 12, 1991 and March 24, 1994. Furthermore, Senators have always had the opportunity to give their views on this matter through debate held under an Inquiry. During the years that the Long-Term Construction Project was under discussion and development, any Senator could have initiated such a debate.

So sayeth the authors of the government's so-called answers — answers to questions that related only to the Senate's threadbare grasp of place in the parliamentary countenance of Canada. Questions, I might add, that after eight months of government rummaging about, remain without direct response in the litter of the excuse-making.

Government inquiries are fine things and every senator should make use of them. But I ask you, should it be necessary to make a formal inquiry to bring into play Senate approval or denial of whatever its committees or committee chairpersons may recommend?

Now, a flashback. On May 31, 1988, Senator Molgat as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Rules and Orders, presented his tenth report. The Speaker asked when it would be taken into consideration, and the chamber agreed, at the next sitting.

• (1600)

On June 2, 1988, Senator Molgat explained that the tenth report dealt with a rule change to avoid any thought that the Internal Economy Committee might not require the approval of the Senate itself for its measures. Senator Molgat said:

> The feeling was that there should be proper approval by the Senate, as there is for every other committee of the Senate, and that final decision on anything must be taken by the Senate itself.

The senators agreed. Approval must be by the Senate — not by an interdepartmental letter on strategy, and not by a committee that had no funds to spend and no details of the work at hand; certainly not by a subcommittee where three or four souls gathered beyond the eyes and ears, not only of the media, but of the Senate itself.

Honourable senators, the importance of our views, pro or con, on the long-term plan for repairs and renovations on Parliament Hill pales beside the issue of the Senate's right to be informed and to decide itself, upon the basis of facts presented, what action is appropriate for the collective. If we allow such rights to atrophy, we will have gone a great distance toward effective abolition.

Honourable senators, the "department of delayed answers," at the outset of its recently submitted statement, notes that the third of my questions dealt with a new committee room intended for the Centre Block, a part of the Public Works Department strategy that had not been debated in the Senate. I should note that Senator Hastings, that very day, did present the fourth and fifth reports of the Internal Economy Committee. Again, no mention.

What I missed on May 12 was the tabling of the committee's sixth report with a single-sentence reference to the Centre Block facility. Even that reference was not heard in the chamber. It was subsequently printed in the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate. Again, the senators were given no opportunity to vote. Tabling, after all, is for information only.

The events of May 12, insofar as the committee is concerned, have surfaced once again, this time in a memo from the Senate's Director of Services to Senator Hastings. The director says:

> As part of the long-term renovation strategy of Parliament Hill, reviewed and approved by Internal Economy on December 12, 1991, and subsequently reconfirmed by the Committee on May 12, 1994 (and reported to the Senate the same day), the construction of a new committee room in the Centre Block forms but one aspect. Public Works and Government Services Canada has seen this undertaking as an opportunity to address the long-standing problem of committee facilities. As such, I have recently been informed that the Minister of Public Works and Government Services Canada has given approval for the department to proceed with the project.
> I would therefore like to advise that the Parliamentary Precinct Directorate will be commencing with construction as early as the beginning of December. Although a firm schedule has yet to be established, I will endeavour to keep everyone informed as the dates become set.
> Should you have any questions concerning this project, do not hesitate to call my office.

Honourable senators, that memo was written on November 28, the day I gave notice of my intention to raise this matter in this chamber one last time.

I thank you for your patience, honourable senators.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: May I ask my honourable colleague a few questions?

Senator Doyle: I will do my best to answer them.

Senator Di Nino: First, I should inform honourable senators that a spirited discussion on this very matter took place today at a joint committee meeting of the Subcommittee on Agenda and Procedures and the Subcommittee on Budgets and Personnel of the Internal Economy Committee.

Perhaps we can place that item on the agenda of the full committee so that we can discuss, in particular, the rules to which the honourable senator has referred.

Honourable senators, it was obvious in our deliberations this morning that there are some rather serious differences of opinion — my colleague Senator LeBreton was with me — as to what, when and how the Internal Economy Committee should present to the senators and/or the Senate.

Perhaps I could ask two questions of the honourable senator.

I am not sure as to what extent Senator Doyle thinks the chamber should be involved in the making of decisions respecting the expenditure of funds or other activities that affect the Senate or senators. In particular, once a budget has been approved and has gone through the necessary steps, should components of that particular document, which should contain most of the items, be discussed or is it the whole document that you think should be discussed? I ask for some direction on this matter.

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, I think I can say it is not particularly or always the amount of money involved. People arrived here one day last summer to find the post office no longer functioning. No notice had been given that the post office was being taken away and moved to a place where it had never been before.

I remember one member of the committee a couple of years ago saying, "Don't ever let them move the post office." He is now Governor General and has no opinion on these matters.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Doyle: I think there is a sense of feeling that when you are changing something that senators are used to, when it is something of value, when it is something that affects the way we function, then it is not untoward to follow what Senator Molgat suggested some years ago. If we do not like Senator Molgat's ruling, we could appeal it to the Speaker.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Di Nino: Obviously, Senator Doyle and I have had some discussions about this matter, and its interpretation will have to be left to the members of the Internal Economy Committee. I agree with the honourable senator when he says that we must do a better job. In fact, earlier someone showed me an article printed in one of today's papers where I said that very thing in public. We will undertake to do a better job.

I have a great deal of respect for my colleague Senator Doyle, and my next comment should be taken not on the substance of his presentation nor the style of the presentation itself: I believe the honourable senator said that there was something rotten in the structures that stand on the Hill. I think those were his words. Was the honourable senator referring to physical structures or human structures?

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, you know that I would never comment on a colleague.

The Public Works Department has told us what is wrong with the East Block — it is falling down; it is being carted away by the termites; it is being taken away by the ant flies. It is really under constant seige and has been ever since it was last restored back in 1967.

I hope there will not be any last question. I do not think I am looking for anything other than that when the carpet is to be renewed, I will not find out about it by reading The Ottawa Citizen and then have to say, "Is that not an interesting turn of events?"

Most people here like to be informed. They may not want to jump up and down about it. They are not demanding longer reports from committee chairmen. However, they are asking to be plugged in.

I thank Senator Di Nino for his understanding and help in writing this little script.

Senator Di Nino: I am actually disappointed that I threw him a line like that as a straight man, and he did not take advantage of it.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the matter Senator Doyle has raised is of considerable importance. I am not talking specifically about the buildings and the proposed modifications. I am asking about the powers of the Internal Economy Committee.

Does the honourable senator know if there is a code or list which sets forth the particular matters on which the Senate has authorized the Internal Economy Committee to make definitive decisions? Alternatively, does the committee play it by ear? In a case such as the carpet to which Senator Doyle has made reference, or the committee room question, does the committee decide, "Well, our colleagues are too busy to deal with lowly matters such as that." Is there some way in which a member of that committee can ascertain what the Senate has authorized the committee to decide definitively?

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, the committee is authorized, — and I am paraphrasing here — subject to subsection 19.1(4) of the Parliament of Canada Act, to act on all financial and administrative matters respecting the Senate, its premises, its services, its staff and the members of the Senate. Those are very broad provisions.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Where are they to be found, senator?

Senator Doyle: I am quoting the authors of the delayed answer to my oral question as reported in the Debates of the Senate at page 973. That was part of the preamble. They are quoting subsection 19.1(4) of the Parliament of Canada Act.

Senator Murray: The Internal Economy Committee of the Senate dealt with it under the Parliament of Canada Act; is that what we are being told?

Senator Doyle: They also referred to the Financial Administration Act. I am quite willing to check that reference for honourable senators.

However, as broad and sweeping as that may seem, if I had been phrasing it I would have said that the committee is empowered to recommend in those areas. While the committee does not need to recommend that we purchase a pound of nails, it should explain when it intends to change practices which have been accepted in another form for some considerable time.

Senator Stewart: I thank Senator Doyle.

On motion of Senator Di Nino, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 6, 1994, at 2 p.m.

THE HONOURABLE LUCIEN BOUCHARD

BEST WISHES ON RECOVERY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I make my statement, I want to first take the opportunity in this chamber to note the dreadful ordeal which was suffered last week by a fellow parliamentarian, the Honourable Lucien Bouchard. I believe all members of this house would wish to join with me in sending our prayers and our good wishes to him, his wife, Audrey, and his two small sons for a successful and speedy recovery.

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBERANCE

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF TRAGEDY AT L'ÉCOLE POLYTECHNIQUE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we did not choose December 6 as the day to discuss violence against women in Canada. Instead, five years ago, at l'École Polytechnique in Montreal, a deeply disturbed individual who hated women took a semi-automatic weapon and shot 27 people, killing 14 female students before committing suicide.

We will not forget the 14 young lives which ended on that day. Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne-Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Marie Klueznik, Maryse Laganière, Maryse Leclair, Anne-Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michèle Richard, Annie St-Arneault and Annie Turcotte. We also remember the families and the friends of these women who have suffered, and continue to suffer, the anguish of that brutal act.

Today, we pause again to remind ourselves that women are being victimized daily by violence in many forms: mental, physical and sexual. Statistics Canada reports that 51 per cent of all Canadian women have experienced at least one incident of violence by a man in their adult lives, most of them in their own homes, and by men they know. In 1993 alone, 63 women were killed by their present or former partners. It is estimated that less than one-third of all incidents of violence are even reported.

While it is impossible to point to a single cause for all of this violence, the easy availability of guns has long been seen as a major factor. A woman is shot to death every six days in Canada. In the vast majority of these cases, a legally owned firearm has been used.

Last week, the Minister of Justice released a comprehensive gun control program, to be followed by legislation in the new year. That program includes increased sentences for the use of firearms in a range of crimes, provisions to deal with gun smuggling, a new national registration system, and a ban on several types of firearms, including the Ruger Mini-14 assault rifle used in the Montreal murders.

The government is also taking action on other forms of violence against women, including Bill C-41 to deal with breaches of trust, particularly in relationships between doctors and female patients. That bill also provides for harsher penalties in hate crimes against women and others; Bill C-42 will make peace bonds more effective in order to protect victims of domestic violence. We are also developing a legislative response to deal with the so-called "drunk defence" in rape cases. Our colleague Senator Gigantès presently has a private bill before this house to begin the parliamentary debate on that issue.

These measures are necessary, and they are being pursued vigorously. However, women and men across the country are also working together to ensure that this is no longer a silent issue. Together, honourable colleagues, we must attack the economic and social problems which foster the fear and the insecurity, and indeed the ignorance, which in turn breeds the anger and the hatred that promotes violence like the tragedy at l'École Polytechnique.

Legislators can, and must, pass laws to stop violence. Each of us must use our positions in public life to send a clear and unequivocal message that we cannot and will not tolerate acts of violence and terrorism against innocent women, and indeed against anyone in our society.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, on this National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women, we honour the memory of those young engineering students and we remember their families.

Had it not been for this terrible act of violence, these fourteen young women would by now have finished their studies and be leading active and happy lives. Their future must be replaced by our collective memory, and their untimely deaths transformed into the recognition by all Canadians, but particularly by our political leaders, our judges, our police officers and our educators, that we have the responsibility to ensure that women can live their lives in greater safety.

[English]

Much has occurred since December 6, 1989. In the wake of that day, the Canadian panel on violence against women was convened to enquire into the problem of violence against women and to propose solutions. The report of that panel, handed down a little more than a year ago, contained hundreds of recommendations.

Weeks later, Statistics Canada released the results of its first national survey on male violence against women, the first survey of its kind anywhere in the world, and one which lifted the veil of secrecy surrounding criminal offences against women.

Late last year, with Health Canada's support, the London Family Court Clinic launched ASAP nationwide, a school-based anti-violence program. Manuals and videos are now in the hands of thousands of school boards, principals and teachers to help them put in place violence prevention programs.

Elsewhere, the Royal Newfoundland Constabulary began training sessions for its officers; the Canadians Teachers Federation distributed booklets; the Ontario Medical Association began to educate its doctors; federal and provincial governments funded a series of conferences for judges. At the first conference in 1992, the judges ate lunch in a shelter for battered women.

Last week, the government moved to establish stricter gun controls — a sensible legislative initiative which merits our congratulations and support.

Five years ago many, if not most, Canadians were tempted to view the stunning display of violence in Montreal as the random act of a madman. We now see that it was a dramatic end-point on a continuum of acts of violence that have been experienced by one in every two Canadian women. The slaughter at L'École Polytechnique has awakened many Canadians from deep denial. We now see that violence against women in Canadian society is a pernicious epidemic and societally rooted. Although measures have been introduced to curb violence since that day, an impact has not yet been felt, as the families of the Montreal victims have pointed out.

The Canadian panel proposed a national action plan based on zero tolerance of violence, and called on government to respond within three months of its final report. There is still no formal response, although it has been promised.

The Justice Minister has also listened to the legitimate outrage when our high court and, subsequently, lower courts, heard cases of unconscionable violence against women and allowed the defence of extreme drunkenness. No action has yet been taken, although it is promised.

In this morning's Globe and Mail, Michael Valpy quotes Dr. Paul Steinhauer, a psychiatrist at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, in his testimony before the parliamentary committee examining the reform of social programs. Dr. Steinhauer testified to widespread developmental failure in Canada, school drop-out rates, psychiatric disorders, suicide, rates of youth crime and violence, and the effects of child poverty. He made the crucial connection that the quality of caring that children receive in the first few years of life is the most important single factor contributing to their subsequent cognitive, emotional and social development. He posed the question as to whether Canadians should create institutions to enhance conditions that would allow children to get a good start in life, or whether we should continue to pay later for the consequences of developmental failure.

Marc Lépine was the product of a mother-battered and child-battered family. On the anniversary of the Montreal massacre that he committed, we cannot lose sight of the need to support social institutions that can prevent the type of conditions that produce the Marc Lépines.

MEDIA HANDLING OF NEWS OF ILLNESS OF THE HONOURABLE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few comments about the way in which some members of the media handled the news of Lucien Bouchard's illness last weekend.

At the outset, I wish to say that I do not pretend to speak for anyone. This is my opinion, assisted by a few dozen phone calls that I received from Alberta as a result of what was happening.

I am told that several commentators and interviewers had a few things to say about Mr. Bouchard's political future. I did not see them all. However, I did see the CBC's Prime Time News Magazine last Friday night, hosted by Pamela Wallin. Quite frankly, I was appalled. I was ashamed and embarrassed. Mostly, I was disgusted by the insensitivity and lack of human decency that was displayed while Mr. Bouchard was lying in hospital, fighting for his life. There were persistent comments made about his political future and the future of sovereignty.

I do not know what the political ramifications of this business may be. I know that when Mr. Parizeau went to the hospital, he did not get in to see Mr. Bouchard. He was asked about the future of sovereignty and all that. He said, "While Mr. Bouchard is fighting for his life, I will not make any comment. There will come a time to make a comment, but it is not now when his family, his wife and children are listening."

I hold no brief for Mr. Bouchard's political objectives. However, it is a fact that he and I are both members of the human race. In my view, he and his family have the right to be treated with dignity and respect.

The CBC paid for this program out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, from which it receives $1.2 billion annually. I am disgusted. What can we do? I do not know what we can do. I know that, in the past, when a politician disagreed with their programming, they would say, "The public has a right to know, and it is our obligation to find out and let them know." That argument cannot be made in this case.

I do not know what we can do. What I do know is that a lot of people in my part of Canada were just as disgusted as I was while watching this program. If I had some control over the CBC, I would cut its budget by a couple of hundred million dollars. Frankly, I do not want the federal treasury to be paying for this kind of programming.

BEST WISHES FOR A SPEEDY RECOVERY

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, certain events transcend political differences, rivalry and philosophies. The struggle for his life that Lucien Bouchard has been waging these past few days is such an event. The remarkable determination and energy with which he is fighting this cruel disease denote great courage. Our hearts go out to him, his family and staff.

A word should be said about the excellent work of the medical team assigned to Mr. Bouchard. Doctor D'Amico and his colleagues have performed a minor miracle and we offer them our congratulation.

Canada is a great democracy. The coming year will be particularly important. We have a major political and constitutional issue to debate. The people of Quebec, who are part of this great democracy, have a decision to make. The debate will resume in due time, with all the major players in place. Lucien Bouchard must be one of them.

I would like to end by wishing Mr. Bouchard, the Leader of the Official Opposition in the Canadian Parliament, a speedy and full recovery. We are looking forward to having him back among us.

I also endorse the remarks made by Senator Joyce Fairbairn, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, on the anniversary of the terrible tragedy at l'École Polytechnique in Montreal. We will certainly have to change our criminal law so that such tragedies can never happen again.

NATIONAL DAY OF REMEMBRANCE

ANNIVERSARY OF TRAGEDY AT L'ÉCOLE POLYTECHNIQUE

Hon. Lise Bacon: Honourable senators, on this sad anniversary I would like to pay tribute to the memory of the fourteen victims of the massacre at l'École Polytechnique in Montreal and express my sympathy to their families.

I also suggest that we take this opportunity to consider the omnipresent phenomenon of violence in our society and especially violence against women.

These young engineering students, cut down in the flower of their youth, represented the future, our future and the future of this country. A brutal and senseless massacre put an abrupt end to the hopes and dreams we shared for their future.

This terrible tragedy helped to focus public concern on the kind of violence that so far had remained hidden behind closed doors.

It is troubling to know that since the École Polytechnique massacre, nearly 500 women in Canada have been murdered by their spouses or ex-spouses. Last year, 75 per cent of such women were killed in a private home, usually their own. Most of these women were between the ages of 18 and 40. On this national day of remembrance, we must ask ourselves about the reasons for this phenomenon. There are probably no simple answers. However, for the sake of the women in this country, we must try to understand and, above all, eliminate acts of aggression against women. Otherwise, we will have failed in our task if we cannot offer them the prospect of a generous society where they can develop their full potential.

As the Prime Minister of Canada said in a speech he gave last Thursday before the French Senate, and I quote:

> We have managed to build in Canada a society that is pluralistic and fair, based on openness, tolerance, generosity and sharing.

If we do not try to put an end to this pervasive violence, we will undermine those foundations of our society. That is why our schools must teach young people respect for others, tolerance and fairness.

I hope that today Canadians will stop for a moment and consider what they can do to stop the progression of violence in any form, especially violence against women. We must never forget that tragic moment on December 6, 1989. We must continue the fight against violence in our society, and we must act now.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) AND (C)—
REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which deals with the Supplementary Estimates (B) and (C), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate, Appendix, p. 623.)

On motion of Senator Doody, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 7, 1994, at 1:30 p.m.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, we will be sitting at 1:30 p.m. tomorrow in order to give committees more time to conduct their business. I also wish to inform honourable senators that tomorrow at the same time, I will have more information about further sittings of the Senate and when we hope to adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO PERMIT ELECTRONIC COVERAGE OF MEETING

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), moved:

> That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public meeting on Wednesday, December 7, 1994, for the purpose of hearing the Honourable John Manley, P.C., the Minister of Industry, with the least possible disruption of the hearing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CELEBRATION OF CHRISTMAS IN CANADA

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, December 8, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the way in which Canadians are being encouraged to celebrate Christmas.

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM— REQUEST FOR IMPACT ANALYSIS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that a large number of manufacturers and producers in Atlantic Canada rely on markets in Central and Western Canada for a major proportion of their sales — an Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission survey shows that two-thirds of firms selling to central or western markets are dependent on those markets for more than 25 per cent of their total sales — and in view of reports that the federal government is considering cutting or eliminating the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program which is essential, especially on the westbound traffic from the Atlantic region, to providing a reasonably level playing field to Atlantic Canada businesses that export from the region and employ a large number of people; and, in particular, in view of Transport Canada's report that the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program is abused, will the Leader of the Government make representations to her cabinet colleague the Minister of Transport urging that an impact analysis of the importance of the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Program to the region's manufacturers and producers be undertaken, and, further, that the analysis involve direct consultation with stakeholders so that, together, government and stakeholders may develop ways to improve the program, not devastate it; a program which is vital to the Atlantic region in terms of jobs and prosperity?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Robertson for her question. Her comments are far more eloquent than I could convey, so I will ensure that the minister receives a transcript of what has been said here today.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT— IMPLICATIONS OF ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, as Senator Olson stated earlier this afternoon, I have great concern with respect to some of the material I read in the media and whether or not to believe what I read.

• (1430)

In the past few days, The Globe and Mail has run a series of articles in which there have been suggestions that our Prime Minister, as a lawyer in private life, gave legal advice when sought in relation to the privatization of the Pearson airport. I should like to provide an opportunity to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate to advise us whether or not it is true that the Honourable Mr. Chrétien did, at that time, give legal advice in that regard.

Further, in order to clear the air of these allegations, I should also appreciate an early response from the Leader of the Government to the following questions: Was Mr. Chrétien, or any member of his law firm, retained by any person representing the Matthews Group Ltd., in relation to the privatization of Pearson airport? If so, at what dates was his firm acting in these matters?

During the 1993 election campaign, did Mr. Chrétien call for the termination of the Pearson airport agreements?

Did Mr. Chrétien absent himself from cabinet discussions relating to the privatization of Pearson airport?

Did Mr. Chrétien vote on Bill C-22 at any stage in the House?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Ghitter for his questions. He knows that the Prime Minister is out of the country at the moment and will be for the remainder of this week. I will transmit your questions to the appropriate source and obtain answers to them as quickly as I can.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary, if I may. Were Mr. Chrétien's legal fees to the consortium among those costs that were allowed by the government, or did the government consider them to be worthless?

Senator Fairbairn: I will certainly take note of my friend's question and transmit it, too.

REVENUE CANADA

AMOUNT OF EXPORT TAX PAID BY TOBACCO MANUFACTURERS—NET LOSSES TO FEDERAL TREASURY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, when the government announced its plan to curb the smuggling of tobacco products, one portion of that strategy was the immediate imposition of an $8 per carton export tax on Canadian tobacco products.

I am led to believe that, eight months after the announcement of that strategy, spokesmen for the major tobacco manufacturers have admitted that they have not paid a cent in export taxes. They have paid nothing, because Bill C-32 gave them three ways to avoid doing so: They do not need to pay $8 per carton for cigarettes destined to duty-free shops; they do not need to pay if the volume exported is below 3 per cent of total production; they can claim reimbursement simply by paying tobacco taxes levied in the country to which they export their products. In the United States, the tax is not $8 a carton but $2.40 a carton. Of course, no manufacturer would choose to pay the higher amount.

As we are approaching the ten-month point in the government's plan, has there been any export tax paid by the tobacco manufacturers? If so, what is the total of that tax? What is the current estimate of net losses to the federal treasury this fiscal year and next as a result of the three tax initiatives?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Spivak, I have taken note of your questions, and I will pass them on and obtain an answer for you.

SPLIT LAKE CREE FIRST NATION FLOODED LAND BILL

Hon. Sharon Carstairs moved the third reading of Bill C-36, respecting the Split Lake Cree First Nation and the settlement of matters arising from an agreement relating to the flooding of land.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Austin moved the second reading of Bill C-57, to implement the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization.

He said: Honourable senators, the legislation now before us represents one of the most significant steps for Canada in its role in world trade, as well as one of the weightiest. As to the latter category, the Final Act, as the agreement which was achieved on April 15 in Marrakesh is called, with its schedules and attachments, amounts to over 22,000 pages and could only be lifted in one fell swoop by Superman. The Final Act has been in the making ever since the conclusion of the Tokyo Round of trade rule adjustments, which took effect in 1979.

In 1982, Senator Allan MacEachen, in his role of Secretary of State for External Affairs, presided over a ministerial meeting designed to examine how to proceed with a new round of trade liberalization. We also have in the Senate two colleagues who served as international trade ministers: Senator James Kelleher and Senator Pat Carney. They were active participants in the process that, after 12 years of negotiation, has delivered up a successful conclusion of what has become known as the Uruguay Round, named after the successful 1986 meeting in Punta del Este, Uruguay, which decided to proceed with the new GATT trade development negotiations.

There are many ways to understand the Final Act and its global impact. It represents the largest tax cut ever, because it will cut global tariffs which are, in substance, taxes. It should improve world living standards by making goods and services cheaper for the consumer. In geopolitical terms, it may help to ward off the battle between the North and the South, the developed countries and the developing countries, by giving market access to newly emerging economies whose sole advantage is often their cost of labour to manufacture low-technology goods.

GATT officials calculate that when the agreement is fully implemented in the year 2005 — there is a ten-year phasing-in period for many countries and in certain sectors — the world economy will have been boosted by more than $500 billion U.S. annually, or by some 2 per cent of world GNP. The Department of Finance has estimated that Canada will see quantifiable gains of at least 0.4 per cent in real income, or $3 billion annually, when the agreement is fully phased in. These quantifiable gains will only be a fraction of the actual gains that will almost certainly occur.

In the briefest summary, the Final Act implements the lowest trade barriers ever. Tariffs are removed on a wide variety of unprocessed and value-added products. The average level on tariffs that remain is reduced to about one-third. Non-tariff barriers such as import quotas are banned. Agricultural trade wars should decline as government subsidies for agricultural production are controlled. Trade in services will be brought under regulation for the first time. The present GATT agreements will be subsumed into what will now be designated as the World Trade Organization. The WTO will be a permanent organization with powers to adjudicate trade disputes, and with the right to permit countries to take trade measures against other countries found to be in breach of WTO rules.

Bill C-57, the legislation before us today, provides for the necessary changes in Canada's domestic law to ensure the implementation of the Final Act of April 15, 1994 to which Canada is a signatory. The Final Act, by its terms, is to come into force by January 1, 1995. The government seeks passage of this legislation at this time to permit Canada to be a charter member of the WTO on January 1, 1995. Honourable senators will know that the world's major trading powers, including the United States, Japan and the European Community members, have already approved the WTO agreement and will be bound by its measures as of January 1, 1995.

Apart from amending Canada's existing laws and tariff schedules to bring them into conformity with our obligations under the Final Act, Bill C-57 provides for the appointment of representatives to the World Trade Organization and for the payment of Canada's share of its budget.

The Liberal Party made clear before taking office that it was a strong supporter of the multilateral trade process and that it would support the GATT and success of the Uruguay Round as the keystone of Canada's trade policy. In office, we focussed our efforts to break the deadlock in the Uruguay Round and to build the permanent World Trade Organization. Amongst the industrialized countries, Canada is second only to Germany in its dependence on world trade to maintain its standard of living. Some 30 per cent of our GDP is export dependent. By creating a more open and stable trading environment, the WTO agreement will generate increased Canadian exports and investments. Exports are crucial to the achievement of the government's job and growth agenda and to Canada's continuing prosperity. The successful conclusion of the WTO agreement is already having a positive effect in Canada and elsewhere through improving confidence in the world economy.

The Marrakesh World Trade Deal of April 1994 involves approximately 40 separate agreements collectively amounting to the greatest commercial agreement ever negotiated on a universal basis. The centerpiece of the new trade regime is the World Trade Organization. The WTO will provide the organizational framework within which the members will pursue rights and obligations contained in three main agreements; the amended GATT, a new general agreement on trade and services, and a new agreement on trade-related intellectual property rights, or TRIPS. The old GATT agreement and its revisions over approximately 47 years are now a part of the new WTO regime. Codes and schedules of the GATT period have been reviewed and revised, sometimes radically.

On the thorny issue of agriculture, a detailed agreement has been worked out involving tarrification of all border measures, minimum access commitments, reductions in export and production subsidies, and real discipline in domestic support measures.

The Final Act is to enter into force on an all-or-nothing basis with the exception of four plurilateral agreements; procurement, aircraft, dairy products and bovine meat products. Signature on the Final Act means acceptance of all the agreements.

From a trade policy perspective, the great area of success is in the development in international rule-making. The creation of a permanent trade policy review mechanism, or TPRM, will provide a basis for the design and implementation of a more ambitious set of rights and obligations based on the terms of the Final Act. Definitions of rules of origin, customs valuation, government procurement obligations and many more will add security to trade practices. There appears to be a genuine transition to a more law-like and less political approach to dispute settlement. What has been achieved is the revitalization of the multilateral trade system based on the principles of nondiscrimination, transparency, due process, consultation and cooperation.

Clearly the WTO agreement has not stemmed interest in the value of regional arrangements. However, it has channelled their development and provided a greater likelihood that regional agreements will be, in effect, negotiating rounds for the further development of the multilateral process. NAFTA, for example, may well be a role model for extending serious obligations in the trade field to developing countries around the world, beginning with the countries of Latin America. It is to be hoped that regionalization will provide a stimulus and forerunner to deeper and broader global integration, rather than a prelude to the developments of inward-looking trading blocs.

Although this agreement covers a wide array of issues affecting international trade relations, three areas stand out, both as a result of the leadership role Canada played in promoting progress and consensus and as a result of these elements representing for us the most important and beneficial achievements of the round. I refer to the market access package, to the agreement on subsidies and countervailing duties which grew out of the Canadian draft, and to the agreement to establish a new institution in the World Trade Organization with a greatly strengthened and integrated dispute settlement system.

The creation of the World Trade Organization is largely the result of a joint initiative by Canada and the European Union. Under the Uruguay Round Agreement, access to markets for industrial products will be substantially improved with most tariffs being cut by at least one-third. Deeper cuts, including zero tariffs in some ten sectors, will also be made. Overall, Canadian exports to the European Union will benefit from tariff reductions of almost 60 per cent. Tariffs on our exports to Japan will be reduced by about 70 per cent. The impact of tariff escalation will be reduced as well. For example, the gaps between tariffs on finished products and raw materials will fall by as much as two-thirds for products of importance to Canada, such as copper, lead, zinc and other non-ferrous metals.

A major achievement of the Uruguay Round is that the agricultural sector is brought under the rules-based multilateral regime. Agricultural tariffs will be cut overall by 36 per cent with domestic support measures to be reduced by 20 per cent and export subsidies by 36 per cent in terms of budgetary expenditures over a six-year period. This represents a significant gain for our agricultural exporters. More generally, the agricultural reforms will contribute to improved efficiency in the world economy, providing a good start for future disciplines, particularly on agricultural export subsidies.

For the first time, trade in services and trade related intellectual property are brought within the framework of multilateral disciplines. The agreement on services covers trade and investment worth approximately $2 trillion annually and will promote continuing liberalization in these sectors. Multilateral rules on intellectual property will provide a stronger basis for the development and transfer of technology. Agreements in areas as diverse as rules of origin, import licensing and pre-shipment inspection will improve conditions for all international traders.

The agreement strengthens trade remedy rules, thereby realizing one of Canada's priority objectives heading into the round. The agreement defines the concept of subsidy for the first time in a multilateral trade agreement. Further, it sets out criteria exempting certain subsidies for regional development, research and development and the environment from countervailling measures.

In this era of fiscal constraint, Canada will benefit from the strengthening of multilateral disciplines on subsidies that can have such adverse effects on our competitive position in both the domestic and foreign markets.

Although the agreement does contain some improvements with respect to antidumping measures, we shall have to go further to ensure that such measures are not used as an instrument for continuing protectionism.

The agreement effectively precludes unilateral measures in responding to trade disputes. The new integrated dispute settlement system — one with clearer rules, tighter deadlines and, for the first time, an appeal process and binding effect — is a major improvement over the existing GATT system. In the final analysis, rules are only as effective as the means of enforcing them. This wholesale reform of the multilateral trade dispute settlement system therefore represents an important, if unquantifiable, benefit for small- and middle-sized players like Canada, which are inherently vulnerable to the threat of unilateralism by the economic giants.

The crowning achievement of the Uruguay Round is the creation of the new World Trade Organization. Such an organization is indispensable in overseeing the operation of the complex series of agreements and other instruments resulting from the round. It will also provide for greater political surveillance of the system by trade ministers in coming years.

The World Trade Organization will finally put international trade on a firm institutional footing by becoming the third pillar of the world's commerce and financial structure, along with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. As the successor to GATT, the World Trade Organization will provide the forum for future trade negotiations aimed at further trade liberalization worldwide and the development of new global rules.

As an aside, honourable senators will know that the 1947 agreements that set up trade rules under GATT also sought to create an international trade organization to supervise the application of those rules. Largely due to the objections of the United States, the ITO was not approved. I did my doctoral thesis at the University of California, Berkeley on the ITO and the attempt of the world community to create a judicial system for world trade dispute settlement. I little thought that there would be such an achievement and the beginning of a rule of law in international trade disputes.

Honourable senators, all parts of Canada and most sectors of our economy will reap substantial benefits from the Uruguay Round agreements. The business and agricultural communities, as well as the provinces, were closely consulted throughout the course of these negotiations. It is in no small part due to their contributions that these agreements will provide real tangible benefits for Canadian producers and consumers in all regions.

The elimination of tariffs on paper and allied products and lower tariffs on lumber will substantially improve access to the European Union and Japanese markets for our forest product industry, particularly in British Columbia, Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

The reduction in tariffs and non-tariff barriers in Europe, Japan and Korea, although more limited than we would have wished, enhance the export competitiveness of the fish products industry in Atlantic Canada and British Columbia.

The agreement will produce a more market-oriented and global trading environment for our agricultural sector. Reductions in export subsidies and in the volume of subsidized exports will put our field crops, particularly grains and oilseeds from the prairies, on a more equal footing with those of our principal competitors.

At the same time, supply management will be able to continue operating as an effective Canadian approach to producing and marketing dairy and poultry products. The agreement allows for the continuation of supply management systems through high import tariffs that will maintain a real security for these sectors.

New rules and disciplines on sanitary and phyto-sanitary measures will improve prospects for exports of many Canadian agricultural and forest products.

The reduction and harmonization at lower rates of tariffs for chemicals and chemical products will improve access to world markets, especially in Asia and Latin America, for our producers concentrated in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario and Quebec.

Sectoral free trade for pharmaceuticals will result in lower import costs and improved market access, and will enhance exports to offshore markets particularly from Quebec and Ontario.

Improved protection for intellectual property will enhance prospects for investment and for research and development.

The Canadian communications and electronic equipment industries concentrated in Quebec and Ontario will benefit from the substantial reduction of tariffs in important industrialized markets. Software and computer services exports will be facilitated by the agreements on services and trade-related intellectual property.

Canada has many strengths in the services sector that will benefit from increased global market opportunities brought about by the new General Agreement on Trade and Services, or GATS. Services in which Canada is competitive internationally include various professional and management consulting services, technical testing, financial, computer and environmental services, telecommunications, air transport, tourism, commercial education and training, health-related services, geomatics, maintenance and repair, and services incidental to agriculture, mining, forestry, energy and manufacturing.

Increased clarity and discipline in the use of multilateral trade rules, particularly countervailing duties, as well as more effective dispute settlement mechanisms, will provide greater security of access for Canadian products in many markets. Canadian products that have in the past suffered harassment from countervail actions, and which can expect more secure access as a result of the agreement, include lumber, fish, pork and magnesium.

In addition, new rules on subsidies provide for the possibility of taking action against subsidized products that displace Canadian products in foreign markets, including those of the subsidizing country. These provisions could be of benefit to Canadian manufacturers of civil aircraft and ground transportation equipment, steel and steel products and other sectors that have been heavily subsidized by foreign governments.

As a country that stands to benefit greatly from these agreements, Canada has insisted that our principal partners fully implement their Uruguay Round obligations by legislating them into their domestic law. We have paid particular attention to the U.S. implementing legislation. The government has been in frequent touch with the U.S. authorities at the highest level to urge them to ensure that U.S. legislation faithfully reflects the international agreements. We are satisfied that the United States legislation adopted by Congress on December 1, while not absolutely perfect, does substantially implement the Uruguay Round of agreements.

The government has also reviewed the European Union and Japanese implementing bills and has made representations to the European Union on certain detailed provisions of its legislation. We are satisfied that the EU and Japanese legislation substantially implements their obligations.

At this point in time, some 40 countries have completed the domestic legal procedures necessary to ratify and implement the WTO agreement. The director general of the GATT estimates that some 70 governments, including all of Canada's principal trading partners, will have completed their legislative procedures in time to bring the agreements into force and to establish the new World Trade Organization on January 1. It is important that Canada play its part and give a clear signal to the world community that we intend to complete our domestic procedures and implement these agreements into Canadian law in time for the January 1 start-up.

Honourable senators will note that Part III of the bill provides that the Governor in Council will bring this bill into force only when satisfied that the WTO agreement is in force. Of course, the WTO will enter into force only after all the important trading countries have adopted the necessary implementing legislation.

Canadians understand that our domestic market is too small to generate alone the level of prosperity we enjoy. It behooves Canada to make a contribution to the functioning of the international trading system proportionate to our interest in the system itself. That is why Canada played a key role in the negotiations that led to the agreement to establish the World Trade Organization; and that is why we are now playing a leadership role in the complex, detailed, preparatory work required to get the WTO up and running.

We are committed to completing, as soon as possible, the unfinished work of the Uruguay Round in such areas as government procurement and financial and telecommunications services. We are also committed to beginning work on the new generation of trade policy issues, including such matters as the relationship of international trade to the environment, competition policy investments and labour standards. We intend to help shape the agenda and basic concepts at an early stage so that future negotiations will advance Canadian interests.

Canada's economic strength now and in the future will depend fundamentally on our willingness to stay on the leading edge of free trade, to take an active and creative role in forging new relationships and in building new structures that, over time, can extend the reach of a rules-based international order. The multilateral system centred on the World Trade Organization will be the foundation of that international order, but it is not the only element of what is, and must be, a complex and constantly evolving order.

Canada cannot wait for the international community to provide the institutions and mechanisms that will ensure our economic security. Multilateralism, while remaining our first option, cannot remain our only option. For Canada, this means taking a yet more active and creative role in forging new relationships and in building new structures that, over time, can extend the reach of rules-based trade.

The original justification for the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the subsequent trilateral agreement with Mexico was really just that: to push forward in areas where our degree of economic integration seemed to call for a deeper, more comprehensive, more expeditious regime of rules and procedures than the GATT could provide. It is Canada's goal to extend this deeper free trade relationship throughout the hemisphere and beyond, beginning with negotiations on Chile's accession to the NAFTA.

Although the negotiation and implementation of the NAFTA has forced Canada's attention in recent years southward to the rest of this hemisphere, we must also begin to explore new means of expanding our trade relations eastward across the Atlantic to Europe, and westward across the Pacific to Asia. As you know, the government has made the expansion of Canadian involvement in Asia-Pacific trade and investment a top priority, and we have backed up that commitment with concrete and continuing action.

Our motivation is clear: Last year, Canada exported $16.5 billion worth of goods across the Pacific, and our imports amounted to $21.5 billion. We have enjoyed a growing trade and investment relationship with many Asia-Pacific countries. However, we know that, overall, Canada's level of commerce has not kept pace with the growth of a region that will, by the year 2000, account for 50 per cent of global production and 40 per cent of global consumption.

What has held us back? Part of the problem is undoubtedly related to our proximity to, and success in, the huge U.S. market. It is the single biggest, richest market in the world, with similar laws, customs and tastes. However, in a globalized economy in which competitive challenges and opportunities are global in nature, Canadian firms cannot afford to overlook the Asia-Pacific market, home of half of the world's people.

The government is keenly aware that Canada's full participation in Asia-Pacific markets has suffered as a result of tariff and non-tariff barriers, discriminatory practices and standards, and obscure rules and customs. Canada is working hard, both through the GATT and through the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, or APEC, to tackle and progressively eliminate all these barriers. To this end, the APEC leaders, including Prime Minister Chrétien, agreed at their summit meeting last month in Indonesia to announce their commitment to complete the achievement of the goal of free and open trade among Asia-Pacific countries no later than the year 2020. They also agreed that the pace of implementation will take into account the differing levels of economic development among APEC economies, with the industrialized economies achieving the goal of free and open trade and investment no later than the year 2010.

The APEC leaders emphasized their strong opposition to the creation of an inward-looking trading block that would divert from the pursuit of global free trade. They agreed to pursue free and open trade and investment in the Asia-Pacific region in a manner that will encourage and strengthen trade and investment globalization in the world as a whole.

The leaders also noted the significant contribution APEC made in bringing about the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round, and agreed to carry out their Uruguay Round commitments fully and without delay.

Honourable senators, the government is committed not only to changing the international rules and regulating trade but also to helping our business community take advantage of the market-opening opportunities that these rules provide. One element is the "Trade Team Canada" approach to international business development which the Minister of International Trade is developing at the direction of First Ministers. The advantages of this approach were demonstrated by the signing of contracts worth potentially $8 billion in China and over $100 million in Vietnam when the Prime Minister led a team of nine provincial premiers and some 375 business leaders to Asia last month. As an active participant both in the preparations for this mission and in the mission itself, I can assure the Senate that the achievements of the mission are real. The government intends, when appropriate, to use a similar approach in other regions, adapted, of course, to the local political and commercial environment.

The implementation of the GATT Uruguay Round agreements by the world trading community will begin a whole new set of negotiations to advance the terms of reference of world trade. The Uruguay Round has taken 12 years from start to finish, and the new round which now begins in innumerable conversations, bilateral sessions and multilateral fora, will probably take as long or even longer.

As I have said, the present Uruguay Round agreements moved the trading world forward in many fields, particularly the protection of intellectual property rights, the gradual reduction of tariffs on agricultural products, definitions of many terms for trade remedy rules, limitation on antidumping laws as protectionist devices, and a dispute settlement system with some teeth.

A more sophisticated understanding of the nature of trade practices and their economic roles is now creating an entirely new set of issues: Questions relating to labour conditions, environmental standards, human rights, and the economic costs and benefits attributed to domestic policies, when added as a factor of cost in international trade, will open new dialogue and many unheard-of new arguments. We saw the emergence of some of these issues in the development of the North American Free Trade Agreement with the preparation of side letters to define these issues. Trinational bodies to deal with environmental and labour issues have already been established under NAFTA.

Many issues were raised by various of the parties but left out of the Marrakesh agreements. The United States pressed the movement of cultural products such as movies across national boundaries, and the opening of markets to financial service companies. These matters will be the subject of renewed pressure, and Canada may again find itself on the defensive.

Canadians will also take the offensive to try to develop new standards as a basis for world trade. We may seek to reduce world environmental pollution by refusing to import goods from countries that pollute the environment, or reduce volumes of trade with countries that fail to adhere to international environmental standards. We may become as concerned about goods produced by child or prison labour, or by countries whose domestic distribution of wealth we see as exploitive of its labour force. We may even press the world community to permit the World Trade Organization to levy a tax on international trade in order to create a fund to improve the environmental or social conditions in certain parts of the world.

All of this is speculation. Today we are asked to consolidate and implement the gains served by the agreements signed in Marrakesh. A new round in a formal process is probably some time away, and it may not come again soon in the form of a multilateral world-based negotiation.

We are seeing also a parallel trend in the efforts being made in many parts of the world to liberalize trade on a regional basis. In November, in Indonesia, the APEC leaders set targets all the way to the year 2020. The western hemisphere leaders' meeting in Miami on December 9 is pursuing the objective of hemispheric free trade. The European Community is gaining new members, regional agreements in Africa are in existence, and there is even talk of a regional economic agreement in the Middle East. Perhaps the next great round will be a negotiation amongst regions.

Mention must be made of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy and its report of November, 1994, "Principles and Priorities for the Future." This milestone committee was co-chaired by Senator Allan MacEachen and Jean-Robert Gauthier, MP, now Senator Gauthier. I commend all parts of the report to honourable senators, but in the present context, I urge honourable senators to become familiar with Chapter 3, "Building Shared Prosperity." I endorse strongly the explanation and recommendations of the committee as they deal with both short-term and long-term trade issues. I am pleased that the committee's work was unanimously endorsed by its Senate members. Our trade policy here in the Senate is truly bipartisan.

Honourable senators, the Honourable Michael Wilson, the International Trade Minister in the former government, played a major role in negotiating the agreement which the bill before us today will implement. In submitting this bill for approval, the government counts on the support of all parties in this chamber for the fundamental principles of Canadian trade policies set forth in the preamble to the bill; namely, that the cornerstone of our trade policy is the multilateral system of mutually agreed market access conditions and non-discriminatory trade rules; that free, fair and open trade is essential for the future of the Canadian economy and for securing the competitiveness and long-term sustainable development of Canada, and that trade expansion contributes to job creation, achieves higher standards of living, offers greater choice to consumers, and strengthens the Canadian economic union.

Honourable senators, these are the essential objectives this bill seeks to promote. I invite members of the Senate to join in considering its purposes and provisions and in assuring its timely adoption.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on what basis does the honourable senator state that Canada will find itself on the defensive in the future with regard to our cultural industries?

Senator Austin: I make that statement on the basis of the work that was done during the negotiations on the Uruguay Round, particularly with respect to attempts by the United States to improve access in world markets for its cultural properties. I refer particularly to the role which France and Canada played in establishing the present arrangement. However, I do not believe for a minute that the United States, in pursuit of its trade policies, will cease and desist on this matter.

Senator Murray: Does the government consider the solution arrived at in the multilateral negotiations satisfactory? I am referring to the exemption with regard to cultural industries.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I can only speak as one senator in saying that while I introduced the bill for the government, the honourable senator has posed a hypothetical question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I asked whether the government considers the solutions arrived at as satisfactory.

To complete the thought, my impression is — and I stand to be corrected — that what was arrived at in the multilateral negotiations is very similar to the exemption that Canada sought and received in the free trade and NAFTA negotiations with regard to cultural institutions.

Senator Austin: The brief answer, honourable senators, is that the government signed the agreement and is therefore satisfied with that aspect of it at this time. However, I was hypothesizing that the United States and others would be leading with their old arguments again some time in the near future.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

BOOK ENTITLED ABOVE THE LAW

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly rose pursuant to notice of Tuesday, October 4, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the book entitled Above the Law.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to take a few moments to talk about a book published last spring which caused quite a stir in official Ottawa circles. The book is Paul Palango's Above the Law, with the rather sensational leader: "The shocking but true story of corporate crime and political corruption in Canada." I had intended to air my thoughts on this book last May or June shortly after it was published, but my schedule and the Senate's did not coincide.

Honourable senators, those of you who have read it know that Above the Law is an unabashed testimonial of one or two former senior officers of the RCMP who are now in private practice or retirement but who actively collaborated with the author. In essence, this book catalogues a list of high profile cases investigated by these officers. In most of those cases, no charges were laid. In other cases where charges were actually laid, charges were subsequently reduced or judges and juries found the defendants innocent. The book's author and protagonist attributes this to political interference and political corruption at the very highest levels.

Honourable senators, I should mention at the outset that my name is mentioned in the book. According to the reference, I once met for lunch with one of the persons who, the book alleges, was the object of suspicion by the RCMP. I have no recollection of the lunch nor of the person I am supposed to have lunched with, but, be that as it may, the reference to me was innocuous. Unless the book alleges guilt by association, I do not take it that I, at least, have been in any way slurred by the book.

Honourable senators, the author purports to raise two fundamental and very serious issues: First, he calls into question the integrity of the Canadian justice system and the manner in which this country is being policed; and, second, he alleges that Canada has a two-tiered justice system where the treatment accorded to the political and business elite is significantly different from that accorded to the average Canadian. These are serious allegations that merit serious attention. The problem is that the book provides no compelling evidence other than inference, innuendo or speculation that either allegation is true.

I took it upon myself to have one of my people contact bureaucrats who occupied, or recently occupied, senior positions in the police and security establishment in the Solicitor General's department, the Privy Council Office and the Department of Justice. These are people who sit or sat at the nexus between the political level and the RCMP, people who attended many meetings between ministers, their staffs and representatives of the RCMP at the highest level. Not one single person supported the book's allegations about political interference in RCMP investigations; not one was privy to or even suspected such interference, and not one had been contacted by the author of the book.

A point must be made here, however, which may explain at least in part Mr. Palango's conclusions. The McDonald commission, as many here know, and as the book recounts, was critical of the RCMP, particularly the security service, for certain of its activities. The commission recommended that the security service be transferred to a civilian security intelligence agency. That was done, and we now know it as CSIS. It also recommended that the RCMP be more accountable to the government, and mechanisms to enhance accountability were put in place.

That quest for increased accountability resulted in more meetings with ministers and their staffs and more information going from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to ministers and their offices. However, there is no evidence I know of that these meetings or this information was case specific, or resulted in political interference by ministers.

However, this enhanced accountability could be misinterpreted by the uninformed observer and by some members of the RCMP as political interference. We must bear in mind that one of the foundations of our parliamentary system is collective and individual ministerial responsibility to Parliament. That ultimate responsibility of ministers extends to the RCMP; and the RCMP must account to ministers and, through them, to Parliament. Otherwise our system breaks down.

We must also distinguish between accountability on the one hand and direction and control on the other. Accountability from the minister's perspective is passive. He or she receives information that allows that minister to exercise his or her constitutional responsibility to Parliament. It is a huge leap in logic to assume that accountability leads inexorably to inappropriate political interference, to control or direction. Mr. Palango and the book's protagonists appear to have made that unfortunate and unwarranted leap of logic.

Honourable senators, I am not here to give a book report. I want to talk in a thematic way about several questions or issues raised by this book which disturb me deeply. The first is the increasing tendency of those in public service to publish kiss-and-tell books upon their retirement from public office. Such books, no matter who is the author, are suspect from the beginning because they provide a very one-sided perspective, a perspective that cannot help but be tinted by self-interest.

There is always the danger that the protagonist will claim, in the eyes of posterity, a status or recognition that was denied in real life. It is difficult for bitterness or past slights and failures not to seep through. It is difficult not to try to rewrite history in one's own image. It is particularly dangerous when police officers become involved in such efforts. Police officers, by virtue of their position, have access to an enormous amount of information from a range of sources. Some of this information may be accurate; some will be of questionable accuracy, at best. Most is not, and should not be, in the public domain.

It is fundamentally wrong, therefore, for such information to find its way into the public domain through a retired policeman's public musings, accompanied by that policeman's interpretation of the meaning or veracity of that information. Policemen occupy a position of trust, a trust that survives, or should survive, their retirement from the force. That trust should include the confidentiality of information obtained through a police investigation that has hitherto not been released and has not had the benefit of objective interpretation, cross-examination or the presumption of innocence.

Upon joining the RCMP, regular and civilian members swear three oaths: an oath of allegiance to the Crown, an oath of office and an oath of secrecy. I am told that these oaths, particularly the oath of secrecy, have not changed in a material way for over 50 years. The oath of secrecy reads as follows:

> I do solemnly swear that I will not disclose or make known to any person not legally entitled thereto any —

— and I emphasize "any" — > — knowledge or information obtained by me in the course of my employment with the RCMP. So help me God.

That leads me to my second point. Where did the information used in this book come from? Mr. Palango, in his preface, writes that one of the protagonists:

> ...agreed to cooperate with me to the extent of giving me access to copies of his old court briefs, handwritten notes and other documents...

That is in relation to the investigation and other matters described in this book.

Throughout the book, words spoken by persons under investigation are often quoted, sometimes at great length. Where did these quotations, which are found between quotation marks in the book, but without indication of source or attribution, come from? One can only assume that they came from transcripts or wire taps or police interviews during the course of the investigation.

Good God, honourable senators, what are we seeing here? Are we seeing RCMP officers upon their retirement taking with them files relating to investigations in which they were involved? Worse still, are we seeing retired RCMP officers who feel they can use that information in any way they see fit? Surely, this constitutes a violation of the Privacy Act.

Many people will be hurt by this book: people who were investigated but never charged, people who were charged but found innocent. They will all suffer the indignity of unhappy events past being dredged up once again, based on the premise of the author and the protagonists that they should have been charged and, once charged, should have been found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Also hurt will be current and former RCMP officers whose representations have now been sullied by the book's allegation that they somehow acted improperly or were incompetent in the conduct of their official duties.

This brings me to my third concern, and that is the relationship between police and the media. The book's protagonists obviously have a high regard for so-called investigative journalists and feel they have a role to play in the criminal justice system. Investigative journalists, with appropriate guidance, can go where police cannot go, unencumbered as journalists are by the requirement for such troublesome things as search warrants and the principles of natural justice, due process and the rule of law. Journalists can say or write things, sometimes based on strategic leaks from police officers, that could not be introduced as evidence or would not stand up in court. The only protections are libel laws which kick in after the damage has been done.

I worry about the developing symbiotic relationship between the media and some police officers. The potential for — in fact the evidence of — misuse is just too great. I am concerned about the media being used by some police officers to put pressure on someone who is the subject of an investigation.

I am concerned that some police officers evidently think, "If we cannot get them through the courts, we will get them through the media." I am concerned about journalists who either do not recognize their power or who abuse their power. In writing about someone who is the subject of a police investigation who has been charged with a criminal offence, journalists rarely have a balanced perspective. What they write is untrammelled by the rules of evidence, and yet they have the power of investigator, prosecutor, judge and jury. What they write is often accorded the status of "fact" by the unsuspecting public.

If the media, on one hand, is to benefit from the constitutional freedom of the press, that freedom has to be balanced, on the other hand, by an equivalent responsibility to act fairly, objectively and properly in writing about criminal investigations and charges. That sense of responsibility is sorely lacking, in my judgment, in most of today's journalists who have been overwhelmed by the quest for sensationalism in order to sell more newspapers or books, and generate more advertising revenue.

These are relatively small points beside the major one I wish to raise today: We now have on the public record the allegation that at senior levels the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been politicized and that, due to budget constraints, organizational, philosophical and turf considerations, the commercial crime and drug enforcement divisions of the RCMP are ineffective.

Honourable senators, what are we to do with these allegations? Are we to leave them hanging without investigation or rebuttal? The RCMP has chosen not to respond, and I think quite rightly so. The RCMP have said it cannot respond to the book's specific allegations because of privacy laws, and I think they are correct. Because the allegations relate to a previous government, the current government may decide to adopt a hands-off strategy. I think that would be a bad strategy because it would leave the allegations to fester.

Therefore, I ask, what does the government intend to do? These allegations are very harmful to the RCMP and could do harm to the RCMP's working relationship with other police forces. I urge the government to undertake an investigation into these allegations and to make a public statement that, in one way or the other, clears the air.

Finally, I also urge the Privacy Commissioner to investigate whether the Privacy Act has been violated through any disclosure of privileged information in that book. Mr. Palango and his collaborators should not be above the law.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PARLIAMENT AND THE COURTS

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the relationship between Parliament and the Courts, including the Law of Parliamentary Privilege and the relevant jurisprudence.

She said: Honourable senators, on November 30 last I spoke to the history of the law of parliamentary privilege. Today, I shall speak to the relationship between Parliament and the courts of law. This relationship has its origins in the undivided High Court of Parliament, where the task of the judges had been to advise the King and his council.

In Canada, appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, were ended in 1947 when the Supreme Court of Canada became the final court of appeal in Canada. The Parliament of Canada was unaffected, retaining its powers of a court of record, its lex et consuetudo parliamenti remaining the Grand Inquest of the nation.

The Supreme Court in Canada is a creation by statute of the Parliament of Canada, the Supreme Court of Canada Act. The powers and authority of the Supreme Court are determined by this statute.

The relationship between the courts of Canada and the Parliament of Canada did not change in 1982, despite the many legalists, on and off the bench, who insist that with the enactment of the Charter of Rights, the locus of power somehow shifted from Parliament to the courts. This premise is erroneous and insufficient, and merits greater debate in the Houses of Parliament.

Parliament, through the cabinet, appoints judges and removes them. The only body in Canada that is authorized to discuss and adjudicate the behaviour of a judge is the Parliament of Canada. Section 99(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867, states in part:

> ....the Judges of the Superior Courts shall hold office during good behaviour, but shall be removable by the Governor General on Address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Parliament has demonstrated enormous restraint, forebearance and grace in the exercise of this power; and the offending judges exercised wisdom and usually resigned before the resolution was tabled. Section 99(1) of the Constitution is mindful that the appointment of judges and their removal are matters of much gravity.

In 1869, on the question of the gravity of appointment of judges, Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> I have always laid down with respect to the judiciary, the principle that no amount of political pressure shall induce me to appoint an incompetent or unworthy judge.

There is no doubt that "constitutional society" acted deliberately, constitutionalizing good behaviour as the tenure of judicial office. In 1883, on judicial conduct, the Honourable Edward Blake, former minister of justice, said:

> There is no function of ours of higher importance or greater consequence to the public weal than the function that we hold of enquiring into or censuring, or dealing with the conduct of the Judiciary.
> I am not one of those who at all object to this great, this highest court of all, this grand inquest enquiring by proper means into the conduct of the judges. As I have said, I believe that to be our highest, our most important and also our most delicate function.

For generations, Parliament has treated judicial behaviour and judicial activity with great care. Parliament expects that the judiciary will treat Parliament and its laws with reciprocal care. Parliament expects that no court will truncate its functions. On this relationship of Parliament and judicial functions, Sir William Anson, in his book The Law and Custom of the Constitution, said:

> ...the courts have no claim to substitute their judgement for that of the legislature...

As regards this relationship, Justice Willes in Lee v. Bude and Torrington Junction Ry Co., 1871, said:

> ...and we do not sit here as a court of appeal from Parliament.
> We sit here as servants of the Queen and the legislature. Are we to act as regents over what is done by Parliament with the consent of the Queen, Lords, and Commons? I deny that any such authority exists.
> The proceedings here are judicial, not autocratic, which they would be if we could make laws instead of administering them.

Further, Alexander Hamilton, in The Federalist Papers wrote:

> The courts must declare the sense of the law; and if they should be disposed to exercise WILL instead of JUDGMENT, the consequence would equally be the substitution of their pleasure to that of the legislative body.

Parliament commands the purse, the executive commands the sword. The judiciary commands neither the sword nor the purse. The courts have "neither force nor will, but merely judgement." When courts of law exercise will, they enter into the realm of politics.

Judicial institutions in the Canadian Constitution are creations of the legislature. The organization, financing and administration of the courts are by legislative statutes. Even the procedure and rules of the courts are provided for by statutes of the legislature.

On the issue of judicial independence, Peter Russell, in his book, The Judiciary in Canada, says:

> In the Canadian system, constitutional conventions play a particularly important role in regulating the relationships among the different branches of government — including the relationship of the judiciary to the legislature and the executive. In this respect the Canadian Constitution draws heavily from the British constitutional tradition. 'In Britain', wrote S. A. de Smith, 'the independence of the judiciary rests not on formal constitutional guarantees and prohibitions, but on a mixture of statutory and common-law rules, constitutional conventions and parliamentary practice'...

The concept of the "independent" judiciary is a parliamentary practice and a convention. This notion of separation of powers, judicial independence and political non-interference in the adjudicative function is part of the great constitutional life of Canada. Albert Venn Dicey, in his book Introduction to the Law of the Constitution defines "conventions" as:

> ...customs, practices, maxims, or precepts which are not enforced or recognized by the Courts...

Conventions are observed in the practice of politics. We must be clear that conventions depend on political process and political players for enforcement, that is, that conventions depend on the actions of Parliament for enforcement.

The question of the relationship between convention and the law are clarified in jurisprudence and case law. In the case of Madzimbuto v. Lardner-Burke and George, Lord Reid stated:

> Their Lordships in declaring the Law are not concerned with convention.

In Canada also, the courts held that conventions can never be legally binding, and that they can have no effect on legal powers. In the case of the Disallowance Reference, Chief Justice Duff of the Supreme Court of Canada, said:

> We are not concerned with constitutional usage... or constitutional practice...We are concerned with questions of law.

Canada, as a constitutional society based on the rule of law, has developed coordinate constitutional institutions: the Crown, the executive, Parliament, and the courts; four coordinate entities. Effective governance compels comity between the constitutional institutions. On this comity, Edmund Burke, in his book, Reflections on the French Revolution has said:

> ...the constituent parts of a state are obliged to hold their public faith with each other...as much as the whole state is bound to keep its faith with separate communities.

In Canada, this faith, this institutional comity, has assured the smooth and continuous functioning of our Constitution. About co-institutional comity, or constitutional comity, Lord Simon, in 1974, in the case of British Railways Board v. Pickin, said:

> It is well known that in the past there have been dangerous strains between the law courts and Parliament — dangerous because each institution has its own particular role to play in our constitution, and because collision between the two institutions is likely to impair their power to vouchsafe those constitutional rights for which citizens depend on them. So for many years Parliament and the courts have each been astute to respect the sphere of action and the privileges of the other...

The Parliament of Canada Act, R.S.C. 1985, Section 5, on the law of privilege and the courts, says:

> The privileges, immunities and powers...are part of the general and public law of Canada and it is not necessary to plead them but they shall...be taken notice of judicially.

The law courts in Canada are generally allowed to enquire into the existence and extent of parliamentary privilege. The courts may ascertain the privileges concerned, and may enquire and determine the validity of the privilege claimed. However, they may not enquire into, and may make no adjudication on the exercise of privilege.

The law of privilege tells us, in the words of the Honourable A.G. Cameron, Speaker of the House of Representatives of Australia, that no one can:

> ...waive, cancel, impair, or destroy the privilege...

No court of law can "waive, cancel, impair, or destroy the privilege." The law of Parliament tells us that these laws can only be amended by Parliament. Joseph Maingot in his book Parliamentary Privilege in Canada says:

> The privileges of members of the Senate and of the House of Commons of freedom of speech, freedom from arrest, exemption to attend court as a witness, and the right to ignore a jury notice, are matters of law and only Parliament may change the law.

The jurisprudence and case law uphold this fact of unalterability, save by Parliament.

In 1884, the case of Bradlaugh v. Gossett declared that the House of Commons is not subject to the control of the courts in the administration of that part of the law which relates to its internal procedure only. The courts have no power to interfere in the jurisdiction of the Houses of Parliament over their own internal processes and proceedings.

A most severe confrontation between Parliament and the courts of law was the case of Stockdale v. Hansard. Mr. Hansard, acting on the orders of the House of Commons, had printed a report. From 1836 to 1840, Mr. Stockdale sued Mr. Hansard several times for statements contained in the report. The House of Commons was represented in court by the Attorney General, Sir John Campbell.

The Commons made orders and resolutions; the court denied them. The court, in Lord Denham, denied Mr. Hansard's defence of privilege of Parliament and found for Mr. Stockdale against Hansard. The House reprimanded Stockdale's lawyer, found Mr. Stockdale in contempt of Parliament, and committed him to prison. In prison, Mr. Stockdale started a fourth lawsuit. The Commons committed Mr. Stockdale's lawyers as they had committed the sheriffs.

Prison did not inhibit Mr. Stockdale and his lawyer, nor put an end to the persistent lawsuits. Parliament settled the dispute. They ended it. Parliament ordered Mr. Hansard to offer no more defence and then passed a law. This statute, the Parliamentary Papers Act, 1840, extends privilege to the staff who, as we see here in this chamber, produce our papers, which we call Hansard.

Stockdale v. Hansard established that the House has exclusive jurisdiction where the dignity and efficiency of the House cannot be upheld without it, saying:

> ...whatever is done within the walls of either assembly must pass without question in any other place.

About Stockdale v. Hansard, Sir Erskine May said:

> The judges admitted that, when a matter is a proceeding of the House, beginning and terminating within its own walls, it is obviously outside the jurisdiction of the courts..

This case speaks eloquently on the relationship between Parliament and the courts of law. The Right Honourable Bora Laskin, former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, spoke insightfully when he said:

> The probable end of the matter would be an assertion of the respective independence of courts and legislatures...when respectively called upon to exercise their functions. Law at this point dissolves into politics.

Most recently, here in Canada, Parliament's privilege of control over its internal processes has been upheld in two cases, being the New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Arthur Donohoe, and Southam Inc. v. The Senate of Canada.

In 1993, in the Donohoe case, Arthur Donohoe, Speaker of the Nova Scotia Legislative Assembly, was sued by the New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. In the appeal from the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Appeal Division, the Supreme Court of Canada Justices La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, McLachlin and Iacobucci, with Justice Cory dissenting, held that:

> The Charter does not apply to the members of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly when they exercise their inherent privileges, since the inherent privileges of a legislative body such as the Nova Scotia House of Assembly enjoy constitutional status.

In 1990, in the Southam case, in the Federal Court, Appeal Division, Chief Justice Iacobucci, Justices Stone and Décary, overturned the Trial Division ruling by Justice Strayer. They said that the Federal Court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action by a newspaper publisher seeking access to Senate committee in camera meetings. They also overturned the trial judge's grant of leave to Southam Inc. to sue the members of the Senate committee individually.

Chief Justice Iacobucci of the Federal Court, Appeal Division, stated in overturning:

> Nor could it be accepted that in enacting the Federal Court Act, Parliament intended to assign to the Federal Court a supervisory judicial review jurisdiction over the Senate, the House of Commons or their committees.

He also stated:

> That approach is appropriate herein because the review of parliamentary proceedings is not a matter to be taken lightly given the history of curial deference to Parliament and respect for the legislative branch of government generally...

Honourable senators should know that these statements on Parliament were the conclusions of the highest courts of Canada. However, three lower courts, being the Federal Court, Trial Division, the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Trial Division, and the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Appeal Division, found differently. Justice Strayer of the Federal Court, Trial Division, and Justice Nathanson of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Trial Division, both found against parliamentary privilege. Their findings deserve study. The justices even articulated a novel view:

> ...our Constitution in this respect is no longer 'similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom'.

These two cases involved discussion of the written versus the unwritten Constitution of Canada. The discussion even questioned the very definition of the term "the Constitution of Canada," as per sections 52(1) and 52(2) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Professor Hogg is quoted on this matter as follows:

> ...Canada's gradual evolution from colony to nation has denied it any single comprehensive constitutional document.

Honourable senators should be mindful that most of the lex parliamenti and the law of privilege is recorded in the rolls and debates of Parliament and is not recorded in the written constitution.

Regarding the similarity in principle of Canada's Constitution to that of the United Kingdom, and the written versus the unwritten, Madame Justice McLachlin, in the Donohoe case, writing for the majority in overruling the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Appeal and Trial Divisions, stated:

> The Parliamentary privilege of the British Parliament at Westminster sprang originally from the authority of Parliament as a court. Over the centuries, Parliament won for itself the right to control its own affairs, independent of the Crown and of the courts. The courts could determine whether a parliamentary privilege existed, but once they determined that it did, the courts had no power to regulate the exercise of that power. One of those privileges, held absolutely and deemed to be constitutional, was the power to exclude strangers from the proceedings of the House.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt but the honourable senator's time is up. Is leave granted to allow her to complete her comments?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Cools: Honourable senators, moving now to the relationship between Parliament and the courts regarding Parliament's first privilege, its right to the attendance of its members and the concomitant right of members to attend, the United Kingdom's House of Commons Select Committee, in 1967 and again in 1977, comprehensively examined, concluded, and reported on parliamentary privilege that:

> ...they are conscious that the requirements of both civil and criminal process may on occasions conflict with the duty of attendance owed by a Member to the House. They are strongly of the opinion that the courts, whether civil or criminal, should give appropriate weight, when exercising their discretion over such matters as the fixing of dates...to the importance of the Parliamentary function of a Member who may be involved.

Further it is stated:

> They believe, however, that the ultimate power to decide between the claim of the House and the claim of the court must remain with the House.

On the question of the relationship between Parliament and the courts of law, the finest articulation that I have heard has come from Professor Dr. Edward McWhinney, a most learned scholar:

> The essence of the constitutional system is harmony and balance between the main organs of government: Courts, Parliament and Cabinet. The relations between these institutions rest on the principle of comity, that is to say, mutual respect and deference. A consequence of this is the principle of economy in the use of power, and avoidance of escalation to direct institutional confrontation, where alternative, more moderate controls are available.
> Parliament's privileges are inherent rights, historically antecedent to and not dependent upon the Constitution Act of 1867. From the English constitutional battles of the early seventeenth century on, it has been axiomatic that the courts are constitutionally obligated to respect and defer to parliamentary privilege. Parliament, as an institution, is not subject to the courts. Members of Parliament, in their personal capacity, are subject to the general law, like anyone else. But the Courts, in applying the law to Members, are obligated to respect Parliament to the extent that, for example, where the normal civil processes as to service of papers or requesting appearance before the courts are readily available, they must be used and exhausted by the courts.

In conclusion, the relationship between Parliament and the courts of law may be simply put: It is the relationship between politics and law, and the discernment to know the difference. Such discernment allows us to know where one ends and the other begins. It is the understanding of personal limitations as well as institutional limitations. The success of the Canadian Constitution and the Canadian civil society to date have been dependent on the fact that both have been worked by gentlemen and ladies of honour, governed by courtesy, by rules, and the discernment to know the difference between law and politics.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Austin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, for the second reading of Bill C-57, to implement the Agreement establishing the World Trade Organization.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to commend Senator Austin for a very clear, succinct and convincing argumentation in favour of Bill C-57, a most complex piece of legislation which will leave few Canadians untouched in the years to come.

Senator Austin's presentation was particularly impressive not only for its content but even more for its authorship, coming as it did from a leading member of the Liberal Party whose adamant opposition in 1988 to free trade, and to a free trade agreement with the United States, forced a general election on the issue, and who, during the 1993 election campaign, repeatedly criticized the NAFTA to the point of threatening to scrap it once elected.

Yesterday, on behalf of the Liberal Party, Senator Austin described the NAFTA as, and I quote his words, "a role model for extending serious obligations in the trade field to developing countries around the world..."

The Prime Minister has been travelling the globe, extolling the virtues of free trade, first at last month's meeting of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit and, more recently, in Paris.

What has led to this extraordinary, but no less welcome, about-face by the Liberal Party, only our friends opposite can explain. Suffice it to say that at last an issue which yesterday divided this house for far too long is today allowing it to work and discuss on the same side for the benefit of all Canadians tomorrow.

I want to join with Senator Austin in expressing appreciation to our two colleagues Senators Kelleher and Carney, and to Michael Wilson, all of who, as international trade ministers, can take much of the credit for the legislation before us.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, Senator Austin has urged that the vote on Bill C-57 be taken in time for it to come into force by January 1, 1995, so that Canada can become a charter member of the World Trade Organization. It should be pointed out that this date is nothing more than symbolic. In effect, the bill provides, in clause 221(1), that it:

> ...shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by order of the Governor in Council.

Therefore, as there is no statutory deadline for passage, this bill can and must be given a study which should not be limited simply in order for Canada to be first past the gate.

Senator Austin extolled the virtues of the World Trade Organization for Canada, but he will be the first to agree that not all in the bill is advantageous to this country. For it is only normal that we have had to give up something for the gains which he has outlined. I doubt that Canadians have much familiarity with the trade-offs to which our negotiators agreed, no matter how justified.

One need only read the major legislation which is being amended by Bill C-57 to appreciate what this bill involves. The following pieces of legislation are being amended by Bill C-57: the Bank Act, the Canadian International Trade Tribunal Act, the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, the Copyright Act, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Export and Import Permits Act, the Fertilizers Act, the Financial Administration Act, the Food and Drugs Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Insurance Companies Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Investment Canada Act, the Investment Companies Act, the Meat Import Act, the Patent Act, the Pest Control Products Act, the Special Import Measures Act, the Trade-Marks Act, the Trust and Loan Companies Act and the Western Grain Transportation Act.

This is an impressive list. Amending only one of these bills would normally take days, if not weeks, of debate and committee hearings, for the amendments are not insignificant. Take the Bank Act, for instance. In the clause-by-clause guide to Bill C-57 prepared by the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, the amendments are summarized as follows, and I quote:

> These amendments implement national treatment and most-favoured-nation treatment by doing three things: the removal of the 10/25 ownership constraints on non-residents; the removal of the rules that restrict foreign bank subsidiaries from occupying more than 12 per cent of the domestic market; and consequential amendments which remove ancillary rules designed to prevent avoidance of the previously mentioned rules. There are also consequential amendments to other provisions that are needed because of the deletion of these rules.

Does this mean that Canadian banks are now vulnerable to foreign control or, at least, significant foreign ownership, something that has been denied for decades?

Honourable senators, these and other questions about the future of significant sectors of our economy deserve answers before Bill C-57 is passed. Canadians must be informed of any negative consequences that this bill contains, whatever its positive aspects, so they can prepare themselves accordingly. One way of dealing with these questions in a more expeditious manner is to ask each standing Senate committee to examine those parts of the bill which come within their particular purview. This would have been done in any case had each act been subject to amendment separately. As it is, we have the equivalent of an omnibus bill which is designated to go to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. I am sure that that committee would welcome the participation of other Senate committees in the arduous task facing it.

I am not making any formal proposals along those lines because I know that we will probably bog down in procedural discussion, but I do hope that when the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs receives this bill, it will rely on the expertise available from other committees and from all senators to make sure that, before this bill is passed, we are not only contented with the many advantages Canada will gain from the bill, but also alerted to the many disadvantages and disruptions in our economy which will also result.

Hon. Mira Spivak: I have a short intervention, honourable senators, which refers to the comment made by my honourable leader about disadvantages and disruptions.

I want to draw the attention of honourable senators to the matter which concerns Canada's sugar beet growers, sugar refiners and large-scale, commercial users of refined sugar with respect to this legislation, including the 300 sugar beet producers of Manitoba and the 170 workers of the Manitoba Sugar Company.

On January 1, the livelihoods of many of them will be placed in jeopardy as a result of the tariff schedules the U.S. proposes under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade now before us. An industry that has suffered losses that have grown to an estimated $170 million annually since 1982, through progressively restrictive trade measures imposed by the United States, will be struck another severe blow. The Canadian Sugar Institute predicts losses of a further $135 million annually as a result of new measures under the GATT and the existing NAFTA agreement. The jobs of more than 900 Canadian food processing workers could be eliminated; an additional 280 refinery workers could face unemployment. All this will begin to happen very shortly unless the International Trade Minister can persuade the U.S. trade representative to postpone implementation of the tariff schedule and return to the negotiating table.

Many Canadians are under the illusion that the North American Free Trade Agreement and the Uruguay Round of GATT are entirely liberalizing agreements that will open up borders. In the case of the sugar and the sugar-containing products industries, however, the U.S. tariff schedule will create what is tantamount to a one-way border. U.S.-made products will have easy access into Canada; Canadian-made products will face a wall of restrictions.

On refined sugar, for example, the U.S. will limit imports from all countries to 22,000 metric tonnes — roughly 60 per cent of the amount Canada alone sold to that market in fiscal 1992-93. Canada will face competition from Brazil and other producing countries. Under the most optimistic assumption that Canada will gain access to the full amount, Canadian refineries will suffer a net loss of $10 million. More important, the domestic market to Canadian producers of crystal drink mixes, sugar and cocoa products and other sugar-containing products will shrink as new GATT restrictions on those products come into force on January 1. As Canadian food processors face new restrictions to U.S. markets, they are reconsidering their investments in Canada.

Honourable senators, while Canadian exports of sugar to the U.S. did reach a high point of 80,000 tonnes in recent years and roused the ire of U.S. refiners and food processors, it is also true that U.S. imports of refined sugar into Canada grew from less than 1 per cent to 13 per cent of the Canadian market. Rather than maintain or increase this two-way border flow, the U.S. government has been persuaded to erect barriers. In a letter to a leading American sugar executive, the U.S. trade representative offered the assurances that the new tariff-rate quotas will "sharply reduce U.S. imports of sugar and sugar-containing products."

The measures, if implemented, will have a profound effect on communities in Eastern Canada that rely on food processing jobs for employment. In Manitoba, where roughly 50 per cent of the beet sugar produced by the Manitoba Sugar Co. has traditionally gone south, the impact could be devastating to factory workers. While restrictions on imports of beet sugar are not slated to come into effect until October 1, unless an early agreement to alter the quotas is reached the parent company, B.C. Sugar, will be unable to offer contracts to growers with any assurance that its product can be sold in the U.S. As the smallest of six refineries, the Manitoba plant is the most vulnerable. Perhaps not surprisingly, the same month the U.S. trade representative offered his assurance to the U.S. industry, the North Dakota-based American Crystal Sugar Co. invited Manitoba growers to ship their beets south of the border and appointed a sales manager to market American Crystal's product to Manitoba consumers.

Honourable senators, the situation that is looming is akin to the struggle that western producers of durum wheat experienced earlier this year. It is also national in scope. Early this week, representatives of seven national organizations — Canadian sugar beet producers, grocery products manufacturers, confectionary manufacturers, a labour union, users of industrial sweeteners, the tea association and the sugar institute — laid out a seven-point plan for the government. The first step is for Canada's International Trade Minister to raise the matter personally with the U.S. trade representative and win an agreement to postpone the implementation of the tariff schedule.

Honourable senators, in giving our support to the GATT agreement, we must have the assurance of the government that it will not be idle and allow the U.S. to impose restrictions that are contrary to the spirit of free trade. I hope the Minister of International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture will respond forcefully and urgently to protect the livelihoods of Canadian workers from these and any similar unfair and unbalanced trade restrictions.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to make a few comments following on those of Senator Spivak. I agree that there are severe problems that individual sectors of our economy must accommodate in passing Bill C-57 and, indeed, in complying with the terms and conditions of the so-called GATT agreement.

I can tell honourable senators about several problems we face with respect to agriculture. Amendments to the Canadian Wheat Board Act will change the way we do business in the international market. The bill provides for many amendments but perhaps the most significant are those that will dismantle the marketing structures we have worked up in the agriculture sector — for example, all the supply-managed programs under Article XI of the GATT that we tried for years to have improved in favour of the Canadian way of marketing.

I have an interest in this business. I have spent thousands of hours designing and going through the enabling legislation that was passed by the federal government so that the provinces could delegate their authority to impose quotas, and that sort of thing. It is not important that I have spent all those thousands of hours. Senator Murray has also spent that much time, because he was one of those who were criticizing everything I was trying to do.

Senator Doody: Our leader was defending the sugar beet farmers.

Senator Olson: I want to be serious. We will have to restructure all of the supply-managed programs, and dairy is one of those programs. Under this agreement we have given access to a share of our market to the United States and other countries. If those countries exercise that access in a certain way, that can be extremely disruptive. For example, I am not sure of the exact numbers they are guaranteed, but I think it is approximately five per cent. If they apply that 5 per cent in a small region of Canada, it will hurt the people of that region a great deal. That is not all, however. In addition, they must also take apart the supply-management system and the administration of the quotas.

We can also talk about eggs. When we brought in the supply-management legislation, eggs were 8 cents a dozen. That is how much the producers received. They were cutting each other up from one end of the country to the other. The same is true with respect to poultry, especially broilers. When we brought in the legislation, it did not suddenly become better, but we put in place a basis and a structure for marketing under what is called a supply-managed system.

I stayed up all night at committee meetings more than once, because the Conservative Party had the philosophy that they could not stand farmers having a little control in their marketplace. If you want to go back over the record, it is all in there. I know we once sat in a committee until 7:30 in the morning because of the filibuster that was going on.

Therefore it is not easy for the agriculture sector to give their approval and try to support this agreement. We know that when the previous government was in office, they were negotiating this agreement in Geneva, day after day. I asked Senator Murray, "How are you doing?" I asked him that several times, especially with respect to Article XI. He will remember that. He said, "We haven't got it all yet, but we are trying hard."

I believed him, but I also went to Geneva where all these negotiations were going on, to find out for myself. I also went to Rome, to the FAO, and to several other places. I know a few people over there from the days when I was in the government. I cannot thrash this old straw now, but after I had been there a couple of days, it was completely clear to me that we were not — and I underline the word "not" — about to get a strengthening of Article XI. I am not totally blaming our government, because it seems to me there were only about four out of a hundred-odd countries that had an interest and were willing to support us in strengthening the terms and conditions of Article XI.

Senator Murray: One by one, they dropped off.

Senator Olson: Yes, that is what I am saying. I know they did. But I want to tell you why it is important. I do not believe that the way in which we managed our agricultural marketing system under both governments, in terms of eggs, poultry, and milk, was doing any damage to anyone else. We kept it inside Canada. Whenever we had some surplus products to sell, we had to go out into the international market to sell them. One such example is skim milk powder. We had to compete with France and with several other countries that were selling that product. However, our supply system did not damage any other country's marketing system in agricultural products.

We have now come to the place where our party is supporting this agreement. We know you are also supporting it, Senator Lynch-Staunton, because you just said so. You also referred back to all the months that your party was in office and trying to work out the basis for the agreement, and I understand that. In my opinion you were not quite as good negotiators as we would have been. If we had been there, we might have ended up with a little better deal.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You signed the agreement; but we were negotiating it when we left office.

Senator Olson: That is no great criticism or victory. You told us then that this was the best deal we could get. I remember Senator Murray saying that. "It is the best deal we could get."

Senator Spivak was defending the interests of the people in her province who are in the sugar industry. That is a perfectly good and proper thing to do. However, I rose to my feet to let you know that they are not the only ones. There are all kinds of other people in Canada who will lose something of value to them through this agreement. I hope their loss will be in the context that it is for the general good of Canada. I am not quite sure how some of the egg producers will get something good out of it, but they will accept it and do the best they can under the circumstances.

I would like honourable senators to know that when agriculture comes asking for something — not that we do it often — we are generally giving up an enormous amount in return.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask my friend Senator Olson a question. First, let me say that I appreciate the concerns he has expressed. I note that those concerns are focussed on one part of one sector, namely the agricultural sector. Does Senator Olson not believe that there are gains made in other parts of the agricultural sector, and therefore by the agricultural sector as a whole, from the agreement?

Second, I want to ask him to answer the question that I think all of us have to answer on this matter, and that is: Even allowing for the adjustments, and in some cases the severe adjustments, that will have to be made, does he believe, on balance, that this agreement is good for Canada?

Senator Olson: That is easy to answer, honourable senators. My party and I — because I discuss these things with my party — believe that, on balance, this agreement is probably good for Canada. The jury is still out, however, in case the honourable senator wants to know. But we are willing to take a chance. We will try.

In reply to the other part of the honourable senator's question on whether other sectors in agriculture will have a gain: I cannot think of one, but there might be.

I will mention one area where there might be an improvement, and that is in the international grain market. You are aware, of course, of the enhanced exports subsidies employed by both the United States and Europe. Those subsidies have hurt us very badly. I will give you credit: Your government was in office when those Export Enhancement Program, or EEP, payments were brought in, destroying the international market for grain. At that time you did put some money in from the federal treasury to help our farmers over that difficult period. I give you full credit for that. Incidentally, we did the same when we were in the same position. I cannot think of a sector of agriculture that will gain much from this measure.

I have learned from long experience that if it is in the political interest of the United States, be it in North Dakota, Montana, Minnesota or any other part of the country, to make some adjustment, they do it and argue about it afterward. We had a situation like that this summer. Certain agreements were reached, not only under the GATT, but under the FTA with regard to durum wheat. They threatened to stop us. In fact, they gave us formal notice. We were not to ship any more durum wheat except within their quotas. That imposition was not by agreement; they just did it. I know why. Some senators from North Dakota and Montana and members of the House of Representatives insisted that that be done. There is nothing unusual about it. They do it all the time. I have experienced that kind of problem before.

Some honourable senators may know of someone in agriculture who will gain as a result of the passage of these new rules under the GATT. I cannot think of anyone.

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Olson. It relates to whether he is prepared to make a further commitment to the concerns Senator Spivak has expressed.

It is true that many sectors will lose a bit. However, there is an overall gain. It is a great piece of legislation because it came from our side. As the honourable senator has pointed out, we helped the grain growers, and never did we tell the grain growers how to sell their wheat, as had transpired in the past.

B.C. sugar will be dramatically affected by this particular action. Can Senator Olson tell me whether he and his colleagues on that side of the house are prepared to make certain that the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture take up these causes with the Mickey Kantors of this world to make certain that we receive a fair deal? The honourable senator is in a position to greatly influence the ministers.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was not speaking for the government. We have a Leader of the Government in the Senate who can find the answers to the honourable senator's question. I am not sure how she would want to answer that kind of question.

The honourable senator can be sure of one thing: This government will do all things reasonable to protect Canadian interests. That has been, and still is, the practice of the Liberal Party. I would bet that they will do something. Nor do I know how much they will brag about it, as the honourable senator has just done with regard to the good agreement that has brought on all this trouble.

In any event, I am sure that what the honourable senator has said was an off-the-cuff remark. The Minister of International Trade, Roy MacLaren, and the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Goodale, were in Washington when we had a dispute last July regarding shipping high quantities of wheat. I was there as well.

The honourable senator may rest assured that something will be done, although I am not in a position to give a commitment for or on behalf of the government.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can. I am sorry I missed Senator Spivak's speech. I can assure you, particularly with regard to the issue of sugar, that the Canadian government, through the Minister of International Trade in particular, has had, and will continue to have, repeated contact with his American counterparts on that question. Indeed, I spoke to both ministers this morning to urge them on to greater heights.

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I speak as a farmer. The honourable senator said that there has been no gains. I am more optimistic. We must recognize the reality of a global economy. I am not suggesting that there will not be any problems with the new arrangement encompassed by this bill. Basically, this measure will reduce subsidies around the world. Granted, the process will take some time. If I can speak for farmers at all, and I have spent my life doing so, I say that we can compete with anyone in the world if we are on a level playing field. I believe that this bill, in its entirety, accomplishes that.

I was close to the Right Honourable Prime Minister Mulroney when he forged ahead with this bill. I am as pleased as I can be to hear that the Liberals have finally come around to the fact that we must live in the real world and recognize that there is a global economy out there that will pay big benefits to Canadian producers.

Agriculture today is responsible for over 40 per cent of the balance of payments in this country. It is an important part of our economy. This bill will be good, not only for farmers, but for all of Canada.

Senator Olson: I do not think you understood the question.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Austin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading on this bill.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I am sure my remarks will be a relief to many in this chamber.

First, I should like to say that I appreciate the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition on many of the items that he has raised.

With respect to the question of free trade, I have always believed that the party to which I belong has historically espoused free trade and continues to do so. I am delighted that the Conservative Party has come to free trade in the past decade.

However, in explanation of the Conservative Party policy, I want to say that, in earlier times in Canadian history, the grand old national policy probably served well the development of Canada in general, although it did not serve the development of Western Canada as well as it might have.

However, the point is that all sides of this house concur in multilateral processes to develop greater access to trade. We all know that Canada is trade vulnerable. Both the previous government and this government are on a common path in terms of this legislation.

With respect to the free trade debate of 1988, there were obvious differences in the quality of the "free trade agreement." I was unhappy that the negotiators did not achieve the targets set by Prime Minister Mulroney when he announced the negotiations. However, that is in the past. We concur today, and I am glad that we do.

With respect to the suggestion that the bill be sent to a number of committees, I appreciate that the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate is not pressing that suggestion. The best way to deal with the questions that need to be dealt with in committee is in the Foreign Affairs Committee, which is already seized in general of the topic of multilateral free trade, has developed an expertise, and can move quickly to deal with more specific questions.

With respect to Senator Spivak's comments, I am glad that my leader has responded. I acknowledge that this is not a "made in heaven" agreement; this is a tough bargain. It has taken years and years to cut. As Senator Olson said, on balance, it is in the Canadian interest.

I acknowledged the role of the Honourable Michael Wilson when I spoke yesterday. I understand very well the contribution that he made. I was perhaps a little less fair to my own side in not acknowledging the role played by the Honourable Roy MacLaren and the officials under his responsibility, under the leadership of Peter Sutherland, who became the GATT leader and whose talents had a lot to do with the final act.

Having said that, honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Austin, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. William M. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, following discussions with my friends across the way, when we adjourn tomorrow we will adjourn until two o'clock on Monday afternoon.

Next week we will sit from Monday to Friday, and when we arrive on Monday, we will have a supply bill before us. Bill C-57 has just been referred to committee. That will keep us busy.

Next week we will probably receive Bill C-46, to establish the Department of Industry, and Bill C-352, to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services, and possibly Bill C-53, to establish the Department of Heritage.

All honourable senators know how this business works. We may have more bills. In any event, the committees will all meet next week. I will discuss with my leader and my colleagues across the way whether we should have one full day of committee meetings next week. I am making this announcement now in order to give everyone an opportunity to make their travel arrangements.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, in view of that information, perhaps we could have leave for the Euthanasia Committee to sit on Monday afternoon at 3:30, in order to hear witnesses? We have had these witnesses scheduled for over a month now, in the apparently foolish expectation that the Senate would not be sitting, or at least not in the afternoon. One of the witnesses is the Minister of Health, and Monday is probably the only time we can hear her.

I would very much appreciate leave for our committee to sit at 3:30 p.m. on Monday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, I do not object to what Senator Neiman has suggested, but perhaps we should postpone a decision until this afternoon, at which time we will know which committees will meet. We can then find out which day would be best for most of the committees to meet.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I agree with that.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask what, if anything, the honourable senator sees beyond next Friday by way of business for the Senate?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed, is it agreed that we will defer Senator Neiman's motion to later this day?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Petten: Senator Murray, would you repeat your question, please?

Senator Murray: I am asking what, if anything the government sees beyond next week by way of business for the Senate?

Senator Petten: As a former leader of both government and opposition, I think you know how this place operates at this time of the year. Several bills that are now in the other place may come forward to us at any time. There are also several at the third reading stage, and two or three others which could be here next week, and we must be here to deal with them.

Senator Murray: Is the honourable senator suggesting that the Senate may sit during the week of December 19?

Senator Petten: That surely is a possibility, honourable senators.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Supplementary Estimates (B) and (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995, presented in the Senate on December 6, 1994.

Hon. C. William Doody moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, I want to say just a few words of explanation on the Supplementary Estimates (B) and (C), which are the second and third Supplementary Estimates for the 1994-95 fiscal year.

The total of both sets of Estimates is approximately $2 billion. The committee's report contains precise numbers for the various components of expenditure, usually to three decimal points, which honourable senators can read but might find tedious to listen to.

Budgetary expenditures in Supplementary Estimates (B) and (C) total $1,768,000 and increase total budgetary estimates to $162.9 billion. The expenditure framework announced in the February 1994 budget and discussed in Part I of the Main Estimates consists of the projected budgetary estimates for 1994-95 and amounts to $163.6 billion. In other words, if the present Supplementary Estimates are approved, $700 million will remain in the framework for additional spending for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance generally observed that lapses in year-end adjustments reduce total budgetary expenditures on balance, often quite substantially. However, honourable senators will have noticed that the expenditures in these Estimates consist of several large positive and negative amounts in the statutory component. In particular, a reduction of $3.4 billion is reported in the Consolidated Specified Purposes Accounts and appears nowhere else in the Supplementary Estimates (B) document.

From the Treasury Board's news release we find that this represents a decrease in benefit payments from the Unemployment Insurance Account. This decrease, in turn, is the result of several factors: more stringent eligibility requirements, in particular an increase in the number of weeks' work required to receive UI benefits; reduction in the benefit rate and a drop in the number of UI claimants caused by improved economic growth and job creation.

I suspect that another contributing factor is the large number of unemployed who have exhausted their benefits and are now presumably on social assistance, or whatever other source of income they have managed to find.

Unfortunately, this substantial saving is offset by an additional requirement of $3.3 billion for interest charges on the public debt resulting from interest rates that have risen beyond the levels forecast by the Minister of Finance in his February 1994 budget. The Department of Finance does not anticipate further substantial increases in statutory interest rate payments during the balance of the fiscal year.

However, if such increases did materialize, and if they were not offset by further reductions in UI payments or other major expenditure cuts, the government would be hard pressed to remain within its expenditure framework, and would almost certainly have to resort to significant, unplanned additional cuts and discretionary expenditures or find additional sources of revenue. We all know, of course, that the forecasting of interest rates in this country is a very uncertain science.

Honourable senators will recall that the so-called Established Programs Financing transfers to the provinces in respect of health care and post-secondary education were frozen on a per capita basis by the previous government. These transfers are made up of cash and tax components. Supplementary Estimates (B) reports increases of $602 million for health care and $210 million for post-secondary education, which appear in the Estimates of the Departments of Health and Human Resources Development respectively.

The increases are due to larger than forecast population increases in several provinces, and to a shortfall in the value of the tax points. The latter occurred despite the increase in economic growth and must be made up by higher federal cash payments to the affected provincial governments.

The Estimates of the Department of Finance include a very substantial appropriation of $527 million to reduce the debt obligations of certain heavily indebted countries. As the report explains, the debts are owed principally by Egypt and Poland to the Canadian Wheat Board and to the Export Development Corporation. The debt relief is part of a package agreed to by an informal grouping of governments known as the Club of Paris. An official of the Department of Finance informed your committee that the $527 million was only an instalment, and that further amounts would be requested to reduce the debts of Egypt and Poland in the 1995-96 fiscal year.

As well, nearly $102 million has been requested by the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade for technical and humanitarian assistance to countries of Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

I might say that the Supplementary Estimates (C) consist of only one vote, a $1 vote, the purpose of which is to extend the government's guarantee of up to $315 million on mortgages issued by the Mortgage Insurance Company of Canada to a purchaser of these mortgage assets, which requires that Vote 12B of Appropriation Act No. 3, 1990-1991, be repealed.

At its one meeting on the Supplementary Estimates, your committee examined the various proposed appropriations of statutory expenditures with its usual care. Officials of the Treasury Board secretariat will be providing written answers to certain specific questions of committee members at a later date.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the honourable senator a question? In his report, there is a request for approval of some $1.9 million for Supplementary Estimates for the Senate. The figure of $1,872,000 is recorded in the report for additional operating costs for the Senate, so states the report, with a certain amount for committees and a certain amount as a carry-forward.

My attention is drawn by the paragraph which states that:

> Officials —

— I assume they mean Treasury Board officials —

> — pointed out to the committee that, by tradition, the Treasury Board accepts the recommendations of the Internal Economy Committee without change and includes them in the estimates.

Does this mean that the policy is to have Supplementary Estimates of the Senate go directly from the Internal Economy Committee to the government without approval of the full chamber? Perhaps the question should be addressed to the deputy chairman in the absence of the chairman. I do not recall this happening before.

Senator Doody: You are absolutely right, senator. It is not a National Finance Committee responsibility. However, my experience has been that all budgetary proposals from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration are approved in this chamber before they go anywhere. That has been the custom during my 10 or 11 years on that committee.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is the Chairman of the National Finance Committee confirming that these estimates did not come to this chamber but went directly to the government?

Senator Doody: I would not presume to say that here.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not recall seeing them. I am wondering if anyone can answer that question. Why were these Estimates not brought before the chamber prior to being presented to the government for their scrutiny, and then returned to us for ratification with all the additional Supplementary Estimates?

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I will try to help the situation. I do not have all the information, honourable senators. However, if I remember correctly, certainly a large component of the Supplementary Estimates were for the special joint committees on defence and foreign policy, as well as for the Special Euthanasia Committee, which budgets were approved by this body, by the Senate.

I am trying to recollect what other component there would be in that particular Supplementary Estimate. Those three were certainly presented in the chamber, and approved by the chamber, with the full knowledge that it would be a supplementary request for funds.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will not quibble with my honourable friend on that one. However, I certainly ask him to confirm the statement that, by tradition, Treasury Board accepts the recommendations of the Internal Economy Committee without change and includes them in the Estimates. That seems to suggest that the Internal Economy Committee can define the financial requirements of this chamber without the chamber approving them.

Senator Di Nino: I am obviously not about to become involved in a debate with my leader. However, I do not think that his interpretation is correct. If part of that Supplementary Estimate contains funds that were not approved by this chamber, I believe that would be incorrect as well.

I am not privy to that, and I do not have before me the make-up of that report. Being one of the new kids on the block, perhaps I do not fully understand the process. However, it is my understanding that all appropriations, expenses, budgets and estimates are presented to the whole body of the Senate for approval, and that the Internal Economy Committee takes action on that basis.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Berntson, that this report be adopted now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA'S DEFENCE POLICY

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy entitled "Security in a Changing World," tabled in the Senate on October 31, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Forrestall).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this motion is adjourned in the name of Senator Forrestall. However, Senator Grafstein wishes to speak to the matter. Is it agreed that Senator Grafstein may speak now, and that the order remain in the name of Senator Forrestall?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Come, honourable senators, let us praise the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy entitled, "Security in a Changing World," for it has constructed for us a rather visible platform to display and rearrange, if we so choose, our values as a sovereign state.

The committee has been incisive in its proscriptions and clinical in its prescriptions. Yet overarching restraint has created a strange misalliance between means and ends. We must do more for less.

Like all public institutions, the committee felt captive to, seemed caught in, a vice of economic constraint. Like Cassandra, the committee warned that the minimum levels of defence preparedness have now been reached.

Let us be blunt. With the onslaught of the present and anticipated cuts in defence, Canada will share a rank amongst the lowest, if not the lowest, of the nations in the developed world. In terms of percentage of budget and percentage of GDP allocated to defence, Canada has marched smartly to the rear.

Do with less, we are told, less defence even though the facts cry for more. What follows from the bottom line of this regime of fiscal restraint? A creative disengagement or worse, a corrosive appeasement. Are these, as Churchill once warned, "the years of the locusts"?

The so-called "peace dividend" has already been long spent. Is there any muscle left on the military bone?

The committee agrees that the future and the nature of the threats to Canada's security are unpredictable. Could Canada be flooded by sudden waves of instability at home while simultaneously compelled to respond to instability abroad?

Risks to our civil society are more complex, more difficult to assay, less malleable to solution, yet threats and risks have not diminished. Rather, they have increased in complexity and quantum.

We are told that the term "defence" is now a misnomer. Rather, contemporary strategists advise us that we should better think in terms of "security."

Then, honourable senators, what is the nature of a sovereign state's "security" in this swift changing and ever unstable world? Against what threats should our Canada stand on guard?

The committee challenges us to probe this singular question. Canada occupies, as we know, the second largest land mass in the world. It is encompassed on three sides by the longest coastline in the world. Many thought, many dreamed that with the end of the Cold War, peace was finally at hand. Surely, many hoped, many believed, world peace and global tranquillity would follow. Some even swore that the millennium was at hand.

Unhappily, as the committee points out, and as other observers tell us, the reverse has happened. Sadly, the human condition has not improved. The so-called "New World Order" offered only a momentary, illusory respite as the Cold War melted. Stability, frozen by the superpowers, has been supplanted by settling "old scores" chased by "new mobs." With the bipolar meltdown, old evils and new have emerged in greater vigour, without any proven or tested modalities of strategic restraint.

The balance of power, once an old and trusted concept in the hands of developed states, of powerful states, is now of limited effectiveness. Instability reigns in practically every region of the world. There are now more than 57 wars, mini-wars, micro wars, raging across the globe, and there are countless more outbursts of violent conduct in practically every urban core on every continent. Violence now touches us all.

What are we to do in a time of fiscal restraint with such global and domestic instability? How do we fulfil our duty to preserve and secure our civil society? Can we evade our public duty and stand by as we witness our withdrawal into smaller and ever smaller circles of security?

What solace, honourable senators, can we garner from the world's thinkers? Eric Hobsbawn, the pre-eminent English political scientist, labels our period "The Age of Extremes" in his soon to be published work. Norman Stone, the Oxford historian, likens our era to the Middle Ages. The nation state is decomposing before our eyes, these thinkers tell us.

You will recall Barbara Tuchman, the brilliant American historian, in her examination of the fourteenth century called A Distant Mirror, when she described the hoofprints of four horsemen of St. John's vision that had become seven: endless plague — read AIDS; ceaseless war — we see it and hear it; crippling taxes — every government has the same problem; war lords and brigandage — the gory lawlessness in our streets; corrupt government — bad government; insurrection against authority; and religious schism and furore wherever we look. If we add to that list of seven, ecological disasters and immigration floods, could this not be an accurate picture — not of the Middle Ages, but of the last decade of this century?

Let us draw on another bank of ideas from two astute yet diverse observers for an even sharper focus. Hans Magnus Ezensberger is Germany's leading essayist and journalist. In his recent and insightful book Civil Wars, he reminds us, as did the committee, that Europeans had hoped the end of the Cold War would usher in an era of peace. Peace has given us no such security. In reality, the "New World Order" brought forth nothing "new" and certainly not "order." He joins with the committee in his analysis that with the removal of the nuclear balance of terror constructed between the superpowers, there has emerged a more fragmented and more unpredictable world with atomized and decomposing states.

As in the Middle Ages, the modern nation state's central authority is under attack on all fronts by destructive violence and lawless conduct. Furthermore, the speed of any outbreak of perverse conduct, aided and abetted by CNN, has now been matched with an even slower gap, a wider lag in the ability of democracies to respond. Democracies seem to lack the will — and even the ability — to calculate the nature of the threats and pay for the methodology of quick response. Meanwhile, we see a proliferating number of conventional weapons, ballistic and weapons of mass destruction, nuclear, chemical, biological.

Now, as the committee points out, we face the global threat to life and limb by the pervasiveness of land mines. With the emergence of religious and nationalist fundamentalism from within and without fracturing and splitting civil society, the nation states seem immobilized, unable to cope. The Yugoslavia disaster has paralysed the UN, crippled NATO, and immobilized the CSCE — and all this in two short years.

In today's Financial Times, delegates at the CSCE in Budapest call recent events in Europe "the most spectacular diplomatic failure" since the end of the Cold War. To make matters worse, I was reminded on our trip last year to the United Nations that senior officials had told us that there are in excess of 50 million land mines scattered around the world, most of which are uncharted.

Ezensberger parallels the thinking of the committee, and traces the accelerating trend to destabilization by the emergence of religious fundamentalist and nationalist organisms within and without states.

I know you will agree that the need for efforts on arms control and verification is a global priority. The committee wisely points out that the emergence of new regional power centres in the Asia-Pacific region dramatically change yet again the "global security equation."

But Ezensberger probes much more deeply, using Europe as his prism. These complex global forces are at work in domestic conflicts as disparate as America's racial uprisings in Los Angeles, and ranging to mindless carnage and ethnic cleansing in Bosnia. They ignite fires of hate and violence from within and from without. Within the borders of old Yugoslavia, the nationalist religious fires burn brightly, and all these fires should convince the Western elites that traditional approaches to conflict resolution have failed. Threats do not work, because the threatened recognize Western disarray in meeting not only global but domestic threats.

Ezensberger argues that we are now confronted with "an autism of violence," an insatiable rush toward self-destruction and collective madness. This condition has spawned what he calls "molecular wars," and he agrees with Hanna Arendt, that great scholar of totalitarianism, that hatred now needs no leaders at all. This call to violence may find its origins in what Freud called the "death drive," the mindless urge to self-destruction, even at the expense of individual survival. This, honourable senators, is hubris. This scorching analysis offers a grim, difficult, dangerous future for our children.

The President of the prestigious Council of Foreign Relations, Leslie Gelb, illuminates the issue of security from a different yet similar vein. In a recent issue of Foreign Affairs, he argues that this new savagery is an "all-corrosive danger, the teacup wars filled with countless bodies and horrors, the scourge of ethnic and civil violence." He concurs that the West deeply underestimated the prospects for peace and stability after the end of the Cold War. More cogently, he echoes the argument that we may still be worrying about old problems that haunted us; "Russia, a rampant Germany, while neglecting the new root problems, wars of national debilitation," Gelb writes:

> If we fail to ameliorate and check this scourge, both the victims and the unpunished killers will undo much of what we value, and undermine our efforts to mould a just and stable international order.

What are the risks to Canada, secure as we are, secure as we feel, in the northern half of the American continent? In a globe with collapsing time and space, there are no borders and there are no walls. No ocean can protect us, either here at home or abroad, from these spontaneous, mindless, malicious acts. On line, CNN will never let us escape. Gelb points out that:

> The failure to deal adequately with such strife is to do something about mass murder, and genocide corrodes the essence of democratic society.

Both Ezensberger and Gelb remind us that we must obliterate the illusion that we in the West are secure.

Thus, honourable senators, all experts agree. The committee agrees. What is to be done? What, honourable senators, if we are not prepared?

Several weeks ago, I had an opportunity to discuss this issue at a meeting in Vancouver of the Atlantik Brucke, some of Canada's and Germany's finest military strategists. All had served in senior echelons of defence. I posed this question to them: What if Canada were challenged today on several fronts at the same time? Could Canada, with its existing array of forces, counter the eruptions of two major civil strifes at home while, at the same time, meeting the challenges of one or two significant conflicts if they erupted simultaneously abroad? These domestic challenges could ignite domestic insecurity, and the international challenges would interrupt our domestic tranquillity, both simultaneously weakening Canada's interests, Canada's civil society.

All agreed that Canada could not, and would not, be able to meet these several challenges at the same time with our present defence establishment, let alone the newly proposed, reduced version.

As Canadians, we pride ourselves as being a sovereign state. Yet, the committee is prepared to nestle under the comforting wings of the American security blanket. The new dialectic is "shared security." However, what if America disengages? What if we are in violent disagreement with American nostrums? What if NATO remains divided, as it is today, on strategy? What would become of our sovereignty then?

Our primary strategic architectonic rests today on "shared security," on "multilateralism." But what if this system goes down? What if our expectations fail? What are our fallback "security" arrangements? What are our fallback alternatives?

Meanwhile, as we retreat into ever smaller circles of defence, our treaty responsibilities explode and expand almost without our active concurrence. Under NATO, our primary "shared security" defence mechanism, we are obliged to come to the defence of the boundaries of all NATO members. NATO boundaries are Canada's boundaries.

Meanwhile, notwithstanding Canada's limited contributions to NATO, we are left out of the Contact Group now dealing with Bosnia. The Contact Group is composed of America, Britain, Germany and France. Despite our contingent on the ground, while America and Germany have no troops on the ground, Canada is left out! Are we left out because we have reduced further our already slender commitment to NATO? Do we no longer count? These, honourable senators, are important strategic issues that all stand on the nature and extent of our commitment in Canada to Canada's defence.

Honourable senators, last week, President Clinton signed the NATO Participation Act which allows the U.S. to supply weaponry and American technology to assist those states in the transition to full NATO membership; a transition which Boris Yeltsin strongly opposes and opposed this week at the CSCE meeting in Budapest. Is there, as one astute European journalist noted, a new kind of Berlin Wall being secretly built on U.S. war technology and NATO interoperability?

The Czech Republic, Poland, Hungary, and Slovakia have received already, or are about to receive, advanced avionics that will allow their planes to appear friendly on the NATO screens. Russia should ask what is up in NATO! What new threat does this pose to global security?

Honourable senators, let me return to my core analysis. "Defence" or "security" is a state's insurance. Canadians believe in insurance; Canadians love insurance. Canadians are the largest purchasers of insurance policies per capita in the world. We are a nation of savers. We are also a nation committed to sharing. We are a nation committed to voluntarism.

Therein may lie the answer to our present predicament. Therein may lie the solution to our current conundrum. Norway, Sweden, Finland, and Switzerland have been confronted by similar challenges. All are peaceful nations committed to world peace and stability. All of them are almost neutralist in their bones, yet all have provided a full "security" establishment as a bulwark against civil or international unrest.

Can we not, honourable senators, reorder our priorities in Canada and unleash popular interest in a much larger reserve force, sprouting in every corner of the land, every corner of Canada, enlisting our national spirit? Our peacekeepers are the repositories today of Canada's greatest pride. Canada's defence establishment is the most federal of all our state organisms, and Canadians love to work in organizations. Many of us have taken our sons and now our daughters to hockey and to Cubs. We are a nation of joiners. We love to interact. Why cannot that same spirit of participation, interaction and teamwork be tapped for a vibrant, volunteer, reserve force? Why cannot each Canadian commit a week or two of his time to military preparedness?

Hans Magnus Ezensberger wrote:

> Even the most stupid person should grasp one thing; renouncing the state's monopoly of force has consequences which may harm the political class itself.

The end result, he argues, is the need for "self-defence." If the state refuses to lead, whether it be individuals or groups, they will arm themselves. Ezensberger was thinking of mass terror on the streets of Germany, but his prescription, I believe, is valid for Canada.

Honourable senators, can we not ask Canada's business establishment to guarantee to those who choose to volunteer that they will suffer no job loss opportunity if they take a week or two each year to stand on guard for Canada? Of course, the military establishment would have to revolutionize its thinking and reorder its priorities. We would have to be prepared to revive and promote volunteer reserves.

Honourable senators, Canada does have a choice. We are ruled by the twin gods, Prometheus and Epimetheus. Prometheus was punished for stealing fire from the gods, giving it to the human race, and for many other skills. His brother Epimetheus took Pandora to wife, and despite his brother Prometheus' warning, allowed her to open up Pandora's box, which let lose all the troubles in the world, leaving hope alone.

Honourable senators, we do not have to choose between disaster and isolation. With leadership, all is possible. Canadians are waiting for a clear call.

John Keegan, in his masterful work A History of Warfare, concluded that the nature of culture cannot be separated from warfare. Since the nature of the human race has not learned restraint or denial, we must remain on guard.

In the government's Red Book —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret to inform the honourable senator that his time is up.

Does the honourable senator have leave to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grafstein: In the government's Red Book, and in our social reforms, we are told there are no rights without responsibilities. If we wish to defend our civil rights in a civil society, rights that are being eroded because of fiscal restraint, we must accept our individual responsibilities for securing our defence. The misalliance must be transformed into an alliance of means that match ends.

Honourable senators, Canadians must expect no more, and demand no less.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Would the honourable senator consider a question?

Senator Grafstein: Yes, I will.

Senator Kenny: I enjoyed the speech by the honourable senator. I was intrigued that the solution selected was a larger reserve. Given that the committee heard testimony that the cost of a reserve soldier in the militia is roughly two-thirds the cost of a regular soldier; given the problems with ensuring that reserves will be available when we need them; given the difficulties that exist with legislation that would require reserves to appear if called for — which is related to the job security problem the honourable senator alluded to — why did the honourable senator select an enlargement of the reserves over an expansion of the regular force as a solution to the problem?

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I preach for more in both categories. I also understand fiscal restraint. I am suggesting that wherever we can save dollars, notwithstanding the demands, perhaps that is the way to go.

I believe we are undermanned in our main defence force. I believe the government needs more. I believe we have chopped too much. I do not think we will be effective, but I think in addition to that, we need a much more vibrant reserve. Thus, if you are asking me what I think we need, I think we need both, and in abundance.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Will the honourable senator answer another question?

Senator Grafstein: Certainly.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, instead of a full-time reserve, how about larger numbers of part-time and daytime reservists? We could use that reserve as a means of sucking up unemployment in parts of the country where unemployment is endemic. We could also have a larger cadet corps. Both solutions would allow for intensive technical training of these people.

Senator Grafstein: I welcome and agree with the honourable senator's suggestion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the debate remain standing in the name of the Honourable Senator Forrestall?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

> That the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide have power to sit at three o'clock in the afternoon on Monday, December 12, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. William M. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when Senator Neiman arranged for her committee to meet on Monday, she was not aware that we would be sitting. I agree that her committee should be able to meet.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the subject of committee meetings, can the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee tell us what his plans are for hearings on Bill C-57?

Hon. John B. Stewart: I cannot make a definitive statement with respect to plans, honourable senators. However, I can be somewhat helpful. I am hoping that the steering committee will be able to meet tomorrow at ten o'clock, and I will ask all the other members of the committee to attend at that time to participate in the planning of the work of the committee on Bill C-57.

I doubt that it will be possible to start the work on that bill this week. However, I hope that we can have meetings perhaps all day Tuesday and Wednesday, and Thursday may be available as well. I do not know what the committee members will want to hear. At the moment, there is that block of time which seems to be available. Of course, if there are more witnesses, the committee could presumably carry on into the following week.

By noon tomorrow, I hope to know more from both sides of the house about the number of witnesses from whom the committee needs to hear.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 8, 1994

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

TREATMENT OF ABORIGINAL VETERANS

EXTENSION OF FINAL REPORT DATE—
REPORT OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk, Chairperson of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 8, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on January 20, 1994, to examine and report upon treatment of aboriginal veterans following the First and Second World Wars and the Korean War, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its report be extended from December 15, 1994, to no later than March 30, 1995.

Respectfully submitted,

A. RAYNELL ANDREYCHUK

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Andreychuk, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SENATE ESTIMATES 1995-96—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 8, 1994

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1995-96 and recommends their adoption.

The total Senate Estimates for 1995-96 will be $42,014,993. In the previous three years, the Senate budget showed a cumulative reduction of 5.8% (2.5% in 1992-93, 1.9% in 1993-94 and 1.4% in 1994-95). This year, although there is no overall increase in the Senate budget, there are a variety of reductions in areas where, it is hoped, there will be the least impact on the services offered by Senate Administration. For example, the closure of the Privy Council entrance to the East Block after hours (provided the Senate is not sitting) and on weekends, and the elimination of the Tour and Relief constable have allowed for a reduction of $116,000 in salaries.

Total person-years have gone down by 10, mainly through attrition, and stand at 437.

A summary of the Expenditure Budget 1995-96 accompanies this report.

Respectfully submitted,

CONSIGLIO DI NINO

Hon C. William Doody: Excuse me, will copies of this report be distributed? Do we have copies? I would prefer to look at a copy.

Senator Di Nino: Yes, honourable senators, copies will be distributed. I have them here.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. However, with leave of the Senate, I should like to make a few comments at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: No.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, before leave is granted, I would like to have a copy of the report so that I will know what we are talking about.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, leave is not granted. However, the motion is before us. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS—
BUDGET, 1994-95—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Thursday, December 8, 1994

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the budget presented to it by the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995, for the purpose of examining matters in accordance with Rule 86(1)(f). The budget is as follows:

| Professional and Other Services | $2,500 |
| TOTAL | $2,500 |

Respectfully submitted,

CONSIGLIO DI NINO

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Di Nino, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUDGET FOR CSCE PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY—
REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Thursday, December 8, 1994

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

FIFTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends that funds totalling $89,576 be authorized as the Senate share of the total budget of $298,590 for the 4th Annual Session of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe Parliamentary Assembly as per the usual 70%-30% sharing agreement between the two Houses.

Respectfully submitted,

CONSIGLIO DI NINO

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Di Nino, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE—SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET,

Thursday, December 8, 1994

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SIXTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the supplementary budget presented to it by the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee for the period ending March 30, 1995, for the purpose of its examination of the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide, as authorized by the Senate on February 23, 1994 and November 29, 1994. The budget is as follows:

| Transportation and Communications | 1,000 |
| All Other Expenditures | 1,500 |

Respectfully submitted,

CONSIGLIO DI NINO

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Monday next, December 12, 1994, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, by two o'clock on Monday we should have the supply bill, as well as Bills C-56, C-51 and C-46.

With the committees working on Bill C-57, and with other committees meeting next week, it is my suggestion — and I have discussed this with my colleagues opposite — that on Monday we meet at 2 p.m. For Tuesday, I suggest that the Senate meet at 1:30 p.m. in order to give committees an opportunity to sit in the afternoon. On Wednesday, we could devote the entire afternoon to committees, leaving the morning for caucus. If, however, we find on Tuesday afternoon that we need to meet on Wednesday afternoon for a short time, then the house could meet, as could the committees.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS FOR INTERNAL COMBUSTION ENGINES BILL

Hon. Colin Kenny presented Bill S-7, to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for internal combustion engines.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Kenny, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, December 13, 1994.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate I shall move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, December 13, and at two o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesday, December 14, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

I would be prepared to give an explanation of my notice if it would be helpful to honourable senators.

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): If the honourable senator would give an explanation, we would appreciate it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stewart: It may be that this motion is redundant. I say that because of what Senator Petten told us earlier this afternoon.

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs will be taking under consideration Bill C-57, to implement the agreement establishing the World Trade Organization. Our plan is for the committee to begin its work at nine o'clock on Tuesday morning, and then resume that work at 3:30 p.m. on Tuesday afternoon, even though the Senate might then be sitting.

On Wednesday, we propose to go back into committee at two o'clock in the afternoon, again if we have the permission of the Senate. We are also contemplating the prospect of a meeting of the committee on Thursday morning. At the moment, it would appear that that schedule of meetings would be sufficient for the consideration of the bill at the committee stage.

However, as I said earlier, in view of what Senator Petten has said, it may be that we do not need this motion, but I thought it would be prudent to have permission, just in case someone objects to giving unanimous consent next week.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, perhaps it would facilitate matters if the Senate gave unanimous consent to Senator Stewart's motion?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Stewart, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kenny:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, December 13, and at two o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesday, December 14, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask Senator Stewart if it is his intention, and that of his committee, to wind up his hearings on Bill C-57 at a certain time, or whether he is flexible in his schedule and, realizing the importance of the bill and the commitment which Canada is making through the adoption of Bill C-57, whether he feels bound by the deadline which Senator Austin suggested, which is January 1, 1995?

Senator Stewart: I gather that the honourable senator is asking me for my estimate as to the time that the committee will require.

The committee has had the advantage of examining the agreement which gave rise to this legislation. At the moment, the witnesses seeking to appear before the committee are not numerous. It is fair to say that there is a good chance that we will be able to complete the work by Thursday next. If necessary, we can come back the following week, but at the moment I do not anticipate that that will be necessary.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Or Friday?

Senator Stewart: That is right, on Friday or Saturday or, indeed, the following week.

Motion agreed to.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday next, December 12, 1994, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples have the power to sit on Tuesday, December 13, 1994, at 3:30 p.m., even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps the same courtesy could be extended to Senator Andrychuk, and unanimous consent be given to her motion at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, in light of the fact that the committee on Aboriginal Peoples is examining Bill C-55, and that we wish to complete hearing a number of unexpected witnesses who have made great expenditures of travel and time, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples have the power to sit at 2:45 p.m. today, Thursday, December 8, 1994, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING SENATE COMMITTEE— NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 13, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of considering at this time the establishment of a Standing Committee on Security and Intelligence.

HEALTH

PROTECTION OF CONSCIENCE IN MEDICAL PROCEDURES— PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have the privilege to place in the hands of the Clerk petitions expressing a plea identical to the one I read in this chamber on March 17, 1994. These petitioners pray that the upper house of Parliament protect health care workers with regard to freedom of conscience in the workplace.

These petitions contain signatures of 1,351 persons from various places throughout Canada.

THE BUDGET

REVIEW OF GOAL FOR DEFICIT REDUCTION— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It was encouraging to listen to the debate on second reading of Bill C-57, and to hear members of the government accepting the leadership of Martin Brian Mulroney's government in the area of world trade.

Senator Austin spoke so eloquently on the virtues of free trade. I recall that in 1988 it set me back to hear how opposed the senator was to the free trade agreement at that time. However, since then the free trade agreements have all been signed and that issue is behind us. Today those agreements are leading to strong economic growth and plant modernization in the country. Ontario is back at the forefront in creating jobs as a result of the Mulroney government's leadership.

On several occasions, I have risen in the Senate to ask whether the government's intention to reduce the deficit by 3 per cent of GDP is an acceptable level compared to the level of the deficit. I have inquired on those occasions when the government will get up the courage to look seriously at expenditures by such government organizations as the CBC. The OECD has now come forward with the opinion that meeting the 3 per cent target is the bare minimum necessary to restore confidence in financial markets after several years of fiscal slippage.

Honourable senators, given that the IMF has said that 3 per cent is not satisfactory, and that the OECD is now saying that 3 per cent of GDP is the barest minimum acceptable, is the government prepared to return to the issue and increase its goal? In my opinion, if we do not begin soon to address some of these areas, we will be in serious economic trouble.

Senator Thériault: Like we were 10 years ago.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator St. Germain for his question.

Honourable senators, the government remains firm in its intention to reduce the deficit by 3 per cent of GDP in three years. The Minister of Finance has indicated in the past, as have I in this house in answer to Senator Jessiman, that the ultimate goal is to eliminate the deficit as quickly as it can be achieved.

A deficit reduction of 3 per cent of GDP will not be easy to achieve; it will call for a great deal of belt-tightening in this country, but the Minister of Finance is prepared to go ahead. We are attempting to achieve a new trend, a deficit reduction process that offers some sense of balance with other economic factors in this country, not just the slashing and cutting that has been in evidence in certain other areas of Canada.

The Minister of Finance is undertaking at the moment an almost revolutionary pre-budget consultation. He is receiving suggestions and advice from people from across the country. He will bring in his budget in February.

I should like to remind my honourable friend that while he has quoted the OECD as discussing this minimum goal, he must remember that, in almost every statistical review of recent days and weeks, Canada has been showing extraordinary strength, whether it be in growth, exports or employment. The employment figure for November is 95,000, the largest increase on record. The country is, at the moment, experiencing a consistent, strong economic advance.

Senator Berntson: When did it start?

Senator Fairbairn: I also remind my honourable friend that while we should listen with respect to advice we receive from outside this country, we must not forget the advice we receive from Canadians. It is on that advice that we will build an economic record which — if one listens to the International Monetary Fund — will show Canada as having the highest rate of growth and employment of the G-7 economies in both 1994 and 1995.

• (1440)

ACTION AGAINST HIGH INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, that economic growth, senators, is due to the leadership that took place between 1984 and 1993. That is on the record.

I hear what the Leader of the Government is saying. I am happy for Canada. There is a great deal of growth taking place, and there is no question that the exports are directly related to the free trade agreement and the NAFTA.

I was in business in 1979, 1980 and 1981 when interest rates were sky high. I see a recurrence of high interest rates coming down the pipe towards us. Once we get into that type of tailspin, the party will be over. If interest rates again reach the 23 per cent and 24 per cent level, the growth that the minister has been speaking about, growth which I hope continues, will be curtailed immediately.

I believe that interest rates will be controlled completely by foreign investors as a result of their investing in our long term debt and the certificates that go with it. Is the government prepared to take action now on this issue? When I say "take action", I do not mean on the backs of ordinary Canadians. I mean with respect to certain programs that Canadians have grown to believe are sacred cows in the system; programs that we can no longer afford.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): As Senator St. Germain knows, my colleague Mr. Massé, at this moment, is undertaking a rigorous program review of all the activities of the federal government, as well as its departments and agencies, to see what can be reduced, what can be changed and what can be done better by someone else. In tandem with the Minister of Finance, he will be bringing forward his conclusions.

As Senator St. Germain knows, the goal of the Minister of Finance in preparing his budget has been a strong preference for the cutting of expenditures rather than other forms of economic activity.

On the question of interest rates, my honourable friend will know that the Federal Reserve in the United States does have an effect on interest rates in Canada. The situation is volatile, as it has been several times already this year.

The other source of volatility in connection with interest rates in Canada is the situation in Quebec. The sooner we have a flat out, straight question which Quebecers can answer in favour of a united Canada, the more secure our economy and our interest rates will be.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SALE OF ARMS TO THAILAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

In the December 7 edition of the The Gazette of Montreal, I read that Canada, in aiming to bolster its depressed defence industry, is planning to sell arms to Thailand. The article states, in part:

> Export curbs on high-tech armaments to Thailand have been eased at a time when other Western arms suppliers are voicing concern over its armed forces' links with serious human-rights abusers in the region.
> Confidential documents obtained by Southam News show that federal officials, acting in accordance with a broad policy approved by Foreign Affairs Minister André Ouellet, are again permitting sales of advanced air-to-surface rocket launchers to the Royal Thai Air Force.

Can the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate shed some light on this situation? Can she tell me, please, that it is not so?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to my honourable friend, the Canadian government confirms that Bristol Aerospace has been issued an export permit for Thailand. That, however, is not a confirmation of sale.

This country continues to implement the 1986 policy on export of military goods, which states that we will not export military goods to countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violations of human rights of their citizens, unless it can be demonstrated that there is no reasonable risk that the goods may be used against the civilian population.

The export application for this permit has been subject to extensive consultation. Its issue will be determined in conformity with government policy guidelines on the export of military goods.

Senator Di Nino: Will the honourable senator please undertake to inform us as to whether any of these restricted sales, or other sales of armaments, will be made or have been made to Thailand, either in the recent past or in the future?

Senator Fairbairn: I will be pleased to report my findings to the house when I am able to do so, honourable senators.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

SUBSTITUTION OF LOANS FOR SUBSIDIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: My question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Honourable senators, on Radio-Canada this morning, I thought I heard a news item respecting the abandonment by ACOA of subsidies to businesses in the Atlantic provinces. I checked today's Quorum, in which I found a brief item respecting Government Services Minister David Dingwall's announcement in Moncton yesterday that, henceforth, loans in lieu of subsidies will be made to businesses in the Atlantic provinces.

What the news was not clear about is that, if this change comes into effect now, whether negotiations now under way for subsidies will be honoured, or whether those negotiations will simply be stopped dead in their tracks. Further, will legislation be required to implement this government decision?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Corbin for his question.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Public Works and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency did, indeed, announce yesterday that ACOA will no longer make grants to industry but, rather, will make repayable loans. This is in keeping with the activity of other regional bodies such as the Western Economic Diversification Fund and FedCorp in the province of Quebec.

My honourable friend may know that, since February 1990, there has been a Treasury Board policy which requires most contributions of over $100,000 to be repaid within the ACOA guidelines. The policy enunciated yesterday by Mr. Dingwall extends that to all capital cost contributions.

I know from my experience with the Western Economic Diversification Fund that the policy of repayable loans is working well. It is aimed primarily at small- and medium-sized business and innovative export opportunities.

My honourable friend asks whether programs that are currently in progress will be affected by this policy. I will check with the minister in that regard and get back to the honourable senator.

BOSNIA

RELEASE OF DETAINED PEACEKEEPERS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in light of the fact that Senator Ottenheimer is occupying the Chair, and knowing that he has a great interest in Bosnia and in our peacekeepers there, I should like to tell my colleagues in the Senate that our 55 peacekeepers are no longer being detained.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers to three questions: a question asked by Senator Gustafson on May 25, 1994; by Senator Ghitter on November 15, 1994; and by Senator Angus on November 29, 1994.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

GRAINS—BREAKDOWN IN TRADE RELATIONS—

(Response to question raised by Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson on May 25, 1994)

Subsequent to a July 1994 International Trade Commission report and following lengthy bilateral negotiations, Canada and the United States reached a one year Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) on grains, which took effect on September 12, 1994. Under the MOU:

— Canada can export 300,000 tonnes of durum wheat and 1.05 million tonnes of other wheat subject to the NAFTA rate of duty, i.e., US$3/tonne; another 150,000 tonnes of durum wheat can be exported at a US$23/tonne rate of duty; any additional exports will be at a US$50/tonne rate of duty;

— a bi-national Joint Commission on Grains, comprised of five experts from each country, has been established to examine grain marketing and support systems in both countries and provide preliminary findings and recommendations to both governments by June 12, 1995; final non-binding recommendations will be reported to both governments by September 11, 1995; the Commission will seek to improve the general understanding of the Canadian and U.S. policies and systems for grains and products in order to achieve lasting solutions for the mutual benefit of farmers and the agri-food industry in North America; and — as part of an agreed peace clause, the U.S. withdrew a GATT Article XXVIII notification and a request to Congress for legislative authority to implement Article XXVIII action which would have effectively established permanent restrictions on Canadian wheat and wheat products, barley and barley products exports to the U.S. The U.S. also agreed not to impose further restrictions on Canadian grains over the life of the MOU. Canada retains its rights to challenge U.S. actions under the GATT and/or the NAFTA, but has agreed not to request a panel or working party pending the outcome of the Joint Commission's work.

HUMAN RIGHTS

THREE GORGES DAM PROJECT—
DISPLACEMENT OF CHINESE CITIZENS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ron Ghitter on November 15, 1994)

Background – Three Gorges Water Resources Project:

Civil works have begun on this project. There are 10,000 workers on site. The Chinese Government has advanced the following benefits for the project:

1. The project will control flooding below the dam site. This will protect an estimated 10 million people from the longstanding problems associated with flooding of the Yangtze River.

2. The coal-based energy sources which China currently uses are a source of environmental concern internationally. The intention of this project is to provide a source of electricity for an economy short of power. It is significant that this source will have a reduced environmental impact.

3. Controlling the water levels of the Yangtze River will improve navigation for both commercial and public boat traffic.

4. The electric power generated by the Three Gorges Dam will provide an impoverished region with much needed economic development.

The Canadian Government believes that the Canadian firms pursuing contracts related to the Three Gorges Water Resources Project are world leaders in their industries and that we should provide support to enable them to compete internationally. We believe that their involvement will contribute to finding solutions for some of the complex technical issues associated with the project.

It is for this reason that the EDC will provide financing for Canadian firms which successfully win contracts associated with the Three Gorges Water Resources Project.

Responses:

1. Is the Government of Canada financing any aspect of the project?

— The Government of Canada is not financing the project;

— The Export Development Corporation (EDC), Canada's official export credit agency, will support Canadian companies, on commercial terms, to finance operations related to the Three Gorges Water Resources Project. The firms must first win the contracts on their own merit.

— There is no concessional or grant element in this type of financing.

2. Are there any details of the relocation of people?

— The Far Eastern Economic Review has reported that 14,000 people have been successfully resettled to date (October 20, 1994).

— According to the World Bank, China has resettled 31.5 million people since 1950 because of railway building, canal building, reservoir creation or urban resettlement — an average of 800,000 per year. Before the 1980's such involuntary resettlements took place without public consultation and without adequate compensation or regulations.

— The World Bank says that China's resettlement policies now meet the World Bank's criteria. Consultation occurs, action is guided by legislation and compensation is adequate (China Involuntary Re-settlement, June 8, 1993).

Has the Honourable Christine Stewart's position on the project changed?

On November 15, the Honourable Christine Stewart emphasized that the Chinese government has decided to proceed with the project. She also emphasized the need for a policy of engagement with China which encompasses a broad range of issues, including human rights and environmental issues.

Canada has a memorandum of understanding with China to share environmental knowledge. We are working with Chinese officials in a variety of areas in this regard. The Environmental Industry Strategy which was announced by Deputy Prime Minister Sheila Copps and Minister of Industry John Manley is a further example of the Government's determination to export our environmental expertise to countries like China, who have identified the benefits of foreign involvement.

This Government believes that a broadly based China policy will be the most effective. Canadian firms are capable of making an important and substantial contribution to the Three Gorges Water Resources Project. At the same time, Canada is also actively involved in development programs with China which emphasize education, women in society, the environment, cultural exchange, human rights and democratic development.

This government recognizes that challenges exist on these fronts, but we believe isolating them from Canadian ideas and expertise is not the answer. We believe our policy of engagement will help our international partners to find the best solutions.

This project could mean thousands of jobs for Canadians. Approximately $4 billion is expected to be spent on foreign equipment and services. Of this, Canadian industry is bidding to supply generators, transmission and other equipment, engineering and project management services valued at between $700 million and $1.1 billion. Direct Canadian exports could be expected to reach $400 to $700 million. This has the potential to create thousands of jobs in Canada — from 3,500 to 35,000 direct and indirect person years. China has repeatedly expressed its hope that Canadian companies will participate.

ORGANIZATION FOR ECONOMIC COOPERATION AND DEVELOPMENT

APPOINTMENT OF DONALD JOHNSTON AS SECRETARY GENERAL—LENGTH OF TERM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. David Angus on November 29, 1994)

Mr. Donald Johnston was appointed on November 29 by the Council of the OECD as Secretary General of the Organization for a term to begin on June 1, 1996. He has been appointed to a full five year term. Mr. Jean-Claude Paye of France was re-appointed as Secretary General of the OECD for a term that will run from November 30, 1994 to May 31, 1996.

There was no amendment to the functions of the Secretary General for either appointment. Mr. Paye and Mr. Johnston will serve consecutive mandates with the normal roles and responsibilities of the office of Secretary General.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy entitled "Security in a Changing World", tabled in the Senate on October 31, 1994. — (Honourable Senator Forrestall).

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, as an alumnus of the National Defence College, I would like to share with this house a few thoughts about Canada's defence policy.

I was not a member of the special joint committee which just tabled its report, but I read it with much interest and I believe that, on the whole, it is a good start, since it seems that the government will go along with some of the recommendations.

Senator De Bané gave us a good idea of the philosophy which guided his group, and there is wisdom in the report. The report outlined very well the new world situation in which our defence strategy must fit.

I also read the dissenting opinions of Bloc Québécois members, which deal more with foreign policy matters than with defence, per se.

I also took note of the report of the group of 21 which contains innovative assumptions, although they are rather wishful thinking in my opinion, because they assume that we will never again be faced with military threats. Who knows? I do not think that we can assume that Canada will not make enemies because it is such a good world citizen and, therefore, will not have to defend itself in the foreseeable future. We cannot take for granted that our powerful neighbour has a vested interest in our protection and that we are consequently secure, even without an army.

[English]

There is no free lunch in economics and also in matters of security.

Lastly, I greatly appreciate the report of the thirteen-member committee, an informal group of people, many of whom I am acquainted with, including Mr. Gilles Lamontagne, Mr. Legault and Mr. Chouinard who submitted recommendations that warrant the government's attention. I hope that it does pay closer attention to them than it did to the advice we gave in connection with the sad affair involving the military college in St-Jean.

The parliamentary committee says that we can trim the size of our air force. I am not an expert, but I have not found any acceptable technical reasons to justify this recommendation. The size of the air force is, by definition, flexible, and ours is a vast country. In my view, we cannot belong to NORAD and NATO without making a decent contribution to these organizations or without being as equally well equipped in the eastern, western and northern regions of the country.

Getting rid of the F-18s is not an economically sound way to manage the air force. In my view, maintaining a single squadron on one base involves some costs. If a cost-benefit analysis were ever conducted, I am convinced that some opinions would be swayed.

For once, we have a public organization involved in aviation that works well. Let us not make any costly errors that may take us a long time to fix. The committee says that we can reduce the size of our navy. However, we have three oceans to patrol to keep an eye out for potential enemies, drug traffickers, foreign fishermen, not to mention the problems associated with transportation on an immense river bordering on three Canadian provinces and eight U.S. states. We are in the process of upgrading our equipment.

As far as our land forces are concerned, I agree with the proposals that have been put forward. I also concur with Senator Gigantès' proposal concerning the use of the reserves. I think we can trim the defence budget a little, perhaps by 10 per cent as has been recommended, but not by much more, given that it is rather modest to begin with.

If we compare ourselves to other Western nations, Canada's participation or the level of our military spending expressed as a percentage of GDP is minimal. However, we can reduce this budget by 10 per cent by improving the way in which we manage our forces: by reviewing, for instance, classification standards for military officers and their deployment, by dividing up tasks more efficiently between military and civilian personnel, by reductions in headquarters and by amending the housing policy for military personnel living off-base, as is the case back home in Sainte-Foy, as well as by amending the personnel rotation policy, which is not cost-effective; and finally, by changing the social benefit policy, in particular severance bonuses which often seem overly generous to my mind.

Finally, we could probably be more efficient in terms of logistics. I am thinking about vehicle fleets and a slew of other equipments. The committee of 13 draws attention to the relationship between our industrial and technological capability, on the one hand, and the operational capability of our forces on the other.

I have no problem with the idea that military equipment has to be up to modern standards and that we have to try and maintain the appropriate industrial capability to meet these standards. However, between the two, priority must be given to the functional aspect of defence, which, in the Canadian context, can only be ensured through alliances, as the last half century has taught us. This does not mean that there is no room for research and development in this area, but just not at any cost.

I support the recommendation from the committee of 13 to clarify the rules governing our participation in UN missions. I think that the events of the last two years show that regional response methods are more efficient that any other, and that we do not have to get involved every time our help is requested by the UN.

Certain requirements should be met, in my view. I am quite baffled to see us taking part in a peace mission in the former Yugoslavia when, for three years, 350 million Europeans have been evading this issue that puts the whole world to shame. While these unfortunate events continue to unfold, some of our allies, in Europe in particular, seem to have an increasingly flagging loyalty to NATO, despite the fact that NATO has been the most efficient military organization these past 40 years, and that these European countries were very happy to make use of its services.

I hope that we will learn from recent experience and decide to examine and clarify the terms and conditions of any future commitment to the UN. In closing, I would like to mention that, in a federal system, defence is, of course, a function of the national government as it entails attractive economies of scale with respect to the inordinate cost of modern military equipment.

[English]

Hon. Colin Kenny: Will the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Bolduc: Yes.

Senator Kenny: I was curious as to why you are opposed to the reduction in the air force, given that the cost of an F-18 is $24,000 an hour to operate as compared to $6,000 for a frigate; given the fact that the principal requirement for the F-18 squadrons has been, with NORAD, to protect North America from incursions over the pole. In the past year, there were no incursions over the pole. Last year, there were none. The year before, there were none; the year before that, there were three; the year before that, there were only five.

Senator Berntson: That is because the F-18s are there.

Senator Kenny: Given the fact that there have not been any incursions over the pole from bombers, there does not appear to be the same need for fighter aircraft as there has been in the past.

In light of those comments, why is the honourable senator opposed to the reduction?

Senator Berntson: The F-18s are there, and frigates do not fly.

Senator Bolduc: Honourable senators, I am not an expert on that. I am told that we would save about $250 million. I do not think that is enough to cause a problem in a budget of $10 billion. What are we doing with a base in the east or the west or the north? I understand that such bases are expensive to run. They do not have to be kept running all the time and besides, they can be operated differently. I think it is wiser to keep the 72 aircraft and the equipment than to cut it down to one squadron on one base.

What kind of support would there be if a problem arose? Where is the support? I think that management is a better place to look for savings. I think that with a roughly $10-billion defence budget, we can save $250 million somewhere by paying more attention to some other aspects. I would be very reluctant, now that we have decent equipment that works and our forces are well trained — I saw them in operation a number of times and was very impressed. I think that we should be careful before letting that go.

[English]

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, the report does call for reductions in headquarters and in headquarters staff, and calls for a reallocation to the land forces. It is not a question of doing away with these aircraft; it is a question of putting them in storage and not using them because they are so expensive to operate.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: May I ask a question? You said that we have to be prepared to protect ourselves from an eventual threat. In fact, this is part of the two basic questions which we should ask ourselves when developing a defence policy. The first question is: Who could attack us? The other question is: Whom would we want to attack? Could you answer these two questions and, if you have the answers, then maybe we can discuss how to organize our defence.

Those questions have never been raised since the international situation started changing, even though our defence people want to maintain a military organization which was set up for a Cold War which no longer exists.

Senator Bolduc: Honourable senators, the other day Senator De Bané told us, and this view is also expressed in the report, that right now we do not know who the aggressor can be, but that this is pretty normal. As you know, so many changes have occurred throughout the world during the last five years that it is impossible to predict what might happen in the future. That is precisely the problem for us. Consequently, I think that even if we do not foresee any immediate enemies, we have to maintain a defence capability. I think this is just common sense. We do not know against whom we might have to use it, but this is quite often the case.

The Russians may well not have known what would happen in Chechenya and elsewhere. Things just happen. We never hear about what goes on in Pakistan. There is also a lot happening in Afghanistan these days. It is not in the news because the CBC, CBS, NBC or the other networks do not have time to cover these events. But the fact is that a lot is happening. I do not know. This is what Senator De Bané was saying: We do not know, but these things can happen and we need a defence capability like we need firemen. We have to be ready. We do not know when and where we will need it. I am not prepared to say that we have entered a period of peace. The world is in greater danger than it was five years ago.

Senator Gigantès: I agree with you, Senator Bolduc. But do you think that the situation has changed to the point that, if there is a threat to North America, it would be directed against Canada rather than the United States? That is what you call a free lunch. Assuming that the Russians or the Chinese launched an attack, their first target would have to be the U.S. We would be affected by the fallout. Why not take advantage of the free lunch under the American defence umbrella?

Senator Bolduc: I would rather not answer your question, Senator Gigantès, because it is hypothetical. I think it would be unwise to take such an approach. Canada has entered into an alliance and abides by the rules of the game of this alliance. In fact, it is lucky for Canada that its neighbour accepts to play the game of alliance, because we have a huge territory to protect.

With respect to defence spending in Canada, we have to stop tossing figures about. The defence budget represents $10 million out of a gross domestic product of $760 billion. It is peanuts! Any less would be pitiful. Heaven knows that I am not a militarist, but there is a minimum requirement. It seems to me that this is what we have right now, and that it is working well for the air force.

I am very unsure about keeping only one squadron in Cold Lake or Bagotville. I think it would only make sense that, if you have two squadrons that work well and do not cost an arm and a leg to operate, plus one support unit in case of an emergency, that is enough. However, if you are down to a single squadron at Bagotville and, all of a sudden, something happens and the entire squadron is called out, what is left in terms of support? Nothing. That does not sound wise to me. Mind you, I am no expert. I am about to give a course on national defence. Even if my year at the military college was very informative, I do not pretend to be an expert on military tactics for all that. It seems to me that this is matter of common sense. We need a minimum of military resources with a degree of flexibility.

On the whole, I do not see any major change being required with respect to the navy and the air force. As for the army, I do recognize that some changes are required and should be made.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bolduc, I think you will admit that, during the years when the Soviet threat was hanging over North America, we had a free lunch because our forces were certainly not adequate, whether it was under the Liberals or the Tories — this is not a partisan remark; I am not criticizing one party or the other. Our defence forces would have been totally incapable of defending us had the Soviets or Communists decided to attack us. We would not have been able to defend ourselves without help. If such an attack did not take place, it is because they were afraid of the American might. Truth be told, we did enjoy a free lunch. All I am saying is, let us follow through and make even deeper cuts in defence spending to reduce the deficit. That should make you happy.

Senator Bolduc: On this I would tend to side with the joint committee. I think that they have shown great wisdom and that Senator De Bané's speech on this matter was full of common sense as a basic philosophy leading to a policy statement. I would not want you to think that I am harshly critical of the report. On the contrary, I find it quite perceptive. I also liked the report of the 13-member group, but I disagree with that of the 21-member group. If we want to discuss the three reports, I think they were a little naive in saying:

[English]

"Oh, we cannot have a free lunch because the Americans are right beside us."

It is not right to say this. If we do not pay in terms of defence, we will pay our share some other way. We must not forget this.

Senator Gigantès: As you can see, our debate is totally non-partisan. You are agreeing with a Liberal senator while I disagree with him. I thought you were very concerned about the deficit. Although this would be an inexpensive way to cut it, you do not want to do it.

Senator Bolduc: I will go even further if I may, honourable senators. I agree that we should cut defence spending from $11.5 billion to $10.5 billion. I agree with this. I think it makes sense. This could be done by reviewing the management of our armed forces. I am confident that it can be done. Cutting costs by 10 per cent is not the end of the world. This 10 per cent can be found somewhere.

[English]

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Forrestall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 12, 1994, at 2 p.m.

YUKON SURFACE RIGHTS BOARD BILL

Monday, December 12, 1994

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-55, An Act to establish a Board having jurisdiction concerning disputes respecting surface rights in respect of land in the Yukon Territory and to amend other Acts in relation thereto, has examined the said Bill in obedience to its Order of Reference dated December 1, 1994, and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following observation:

The Committee, having heard the views expressed by The Kaska Nation and the Kwanlin Dun First Nation, urges the Government to address, to the extent possible, their respective concerns in a timely manner.

Respectfully submitted,

A. RAYNELL ANDREYCHUK

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now. I do so in order to permit the chairperson of the committee to say a few words.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, Bill C-55 is the companion piece of legislation to Bill C-33 and Bill C-34, which were passed by the Senate at the end of June and the first part of July, 1994. These three bills are the culmination of negotiations for some 20 years with the Yukon Council. I made my comments at the time of the passage of the other two bills, and I believe those comments are still pertinent today.

This bill will allow aboriginal self-government as a process to begin in the Yukon Territory. It will involve the territorial government, the Canadian government, and the Yukon Council.

What has been particularly difficult with respect to this bill is that while the bill before us, Bill C-55, deals with surface rights, it appeared to be a bill that is in conformity with other surface rights bills that have been passed. The committee found no particular difficulty with Bill C-55 on the face of it.

Honourable senators will recall that when Bill C-33 and Bill C-34 were passed by the Senate, on short notice the Kaska Nation asked to be heard, since they had some difficulties with the process. The Senate agreed to the passing of Bills C-33 and C-34, and indicated that the Kaska Nation would be afforded the opportunity to be heard when Bill C-55 came before us. We were assured by the government that the other two bills would not be proclaimed until all three bills had been passed by the Senate.

Therefore, with respect to the consideration of Bill C-55, the Kaska Nation asked to be heard, and were heard by the committee. In addition, the Kwanlin Dun First Nation also asked to be heard.

What is becoming increasingly apparent is that the road to self-government has been a difficult one for the First Nations. They have dealt with the Canadian government. However, it is a far-reaching and difficult process to make sure that all parties are heard, that all of their rights are adhered to, and that all issues are taken into account.

What is also emerging is that there cannot be complete unanimity among the First Nations, as perhaps we should have realized. While the committee felt that the constitution of the Yukon Council had been followed, and that there is due process within the Yukon Council, nonetheless there are some groups which feel that they have not been properly heard from, or that their views have not been adequately taken into account, nor have they been afforded their full rights. While the committee was sympathetic to this situation, we felt we could go no further than to ensure that the Yukon Council had, in fact, followed a due process model.

However, we are urging the Yukon Council and the Canadian government to think in a forward manner to take into account the minority groups who, in fact, have something to say, particularly the Kaska Nation, which does not recognize our boundaries. Their territorial lands, their lands of usage, straddle both British Columbia and the territories. They believe that, by signing this agreement and adhering to it, it is possible that some of their rights in British Columbia and the totality of their rights might be in jeopardy. The Kwanlin Dun, on the other hand, feel that the question of membership is a difficult one for them. They wanted to have the whole issue of membership aired and resolved before these agreements could go forward.

We have taken the comments of both the Kaska Nation and the Kwanlin Dun as serious issues. In fact, we urge the Canadian government and the minister in particular to take these concerns seriously and to ensure the expeditious and fair continuation of the process of negotiation with the Kaska Nation.

I repeat my comments made at the end of our committee meeting, and I am perhaps speaking as much for myself as for the committee: This is a process whereby the aboriginal peoples have a say in the determination of their future. They also have responsibilities for their own people which before were embedded either in the Indian Act or elsewhere in the Canadian government. It is incumbent upon them to ensure that the process includes all their peoples. While we understand the road to self-determination of their original wishes is a difficult one, aboriginal self-government, too, is a difficult process, and they must ensure it will be of benefit to all their members.

In summary, the committee had no difficulty with Bill C-55 in particular; rather, our concern included the whole process that brought this issue into the Senate. The problems are made abundantly clear by the difficulties faced by the Kaska and the Kwanlin Dun nations.

I urge the minister and the Canadian government to think through the processes leading toward aboriginal self-government. The three bills can be proclaimed at the call of the Canadian government; however, we urge the government to take into account the concerns of the Kaska Nation and the Kwanlin Dun in order to ensure fairness throughout the process.

This process began 20 years ago, but Canada has changed, the issues have changed and the aboriginal peoples' understandings and aspirations have changed. We believe that the three bills together are a fair representation of the direction and the intent which previous governments have followed, and reflect the desires of the aboriginal peoples themselves.

As we enter into other agreements and other pieces of legislation, we can only hope that the process will take into account the issues which, in my opinion, were not adequately handled by these bills. Perhaps both sides will take it as a learning experience and profit from that learning.

Honourable senators, I trust that we can now begin to work on the content of the aboriginal peoples' aspirations in the Yukon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I rise to address third and final reading of Bill C-55, the Yukon Surface Rights Board bill.

Before I begin my remarks on the bill, I want to thank Senator Andreychuk for her chairing of the committee dealing with Bill C-55. She was put in a very difficult position because certain witnesses were making some representations which, while they dealt with the final results of the bill, did not deal directly with the bill. It took some skill on Senator Andreychuk's part to ensure that these people had a fair hearing, that their position was clearly put and, at the same time, ensuring that the committee remained within its bounds.

I also say thank you to Senator Di Nino who was instrumental in the preparation of the addendum to the report which brings to the attention of the Senate the delicacy of these issues. We are dealing with people issues here which are not always a part of this type of legislation. It was a delicate situation in which the committee had to avoid involving itself in local politics and attempting to solve the problems the Council for Yukon Indians has with their own membership. Mistakes will be made, but as the Chief Negotiator, Vic Mitander, pointed out during the hearings: "There will be mistakes but we will make them and we will sing for them."

I appreciated the way Senator Di Nino and Senator Andreychuk guided us through the committee hearings. It was important. After all, and I am being forced under duress to say this, the Conservative Party had considerable input into this legislation.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, we get as much of the credit for this as I can possibly drum up; however, the umbrella final agreement was signed during the Conservative years in power and they may have had a little bit to do with much of the legislation that is before us.

I do not want to mention from whom I am receiving these "threats"; however, Senator Lynch-Staunton and Senator Berntson have both been invited to the Yukon next year to take part in some of the festivities to be held there. Honourable senators can draw from that whatever they will. I also thank honourable senators for demonstrating their commitment to the social, political and economic development of the Yukon by supporting this legislation at second reading. I urge them to continue that support today so that Bill C-55 can be quickly proclaimed into law.

I will briefly review the objectives of Bill C-55, as well as its broader implications for First Nations people and other Yukoners.

Bill C-55 will establish a new surface rights regime in the Yukon to regulate access to both private and public lands. This new regime is a requirement of the Yukon umbrella final agreement which was signed by the federal and territorial governments and the Council for Yukon Indians in May of 1993.

Notwithstanding this land claim commitment, honourable senators, the new regime also makes sense from the viewpoint of strengthening public government in the Yukon. As land claim final agreements are implemented, the pattern and land ownership in the Yukon will change dramatically. Large areas of Crown land will be confirmed as lands held exclusively by Yukon First Nations.

In total, the 14 Yukon First Nations will eventually own some 41,000 square kilometres of land. As well, other private interests will begin to acquire ownership of more and more land in the Yukon.

Despite this transfer of surface ownership, the Crown will continue to own the subsurface resources under most lands in the Yukon. These resources hold a major key to economic growth and job creation in the territory. Parliament must ensure that the holders of substantial surface rights and others who need to use the land have access to it. That is the objective of the new surface rights regime. With Bill C-55, we will help put in place clear rules, rights and obligations for acquiring access to lands in the Yukon. In so doing, we will reinforce the certainty that is one of the primary benefits of land claims final agreements, giving both industry and land owners the confidence to invest in resource development projects. This in turn will create jobs in the Yukon and contribute to Canada's overall prosperity.

Honourable senators, Bill C-55 provides for the establishment of the Yukon Surface Rights Board, a key element of the new regime. This board, which has been modelled on similar institutions operating in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, will function primarily as a dispute resolution mechanism.

As I have already indicated, the Yukon Surface Rights Board will have powers to resolve disputes related to both settlement and non-settlement lands throughout the territory. The government anticipates that most of these disputes will involve access to land for the purpose of exploring and for developing subsurface mineral resources. Among other powers, the board will have the authority to issue access orders, to establish terms and conditions of access, and to award compensation for access or for damages resulting from access. The board's orders will be enforceable through the Supreme Court of the Yukon Territory and may be appealed on limited grounds, such as bias or a lack of procedural fairness.

I want to make it clear that the Yukon Surface Rights Board is a new institution of public government. Its members will be appointed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Half of the board members will be nominated by the Council for Yukon Indians and half by government. This will ensure that all sectors of Yukon society are represented on the board and will have meaningful input into the decision-making process. It will make the Yukon board a practical example of resource and co-management that can be replicated in other jurisdictions.

Honourable senators, one of the underlying reasons for creating the new board is to keep issues of access and compensation out of the courts. In other jurisdictions in Canada, this approach has proven to be both a cost-effective and time-saving alternative to litigation. However, this does not mean that the government wants each and every access issue to be brought before the board. In fact, the opposite is true.

Honourable senators, Bill C-55 will require people to attempt to negotiate access and compensation agreements before bringing the dispute before the board. The board will only be asked to resolve disputes where no such agreement was possible.

As honourable senators heard during second reading debate, this bill is based on extensive consultation with the Yukon First Nations, the territorial government, the mining industry and the general public. It comes as no surprise to anyone that, since it was included as a provision of the Yukon Umbrella Final Agreement and has been developed during more than a year of meetings, drafting and redrafting, it is fair and reasonable to all parties and it is responsible to Canadians in general.

I would remind my honourable colleagues that Parliament's endorsement of this legislation is critical to the process of settling land claims in the Yukon and bringing self-government to the Yukon First Nations. Without Bill C-55, honourable senators, neither the Yukon First Nations Land Claims Settlement Act or the Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act will come into force. Both acts have been approved by Parliament, but under the terms of the land claim agreement, they cannot be proclaimed until this new surface rights regime is in place.

Honourable senators, Yukoners — and particularly First Nations people — have waited far too long to have the certainty and other benefits that land claim settlement will bring. The Yukon Umbrella Final Agreement is a result of more than two decades of negotiations. It has raised expectations and created a new mood of optimism in the Yukon.

This is a good bill in its own right, but we must keep in mind that much more is at stake, including the honour of the Crown in living up to its commitments that have been made to Yukon First Nations over many years. With that in mind, I would once again urge honourable senators to support Bill C-55. A "yes" vote today will have positive repercussions in the Yukon for years to come.

Honourable senators, with respect to the problems that Senator Andreychuk spoke so clearly about, further meetings were held in the Yukon this weekend. The Kaska Dena and the Council for Yukon Indians and Kwanlin Dun particularly have made considerable progress in dealing with the problems brought to the committee last Thursday. These problems are not solved yet, but they have come a long way to solving them, and will continue to work in that direction in the proper forum, which is their forum in the Yukon.

I also wish to say at this time that with the passing of Bills C-33, C-34 and C-55, a new era is dawning in the Yukon. We will now see the serious devolution of powers from the federal government to the government of the Yukon Territory. The negotiations for that devolution of powers will now take place with three governments at the table: the federal government, the government of the Yukon Territory, and the First Nations' government. No serious devolution, in my opinion, can take place without the three partners in serious negotiation. I am not talking about one or two parties getting together and saying, "We will discuss devolution," and then bringing in the third party to ask what it thinks. I am saying that now there will be some serious negotiation with all three parties involved. That is the only way I see devolution of powers from the federal to the territorial government taking place.

With that, honourable senators, I should like to thank all members on both sides of this house. We have had fantastic cooperation all the way through the process from my colleagues on this side as well as the senators on the other side. I can tell honourable senators that such cooperation is appreciated.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to your attention the presence in the Speaker's Gallery of a delegation from the Council of Yukon Indians, who have come to see the historic passage of Bill C-55 at third reading. Present are Judy Gingell, chairperson, Shirley Adamson, Chief David Keenan of the Tlingit Council, and Percy Henry, an elder from Dawson City.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1994

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill C-42, to amend the Criminal Code and other Acts (miscellaneous matters).

I ask that the report be printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Beaudoin: With permission, immediately.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is permission granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Beaudoin: Honourable senators, the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which Bill C-42 was referred, has examined this bill, assisted by presentations made by experts from the Department of Justice, on two occasions, by the Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Association and the Barreau du Québec. Today, we wish to propose six amendments, including four of a formal nature and two relating to substance.

The Department of Justice has agreed to drop clause 61 from Bill C-42. This clause gave rise to considerable discussion within the committee. Its purpose is to prohibit the publication of material provided by the prosecutor to the defence. Revealing prosecutorial evidence to the accused is now compulsory since the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Stinchcombe case. Clause 61 will be revised in the course of the next review of the Criminal Code, which is scheduled for 1995.

The committee also recommends that clause 62 of Bill C-42 be dropped. This clause prohibits the publication or broadcasting of any information in respect of any matter dealt with by a judge before any juror is sworn, and of any information in respect of any matter dealt with after the jury is sworn but when the jury is not present and permission to separate is given to members of the jury.

The committee heard conflicting opinions on the impact of this clause, which constitutes a violation of freedom of expression and freedom of the press. The central question is whether or not this restriction is justified in a free and democratic society, within the meaning of section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In light of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada regarding the film The Boys of St. Vincent's, in which the Supreme Court indicated that one must strike a fair balance between the right of the accused to a fair trial and the public's right to know, the committee feels it is preferable to drop this clause from Bill C-42. If the Minister of Justice is of the opinion that the clause is necessary, he will have to revise the wording to bring it into line with the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and those rights and freedoms protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The four remaining amendments are purely formal in nature and consist in bringing the French version into line with the English version.

First, it is proposed that the French version of clause 37 be amended by adding the words "faite sous serment" to better reflect the English version. The purpose of this amendment is to ensure that the two versions are equivalent.

The second amendment concerns clause 38. It is proposed that the French version be amended by adding the words "après la saisie." The purpose of this amendment is also to ensure that the two versions are equivalent.

The purpose of the third amendment is to make the French version of clause 44 correspond with the English version.

Finally, the French version of clause 71 of the bill refers to a non-existent paragraph. This clause amends subsections 1 to 3 of the present section 699 of the Criminal Code. The French version of subsection 3 refers to paragraph 2(b), which exists in the English version but not in the French. This is simply a drafting error which must, however, be corrected immediately.

Furthermore, the word "convocation" for subpoena must be replaced by the more accurate term "assignation."

Honourable senators, these are the reasons why the committee has seen fit to propose six amendments to Bill C-42.

Finally, I would like to say a few words about the process. In future, it would be most desirable to submit such bills to the Senate first. All members of the committee agree with me on this point. The Senate has already proven itself in this very important field. No doubt we would do better work if we had more time. Honourable senators, I therefore ask you to adopt this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(g), Honourable Senator Beaudoin, seconded by Honourable Senator Murray, moves that this report now be adopted. Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill as amended be read the third time?

[English]

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1994-95

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-63, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY BILL

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-46, to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other Acts.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

THE BUDGET

METHODS OF DEFICIT REDUCTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Before the election, the now Minister of Finance said, and I quote:

> We don't believe that increasing taxes is a decent way of fighting the deficit.

Does the government still hold that view?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. As the honourable senator knows, in his efforts to reduce the deficit to the goal of 3 per cent of GDP in three years, the Minister of Finance has indicated that the preferred method of doing so is reducing expenditures.

He has also indicated that he seeks the views of Canadians and groups, including the Finance Committee of the House of Commons, in this pre-budget consultation. Their views, of course, will be considered. However, anything further must await the budget.

Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have indicated that their preference for proceeding toward their goal is a reduction in spending.

IMMIGRATION

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD—REVIEW OF POLICY AND APPOINTMENT PROCESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, the Immigration and Refugee Board is a powerful agency responsible for deciding the fate of thousands of individuals every year. This determining body has been held up as a shining example within the international community, and is a vital part of our United Nations' commitment and humanitarian obligation.

In overlooking the incidents of recent weeks, including last week's $100,000 payoff of Mr. Schelew, and in persisting in trying to sweep serious allegations under the carpet, this government tarnishes Canada's domestic and international reputation as a trustworthy and generous provider of refuge for those who are persecuted.

My question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Will this government preserve our good reputation and immediately move to review the entire policy and operations with respect to the IRB, including the appointment process, and remedy the source of the conflicts that have resulted in two resignations within the past five weeks?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Di Nino for his question. The honourable senator will know that the reputation of the board, based on history, is of great concern to the minister. Events of recent weeks have obviously caused considerable concern.

Honourable senators, the chairman of the board has requested a meeting with the minister in the near future to discuss proposals for a more effective and efficient operation of the board. The minister will follow that up quickly.

The board itself has been reviewing the conclusions of the Hathaway report and is planning, as well, to implement some of those recommendations.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, before I ask my next question, I wish to read what Minister Marchi said on October 1, 1994, to the editorial board of The Toronto Sun. He stated:

> I think we have improved the quality of appointments on the Immigration and Refugee Board. We place more emphasis on competence than ever before. Some previous appointments were nakedly partisan.

That is a quotation from Mr. Marchi.

The government, in its now infamous Red Book, promised the Canadian people that, once elected, they would move to ensure that Governor-in-Council appointments would be less political and more aptly attributable to professional credentials. Indeed, Minister Marchi has recently referred to the advertising of appointments in The Canada Gazette. He stated that this demonstrates that his government has made progress and depoliticized the appointment process.

Once again, honourable senators, in actual fact, it was former Prime Minister Kim Campbell, shortly after taking office, who immediately instituted this first move in making the appointment opportunities available to The Canada Gazette, not Mr. Marchi. Mr. Marchi, on the other hand, has continued to appoint his campaign workers, his fund raisers and supporters, and his Liberal colleagues to the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Honourable senators, I fear that we are not yet finished with this matter. Will this government break another Red Book promise by relinquishing its commitment to amend the political appointment process?

Senator Cools: No politics is good business.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will certainly transmit my colleague's views to the minister and to the government. However, I would reiterate what I have said before: that I believe there are fine Canadians serving on the board. The people who serve on that board do so in good faith and with competence.

In any event, I will transmit the further views of my friend to the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SEARCH AND RESCUE—REPLACEMENT OF SEA KING AND LABRADOR HELICOPTER FLEETS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. However, before I ask my question, first of all I wish to extend the sympathy — I am sure of all of us — to the families of the seamen lost at sea off the East Coast of Canada just a few days ago, and to express appreciation for the efforts of both the Canadian and United States Maritime Search and Rescue personnel. I draw from that only slight embarrassment but, nevertheless, comfort in seeing the United States Coast Guard equipment doing work which might more properly and more quickly have been done by Canadians, if we had had that capacity.

I ask my question with those thoughts in mind, and in light of the very strong advice received by government over a period of years from military officials, that the seaborne Sea King and the search and rescue Labrador need replacing. That replacement was virtually assured by a firm undertaking in Minister Collenette's recent release.

Will the minister find an early opportunity to clarify with the government whether or not the government intends to take the advice of their own senior people in replacing these two pieces of equipment, as has been advised, with a single piece of equipment?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to take my friend's question to the minister and to provide as much information as I can to satisfy the question. I also join with my friend in his first remarks. I want to extend our deepest sympathy and our feelings of pride to those families who have lost members. All members in this house think of them with great concern, sympathy and pride for what they achieved.

SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier moved the second reading of Bill C-63, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to thank all the honourable senators for their welcome and to say that I intend to take an active part in the debates in this place. Let us say that, so far, I remain a neophyte. I have no comment, but someday soon I will gain courage and make constructive suggestions. You can count on that.

The bill before you today, honourable senators — that is to say Appropriation Bill No. 3, 1994-95 — provides for the release of the total of the amounts set out in Supplementary Estimates (B) and (C) for 1994-95, or $1.895 billion.

Supplementary Estimates (B) and (C) for fiscal year 1994-95 were tabled in the other place on November 3 and 17 respectively. These supplementary estimates were considered in committee, on November 24, 1994, with senior officials from Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance in attendance.

These supplementary estimates increase the federal government's net estimated expenditure requirements by $1.895 billion, of which approximately $1.1 billion has to be approved by Parliament through an appropriation bill. The other $750 million or so represent the net budget-actual variance on a number of statutory items already approved by Parliament.

[English]

Here are some of the main items in these supplementary estimates: an increase of $3.3 billion in forecast public debt charges due to higher interest than originally forecast; a forecast decrease of $3.3 billion in benefit payments from the unemployment insurance account due to measures announced in the February 1994 budget as well as a reduction in the number of claimants; a net increase of approximately $794 million in transfer payments to the provinces in support of health, post-secondary education, and social assistance payments; $527 million from the Department of Finance to meet Canada's commitments under multilateral agreements to reduce the debt load of certain heavily indebted countries; finally, $101 million from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade related to assistance to be provided by Canada to countries of Central and Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Honourable senators, should you require additional information, I will try to answer questions. If not, I move the adoption of this report.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, in response to my friend's introduction of this bill, I should like to say a few words. It has not been the custom of this place to go into great depth on appropriation bills or supply bills. We usually deal with them in detail in the National Finance Committee, and the committee report forms the basis of the debate in this place.

That report has been tabled. We spoke in some detail about that report last week. At that time, I called the attention of the Senate to the various components of this particular appropriation bill, particularly the two supplementary supply acts.

Having said that, I do not think it is necessary at this time to go into any more detail. I appreciate my friend's comments and I share the enthusiasm of our friends on both sides for his presence here with us.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

On motion of Senator Hébert, bill placed on Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy entitled "Security in a Changing World," tabled in the Senate on October 31, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Forrestall).

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, Senator Forrestall had intended to be here to speak on this item, but he is absent at the moment. Senator Kenny and I are prepared to speak to this matter now. May we have permission to give our comments and then adjourn the matter once more in the name of Senator Forrestall?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreeable that we proceed with another speaker and leave the matter in the name of Senator Forrestall, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Sylvain: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to rise today and join in the debate on Canada's defence policy and the shape this policy should take in the future.

When I was asked to join the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy, I thought it would be a wonderful opportunity to put my knowledge of the military to use. Unfortunately for me, that knowledge was gained during the Second World War, somewhat before the days of our high-tech military, and certainly long before Star Wars. However, I felt I had one saving grace. I have been a member of the NATO parliamentary group for some years and have gained some appreciation of the changes which have taken place in the world situation since the fall of the Berlin Wall.

Finally, I have spent my life in business, and I believe someone on the committee should at least look at the problems that changes in defence might bring to our military defence industry, such as it is.

I enjoyed my involvement with the committee. I feel that I contributed in some part to the focus of the report. Fortunately, I believe our report was taken into consideration by the government when they drafted the white paper on defence which was released on Thursday, December 1, 1994.

It is appropriate that I pay tribute to my Senate colleagues who took part in the work of this committee. On the government side, Senator De Bané co-chaired the committee in an even-handed fashion which fostered good discussion on most, if not all, topics. Senator Kenny was his usual inquisitive self. No statement by a witness or department official went unchallenged. In the end, we have a better report because of his tenacity.

On this side of the chamber, there were three of us who championed different causes. Senator Meighen pursued the enhancement of the reserve system, and the prominent place reserves occupy in the white paper is largely due to his work in this area. Senator Forrestall, ever the Maritimer, put the name of Cornwallis in almost every transcript of the committee's proceedings. To his credit, he also raised the issue of helicopters at every opportunity, and the mistake made by the government when it rejected the EH-101.

As for myself, I concentrated, as I indicated previously, on NATO, the preservation of Canada's defence industry, and on the curious budgetary allocation to the Department of National Defence. As I will explain later, that budget includes much more than simply spending on the military.

The NATO debate, or more properly whether Canada should remain in NATO, began with the publication of the Canada 21 Study just as the committee was established. This group of scholars and some former politicians argued and recommended that Canada virtually terminate its relationship with NATO. I found that to be a completely untenable position. I believe that Canada's continued involvement in the NATO alliance is of prime importance.

Fortunately, I was not alone in these beliefs. Alex Morrison of the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies, during his appearance before the committee, supported Canada's continuing in NATO. He described those who would have Canada continue in NATO but not live up to its financial obligations as "disingenuous." It was also encouraging to hear Major-General Lewis MacKenzie describe Canada's continued involvement in NATO and SACLANT, the Supreme Allied Commander Atlantic, that is the North American pillar of NATO as "paying our dues in the international community."

NATO is no longer a collective security organization designed to protect Europe against the communist threat. It has evolved in the last few years into a "partnership for peace." The involvement of former Warsaw Pact nations in NATO is still a shock to the system for some of us. Walking down the corridors of NATO headquarters, it is interesting and encouraging to see representatives of former enemy nations taking part in debates over peace and security.

Perhaps the benefits of our continued involvement in NATO were best described before the committee by Professor Mark Hennessey of the Royal Military College at Kingston when he said:

> As for our alliances, NORAD and NATO, they currently provide us with a voice in international discussions that is out of proportion to the forces we dedicate to the task. NATO is important to us and we should exercise our voice, especially over the question of giving a blank cheque to the newly democratic nations of Europe. These alliances also provide us access to top level intelligence.
> It is important that Canada be positioned to take advantage of the new relationships in Europe. With the transformation of NATO could come a new measure of integration between items that can be supplied by North America and which are needed in Europe. There is an expansion in trade relations and revolutionary developments in global communications and technologies. As well the flow of ideas across international borders joins commodities and capital as we move into an era of cooperation. This trade, and Canada's role in it, is facilitated by collective security organizations such as NATO and the consequence of linking together the nations of the Partnership for Peace with the rest of NATO.

I stressed as well the fact that Canada can take advantage of Article 2 of the NATO Treaty, the Canadian clause. This article allows for economic cooperation among alliance members. It is taking on increased significance as NATO becomes more involved in strengthening free political institutions and promoting "conditions of stability and well-being." In fact, it is this article which allows NATO to move into economic and cultural spheres of member countries.

It was my major intention when questioning witnesses on the subject of NATO to draw out NATO's contributions to the Canadian government for use of facilities in Canada, and the benefits of our involvement in NATO to Canada's defence industry. My premise for doing so was the following: If I could show that, through payments to Canada for the use of Canadian infrastructure by NATO countries, our participation in NATO costs us that much less, and if I could show that jobs in Canada were created and maintained in our defence industry because of our continued involvement in NATO, then I could show an overall economic benefit to continued Canadian involvement. I believe I was able to prove both of my premises, and if the white paper can be believed, my argument for continued involvement in NATO was accepted by the government.

As for the benefits accrued because of foreign military training held under NATO agreement, the 1991-1992 estimates published by the DND show the total local economic benefits to be in the order of $42.3 million. Added to this is the economic benefit enjoyed by Canada's defence industry because of our NATO involvement.

In its appearance before the committee, the Conference of Defence Associations stated:

> In the short term, I would look at our defence industry sales. As far as I know, after the United States, we still make the next highest number of sales of subsystems and systems to our NATO allies.
> ... NATO allies do take a steady amount of our defence production.

Let us not forget that the United States is also part of NATO.

Canada's defence industry, as reported to the special joint committee by the Canadian Defence Preparedness Association, is composed of some 800 companies who participate either directly or indirectly in defence production. Approximately 70,000 people are employed directly, with another 100,000 to 120,000 in supporting industrial occupations. Canadian industry supplies approximately 70 per cent of Canada's defence needs, but requires an export market if it is to be profitable and to be able to do the research and development work necessary to remain competitive. It should be noted that 19 per cent of the government's total expenditures go directly to the Canadian defence industries.

In 1991, Canadian defence exports were $900 million. Of that, $726 million went to the United States, $131 million to Europe and $62 million to the rest of the world. In 1993, exports to NATO countries other than the United States totalled $77 million, according to the annual report on exports of military goods from Canada published by the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade. NATO countries, including the United States and the European countries, remain a vital and essential market for Canadian defence exports.

In addition, there is the Canadian aerospace industry. In his presentation, Peter Smith, President and CEO of Aerospace Industries Associations of Canada, gave some impressive statistics as to the amount of money involved in this industry, persons employed, and its export market. In 1993 he reported that aerospace industries generated sales of $9 billion, with 70 per cent of that coming from exports. Between 70 and 80 per cent of those exports went to the United States. A little over 70 per cent of the aerospace output is commercial with the remainder being for defence. Most of the defence products, he reported, are in avionics or electronics or dual use in that they have both a civilian and defence application. Canadian aerospace domestic defence sales and exports employ approximately 18,000 people directly with total aerospace employment being 100,000 people.

Mr. Smith referred to the importance of the Defence Production Sharing Arrangement with the United States as it includes Canada as part of the North American defence industrial base, and allows access to technology development on projects of mutual assistance. He stressed the importance of the agreement because of all the aerospace sales, about $1.5 billion, mostly for defence exports to the United States. I asked him if we were not a member of NATO or NORAD would the same level of sale occur? Not surprisingly, he responded that our industries receive this level of sales specifically as a result of Canada's membership in NATO and NORAD.

Because of my interest in NATO and the defence industry, I am heartened by the white paper. It is obvious the government paid attention to the findings of our committee, and having listened, will it be willing to act in support of the industry?

On Page 42 of the defence white paper the government states:

> ...National Defence will work with Industry Canada, as well as Public Works and Government Services Canada, towards harmonizing industrial and defence policies to maintain essential defence industrial capability. The Government will seek to foster defence conversion, overall industrial growth, and the international competitiveness of Canadian firms consistent with our international trade agreements.

I hope, as does the defence industry, that the government will live up to these commitments.

The last issue I wish to address covers a number of related matters. They are covered both in the committee's report and in the white paper, but I refer to them mainly under the heading of the "defence budget." Matters such as regional development and buying off the shelf are both related to the defence budget.

Throughout the committee's hearings I attempted to establish that the defence department's budget was only partly dedicated to defence. A portion of it, in my estimation, goes toward regional development schemes which form part of the procurement chain. The point here is that most people who are knowledgeable in the area of defence and who have studied the defence budget, believe it has been cut as far as it can be cut and still be a multi-purpose combat-capable force. We argue in our report that any further cuts will have to identify which capability the government wishes to have dropped. However, if you can conclude that a portion of the defence budget does not supply defence at all but looks after regional industrial expansion, then these amounts should be removed, in whole or proportionately, from the defence budget, allowing more room for the maintenance of our military capabilities.

This "budget plus" was addressed by representatives of the Auditor General's office who appeared before the committee. In addressing procurement and defence budgets, Mr. Rattray of the Auditor General's office stated:

> You have to look at procurement in its totality as a government instrument. You cannot take an organization such as National Defence and simply say "Let's just buy exactly what Defence needs to meet its operational requirements, pure and simple." There is a complexity here in that large expenditures are used for non-defence objectives. They're valid objectives. The government sees fit to take certain action. Therefore, it becomes very complex.

However, a few minutes later, when dealing with the same theme, he acknowledged that we "have a defence budget plus." The committee's report at page 23 describes the present defence budget of $11.6 billion as including > ...an undetermined cost for regional economic development which the Auditor General's office has stated makes the Defence budget in reality a Defence Budget Plus, and therefore gives a misleading picture of military expenditures.

I am pleased to see in the white paper that the military procurement will be brought at last into the last half of the twentieth century through the use of just-in-time delivery and off-the-shelf purchasing for military goods.

I doubt that regional development will ever be completely divorced from the defence budget. It should be helpful, however, to have the regional development costs reflected in some other department's budget so that we can get a true picture of how little money the military is given to protect Canada's interests at home and abroad.

All in all, I believe the defence budget review, through the use of a special joint committee, has proven to be a useful exercise. The use of joint committees does give this house some degree of influence over the making of public policy.

I look forward to the establishment of the Special Joint Committee on Defence, as recommended by our committee on defence policy review.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak on the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy. At the outset, I would like to thank Senator Sylvain for his kind remarks.

Over the past eight months, the committee has worked hard and seriously to produce a document which I believe has been a useful step in the development of Canadian defence policy. We sat for over 200 hours in eight months, or one out of every 20 waking hours, and the committee attendance was over 95 per cent. We travelled almost 44,000 kilometres, the equivalent of once around the world. We heard 403 witnesses. We received over 300 written submissions and gathered stacks of defence documents.

Parliament can now boast 16 reasonably knowledgeable members on defence matters who have demonstrated that Parliament can, and should, have a role in the development of defence policy.

What is the fundamental message of our report? It is that Canada needs its armed forces now and into the future. Why? The purpose of Canada's armed forces is to protect our interests, support our values and fulfil our responsibilities.

However, many argue that, "There is no threat to Canada." In a direct limited military sense, that may be true, but there are certainly threats to our interests and values. The Canadian Forces have been continually engaged at home and abroad, even since the end of the Cold War, in protecting those interests and values and in fulfilling our responsibilities as a country.

In the Gulf War, we participated to protect our interests in a stable international system governed by the rule of law against an outright aggressor. We also had an interest in protecting the world's oil supply, on which many of our trading partners rely and on which our own trade therefore relies.

In Rwanda and Haiti, we are participating to protect our values because we cannot sit idly by while people are massacred or democracy is overthrown. We participated in rebuilding Cambodia in 1991 and 1992 because we have a responsibility as a rich and secure nation to help bring peace and stability to others.

At this point, I should like to quote General Lewis MacKenzie in his testimony before the committee, when he argued that our obligations abroad are proportional to our blessings at home. This confers a large responsibility on Canada. We cannot predict the future but we can be sure that problems and tragedies, like and unlike those I have just mentioned, will occur. They will occur because, although the world has changed, human nature has not.

While warfare on a global scale may be a thing of the past, new regional conflicts are breaking out faster than old ones are resolved, often within rather than between states. Sources of conflict are many, including ethnic and religious intolerance, and environmental degradation. Conflicts can break out with stunning speed and savagery, as we have seen in Rwanda.

Political and economic reform is creating losers as well as winners. An unexpected economic disruption or a well-timed political coup in a country such as Russia could overturn fragile new structures. The new rulers may find themselves with large arsenals of conventional weapons or even weapons of mass destruction and the will to wield them.

Canada will not be immune. Economic interdependence ensures that when conflicts do break out, their effects will reverberate around the world. Ease of access to global transportation means refugees can, sooner or later, reach Canada's shores. Closer to home, we are already seeing emerging dangers caused by scarcity of resources. Our East Coast fisheries have been savaged by fishing fleets mostly from countries whose own stocks have been depleted.

As well, drug- and people-smuggling to Canada and across Canadian land and waters continues to increase. Domestically, all is not calm either. Forces of tribalism, regionalism, and nationalism tug at our social fabric. The wrong combination of grievances, determination, hopelessness and poor judgment can quickly and easily turn instability into confrontation.

This is an unstable world. Terrible things will continue to happen and, when they do, they will be worse than we expect. We can also be sure that the security threats we confront will not be what we planned for. This is the lesson of history.

Who would have thought that the war in the middle of our century could be so terrible and last so long? It did in part because we and other Western countries did nothing to prepare. Our young men and women paid a high price later because governments had other priorities in the 1930s. History goes on repeating itself.

Fifty years later, in 1982, Britain found itself fighting in the South Atlantic, scant months after deciding that its naval sources could safely be substantially cut back. Even more recently, the United States found itself engaged in a major land war shortly after the fall of the Berlin Wall, when everyone had concluded that the era of heavy armoured warfare was a thing of the past.

When threats to our security arise, we must be able to respond. When the threats are at home or nearby, it is on our own national capabilities that we must rely first and foremost. For this reason, the committee saw a continuing purpose in a military capacity to oversee and protect Canadian territory, air space and water.

That is not to say we cannot seek multilateral approaches to reducing the burden. For example the report proposes that the government pursue a multilateral agreement to demilitarize the Arctic. Concerns about submarines under the ice pack, about threats to Canadian sovereignty and about ecologically damaging activities in this sensitive environment could be answered by such an initiative.

When the threats are overseas, we must and will always act in cooperation with others. We work with our friends and allies to promote peace and stability because that is the way we can make the greatest contribution to global security. It is for this reason that we have and must continue to participate in multilateral security forums like the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We must also continue to cooperate with the United States in a broad range of areas, including NORAD. Participating in multilateral security operations overseas ensures that we will not lose our influence and access to the highest councils where our economic and security interests are at stake.

Our reliance on multinational organizations means that we also have a big stake in adapting them to our current need. How we do that is a matter for our foreign policy. However, it is clear that we need an international community which can manage conflict and crisis quickly and cheaply. The difference now is that our focus should no longer be on a particular region or on a particular type of conflict.

From these realities, the committee concluded that the Canadian Forces would have to carry out two primary tasks. The first is to protect Canada's territorial sovereignty and the second is to defend Canada's security interests internationally. To do this, the committee's fundamental conclusion is that our armed forces must be unified, properly equipped, combat capable and multi-purpose. They must be flexible, mobile and adaptable.

We concluded that the Canadian Forces are not yet properly structured and equipped for these tasks. We need to make some changes. First, and most basic, we need more soldiers at the sharp end. The committee visited units in Croatia and Bosnia which were constructed out of other units because they were so undermanned in Canada. We met soldiers on their third six-month tour of duty in two years, because there just are not enough combat soldiers in our army. We have to do something about that. Second, we need to be able to get those soldiers where they need to go, especially overseas, and support them. Third, those soldiers need to be properly protected. Not to provide them with the right equipment is immoral.

Again in the former Yugoslavia, the soldiers told us that their armoured personnel carriers were unable to stop a bullet and that they did not have enough radios or night vision binoculars. We have to do something about that.

Our defence spending has to be radically altered. The priority must be spending on equipment and training for the young men and women who are going into harm's way. That is why we recommended a major redesign and reduction of Canadian Forces headquarters. That is also why we believe the reserve forces, which cost $1 billion per year, should be put to better use and provide more combat service support capabilities.

That is why we recommend that fighter aircraft be cut. That one part of the Air Force costs us over $1 billion a year to operate when all the training, headquarters and base support costs are factored in. Yet, they have been deployed overseas on operations only once in the last 40 years, that being during the Gulf War. Our entire land forces cost only twice as much and they have been sending thousands of people on operations overseas every year for decades. Some things are out of balance in our forces, and the balance must be restored.

What kind of armed forces do the committee's recommendations leave us with? They leave us with an armed forces that has at home, for task one, one ship available at all times on each coast to act in the world's second largest maritime area of responsibility; an ability to know what is going on in our air space and do something about it; a capacity to deal with one or two Oka-type incidents across the country; and, abroad, for task two, an armed force that can contribute to two or three multinational operations, such as peacekeeping missions, in a major way. This is at a time when there are several dozen conflicts going on around the world and, undoubtedly, more trouble on the way.

Given that so much of our trade is overseas, and given that we are a nation of immigrants with roots around the world, this hardly seems excessive. Yes, I am afraid it will cost us between $10 billion and $11 billion a year for the foreseeable future. Modern, well-trained and properly equipped armed forces are expensive. They take time to create. They cannot just be plucked off the shelf when needed. However, not to have them when they are needed is even more expensive. Spending on defence is an investment in our long-term security.

I caution that spending only 2 per cent of our gross domestic product on our long-term security may be too low and could prove short-sighted. As an analogy, we have built a beautiful house but we are living in a high-crime district, and we are very foolish if we do not install the proper security system. The premium for that security system will be much cheaper than the cost of a fire or a break in.

Some have called for more defence cuts and a smaller defence budget. "The Cold War is over," they say. "It is time for a peace dividend." We have that dividend, and for us it is peace. Others argue that times are tough, that the deficit is our biggest threat, that defence must pay its share. Well, defence has paid and paid and paid its share. In fact, since 1961, the increase in spending on debt servicing has almost exactly equalled reductions in spending on defence as a percentage of government expenditures. This means that defence cuts have been the only real strategy of successive governments to pay for our debts.

Spending on defence is now less than a quarter of our spending on debt servicing. You could cut defence to zero, abandon our sovereignty and global interests, and still not come close to solving the problem.

Still others point to our allies and say that they are cutting more, and why can we not? In spite of all the cuts, Canada is still among the NATO countries which spend the smallest percentage of their gross domestic product on defence. For over 30 years we have had a free ride, and the free ride is over.

Of course, the defence we get for our money depends upon how well we spend it. The major purpose of our work was not to examine how defence is run, but in the course of digging under rocks we unearthed a lot of issues and concerns. Management of defence is complicated and full of difficult issues. I do not want to spend too much time on it today. However, it is clear that in many areas we have not yet got it right. There is much work left here for the department and Parliament.

One recommendation that is likely to upset a lot of people is that we stop using defence equipment purchases to subsidize regional development or, if we do so, we should identify the premium which, in the past, has been as high as 30 per cent, and call it regional development spending, not defence spending.

We also want the military to buy equipment off the shelf. We can no longer justify designing and manufacturing military equipment that is unique to Canada, and that has no market outside Canada. We believe that Canadian companies can compete without a constant stream of government subsidies.

The Auditor General clearly pointed out in 1992 that companies rarely break free from subsidies and technology transfer, which is often the excuse for the subsidy. It hardly ever happens.

Honourable senators, if we want to spend money supporting regions or industries, let us say so and not disguise it as part of the defence budget. We are spending little enough on real defence without applying additional burdens of regional development or corporate subsidies under that account.

There is much left for Parliament to explore in defence management. Several of our recommendations called for the parliamentary committee to follow up with further study. We believe the process should continue. If war is too serious a business to leave to the generals, then defence is too serious a business to be left to the bureaucrats.

The committee has proposed some positive, achievable reforms to ensure that members of Parliament will be engaged in an ongoing way in the most profound responsibility of government — the protection of its citizens and sovereignty. We believe that ongoing parliamentary scrutiny of defence is in the national interest. We want government to tell us what it will do with respect to its future expenditures and capital plan. We want government to tell us what it has done in an annual review and assessment of defence policy, and by reporting on the progress of capital projects.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Kenny, I am sorry, but I must bring to your attention the fact that your time is up.

Honourable senators, does Senator Kenny have leave to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, we want government to tell us how well it has done, with meaningful indicators which actually tell us how much defence we are getting for our dough. Parliament must use that information earnestly.

Honourable senators, the defence of the nation is serious business. It should be subject to a regular public review. It should involve all recognized parties in Parliament to build the largest possible consensus, and Parliament should have sufficient resources to do a credible job.

For this reason, the committee has recommended that a Standing Joint Committee on Defence be established to build on the success of this latest exercise. Our report establishes an opening agenda for the committee, a series of issues which remain unresolved, and information from the government on plans, priorities and the capital programs on which to seek the views of Canadians.

To sum up, honourable senators, the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy has produced a report which repositions Canada's Armed Forces for the next decade. The committee has shown that Parliament can and must play a significant, continuing role in the development of Canadian defence policy. I hope that the work of the recommended standing joint committee on defence can begin soon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the order remain standing in the name of the Honourable Senator Forrestall on the Order Paper?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

EXTENSION OF FINAL REPORT DATE— REPORT OF ABORIGINAL PEOPLES COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples (extension of deadline), presented in the Senate on December 8, 1994.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on behalf of Senator Andreychuk. This extension of deadline was explained. It is simply an extension of the deadline to report on the aboriginal veterans' study. It has no budget implications, I am told, nor any other implications other than simple logistics in getting the report ready. Thus, the committee has asked for an extension.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Berntson, for Senator Andreychuk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, that this report be adopted now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON POPULATION AND DEVELOPMENT—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz rose pursuant to notice of November 17, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the officially adopted text of the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD), held in Cairo, Egypt, from September 5 to 14, 1994.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to my inquiry this afternoon. If I do not have enough time after the 15-minute limit, I should like to resume tomorrow, with the permission of honourable senators.

It was with a deep sense of appreciation and responsibility that I accepted the challenging invitation from the Minister of Foreign Affairs last September to be a member of the official Canadian delegation to the third UN International Conference on Population and Development held in Cairo, Egypt, from September 5 to 14, 1994.

Despite my experience as a delegate for Canada 20 years ago in August of 1974 at the first UN Conference on Population in Bucharest, I did feel some trepidation about the portent of this highly controversial and important third conference. Incidentally, another Canadian delegate to the third UN Conference on Population in Cairo was our former colleague Senator Lorna Marsden, who had also been a delegate to the second international conference held in Mexico City in 1984.

In Cairo, I was the lone senator on the Canadian delegation, headed by the Honourable Sergio Marchi, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. His deputy was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Latin America and Africa), the Honourable Christine Stewart. Other Canadian delegates included seven members from the House of Commons and spokesmen from the Ministries of Health, Citizenship and Immigration, Foreign Affairs, and also two directors of the NGO Planned Parenthood of Canada.

I wish to express my appreciation to our Ambassador to Egypt at that time, Mr. Jacques Simard, and his associates for their expert assistance and hospitality during our stay in Cairo.

As honourable senators know, the civilization of Egypt dates back to 5,000 years B.C. It has a rich, varied history and culture that is most fascinating, not only because the Sphinx and the pyramids are located there, but also from the historical events that took place in that country — if we go back far enough — to Joseph, son of Jacob, who became chancellor to one of the Pharaohs and who helped many Hebrew people in Egypt during the world famine at that time. Let us not forget that it was out of Egypt that Moses led forth the Jewish people from enslavement and crossed the Red Sea.

Today, honourable senators, the lands of the Nile, sometimes shaken by Islamic fundamentalism, are nonetheless filled not only with towers of mosques but also with the spires of Christian churches and other religious denominations.

In Cairo, it was startling to see extra police and soldiers — amounting to about 2,000 — at all checkpoints throughout the city protecting the delegates, which apparently numbered, including the NGOs and tourists, an extra 20,000 people.

The conference was preceded by a two-day consortium of parliamentary associations hosted by the Egyptian government on September 7. They called it "Parliamentarian's Day." It was chaired by Speaker Ahmad Fathi Sorour, a high-ranking member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Some 200 parliamentarians from around the world offered in the National Assembly their views for an official IPU statement regarding the main objects of the Cairo UN conference, which was adopted without a vote. I was the only Canadian to speak in that debate and did so, of course, on my own behalf as a physician and also as a long-time parliamentarian.

The International Conference on Population and Development, as the conference is known officially, was attended by delegations from 183 countries. It was presided over by Dr. Nafis Sadik, a physician from Pakistan and director of the United Nations Fund for Population Activities. This conference was one of the most important conventions ever on population questions, and certainly the biggest, bearing profound implications for society in the approaching millennium.

The focus for discussion, called the draft Programme of Action, evoked a lively and highly polarized debate on the central chapters of the draft text. Many developing countries, and several Islamic states, along with the Holy See, objected to permissive language on abortion, promotion of contraception, extramarital sexual relations, erosion of the status of the family and exposure of adolescents to corrupting pornographic material. Under the limits of time, pressure to attain a rough consensus produced several express reservations by more than 45 countries to passages in the Programme of Action to which they could not consent. Therefore, until the last day, there was no consensus.

A primary objective enunciated in the adopted Programme of Action was to raise $17 billion for the advancement of primary health care for women and for the promotion of non-coercive family planning information. Much of the target was said to be attainable with a commitment of 0.7 per cent of each country's GNP, a level which Canada already exceeds, to an aggregate of more than $80 million in the field, including projects backed by CIDA and IDRC. Discussions about the controversial idea of allocating 20 per cent of GNP and 20 per cent of aid to population activities will take place at the next world summit in Copenhagen, Denmark, in March of next year.

Honourable senators, as the sole Canadian senator at the Cairo conference, it is my intention to give you today a synopsis from the vantage point I was privileged to have and, by inquiry today, to make several recommendations.

On November 17, 1994 during the Forty-Ninth General Assembly of the United Nations in New York City, which is ongoing, the Secretary General released the official report of this ICPD conference held in Cairo, including the 110-page Programme of Action — the non-binding set of aspirations the convention propounded. To this document, more than one in four, or 47 of the 183 delegations attending out of the 192 invited, had expressed reservations. Written reservations alone occupied 10 per cent of the 155-page report of the ICPD, which I am happy to table today in order that honourable senators will be apprised of this important conference.

The variance of consensus by written and oral reservations was over and above the absence from agreement of those who did not attend the conference, namely, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, Iraq and Lebanon, who stated publicly their objections to the conference, as well as Monaco, Liechtenstein and Nauru, and war-ravaged Bosnia and Rwanda.

The Cairo Programme of Action is thus viewed best as a weather-vane for development policy where it affects natural population growth. Chapter III of the Programme of Action, to which no reservations were lodged, declared sustainability to be the context within which economic development should be evaluated. Even so, what sustainability actually means, or what it consists of, was left undefined.

Significant in their presence were delegations of the so-called emerging economies: Eastern Europe, Baltic and the Russian-Federation nations, ravaged by negative fecundity and plummeting GDP. About 40 island states had a large impact, whose hopes of stability are affected by demographic factors — some very positive, such as tourism on which they depend, and others markedly negative, owing to obvious limits.

Over-urbanization is a prime factor for developing nations, whose need to expand infrastructure is poignant, as to an important extent it is for emerging economies. Several nations facing desertification, such as the sub-Sahara desert nations, need to determine where to emphasize infrastructure expansion — in the already burgeoning cities or as against the desert.

The Programme of Action of this conference widely acknowledged the family to be the normative element founded on marriage of male and female essential to society for raising its future generations. Combining with attention to this fact in the Year of the Family, the United Nation's evolving vision of itself as world intervenor for peace highlighted the concerns of innumerable people seeking hope, escaping oppression and separated by violence. That Canada takes proud interest in the migration of families, and in their reunification, was emphasized in that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration headed our delegation. He acknowledged during his speech at the plenary session that Canada, by nature, depends upon immigration to be sustained, let alone to grow. He said that it has always been his experience that Canada, as a compassionate country, welcomes streams of humanity for the building up of a just society. In his speech to the General Assembly he also stated that he recommends that our government support the G-7 call for another conference of this type in 1997.

Besides being a response to geography and upheaval, this conference in Cairo was also a needed opportunity to assess a tumultuous decade of the world's progressing and sometimes floundering development, taking a close look at its most telling measures. Prominent among these human goods were fertility, longevity, wellness, security, education, and other human rights, such as equity of the sexes and respect for the family.

Nine days were nowhere near adequate to assess these attainments, let alone to consolidate findings and craft a directive of future goals. Consider the necessity for a world conference just on the development of women, which is to be held in Beijing, China next September, and the World Summit on Social Development in Copenhagen, which I mentioned earlier. At a hoped-for world conference on migration, respect for human diversity will play a major role, something which I think would be an important conference if the nations of the world get organized and agree to attend.

At Cairo, the question of the equity of sexes arose frequently, especially during our discussions on education and health. While women do generally survive men, this vigorous feminine contribution to a robust populous is in many places undermined by inadequate primary health care even during maternity, a time that normally is the pink of female health.

Of great concern, especially to the physicians at the conference, was the unhealthy and uninformed tribal rite or ritual whereby young girls of some Islamic families are subjected by their parents to so-called female circumcision. As the removal of an organ, this practice is classed by our medical profession as genital mutilation. Along with many other delegates, many of them reverent Mohammedans, I was appalled at the shocking revelations in a CNN television documentary shown during the conference depicting the tribal practice of clitoridectomy. In one unforgettable scene, the young female victim screams out, "Father! Father!...A sin upon you. A sin upon you all."

Honourable senators, I submit in this inquiry that, so far as the limits to pluralism must operate for the good of a just society, as we aspire to be here in Canada, excising organs for non-medical reasons, even vestigial organs, which of course genitalia are not, is to be deplored by all nations.

In the Canadian context, which is multicultural like no other, the point is especially significant. Security of the person and life itself upon which every liberty is founded are so fundamental that we are troubled to frame for them a charter of fundamental rights and freedoms.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Haidasz, I am sorry to interrupt but your time is up.

Senator Haidasz: With the permission of honourable senators, may I continue the debate on my inquiry at the next sitting of the Senate?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: Then I adjourn this debate.

On motion of Senator Haidasz, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 13, 1994

SENATOR'S STATEMENT

HUMAN RIGHTS

UKRAINIAN-CANADIAN COMMUNITY—
REDRESS FOR PAST INJUSTICES

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I rise today to give voice to the concerns of the Ukrainian-Canadian community, of which I am a member. A series of injustices committed against this community during and immediately following the First World War are undisputable and disturbing. Equally disturbing is the fact that so many Canadians are still unaware of these injustices, and yet this cause is not more diligently pursued by the media, academics and beyond the Ukrainian community.

Under the War Measures Act of 1914, the Government of Canada proceeded to intern thousands of Ukrainian-Canadians, considering them enemy aliens. Men, women and children were herded into camps where they were treated as prisoners of war and deprived of fundamental human and civil liberties. While interned, some of the lands belonging to this segment of the population were confiscated and their labours were used to profit agencies of the government. These highly significant injustices have yet to be properly recognized and dealt with.

The debate over acknowledgment and redress has not been non-existent. Indeed, on September 22, 1988, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney announced that an agreement had been reached with the National Association of Japanese-Canadians regarding the acknowledgment and redress for crimes committed against that community during the Second World War. With regard to such measures, he stated:

> ...you deal with them in the belief that a strong nation is capable of looking at its past and resolving injustices as they occur, and that's what we are in the process of doing.

The imperatives that demand that we learn from the Japanese-Canadian experiences are no less pressing in the case of Ukrainian-Canadians. It is in this vein that the government of the day entered into negotiations with the Ukrainian-Canadian Congress in 1988.

On May 18, 1993, the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism offered a package of proposals designed to meet the redress requirements of the Ukrainian-Canadian community, including an official acknowledgment, certificates of honour, a national builders hall and community programs. This package did not lead to a settlement, but negotiations continued.

It is unfortunate that progress has been slow for the acknowledgment and redress of injustices towards Ukrainian-Canadians. It is essential that this issue not be allowed to falter. Redressing an historical injustice is fundamental to the ability of the Ukrainian-Canadian community to regain and sustain its sense of identity and moral worth. We must confront history and learn from it, so that we may move forward. Only in facing up to this tragedy, by admitting mistakes, acknowledging hardships and, most of all, by educating those who come after us, can we ever hope to remove the threat of such events occurring again.

I, therefore, call on the government to pick up where the previous one left off by properly resolving the compelling issue of Ukrainian-Canadian internment redress. This is an important issue for all Canadians. It must be addressed as a priority. In the coming weeks, I will continue to press the government on this issue.

FUTURE OF AGRICULTURE IN CANADA

INTERIM REPORT OF AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Dan Hays, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, presented the following report:

Tuesday, December 13, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to table its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on Tuesday, June 7, 1994, to undertake a special study on the future of agriculture in Canada, tables an interim report on "New Realities and Tough Choices: From Agriculture to Agri-Food."

Respectfully submitted,

DANIEL HAYS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

• (1410)

On motion of Senator Hays, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

REPORT OF AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE REQUESTING POWER TO TRAVEL PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the fifth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, requesting that the commmittee be empowered to incur special expenses pursuant to the procedural guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this report be printed as an appendix?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Appendix (A), p. 682.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hays, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 14, 1994 at one thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

EXPECTED INCREASE IN DEBT SERVICE COSTS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, my question is for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since the Minister of Finance tabled his fiscal update in October, there has been a sharp jump in interest rates. This is especially true in relation to the short-term debt that makes up most of the government's liabilities. The interest rate on three-month treasury bills has jumped almost two percentage points since October 25; one-year T-bills are up a percentage point and a half; five-year bonds are up half a percentage point. Only at the long end of the market do we see 30-year bonds down, and then only marginally.

The government's goal on the deficit is to reduce it to $25 billion annually, two years from now. The government says each full percentage point increase in interest rates adds an extra $2.5 billion a year in interest costs after two years. The House of Commons Finance Committee said last week that if the government cannot meet its deficit target, it should slap on a deficit surtax.

Can the Leader of the Government assure us that taxes will not rise to meet the added debt service costs?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Jessiman for his question. You will know that I cannot really make pronouncements on matters that pertain to the budget. Therefore, I am constrained in answering your question.

As you are aware, the increase in interest rates is something that the government had foreseen some time ago. Indeed, many months ago when we were making projections, a great many people thought we were being overly pessimistic.

Now, as the Minister of Finance has stated, we are in a position to continue on the course that we have undertaken. The commitment remains undiminished in terms of our goal to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in 3 years.

We are obviously concerned about the rise in interest rates. It is a worldwide phenomenon. It is in large measure, too, a factor of the activities of our friends at the Federal Reserve Board in the United States. The situation also is not helped by comments such as those made by the Premier of Quebec in New York yesterday.

POSSIBLE REDEMPTION OF CANADA SAVINGS BONDS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, given the sharp increase in interest rates over the past six weeks — and I am told today that the bank rate has jumped 71 basis points, so it now stands at 7.03 per cent — is the government concerned that there may be a rush to redeem Canada Savings Bonds at the end of this month? If such concern does exist, is there a contingency plan to deal with it?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I honestly could not comment on that question. I will take it to my colleague the Minister of Finance and see what kind of a response I can get for my friend.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Atlantic Opportunities Agency announced last week that it is changing its policy on contributions to business. In ACOA's first five years of operation, that policy has helped the economy of the Atlantic region to grow by some $1.4 billion. It has reduced the region's income disparity gap with the rest of Canada by 4 per cent. It has created 42,000-plus new jobs, and maintained another 45,000 jobs.

I agree with the change in policy towards loans rather than grants. I know that the Western Diversification Program also operates on loans. However, will the Honourable Leader of the Government provide assurance that the regional development dollars being spent in Ontario by FEDNOR, and in Quebec by FORD-Q — or La Pred, as I believe it once was called — will be subject to the same rules that the federal government is applying in Atlantic Canada and in the western provinces?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank my friend for the question. I can certainly indicate to her that FORD-Q in Quebec operates on repayable loans. I will need to check on the Ontario situation, and will do so quickly.

ATLANTIC CANADA REGIONAL VENTURE CAPITAL FUND—EQUITY FINANCING NEEDS OF SMALL BUSINESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: I have another quick question, honourable senator. The regional development conference in Moncton last week issued a report that the four Atlantic premiers and the Minister for ACOA are working on the creation of an Atlantic Canada regional venture capital fund, which is excellent news. Further, a press report stated that the minister, David Dingwall, and the premiers are studying a proposed venture fund of $20 to $30 million which would be invested in companies needing $1 million or more in equity to develop products and export markets.

In practical terms, there is a significant need in the Atlantic region for equity funding for businesses requiring financing in the range of $100,000 to $200,000. The bulk or majority of new jobs created over the past few years has come from those smaller industries.

My question is this: What consideration is being given to addressing the equity financing needs of businesses in this range, which create the most jobs and opportunities for Atlantic Canadians?

I know you will not be able to give me an answer today, but I should like it as soon as possible.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will pass that question along to my colleague. I know that my honourable friend shares with the leaders in Atlantic Canada the concern that small and medium-sized businesses receive a constant and viable access to capital for their development and expansion. I will put that directly to the minister as well.

THE BUDGET

ELIMINATION OF TAX BREAKS FOR HEALTH AND DENTAL PLANS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, health and dental plans are on the list of tax breaks that the government is considering scrapping. Some plan members could pay up to several hundred dollars a year in extra taxes. This is more than many would pay for health and dental services if they had no plan. Is the government not concerned that this would cause many workers to drop out of dental and health plans?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will tell my honourable friend, as I indicated to Senator Jessiman earlier, these are questions for which I have no answer at the moment. Indeed, even if I did, I would not be able to give them to you.

As the honourable senator knows, the suggestions coming forward from many sectors have been prompted by the pre-budget consultation process which, in terms of generating ideas not just from a parliamentary committee but from Canadians all across this country, is quite amazing. All of these suggestions will be considered in the final analysis. The Minister of Finance will go into his office quietly and decide, and then we will know in February.

Senator Cohen: Honourable senators, if the workers drop their coverage, there will be no benefits to tax. However, many of these same taxpayers could claim the medical credit for bills their plan used to cover. Why, then, is the government willing to risk destroying a system that works well for what may turn out to be very little in the way of extra tax revenue?

Senator Fairbairn: I will be very pleased to take my friend's concerns and comments to the Minister of Finance, who has not made up his mind on any of the issues before him. I will be putting these questions before him as well.

AGRICULTURE

THREAT TO SUGAR INDUSTRY UNDER NEW GATT RULES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In less than a month, Canadian sugar companies and related industries will face a serious crisis because, on January 1, 1995, under the new GATT rules, the U.S. will impose new restrictions on imports of sugar and sugar-containing food products, threatening more than 2,400 jobs in Canada, including jobs in my own province of Manitoba. The U.S. is taking this step in order to protect its own market, which maintains artificially high prices for sugar, and thus creating more barriers for Canadian companies.

Honourable senators, my question is this: Can the Leader of the Government indicate to us what action the Canadian government is taking, and what talks are going on to prevent this crisis?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for her question, one which she will know is of great importance to myself and to the area I represent.

The Minister of Trade, the Honourable Roy MacLaren, has had repeated conversations with his counterpart in the United States, Mickey Kantor, on this issue. He was doing so again last week in Miami. I have not yet received a report as to the progress or nature of those most recent discussions. However, I will try to find out what they were and have an answer for the honourable senator tomorrow.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—IMPLICATIONS OF ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the continuing interest in the Pearson airport matter.

You may recall a week ago that I made an inquiry as to whether or not the Prime Minister was involved, as a lawyer in private life, in giving legal advice to the syndicate, or to any representatives of the consortium. I have not yet received a reply to that question. In view of the forthcoming recess and the continuing interest in this topic, and now that the Prime Minister has returned from his travels, has the honourable leader yet had an opportunity to discuss this matter with the Prime Minister, and if so, does she now have a response to my inquiry?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to discuss this matter with the Prime Minister. I certainly forwarded the questions of my honourable friend to his office just as soon as they were asked. This afternoon, I will attempt to get a response from him before we adjourn for the recess. If that is not possible, I will get it to him another way.

PROPOSED CLOSURE OF ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT ST-JEAN—RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The saga of the Collège militaire royal de St-Jean continues. Last weekend, the federal government agreed to discuss with the Government of Quebec a process whereby the military college would be closed after a period of two years instead of several months. I would like to know what the government's intentions are.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend is quite right. The saga continues. A number of statements have been made in recent days, as he will know.

Honourable senators, discussions have been moving along very well with the mayor of St-Jean. Those discussions were based on the demilitarization of the college and its transition into a civilian institution. All discussions were based on the foundation of the principles of the July 19 agreement.

The minister was certainly prepared to continue those discussions with the province of Quebec. His counterpart in Quebec then leapt into the fray, and I believe the minister said yesterday, in answer to some questions, that the principles on which he and the mayor had been conducting their discussions were being — if I can use the word — "misrepresented" by Minister Beaudoin in Quebec.

At the moment, I believe Minister Massé has urged Madam Beaudoin to accept the principles contained in the July 19 agreement on CMR, in the hope that that would lead to an early conclusion of the conversations that have been making progress in recent weeks and days. We are very hopeful that a timely agreement can be reached; however, a better understanding must take place between the government of Quebec and the other partners to the discussion before that can go ahead.

Senator Nolin: The original decision of your government was motivated by financial restraint and required the fast closure of the college. Now your government is attempting to have discussions with the provincial government on a two-year closure of the college.

Are financial restraints no longer the motive of the government? What is the real motive of the government?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as was the case some months ago, financial restraint remains fundamental to the consideration, not just of CMR but of other areas that were restrained and restricted and, in some cases, closed at that time. Financial concerns are still very much a part of the situation, as far as this government is concerned. Nonetheless, some ongoing discussions were bearing fruit up until Sunday. The hope is that the federal government will be successful in urging the Government of Quebec to get back on track, with a view to concluding an agreement that will be beneficial, not just to the Government of Quebec but especially to the community of St-Jean.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29 by Senator Jessiman. I also have answers to two Order Paper questions in the name of Senator Marshall, but now standing in the name of Senator Berntson.

THE BUDGET

REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS—
GOVERNMENT POSITION ON POSSIBLE CHANGES

I wish to respond to the question presented on November 29, 1994 by my honourable colleague concerning comments made by Liberal M.P. David Walker, quoted from the November 28 edition of the Winnipeg Sun.

On the issue of Old Age Security discussed in the above mentioned article, I wish to state that Mr. Walker was speaking only in his capacity as a Member of Parliament. It has been stated on numerous occasions that it would be inappropriate for the Government to comment on any individual budget proposals or items under discussion in advance of the next budget.

While it is understandable and even expected for these types of national budgetary issues to be raised and discussed given the unprecedented open pre-budget consultation process that has been initiated by this Government, it is important to understand that the government's approval or disapproval of any individual measure will be made public only at the time of the budget's release, once all of the information arising from our extensive public consultation process has been reviewed and analyzed.

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier moved third reading of Bill C-63, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

• (1430)

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Michael Kirby moved the second reading of Bill C-46, to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, in June 1993, the former government announced a major reorganization which merged together the Departments of Industry, Science and Technology with Investment Canada and parts of the Departments of Communications and Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Bill C-46 formally implements that reorganization.

The bill gives a legislative mandate to a new and more efficient Department of Industry and gives the Minister of Industry and his deputy minister their powers, duties and functions.

The reorganization of the Department of Industry was adopted by the current government following the 1993 election as part of its major initiative to focus on developing small and medium-sized businesses.

The Red Book, which the government used during the last election campaign, acknowledged that the growth of small and medium-sized businesses is essential to creating jobs for all Canadians. The Speech from the Throne reaffirmed that commitment. Subsequently, strengthening the infrastructure in the business environment for small and medium-sized firms became an important focus of the government's first budget.

Under this bill, the Minister of Industry and his department will perform a variety of functions which strengthen the national economy, promote the mobility of goods and services across Canada, increase the international competitiveness of Canadian industry, focusing on services as well as products, and encourage the fullest use and development of science and technology by Canadian businesses.

The Department of Industry has already undertaken many high profile and important initiatives in the past 12 months. Currently, one of the projects under exploration, in cooperation with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, is a study of the feasibility of developing a business network strategy. This measure would set up some 30 business networks across Canada to foster cooperation and collaboration among small and medium-sized firms with common business interests. Another initiative of this department is a pilot program under the Technology Partnership Program. It will explore the feasibility of incentives for universities to enter into partnerships with businesses in order to develop emerging technology for industrial application. A new fund has also been established to help expand existing businesses through the Federal Business Development Bank. The Canada Community Investment Fund has been announced with one of its aims being to ensure the availability of equity financing for smaller firms.

These four impressive measures I have just mentioned are but a few examples of the work which the Department of Industry has already initiated. I repeat, Bill C-46 gives the legal framework to a department that already has a clear and decisive plan of action.

To this point in time, the reorganization announced in June 1993 has gone well. Bill C-46 provides for a painless transition in creating a department which will achieve the objectives set out in the act. The text of Bill C-46 substantially reproduces provisions of the old acts that underlie the departments which have been merged into the new Department of Industry. The central idea was to preserve the status quo between the mandates of departments and minimize changes in order to provide for continuity in the functioning of the Department of Industry. Efficiency and certainty were given maximum priority in this reorganization.

As was clear in the government's Throne Speech last February, the government attaches top priority to the overall objectives of Bill C-46. Indeed, just a few months ago in Quebec City, the Prime Minister outlined the agenda he wants the new Department of Industry to develop in the interests of economic renewal. The priorities the Prime Minister outlined were: improve the business climate for entrepreneurs, help business profit from new technology, seek expanding markets and promote the tourism industry.

Bill C-46 meets all these objectives by bringing together under one department, under one minister, the key elements of economic development from the former Departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Communications, Investment Canada and Industry, Science and Technology. Overlap and duplication are substantially eliminated. Administrative costs are substantially reduced. More coherent and effective policy development is encouraged.

Under Bill C-46, existing resources can be applied more efficiently and more expeditiously. One minister and one departmental team under one deputy minister will direct their efforts to achieving our economic renewal goals using the resources of what were previously several organizations.

I cannot think of a time when the duties of the minister responsible for industry have ever been so far reaching. In that sense, Bill C-46 is extremely remarkable because of its comprehensiveness. It gives all the tools needed for economic development renewal and economic development policy to one department. The result will be a department that will be able to focus fully on developing and carrying out coherent, efficient and effective policies for economic renewal.

Under Bill C-46, the educational and scientific communities, consumers, small and medium-sized businesses and tourism operators will all be able to look to one organization to meet their needs and concerns in the area of industrial strategy. They will no longer have to shop their concerns around to a number of different departments with different mandates. Meaningful and more efficient interaction between government and business is the result.

For example, by placing responsibility for consumer policy within the Department of Industry, it is guaranteed that a consumer viewpoint will be represented and have a place around the table when policies are established that impact on the Canadian market-place. In point of fact, Bill C-46 will provide for an integrated process in which consumer concerns are dealt with early in the policy development process, and in a much more effective way than was the case years ago. In this way, consumer protection efforts can now be concentrated on preventing problems rather than correcting them after the fact.

Consumers and businesses have an equal interest in ensuring the efficiency of the Canadian market-place. Consumer interests, for example, will help determine our course in areas of vital concern to all Canadians on issues like those related to biotechnology, the Labelling Act and regulatory reform.

There is clearly no room for overlap and confusion if Canadian companies are to compete successfully abroad. Technological advances move so fast, and are such an increasingly important factor in all our lives and in the competitiveness of Canadian business that Canada cannot afford to follow behind the pace of technology. The new department of industry has acted swiftly on this front, publishing a discussion paper earlier this year on the future of the information highway in Canada. Canadians must have access to the information highway. They must be able to get the information as cheaply as possible and, in the process, have their privacy protected. I cite the importance of the information highway to our country as one more example where our industrial strategy must be clear, decisive and informed.

Honourable senators, Bill C-46 is an absolutely essential part of giving the Department of Industry the legal framework, the legal sanction to carry out work that is vital to the future of Canada in a comprehensive, logical and informed manner.

In practical terms, Bill C-46 means that the Department of Communications Act and the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Act will remain in force in a skeletal form, but without the powers that are now to be vested in the Department of Industry. These acts will eventually be replaced as other departments that still require them — for example Health Canada, Heritage Canada and Agriculture Canada — revise their own legislation.

The Investment Canada Act is amended by Bill C-46 to remove the provision creating Investment Canada as a separate department. A director of investment will be appointed who reports directly to the Minister of Industry.

Responsibility for federal regional development activities in Ontario and Quebec remain, as they have been for some time, within the Department of Industry. There will not be separate legislation for the Federal Office of Regional Development in Quebec. The authority for regional development in Quebec will, however, be transferred by Order in Council to another minister once the bill has been proclaimed. This arrangement acknowledges the importance of regional development efforts by providing for a more effective and efficient means of program delivery.

Bill C-46 also includes a clause that gives the minister the power to fix fees for products and services sold by his department. These fees are not restricted to cost recovery or to fees for other government services. Consequently, this section may be a source of future funds.

Bill C-46 also confirms responsibility for aboriginal business development within the Department of Industry. It does not affect the independence of the Bureau of Competition Policy, which will continue to exercise its mandate under separate legislation. As well, it makes certain that the proper emphasis is placed on tourism as a vital part of the Canadian economy by making the Minister of Industry responsible for the tourism sector.

In conclusion, let me summarize by saying that, clearly, a strong economy is the essence of a strong society. The principal aim of Bill C-46 is to bring together in one department the key tools which government requires in order to help ensure the future strengths of Canada's economy. It is much more than merely a cost-cutting bill, although there are significant costs to be saved, and further savings are expected as the departmental organization is fine-tuned.

Bill C-46, as laid out in the government's platform in the last election and in the Speech from the Throne last February, is an essential part of this government's economic strategy because of its focus on small and medium-sized businesses. It is also an essential part of the government's economic strategy because it offers a streamlined, smaller and more efficient government which is, in fact, what Canadians want. That is what we believe this bill is delivering, and that is why I believe this bill ought to be supported by the Senate.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as has been said by my honourable colleague, this is one of several bills dealing with the reorganization of government. I spoke at length on one of the earlier bills last week. I think I characterized it as my umbrella speech dealing with all of these reorganization bills.

I raised a concern at that time, honourable senators. I raise it again now, and I hope to find the answer in committee. My concern deals with the removal of the prior obligation to table before Parliament an annual report on the operation of the department. I am told that virtually all of the bills dealing with this reorganization have in some way modified the requirement to table that annual report. There may be other questions in committee, but, by and large, there is no particular difficulty with this bill or most of the other reorganization bills. We still have a problem with the reorganization bill dealing with Public Works, but we will deal with that when it comes forward. From our side, we would not object to this bill going to committee now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kirby, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS FOR INTERNAL COMBUSTION ENGINES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Colin Kenny moved the second reading of Bill S-7, to accelerate the use of alternative fuels for internal combustion engines.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill S-7 is to accelerate the move to alternative-fuel vehicles in Canada.

The problem we face with alternative-fuel vehicles is a simple one. It is a chicken and egg problem. Manufacturers say they cannot manufacture alternative-fuel vehicles because customers choose not to buy them. The reason customers choose not to buy them is that they cannot get them refueled. People who provide the fuel say they would install more refueling stations or more refueling capacity if only there were more alternative-fuel vehicles to use the refueling stations. Thus, you have a circular argument where no one proceeds any further.

The purpose of this bill is to break that log jam. The federal government purchases and operates roughly 39,000 vehicles. It is my hope that with this bill we can gradually convert 75 per cent of the federal government fleet to one form or another of alternative fuel and use that as the core to break the cyclical argument.

This proposal calls for two years of study and then a gradual phase-in, until the year 2004, of alternative-fuel vehicles. By the year 2004, 75 per cent of vehicles purchased by government will be run on alternative fuels.

The bill itself is fuel neutral. It does not choose between ethanol, methanol, natural gas, propane, hydrogen, or electricity. It leaves it open to the market-place to decide which of those fuels is best. In some regions, certain fuels will clearly have an advantage over others.

The proposed act is also an important first step for the government towards meeting its real commitments. It will help clean up carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. It is also an opportunity for the government to save money in a variety of ways.

As we all know, alternative fuels tend to be cheaper than gasoline. If a medium-sized vehicle or larger is driven 20,000 kilometres per year or more, there is likely to be a payback within two or two and a half years. It is reasonable to assume that, if the government could convert 75 per cent of its vehicles to alternative fuels, by the year 2004 it would save $7 million per year, even after the cost of conversion or up-fit, or the additional costs which would be incurred in purchasing vehicles designed to run on alternative fuels.

In order for this program to be effective, the government must reduce its outrageous menu of vehicles. Presently, the government purchases 106 different makes and models of cars from different manufacturers. On the face of it, this seems to be an outrageous number which can be vastly reduced.

The Auditor General, in his 1992 report, was very critical of the government for not significantly reducing the number of makes and models of vehicles that it purchases. He suggested, as an example, the method of selecting and purchasing vehicles used by the RCMP. Honourable senators may have noticed their vehicles on Parliament Hill. They are the same type of vehicle the RCMP use in Regina, in Victoria, or in Saint John. That police force uses a common vehicle right across the country. When they make a bulk purchase, they benefit from cost savings. In addition, that leads to administrative savings and significant savings on maintenance.

There is no reason why the federal government cannot follow the example of the RCMP and reduce the types and makes of vehicles it purchases. The purpose of reducing the types and makes is that it will be necessary, ultimately, for manufacturers to start producing originally manufactured alternative-fuel vehicles.

This bill, however, does not call for that; it simply calls for the government to operate vehicles fuelled by alternative fuels. It can do it by up-fitting, it can do it by converting or, once they are available, it can do it by purchasing originally manufactured alternative-fuel vehicles. If, at the same time, the government could reduce the size of its fleet, it would save money. If it were ordering more of the same types of vehicles, then manufacturers could economically start to produce them for alternative fuels.

One of the beauties of this bill, from my perspective, is that the government is leading by example. We are not talking about the government telling people how they should run their lives; we are talking about the government getting its own house in order and demonstrating, by its example, that alternative fuels work, that they will save money, and that they will clean up the air.

If the federal government did proceed along these lines, by the year 2004 it would have over 30,000 vehicles operating on alternative fuel. They would cause, in turn, just by their very use, an expansion of the refuelling infrastructure. They would also create an opportunity for manufacturers to increase the number of vehicles they produce which run on alternative fuels.

When this bill is referred to committee, we will have an opportunity to examine a variety of issues which relate to alternative-fuel vehicles. First, how well do alternative-fuel vehicles function compared to gasoline-powered vehicles? Do they start as efficiently? Do they work as well in hot and cold weather? Do they accelerate as well? Do they require refuelling more often? Does the fuel tank require extra space?

Second, I would expect the committee to examine the refuelling infrastructure of various alternative fuels. How good is the distribution compared to gasoline or diesel fuels? Are there specific regions where certain fuels have an advantage over others? How well will urban areas be taken care of with alternative fuels? What risk does a driver have of running out of an alternative fuel on the highway? What supply systems can be established for small or remote fleets?

Third, I would expect the committee to examine the financial cost benefit of each alternative fuel. How much more does it cost to purchase an originally manufactured vehicle? How much does it cost to convert or up-fit a conventional vehicle? How much will be saved on fuel over the life of the vehicle? How long does the payback take? Are there any extra maintenance or refuelling costs? Are there higher or lower resale values? Will fuel suppliers cover the cost of conversion and recover it out of fuel sales?

Incidentally, this is similar to a program which the federal government has just recently entered into called the "FBI" program. Companies will come in and insulate federal buildings at their own cost, and recover their costs out of fuel savings down the road. There appear to be many alternative-fuel suppliers who are prepared to convert government vehicles at their own expense and recover the costs out of the savings in fuel costs while the government uses the vehicle.

Fourth, the committee will require to examine what the environmental benefits are of each fuel as compared to conventional gasoline.

Finally, I would expect the committee to examine what special offers or incentives various manufacturers or fuel companies might make to assist the government in converting to alternative fuels.

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I, too, want to be brief; I do not intend to repeat all the arguments of my colleague.

When Senator Kenny showed me his bill, I felt it was important for the Senate to address this problem. I was not aware that the Government of Canada owned a fleet of some 40,000 vehicles including more than 100 different models.

During consideration of this bill, it will be interesting to examine the various avenues open to the owner of such an important fleet of vehicles, not to mention the financial and environmental savings. I think that this is a major bill, given today's scientific advances which offer us alternatives to conventional energy sources.

I personally support this bill and look forward to doing some interesting work on the committee that will study it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kenny, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy entitled "Security in a Changing World," tabled in the Senate on October 31, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Forrestall).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreeable that we proceed with another speaker and allow the matter to remain standing in the name of Senator Forrestall?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Louis Roux: Honourable senators, with Senator Forrestall's consent, let me join my colleague Senator Gigantès on the subject of the report from the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy. I realize that what I am about to say is unusual, if not unheard of, in this chamber, but I owe it to my conscience and also to the hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens who are pacifists at heart and who want everyone in the world to live as brothers and sisters, regardless of national boundaries.

[English]

I am a strong advocate for a new vision of Canada's security interests. I believe that Canada can no longer afford to apply the methods and doctrines of the past to modern problems.

Having said so, I do not wish to suggest that Canada's record is anything less than exemplary. I know that Canada has distinguished itself in its dedication to international security in many conflicts and through its exceptional peace-keeping record. I received military training in my youth, and I have nothing but respect for the many veterans with whom I have had the honour to serve in this chamber.

At the outset of this parliamentary exercise, I was encouraged to note an acknowledgment on all sides that Canada's defence — that is to say security — requirements should be considered in the context of a new world, free from the threats posed by the bi-polar system of the Cold War era.

The report of the special joint committee includes the following observation in its introduction:

> This is not a time to repaint the status quo — it is a time to question old premises and look for new ones that are appropriate to our country in a world that in itself is remarkably new.

It was with some considerable disappointment, then, that I read this report and found it full of militaristic and war-like terminology. The unhappy result is that the report reflects much of the old wisdom on Canada's security needs. The opening premise of a new world order leads to no logical conclusion. I believe we need to review our perspective on these matters. We tend to conceptualize these questions in terms of confrontation; a basically militaristic attitude prevails.

Indeed, our concept of security for the last 2,000 years has been dominated by the famous motto of Vegetius, a Roman general of the fourth century. "Si vis pacem, para bellum." or "Let him who desires peace, prepare for war." We need to change that way of approaching the question of security.

Bereft of the so-called "devil" embodied in the Soviet threat, our military minds seem to need to find new evils for themselves, new specific enemies to defend against. We need to give up that way of thinking. We need to focus on cooperation and dialogue. After all, war is not necessarily an inevitable result of differences. We need to refocus our minds, not on defence but on the broader concept of security, be it in the form of feeding the hungry, eliminating violence against women and children, working towards fair trade practices that enable third world countries to develop, or sending peace-keepers, not combat soldiers, abroad.

"Security" above all is prevention, not intervention.

It can prevent, but it cannot cure.

[English]

We must concern ourselves with social injustice which can only lead to social disorder. We now have much more to fear from underdevelopment than nuclear missiles of a potential, imaginary enemy.

Permit me to comment for a moment on the issue of training. The young men and women of our Canadian Forces must be prepared not only to defend themselves and their country but also to create a good rapport with their fellow citizens and with the inhabitants of countries wherever they are called upon to serve.

In my opinion, the type of obligatory service suggested by Senator Grafstein is not the best route. I would suggest an emphasis on organizations like Katimavik and Canada World Youth. This type of voluntary community service, if better funded and promoted, would result in a pool of talent from which we could draw when necessary to defend Canada's interests at home and abroad.

There should be a more cooperative approach by the department. For example, the Department of National Defence should obviously be working very closely with the Department of Foreign Affairs in its efforts to evaluate and respond to Canada's security concerns. Cooperation with the Coast Guard and with our customs personnel should be improved. Duplication of effort should not be a cause for waste of precious public resources in a time of such restraint.

The Department of National Defence should also intensify its cooperation with non-governmental organizations like the Red Cross, Amnesty International, Canadian Quakers, Médecins sans frontières, and the many relief agencies that operate around the world to provide food, water and medicine to the desperate. This could be a useful alliance. After all, these organizations are often on the ground long before the military, and can bring a great deal of experience and insight to a given situation.

For example, Ursula Franklin, a professor at the University of Toronto tells us in an interview in Peace Magazine that several international organizations warned about Rwanda, and in the case of Somalia they pleaded against the sending of troops. We would have done well to heed their warning.

Senator MacEachen pointed out some differences between this report and the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy, and I think it is constructive to revisit them. First, he suggested that his report differed from this in that the foreign policy report was able to describe the "broader concept of security and to recognize the growing importance of non-military factors." Second, his report "reaffirms the central role of the UN in security matters" and considers that UN reform is vital in this regard.

Finally, and perhaps most interestingly, the foreign policy report concluded that "peace-keeping should be the primary international role of a more specialized Canadian Forces." I would be inclined to favour this view rather than the view that Canada's forces should be equipped and trained to cope with any imaginable situation. We can meet the diversity of challenges to our security through corrective effort rather than by duplication of resources.

In May 1993, an Angus Reid/Le Soleil poll found that 68 per cent of Canadian citizens, and 85 per cent in Quebec, were in favour of cutting spending at the Department of National Defence. In fact, the department has reduced its budget in recent years. However, the report's figures give a distorted picture of the situation. On page 25, Figure 2 shows a reduction in spending compared with the forecast in the 1987 white paper and not compared with real spending. The report says that between 1988-89 and 1998-99, cumulative spending cuts will total $21 billion.

Statements like these are misleading. They attempt to prove that there has been a spectacular reduction in defence spending, even though it was only about 9 per cent. I am sure we can do better, especially when we are thinking about slashing social programs we apparently can no longer afford.

[English]

The Finance Minister is looking for an extra $9 billion to cut from next year's budget. I say the Department of National Defence is a good place to start. We can go a lot farther than we have already gone. The Auditor General, for instance, has identified, most recently, a number of examples of waste in the Department of National Defence. He has suggested that the department has failed to capitalize on a potential $700-million savings due to the implementation of information technology projects.

He also suggests a further $30 million per year could be saved by employing a more rational use of telecommunications. While the Department of National Defence represents only about 10 per cent of program spending by the government, it currently spends about 30 per cent of the government's information technology budget. Clearly, we have not exhausted the possibility of savings in this department.

One area that I believe has been underexplored is that of weapons acquisition. In recent analyses, emphasis has been placed on structure and composition of the department. We must also examine the kinds of materials we are purchasing, and what our needs really are in this regard. Here, we are trying to find $9 billion to cut from the budget to meet the deficit targets of the Minister of Finance. Where are we looking first? We are looking to our social programs. That is a shame. A more rational use of resources would allow us to reduce the deficit, make provision for our continued security, and still soften the blow of budgetary restraint on the least privileged members of our society.

I say that defence, in particular the acquisition of offensive weapons when we already have so many, should be first on the block when it comes to cutting the deficit.

[Translation]

You are no doubt aware of my interest in cultural policy. I am aghast to see the steady deterioration of our great cultural institutions, including the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canada Council and the National Film Board, to name only a few. I am afraid that our identity as citizens of this great country called Canada may go the same way. What will be left to defend on the day we have lost our identity, after abandoning our culture? I would say culture is even more important than defence, and costs a lot less. The ancient Greeks may have lost the war against the Roman Empire but at least their culture prevailed. That is something to consider when deciding where to invest our peace dividends.

[English]

The committee concedes that Canada's need to purchase equipment to deter attacks and defend itself against nuclear weapons has expired. However, no other reassessment of matériel requirements seems to have been made. I contend that, in this dramatically new world, Canada needs to concern itself less with the defence of its own borders and concern itself even more than it has with the establishment of an effective method of ensuring international security. It is international instability much more than any threat to Canada's own borders that must concern Canada.

As our esteemed co-chairman, Senator De Bané, said in the committee when I appeared with Pierre Jasmin, President of Les Artistes pour la Paix:

> Canada has a vital interest in ensuring that any conflict, no matter what part of the world it occurs in, is dealt with.

I believe that Canada's Armed Forces need less and less to acquire and maintain offensive weapons. We should streamline our expenditures and focus on equipment that will allow Canadian peace-keepers to carry out their duties in relative security. The recently released white paper seems to agree with this point. On page 14 of the French version, the minister acknowledges that Canada has already made such choices in the past. For example, Canada does without aircraft carriers and medium-lift helicopters. It will have to learn to do without more of these kinds of offensive instruments of war and rely on tools of peace-keeping and defence.

The point is that there are significant economies to be realized by foregoing the purchase of offensive and expensive weapons. Furthermore, rather than duplicating the defensive capabilities of our allies, Canada can profit from making its defences complementary to them. The committee itself acknowledged that the United States has an interest in defending Canada, should the need arise. Despite our vast territory and sparse population, Canada need devote few resources to the defence of its sovereignty since we face little threat of invasion. Moreover, in the event of an invasion of Canada, the United States would be our ally and our only hope, whether or not we reduce our defence budget.

Finally, on the aspect of military weapons, I find it ironic that, at the same time as the Government of Canada is taking steps to impose stringent new controls on weapons in Canada, we still have Canadian companies producing offensive weapons en masse for military purposes. If we are a peace-loving nation, we should not have any need for such weapons. We certainly should not be contributing to the world's arms race.

This point leads me to the subject of defence conversion.

[Translation]

Neither the report of the joint committee nor the white paper published recently by the Minister of National Defence gave any serious thought to the problem of defence conversion. They merely stated that this was an important matter since our security needs were changing. These documents, however, failed to make any specific proposals for helping these industries adjust to the new realities of our planet. However, we cannot keep supporting an industry that prospered because of the armament requirements of a bygone era. We must help these industries diversify and apply their technology and expertise to civilian production. The fact is that a significant share of research and development funding is directed to the defence industry. If we do not deal with the problem of defence conversion, Canadian industry as a whole, and not just the sector that meets the alleged needs of our national defence, will suffer.

[English]

Honourable senators, I think we may have fallen into the trap of applying tried and true methods to new and unknown situations. Our fiscal reality makes our current level of defence spending unsustainable, and our security needs are not squarely addressed by the report.

I have not had ample time to review the white paper, but I fear it is not a profound improvement on the committee report. We need to cut further and apply our resources to the real and significant threats — international conflicts and instability.

We cannot afford to continue to spend $11 billion annually to defend against an invasion that will never happen. I disagree with Senator Grafstein when he suggests that we should be prepared to deal with two or three situations of mass civil unrest while participating in two or three major multinational forces. With all due respect that seems, to say the least, improbable.

The precarious state of our finances has made it necessary to husband our resources and use them more effectively through our membership in organizations like the UN. Our aim must be to prevent conflicts and tensions everywhere on our planet; conflicts and tensions that may harm us either indirectly because of their disastrous economic impact, or directly by destabilizing security throughout the world.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senator, I want to ask you a question. I congratulate you for your comments which, as you know, were more eloquent than mine on this issue. I do hope that you will continue to refer to the Greek authors, because Senator Lynch-Staunton is tired of hearing me quote my ancestors. Again, I hope that you will take over. Do you promise to do that?

Senator Roux: I will.

Hon. Michael A. Meighen: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words on the report of the joint committee, on which I had the pleasure to sit during the spring and summer.

I listened with great interest to the comments made by Senator Roux, whom I admire a lot. I want to congratulate him for the high intellectual quality of his presentation. I think that he will disagree with me just like he disagrees with Senator Grafstein, but the views of everyone are necessary to reach a consensus. I am anxious to read his whole presentation.

I also want to congratulate the co-chair of our joint committee, Senator De Bané. He is a long-time friend, in fact since we studied law together at Laval University. I have always had a great deal of respect for his personal qualities.

[English]

Throughout our travels, and through the long hearing process, his even-handedness, his sense of fairness, and his ability to grapple with a very complicated subject-matter served the Senate and, indeed, the committee very well.

I, of course, associate myself with the remarks made by Senator Sylvain the day before yesterday when he spoke of the important contributions of Senators Kenny and Forrestall. I would add the contribution of Senator Sylvain. Honourable senators, his remarks caused me to harken back, in my mind, to the first speech I ever made in this chamber. I have not made many. At that time I indicated that I thought the Senate worked best when it worked in a non-partisan fashion. Then I was sitting where my honourable friends now sit. Senator Frith was not long in coming to me to remark, "Isn't it funny how non-partisanship always commends itself to the government?" Now that I am in opposition, non-partisanship in the Senate still commends itself to me. That is how we can work best.

Certainly, it is fair to say that members of the committee achieved a remarkable degree of non-partisanship. I hope that the fruits of our labours will be judged, with the passage of time, if not to be equally remarkable, at least to have been of some use.

The committee learned a great deal not only about Canada's armed forces but also about the reputation they enjoy throughout the world. In discussions at NATO headquarters in Europe, at the United Nations, at the Pentagon, at NATO headquarters for the Atlantic in Norfolk, Virginia, at NORAD headquarters in Colorado Springs, and during our visit to the United States Third Fleet in San Diego, the theme was always the same: Our allies hold Canada and its military in high esteem.

I sometimes think that others know and appreciate our contributions to the world better than do Canadians themselves. After all, it was through our military involvement in war, however regrettable, that we truly gained independence from Great Britain when we declared war on our own and when our troops fought under the command of Canadians.

Since the writing and tabling of the report of the special joint committee, the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Foreign Policy has also reported. The government has seen fit, very quickly I might add, to produce the defence white paper. I believe the government is to be congratulated for taking most of the ideas found in the defence committee report and adopting them in the white paper.

Before I discuss in some detail my main preoccupation during this exercise, that is to say the future of Canada's reserve forces, I would point out some areas of the committee's final report which should be emphasized.

It became evident that the committee would have to come to grips very early on with the issue of world stability and what the Canadian military means to Canada's place in this world. Both the special committee on foreign policy and that on defence concluded that while the Cold War has ended, wars, in general, unfortunately continue. Indeed, the tension produced by the Cold War which prevented the outbreak of full scale war has moved into other areas.

Instead of the tension resulting from the threat of total nuclear annihilation, we must now deal with regional pockets of stockpiled nuclear and conventional weapons; tensions of many ethnic, religious and territorial conflicts spread throughout the globe; dangers to democracy and market reform in the former U.S.S.R. and elsewhere; and, lastly, economic dangers which could result if Canada is unable to remain economically strong and globally competitive.

As a committee, we concluded that the world is still an unsafe place and that there is virtually no way to predict where the next conflict will erupt nor what form it may take. In this connection, I congratulate Senator Kenny on his remarks yesterday, and I associate myself with his analysis of that particular problem and situation.

Having arrived at that conclusion, when we moved to consideration of the question of Canada's role in this unstable and unpredictable world, committee members had a choice to make. There are those — indeed some in this chamber — who see no need for Canada to have a combat-ready or combat-capable military force. Why do they believe this? It would seem, at least to me, they feel that Canada is not under any direct threat and that, because of our geography, we cannot totally defend ourselves by ourselves; they, therefore, conclude that we should give up on defence and turn it over to someone else, presumably the United States.

Honourable senators, I submit that that is an unacceptable proposition to most Canadians. Does Canada not owe a duty to the world beyond its borders? Does Canada not owe a duty to itself, if not to others, to seek to shape the world in its own interests? Is there no pride in the fact that, when a crisis develops, one of the countries whose troops are most sought-after for help are Canada's? What do these minimalists care about Canada's place in the world community? Obviously not much. They would have the UN and NATO and countries with whom we trade say, "Do not call Canada," and particularly, "Do not call if the going is tough."

Honourable senators, Canada must assume its responsibilities on the world stage. We are a member, after all, of the G-7, of the UN and of NATO. We were founding members of the latter two organizations. We have an economy built on trade. By definition, that means we are obliged to interact with the rest of the world. Having military forces which can respond when called upon to defend our interests and those of our friends and allies are the dues we pay for the place we occupy on the world stage.

We have no choice, honourable senators, but to rely on alliances, especially with the United States but also with other countries, to defend our own country. That has been the case for many years. However, we have an obligation and a duty which goes beyond our borders. We have a proud history of contributing troops to fight in the name of freedom and to preserve peace throughout the world. We will continue in this direction; and I am proud to say that that was the conclusion of our committee.

Even so, we did recommend reductions in our CF-18 squadrons. These planes will be kept in warm storage, ready to be reactivated if and when needed. We believe in Canada's place in the world, and we do not propose to cut our entire capability.

Based on these arguments, it was determined that Canada should continue to have a military that was unified, properly equipped, combat-capable, multi-purpose and, I might add, affordable. This will allow Canada to continue to occupy its rightful place as a country contributing to global peace and prosperity, security, and to the improvement of the human condition. However, in order to implement this recommendation, we had to look carefully at the budget for DND to see how this military would be afforded. We had to look at the strength and effectiveness of our armed forces, and the number we can put into the field as compared with the number who remain at headquarters. Finally, we had to consider the condition of our military, both in terms of lack of appropriate equipment and the time spent in the field by too few regular and reserve forces.

It was on the committee's trip to Bosnia and to our peace-keepers in the Adriatic when most of us began to really appreciate the contribution made to world stability by the men and women of our armed forces. At the time we visited, which was obviously a little more peaceful than it is now, we saw our troops helping not only with the establishment of peace between warring factions but also with the provision of humanitarian aid. I suppose this was a unique situation in that there were not the usual two warring factions but three, all of whom spoke the same language, all of whom looked much the same, and all of whom had lived with each other for centuries. We came to know, firsthand, the problems encountered by our forces as they coped with inferior equipment and lack of essentials.

One version of our report, unfortunately not the final one, made reference to the fact that when the tours of duty ended, our troops had to exchange helmets and flak jackets with those of our troops who were relieving them because there were simply not enough to go around. That made me realize that the committee had no choice but to strongly recommend a refocusing of military expenditures.

As well, more troops had to be put into the field, especially to bolster our land forces, so that the tours of duty of our men and women would be reduced from one in three to one in five. One in five is the present defence department policy, but, unfortunately, not the practice. At present levels of tours of duty, the stress on families and morale just simply cannot be sustained.

Our analysis of the situation in relation to equipment and manpower needs were confirmed by witnesses, as honourable senators have heard, such as retired Major-General Lewis MacKenzie. He made the point that the demands on our forces would not diminish and, as such, we must reallocate some resources to the Army in order to give them the best chance to endure in the operational settings of the future. In fact, according to Major-General MacKenzie, the savings achieved by cutting back on the use of the F-18s, which we suggested, would equal 4,900 more combat soldiers and 714 new Canadian-built armoured combat vehicles, the ACVs, which would more adequately serve to protect our troops.

The committee agreed with his assessment and set about addressing what it considered to be the priorities for our military and how scarce resources should be reallocated to meet those priorities. While there are differences between the committee report and the white paper, I think they are more differences of degree than of substance. Both reports agree on the need to maintain multi-purpose, combat-capable air, land and sea forces. The white paper, however, calls for greater cuts than those envisioned in our report with respect to both the defence budget itself and the size of our forces.

Our committee suggested that the planned reduction of the forces to 66,700 by 1998 represented a minimum size which would permit Canadian forces to be effective in fulfilling domestic and international duties. The white paper now calls for greater reduction in force sizes, to 60,000 by 1999. It also calls for cuts to the primary reserves, which will result in a primary reserve force of only 23,000.

Although these are certainly significant reductions in military personnel, the White Paper also concluded that the committee was correct in recommending an increase in the number of deployable troops. It recommended 3,000; whereas we had recommended 3,500. I fear that even 500 fewer troops in the field may well be a decision that we will have cause to regret.

Both reports recommended substantial changes to the command and control structure of our armed forces. Those of our committee go much farther, however, than the white paper recommendations. If the committee's recommendations had been followed, I believe the end result would have been more beneficial and more cost-effective to the functioning of the military.

For example, to ensure that more of our troops are in the field rather than behind desks, we recommended cuts in headquarters staff. Almost from the beginning of the hearing process, the committee in general, and I must say myself in particular, became concerned about the size of the Department of National Defence, which numbers about 71,000 people, compared with the number of troops that we could put into the field at any one time, which is between 3,500 and 7,000. No one could give us a definite figure. Whether you choose 3,500 or 7,000, it seems to me a very small percentage of 71,000.

The white paper is unclear as to what the government intends to do with command and control. It says that it will institute a new command and control structure by 1997, and that one layer of headquarters will be eliminated. Unfortunately, there are no details as to what this means or what will be the end result; or what savings will be achieved.

The paper also states that the overall number of civilian employees will be reduced to 20,000 by 1999. That is all well and good, but who knows how many people work at headquarters, or how these suggestions will affect the military?

Moving on to equipment, both reports address this issue. I do not want to list all the recommendations in this regard. Suffice it to say that everybody agrees that the capabilities of our armoured personnel carriers must be brought up to standard, and quickly. The white paper does address this, but there seems to be no real sense of urgency.

From our experience, honourable senators, I can tell you that, in Bosnia at least, our present armoured personnel carriers, or APCs, are woefully inadequate, and more lives will be lost if the situation is not corrected soon.

I should like to say a few words about the purchase of submarines. During the committee's travels to SACLANT headquarters in Norfolk, Virginia, the importance of submarines for peacetime, as well as for war fighting, was stressed. They do provide an additional dimension to drug interdiction and fisheries surveillance of our three coastal areas. In short, they are an essential core capability of the Maritime forces and are of strategic value to Canada's ability to exercise sovereignty over the Arctic environment. They require a small crew and are relatively inexpensive to operate, at less than one-third the cost of one of our modern frigates.

In the end, after much hesitation, I became convinced that we should maintain our longstanding submarine capability, albeit on a reduced basis and on certain conditions. This found its way into both committee reports. I was especially pleased to see it in the white paper, which recommended the purchase from existing budgets of three to six modern, diesel-electric submarines, most likely the Upholder Class submarines from Great Britain.

I do wonder, though, honourable senators, about the timing of this and whether, in fact, the submarines will be able to address Canada's unique Arctic environment. If the government does decide to proceed, I trust that it will ensure that these submarines can perform the tasks that will be required of them under the Arctic ice. The government should know that Canada is a world leader in the technology which would adapt these submarines for use in Canada's extreme weather conditions; technology such as the air propulsion systems.

In making a decision, the government, like any government, must attempt to strike a balance between fiscal constraints and military needs, keeping in mind that, once lost, a core capability is both difficult and expensive to reacquire.

I should like to turn now to a subject which occupied a great deal of my time on the committee, that is, the reserves. Although I am somewhat uncertain as to the source of my own interest in the reserves, never having served, it is no secret that much of the credit must go to my own father-in-law Richard Dillon, Honourary Colonel of the Royal Canadian Regiment. As a reservist himself, his familiarity with the problems associated with the reserves has been a great help to me and, I believe, to the committee.

The Canadian Armed Forces in times of war, in times of crisis, have traditionally relied heavily on the deployment of reserves. This goes back to the earliest of colonial days. The majority of Canadian men and women who took part in the First and Second World Wars were not part of Canadian regular forces. Indeed, in more recent operations, Canadian units under the auspices of the United Nations contained as high as 42 per cent reservists. Reservists average approximately 18 per of all units involved in Canadian international peace-keeping missions.

Reserves also form the link between the military and the general public. They illustrate on ceremonial and other occasions a commitment to duty and citizenship. In 1971, the concept of total force was introduced in order to give reservists a unique role in the military, a role all to themselves, to augment the functions performed by the regular force. Although this concept was redefined in 1987, it has never lived up to its potential, leaving both regulars and reservists disappointed.

On top of the confusion created by the total force idea came the Auditor General's 1992 report which severely criticized the way the Department of National Defence was dealing with reserves. According to the Auditor General, reservists were ill-trained, ill-equipped and unreliable, and could not be counted upon to show up for either training or combat — a pretty damning indictment. May I say as an aside that the 1994 Auditor General's report indicates that definite improvements have been achieved over the past two years.

It was in this light that the special joint committee commenced its consideration of the reserve issue. Witnesses appearing before the committee, while praising the contribution of reservists, cautioned that if they were to continue, two issues must be addressed: availability and better delineation of the tasks to be performed.

As to the question of availability, the committee struggled with this for some time. Two facts were important to the decision: First, for every reservist needed to serve in a Canadian international peace-keeping unit, the Canadian Forces received three to four requests from reservists willing to serve our country abroad. Second, a great number of trained reservists are unavailable for active duty for one reason or another. In the end, we were persuaded by the Canadian Forces Liaison Council that legislation making it mandatory for reservists to report for duty would be counter-productive; employers simply would not hire reservists. I hope the liaison council is right, and I think they are. However, if they are wrong and difficulties arise, the council should feel free to change its mind and to request enactment of this legislation. Hopefully, the government will take the lead by giving to reservists adequate leave for training when called upon to serve.

In order to address the tasks for the reserves which arise from the new demands placed on a smaller regular force, the committee hit upon a number of solutions, some of which address the issue of command structure. The role of the reserves will be strengthened by better matching their civilian skills to military needs. This is being done now with the communication groups, in the air command, and with reserves tasked with responsibility for mine-sweeping.

This skill-matching should be undertaken to a greater degree in the militia. However, the militia would continue, and should continue, to focus on its traditional combat arms roles. The ultimate purpose of the militia is to serve on active duty, and it should be organized, manned and tasked to do so.

Thought should also be given to combining some of the reserve regiments and putting training facilities in the suburbs, close to people who could potentially be recruited as reservists. This is inevitable. There are simply too many reserve units in Canada with too few reservists. I know traditionalists in the military will be critical of this position, but they have to be realistic. If the reserves are to continue to be a useful part of the military, changes must take place. Small, more rural regiments will have to become units of larger metropolitan regiments. There is no reason for the absorbed units to lose their historic names and identities; however, they will have to exist within a larger regimental structure.

We should look carefully at the command structure of reserves. Who should be responsible for the reserves in a particular area? There should be closer ties between the reserve units and the regular units in particular areas of the country. Reserve and regular units should train together. We should also look at the potential to have a reservist command a regular unit, just as a regular unit could command a reserve unit.

I see from the 1994 Auditor General's report that the land force command has instituted total army establishment under which militia units are to be assigned specific training missions. This will allow individual unit members to augment regular force units. This sounds good to me.

I believe the committee's recommendation on the subject of short-term contracts for those entering the military, which has been endorsed in the white paper, will be of particular help to the reserves, the idea being that when someone finishes a five-year contract, they would go into the reserves. This should build up the numbers of the reserves with those who are physically fit and willing to serve their country. People serving on contract could be kept on in the military if both parties are agreeable. It is my opinion that the option of a military career is not thwarted by this recommendation of short-term contracts.

It is also my hope that the government will look to the reserves or to the military as vehicles which could help Canada's youth. I am not recommending compulsory military service of Canada's young people through enrolment in the reserves; however, it is in the best interests of the country and the military to facilitate youth involvement by making service to Canada attractive.

In his evidence before the special joint committee, Colonel Dillon brought to the attention of members a proposal from the Royal College of Defence Studies in Great Britain entitled, "Service For The Nation." The thrust of this proposal was that all British males and females would be asked to give one year's service on a volunteer basis to the nation between leaving school and the age of 25 — not necessarily one year's service in the military, but one year's service. This program, although it has not been implemented to date, was designed to give a focus to the alienated, unemployed youth of that country.

Another example by which youth could become involved in the reserves, to their mutual benefit, was presented to me by a distinguished Montreal soldier, Colonel J. Wolfe. It involves summer training for young people conducted by and through the reserves — perhaps 100 candidates per large reserve unit and 40 candidates per independent unit, for a total of some 5,000 to 7,500. Summer training would be aimed at high school graduates or university students who would be paid for their successful participation in the course. The recruit would be quickly brought up to military standards and could ideally operate in some peace-keeping situations.

If the recruit wished to continue in the program, he or she would be required to participate in local regimental training and activities of the regiment during the winter months and the following one or two summers in a more intensive program of military activity. The training facilities are there. The infrastructure is there. They are both ready and available to be used. The training could be constructed through the use of both regulars and reservists which would help to keep the overall cost down to a minimum. I believe such a program would not only provide military training but would also help our young people learn self-discipline, a variety of trade skills and the meaning of citizenship.

It is my suggestion, honourable senators, that the Government of Canada review its youth programs with the objective of involving the young people of Canada in one or more of the training programs offered by Canada's military. For a guide in doing this, the government could revisit its Youth Training and Education Program, known as YTEP, which was popular in the 1980s. It included a three-month program of military training followed by nine months of trades training. I know, from speaking to both participants and people in the military, that it was considered to be of great mutual benefit.

In relation to the reserves, I am heartened by the recommendations of the white paper. Even though the end result would be a smaller reserve force, I believe it would be a force which would have meaningful tasks to perform.

Honourable senators, it is important to realize that the four levels of mobilization contained in the white paper can only be accomplished with the active involvement of the reserves. The first stage includes training and preparation of reservists to augment the regular force. The second stage, force enhancement, directly involves reserves playing the role of augmentation. The third level force expansion would probably mean the involvement of supplementary reserves. Finally, national mobilization — perish the thought — would put us where we were in the Second World War when there were many more reservists in action than there were regulars.

With this mobilization plan as a base, it will give reservists across the country the feeling that they are needed and counted upon to perform a meaningful role in our military. However, without adequate training and tasking, funding and facilities, equipment and encouragement, the reserves will simply continue to wither away and not be in a position to make the government's four-stage mobilization structure a realistic scenario.

The white paper indicates that reservists will be trained so that their ability to augment the regular force will be greatly improved. Stress will be placed on assigning more service support roles to the reserves for such matters as "medical, logistics, communications and transport functions." I also like the idea that local communities are to be charged under the white paper with some responsibility to help sustain the reserves.

Honourable senators, there are exciting challenges ahead in this area. I hope that the white paper's omission of mentioning the establishment of a Special Joint Committee on Defence was simply an oversight and that such a committee will be established early in the new year. Indeed, it would certainly be my intention to bring matters of the reserves and of Canada's youth in general to the attention of this new committee at the earliest possible date.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable senator entertain a question or two?

Senator Meighen: Certainly.

Senator Gigantès: When do you foresee a general mobilization, and for what sort of war?

Senator Forrestall: At the first sign of you getting out of hand.

Senator Gigantès: I am asking a serious question.

Senator Meighen: I do not foresee it, but it is always a possibility, senator. I cannot predict. As has been said many times in this chamber by others who have spoken on the committee's report, no one can predict what the situation will be in the world next year or in ten years' time.

I do not think that anyone can say with any assurance that there will never again be a need for general mobilization in this country. The need is less than it has been recently, and I hope and pray that it will never come to pass, but I am not able to say that it will not come to pass ever.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senator, are you aware that that was the argument of the French cavalry before the Second World War for maintaining a large horse contingent, when it was known that the Germans had switched to tanks? The infantry was maintaining a luxury version of the World War I trenches in the ligne Maginot on the ground. One never knows. If one never knows, we could increase our defence budget instead of decreasing it.

Senator Meighen: I am glad we agree that one never knows. That is why there is emphasis throughout the committee's report and in the white paper on the ability of our military forces to adapt, to be flexible, and to be prepared to meet any possibility.

Certainly you and I would agree that the Maginot line theory is not one which commends itself to anybody, and that is not what is being suggested.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senator, I agree with you on the defence, on the reserves, and especially day-time reserves being useful for giving the young a sense of service, sopping up unemployment. However, in the past I was against CF-18s. I thought the frigates were a wasteful expenditure. I am criticizing Liberal governments now. I still think they are.

I am for good armoured personnel carriers and some things that go with it. However, I have a feeling that in what you say you have fallen for the military argument, which is that we must be prepared for every eventuality. We are not prepared for every eventuality in any field. It is not possible. We cannot afford it.

I believe Senator Roux would support me when I say a defence budget of $6 billion is plenty. A really good, fight-willing force of 10,000 men is enough.

Senator Meighen: Honourable senator, I suppose we could debate this for a long time. It is hard to know how many situations the military would be called upon to meet at any one time. Obviously we cannot be all things to all people and we cannot get involved in all situations. We all agree that we must be more selective in our participation, even in peace-keeping missions nowadays.

In my view, if you are suggesting 10,000 people in the field, then I would agree with you wholeheartedly. As I mentioned in my remarks earlier, we are now only able to put 3,500 to 5,000 in the field. That seems to me to be woefully inadequate. If you and I agree on 10,000, I am happy. However, I suspect you were referring to 10,000 or more in a general context, incorporating not only those able to fight in the so-called "teeth" of the military, but also those in the so-called "tail." I know 10,000 would bring us to a point of total irrelevancy, so I could not support that.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I said quite clearly 10,000 teeth and 10,000 tail, no more. Right now we are 10 to 1 tail. I would like it to be 1 to 1.

Senator Meighen: I am not sure Senator Roux would agree with you. You are now sounding more like a militarist than anyone in the committee because we did not necessarily say we needed 10,000. We merely said 3,500 was woefully inadequate. If you are suggesting 10,000 and realizing, as I know you do, the necessary personnel support that that requires, then you are not talking about a smaller military force.

Senator Gigantès: The Israelis operate on a ratio of one tooth and one tail. We should be able to do the same.

Senator Meighen: Senator, the Israeli army does not have the geography that we have. It does not have the international commitments that we have. It has one commitment and that is the defence of its country, in which it has been actively engaged for many years. The situation is vastly different.

Senator Gigantès: Could you tell me who will attack us? Whom do we want to attack?

Senator Meighen: Why does the honourable senator and others persist in referring to an attack upon Canada? The point has been made over and over again that none of us are able to visualize an attack on Canada at this point. Does that mean we merely disband our military defence forces, fold our arms and let others do the job of ensuring world stability? Surely we have an obligation to work with our friends and allies around the world to protect Canada's interests. Canada's interests lie in a stable world where regional conflicts are prevented to the best of our ability, and not allowed to escalate into wider spread conflicts. That is where our interest is.

It is not a question of who will attack us. It is a question of what type of world we want to live in. If we wish to play a meaningful role in ensuring that the world is a better place, rather than merely a globe made up of warring factions, then we cannot sit on our hands and refuse to participate on a worldwide basis.

Senator Gigantès: If I must make a choice between more participation than at present, on a worldwide basis, and finding more money for health, or education, and for research, I would take the latter choice.

Senator Meighen: There are lots of places we could find to cut. We have already cut more in the military than we have cut in many other areas. It is time we looked at other areas to find money, such as support programs that are no longer fulfilling a function.

The honourable senator may not be willing to look there, but I think most Canadians are, and even your own Finance Minister.

On motion of Senator Forrestall, debate adjourned.

SENATE ESTIMATES 1995-96—REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the thirteenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1995-96), presented in the Senate on December 8, 1994.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino moved the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, before doing so, I have some additional information to present to you, part of which was contained in the report. I will highlight some of the areas which I think will be of interest.

• (1600)

Over the past three years, the actual cost to run the Senate has been reduced by approximately 11 per cent. As an aside, I understand that the actual cost for the other place has increased by approximately 6 per cent.

A serious analysis of the efficient and effective operation of the Senate shows that this year we have achieved a stand-pat budget. There was no increase in costs.

I should also like to draw the attention of my honourable colleagues to a number of items which I believe would also be of interest. Approximately 70 per cent of the cost of running the Senate consists of salaries and benefits, leaving us little or no room to manoeuvre.

This year we had an unexpected request from Treasury Board for an assessment of some $460,000 for funding of staff benefits. This is a statutory requirement over which we have no control.

I should like to inform colleagues that the sound system and the replacement of carpet for the chamber has been postponed to a later date.

Finally, it is the intention of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to review one or two departments per year, giving us a better opportunity to assess the operation of each department.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the chairman of the committee. I read in the report that the total person years has decreased by 10, mainly through attrition, and stands at 437.

My concern is with the phrase "mainly through attrition." Are we firing people or is the number decreasing through attrition?

Senator Di Nino: It is pretty clear. It says "through attrition." To my knowledge, there have been no firings. This has been accomplished by resignations. I do not believe that anyone was or will be let go.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS—BUDGET, 1994-95—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourteenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget of the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders), presented in the Senate on December 8, 1994.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Perhaps the deputy chairman of the committee could briefly explain the report.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, this report deals with a budget for the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders of $2,500. That is the extent of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUDGET FOR CSCE PARLIAMENTARY ASSEMBLY—
REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifteenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget for the 4th Annual Session of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe), presented in the Senate on December 8, 1994.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE—SUPPLEMENTARY BUDGET, 1994-95—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixteenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget of the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide), presented in the Senate on December 8, 1994.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON POPULATION

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, calling the attention of the Senate to the officially adopted text of the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD), held in Cairo, Egypt, from September 5 to 14, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Haidasz).

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish to take this opportunity to thank all honourable senators who were here yesterday and granted me leave to continue my remarks on my inquiry this afternoon.

The concluding document of the very important International Conference on Population and Development of Nations, called "The Programme of Action" also stressed freedom of religion. One can do worse than to regard religion as a necessary social bond to act justly, to love one's neighbour, and to walk humbly before one's God. Where informed moral freedom thrives in truth, it is ready to defer, or to be corrected of misinformed cultural practices, such as genital mutilation, to which I referred yesterday. A long history of missions highlight the enhanced regard for women which results from the education of girls as well as boys. Knowing that unjust practices die as ignorance is banished, the program of action of this conference strenuously calls for child and adult education on an equitable basis.

Given the value of law as teacher, I hope to introduce in this chamber in the near future an amendment to the Criminal Code to render female circumcision in Canada a punishable offence. I believe the measure will not limit religious freedom, since the offending practice, which appears to be predominant in certain Islamic areas of the world, is only a ritual, or rite, and not a tenet of Islam found in the Koran. While male circumcision is a semitic tenet, that inoffensive procedure removes or sections no organs. It is frequently regarded as a hygienic procedure and can prevent precancerous or even cancerous lesions in that site.

As a final point before leaving this issue, honourable senators, I wish to bring to your attention that Canada can be proud of a singular primary health care program at a Christian hospital in Nigeria in the midst of Islamic culture. This project, administered by Dr. R. Walley, a physician from St. John's, Newfoundland, is headed by a Sister surgeon renowned for her expertise in treating obstetrical fistula, a dangerous complication in maternity resulting from genital mutilation. This Canadian Safe Motherhood Project, as it is entitled, was at risk of having its support cut by CIDA until the final text of the ICPD came to light. It is precisely the sort of initiative emphatically called for in this world conference.

Honourable senators, among significant amendments to the program of action, a most meaningful clause, called a "chapeau," directs that the document may not be interpreted to undermine sovereign interests, including what truly are religious beliefs of the citizens of a nation. This principle enjoins that centrality be accorded informed conscience and the free exercise of religion.

The importance of this "chapeau" cannot be overstressed.

This matter is treated in paragraph 1 of Chapter II of the principles of the Programme of Action which I tabled yesterday. I should like to quote from that paragraph 1. It reads as follows:

> The implementation of the recommendations contained in the Programme of Action is the sovereign right of each country, consistent with national laws and development priorities, with full respect for the various religious and ethical values and cultural backgrounds of its people and in conformity with universally recognized international human rights.

Many were the delegations who called for this clear directive that whatever authority the Programme of Action may have, or is supposed to have, it is subject to national sovereignties and religious freedom. A number of reservations even sought to reiterate, for greater certainty, the assurance that it expresses. Moreover, of the 136 delegations who had no reservation to the programme after amendments, a majority could not have been assured of a consensus without this all-important "chapeau" or caveat, as well as a number of cognate principles stated in Chapter II specifically and throughout the Programme of Action.

One such principle is an espousal of freedom for all couples from coercion to set some given limit to their family. Coercion was clearly understood not to mean force only but more commonly financial and other inducements, as often is done by the rich countries of the world. Many delegations had found that inducements for family planning or population policy degenerates easily into so-called fertility regulation.

In Cheops Hall, that magnificent place of the People's Assembly of Egypt, I was delighted, on the occasion of World Parliamentarians' Day, to make a brief speech, not only as a parliamentarian, but also as a physician, concerning the wisdom of treating fertility not as a disorder, nor women as chemical laboratories in disarray.

Women are alienated by devices or chemical contraception, much of which is known to be abortifacient and have serious health consequences of which women are little informed. Informed consent was called for frequently by delegations to this conference.

Honourable senators, I bring to your attention the article in the Canadian Forum, September, 1994 by Peter Gillespie, and I quote from his article:

> Unlike family planning, population control does not expand the range of women's choices; rather, it explicitly aims to diminish choice...Not only is population control an infringement on reproductive freedom, but the history of population programs is one of abuse.

Concerns such as this prevailed to remove language from the Programme of Action that may have been construed to endorse abortionism. Focus was instead directed to primary health care within which the widening complications of abortion are to receive greater attention, including post-abortion syndrome, sister to the post-traumatic stress syndrome suffered by those who have survived horrors, as the recent report by our Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology documents so well.

That nations should strive to reduce, even to eliminate, the practice of abortion, which can never be safe, let alone for the tiny persons it destroys at inception, was almost unanimously called for in this conference. Delegations bore in mind that in a number of places throughout the world, there are legal hurdles to a ban, but it was significant that China, at this conference, lent its voice to a reversal of coercive policies on family size, which have heretofore been the preponderant reason for rampant abortion in that country.

In this inquiry, I would encourage honourable senators that our government finds simple means to do so in Canada, for example, by eliminating the transfer of funds to provinces for the procurement of abortion, as it is not health care within the meaning of the Canada Health Act or by any precedent of jurisprudence in Canada. If it were necessary health care, then by the Bourne legal principle, abortion would be a right. As the Cairo conference Programme of Action openly states, it is not a right.

It surprised a number of feminists at this conference that the reception of this message and the Programme of Action itself owed a great debt to the wide endorsement of the advancement of women. It was found necessary to shore up resolve against a tragic epoch of coercive programs and artificial inducements that address fertility as a state of personal health disorder.

I would be remiss not to mention that the United Nations conference in Cairo was also an opportunity untapped and a road not taken. I am persuaded that, with adequate opportunity for all delegates to have been apprised of issues prior to convening in Cairo, there would have been a better result, a greater consensus on more text, albeit to a briefer document. Approximately 90 per cent of the 113-page draft Programme of Action enjoyed substantive agreement, arrived at in the conclaves and side negotiations prior to September 5 in Cairo. However, it would be misleading to say that more than 15 per cent of the document was specially consequential. Within the very consequential parts at the core of controversy, no one could have held the illusion that consensus could have been found.

The drafting process may have underrated the preparedness of the parties to the programme. Even after intensive amendments on key segments held in reservation, 5 per cent of the delegations produced well-written statements taking up 10 per cent of the ICPD report. Thus, while one cannot, in truth, declare the Programme of Action a consensus, one must appreciate the great headway achieved, considering how flawed the starting point was.

The very step of reserving agreement, as opposed to filibustry, shows the profound goodwill and desire to carve common ground by all participants. This spirit prevailed notwithstanding polarization over much of what was the core of the draft agenda. Some of the water may have appeared poisoned by the persistence of terms contradictory to stated principles. For instance, fertility regulation is still present in Chapter XII, even though, in the interests of the dignity of women, it was a term that the majority agreed should be dropped. A directive in Chapter XIV, 14-17, on international cooperation may induce acceptance of population policies by modifying debt relief, and this despite the fact that the ICPD principles at the Geneva convention condemn coercion.

Perhaps the greater loss was that goodwill was so manifest at Cairo, yet in realization cut short over persistent hurdles offensive to humanity. Drafters may have forgotten that measures designed to limit the number of people were declared crimes against humanity in the Geneva Convention of 1948. The fact that the preamble decries setting targets and yet urges populations to be no greater than specific numbers by the year 2014 defies understanding, especially as the aim of the human family is not to limit its numbers or to shorten its longevity, but rather to sustain these.

At any rate, His Excellency David Karsgaard, our current Canadian ambassador to the United Nations General Assembly, addressing that assembly's forty-ninth meeting on November 17 last, echoed the words of numerous observers when he said that this ICPD report "recognizes that social and economic development rather than adherence to strict demographic targets is central to achieving a balance between the number of people on earth and their demands on the world's ecosystems."

A French demographer, M. Hervé le Bras, draws the conclusion in his recent scholarly work which was published during the last half of our conference, entitled Les limites de la planète — Mythe de la nature et de la population, that to require some supposed target of people, even as an outside limit, to attain a prejudged balance is predicated on a pathetic Malthusian myth.

To the extent that the program of action sustains an interpretation that it strives to avoid falling into that myth, high praise came from many delegations, including that from the Holy See —

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret to interrupt the honourable senator, but I must tell him that his time is up.

Senator Haidasz: Will honourable senators once again allow me to adjourn the debate in order that I may finish the last part of my speech at the next sitting of the Senate?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Haidasz, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF APPROVAL FOR VARIOUS PROJECTS— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Doyle, calling the attention of the Senate to the absence of Senate approval for various projects in the purview of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets, and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Di Nino)

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask that this order stand in the name of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly rose pursuant to notice of December 6, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the way in which Canadians are being encouraged to celebrate Christmas.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate this opportunity to place on the record certain views I have about what is happening to Canadians in terms of the way in which they celebrate Christmas. I promise to be as brief as possible.

What I want to talk about are constants in our ever-changing world. During my career as a businessman, I have been fortunate to visit and work in many countries in the world, and to learn about and to admire many different cultures. Learning about the cultures of others has been a particularly rewarding experience — the great religions and social systems of the Orient, the Islamic faith that springs from the same origins as Christianity and Judaism, and ancient Hinduism, the antecedents of which reach back several thousand years.

The common thread through many of the great cultures and religions of the world is respect. I refer not only to internal respect, that is, respect for one's fellow believers, but external respect, that is, respect for people of other cultures and their religions, and respect for their right to practise their own religions peacefully, although perhaps not to proselytise.

In my professional life, I learned very quickly to understand and respect the cultural and religious traditions of other peoples because to do business within a foreign country requires at least a minimum of cultural and religious observance, or sensitivity.

Canada, in an amazingly short time — certainly less than a generation — has become a multicultural and multireligious country. One need only travel around a city such as Toronto to grasp the magnitude of the change. Street signs in Portuguese, Italian, Mandarin, Greek and other languages proliferate. I am told that something in the order of 110 languages are spoken in the City of Toronto.

To a lesser extent, the same "multiculturalisation," if I can call it that, is happening in every other major urban centre in Canada. I refer to Vancouver, Ottawa and Montreal, to name a few. This transition to a truly multicultural society has been achieved with remarkably little strife. The credit for this lies in our positive approach to multiculturalism. This has occurred because the established cultures of Canada not only provided a safe haven for new and minority cultures, but actually encouraged the practice of these cultures and their religions. We respect their traditions and celebrations, and I know they respect ours.

I think it is fair to say that no country has been as accepting, as encouraging and as embracing to other cultures and religions as Canada has been over the past 25 years or so. However, our record is not unblemished. Unfortunately, we have our white supremacist groups and our neo-Nazis. We have had a few inter-cultural incidents.

When all is considered, I assert that our accomplishments are commendable, especially when compared to the "melting pot" approach of the United States, the cultural xenophobia of countries such as France, the ethnically discriminatory immigration policies of Mexico and other Latin American countries, and the developing tide of anti-immigration sentiment in some U.S. states such as California, not to mention the rise of nationalism in Germany and other East European countries. One need only look at the atrocities committed in the former Yugoslavia, certain Middle Eastern countries or in the former Soviet Union in the name of "ethnic cleansing" to appreciate how rare and valuable Canada's attitudes to multiculturalism have been.

It was, therefore, with great sadness and disappointment that I watched the furore that erupted last year in Ontario over so-called "Christmas iconography." I raise the issue now because the Christmas season is upon us. I think it behooves us to reflect upon the recent experiences of the past and, hopefully, to avoid their repetition.

For those honourable senators who are from other, more sane, parts of Canada, who are unaware of the fuss, or who have forgotten about it, allow me to recapitulate briefly the major events. On November 10, 1993 the Ontario Management Board Secretariat, which is equivalent to the federal Treasury Board, issued a written edict banning "Christmas iconography from all government lobbies or building exteriors exposed to the public." The ban was "not up for debate." Any decorations had to "conform to a seasonal theme, rather than Christmas iconography," which would include any decoration that depicted Jesus Christ, nativity scenes or references to the Christian faith. Christmas decorations in several Ontario government buildings, such as one in Sudbury, were actually dismantled in response to this ban.

The media, of course, jumped on the story. Some so-called liberal journalists took pains to point out that Christmas has no historically accurate relationship with the birth of Christ. It was pointed out how Christmas probably originated from a combination of sun-worship festivals that were common among pagan tribes in the northern hemisphere, the Roman feast "Saturnalius," Druidic feasts and satanic worship.

When the edict became an issue on the floor of the Ontario legislature, the NDP government beat a hasty retreat. As a matter of fact, a Chanukah candelabra, and later a crêche did appear, as they have on previous years, on the precincts of Queen's Park. However, as a practical matter, the damage was done. It was very clear to public servants that in the new era of newspeak and political correctness in NDP Ontario, Christmas iconography is a "no-no."

The retreat was a particularly graceless and insensitive one. A government spokesman was quoted as explaining the appearance of the crêche in this way:

> Christmas is Christmas, so we put up a Christmas tree. Chanukah is Chanukah so we put up a Menorah. We try to celebrate any festival which is brought to our attention.

Is it not wonderful that someone brought Christmas to his attention? I, for one, found the marginalization of Christmas as "just another festival" insensitive and offensive. It was particularly upsetting to me that the Ontario government ban apparently originated from complaints the government received in 1992 about the presence of "Christmas iconography" in Ontario government buildings. There was no source identified as far as the complaints were concerned.

To be fair, Ontario is not alone in this silliness. I understand there were some concerns on Parliament Hill last Christmas about our own Christmas tree presentation and concerns not to offend anyone, to show sensitivity to non-Christian religions and cultures. Doubtless, countless hours of bureaucratic time was absorbed in a careful consideration of all the issues and implications.

On the other hand, I found it ironic, though encouraging, that many articles prompted by the furore and written in support of the celebration of Christmas were by ethnic writers. Rachael Raza, for example, wrote in The Toronto Star:

> ...Canadians have celebrated Christmas with verve and enthusiasm for hundreds of years. Why should it suddenly become a skeleton in a closet, and not be mentioned by name, let alone be celebrated without any hang-ups?
> I understand this —

She is referring to the Ontario ban —

> — is being done to accommodate people of other religions, to make us feel at home. Well, I do not feel at home if the hosts are not allowed to celebrate their own festivals, but are expected to share in mine.

She goes on to ask, what is wrong with Christmas? She concludes:

> There is nothing wrong except with those people whose hearts and minds are not open enough to adapt... Participating in Christmas does not take away one's religious beliefs or convert them to Christianity. All it does is bring about better understanding among people.
> To those who complained about Christmas iconography, I say to you, 'Respect and accept our traditions as we have accepted and respected yours.' I ask you to remember that the essential message of Christmas is peace on earth and goodwill to all people. What can possibly be offensive or insensitive about that?

I also venture to say, albeit with some personal sadness, that Christmas will probably continue to diminish in importance as a religious festival in our expanding multicultural society. Ironically, with our festivals of light and our First Night celebrations, we are recreating the pagan celebrations which Christianity brought together as the "Feast of Epiphany" and which ultimately became known as "Christmas."

This is progress?

I must say, however, that the demise of Christmas and Christianity, to which Christmas is central, has been forecast before. George Santayana, in his Character and Opinion, wrote in the late 1800s:

> Civilization is perhaps approaching one of those long winters that overtakes us from time to time. Romantic Christendom, of which Christmas is a part, picturesque and passionate, may be coming to an end.

However, if the demise of Christmas as we know it occurs, the transition to a non-religious, sanitized, year-end celebration will occur naturally in our response to our changing demographics. Let us not force the issue because, by doing so, we will be forcibly taking away from a large segment of the population something which is important and valuable, and deeply entrenched in our lifestyle, our history, our emotions and our psyche. It is also such real or imagined hurts or losses which accumulate and fester and become the wellspring from which the propagandists of white supremacy and cultural hate erupt.

To those politicians who would "ban Christmas," I would point out that the puritan government of Oliver Cromwell tried to do so in 1647 with no long-term effect. I wonder how Bob Rae would appreciate the analogy to Oliver Cromwell and the Roundheads?

History has shown us that government repression of ideas, of religious traditions and rituals rarely works. It usually has opposite results to those intended. To those small "l" liberal journalists who sneer at the value of Christmas, and who claim it is a festival confected by an opportunistic church from a menu of pagan and other non-Christian festivals, I ask: How many religions are historically accurate? How many religions have not borrowed extensively from other religions and cultures?

If we are not to celebrate Christmas for cultural sensitivity reasons, perhaps we should stop celebrating New Year on January 1 as well. Our New Year's celebration is no more historically pure than Christmas and could equally offend those religions and cultures who refer to a different calendar. I am sure there are many journalists, and I know a few, who would fight tooth and nail against giving up certain aspects of the New Year's ritual.

In the final analysis, who cares? Christianity may be one of the newer religions and Christmas one of the newer celebrations, but Christianity has been around for nearly 2,000 years, and Christmas has been celebrated along with the birth of Christ since the fourth century A.D.

To those who, in the pursuit of sensitivity and political correctness, would give up or tone down Christmas, I say, "Think again." A culture or religion which does not respect itself and its traditions cannot expect respect from anyone else. In our ever-changing world, our traditions remain our constants, our heritage to share and to pass on to successive generations.

Diversity is not a bad thing. A homogeneous, laundered, desensitized, everyman culture can be terribly bland, unexciting and uninspiring. Think of the great works and noble deeds which have been inspired by the Christmas story. Think of a world without Christmas, a world without the inspired work of Michelangelo, da Vinci, Martin Luther, Charles Wesley, Longfellow, Robert Frost, Brooks, Charles Dickens, even Dr. Seuss. Think what a hole there would be in our culture without Christmas and the iconography that goes with it.

Think about the timeless values of Christmas. Think of how important Christmas was for you, what a touchstone it was for you when you were growing up in your culture and in your faith. Now, consider giving it away and not passing it on to your children.

Sensitivity in a multicultural society is critically important but it can be taken too far. How far away are we from the day when I refrain from going through a green light lest I offend someone sitting idle at a red light?

Let us think about what we are doing. Let us be culturally sensitive, of course, but let us be rational in our sensitivities.

And so to the Roundheads in the Ontario government, to those who would ban Christmas, I say, "Butt out!"

Perhaps more elegantly, I quote from the great Christmas carol of John Byron:

> Christians, awake! Salute the happy morn.

POWERS OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES

MOTION TO REFER PAPER TO STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 7, 1994, moved:

> That a paper dealing with the powers of parliamentary committees, prepared by Diane Davidson, General Legal Counsel to the House of Commons, dated November 16, 1994 and tabled with the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations on November 17, 1994, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

He said: Honourable senators, I am not a member of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations. However, my colleague Senator Kelly sent me a copy of the submission presented by Miss Diane Davidson, who is mentioned in my motion, with respect to the powers of committees.

I found it a fascinating document. I attended the next meeting of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations to hear the Deputy Minister of Justice address himself to the very paper which Ms Davidson had presented.

For some four years, I was chairman of a committee of the Senate. Either through timidity or ignorance, I found myself on several occasions being conned — that is the only word I can use to describe it — by public servants who appeared before the committee and told the committee that certain material was not available. It was classified. There was some reason why it could not be made available.

As I said, it was either by timidity or ignorance that neither I nor any member of the committee spoke up and said, "That is not so. We have a right to get that information." When I read this report of Ms Davidson and when I heard the Deputy Minister of Justice, I felt like a kid who had just been given a key to a candy store. We could have dragged these people before the committee in leg irons and got the information we wanted.

This submission is so intriguing that, after it is dealt with by the Joint Standing Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, I think it would be a useful, indeed required, study for the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to undertake. My comments apply not only to chairmen of committees but to anyone who takes committee work seriously.

That is why I have moved this motion. I have spoken to the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Senator Beaudoin, who has enthusiastically agreed, as has the committee, that the matter should be referred to that committee. I think it would be a most useful exercise.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I certainly appreciate the context in which this motion is made. I do, however, have a question for Senator MacDonald. Why is he suggesting that the matter be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs instead of to the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders? Is there a distinction that I have missed?

Senator MacDonald: No. That was the suggestion that was made. I have no strong preference. I just assumed that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs would be the appropriate body, and its members have expressed an interest in studying it. However, I am in the hands of the Senate.

Hon. Joan Neiman: I have been a member of both these committees. My first reaction is that this matter should go to the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders rather than to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

I would be delighted to study it in either forum, but I think that the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders could handle it extremely well in the first instance. At this point in time, with the material coming before the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders may have a little more time to deal with it.

Perhaps this is something the two chairman should consider.

I will adjourn the debate to give us an opportunity to discuss this matter. In any event, the document should be referred to one of these committees.

Senator MacDonald: I do not think it is necessary to have a huddle between two committee chairmen. I think that either committee would be delighted to deal with it. If someone wishes to move to amend the motion, we can deal with the matter now.

Senator Corbin: I have no preference as to which committee the matter should be referred, but, before pursuing the matter, I should like to have an opportunity to read the paper to which Senator MacDonald alluded. I can assure the honourable senator of my goodwill and my cooperation in having the matter referred to a committee, but I should like to peruse the matter further so as to be in a position to reach a personal conclusion as to which committee would be better suited to deal with this matter.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, Senator Corbin has made a very good suggestion. Before we decide that the matter should go to the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders rather than to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I suspect that when the honourable senator reads the powers as they are described, he may have the same concern as I have. I should like to be very sure that the report does, in fact, describe the powers of parliamentary committees. It seems to me that that would go back, in part, to elements of the Constitution; and right back to the beginning of parliamentary regulation and rules. We may find that the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will be the more logical starting point. I do agree with Senator Corbin.

Senator MacDonald: I will ensure that Senator Corbin receives a copy of the paper.

Senator Neiman: I, too, would like to look at the paper before we discuss it again.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, December 14, 1994 at 1:30 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, December 14, 1994

The Senate met at 1:30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADA GRAIN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-51, to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-56, to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1994

MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill C-42, to amend the Criminal Code and other acts (miscellaneous matters), and acquainting the Senate that they had agreed to the amendments made by the Senate to this bill without further amendment.

[Later]

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

> That the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide have power to sit at 3:15 p.m. today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRECINCTS OF PARLIAMENT

TUNNEL BETWEEN EAST BLOCK AND CENTRE BLOCK—APPROPRIATENESS OF EXPENDITURE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I learned just today that the government has authorized the building of a tunnel from the East Block to the Centre Block, and that, apparently, senators have no say in the matter whatsoever.

Given the financial situation of our country, does the government feel it is appropriate to be undertaking such a building project?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Comeau, I will look into your question and try to get back to you tomorrow with an answer.

Senator Comeau: Apparently the project has been given the go-ahead. I should warn the government leader that time is of the essence on this point.

Senator Fairbairn: I appreciate my colleague's concern.

AUTHORITY TO INITIATE PROJECT

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on that matter. I am told that there will be a considerable amount of money spent by the Department of Public Works on the East Block and on the tunnel from the East Block. Will the Leader of the Government assure us that the project was not instigated by or at the request of the Senate of Canada, but rather that it is a government initiative over which the Senate has no control?

Senator Olson: No, because you guys do not vote right.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There is just no consultation.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will follow up on that question as well. I regret that the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, who may have some understanding of these issues, is not with us. As you know, he underwent surgery last week. I will look into these questions today, and it is to be hoped that I will have something on this matter tomorrow.

TRANSPORT

REMAINING IMPEDIMENTS TO REDEVELOPMENT

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, some weeks ago I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if she could try to temper the remarks of some of her colleagues. Today, I wish to congratulate and thank her in that regard. I do so because, yesterday, the Minister of Transport referred to senators in the most gracious way that I have heard. He referred to us as "tenacious."

Flush with this success, will the Leader of the Government go one step further? Will she obtain for us an answer, preferably before we adjourn, as to whether or not any impediment concerning the redevelopment of Pearson airport now exists? Has the government started any negotiations on its own initiative to correct whatever impediment there is remaining?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my colleague has a regard for the Senate and its efforts on the legislation about which Senator MacDonald asks. I believe he expressed that regard yesterday. I wish to thank the honourable senator, and other of my colleagues on the other side, for the understanding and sensitivity with which they have approached this issue.

I will be glad to look into the second part of the honourable senator's question and see if I can have something for him by tomorrow.

I am aware that my colleague has an outstanding question on the larger issue of Pearson airport. I hope that I will be able to obtain a response to that question as well.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PROPOSAL TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE—
REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, on several occasions, I have raised issues concerning security and intelligence. The answer we received from the Leader of the Government was a good start. I figure — There seems to be a problem with the sound. I do not know whether it is intended to soften me up because I am against changing the sound system, which will cost a fortune.

[English]

I am very much the Scrooge when it comes to matters of administration. We had a long debate about changing the sound system. For the moment, I still oppose it.

[Translation]

On several occasions, I have put questions regarding security issues to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have received a written answer, telling me that the minister would gladly come and answer our questions. I shall be brief, for this one. I am prompted to ask you this question because of Senator Kelly's excellent notice of inquiry.

[English]

I should like to join with him in saying that the time has come for the Senate — not the House of Commons — to establish a standing committee on security and intelligence. It may take some other form. However, I believe we have made progress since the last time I asked multiple questions on this issue.

Is the Leader of the Government in a position today to give me some hope that when we come back in February, she will have a firmer answer to give me?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Prud'homme for his questions. I repeat what I have said already, both orally and in the form of a written answer to him: I have spoken with the Minister of National Defence, who has repeated fulsomely to me his willingness to appear before a Senate committee to answer the questions of senators as best he can on matters of security.

I am most conscious of Senator Kelly's interest in this issue. Indeed, he has a motion concerning the issue of security before the Senate now.

As honourable senators know, both sides of the Senate are in a situation where we are considering future work or special assignments to committees, as has been the case in the current sitting. I am sure those discussions will intensify as we go into the new year. In fact, my colleague Senator Kenny has put on the record his interest in the question of defence. I am sure the question that concerns my honourable friend will be an issue in those discussions. Beyond that, I cannot say anything more at this moment.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, since last I exchanged views with Senator Fairbairn, I examined every reference she was kind enough to give to me. I read Senator Kelly's report, but he barely touched on the matter about which we have been concerned of late. He did some splendid work on the issue of terrorism. However, that work had nothing specifically to do with what we are now discussing.

The Minister of National Defence has made a kind offer to appear as a witness before one of our committees. He will only appear as a witness pertaining to the very limited part of his own responsibility concerning security. However, he is responsible for but a part of that issue. The Privy Council is responsible for another part. The Privy Council is led by the Prime Minister.

With that in mind, I am not in a position today to say that I wish to see the Prime Minister appearing before a committee, and not the Minister of National Defence. However, I hope that what has been said on this subject thus far is being actively considered. Because we do not ask a question on this topic every day does not mean that we are forgetting where we started the debate. I waited, because I wanted to see what developments would take place. I know a matter such as this takes time. It is a fragile and controversial subject. However, I am a patient person; I can wait. After all, the Senate is the best place in which to be patient.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I appreciate my honourable friend's patience. I also appreciate something else that he mentioned, something which is part of this discussion, and that is, when we talk about an area such as security and intelligence, it is an area unlike any other in the process of government. It is an area about which I know my friend Senator Kelly is most knowledgeable, and also to which he is extremely sensitive.

During the hearings on terrorism and public safety, I recall that in order to obtain the kind of forthright views and information that were necessary for the excellent report that was produced, virtually all the hearings were held in camera.

I ask honourable senators to keep in mind that we are dealing here with an issue that is unlike any other issue. For that reason, a great deal of consideration goes into the requests that are being made by my honourable friend and others. The issue will be discussed and considered.

I am not trying to stonewall my honourable friend. However, I assure him that our discussions and considerations will continue into the new year. We will try our very best to do the right thing.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I have been active in politics for 31 years. Often, when things become embarrassing, we have a tendency to say that it is top secret, or for the minister's eyes only. One time I invented a new term which was, "So secret — destroy before reading."

I do not want to believe that in the name of security —

[Translation]

So many crimes and sins have been committed in the name of security. When things become very embarrassing, there is a tendency — I want to be very clear. I am not talking about the government, the minister or whoever is responsible, but so many crimes have been committed in the name of security, so many mistakes have been hidden in the name of security. That is the point I want to make on this issue. I am not interested in rehashing the past.

The world has changed, as I said. I am not interested in rehashing the past. I am interested in the future.

Honourable senators, hundreds of millions of dollars are spent, some of which I am convinced are without the scrutiny of Parliament. That is unacceptable. The minister knows how seriously I feel about this matter. I know the minister takes my request seriously. That is why, in 1995, I will be looking for progress under a new world order where Parliament will have much more say.

Senator Fairbairn: I am very conscious of my honourable friend's concerns. He has been here 31 years, one way or another, and I have been here 33 years. Certainly, in this day and age, perhaps one of the best ways of getting your views across is to stamp them "Top Secret," and you can guarantee they will be out tomorrow. That is not what I am referring to.

Honourable senators, I am not referring to embarrassing or controversial issues. There is a real sensitivity in the area of security and intelligence which must form part of our deliberations as we attempt to satisfy the legitimate concerns of Parliament.

DESTAFFING OF LIGHTHOUSES— REQUEST FOR JUDICIAL INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

The Leader of the Government will be aware that there have been a number of calls — with a safety element ascribed to them — for a judicial inquiry into the destaffing of lighthouses on the West Coast of Canada, in Newfoundland, and other maritime centres.

It has come to my attention that, while appearing before the Transport Committee in the other place, the Transport Minister, Douglas Young, made a broad, sweeping reference to a number of matters. One of the items was termed "marine-related matters."

Will the Leader of the Government find out whether or not the term "marine-related matters" includes our request for a judicial inquiry into destaffing? This certainly is not good enough for us. Was it the minister's intention to refer the question of destaffing to the Standing Committee on Transport?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will do my best to obtain an answer for Senator Forrestall.

POLICY ON ADMINISTRATION OF INTER-PARLIAMENTARY ACTIVITIES—EQUALITY BETWEEN HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Di Nino, the Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

On December 8, we were informed by Senator Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, that he was pleased to advise that the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons had now approved, in principle, an agreement with the Senate for the joint administration of parliamentary associations. I take it all honourable senators know what is entailed by the word "administration."

However, my understanding of the new setup is that, in matters of policy, the members of the House of Commons will have the overwhelming and final say with respect to the general guidelines applying to parliamentary associations. In my view, that goes against the grain of the equality and independence of both Houses.

Honourable senators, I have no difficulty with the administrative concept that is put forward by the paper. I do regret, however, that we have not had a substantial debate on this matter in the house. I suppose this is as good an opportunity as any to do it, but there is little time if we want the budget proposals to move forward in January.

My question for Senator Di Nino is this: On what basis did the Senate Internal Economy Committee agree to let the House of Commons have the overwhelming say in establishing policy as it applies to interparliamentary associations? In other words, why are we playing second fiddle?

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Now I know how the Leader of the Government in the Senate feels.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We will take this question as notice.

Senator Di Nino: My leader informs me that I have the option of saying thank you for the question, and I will refer it to Senator Hastings for an answer.

Honourable senators, I do think there should be some debate on this matter. The basis that has been put forward here is the same as that which has been established for the cost sharing for the parliamentary associations, namely, 70 per cent for the House and 30 per cent for the Senate. Therefore, when we approached the other place for a more equitable representation, this particular fact was referred to us.

I should like to inform my colleague opposite that I share his views. As a matter of fact, with the knowledge of — but not necessarily the consent of — Senator Hastings, I wrote a personal letter to Mr. Gagliano imploring him to reconsider the issue because I do feel that there should be much more equity in the distribution of effective power. I suggested to him that a more appropriate number would be three and four. Obviously, you know what the response was: We received a notice, although Mr. Gagliano did make some changes to the presentation that I had also suggested.

I believe that this is an appropriate opportunity for Senator Corbin to raise an inquiry. I, too, wish to participate in the discussion, since I am not pleased with the situation as it now stands. Obviously, the House pays 70 per cent of the costs, and therefore they are suggesting that they should have 70 per cent of the vote.

However, honourable senators, an opportunity remains for participation by the Senate in that a steering committee has been set up to finalize all of these matters. At the present time, two of our senior staff members and five senior staff members from the House are working on a position paper that will be presented to a committee to be made up of two senators and five members of the House where discussions on all of these matters will take place. Perhaps at that time, if Senator Hastings and I could have some support from this chamber, we could fight a little harder to address the inequity or the imbalances that I agree with my friend exist here.

Senator Corbin: When it comes to matters of principle, I do not think financial contribution should be the criteria. This house is either independent or it is not. We must ask ourselves this question: Are we now in the position where we participate in inter-parliamentary activities on the basis of an invitation as guests of the House of Commons? That would be my interpretation of the present setup.

As much as I appreciate my "vis-à-vis's" concern over this whole matter, I am reluctant to approve the Senate's budget, which contains this item of split administration of the inter-parliamentary associations, before the question of fundamental principle has been sorted out. Either we are independent or we are not.

There is another way to go about it, and that would be for the Senate to set up its own inter-parliamentary associations. In that way, we could deal with topics that interest senators, and we would not be at the tail end of the activities and the dictates of the other place. Obviously I am unhappy with the way in which the whole system has evolved over the years. This is a great opportunity for the Senate to do something constructive about the matter.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, I completely agree with my colleague. Obviously he would have more influence over those in power in the other place than we do. I ask the honourable senators opposite to use that influence, particularly that of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to achieve a more equitable distribution of power, if I may put it that way. However, a full and open discussion on this issue would be appropriate.

I am not sure that the proper vehicle for such discussion is the topic of the budget for the coming year. I spoke with my colleague opposite a few moments ago to inform him that I had been asked to inquire as to whether we could proceed with this matter. The Treasury Board requires that we submit the budget to them by the middle of January.

A full discussion on this issue certainly is welcome but we should find another forum. I repeat, perhaps the Leader of the Government of the Senate and her colleagues could intercede on behalf of our institution with the other place. Perhaps they can do a better job than I in dealing with Mr. Gagliano.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I understand the suggestion of my honourable "vis-à-vis," to the effect that we approve the budget. I certainly had no intention of stopping it in any way, shape or form. There are good proposals contained in the general cadre of the program. Nevertheless, I want to know, after proper debate and a good hearing on this rather fundamental issue, if we in this house feel we are not getting fair input into the policy area, whether we are free to pull out of the agreement at any time. Is that what he is saying?

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, that is my understanding. I stand to be corrected, but I believe that is the case.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to the question asked by Senator Corbin regarding the inter-parliamentary associations and the recent changes that have been negotiated. Some time ago, there was an article in the press to the effect that the Board of Internal Economy in the other place had agreed to a program in which all travel conducted would be at the lowest possible rate; that is, economy, and spousal travel would no longer be approved. I am wondering whether similar commitments regarding the Senate have been made.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, that particular provision is one of the conditions to be finalized in the upcoming discussions. I can tell you that the conditions outlined in the press release, which was been circulated to all the members, as far as Senator Hastings and I are concerned, would be applicable to all members of committees travelling on behalf of the Senate or the House of Commons.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I found it particularly — perhaps "offensive," again, is too powerful a word — unbecoming, perhaps, that the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, on its own, would issue a press release before we in this institution have had an opportunity to consider and approve the deal. To me, that is totally unacceptable. That is not the way to conduct business within the precincts of Parliament.

Senator Di Nino: I have no argument.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I was called out during part of the exchange between Senator Di Nino and Senator Corbin. Will this matter be debated in the Senate, the new arrangements respecting inter-parliamentary associations? If it will be debated, then I will reserve my comments until later. If not, I have a question to put to the honourable senator, the Deputy Chairman, which he may wish to reflect upon and reply to at a later date.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, the question of whether or not this subject is to be debated in the Senate is entirely up to my colleagues. It is my suggestion that Senator Corbin raise the issue in the form of an inquiry precisely for that purpose. I, too, believe that we should have a full hearing to satisfy ourselves that this is the best we can do and the way we want to go. Otherwise, we should look at alternatives. We are talking about the matter today as a component of the budget. I would be pleased to answer any questions.

Senator Murray: When is the budget up for debate?

Senator Di Nino: The budget was presented two or three days ago.

Senator Murray: It will be called in due course?

Senator Di Nino: It was called and dealt with yesterday. Senator Corbin adjourned the motion. We were hoping to get it passed today.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, it is the responsibility of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy to table such matters for discussion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This is Question Period.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I am perhaps breaking the rules of Question Period, but what other forum is open to us? The budget proposals have been tabled. We are at the tail end of the session, in the pre-Christmas holiday period. Everything is rushed. I will be tied up in committee today with an important witness, the Minister of Justice, on the topic of euthanasia. I would have liked to debate the matter later this day but I just cannot find the time.

It seems to me that the proper method for dealing with this topic would have been for the chairman or deputy chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to come to the house with the specific proposals and ask that the house adopt, modify or reject them. Now it is buried in the budget. I find that unfortunate because it is a matter that carries important consequence for all of us.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, Senator Hastings as Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration circulated that material approximately two weeks ago, I do not recall the date. Frankly, this is the first I have heard that anyone, other than those at the Internal Economy Committee meeting, has any major concerns about the measure. I am not suggesting that this is not the appropriate place to raise those concerns. However, in fairness to Senator Hastings, he did send this circular around about two weeks ago.

Senator Corbin: The matter was not properly before the house before you tabled your report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret to interrupt but the time for Question Period has elapsed.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Sharon Carstairs moved the second reading of Bill C-51, to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that act.

She said: I am pleased to introduce Bill C-51, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Honourable senators, the Canada Grain Act first came into being in this nation in 1912, and it was most recently amended in 1988. From its very inception, the act was designed to regulate the grain industry, first, in the interests of the grain producers, and then in the interests of the grain industry in general. The purpose of Bill C-51 is to make changes that these very groups have told us are required to ensure that the Canada Grain Act continues to fulfil its mandate.

Honourable senators, I would like to start by putting this legislation into the more general context of the government's priorities.

These priorities are economic growth and jobs. They apply to all sectors of the Canadian economy.

Those among us who are familiar with the agricultural industry realize that the agriculture and agri-food sector plays a prominent role in Canada's economy. The contribution of the agri-food industry to the gross national product of this country averages 8 per cent, and the sector employs nearly two million Canadians.

In the prairies, grains and oilseeds, much of which is exported, represent more than half of farm revenue.

[English]

Agriculture is vital to this country, and the agri-industry is also significant. Agriculture must play a major role in achieving the economic objectives that are so important to the vast majority of all Canadians.

In agriculture, as in all sectors, this calls for a multifaceted coordinated strategy, one that is devised in cooperation with all of the industry stakeholders. This bill forms an integral part of the overall economic strategy that we must have for agriculture in this nation, and it will contribute substantially to the competitiveness of our grain industry. It will enhance the well-being of the many communities, families, and individual Canadians who depend on this industry for their livelihoods.

The Canada Grain Act is administered by the Canadian Grain Commission. The CGC is a special, federal, operating agency that serves all facets of the Canadian grain industry from plant breeders and grain producers to grain handlers and marketers, through to Canada's international and domestic grain customers. It employs about 750 people across Canada, and these generally are experts in a wide range of technical and scientific fields.

The commission's vision statement is to strive for excellence in adding value to the Canadian grain industry. The CGC seeks to remain a leader in providing grain quality management and quantity assurance, and is dedicated to excellent and responsive service in support of producers, all sectors of the grain industry, and, of course, their customers.

The CGC regulates the grain industry to ensure the fair treatment of producers, the integrity of grain transactions, and to maintain grain quality as grain is moved through the marketing channels so customers are satisfied. The CGC, therefore, is central to the unique Canadian system of grain quality, uniformity, safety, and integrity which has proven successful in marketing Canadian grain over a long period of time.

Honourable senators, this legislation is the result of a very broad consultation. All the parties impacted by this bill were invited to participate in the discussions, and this legislation reflects the position of the large majority of the interveners.

The Canadian Grain Commission began its evaluation in February of 1991. A working document was submitted to 45 organizations representing producers, storage operators and marketing companies. In August of 1991, an additional working paper was submitted to the whole industry which resulted in further discussions with 57 organizations. A second series of consultations allowed further input. In November of 1991, yet another and further revision was made. In addition, discussions remained ongoing during all of 1992.

Bill C-51, therefore, is rooted in a process of extensive, responsive and honest consultation. As legislators, I am certain that we are dealing with legislation that is based on a democratic consultation, and that must please us all.

For clarification purposes, I will group the amendments into three main categories. The amendments will ensure enhanced competitiveness, more protection for grain producers, and new safeguards for Canadian taxpayers.

The grain industry, like all industries, is changing rapidly. To remain competitive in the global market-place, we need a regulatory and legislative regime that supports the shared concerns of all stakeholders. At the same time, we need an environment in which individuals and groups within the industry can compete successfully, adding, wherever possible, value to their efforts.

Bill C-51 is designed with these considerations in mind. As a result, the Canada Grain Act will be amended to strengthen the role that quality plays in Canada's grain industry. This will help reinforce the unique things that we do in this country in our grain industry which ensure that only the best grain varieties are developed, marketed and transported through our bulk handling system. This amendment affirms that quality will continue to be the cornerstone of Canada's grain marketing strategy.

Canada's commitment to grain quality will be strengthened in additional ways. For example, the definition of "contaminated grain" will be clarified, and the responsibility of elevator operators for safe handling of hazardous compounds and safe disposal of contaminated grain will be clearly spelled out.

As well, Bill C-51 affirms the commission's authority to set standards for the drying of grain. This is significant because improperly dried grain often only shows up after it has been processed, and the first person to become aware of that contamination is, unfortunately, the consumer. That would not enhance our reputation as a competitive grain marketing country.

Unnecessary, outmoded laws are a drag on competitiveness. In the spirit of removing such unnecessary laws, process elevators will not be required to undergo weighovers. A weighover is a procedure in which an audit is conducted to verify the tonnage in store, by grade. Weighovers make a great deal of sense when elevators which are handling grain do not own the grain.

However, for process elevators which own the grain they have in stock, to be forced to do weighovers seems somewhat ridiculous, and provides work perhaps only for bureaucrats, but with no advantage to the grain producer.

Also, in the spirit of removing unnecessary laws, the CGC will no longer be required to set maximum tariffs for elevators. Elevator tariffs are the fees that grain elevator companies charge for the services.

Honourable senators, government regulation of tariffs dates back to a time when producers were less able to protect themselves from the setting of unfair prices. Because producer-owned or controlled companies now control the bulk of elevator capacity in Canada, this kind of government involvement in tariff setting is, I would suggest, no longer needed.

This deregulation of maximum tariffs will proceed in stages. During a two-year transition period, the commission will retain the authority to set tariff ceilings by order if problems arise. I suspect that problems are unlikely, but we must make sure that we have not been precipitous in this area.

In the current crop year, for example, terminal elevator operators were given the power by the commission to set their own elevator tariffs. Generally, their increases were minor and essentially fair. This is a good indication that having the market-place set the tariffs will result, I believe, in fair tariffs. Still, honourable senators, safeguards will remain. Even after the two-year transition period, the commission will continue to have the authority to set maximum tariffs, if needed.

Bill C-51 will also provide much needed protection for taxpayers. In 1991, the Federal Court of Appeal ruled that the CGC was liable for losses sustained by producers in the early 1980s when two licensees went bankrupt, and the security they posted with the commission did not cover their liabilities. Canadian taxpayers were required to pay out more than $3.9 million, an amount equal to the difference between the security posted by the companies and their actual liabilities to grain producers.

Honourable senators, the Canada Grain Act was never intended to provide unlimited protection for grain producers. Unlimited business protection is unknown in any other industry, and Bill C-51 makes clear what protections are intended. Basically, the intent of these provisions can be stated as follows: While protection by security posted by CGC licensees is one of the rights producers have under the act, grain producers must assume some responsibility for their business dealings.

Therefore, Bill C-51 places the onus on the farmers to help minimize their risks. These include a provision which, by regulation, protects producers for a prescribed period from the date of delivering grain to a licensee. If producers decline to accept payment for their grain within that period, they will not be eligible to be paid out of the licensee's posted security should that company fail.

Based on consultations the CGC conducted with producers and the industry, honourable senators, the prescribed period will be 90 days. There is a requirement that the farmer must notify the CGC within 30 days of a failure to pay, or default by a grain company. There is also a provision which places the onus on the farmer to determine if he or she is dealing with a duly licensed company. Only licensed companies must post securities with the CGC. Claims will not be valid if the farmer is dealing with an unlicensed company.

Honourable senators, Bill C-51 contains a provision which requires the producer to obtain CGC authorized documents from grain dealers and other CGC licensees, a provision that will permit the commission to set percentage limits on security coverage. The commission would not be able to use this particular regulatory power without Governor-in-Council approval. Currently, coverage is 100 per cent, and this will remain the case, at least in the foreseeable future.

Finally, the bill contains a provision which explicitly limits the liability of the Canadian Grain Commission to the amount of security posted by licensed companies with the CGC. This provision is designed to bring the protection enjoyed by grain producers more into line with security provisions common in all other areas.

Honourable senators, as I said earlier in my remarks, Bill C-51 was preceded by a series of in-depth industry consultations. These consultations demonstrate conclusively that the industry has changed, and that the Canada Grain Act must change accordingly.

After a consultation process, the authors of the bill prepared a number of legislative proposals that were examined and approved by the House of Commons. I strongly urge honourable senators to support this bill.

[English]

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few brief comments on Bill C-51, specifically relating to the area of change.

This bill deals with the changes that have come about because of the free trade agreement, which our government worked on for some nine years. I am very pleased to see that the government in power today passed that free trade agreement.

A number of things must change to meet our vision of agriculture for the future. First, prior to this bill, you could not legally move grain from the province of Saskatchewan to the province of Manitoba by truck, or from the province of Alberta to the province of Saskatchewan. We did not have free trade among the provinces in Western Canada. The activities in the grain market there were supervised by the Canadian Wheat Board. Bill C-51 changes that situation.

In her speech, the honourable senator said that some of the onus must be placed on the farmers. As the free trade situation opens up with respect to both continental and international trade, farmers will have to be more responsible with respect to who they sell their goods to. I support that concept. Some people have raised the issue that perhaps we are placing too much onus on the farmers. However, I suggest that farmers should be sure of who they are dealing with, in terms of security, when they sell their products.

For the most part, I believe that this bill opens up a new vision in terms of free trade opportunities, not only in continental trade but in international trade as well. We have some very good examples of this freer trade. The canola industry and other oilseed industries have become a $9-billion business in Canada.

As a senator, I am not supposed to have my tongue in my cheek on issues that are political matters, but as one who saw this free trade situation develop in North America, and then the GATT, these are exciting days for farmers. The administration which prevailed before this one accomplished many things. However, we must still strive toward our vision, and seek out opportunities to trade in new markets.

Honourable senators, I am very optimistic. This bill allows for the expansion of trade, whether it is the U.S. market, the Mexican market, the continental market or the international market. It also allows us to have free trade, at least in Western Canada, where trucks will be able to pass through the borders of the various provinces without breaking the law.

Honourable senators, I support the direction of this bill in general, and believe it is a step in the right direction.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Carstairs, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Hon. Colin Kenny moved the second reading of Bill C-56, to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to address the house in support of proposed amendments, under Bill C-56, to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

Canadians want to see environmental values incorporated into economic decisions. When this happens, they see that economic growth need not lead to environmental degradation. More than that, they are learning that, if we do things right, promoting a sound environment can have a positive impact on economic growth. This is the essence of sustainable development.

Honourable senators, to demonstrate its determination to fulfil its "Red Book" commitments, the government is proposing three amendments. These amendments have been carefully balanced to demonstrate the government's responsiveness to the ongoing concerns of all major stakeholders. The government is proposing to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act to enshrine the principle of "one project, one assessment" in order to avoid costly duplication, to guarantee the existence of participant funding in order to promote effective public participation in the process, and to require a cabinet decision in order to respond adequately to the recommendations of independent environmental assessment mediators or panels.

Honourable senators, before I explain the benefits of these amendments I should like to reiterate that business and governments have an important planning and decision-making tool in the pursuit of sustainable development and environmental assessment. Environmental assessment is a systematic information-gathering process used to help make decisions that take into account the impacts of human activities on the environment. It involves an assessment of potential impacts of a proposed project on the ecosystem, the air, water, land and living organisms, and includes a study of social and economic impacts on affected human populations. Such assessments provide a solid basis for limiting or eliminating environmental effects and making timely, informed, enlightened decisions.

Environmental assessment provides a forum to discuss public concerns about environment and health. In turn, the process helps business and governments to meet their responsibilities for the environment and earn public confidence.

Honourable senators, the environment and economy are inseparable, and environmental assessment is the foundation upon which sustainable development can and must rest. Conducting an environmental assessment makes both good environmental and economic sense. As honourable senators are aware, properly applied, it ensures that environmental considerations are integrated into overall decision-making at the earliest possible stage in a project's life cycle or approval process. In turn, this minimizes or eliminates the possibility of unanticipated, and often very costly, remedies to downstream problems.

Honourable senators, the proposed amendments to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act make a good thing better, and I shall outline why that is so.

First, industry will be pleased that the government is moving quickly to enshrine the "one project, one assessment" principle. This measure promises to provide important efficiency gains as overlap and duplication between federal departments is minimized. From now on, proponents can expect to obtain one coordinated set of requirements and one coordinated decision for projects in which more than one federal department is involved.

Second, the amendment to require that the cabinet respond to panel recommendations will ensure that all ministers, with their different responsibilities and regional representation, may have input into decisions. More to the point, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, both explicitly and implicitly, seeks to strengthen a growing new culture within federal decision-making circles, one that is more sensitive to environmental concerns. It does so in part by making all departments and agencies accountable for the environmental consequences of the decisions they take or those they fail to take. Accompanied by the amendment introduced under Bill C-56 requiring cabinet to review the recommendations of mediators and public review panels, this sends a powerful signal about the government's commitment to the environment.

Finally, the decision to include an amendment obliging the Minister of the Environment to establish a funding program for public participation in a review by a mediator or a panel is an equally positive development for industry in two ways. First, it may provide proponents with valuable information they might otherwise not have been aware of vis-à-vis the long-term viability of the proposed endeavour; and, second, it ensures that those who will be impacted by the proposed development will have their say prior to, rather than after, irrevocable decisions or investments in the project have been made.

Honourable senators, stripped to its essentials, environmental assessment means good planning — planning that is as good for the environment as it is for the bottom line of Canada's business community. Recent studies indicate that, on average, environmental assessments comprise less than half of one per cent of capital expenditures associated with projects. These costs are typically recouped later through more expeditious regulatory approval. More to the point, advance planning minimizes the risk of more costly redesign and refitting of projects because of their unanticipated consequences.

Honourable senators, I have outlined for you a number of good reasons why I believe the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is good for Canadian industry and good for Canada. This legislation is fair, balanced, efficient, and it is a positive piece of legislation. This legislation, along with amendments, deserves the support of senators.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Kenny for his lucid defence of the amendments to the Environmental Assessment Act. The bill contains many laudable features which deserve support, but there are also some major deficiencies.

The legislation to be amended by this bill has a protracted history. The previous government began late last decade to address the difficulties in an environmental assessment review process which was founded not in a law enacted by Parliament but in a guidelines order issued by cabinet at the eleventh hour by the previous Liberal government.

Judicial interpretation of that guidelines order created a climate in which the operating law was virtually unknown. Court rulings on the Rafferty-Alameda and the Oldman Dam projects appeared to create new law yearly, often more frequently. Clearly, an act of Parliament was required to end a situation in which proponents of major developments, environmental advocates and governments could not foresee, from month to month, the rules which would govern the critical matter of putting the plans of governments or the private sector to the environmental test.

Five years and a great deal of debate later, we have this act and the amendments. I need not remind honourable senators that the bill which we approved in 1992 was not without its flaws. The weaknesses were well covered in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources — then under the chairmanship of Senator Dan Hays — under the section entitled, "The Bill Does Not Go Far Enough."

Prior to their election, members of the current government appeared to agree with that assessment. They promised the electorate to "legally recognize intervenor funding as an integral component of that assessment process." As Senator Kenny has outlined, Bill C-56 provides for such funding. They further promised to "give teeth to the independent Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency." They promised that the agency's relationship to government would be roughly similar to that between the CRTC and cabinet. That is most certainly not the case here. In fact, by Bill C-56 and by recent administrative rulings available only to those who have access to cabinet documents, they are not distancing the environmental review process from political, potentially partisan considerations, but going in the opposite direction. Given the past history of major projects being excluded from the environmental assessment process by cabinet, this portion of the legislation does not represent progress.

It was the charge that the review process had fallen victim to political considerations, and thus been ignored, which prompted the first court challenge to the guideline's order in respect to the Rafferty project. Environmental advocates were legitimately outraged that a review of the dam had not been conducted. In their view, front-end politics had denied Canadians the right to consider the harm to the environment of that development. In introducing this bill, the previous government gave Canadians a clear and noble process for all to follow. By failing to fulfil its election promise and introducing Bill C-56 and administrative measures in recent months, however, this government is increasing the likelihood that budget restraints or political considerations will override environmental considerations.

I want to elaborate, but first let me give credit to the bill's positive aspects. Bill C-56 would require the government to create a program to fund public participation in mediation and assessment by review panels. This is a great improvement. As the act stands, a participant funding program is allowed, but not required. In practice, however, the amendment proposed in Bill C-56 may result in only a modest improvement.

The previous government made funds available to participants through the Green Plan. This fiscal year alone some $1.4 million will be given to participants in six public reviews. The strength of any new participant funding program will certainly depend on the level of commitment of funds to the program. That remains to be seen. It is commendable that this government is making the commitment in principle. Certainly, informed Canadians must be given the opportunity, through access to funds for research into highly technical areas, to present their perspective to panels or mediators.

Bill C-56 would also require the use of previous environmental assessment work conducted when a project is put on hold and then reactivated. This is turning something which the act allows into something which would be mandatory. It is conceivable that this provision will save time, effort and considerable taxpayers' dollars in any future assessment of, for example, the Great Whale project, if that project is revived.

It is good commonsense not to force project proponents, government or environmental defenders, to begin at the starting line when a project is revived. At the same time, care must be taken that any significant new information about a project's environmental impact that arises during the period of delay is also considered. The amendment proposed by the Commons Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development corrects an important oversight.

Bill C-56 would also give full cabinet the right and duty to consider all reports by environmental assessment review panels or mediators. Only with cabinet approval could any minister or government agency respond to the findings or recommendations of those independent individuals charged with weighing the facts and proposing a solution. The Minister of the Environment has cast this amendment in its most favourable light. On October 31, she told the Commons:

> We are not just talking about ending backroom pressures to overturn environmental assessment. We have introduced legislation to take away the ability of any individual cabinet minister to overturn those decisions.
> The new law puts the onus on cabinet to respond to those recommendations. In the name of fairness and openness and in order to make sure that everything is completely transparent, we are acting to make sure that the whole government by virtue of cabinet is responsible for environmental assessment decisions.

My own opinion is that it is not a forward step but a huge leap backward from the promise to the electorate in the autumn of 1993 that:

> A Liberal government will amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act to shift decision-making powers to the independent Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency, subject to appeal to the Cabinet. The agency's relationship to government would be roughly similar to that between the CRTC and Cabinet.

Under the Broadcasting Act, the CRTC does have considerable decision-making authority. It is not the case that each and every decision arrived at by commissioners is routinely presented to cabinet. Under section 28 of the act, the commission's relationship with cabinet is set out as one that gives cabinet the last word only on matters of the issuance, amendment or renewal on a broadcasting licence, and only when one of the parties referenced in the commission decision launches a specific appeal to cabinet. Only then does cabinet have the power to set aside a decision or to instruct the commission to reconsider. Should the commission again reach a decision which is not to cabinet's liking, again a specific appeal must be launched and cabinet can finally set the decision aside. In short, that is considerable authority. It is an arm's-length body.

By contrast, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency will be a weak cousin, administering the environmental assessment process but having little or no say in its outcome. That is not what was promised.

Those who support the government's altered position may well contend that, in making the full cabinet responsible, the potential that any single minister's ability to play politics while ignoring the findings of a panel or mediator is diminished. I take the position that the potential for the full cabinet to set aside sound environmental judgment in favour of shorter-term economic and federal-provincial concerns is enhanced.

In recent months the government has demonstrated precisely how little authority it is prepared to give the new agency. In October, in an attachment to a cabinet document, it set out the rules by which departments can gain access to a centrally administered pool of money to undertake an environmental assessment. It cannot have access to that pool if the department is the proponent of a project. It cannot have access to that fund to review private sector projects of concern if there is no regulatory trigger for a review; that is to say, if the laws it administers are not included in the list of triggers listed under the CEAA regulation.

By way of example, if Natural Resources Canada thought it best to call for a review of a private ski development in one of our national parks, a development that only required the issuance of a tree-cutting licence, it would have to find the money in its own tight budget, or it would have to forget about that environmental defence. Perhaps most important, it is not the new agency that will administer the pool, it is Treasury Board.

These are the new rules, and they are beyond scrutiny. The Minister of the Environment suggests that with this amendment in Bill C-56, everything is transparent. It is precisely by placing matters before cabinet rather than an independent, arm's-length agency that everything becomes shrouded beyond the reach of public scrutiny, protected from disclosure even through the Freedom of Information Act.

As an excellent research paper produced by the Law and Government Division of the Library of Parliament Research Branch observed, if a minister or a government department decides to approve a project, there appears to be no obligation to inform the public. Nor is there any way for the public to be certain that the action is consistent with cabinet's approval. The researcher asked these sensible questions:

> How would the public know if the proposed course of action was consistent or inconsistent with cabinet's approval? In cases of inconsistency, who would sound the alarm? Would cabinet? Would the intervention be timely? The bill provides no answers to these practical questions.

The solution, I suggest, is not for the government to centralize the decision-making authority in cabinet and the control of the purse-strings in Treasury Board, but to fulfil its campaign promise and give real teeth to an independent Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency.

Bill C-56 is deficient not only in what it does but in what it does not do on another important matter. When the minister appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources in June, she informed us of some of the amendments under consideration at that time. In answer to a question which I put to her, she said clearly that one of the amendments dealt with the aspect of incorporating the assessment of government policy, not just government projects, into the act. She said:

> ...I think that if you go back to the comments of the Liberal critic at the time the CEAA was originally proclaimed, the Honourable Paul Martin, he felt that policy assessment was an element that would be a positive addition to the act, and that is one of the discussions we are having.

The bill before us makes no mention of requiring the government to assess new agricultural policy, transportation policy, economic policy, or any new policy that can and does have a major impact on the environment.

Honourable senators, Bill C-56 presents improvements to two aspects of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. It gives, however, less than was promised. There is clearly room for further improvement.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Defence Policy entitled "Security in a Changing World," tabled in the Senate on October 31, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Forrestall).

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I rise today to take part in this all too brief debate on Canada's new defence policy.

Defence is something that is very dear to my heart, having lived in and grown up in the military environment of Halifax. I was particularly pleased and grateful to have been named to serve on our Senate committee.

As senators have been very quick to point out, this is the first occasion on which a full-scale review of defence policy has been turned over to our committee. It gave us an opportunity, together with Canadians from all walks of life, to examine and review where we are and where we are going after the events in Europe started by the removal of the Berlin Wall.

Our review was different from other reviews undertaken in countries such as France, Australia and the United States in that it was undertaken by parliamentarians and not by departmental officials. It gave parliamentary participants an opportunity to talk not only to serving military and former military but also to some of the peace organizations. We have spoken widely, and we have been advised generally wisely by Canadian people.

Today, I want to concentrate on three areas that have not been touched on in any depth by earlier speakers, and they are the replacement of ship-borne search and rescue helicopters; the question that I refer to as the "Cornwallis concept," the concept of a peacekeeping training centre for Canada; and, finally, if there is a moment, process.

Peacekeeping has changed; there is no question about that. It has become peace-building. Perhaps more often lately, it has become peace-making. People trained as war fighters are now being challenged to find ways to provide clean drinking water, food, clothing and shelter to people in war-torn areas.

We heard evidence about the type of person it takes to be a peacekeeper today. We saw it firsthand in Bosnia. A person has to be a fully trained combat-capable individual. He should be a member of the military. However, his skills have broadened so much that he may not necessarily have to be a member of a military group. He must be tactful, and have the patience of Job. He has to understand the culture and the history of the people among whom he is working. We require our peacekeepers to act as mediators. They build roads, lay communications, and do humanitarian work, as we see daily on television.

In a report by the Subcommittee on Security and National Defence of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs in February of 1993, it was recommended that:

> The subcommittee recommends also that, within the general curriculum of the Canadian Forces at military staff colleges, officer training programs and the like, more emphasis be placed on dispute settlement and conflict management programs, as well as on the United Nations, regional organizations, and peacekeeping history and practice. Once personnel are assigned to a specific foreign locale, they should be specifically instructed in the history, tradition and culture of the country to which they are being sent.

I believe that, in recent years, Canada has developed a very special expertise in this area. We were told this during our visits to Europe, the United States, the former Yugoslavia, as well as during our visit to Italy. We were told of the expertise that we have and the value of that expertise to the United Nations.

I would want to use this special expertise to assist the United Nations in the mandate that seems to be developing, in the sense that it would form the basis of a very worthwhile higher educational centre, perhaps located at Cornwallis, which would be complementary to some of the efforts being made on the West Coast at the Lester B. Pearson College. We could invite the military, civilian and non-governmental organization leaders for the type of training that would enable them to understand one another better.

We learned that it was very confusing to enter upon a project only to find that another country involved in the peacekeeping action with you had not the vaguest idea of what you were doing; did not know what to do next; and did not know how to establish liaison in the communities and villages. It would be good to approach these common requirements of cultural understanding and historical appreciation from an educational point of view.

We could train leaders from around the globe, including leaders in countries that are not involved in peacekeeping actions, to be prepared to respond appropriately when, God forbid, some of the conflagrations that we are involved in in many parts of the world spread to their countries.

• (1500)

A French general once suggested that a BA level of education was sufficient for an officer to lead troops into battle. That was probably quite true. Today, a Master's degree is not sufficient to lead men and women into peacekeeping and peacemaking challenges. Indeed, they need PhD. level instruction. Those are two euphemisms that suggest how far we have been forced to come because of the changing nature of the role we are now thrusting upon young men and women fighting for Canada.

Honourable senators, we have a golden opportunity to show leadership and to participate much more actively than we are in the establishment of a common centre, to bring together the loose ends that plague the United Nations, command and control being just another one.

I wish to speak briefly, honourable senators, about ship-borne helicopters and search and rescue helicopters. There is no doubt about the useful lives of the two pieces of equipment we have in place now. They are on their last legs and must be replaced. That fact was recognized by the committee in its report and by the minister and the government in its paper. However, I continue to be concerned about the absence from that paper of any firm indication of the nature of these two pieces of equipment.

First, it should be one piece of equipment. Second, it should be a piece of equipment that bears some reality or relationship to the harsh North American climate in which we live. Given our geography and location, we have extremes of cold, fog, rain, fires and avalanches. It is not surprising, therefore, that search and rescue incidents arise quite frequently, and they must be met by specialized pieces of equipment.

I should like this chamber to urge upon the government a set of specifications that will sound surprisingly like the EH-101. That is a battle I will not fight on this floor. Rather, I am requesting that we look at equipment that will have a range of some 550 miles, plus its reserves; a speed of 160 knots; a hovering capability at 8,500 feet, and the capacity at 8,500 feet to recover from a lost engine; the capacity to carry, besides crew, nine people; the capacity for day and night all-weather operational capability, including — and this is perhaps the most important factor — the capacity for full de-icing; and the capacity for in-flight refueling so that we might, from time to time, engage in a very useful role as the Hibernia project develops.

Honourable senators, the same can be said for the ship-borne helicopter. It extends the range of the surface ship. It is no longer a piece of equipment merely to satisfy anti-submarine warfare, although God knows there are more submarines out there belonging to more nations today than there were five years ago. Rather, it is a piece of equipment that can be employed — and we have seen the beauty of this — in drug interception, and monitoring the smuggling of aliens into our country. More important, we built ships to carry these helicopters, so why not put good helicopters on them?

Finally, honourable senators, I wish to reflect on the question of process. As I have said, the committee worked long and hard. We visited widely. We had, as we started out, what I thought was the freedom to think, respond, react and assess information that came to us from all sources, and then to weigh that information and write a report.

As much as I love Admiral Mifflin, I found from time to time that the presence of the parliamentary secretary on the joint committee was a bit inhibiting. It was just a bit difficult to exercise freedom. I gave consensus where freedom was, at times, given grudgingly.

I refer honourable senators to the McGrath report of 1985 on the reform of the House of Commons. One of its recommendations was that the parliamentary secretary should not sit on standing committees because his presence limited the work of committees. It put the government on the committee, which led to the potential to interfere with the independence of the committee.

The rules of the other place were changed in 1985 to preclude parliamentary secretaries from sitting on committees. This worked well for a number of years, but in the early 1990s, the rules were changed to once again allow parliamentary secretaries to sit on committees. This change came about as a result of a request by committee chairmen to have ongoing and closer relationships between the government and the committee itself.

Honourable senators, I think McGrath had it right, especially in relation to committees. I believe the joint committee did not go as far as it could have in the recommendations because of strong exceptions taken from time to time by the parliamentary secretary.

I submit, honourable colleagues, that special committees are useful. They allow members of Parliament to study particulars in great depth and make recommendations to the Senate and House of Commons on issues of policy. However, their usefulness is limited if they are constrained in their recommendations by the presence of government. I submit that the government, when considering the membership on special committees, seriously reconsider its position with respect to the presence of the parliamentary secretary.

Honourable senators, I make these remarks not to be critical of that distinguished sailor, but rather so that committees can feel free and feel that they are acting in the best interests of all concerned.

In the words of a very distinguished Nova Scotian, Robert Stanfield, on his Christmas card to me this morning, he said, "May I wish all of you and all Canadians a better 1995 and pray God that we all deserve it."

CONSIDERATION OF INTERIM REPORT OF AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry entitled: "New Realities and Rough Choices: From Agriculture to Agri-Food," tabled in the Senate on December 13, 1994. — (Honourable Senator Hays)

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, in speaking to the report which was tabled in the Senate yesterday and in the House of Commons, my first remark must be to Senator Orville Phillips. I notice an error in the report where we have designated Senator Phillips as "P. Michael Phillips" rather than by his correct name, Orville. This error was drawn to my attention by several people. I regret any consternation Senator Phillips may have experienced as a result of this error. I will see that it is corrected.

The other observation I would make is that this is a study which arose pursuant to a study by both the Senate and the House of Commons Agriculture Committees. I will refer to them by that short name.

Accordingly, we see in the interim report of the committee, which was tabled, the request for government response signed by Mr. Speller, the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee. This has also been drawn to my attention. It is part of the text because we, together, have approved exactly the same report after a vote of all parties who participated, including the opposition party here, the Official Opposition party in the other place, as well as the other recognized party in the other place.

The title of the report tells the story: "New Realities and Rough Choices...." This is a time of great difficulty in the agricultural sector. The purpose of the two committees' study to this point, and into the future, we hope, is to seek input on a long-term strategy to take the agri-food industry into the next century.

The term, "agri-food," I know, grates on Senator Spivak's ears. This is not about poetry but, for some reason, we have chosen this generic term to describe a most important industry. I know Senator Spivak regrets that we have not come up with a better term.

Long-term decisions are often influenced by short-term priorities. The committees felt it was important to give the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food some direction before the presentation of the 1995 federal budget. To do that, it was important that the interim report be tabled this month. We have achieved that end.

We note that agriculture is undergoing great changes at the present time. Agreements such as the Uruguay Round of the GATT, or its successor the World Trade Organization, and the North American Free Trade Agreement, have established new rules of the game for agricultural trade. In the past, agriculture policies were often, indeed usually, proposed in response to emergency situations but were maintained, with some changes, when the emergencies had passed.

There is a good description of the environment of policy developments set out in the report going back to the beginning of the century through the Depression, including the responses which have followed crises. We are in a sort of crisis now with our budgetary constraints and yet, in the world today, in excess of $300 billion is spent every year to subsidize the primary agriculture commodities. As one can imagine, that has had an enormous effect on international prices.

In any event, crisis policy development has been the order of the day. It has led to not only ever-greater government intervention but also to a set of policies which were not always well coordinated. It is increasingly important that there be consistency of approach throughout the agri-food chain if Canada is to compete internationally under the new trade rules.

In recent months, the committee listened to the views of farm organizations, academics, food processors and distributors on the agri-food industry and how the government can best help achieve their goals. We had some 21 hearing days. We heard more than one witness on some of those days and have, to date, heard from more than 30 witnesses.

The primary sector of agriculture accounted for 2.1 per cent of Canada's gross domestic product in 1993. The entire agri-food sector accounted for 8 per cent. This represents a significant contribution to the gross domestic product of the country and of all provinces individually, although the importance of agriculture does vary from province to province.

The Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food absorbs 1.4 per cent of the total federal budget, and its budget, both in terms of transfer payments and operating expenditures, has followed a downward trend since 1991-1992. Direct payments received by farmers totalled a net $2.2 billion in 1993, which is a 30-per-cent reduction from the year before.

The federal expenditure for farm income safety net programs has fallen in recent years to an estimated $800 million in 1994-95, versus $2 billion as recently as 1991-92. Furthermore, primary producers have experienced declines in expenditures under the Western Grain Transportation Act. The value has decreased from about $725 million in 1990-91 to an expected $560 million in 1994-95, a drop of 23 per cent. If what we hear is correct, in the process, the ministers responsible will change the method of payment under the Western Grain Transportation Act from the railways to some form of payment to the producer.

The point is that this has been a declining amount paid under that historic payment to the west. The last two budgets saw a decline of 23 per cent, and we fully expect to see a further decline. The recommendations of the report are for no further cuts in agriculture research and development and a freeze in safety net payments. This report comes at a time when there has been a dramatic decline in public dollars spent in the agriculture sector.

Once the new GATT-World Trade Organization agreement is ratified, the aggregate measure of support is to be reduced by 20 per cent from the base period of 1986-88. Canada's aggregate measure of support was estimated at $5.36 billion in 1986-88. In 1993, the number was $3.3 billion, which is a reduction of 38.6 per cent. This is 18 per cent more than the minimum reduction required under the GATT.

There is ample room, then, to do nothing if we choose. We are not obliged under that international agreement to take aggressive steps to reduce in that area. We have already done it. Undoubtedly, we will continue to do it. It is in that context that we must look at the revision of programs and the cutting process that the Minister of Finance is going through at the present time with the department.

On the issue of research and development, the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food presented to the committee and to the agricultural constituency a vision statement, "Future Directions for Canadian Agriculture and Agri-food." As a part of that, the committee and the minister feel it is very important to achieve a target of $20 billion in exports of agricultural goods by the year 2000 and, to the greatest degree possible, further-processed goods or value-added goods.

It is essential that certain areas of agriculture crucial to its long-term viability and its contribution to the gross national product, not be compromised. We were told that research and development is absolutely essential to our success in that area.

The report deals with imaginative new ways in which we are carrying that out as a joint exercise with the private sector, and with other public sector institutions such as universities and provincial governments.

In June, 1987, the then subcommittee of the National Liberal Task Force on Agriculture, Research and Development, which I had the pleasure to co-chair along with Dr. Morris Foster, visited most of the research and development facilities of Agriculture Canada. In their report, the subcommittee said that the extension of agricultural technology, as well as determining the research and development needs of the agriculture community, is extremely important.

The subcommittee also said:

> It is important to note that long term budgeting plays an important role in the dynamics of research and development. Once turned off, scientific research is not something which can be quickly turned on.

It is an area of initiative, public and private, that requires continuity, and it is extremely important that we observe that now at this time of budgetary crisis, and that we somehow continue to carry out this important support for Canadian agriculture.

Another important area is food standards. The agri-food industry is moving to take over many responsibilities for marketing a quality product. Nevertheless, federal food standards continue to ensure both a safe food supply and a quality that helps maintain our competitive edge in both our own markets and export markets. Health and safety of food must not be compromised in any funding cutbacks. More than ever, innovation, entrepreneurship, good market intelligence and information are a prerequisite. Government can play a useful role in supplying the information needed to fill niche markets.

Agriculture is a way of life, but it is also a business which must increasingly face the same challenges as other commercial sectors in Canada, except that farmers must face an additional, powerful and unpredictable challenge: the weather.

Market globalization also presents another major challenge to Canadian producers, since they are often caught in the crossfire of agricultural subsidies by the United States and the European Community.

Some witnesses told the committee that current budget restrictions might be perceived as an opportunity to restructure farm income assistance programs. However, that must not be used as a pretext to ignore the basic need of farmers to stabilize their income, given the uncertainty generated by the weather and the sometimes artificial fluctuations of international markets.

When world prices are high, and when there have been no natural disasters, such as a drought, in a long time, people tend to forget that such things can happen at any time. Moreover, as long as Canada's trading partners keep subsidizing their agricultural sectors, it will be essential to maintain reliable and predictable farm income assistance programs so that our farmers can compete in world markets. Budgets may be smaller, but it is always possible to do more with less.

[English]

In the area of rural development, Canada has witnessed increased urbanization over time, which has had implications for the proportion of agricultural land in agricultural production and for rural communities. The decline in the number of agricultural producers has had negative implications for rural infrastructure, with the closure of hospitals, schools, stores and other services. As well, many farmers feel that urban Canadians fail to understand agriculture, its pressures and the rural way of life

In addition to the important role that is played by a healthy agricultural community in contributing to rural development, value-added activities are critical. Some of these initiatives may be related to agricultural products, while others may not, such as small business and tourism. Certainly, government policies and programs must facilitate, rather than inhibit, the development of value-added enterprise. Rural communities and value-added activities also have a role to play in creating the employment opportunities that are so important for the many farm families who need off-farm income in order to live. In sum, the preservation of rural communities is in the best interests of, and is extremely important to, all Canadians.

To conclude, I will quickly go through the eight recommendations that were made by the committee. The speech that I have given is an elaboration on those recommendations, together with the text of the report, which is some 21 pages.

The recommendations are that the Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food retain prime responsibility for agri-food research and development. We heard from some witnesses that this is in response to the concern that there may be some rationalizing of R&D in a way that would leave agricultural R&D isolated, or in a place where it would not be sensitive to the needs of the sector.

The committee recommends that in view of R&D's critical role in achieving the agri-food sector's goals of increased competitiveness and continued viability, funding for Agriculture and Agri-Food Canada's R&D program be maintained at current levels. Undoubtedly, more can be done with the money that is being spent, or it can be rationalized in a better way. That is not an indication that everything is in order, but rather an indication that that level of support is needed.

The committee recommends that the Department of Agriculture and Agri-Food give priority to R&D programs that encourage proactive partnerships between industry, governments and universities in carrying out R&D that meets the needs of end-users.

The committee recommends that, given that food safety and quality must not be compromised, Agriculture and Agri-Food Canada should continue to be responsible for their regulation with respect to the public good, notwithstanding any budgetary reduction the department may face. In that area, about 13 per cent of current spending goes to R&D and about 13 per cent to the inspection service. These are areas where cuts must be watched very carefully.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret to interrupt you, Senator Hays, but your time is up.

Senator Hays: If I might have leave, honourable senators, I will not be more than three or four minutes.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hays: The fifth recommendation of the committee is that Agriculture and Agri-food Canada pursue more aggressively "one-window" access and other innovations designed to integrate market information and market intelligence, and to expedite their delivery. That is an extremely important initiative on which almost everyone agrees. If we are to go through the revolution that we anticipate in the agricultural sector, we need the best possible market and other information, including weather, that we can possibly have. Government has a role to play in helping disseminate that information and getting those signals out.

The sixth recommendation, now that Canada has met its World Trade Organization commitments in terms of domestic subsidy reduction, is with regard to the option we have of freezing until the end of the century our current income protection programs. It is important that we have continuity there. If we stop the evolution of the programs, we send the wrong signal to farmers.

Farmers must participate in their own well-being. Government will help them. However, too often what has happened is that when we face a crisis, our hearts go out to the farm community, and we do something about it, only to say afterwards, "Next time you must be a participant yourself." Let us not lose sight of the fact that we have done that over and over again, and we must now send a strong signal to the agriculture sector that, if they want help, they must themselves be responsible for the biggest part of that help and participate in these programs.

Recognizing the linkages between the agri-food sector and rural development is the seventh recommendation. The committee recommends that the federal government assess agri-food policies and measures that inhibit the value-added processing and other development activities that contribute to the viability of rural communities. It is very important that we recognize the importance of those in supporting rural life.

Finally, the committee recommends that the government ensure that future federal agri-food policies and programs encourage primary producers and processors to make decisions that contribute to environmental sustainability. Specifically, the government should be required to undertake an environmental impact study of any major agricultural food policy or program change. That is obviously important in that if we have policies that encourage bad practices — and summer fallow might be one of those — then that is something that comes at a very high cost in terms of supporting an activity that is bad for the environment, plus the loss of soil or environmental degradation.

Honourable senators, those are my comments on the report. I thank other honourable senators who participated actively in the hearings, and there are many of them, particularly the Deputy Chairman, Senator Gustafson. We look forward to continuing our work in the new year and producing a large, final report in the spring.

• (1530)

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Would the Honourable Senator Hays permit a question?

Senator Hays: Of course.

Senator Robertson: As the honourable senator knows, I am not a member of his committee. However, from listening to his remarks with interest, I believe I understood him to say at one point that there was some opinion which would recommend that the subsidies from grain transport be transferred to the farmer. Could the honourable senator explain that, please? Who is pushing for such a position?

Senator Hays: I am referring to recent comments made by the Minister of Agriculture. One of the numerous study groups which is active at the present time is looking into this matter on behalf of the minister with a view to making a recommendation. Pursuant to consultations, the minister has undertaken to render a decision on that matter early in 1995.

As the honourable senator knows, the WGTA is something which started in 1897 or thereabouts. It is referred to in the report. It has evolved to where it now provides a quantified amount as opposed to statutory rates that are paid to the railways to help move qualifying commodities to tidewater.

There have been innumerable studies on how to change that provision and to make a more successful support program in terms of value-added, et cetera. My reference is to the minister's statement that we will see a change in that next year.

Senator Robertson: I thank the honourable senator for his comments.

The Atlantic Canada freight rate subsidy is being phased out this year. There is a significant historical pattern in Canada relating to that subsidy. I shall be interested in seeing the relativity that develops between the two patterns.

Senator Hays: As will I, honourable senators.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I was impressed by the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. In view of the important effects on health which are due to the products manufactured by the food processing industry, did the committee, chaired by the honourable senator, study the area of processed foods?

Senator Hays: In a couple of ways we did, yes, honourable senators. In 1993-94 we spent in the order of $290 million on inspection and regulation. It is extremely important that we not compromise food quality or safety. The committee was told by witnesses that this is important. Accordingly, we recommended that we not make any cuts that would put us at risk in this area.

We also heard a lot about the subject in terms of further processing of primary agricultural products being a means of enhancing our export opportunities. We have numerous food laboratories in Canada. We have a number of initiatives under way in the area. If we want to achieve $20 billion in exports by the year 2000, which is roughly a doubling of our exports, then we will have to do it in that area. Holland and the United States have been most successful in this area. We would like to copy that success.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask Senator Hays a question on the budget. The total amount is $144,000 and a bit. Our share is that which is marked with an asterisk in the full report, coming to $22,000?

Senator Hays: I do not have the exact number. However, by way of general comment, the agreement is that the Senate would cover half the cost of interpretation and so on; that is, the hard costs of the study outside of Ottawa, and that each of the committees would look after their own transportation costs. In the House of Commons, the committee has received subcommittee approval for their budget. They are in the process of receiving the necessary approval from the House. We are committing here that the Agriculture Committee will pay for travel out of its budget. There is a difference between the two.

I do not know whether I have answered your question, Senator Lynch-Staunton.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In the explanation of the cost elements, it says that items with an asterisk are the Senate's share, and my totalling of those items brings a result of $22,300. Is it correct that our share of this budget is limited to those items which have an asterisk, which are seven in number and total $22,300?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I hope it will be noted somewhere that we should not be called on to pay a greater share.

Senator Hays: I am not sure where we will put that note, but with the help of my clerk, I will find a way to do that. It is on the record in the chamber here.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I have a few comments to make on this report. It was a great privilege to sit on the two committees which met jointly. I must say I learned a great deal from my colleagues Senator Hays and Senator Gustafson which supplemented my early experiences on the farm in the Interlake in Manitoba.

As a document that reflects the range of concerns presented to committee members during our many hours of hearings, I think this report could more aptly be dubbed a preliminary report rather than an interim one. It does present, as Senator Hays has pointed out, several significant conclusions which, in fact, are good starting points or first principles. Those include, of course, that Canada must maintain an acceptable level of food self-sufficiency, that Canada can benefit in the emerging environment of liberalized trade with the right domestic policies, and that Canada must not lose sight of the primacy of our primary producers. In the words of the report, we must not disarm them as we change the rules. I find it a little difficult to adjust to the language, as Senator Hays points out, which is the language of the corporate world and no longer the language of the family farm. The world has changed.

These are sound principles. They are important to Canada's food producers, including those in my home province of Manitoba. They are important to food processors, those who work in the transportation industries, food distributors, retailers, those who live in rural communities, and ultimately to all Canadians who, as consumers, enjoy one of the world's lowest rates of food expenditures as a percentage of their family budgets.

I am pleased that the committee makes the further admission that we are not yet in a position to propose a long-term strategy for Canada's agri-food industry. We have not heard yet from people elsewhere in Canada who have not had the opportunity to appear before us in Ottawa. We need that input, and I certainly hope that the committees will, as stated, undertake the travel slated for the new year and listen to Western Canadians and Canadians all over Canada.

This report has been cast as a pre-budget document, a message to the government that it would be unwise to reduce federal support for agriculture and agri-food in several crucial areas.

Included in its eight recommendations, as Senator Hays has read them, are two clear, pre-budget suggestions: maintain the current level of spending on farm income protection until the end of the century, and hold the line on funding for research and development. These are not modest proposals, and they are essential.

As Statistics Canada data shows us, without income protection and other payments and rebates from Ottawa and the provinces to farmers, farmers across Canada were in the red three years out of the last seven. In Manitoba, government subsidies were the only reason that farmers did not suffer a net loss in five years out of those seven.

Honourable senators, as the interim report rightly notes, as a result of the GATT we are entering a period of adaptation, but more than 50 years of income protection programs cannot and should not be changed quickly.

We also need to invest in basic research. We must take the long-range perspective. For example, the $9-billion canola industry would not have developed without the government's investment in basic research. That is an important point because the trend now is to look at research which quickly benefits the industry, but that is not always the case.

The committees are essentially telling government to hold the line. They are not advancing any of the specific economic instruments proposed by such groups as the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities or the National Farmers' Union. The SARM, in an excellent brief, offered several specific suggestions which I hope the Minister of Finance will consider. Included in those suggestions were: the creation of the agriculture equity fund to encourage investment in agriculture, the allowance of RRSP funds for the purchase of farm land, and the creation of loan or business programs directed at farm women. Those are clearly missing.

The NFU warned that, without a safety net, hog producers are particularly vulnerable. It clearly called for one. If the Finance Department is in search of ideas to ensure that Canadian agriculture and agri-food industries contribute to the GDP in the long term, officials will have to go beyond the committee's report. However, that would naturally be done because this is just a preliminary report.

Honourable senators, there are two other matters that I believe deserve more attention than the report reflects. The first concerns the wealth of factual information laid out by former MP Ralph Ferguson. He was a Minister of Agriculture, not just a member of Parliament. His three-year study clearly showed that farmers are not getting a fair share of the consumer's food dollar. They suffered input costs that rose 16.5 per cent in the last decade, while farm product prices, overall, stayed steady. While this was happening, consumer prices for products, particularly those not controlled by marketing boards, increased as much as 235 per cent.

In the latter part of the decade, food manufacturers averaged a rate of return on assets of close to 17 per cent. Distributors did slightly better. The toiling producer, the farmer, had a rate of return of just over 6 per cent before being paid for his or her labour. No one could reasonably call this a fair share.

I remember the days when I was on the school board. We had negotiations with teachers and settled for a 13-per-cent increase at a time when farm income had gone down by one third. It was a phenomenal gap.

Honourable senators, the picture that emerges through this three-year study is one of increasing market share concentration by a handful of distributors, higher farm input costs, and international pressure to take away from the farmer the marketing board supply management tools that can give him or her a measure of resistance against the squeeze from both directions. We are told that farm input costs in Canada range as much as 25 per cent higher than those in the U.S. A good part of the reason, according to others, is tougher anti-trust laws south of the border. We are told that Canada's food distribution network is more concentrated than in the U.S., due in no small part to Canada's weaker anti-trust legislation. Those observations should not be forgotten as we wrestle with changes to marketing boards and agencies that have traditionally served us, and served us well.

Finally, honourable senators, while the committee's report supports environmentally sustainable agriculture, its suggestion is a call for environmental impact studies of agri-food policy or program change. At best, that is a good start. We know that our European counterparts are more progressive in this area. We know that the task force appointed by the Finance Minister and by the Environment Minister to assess economic instruments and disincentives to sound environmental practices barely touched on the field of agriculture. There is work to be done here, and I hope the committees will not ignore it.

I do not believe that the task force report has been tabled yet in either house. It is to be hoped that we will receive it shortly. I have seen a copy of it. There is much work to be done.

As the Worldwatch Institute warns us, worldwide the trend in per capita food production is on the decline. In grains alone, per capita production has decreased steadily since 1984. Carryover stocks are far below the 100 days recorded mid to late last decade. In fact, carryover stocks are now approaching the record low levels of 1973 that led to a doubling of world grain prices.

As a resource-rich, food-producing nation, Canada has an opportunity and an obligation to hold to the principles of self-sufficiency — which is very important — and defence of the primary producer, the farmer, and to take part in a liberalized trade environment in a way that will allow us to feed ourselves and many others around the world.

Honourable senators, as Senator Hays has said, we cannot afford to merely tinker with the future of agriculture.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this order will stand in the name of Senator Hays until the next sitting?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Hays, debate adjourned.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations (Illegal dispensations), tabled in the Senate on Thursday, December 1, 1994. — (Honourable Senator Lewis).

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I am pleased to finally have the opportunity to say a few words respecting the second report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations which I tabled on December 1.

As you will see from the report, honourable senators, the joint committee has adopted this report in an effort to obtain from government a comprehensive response to an earlier report of the committee. As mentioned in the second report on June 3, 1993, the ninth report of our committee was tabled in both Houses. In accordance with the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, the committee requested that a comprehensive government response to that report be tabled in the House of Commons. That request was not complied with prior to the dissolution of the last Parliament. As a result of that dissolution, the request lapsed.

In order to obtain the response to its ninth report, the committee has readopted that report and appended it to the second report with a request that the government provide a response to that appendix.

The ninth report of the standing joint committee dealt with an issue of principle that has important constitutional ramifications and which should be of great concern to all legislators. In a nutshell, the issue is whether or not the executive has the constitutional authority to exempt individuals from the regular application of the law without express authority having been granted by Parliament. The practice of granting exemptions from the application of subordinate laws was denounced by the joint committee in 1977, when it was co-chaired by the late Senator Eugene Forsey, as being "both illegal and subversive of constitutional government."

Honourable senators, the adoption of the ninth report was prompted by the apparent resurgence of the claim that the executive has the power to dispense with the law in favour of individuals, even when that power has not been granted by Parliament.

In its ninth report, the joint committee firmly condemns the practice that is a denial of the rule of law, and that challenges the legislative supremacy of Parliament. It is profoundly disturbing that a claim that was expressly declared to be unlawful by the 1689 Bill of Rights, an enactment that forms part of the Constitution of Canada, would be revived some 300 years later.

The ninth report gives two examples of the practice objected to by the joint committee. The second of these is known as the "Kemano Completion Project Guidelines Order," which purported to exempt one particular project from the application of the regulations that would otherwise have applied to that project.

According to the joint committee, the adoption of this order, and that of a now revoked amendment to the income tax regulations giving a minister the authority to exempt individual taxpayers from predescribed reporting requirements, reflects the same unfounded assumption that a regulation-making authority empowered to establish binding rules of conduct may, without further authorization from Parliament, declare those rules to be inapplicable to named individuals or in one particular set of circumstances.

In its ninth report, the joint committee stressed the dangerous consequences for our system of government of accepting the theory that has been put forward by government to justify the enactment of the regulations reported upon, and points out that a society in which those who govern have an unfettered discretion to decide when and to whom a law applies, or the discretionary power to enact a law for one citizen and a different one for his neighbour, is one in which arbitrary government soon replaces government according to law.

Members of the committee do not believe that Canadians wish to be governed on the basis of administrative discretion. On the contrary, Canadians expect, and have a right, to be governed by laws that apply equally to all, the administration of which is subject to the supervision of the courts.

Honourable senators, it would be difficult to overstate the importance of the issue dealt with in this report of the joint committee. The executive's claim, if allowed to stand unchallenged, would seriously undermine constitutional rules which have been in place for centuries, and which have served to protect the rights and liberties of Canadians.

If honourable senators have not already done so, I would urge them to read the ninth report of this committee. I think you will find it very interesting.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Lewis, I wish to ask you a question which applies to all other joint committees. It arises from Senator MacEachen's point of order made the other day, which obviously is not debatable since it is under advisement. However, it has made me more attentive to reports of joint committees.

Your request is that the government reply, which is made on behalf of both houses, be tabled in the House of Commons but not in the Senate. You quote Standing Order No. 109 of the House of Commons, and there is also another reference to tabling in the House of Commons only. I am asking you the question, but perhaps it should be directed to the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders.

A briefing note prepared by the Table Research Branch of the House of Commons says that joint committees follow the rules of procedure of the House of Commons, although this is nowhere specified in a rule or standing order. Item 7 in this report says that it is critical to stress that joint committees rely on practice, and that there are no written rules or standing orders that provide guidance in instances such as these, but that by convention the rules and practice of the House of Commons normally apply.

I do not believe that has caused any problem, but Senator MacEachen did raise a point with regard to the physical presentation of a particular report of a joint committee. We know what the ruling was of the Speaker in the other place, and we are concerned as to whether we are bound by that.

Perhaps the time has now come to look into what rules should apply to joint committees, in order that both Houses be treated more fairly than we were in this particular instance.

Senator Lewis: Senator Lynch-Staunton, that was an interesting point raised by Senator MacEachen. There seems to be a lack of any rules dealing with reports of joint committees. I am not familiar with the rules of the House of Commons, but the report is being tabled in this way because they do have rules there, and I think the rule specifies that the government should table a reply.

We do not have that type of rule here. However, it seems, as Senator MacEachen said, that it is time we did have something to deal specifically with how we report joint committee recommendations, and how we proceed from there. That is something for the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders to consider.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We would need an order of reference to instruct the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders to look into the matter, in order to avoid problems such as that which Senator MacEachen raised.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: If no other senator wishes to speak, this matter is considered debated.

Debate concluded.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave, I ask that a correction be made which arises out of my speaking to the wrong order. Yesterday, I tabled two reports, the fourth and fifth reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. The speech which I gave should have been given under Order No. 3 on Orders of the Day, Order No. 3 being the fourth report. I mixed them up and gave the speech under Order No. 4, which is actually the committee's fifth report.

In that I have an outstanding question on the fifth report from Senator Lynch-Staunton, I shall ask for leave that that remain on the Order Paper so that I can give him the appropriate response tomorrow. I was given permission to do that, but under the wrong order.

It may be appropriate to leave the other matter open as well, under my name, in the event that there are other senators wishing to speak. At one time Senator Gustafson expressed an interest in speaking.

With leave, I make that correction.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON POPULATION AND DEVELOPMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the officially adopted text of the International Conference on Population and Development (ICPD), held in Cairo, Egypt, from September 5 to 14, 1994.—(Senator Haidasz, P.C.)

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, with thanks to our colleagues who were present here yesterday, I rise again today, for the third successive time, to deliver the third and final part of my speech on my inquiry on the official report of the United Nations third International Conference on Population and Development.

To a great extent, the stillbirth of some of the good intentions brought by nations to Cairo resulted from a process which was too closed and even stultified in preparation. Where that process may have lacked openness was counterproductive. Canada went forth to build bridges without reservation, but unfortunately the briefings of our own delegates were pitifully late, and we did not know Canada's detailed position until a day or two before our departure for Cairo. Canada's position turned out to be last year's policy proposed by CIDA, with no opportunity for debate in Parliament or discussion in any committee, as there was in other countries.

I therefore recommend that, in preparation for the March 1995 World Summit on Social Development in Copenhagen, and in preparation for the 1995 Beijing women's conference, a greater degree of openness be fostered. Certainly, women's and other human rights only stand to gain from openness. Furthermore, rather than denying women the very fairness they rightly seek in public debate, both participatory democracy and parliamentary democracy would be served by more openness.

Notwithstanding the out-of-character suggestion of withholding debt reduction that remains in the program of action, and the abhorrent financial aid inducements blatantly suggested by some United States of America spokespersons in Cairo, the inalienable right of a couple to adjust their fecundity without coercion was finally endorsed in the Cairo document. The central place of the family, predicated on the word "couple" because of the necessary union of two opposite sexes for procreation and the survival of the human race, also requires sexual responsibility on an equitable basis. This barely gains mention in the text of the conference report, and much less ink than is deserved is given to modern proven methods centering on fertility awareness which enjoined the interest and responsible involvement of the male partner in particular.

It is worthy of note that in Montreal, shortly after we returned from Egypt, UNI-PATH, an inexpensive hormone indicator developed in Britain for easy detection of ovulation onset and cessation, was heralded at the International Convention of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. At that convention, several obstetricians declared this hormone to be the most significant outcome of their international conventions in many a year.

Education promoting abstinence and fidelity for the combat both of promiscuity and sexually transmitted diseases also received endorsement in the Cairo conference report. For the stated aims of access, healthiness and religious freedom, this endorsement deserves the strongest possible emphasis, as it is overlooked in our own country's health promotion policy.

Honourable senators, in this inquiry, I would encourage a search for programs in Canada, such as SERENA and Teen Aid education projects, which meet these objectives. This conference roundly called for fertility information and education to be imparted to women as well as to men. A fine example of a setting in which fertility awareness methods are readily imparted is that of the new Care Centre for Women recently founded in St. John's, Newfoundland. I recommend to our government the mission statement of this establishment in St. John's, which serves as a model for all women's health services.

The failure to inform women with respect to fertility stands to frustrate the hopes of even those who would increase development aid to advance the practice of birth spacing, the best hope for stabilizing growth rates with regeneration of resources. The high financial and personal costs of documented ill-health, undesired infertility, or the unreliability of such methods to adjust to one's fecundity, with a tantamount escalation in abortion worldwide, is very high. Some delegates in Cairo were shocked to hear from the World Bank's 1993 World Development Report that abortion alone exerts two-thirds of the total drag on national economic productivity.

Honourable senators, one of the most pervasive myths, that to control or prevent teenage pregnancy one must throw ever-increasing amounts of contraception at individuals, was actively promoted in Cairo by one of the oversized world NGOs. A touted 10-year-old Ontario study of teenage pregnancies, debunked several times over, was cherished by this non-governmental organization in that it makes the claim that teenage pregnancies decreased with increasing prevalence of contraceptive acceptance. Just the reverse happened, masked by two facts: This study counted births without adding an increasing rate of clinic abortions, or a correction for the ill-kept statistics of so-called therapeutic abortions in our hospitals.

Second, in recent years, the percentage of young Canadian women of childbearing years has been decreasing in our country, with a current tally of 1 million fewer women than males under the age of 25. This may have resulted from extensive use of low-dosage abortifacient contraception by a whole generation of women. At any rate, during the time period studied, and increasingly since, teenage pregnancy rates have increased with the usage of contraception. It was recently observed in England that of teenage pregnancies — which are increasing in that country as well — fully one half of young mothers are known to be using contraception. Yet the clearly erroneous Orton-Rosenblatt report by McMaster University extension students done in 1984 is still cited to this very day by its sponsors, Planned Parenthood.

Like all delegates prevailing at Cairo, including the Holy See, I have always endorsed the true empowerment of women. I have not only a wife but three daughters and five granddaughters, and I am pretty well aware of their situation. Natural fertility awareness attains that goal, but its wisdom flies in the face of those who have influenced non-governmental organizations and even federal government departments, whose tenet is that empowerment of women is an empowerment to be infertile. In my medical experience, honourable senators, most women do not agree that that is a position either of equity or respect for womanhood. It certainly offers them no defence against exploitation, and it is not borne out by apocalyptic rates of abortion, breast cancer, sexually transmitted diseases and other diseases, as I mentioned in my address to the World Day Parliamentarians in the Assembly of Egypt.

Honourable senators, if feminism means the empowerment of women to be infertile, then the author of feminism is no friend of woman.

At least it can be said that in Cairo the enhanced fertility awareness intrinsic to natural birth spacing was recognized for its efficiency in propagating peer-to-peer and down generational lines. Besides these benefits, it involves very little cost. It is an easy method, an effective educational strategy, and virtually no follow-up is necessary.

Honourable senators, the draft text of the conference report in Cairo unfortunately lacked mention of UNI-PATH, the hormone I mentioned a few moments ago, or any of the other proven and readily-learned fertility indicators, including the method developed by the Australian couple, Dr. and Mrs. Billings, which is being increasingly well-received in China. However, the Chinese delegation did wish to discontinue Draconian and violent methods to curb urbanization, strenuously proposing terms against any hint of coercion to stabilize population growth. This fact was a big surprise to many delegations.

In Cairo, honourable senators, promotion was urged for on-demand breast feeding culturally on a wider scale, since this commonly acts hormonally to prolong natural infertility. One can little gainsay the benefits of breast feeding. The World Health Organization endorses it for the attainment of good infant health and increased mindfulness of good maternity dietary habits.

Maternal health and sexual health certainly became a major focus for Cairo. The World Bank's 1993 World Development Report registered that in 1990, of a total of 431,000 maternal deaths in the world, some 61,000 were attributed to abortion. Of the largest group of 130,000 fatal hemorrhages, a number may also have arisen in connection with abortion. Hence, we learnt that there was a very large risk attending the practice of pre-abortion.

But aside from the turnabout on the subject, which rightfully obtained for this ICPD the nickname of "the abortion conference," there were several other challenges which the final program of action sets before all its signatories. The view of women's fertility and pregnancy as disorders was not to be countenanced by anybody. For the first time in a United Nations conference since the Geneva Convention, women were openly spoken of as the victims of exploitation that they are. Indeed, Chapter V of this report went beyond early plans for the agenda being set for the Beijing conference on women next year.

Unfortunately, Canada has exported, at taxpayer's expense, technical skill and even untested technology, for instance, to develop a so-called "vaccine against pregnancy" which IDRC claims to be funding. This was apparently started by way of a CIDA grant at the inception of a project in India several years ago. This view of pregnancy as disease does not lie well with fundamental human rights such as the universal declaration in Geneva that everyone is to be born free and equal in dignity.

It is also coming to light that hundreds of thousands of women who have been implanted with Norplants will soon suffer increased rates of life-threatening ectopic pregnancy. Furthermore, the World Health Organization does not know how to go about checking up on the health of these women who have been implanted. It cannot afford to, nor can it afford not to, locate and remove aging Norplant inserts. Such is the fruit of regarding fertility as a disease; another is the correlation of artificial steroid estrogens in the birth control pill with eventual breast cancer, which I also described in my speech in Cairo.

In 1993, the World Bank published a unique indicator of needed development. It is the so-called "DALY Index," "DALY" meaning Disability Adjusted Lost Years of Life. This carefully constructed measure provides a macro-economic indication of long-term illness and lost productive years due to premature death. It is a measure of the economic burden of disease. Applied to every geographic region in the world, the loss of productive years was especially profound where fecundity itself was in decline, or if momentarily increasing, doing so in a struggle to offset mortality and downturned productivity. As the renowned French demographer Mr. Hervé le Bras notes in his recent book Les limites de la planète, it is curious that commentators should view as negative these precursors to rebounding well-being: fecundity and longevity.

The Hon. the Speaker: I regret having to stop the honourable senator at this time, but his time has expired.

Senator Haidasz: With your permission, if I could have another five minutes, I could conclude my inquiry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: Perhaps this is the final contradiction which the draft text of the conference, inherited by delegations in their congress at Cairo, went little distance to dispel. What economists know everywhere, if not stated by those who, as Hervé le Bras suggests, want to control other's fertility, is that natural growth is the engine of development. Without it, Mexico would not have had bargaining chips at the NAFTA table, any more than did Japan or Hong Kong after the declining hegemony of Britain yesterday, nor does Singapore and Guangdong today in the wake of communism in decline in China.

What so many eloquent delegates to Cairo agreed is needed is a promise of rationalizing growth, productivity and consumption patterns by wise infrastructure development throughout the world. As to dilatating policies or, what adds insult to injury, fertility regulation, there is abundant evidence that these have been the cause of economic anaemia, of even the pernicious type, in the former communist countries of Eurasia and arguably, even in Canada and Britain.

In its deference to national sovereignties, the Cairo Programme of Action could not require immediate rescission of legislation which has legalized abortion in some countries, but it strongly adverted to requirements of safety, as well as to full information as to consequences and alternatives which all agreed should militate against this practice. The Cairo conference impressed on all the necessity of upholding the dignity and well-being of women, something exploitation of abortion cannot do.

Honourable senators, I hasten to add that the World Bank 1993 World Development Report summed up all of the worldwide losses to productive life for 1990 as equivalent to the death of 42 million infants, or fewer if a newborn is attributed some value. There are estimated to be over 55 million abortions in the world annually.

In conclusion, to those of us who went to Cairo in 1994, those who wanted to shun openness sought to cover their crimes against humanity by making abortion a right. Therefore, it is scarcely possible for me to express adequately my relief that, at this conference in Cairo, the agenda of abortionism really was shamed.

As I mentioned in my speech earlier, we are facing three world conferences on these issues next year. I hope that interested honourable senators will pay attention to the times that they will be held, and will seek to determine what will be on the agenda of these conferences, and be prepared so that we can openly discuss the agenda of those conferences in Parliament, as is done in many other countries of the world.

POWERS OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES

PAPER REFERRED TO STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion that a paper dealing with the powers of parliamentary committees, prepared by Diane Davidson, General Legal Counsel to the House of Commons, dated November 16, 1994 and tabled with the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations on November 17, 1994, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Neiman, I move that this paper be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study.

TRANSPORT

Hon. Pat Carney rose, pursuant to notice of December 1, 1994:

That she would call the attention of the Senate to the findings of the Ad Hoc Parliamentary Committee on Lightstations, which travelled to British Columbia from November 21 to November 25, 1994, to hear the testimony of witnesses in four centres of British Columbia.

She said: I should like to speak to my inquiry this afternoon and table the interim report of the Ad Hoc Parliamentary Committee on Lightstations which travelled to four centres of British Columbia from November 21 to 25, 1994.

The report is in the form of a letter to the Minister of Transport, Doug Young, and colleagues might like to know we already have a preliminary answer to the report.

Dear Minister:

Re: Destaffing B.C. Lightstations: Interim Report.

We are writing to advise you of the work of the Ad Hoc Parliamentary Committee on Lightstations which met with coastal British Columbians during the week of November 21 to 25, 1994 to discuss your department's plans to destaff the B.C. lightstations under the Lightstations Services Project.

Our committee is comprised of two Conservative senators and three B.C. Reform MPs. We heard from 67 presenters, representing hundreds of thousands of British Columbians, during afternoon and evening hearings in Richmond, Sidney, Campbell River and Nanaimo. In addition, petitions signed by more than 15,000 concerned British Columbians expressing opposition to destaffing were tabled during our hearings.

These 67 presenters are in addition to many other opponents of destaffing who have written to us, including both the provincial government NDP caucus and the Liberal opposition caucus, six provincial cabinet ministers...

Who have coastal ridings.

...the union of B.C. municipalities, villages, towns, districts and band councils along the coast.

Angry aviators, fishers, marine pilots, boaters, kayakers, union officials and residents of coastal communities appeared before the committee to express their hostility to destaffing in the interests of maritime and aviation safety. They came off their fishing boats, their tugs and their floatplanes "looking for blood," in the words of one aviator. One young man sang his brief in the beautiful museum at Campbell River. The mayor and a community nurse drove over from the west coast community of Gold River.

In contrast to your statement to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on June 22, 1994 that 'there is nothing particularly unusual about the marine realities of that coast', all presenters spoke of the uniqueness of the area; its isolated, scattered settlements; the lack of road access to 27,000 kilometres of coast line (unlike the U.S. coast line); the sudden climatic changes and fog pockets in the coastal fiords; the savage storms and seas; and the heavy and expanding volume of marine and aviation traffic along the working coast.

All echoed the same concern: In the interest of marine and aviation safety, people want people on the lights. The automatic equipment proposed to replace them is reported by users to be unsafe, unreliable or non-existent.

Here is our interim report.

There is no support for destaffing among any user group. When a representative for the tug and barge operators supported automation, a union official representing the tow boat employees countered: 'The people in the offices don't need the lights. The people on the tugs do.'

There is solid support for services supplied to mariners and aviators by lightkeepers, particularly in regard to local weather conditions. Users want more local weather reports, not fewer reports. All lightkeepers are trained in aviation weather, although it is not in their job description.

Many people echoed the concern of Stan Kaardall of the Campbell River Aircraft Operator's Association, who has flown the coast for 44 years: 'I use lighthouse weathers every day and I have to have them to do my work safely. We do not use automatic weather reports for flight planning because they are of no use to us.'

The Committee also heard ample evidence that a dedicated communication system should be implemented through the use of VHF and single side band radio equipment. This was a major concern to both fishermen and aviators alike...

There is deeply entrenched concern over the reliability of the automatic weather stations and aids which have been deployed along the coast and which are repeatedly reported by the users to have a high failure rate, particularly in the winter months. Said a Pacific Trollers Association official: 'We need 100 per cent reliability of any system to assist us. An 80 per cent rate may be good enough for technicians, but not for mariners.'

One Port Alberni aviator reported being given "incredibly bad" information (the automatic system reported clear to 10,000 feet when in fact he found fog), adding: 'No information is better than wrong information' provided by an automatic site. This can be a serious safety risk.

There is equal concern about the limited information that the automated systems emit compared to the information available from lighthouse keepers. Said one aviator: 'The very little that automation gives us is of little use. You can get the temperature and the wind direction, but you can't get the ceiling and the swell heights needed for float plane operations.'

Said a fisher. 'About 20 to 50 per cent of the time, the automatic system (in his area) is not available. There are more breakdowns in winter. And it can't tell you what the chop looks like in the channel.'

There is a profound sense of the safety net provided by the "system" of staffed lightstations, in addition to the services provided by individual lightkeepers. The B.C. Aviation Council, noting that British Columbians have the highest propensity to fly in Canada, reflecting the movement of goods and services to remote areas, stated: 'Pilots need to know what conditions are like 50 to 100 miles ahead. On the north coast, for visual flying, the only weather and services available are provided by staffed lightstations.'

In contrast, fishers said that in American waters, where U.S. lightstations are unmanned, local weather reports are obtainable from military-funded and available Coast Guard personnel positioned along the coast.

There were many emotional reports of search and rescue operations performed by lightkeepers, of deaths of friends and family members at sea...

About 50 died on the coast last year.

...of all-night vigils kept by lightkeepers and their wives, of storm warnings and friendly advice. One island resident said —

And this person is known to Senator Hays.

'Lightkeepers really know their local areas. I think we need the lightkeepers more than we need the lights.'

Deep-seated anxieties were expressed over the Coast Guard's belligerent push to destaff. Homer Stevens, a fisher of 58 years' experience and former head of the United Fishermen and Allied Worker's Union said. 'I have fished from the Fraser to the Nass River and Queen Charlotte Sound and Dixon Entrance, and I find it hard to believe that people would seriously consider destaffing, making it impossible for a boat to get up-to-date knowledge of what is happening locally. What value is there placed on life?'

Scientists at the Federal Institute of Ocean Sciences outlined the useful scientific work lightkeepers and their families perform, at modest cost, which in crucial cases cannot be performed by any known technology at any cost. Saline samples and water temperatures, collected on specific tidal conditions, are used to predict Salmon migration patterns, the El Nino presence, and appropriate fisheries management techniques.

Lightkeepers also assist in monitoring tsunami warning systems at locations where there is no other human presence to perform the work at any price.

There was a prevailing view that the loss of low cost lightstation and lightkeeper services and their replacement with high cost, unreliable automatic equipment will cost more money than the present system and be less cost-effective. Noting that a Transport Canada internal audit found the Marine Navigation Services division notorious for its overtime, one lightkeeper said, "How can the Coast Guard claim cost savings when it doesn't know what its costs are?"

There was widespread support for the view that lightkeepers' mandates should be expanded beyond the "change the lightbulb and mow the lawn" dictates of their job descriptions to include search and rescue, fisheries inspection, drug trade monitoring, assistance to tourists, boater safety education, and other marine and aviation services.

There was also a willingness among most user groups to consider some form of "user pay" for services, including possible boat licences for the vastly increasing numbers of recreational boaters, who are viewed as not paying their share of services consumed. Others felt that implementing a service fee would be costly to administer, and uneconomic. Any moves in this direction, however, should be carried out in consultation with the stakeholder groups to decide what services are required and who should pay for them.

There was prevailing suspicion of Coast Guard motivations, claims of "cover-ups," speculation about automatic equipment contracts, charges of "a personal vendetta" shown against the lightkeepers by departmental officials, expressions of "betrayal and anger" which must be addressed by you, Minister, through an investigation by an independent third party if confidence in the Coast Guard is to be re-established with the maritime and aviation community.

I hope that this next portion will be of some interest to senators, including the Liberal senators who voted against this study at the hearings in the Transport Committee.

In his testimony before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on June 1, 1994, Rick Bryant, Regional Manager, Marine Navigation Systems, Western Region and the bureaucrat primarily responsible for the destaffing initiatives said:

> Certainly, when we were looking at the question of lightstation destaffing in the past, the weather reports from the lightkeeper represented the major contribution. What we see now is a large number of these automated sites. Our point of view in that regard is that these automated systems can do the job that was done in the past by the lightkeeper.

Minister, the evidence presented to us by the people who use the system, often at risk to their lives, indicates Mr. Bryant is wrong.

In conclusion, Committee members were moved by the devotion shown by the coastal community towards the lightkeepers and their families, the dignity with which they have borne the indignities of being told by their bosses that their work has no value, and the dedication they have shown in giving life to the Coast Guard motto, "Safety First, Service Always."

We hope our interim report, and the final one which we will file in Parliament, will assist you in making the decision to scuttle the Lightstation Services Project before it shreds the staffed lightstations' safety net which serves the coast so well and is so valued by British Columbians.

This report is signed by myself and John Duncan, MP for North Island—Powell River, as co-chairs.

Colleagues might wish to know that today The Vancouver Sun asked Minister Young for his comments on this report. Even though it represents the views of so many hundreds of thousands of British Columbians, Minister Young said that our report would have no impact at all, and would not make any difference regarding destaffing. His reply shows that his own Coast Guard consultations, which are at mid-point among 60 public sessions on the Newfoundland, New Brunswick and British Columbia coasts, are a sham and a fraud. His willingness to endanger the lives of British Columbians show a breathtaking degree of arrogance which will never be forgotten in my province.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I want to add my attestation to the comments of Senator Carney. I went as a Nova Scotian to Vancouver Island. We went up to Campbell River. We went to the lighthouses. We met these people. We talked to them and heard their stories. We were convinced — at least I was — of the danger of putting automated weather systems into position before they are ready, before they have an efficacy that is acceptable.

We are not talking about items like streetlights, where you can look to the right and to the left. We are talking about descending from sunshine at 5,000 feet, through clouds, to land on water, sometimes rough, always dangerous, but always safer and more manageable when you have accurate information as to what lies below the cloud cover.

In every instance, pilots cautioned us against acceptance of these new systems, which have not yet been proven in use. To measure that, of course, we need look no further than the difficulties of Canadian Airline International in their report of a few short months ago. They refuse to use information derived from the automated systems in any sense of relying upon them for safety.

It may be that, somewhere in the future, some years ahead yet, there will be an automated system that can look other than straight up; one that can look out to the side in any direction. We do not have that technology yet. Until we do have it, the only safe way that private commercial operators can fly up and down that coast is with reliable, on-the-ground, visual reports. These can only come from the people who are put in place to do that, who are trained as weather observers, and who have earned the trust of pilots.

We are speaking not only of pilots, although a pilot in an aircraft in landing mode is in a critical situation. This change affects as well the transit of ships. It affects not only fishermen but anybody plying that coast. These people want to know more than what an automated station can tell them about fog and wave heights, about current, about how the wind is affecting the tides. That does not happen with automated systems. Such systems are not that sophisticated nor will they be, given the technology available to us, until well into the next century. That day is coming, but it is not yet here.

Let me say to those who might wonder about it, in Nova Scotia our manned lightstations are all gone, and we are having problems. In Newfoundland they are half gone, and the rest will go over the next few months if the ministry has its way. That will be a mistake, because we are doing two things: We are endangering lives, and we are not achieving the purpose, which is to save money.

We are not saving money. These automated systems are enormously expensive. They put four or five in place in case one breaks down. There is a redundancy of not two or three, but sometimes five. They cost anywhere from a quarter to half a million dollars just to buy them still in the box. Then you have to put them in place. You are looking at hundreds of thousands of dollars per unit.

Do you know what it costs to keep a lighthouse family at Langara? About $30,000 per year; at most $35,000. Speaking of that family, we were privileged to meet them, a husband, a wife and a ten-year-old son. I saw in that family an absolute dedication to service, an absolute care and concern for lives that transcended anything I have ever seen in my life. That was their duty. They were proud to be part of that work and of the great tradition of lightkeepers in this country.

Their work has changed. It is not the same as it was 20, 30 years ago, or 100 years ago. However, it is still vital. How important is safety? What if we were talking about saving $40 million or $50 million or $100 million or $1 billion? We are talking about saving a couple of million dollars, if that, because — and isn't this interesting — when the lighthouses are destaffed, these men and women will be kept on the payroll, presumably until normal retirement time has arrived. We are not even saving salaries, but we are jeopardizing lives. We are placing lives in danger unnecessarily. We do not have that right, in my opinion.

We have the chance now to refer this subject-matter. I was somewhat shocked and very disappointed to hear of the minister's response in the other place today, that our work is not important and does not mean anything. He was saying to the hundreds of people who appeared before us, "Why did you waste your time? I do not care what you say or what you think. I do care about the people who fly up and down your coast."

Now I understand Elsie Wade's fury and rage for this cold, insensitive man. I wish he came from a part of Canada other than the Maritimes.

You cannot treat so casually the hundreds of people who, every day, must get into an airplane, and who need to know whether the land is visible. They need to know how high the chop is. Is it a foot and a half or is it a metre? You have one way in one-metre swells and another way in two-foot swells.

I commend and urge upon you the responsibility to communicate with the ministry, because it is a unanimous opposition. It is not a vested interest. It is a unanimous position that he at least take a look at appointing somebody at arm's length to give them a free and independent voice or opinion as to the impact of carrying on with this change.

The work that Senator Carney has done, together with members of the Reform Party in that part of the country, commends itself to all of us. It is a pleasure and a privilege for me to go out and meet the people, particularly the individual families who see in the work they do a way of life and a dedication to safety and service.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: May I ask a question of either Senator Carney or Senator Forrestall? Coming from the Atlantic coast, one has heard over the years certain comments about what happens when our lightkeepers are replaced with the so-called sophisticated new equipment. I have found these complaints most interesting.

If someone is in the air and they are coming down, will the system be able to tell that pilot if it is raining, snowing, sleeting, hailing? Can it tell those differences, as the keepers now can?

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, the simple answer is that the automatic equipment cannot tell the difference between rain and snow. Often, the system does not work at all. Sometimes these systems are out for months. It can tell you what is happening directly overhead and on one horizontal side when it works. It cannot tell you what is happening in the area. It cannot tell you if a front is moving in or if a fog has drifted over. It cannot tell you the height of an ocean swell.

My son is a Twin Otter pilot, and he flies that coast. He is at risk every day when he has to fly with automatic weather systems. My daughter and her husband have been fishers for 20 years, and their lives are at risk every time they go out because of these systems. My tenant died. He disappeared with his son. They never found his body. They just found the 11-year-old's body in the fish boat that left Campbell River and never made Bellingham. Uncle Eddy died when he ran his fish boat up against a rock.

I am one of the families who live on the sea, and by the sea, in a coastal marine environment. I echo the concerns of the people who appeared before us.

On motion of Senator Berntson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

TRUDEAU AND OUR TIMES

MISLEADING INFORMATION IN GLOBE AND MAIL BOOK REVIEW

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I would refer to a review, which appeared in The Globe and Mail of November 5, of the Clarkson, McCall book entitled, Trudeau and Our Times, specifically, Volume 2, The Heroic Delusion.

The review was written by Mr. Robert Sheppard. After having made a declaration as to how rich this book was in lore, he referred to Mr. Trudeau as an idiosyncratic event. He then turned his attention to me, as follows:

> Close runners-up include: The take on Allan MacEachen, the moody high priest of the welfare state, going AWOL for six weeks (he even skipped the meetings of the inner cabinet) because he couldn't face his colleagues after the fiasco of his 1981 budget...

Honourable senators, the references to moods and priesthood are beside the point, but the facts about attendance are quite another matter. All I have to say is that Mr. Sheppard's comments are totally false, and the sources relied on in the volume are also totally false.

The records of the House of Commons, confirmed by a check with the data systems of the Library of Parliament, reveal that, in each of the six weeks from the date of the budget until the House of Commons rose for the Christmas break, I was in the House of Commons, surrounded by colleagues, explaining and defending the budget. During those weeks I was in the House of Commons, and on 17 days I answered a total of 156 questions put to me by the members of the House of Commons. I would say that is something of a record.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The budget was something of a record as well.

Senator MacEachen: I wish the Honourable Leader of the Opposition would take this item with the seriousness that I do, because I find this reference to be totally false as well as damaging, and it ought to be corrected.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: It may be that at some time, if his activities are misrepresented in the future in such a gross way as mine have been, the Leader of the Opposition will not appreciate humour from his colleagues in the Senate as he attempts to correct the record.

With respect to the suggestion that during this period I skipped meetings of the Committee on Priorities and Planning, the inner cabinet, that is totally false. In the period from the budget of November 12, 1981, to the end of February, 1982, the Committee on Priorities and Planning met on 12 separate occasions: November 27; December 8, December 16, December 22, 1981; January 12, January 20 — the committee met twice on that day — January 26, January 28; February 9, 18 and 22, 1982.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the honourable senator, but his time has elapsed. Is leave given to allow him to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator MacEachen: My review of the record, honourable senators, shows that I attended each meeting. In fact, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I chaired the meeting of November 27, 1981 and the meeting of January 12, 1982. So much for the allegation that I could not face my colleagues.

Honourable senators, any reader of political biography in these days must be on the alert to determine what is the historical record, what is fiction, and what is defamation.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, on a Christmas note, because this is expected to be the last sitting before the Christmas recess, I wish to express a few sentiments worthy of this important season.

Honourable senators will know that Christmas takes place in the depths of our northern winter. It is a time of celebration and goodwill. Some grinches would say, however, why celebrate in the Senate and why celebrate the Senate at all? We, too, often come up against the slings and arrows of dispirited comments about our national institutions, but what is this institution if not the manifestation of the Canadian people? The spirit of the regions is alive and well in the Senate of Canada. It is appropriate then, indeed warranted, that we commend the people who are in fact the spirit and heart of this Senate — the devoted Senate workers who make possible this forum for sober second thought, even amidst our Christmas party season. No small feat, as you will all attest.

Despite the difficult financial climate with which we are presented, the level of service in the Senate is excellent, as always. Perhaps too often we senators appear not to notice or appreciate the high quality of service and the sacrifices of which we are the recipients. I am reminded of the words of Dolly Parton:

> Sure we had runnin' water — when we'd run and get it.

I hope senators ensure that their New Year's resolutions include the occasional recognition of all Senate personnel.

Honourable senators, I offer my sincere holiday wishes to all of those who make the Senate the place that it is, and ensure that it operates in the professional manner that it does. To all those involved in administration, maintenance and security, I extend to them and their families an earned Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

To the individuals in the chamber who assist us when we are sitting, the Table Officers with their first-year "rookie" Clerk, the Journals and Debates people, and of course the young men and women who serve as pages, I say on behalf of this side, thank you very much, and all the best during the holiday season.

Honourable senators, almost a year has passed since we exchanged sides in this place. I am pleased to say that the level of cooperation and goodwill to which we had become accustomed in the past few years has not diminished. Certainly, we have our differences, but these have been displayed in the spirit one would expect of this institution. This situation could not have come about if it were not for the cooperation that exists amongst the respective leaders, the deputies and their offices, and all honourable senators, for that matter. I wish to personally thank Senator Hébert and his staff for helping a young "whippy" with her interim job.

Honourable senators, I wish all colleagues on both sides of this chamber a safe and happy holiday season, and I look forward to a productive and stimulating year ahead. I might add as well that, once again this year, there were too many red lights on the Senate Christmas tree!

Merry Christmas.

[Later]

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to respond to the comments of the Honourable Senator DeWare. With the exception of her reference to red lights, so say we all.

THE HONOURABLE PAUL DAVID

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT FROM THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when I entered this chamber for the first time, I had the honour to be escorted by Senator Paul David. Today I have the honour to pay him tribute as he is preparing to retire from the Senate, since he will turn 75 on Christmas Day.

[English]

I first met Senator David in the mid-1960s when I joined the Board of Directors of l'Institut de Cardiologie de Montréal, of which he was a founder in 1954. It did not take long to recognize his many skills: those of an administrator, of a medical practitioner, and of one actively involved in his community. No doubt many of these traits were inherited, as his family carries many of the most distinguished names in Quebec.

His grandfather, Laurent Olivier David, journalist and author, was appointed to the Senate by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1903 and served here for 10 years, while his father, Louis Athanase David, who was a Quebec cabinet minister, was appointed by Mackenzie King in 1940 and died in 1954.

Paul was appointed by Brian Mulroney in 1985, his first Senate appointment from Quebec, and one of many of a non-partisan nature made by Prime Minister Mulroney which allowed this place its unique mix of talent and experience.

Senator David had only been retired for a few months after 31 years with the heart institute when, as he put it, he received a "surprise" call from the Prime Minister. His professional career included active participation in numerous heart associations around the world. Recognition has come in the form of honorary degrees and many awards, including being named a Companion of the Order of Canada in 1981.

However, it is as a senator that most of us have come to know him, and we quickly learned to benefit from his wisdom. In his first speech here, he quoted from a passage of the book written by his father in 1934.

[Translation]

> Politicians should remember the role they have to play. It is their job to provide guidance and to tell the people the whole truth about the goal to be achieved. The only goal we can contemplate without betraying our traditions is to perpetuate in Canada the idea behind the founding of the country.

Those of us who had the opportunity to hear Senator David did so on a regular basis because his comments were always clear, full of insights and the product of a remarkable intellect.

I remember especially his speech during the abortion debate when he tried to reconcile the values of a Catholic, a physician and a strong believer in the family, values which he has always defended.

[English]

Whether in this chamber, in caucus or in private conversation, one was always struck by Senator David's refreshing frankness, his sense of humour, his modesty and his commitment to whatever cause in which he was involved. Certainly, his commitment to the Senate was complete. His absence has already shown us how much we miss him. Whenever assessments are made of contributions by its members, the Senate will always rank those of Paul David among the most prominent.

[Translation]

All the senators on this side join me in wishing him a retirement free of the handicaps which he is currently fighting with courage and determination. We also thank his family for allowing us the privilege of working with a great Canadian.

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to join with the Leader of the Opposition in saying a few words in tribute to and in honour of Senator Paul David who, sadly, reaches the mandatory age of retirement at the end of this month. His presence in the Senate has been missed in recent months, not just in terms of participation but in terms of personal friendship.

Senator David came to the Senate in 1985, having achieved enormous accomplishments in the field of medicine, most specifically cardiology. Senator David founded the Montreal Heart Institute, where Canada's first heart transplant was performed. He served as its director for 30 years until 1984. Senator David was recognized and respected in the medical community. His appointment to the Senate was met with great acclamation.

In 1981, as my honourable friend has noted, he was recognized for his accomplishments both through an appointment as a Companion of the Order of Canada and, because of his intimate involvement in the life of the city he loves, he was named "Grand Montréalais" — great Montrealer.

His appointment to the Senate was definitely seen as a great asset in broadening the base of expertise and diversity in this chamber. He became Canada's first third-generation senator, which speaks volumes about his family and its dedication to community and country. I am, of course, referring to the historical tradition of the David family. His grandfather, Laurent Olivier David, was appointed to the Senate by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. His father, Louis Athanase David, was appointed by Prime Minister William Lyon Mackenzie King in 1940.

Senator David took full advantage of his appointment to this institution to continue working on the issues that were important to him, promoting medical research and awareness of difficulties faced in our health care system. We will miss his continuing involvement in that issue as it evolves in the months and years ahead.

Generally, he was here to serve the people of his community, the people of his province and the people of his country. We remember his work as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, and his participation in a number of other committees of this place, including Official Languages; Banking, Trade and Commerce and Veterans Affairs.

The one committee for which I remember him most particularly was the Special Senate Committee on Youth, which was his first assignment in this chamber, as it was mine. I got to know him as we travelled across the country, and as we struggled over every single word of that report. He had great humanity and sensitivity for that most important segment of our Canadian population.

In his address to the Senate during consideration of that report, Senator David stated:

> These young people are our future... They represent a major challenge to the conscience of the parliamentarians of Canada and of every province. Are we not the physicians of the nation? We must therefore, like physicians, try to find gradual or radical remedies to our present problems, prevent future ills and relieve, by technical and human means, the most vulnerable elements of our society.

Those words are equally as important today as we struggle still with trying to prepare a better future for the young people of this country.

As was noted in his first speech in the Senate, he quoted from his father. He also quoted from his grandfather. I should like to read that quote today, as it fills in a large part of the "canvas" of this man we have come to know as Senator Paul David. It is interesting that he spoke in a debate on a meeting of the World Conference to Review and Appraise the Achievements of the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality, Development and Peace, held in Nairobi, Kenya.

He opened his remarks by talking about his appointment to this place, how he had been called and what it meant to him. When he thought he was about to launch into retirement, here he was back in the fray. He said:

> When I accepted the responsibilities of a senator, it was because I was tempted to follow in the footsteps of my grandfather... and my father...
> I feel a little like Laurent Olivier David, who wrote in the preface to his last book, Au soir de la vie (1924):
> > I believe that when a man has been involved in all the things of this world for more than 50 years... he should say what he has seen and observed, pointing out what could be useful to his fellow citizens and guide them, helping them avoid the errors and mistakes he may have made himself. At a time in life when he is no longer driven by passion or self-interest, I think a man has a right to believe that his comments and advice are of some value.

Honourable senators, I can only say that Senator David's comments and advice have been of great value to this chamber and to the people whom he represented here. Colleagues on this side of the house would like to offer to him and to his family our thanks for their contribution, and for his contribution.

We extend our very warmest wishes to him, particularly for the birthday party which he will have — a most joyous occasion — on December 25, Christmas Day.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, Senator Paul David, Companion of the Order of Canada, will reach the mandatory age of retirement over the Christmas period. I wish to pay tribute to him today.

Senator David comes from a line of illustrious political figures. As mentioned earlier, Senator Laurent Olivier David, his grandfather, who lived from 1840 to 1926, was a close friend and comrade-in-arms of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Prime Minister of whom he has written a biography that is still referred to. His father, the Honourable Louis Athanase David, born in 1882, served as Provincial Secretary of Quebec from 1919 to 1936 and in the cabinet of the Quebec Premier Louis-Alexandre Taschereau.

Louis Athanase David was appointed to the Senate in 1940 by Prime Minister Mackenzie King. Minister and Senator Athanase David went down in history as a great friend of the arts and literature. He founded the prestigious David Literary Award in Quebec in 1922.

Our colleague Paul David, appointed to the Senate by Prime Minister Mulroney in 1985, is a famous cardiologist whose reputation extends far beyond Canada's boundaries. He founded the Montreal Heart Institute in 1954 and was its director until 1984.

Appointed to the Senate on September 26, 1988, I had the good fortune to see Senator Paul David at work for four years.

He was known for his many well-written speeches and also for his untiring work in committee. He was particularly interested in matters related to the Canadian Constitution, as were his ancestors before him. He made a good team with Senator Arthur Tremblay and Senator Martial Asselin.

A graduate of the Université de Paris, the Université de Montréal and Boston University, Senator David is a cultured and charming man, and very good company.

In the spring of 1992, he was struck by a cruel disease. We are still hoping that he will regain his health. Our best wishes to him, to his wife, Dr. Yvette Lemire, also a cardiologist, and to his children. Thank you, Paul David.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, on December 25, Senator David will reach the age of mandatory retirement for members of this house. It is with great pleasure, but also with sadness, that I pay tribute to our colleague today.

I will not make any attempt to summarize Senator David's résumé. It would take too long and, in any case, others have done it before.

I will only say that his academic distinctions, as well as the very important positions he has held, particularly in the field of cardiology, and also the many tributes paid to him in Quebec, in Canada and abroad, give a good idea of the remarkable qualities of Dr. David from a personal, professional, scientific and social point of view.

Here in the Senate, and for as long as his health allowed him to participate in all the major debates, we were privileged to benefit from his great culture, his remarkable intelligence, his solid judgment and his uncommon wisdom.

Beyond the daily debates and the review of various pieces of legislation in which he took part, Senator David also conducted in-depth studies of issues affecting Canadian society as a whole.

Here are just a few: the abortion issue, in 1988; Canada's demographic trends, in 1989; health care and its changing costs, also in 1989. When he left us for health reasons, shortly before the referendum on the Charlottetown Accord, Senator David was working on the historical perspectives of Quebec society and the understanding of the distinct society.

Although this is by no means the only work to which he contributed, I want to say a few words about a major development in the history of health services in Quebec. I am referring to the Montreal Heart Institute, with which his name is and will always be associated.

In the early 1950s, barely into his thirties, he dared to conceive of this very bold project which finally took shape in 1954; it was the second of its kind in the world, the first one being in Mexico. Since then, several others have been created on the model of this institute.

I would now like to quote Dr. Marcel David, the former director of professional services at the Montreal Heart Institute, who said this on the fortieth anniversary of the creation of the institute:

> Little prince: Dr. David, design me an institute.

He added:

> Dare to dream such a dream and found an institute dedicated entirely to cardiology. It took someone of Dr. David's calibre.

He added:

> Elementary. All he needed was to have his head in the stars and his feet on the ground, to be both a visionary and pragmatic; not some wild-eyed visionary but clear-headed and perceptive, a courageous man who would not reject an audacious idea that came to him at the right time, a powerful idea that would become his reason for living.

That life would then be just a matter of stubborn persistence, ceaseless efforts, patient and intelligent diplomacy and no doubt impatient inner trepidation as well when faced with difficult obstacles to overcome, and they always were overcome.

This combination of a powerful man of action and an inspired visionary made the dream of a Montreal Heart Institute a reality. In a word, Dr. David is the Montreal Heart Institute.

We still recognize this visionary quality in him today, since he has always been good at long-term planning. In carrying out his projects, he always considered what would happen later.

I have had the privilege of knowing Senator David for many years and I would like to take this opportunity today to stress the qualities that everyone recognizes in him, namely his culture, refinement and sensitivity to the needs of others. It may sound redundant, considering how much his qualities have been praised in this chamber as well as elsewhere, in other circumstances. He is a leader who, in spite of all his titles and achievements, will always stay modest and unaffected. He is a hard worker who listens to people, is fair, honest, and always full of wisdom.

When I was Minister of Health and I needed a mediator to deal with a rather touchy problem concerning immigrant physicians, his name naturally came up among others as the one who could resolve this touchy problem which, at a certain point, could have put lives at risk.

We know that Senator David would have liked nothing better than to be back with us in the Senate, but his health would not allow it. I know that he will be sad when the tributes we are paying him today reach him. I want to assure our friend that he will be remembered by his Senate colleagues as one who was very conscientious in all he did, and always spoke words reflecting high intellectual integrity as well as superior intelligence and deep respect for the dissenting opinions that may be expressed in this chamber.

Be assured, Senator David, that you will remain for us a great Montrealer, a title which you received in 1980, a great Quebecer recognized by the Ordre national du Québec in 1988, and a great Canadian whose merit was recognized as early as 1967, when you were awarded the Canadian Centennial Medal, in 1968, when you were named Officer of the Order of Canada, and in 1981, when you were promoted to Companion of the Order of Canada. I wish to express to you our friendship and our gratitude, a feeling which, I am sure, is shared by your fellow citizens, especially those in Quebec.

I hope that your wife, Dr. Lemire, your six children, of whom you can be proud, and your grandchildren will share many more years of happiness with you.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I wish to join in the warm and eloquent words spoken by the Leader of the Government and some other senators about our colleague Senator David. I knew him slightly before his appointment to the Senate but, like Senator Fairbairn, I got to know him better while travelling with the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth to hold public hearings and long discussions.

He willingly chose to serve on this committee because of his genuine faith in youth. This could be seen in the way he spoke to young people during the public hearings, of course, but also in the less formal meetings that we had with youth groups in all major Canadian cities. I have always been impressed by Senator David's interest in youth and hence in the future of our country. Even if there were no other reason—and there are many others — this interest alone would be enough to make me sincerely regret his leaving the Senate.

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, as the youngest, or shall I say the newest member of this house, allow me to say a few words.

Doctor Paul David was a friend to me. I met him as a parliamentarian, when both of us were sitting on the Joint Committee on Official Languages. We do not always tell what goes on in committees, but let me say this. To us, Paul David was a simple man and an honest man who was able to recognize the importance of Canadian issues, such as fairness in the area of language rights.

I must say that to us, members of the French-speaking minority, Paul David was a strong supporter, and I want to pay tribute to him because he helped us to develop worthy programs throughout the country which have made Canada one of the best places in which to live.

As president of the Assemblée internationale des parlementaires de langue française, I want to remind my colleagues that Senator David sat on the Canadian executive and contributed to the development of our large French-speaking community and helped to improve the situation, especially in African countries.

He had a legitimate interest in this area, and he expressed his thoughts and his good intentions and showed his simplicity and honesty, both at the international and the national levels. In this regard, I want to say to him: Thank you, Paul.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like to add my voice to all those who have paid homage to Senator David. Senator David and I were neighbours, meaning he was my desk neighbour. Naturally, as such, I often consulted him, sometimes even as a patient when I had health problems in his field. My wife and I went on a few trips with him and his wife, including a trip to Africa which I will never forget. His charming wife became a good friend of my wife's, and one of his daughters is a long-time friend of one of my own daughters living in Montreal. Therefore, he is almost a member of the family.

I have always been a fervent observer of Quebec politics and I teased him a lot when he came to the Senate as a Tory senator, after his grandfather and father had been liberal senators. I teased him and asked if he was serious in his political choice.

Everyone knows that Senator David was extremely serious; too serious, perhaps, for his own good. Later on, knowing he had founded the Montreal Heart Institute and was now president or director of the Institute — I am not sure of his exact title — I began to see him more truly as Senator Paul David.

On one occasion, when I went to visit him in his office, I noticed that he was smoking. I said to him, "Senator David, you have disappointed me again. The first time was when I realized that you were a Conservative senator. This time is more serious. With all that you have said and written about cigarettes, how can you still be smoking?" He asked me how I had stopped smoking — this was before I started turning to my friends for cigarettes — and I told him that I had stopped because of a serious health problem. I had had bypass surgery. He said that perhaps that was what it would take for him to stop smoking, a shock like that. He added that he stood by everything that he had said and written about cigarettes; that that, and not what he was doing, was what he recommended.

Such was the sincerity of the man. I often consulted him as a doctor, and I would tell him that he was too serious. He would say to me, "Norbert, that is the way I am. When I have things to do, I cannot stop, I cannot relax until the work is finished, and it is never finished."

Honourable senators, I extend my best wishes to Mrs. David and to our colleague. I have been devastated to learn the nature of Senator David's illness. His office will now be occupied by Senator Gauthier. His secretary and research assistants had, in a way, become part of my staff.

I wish him health. I wish it from the bottom of my heart. I still hope that there will be a miracle and that Senator David will return to work, but if it is not to be, I wish him and his wife the courage and the strength to go on.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I simply want to add my own comments to all that has been said about this remarkable man. I say he served French Canadians and Canada very well. It is touching for me to be saying this because I came to know Senator David through my father, who was a friend of his father.

This means, of course, that in my family we talked a lot about politics. We knew Sir Athanase David and Senator David very well. We are all aware of his affection and devotion for the French language, French Canadians, his country and the Senate. We will all miss him tremendously, and I would like to assure him of our kindest regards.

[English]

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of honourable senators regarding Dr. David. My colleagues have covered his career and his life very well.

I first met Senator David when he was known as Dr. David, the founder and director of the Montreal Heart Institute. My late father, Senator Ray Petten, was a patient of his at the heart institute, Maisonneuve Hospital, in the mid-1950s. I give Dr. David credit and thanks for extending my father's life. It is my fondest wish that he return to good health to enjoy his well-earned retirement.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to add my name to the list of people who had all those nice things to say about Senator David. We will miss him as a colleague. As well, we will miss him as a member of the medical profession.

Senator David, Senator Keon, Senator Haidasz, Senator Phillips, Senator Demarais and myself are all members of the medical profession in this place, and our number will now be reduced by one.

The Senate was an institution run by the legal profession until the medical profession showed them they could go nowhere without our support and help. Consequently, when we lose one of our good physicians, it is a sad day for this chamber.

Honourable senators, Senator David reaches the good old age of 75 on Christmas Day. I extend my best wishes to him and to his family. We will miss him.

While I am on my feet, I wish to extend best wishes to another Senator. Senator Finlay MacDonald will have a birthday on January 4th. He was born at the same hour, on the same day of the same week, of the same month and year that I was born on Prince Edward Island, although, of course we had different mothers and fathers. He was born in a hospital, and I was born at home. We were both wrapped in blue blankets, but I turned mine into a red one. He stayed with the blue.

Merry Christmas to you all, and to all a good night!

CANADA GRAIN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

SIXTH REPORT

Your committee, to which was referred the Bill C-51, to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 14, 1994, examined the said bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

DANIEL HAYS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, indeed I will give leave. However, as I said earlier, I wish to have more consultation so as to know when leave will be asked. His Honour and I had good communications when he was Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. I will, with great pleasure, give leave in this instance. However, I should like it to be known again that consultation in such circumstances should take place.

The Hon. the Speaker: You are correct, Senator Prud'homme. I should have asked if leave were granted.

Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, my displeasure was not directed at the Chair. My displeasure is directed at those who should ask for leave, if they need it to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion for third reading is now before honourable senators. It is your pleasure, honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Pat Carney, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 15, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your committee, to which was referred the Bill C-56, to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 14, 1994, examined the said bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

PAT CARNEY
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John B. Stewart, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 15, 1994

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

Your committee, to which was referred the Bill C-57, to implement the Agreement establishing the World Trade Organization, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, December 7, 1994, examined the said bill and has agreed to report the same without amendment, but with the following observations and recommendations.

The Committee is of the opinion that the World Trade Organization will come under justified criticism unless adequate provision is made to ensure political accountability, transparency, and relevance.

The Agreement confers on the Ministerial Conference the authority to direct the work of the World Trade Organization and to take decisions on all matters under any of the Multilateral Trade Agreements; however, the Conference is to meet as infrequently as once every two years. The Committee believes that this will not provide effective political control of the Organization; consequently, the Committee recommends that Canada pursue aggressively with other Members the implementation of structures and procedures to ensure that the ministerial meetings exercise effective control of the Organization and to ensure both transparency and relevance.

In constituting the delegation to the Ministerial Conference, the Minister should consider the inclusion of members of both the Houses of Parliament and of persons drawn from the public.

In addition, the Minister responsible for representing Canada in the World Trade Organization should report annually to both Houses of Parliament on the functioning of the Organization and on all significant issues requiring decision by Canada and affecting Canadian interests.

Also, we recommend that such reports be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs for consideration and report.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN B. STEWART

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to speak to this bill, but we do not have a copy of the report. One will be distributed, surely.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the wish of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton to delay this matter until later this day?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I move that the item be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration later this day. It is an important bill, one which deserves more consideration than that which is given by passing it automatically.

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Opposition.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

FARM SAFETY

AGRICULTURAL AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXTEND DATE OF FINAL REPORT ON STUDY

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), and notwithstanding its order of reference of March 17, 1994, I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Foresty be authorized to continue its special study on farm safety and farm-related health issues, and that the Committee present its report no later than June 30, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

ONTARIO COURT GENERAL DIVISION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE CONDUCT AND BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND JUSTICES

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, pursuant to rules 57(1) and 58 (1), I give notice that, two days hence, I shall move:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be constituted to examine and report upon the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and officers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division), where their conduct includes

(i) failure to take judicial notice of the Constitution, the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the laws of Canada pertaining to the Senate, and

(ii) failure to comply with the said laws and privileges and

(iii) their other conduct related to the Constitution, the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, and the dignity of the Senate; and

That the committee be further empowered to consider and report upon related matters which may concern the privileges of the Senate; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That the committee be composed of five members, three of whom shall constitute a quorum; and

That the Committee of Selection be instructed to decide and report upon the membership of the Special Committee.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Cools has given notice, as I understand it, of her intention to move a motion on that matter. Now is not the time to discuss whether or not the motion is in order, much less whether it is appropriate. However, I reserve the right to raise those questions when the motion is before us.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

EXPANSION OF POWERS—PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, on behalf of some 40 petitioners from the province of Saskatchewan, I have the honour to present in the Senate a petition to Parliament requesting that it continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in relation to the marketing of wheat and barley to export, and that the Canadian Wheat Board's marketing powers be expanded to include all grains and oilseeds.

CANADA COUNCIL

Hon. Jean-Louis Roux: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 20, 1994, I will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Mr. Roch Carrier, Director, and Mrs. Donna Scott, Chairman of the Canada Council, are completing a Canada-wide consultative tour of artistic circles on the Council's future, given that additional cuts in the next budget would greatly jeopardize the organization's original mission.

TRANSPORT

AUTOMATED NAVIGATIONAL AND WEATHER SYSTEMS—REQUEST FOR DOCUMENTATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Would the government make available all documents in its possession regarding the purchase and testing of all automated navigational aides and automated weather stations, including the AWOS system used by the Coast Guard in British Columbia and Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Carney, I will refer your question to my colleague and try to obtain an answer, which perhaps I can communicate to you during the break.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT REDEVELOPMENT—ALLEGED INVOLVEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—
REQUEST FOR FURTHER ANSWER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, yesterday the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate tabled what was supposed to be a delayed answer to questions asked by the Honourable Senator Ron Ghitter and myself. I appreciate the Deputy Leader's courtesy in attempting to provide an answer except, unfortunately, he forgot to answer the questions.

In 1989, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, then a member of the law firm of Lang, Michener in Ottawa, was present at a meeting with Mr. Jack Matthews of the Pearson consortium. The meeting lasted about an hour and a half. Mr. Chrétien, in a statement in the other place, denied that he had attended that meeting as a lawyer.

My question, honourable senators, is: What was Mr. Chrétien's capacity at that meeting? Was he a consultant, a lobbyist, legal counsel, or was he present in all three capacities? I understand that his bill indicates he was present in all three capacities.

Can the Honourable Leader of the Government advise me in what capacity Jean Chrétien attended that meeting?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Phillips observed, the Prime Minister answered questions in the other place on this matter. That answer was transmitted to Senator Phillips and to Senator Ghitter.

Senator Phillips, I will transmit your question of today and see what transpires.

Senator Phillips: I have a supplementry question, honourable senators. We on this side have repeatedly asked for a judicial inquiry into the Pearson airport lease. I would ask the Leader of the Government to use her considerable influence and charm on the Prime Minister, and persuade him to appoint a judicial inquiry. Such an inquiry would reveal the full extent of Mr. Chrétien's involvement in the negotiations leading up to the Pearson airport lease, and the propriety of the fact that Mr. Chrétien turned over his legal files to his former partner, Mr. Robert Wright, and then appointed Mr. Wright to draw up the compensation package offered to the Pearson airport consortium.

Honourable senators, I feel the public is entitled to such an inquiry. They are entitled to know the full extent of Mr. Chrétien's extensive involvement in the negotiations leading up to the completion of the deal. I do not think there is any other accurate way to do it other than by having a judicial inquiry.

Senator Fairbairn: There are many things I could say at this moment, but I will refrain from doing so. The Prime Minister, in his response, has indicated that he did not have an involvement as a lawyer in this issue. I will be pleased to put the details of this question for a further response. There is, to my knowledge, no evidence whatsoever that the Prime Minister had extensive involvement in the negotiations leading up to the Pearson Airport Agreement.

TUNNEL BETWEEN EAST BLOCK AND CENTRE BLOCK— REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, my questions are for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and are in connection with the building of a tunnel to connect the East Block and the Centre Block.

In the absence of any agreement or consultation on this undertaking, could we in the Senate be advised of the amounts of various tenders which must have been submitted by applicants for the job? Have limits been set on cost overruns? Could we have assurances that offices and corridors in the Senate precincts will be returned to their present state at the conclusion of the construction? Could we be advised whether the existing tunnel between the East Block and the Centre Block continues to be used for pipes and cables and other services, and will the new tunnel be primarily a promenade or a sheltered walkway — mostly for members of the House of Commons who have approved this undertaking?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take all of Senator Doyle's questions and prepare a complete answer for him during the interim of our adjournment. I will undertake to provide that information more quickly than the last time he set out a great number of questions related to these kinds of issues.

As honourable senators will recall, yesterday Senator Comeau asked a question on this same subject. I have received some preliminary responses. If I may, I will give them with the caveat that the further information which Senator Doyle requires will be provided upon our return.

May I also express my regrets that Senator Hastings is not present, particularly in his capacity as Chairman of The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, because I am sure he would be in a better position to answer some of these questions.

I am advised that the tunnel project is a part of the Department of Public Works' long-term plan. I am also advised that the Senate, through the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, was consulted on at least two occasions on this plan.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Consulted?

Senator Fairbairn: This is what I am advised. I will try to find out further details as to time and place.

All senators will know that last August 18, Senator Hastings sent a memo to all of us on the subject of the East Block tunnel, indicating approval for the renovation and repair of that link between the Centre Block and the East Block. It was indicated that it was part of the Department of Public Works' long-term plan to renovate Parliament Hill; that the project would commence in April of 1995; and that it would continue over a period of approximately 12 months. He indicated in his memo that officials from the Department of Public Works had indicated to him that they would do everything possible to limit inconvenience to senators, to Hill employees, and to visitors.

Certainly one of the reasons for the repair and construction of this tunnel was that there would be a secure link between the East Block and the Centre Block. It was felt that a lack of such a facility would jeopardize the safety and security of parliamentarians in the event of an emergency.

As I said, I will take the questions of Senator Doyle, and I will attempt to obtain a fulsome answer by the time the Senate resumes.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary question, is the Leader of the Government confirming, then, that the courtesy extended to senators and their staff, employees and others directly affected by these works, is limited to the receipt of information? Are we no longer to be consulted, whether it relates to the moving of the post office, the construction of the tunnel, or the building of the committee room? It is simply assumed that it was all approved at a certain date a long time ago, and, on occasion, we will be informed of what is happening. Is this what we are being told?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, that is not what I am intending to imply. I wished to give at least a partial answer today, because that is the procedure I followed respecting the questions asked by Senators Comeau and Doody.

I would also add that, to the best of my knowledge, all of the costs of this undertaking will be costs of Public Works and not of the Senate of Canada.

If I might extend the answer further, there may have been other discussions with officials in the Senate of which I am unaware. I have today spoken to my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, and I have asked that the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, and the Speaker of the Senate be pulled into these discussions as they develop in the future.

Hon. C. William Doody: For the sake of the record, honourable senators, my question yesterday was to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate for assurances that these construction projects which have been undertaken from Centre Block through and to and in the East Block are an initiative of the Department of Public Works and the Government of Canada, and not of the Senate. I do not want to pick up the Citizen tomorrow and see another onslaught on all these "big spenders".

in the Senate who are building lavish tunnels. In fact, we have been struggling back and forth through the existing tunnel for the past 15 years, somewhat discomfited but certainly able to make it. We did not ask that this tunnel be built, nor that renovations take place across the way.

Senator Fairbairn: I certainly intended to state quite clearly that this is a Public Works initiative. It is not a Senate initiative. The Senate has been very prudent in its activities over the last few years, and even up until this point. We are sometimes unjustly criticized for things in which we as senators have no involvement. We have, indeed, put a halt to the renewal of the carpeting in the Senate chamber. As well, on our own initiative, the improvements to the sound system have been halted. We, on both sides of this chamber, have taken some very prudent action in recent days. The record should reflect that.

ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM— REQUEST FOR IMPACT ANALYSIS—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if I may receive a response to the question I asked about ten days ago regarding Atlantic freight rate subsidies. If she could send it to my office during the break rather than waste the complete intervening period, I would appreciate it.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do that. Unfortunately, I am unable to provide the answer today. We have been turning these answers out as quickly as we can, but some take a little more time.

COMPENSATION TO CANADIANS FOR PAST INJUSTICES

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: My question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The press has reported that six groups have been contacted about redress for certain injustices of the past. I understand that the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism, Ms Finestone, has indicated that she has conveyed some sort of apology to these six groups and that no compensation will be awarded.

• (1520)

My question is this: Why is the compensation to Canadians — not ethnic Canadians, but Canadians — given such low priority? Why is it not taken as an injustice and a wrongdoing which must be corrected?

This is not a category of broad compensation, but rather one of real loss by real Canadians — loss of their rights, their property, their livelihood, and a diminishment of their lives. I believe the issue is now confused.

Will the Prime Minister take this matter as a priority? Will the Prime Minister apologize? Why would Canadians of ethnic background, but nonetheless Canadians, be treated differently? Why are these issues not looked at as meritorious issues for Canadians? Why are they put into such a category? I would appreciate answers to these questions — answers which may clear up some of the confusion which has been created.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that I do not have with me today my colleague's letter and a note of the comments she has made. I will endeavour to ensure that whatever information is available is conveyed to my honourable friend.

Honourable senators, there is no question about the seriousness with which the government has taken these issues. For some time there has been a commitment to create a race relations board. There have also been a number of statements by the minister, and by others in the government, including the Prime Minister, of deep concern about the issues to which my friend refers. I will do my very best to get as much material as I can to her to dispel her concerns.

CONSULTATION WITH SENATE BEFORE UNDERTAKING FURTHER WORK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to Senator Doody's question of yesterday. I appreciate the response of the minister, but I wish to indicate that Senator Doody pointed to a general question, one which is very demoralizing for those who sit on the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. We struggle with reducing the operational expenses of the Senate. We look at every line very carefully. We go through months of work. All of a sudden, we receive a memo indicating that Public Works gives no thought to what we have been doing for these many months.

Honourable senators, it is demoralizing to be subjected to the way in which Public Works operates. The Minister of Public Works may not find this to be a very serious matter, but all senators do.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate relay to the Minister of Public Works that this kind of nonsense should stop? If work requires to be done, the Senate should be consulted.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will be pleased to relay Senator Comeau's concerns. As I indicated earlier, I have conveyed that message today to my colleague, who was receptive to it. I believe everyone understands that every effort is being made to keep this precinct secure and in good shape, not only for those who serve here, but also for those who visit.

This is an ongoing matter, honourable senators. I will do my best to ensure that the Senate has a rightful place in any discussions that take place and, certainly, are kept apprised of any intentions and information as they develop.

ROLE OF SPEAKERS AS CHAIRMEN OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEES OF BOTH HOUSES

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, when I served as chairman of members' services in the House of Commons for eight years, representatives of the Department of Public Works would commence projects without notice to members, and leave members of the House of Commons to deal with the public outcry that would follow.

As part of a solution to this dilemma, I believe that the Speakers of both Houses should be given the power to make decisions respecting these projects. That was my opinion when I served in the other place, and it is my opinion now. I know we will have to go through certain changes. Ultimately, I see the Speaker as the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee in the Senate. That is my position.

I share the frustration of my colleagues in being singled out as being responsible. The Speakers of the two houses of Parliament are, as far as I am concerned, the ultimate guardians of Parliament Hill. I know I am bucking tradition, but, surely, if our Speakers do not undertake this task, someone should become the guardian of the hill, and the members of both houses should be consulted.

Would the Leader of the Government consider this positive suggestion?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): As honourable senators will appreciate, at this point in time, I do not have access to my friend's predecessors to familiarize myself with the discussion that took place at that time. However, I do know that the Minister of Public Works was most receptive to my suggestions along that line this morning. I will certainly pursue them with him. As my honourable friend would know, he is a great proponent of following correct procedures on Parliament Hill.

REQUEST FOR DEFINITION

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to provide us with a definition of "parliamentary precinct"? What falls under senatorial authority and what does not fall under senatorial authority?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be delighted to provide such a definition.

CENTRAL HEATING PROBLEMS—REQUEST FOR REMEDY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I say to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, never mind the Internal Economy Committee! There is something wrong with the heating system in this building. Will you please ask the Department of Public Works to correct it?

I am told that the pipes leading into my office and other offices on the first floor are so corroded and so filled with gunge that the heat cannot get through. Never mind the Internal Economy Committee. Will she please ask Public Works to correct the situation so we do not have to work with frozen feet in a temperature of 50 degrees Fahrenheit?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Corbin, I have already inquired into this matter. I, too, have discovered a problem with the heating, and it is to the point where I have been using floor heating and blowing the circuits in the office as a consequence. In fact, I conducted some meetings the other day in my down-filled coat.

Honourable senators, I am quite aware of this difficulty with the heating system. I will pursue it vigorously.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have responses to questions raised in the Senate by Senator Duncan J. Jessiman on November 24, Senator David Tkachuk on December 1 and Senators Finlay MacDonald, Roch Bolduc and Mira Spivak on November 29. I also have answers to two Order Paper questions, one in the name of Senator David Tkachuk and the other in the name of Senator Jack Marshall, which is now standing in the name of Senator Eric Arthur Berntson.

PARKS CANADA

USER FEES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Through the consultations on user fees which Parks Canada undertook during the summer of 1994, Canadians, including visitors, users and other interested parties benefiting from services, were asked for their advice on how to set fees that are seen to be fair and appropriate.

Consultation activities at Prince Albert National Park included visitor information packages and feedback forms, media releases, letters to elected officials and other community members, telephone interviews, open houses, and public meetings.

In the summer of 1994, more than 100 teachers were contacted by letter and telephone by Prince Albert National Park to solicit their feedback on initial proposals for user fees. Visitors were also asked for their opinions regarding charging for school groups.

The overall response from those who participated in the consultations related to Prince Albert National Park was supportive of the proposal to charge students a fee on a per person per day basis, however, local school organisations did state their concerns with respect to the original levels of fees proposed and methods of collection of fees, and requested further consultations.

In order to respond to the requests from Canadians to continue consultations, the Minister of Canadian Heritage has directed Parks Canada managers to extend the consultation period.

During this second phase of consultations, Parks Canada will seek advice on specific fee proposals and methods of collection of fees. These consultations are under way and will be completed by December 31, 1994.

In response to feedback received during the first phase of consultations related to Prince Albert National Park, the management of Prince Albert National Park will consult on specific fee proposals which take into consideration the need for fees for family and student groups as well as the need to provide a fairer fee structure based on per person use of Parks Canada services.

The director of education for the public schools in Prince Albert has been asked to participate in these consultations, and a meeting was held on November 24, 1994. Parks Canada discussed the proposed fee structure for student groups visiting Prince Albert National Park (the current proposal is to charge students $1.00) and the most cost effective methods to collect these fees.

Prince Albert National Park has also entered into discussions with the local cooperating association to determine how to sponsor students who may not be able to pay the proposed student fee.

Based on all of these consultations, recommendations for fees will be forwarded to the Minister of Canadian Heritage for his approval. The approved fees for 1995/96 will be announced in early 1995.

The final list of fees will be published early in 1995.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT— CANCELLATION OF LEASE AGREEMENT

T1T2 Limited Partnership ("Partnership") has caused to be registered against Her Majesty's title to the Pearson Airport property a certain number of instruments (including the Terminals 1 and 2 Complex Lease). On December 14, 1993, the Minister of Transport wrote to the Partnership asking that the Partnership surrender its interest in the Pearson Airport property and reconvey that interest to Her Majesty including providing the appropriate registrable documents relating thereto on a "without prejudice" basis. Until now, the Partnership has refused, omitted or neglected to do so.

The position taken by the Minister of Transport as well as by the Attorney General Canada in the case pending before the Ontario Court (General Division) is to the effect that the continued registration of the instruments creates an impediment to Her Majesty further dealing with the Pearson Airport property.

SCIENCE, RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

TAX CREDITS FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Roch Bolduc on November 29, 1994)

In his 1994 annual report, the Auditor General focuses on the need for more thorough and systematic monitoring of and accounting for tax mechanisms for providing assistance to SR&ED.

We agree with the recommendations of the Auditor General to improve data and monitoring. Indeed, we have already taken steps to do so.

We have been working directly with Revenue Canada to improve the capture of data in respect of investment tax credits for scientific research and experimental development (SR&ED). These efforts are being coordinated through an interdepartmental committee established for this purpose. The goal of this work is to put us in a position to better monitor and evaluate federal income tax assistance to SR&ED.

The importance of SR&ED for the Canadian economy and the cost of government assistance in respect of SR&ED necessitate that timely, accurate and useful information be available to monitor and evaluate the performance of federal incentives for SR&ED. It is the intention of the Department of Finance to move expeditiously to carry out an evaluation study of income tax assistance to SR&ED and publish the results.

CHANGES TO EXCISE TAX ON TOBACCO PRODUCTS—INEQUALITY OF TREATMENT OF PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on November 29, 1994)

The government has undertaken a comprehensive national action plan to combat smuggling in Canada.

The plan includes increased enforcement, tobacco tax changes, measures affecting tobacco manufacturers and measures to reduce smoking. This integrated approach is designed to impact both the supply of and demand for contraband tobacco products, causing serious disruption to organized smuggling networks and restoring the domestic tobacco market to legitimate wholesalers and retailers.

The reduction in tobacco taxes is an exceptional undertaking — given the magnitude of the smuggling problem, however, and the potential for continued growth, reduced tobacco taxes are considered essential to the effective deployment of additional new enforcement resources across the country.

For the federal government, the reduction in tobacco taxes involves both a $5 national reduction and matching, province-specific reductions in respect of those provinces that choose to reduce their taxes beyond the $5 national reduction. This scheme was designed to provide flexibility in recognizing the common interest, and working with the provinces, to protect revenues which were being eroded by widespread smuggling.

To date, the government has been pleased and encouraged by the impact of the anti-smuggling initiative — there has been a marked decline in tobacco smuggling and significant seizures and arrests involving organized smuggling networks.

At the same time, it must be noted that enforcement efforts take time to achieve maximum effectiveness when operating against widespread, organized criminal elements — the government will continue to closely monitor the smuggling situation and will take appropriate action as warranted.

THIRD READING

Hon. Jack Austin moved third reading of Bill C-57, to implement the Agreement Establishing the World Trade Organization.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, trade policies are an important asset among the public policies that the government has at its disposal to promote economic growth and employment.

Indeed, such a goal must be supported by our international trade, our ability to export and to enter world markets. We will not grow richer by limiting ourselves to our domestic market; we have to make profitable sales on foreign markets.

This bill is so important that I had to speak on it. We are about to pass one of the most important pieces of legislation ever. This legislation is in line with the philosophy of our party, beginning in 1988 with the Free Trade Agreement, then NAFTA, and now this one which is the descendent of the others that preceded it.

Traditionally, because Canada was sparsely populated and rich in natural resources, we prospered thanks to our ability to provide industrialized countries such as England with raw materials such as metals, paper and wood. This allowed us to diversify our production so that we now export a lot of finished products and services, such as automobiles, electronic equipment, airplanes and turbines, so much so that today 40 per cent of our exports to the United States, for example, are manufactured goods, as opposed to 10 per cent in 1960.

In that respect, the 1988 free trade deal had structuring effects. From 1989 to 1992, the value of our exports to the United States increased by 24.3 per cent.

It is the high value-added sectors that benefit the most from access to the American market. Of those 16 liberalized sectors, 13 have captured shares of the American market. While it is too early yet to draw definitive conclusions, our overall performance is encouraging, at least on that side. Of course, the Americans have also captured shares of the Canadian market in some areas, and a major percentage of trade comes from transactions between multinational firms, but the fact is that our trade balance is doing well and that our competitiveness in recent years has been better than some expected.

We are now operating successfully in a bigger context in North America, and we should be optimistic. As a matter of fact, the government has embraced the idea. Our friends opposite certainly have come a long way since 1988, especially since NAFTA!

The Prime Minister recently announced that we will have a fourth partner in NAFTA, while we wait for the day when all 750 million North and South Americans can join.

It should perhaps be noted here that Mexico has the same buying power as Ontario. It is equal to the buying power of 8.5 million Canadian or American consumers.

May I add that, with a population of 150 million, Brazil is the tenth largest industrial power in the world, and that the industrial production of the province of Sao Paulo alone exceeds that of Spain and Portugal combined. Also, with a GNP of $295 billion U.S., Argentina's economic activity is greater than that of Ontario, which totals $228 billion U.S., and is double that of Quebec, which totals $130 billion U.S.

However, the bill before us opens other doors as a result of a strong tendency toward globalization of the market economy. Everybody knows that the technological advances of the past decades have resulted in a considerable drop in transportation and communications costs, which has led to a decentralization of manufacturing on a world-wide basis. Today, parts can be manufactured and assembled almost anywhere, according to the law of comparative advantages, and then be distributed according to international demand.

While businesses were opening plants all over the world, they were also concluding agreements with other foreign businesses. With the liberalization of financial markets, it became almost inevitable that the liberalization of trade in goods and services would follow.

The logical conclusion to this structural transformation was the success of the Uruguay Round, which led to the creation of the World Trade Organization, a 45-year-old dream that will become reality in 1995.

Many people criticized the process of negotiation leading up to this historical agreement; but when you think of it, seven or eight years to reach an agreement among 125 countries with different interests and at various stages of development is not that long.

The agreement deals not only with tariff cuts of nearly 40 per cent as a whole — bringing tariffs down roughly to between 10 and 5 per cent for most products — but also with important breakthroughs in more difficult areas such as textiles and clothing, for which tariffs will drop from 32 to 18 per cent, and agriculture, where tariffs will remain high but where quotas will be replaced by tariffs, which will be progressively phased out in order to avoid widespread destabilization and to maintain, as much as possible, the rural lifestyle specific to each country.

There were also breakthroughs in the definition of what constitutes a subsidy. God knows how important this is, especially in view of the fact that none existed before. It will also be useful in the case of NAFTA. There were breakthroughs in the rules concerning intellectual property, so dear to our southern neighbours and to us, too, in fact; breakthroughs in the rules concerning dispute settlement procedures, which have been greatly improved; and finally, in the opening up or gradual liberalization of new areas in the service sector. It is not a complete opening up; just a beginning, in the areas of transportation, professional services, and telecommunications, to name but a few.

For a province like mine, this agreement opens up additional markets for the metal and paper industries, electrical and electronic products, transportation equipment, pharmaceuticals, engineering, data processing and geomatics services, environmental technology services, and many other sectors. There are benefits for the consumer, while trade relations between countries and producers are put on a more civilized footing.

On the Foreign Affairs Committee, a number of senators expressed on a not unreasonable concern about the bureaucracy taking over the new World Trade Organization and the attendant potential loss of political accountability among its leaders. This is a very real possibility, since a major part of policy-making activities in the years to come will take place via decisions by panels or by adjudication, and not via decisions by democratically designated political leaders.

In the past, adjudications under GATT rules were not a major threat, because most of the policy-making took place in individual countries via the mandates given by government authorities to their own negotiators at the Kennedy Round, the Tokyo Round and the other rounds, but at the time, there were few participants, only a few dozen.

Today, with 125 countries and perhaps other major players like China, probably, in a few years time, the nature of the process may be altered. Policy-making will not take place during the general round but as a result of add-ons here and there following private agreements on, for instance, transportation, telecommunications or financial services, or as a result of panel rulings or arbitration, the consequences of which some countries feel are undesirable.

We will therefore need parliamentary and government mechanisms to review, from time to time, the performance of the leaders of an international organization that will play such an important role in the future. That being said, I will be very pleased to support this bill.

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, Canada is a trading nation. Canada's future depends on trade. Suddenly, this year, trade policy has transformed foreign policy and captured the public agenda.

Some argue that Canada has become almost too obsessed by trade. If foreign policy forms an analog to domestic values, if foreign policy reflects domestic policy, a fortiori it affects trade policy.

Henry Kissinger, in his monumental book on foreign policy entitled Diplomacy, published earlier this year, faintly mentions global trade. Mr. Kissinger only dedicates one page out of 835 to deal with global trade policy.

All this has changed in just one year. Trade has now become a national priority in all countries around the globe. Trade has become the icon of the new world order. Canadians now worry that greater globalization of trade silently and surreptitiously erodes Canada's independence, Canada's sovereignty. Are we losing control of our future? Are we delegating our destiny to amorphous international organisms?

The Special Joint Committee on Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy travelled across Canada this year and uncovered a deep desire among Canadians who crave greater direct participation, greater access to decision-making in foreign policy and trade policy formulation. Canadians want to be more actors than victims of global forces.

This emerging paradigm of public dialogue presumes a condition precedent, a level playing field of coherent information, a broader strata of data to forge informed public opinion.

Walter Lippman, in his book many decades ago entitled Public Opinion, defined "informed public opinion" as essential to the healthy operation of democratic governance. This is a truism.

Parliament needs better and regular information to consider and calculate the impact of these complex global arrangements on Canadian life. Trade touches practically every Canadian. Almost every Canadian job is affected by Canadian trade. Parliament needs a broader level of expertise to strategically assess and react to swift changes in complex international trade, policy and practices. Hence, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs' recommendation in its report today to the government that an annual report be made to Parliament to allow the committee of the Senate an opportunity to consider trade policy and its practices, as it changes from time to time, as a continuum on an annual basis.

Parliamentary committees allow a platform for public participation in the evolving policies of the WTO. They also provide affordable access and a safety valve for wider public participation in these global processes.

We live in a global era. No one can deny that. We need precision, practices, policies and people to navigate the Canadian ship of state through the confusing cross-currents and treacherous shoals of global trade.

May I commend the Prime Minister and the Minister of International Trade for their leadership on the trade front. We now need informed public policies of surveillance to match progressive policies.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I also want to highlight the importance of this proposed legislation which we are being asked to pass today. I cannot think of one single piece of legislation that will affect all of our lives as much as this.

For the purposes of brevity, I would associate myself with the comments made by Senator Bolduc about the effect of the World Trade Organization agreement and the history which has led to this point.

I also want to associate myself with Senator Grafstein's remarks, with one exception: I do not believe that trade has become our agenda this year. I want to commend the previous government which had the foresight to see that a rules-based economic system was absolutely necessary for the survival of Canada. I would add that there is no such thing as a distinction between domestic policy and foreign policy.

I also want to commend the government of the day and, in particular, Minister MacLaren for the vigour with which he has pursued and continued the direction that was started, and for being able to present the legislation to us at this point.

Canada cannot talk about employment and jobs without having a long-range perspective. The World Trade Organization gives us that opportunity to look to the future. It gives us a playing field where we will, in fact, be able to rely on some rules which may operate to our advantage.

However, the World Trade Organization is an embryonic organization. It has yet to be implemented. The structure of the panels has not yet been decided. We are uncertain how disputes will actually be dealt with. Therefore, it will require the consistent and continued effort of this government to deal with the structure and implementation of the World Trade Organization as a priority issue.

My concern throughout has not been that the legislation is flawed. It is not a perfect piece of legislation. However, any legislation which must involve over 100 countries with different cultures and perspectives cannot be a perfect document for one country. It is the best effort, given the changing times, the lack of certainty and the history, towards any uniform system.

What will be required in Canada, and what I believe is missing to date, is a strategic plan by the government on how it will interpret the agreement, how it will offset advantageous interpretations which may benefit other countries as opposed to ours.

It seems to me that while we have continued to have a good team, both from the bureaucracy and from the political side, in putting our points forward, they have continued to take reactive positions rather than proactive positions.

I, therefore, support the committee's recommendation that there be further scrutiny. Only if political will is brought to bear on the World Trade Organization and upon our partners in world trade will we have an effective, long-range hope for jobs and security in Canada. More parliamentary and public scrutiny can only involve Canadians in understanding and encouraging the government in the right direction and into the art of the possible.

I ponder how many Canadians know that this bill, which will affect their lives, will be passed today. We were told that, in some countries, over 40 per cent of the public polled were aware that a World Trade Organization agreement was being signed.

The recommendation of the Senate committee is timely to further support what I think is an appropriate long-term strategy for world trade. Only if the Senate and the Canadian public is vigilant will we have the level playing field that we so earnestly hope to achieve.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I would begin by drawing attention to the second paragraph of the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which deals with Bill C-57, to implement an agreement to establish the World Trade Organization.

The second paragraph reads:

> The Committee is of the opinion that the World Trade Organization will come under justified criticism unless adequate provision is made to ensure political accountability, transparency, and relevance.

• (1550)

In my mind, that concern flows from the evidence which we heard during the hearings of the special joint committee examining Canada's foreign policy. We heard testimony about the international financial institutions, including the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

As the report says, increasingly serious questions are being asked about the future of the system and the structures and roles of today's family of IFIs, the IMF, the World Bank group, regional development banks, and the Bank for International Settlements.

During its hearings, the committee heard, as the committee report points out, numerous complaints about the international financial institutions. For many of the witnesses, these institutions have become bureaucratic and undemocratic behemoths which are not sufficiently accessible, open or accountable, and which operate in a world of their own, largely insulated from competitive discipline and the concerns of ordinary people.

The report goes on to say that there is dissatisfaction with the lack of sensitivity to such concerns and of public transparency in the procedures used to design and apply structural adjustment policies. Some of the criticism has been harsh and reflects a loss of public confidence, which threatens to undermine Canadians' support for multilateral institutions generally.

The committee to which I have referred, basing itself on recommendations presented to the committee, made a series of recommendations in the expectation that the international financial institutions will reform themselves and will overcome the obstacles which prevent them from holding public confidence today.

There is today no World Trade Organization. As Senator Andreychuk states, it is embryonic. It is in the process of formation. We have heard about the high expectations which are held for the World Trade Organization and the agreements that lay behind it.

Yesterday, a witness from Washington told us that the United States expects to gain enormous benefits from the World Trade Organization and the dispute settlement mechanism, particularly in the field of intellectual property. Similar benefits will flow to other countries.

There is a provision now, we are confidently told, by which trade disputes between member countries will be settled in a dispassionate and judicial manner. These settlements will be binding upon countries. If any particular country fails to abide by a decision, the plaintiff can bring forward retaliatory action. Because of the importance of this mechanism and the world stake in trade, it is my view that the World Trade Organization will be increasingly important. It will become a more powerful organization, and, as Senator Andreychuk has pointed out, have implications for the welfare of citizens in all the member countries.

Having said all of that, I ask myself, "What provision has been made to prevent the World Trade Organization from falling into the same trap of non-accountability that has befallen the international financial institutions?" There is today no world trade organization, but we are setting one up. Who will control the organization? The bureaucrats in Geneva? The missions from individual countries who will congregate in Geneva and develop their own unique trade culture which will become the philosophy that they, with missionary zeal, will attempt to portray to the member governments? What provision is there that there will be political control, which has obviously not been the case in the institutions that we asked to be reformed in our report?

As the report from the committee which has examined the bill points out, there will be a ministerial conference with authority to direct the work of the World Trade Organization and to take decisions on all matters under any of the multilateral trade agreements. The same report goes on to say, however, that the conference is to meet as infrequently as once every two years. It is merely laid out that the ministers will be in charge and they will meet at least every two years. There is absolutely no provision for any structure or any procedure to ensure that in fact political control, direction and accountability will be in place.

Unless steps are taken now, there will be a drift towards bureaucratic control, as was stated by one of the witnesses before the committee in a Freudian slip, telling us that the bureaucracy ran the European Union. The British have been complaining that bureaucrats in Brussels are running the show and the Parliament has damn little to say. That is the contention, at least, of a wing of the British political class.

We — that is, the committee examining the bill — think it is urgent that the Government of Canada develop a strategy to produce structures and procedures which will ensure political ministerial control of this important future organization.

I wish to point out the dangers if this organization becomes insulated from the political forces which are at work, not only in Canada but throughout the world, to link other objectives of society to the question of trade. In the report of the special joint committee it is called "trade linkages." and we point out that we heard a large number of voices advocating that Canada and other countries attach normative conditions to trading relationships and should discriminate in their trade against countries which violate human rights, are careless with the environment, abuse women or children, or suppress labour.

We have concluded as a committee that this is a vital concern. Human rights, environment and labour standards have a place in trade considerations. We say that as soon as the WTO is established, Canada should bring to that body's attention not only the trade linkages mentioned above, but also the problems associated with trade and investment that arise when higher yields attract capital to places where there is little in the way of social or environmental programs.

If the World Trade Organization and Canada are to deal with the representations of Canadian labour and the labour movement in other countries, just to mention one facet of the problem, then the World Trade Organization has to be equipped politically to deal with those worldwide trends.

Not only must ministers run the show, but there must be a link between the World Trade Organization and domestic constituencies. One of the domestic constituencies is the Parliament of Canada. We think there ought to be a link between the World Trade Organization and Parliament. We should make specific proposals that members of Parliament should be part of the delegations to the ministerial conferences, and that the minister be asked to report annually to both houses of Parliament on the functioning of the organization and on all significant issues requiring decision by Canada, and affecting Canadian interests. We recommend that such reports be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs for consideration and report.

In addition to Parliament, there are powerful, growing constituencies concerned with environmental issues, human rights and labour standards. How are these forces to be dealt with within the World Trade Organization? How are they to be handled politically? How is the World Trade Organization to remain alive and sensitive to these social and political trends? It can only be done if the necessary structures and procedures are put in place, if it is open and accessible, and if all the interested parties have an opportunity to make their contribution to the evolution of this organization.

Unless steps are taken now, honourable senators, in years ahead we will hear the same complaint about the World Trade Organization as we now hear about the IMF and the World Bank: that it lacks accountability, transparency and relevance. The purport of this committee report is to alert the government, now, that this is an important issue; to ask it to lay out a strategy so that Canada can take the lead in ensuring that the World Trade Organization becomes a centre for political direction and where political concerns can be heard; and, furthermore, that it include, for example, as we indicate in the report, the opportunity for other constituencies such as labour and human rights to be part of the ministerial delegations so these concerns can be heard and dealt with at the World Trade Organization.

Honourable senators, we are looking ahead. We heard in testimony that Canada, as part of the G-7, must look at its performance; that unless it becomes more active and aggressive, it will not continue to hold the prestige it holds today. We recommend that the government, in preparation for the summit in Halifax, prepare a general strategy on economic institutions so we can take a role of substance in the G-7. Part of that strategy is what we do in terms of the World Trade Organization.

My purpose, honourable senators, is to support the report of the committee, to invite the government to pay attention to what we say, and to invite members of the Senate, in the future, to be vigilant in ensuring that these sound proposals have been respected in the operation of the World Trade Organization.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I have a few brief remarks which I would begin by congratulating the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs on its report which, I think, targets a major concern.

The Minister for International Trade, the Honourable Roy MacLaren, told us in committee this morning that he would return — assuming he is still Minister for International Trade — to the committee in a year's time to report on the concerns raised this morning by Senator Gauthier, Senator Grafstein and others in the committee, and which have been fleshed out and made much more specific in the debate this afternoon.

Honourable senators, I would add that I believe the passage of this bill will help diversify Canada's exports to many more countries. I believe it will be of great advantage to Canada in establishing a framework of rules that will be based upon objective criteria, almost trade law. In fact, over time, while I agree with ministerial and political responsibility, it is necessary to allow the WTO as an institution to evolve with respect to its dispute settlement mechanisms, an objective set of criteria, and credibility in the settlement of issues.

There is much left to do, honourable senators, on issues of specific concern to Canada. However, that is a stage along the road. The government will have a platform on which it can proceed to concern itself with issues such as steel and sugar in dealing with the United States, and in dealing with many other issues of international concern.

Honourable senators, I commend the Senate to approve this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Austin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that this bill be read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

December 15, 1994

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that The Right Honourable Ramon John Hnatyshyn, Governor General of Canada, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 15th day of December 1994, at 16:30, for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

FUTURE OF AGRICULTURE IN CANADA

REPORT OF AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE REQUESTING AUTHORITY TO TRAVEL ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fifth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry (budget—study on the future of agriculture in Canada).

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, yesterday, during a discussion, I undertook to confirm for Senator Lynch-Staunton that the total amount budgeted for the shared compensations with the House of Commons — assuming the study with the House of Commons proceeds — did not exceed, by my calculation, $22,270. Senator Lynch-Staunton wished to ensure that no other parts of the budget or no amount in excess of that would be spent for those purposes.

• (1610)

Senator Lynch-Staunton, the best way I can satisfy you on that is to undertake, to you and to this chamber, to monitor that budget to ensure that no amount in excess of what is provided for in the proposed budget is spent.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): I thank Senator Hays for his explanation. It is much appreciated.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SENATE ESTIMATES 1995-96—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1995-96), presented in the Senate on December 8, 1994.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I apologize for being distracted but it was for a valid reason. I spoke, more or less, directly to the thirteenth report of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee yesterday during Question Period. In fact, I probably bootlegged comments which had nothing to do with the Question Period. In a way, I think I touched upon most of the points I would have wanted to raise by way of a more formal intervention in this matter. Nevertheless, I do want to come back very briefly on one or two of those points.

My main concern has to do with the way in which, what shall I call it, the "boutique" or the "shop" of inter-parliamentary relations has developed within Parliament over a number of years. I myself have been here for 26 years now, since 1968. I have had experience in both houses as well as on a number of inter-parliamentary associations.

In fact at one point I was international vice-president of AIPLF, l'Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française. Quite possibly I would have become president of that international association had it not been for the very tense relations in those days between Quebec and the federal government over, again, the issue of separation. As you can suspect, Quebec was very active on that front and there is no way they could have supported and underlined, anyhow, the possibility of my becoming an international vice-president, as remote as that would have been. Nevertheless, that factor was there.

I have had some experience at all levels, including organizations of international meetings here in Ottawa, as well as participating on some of the smaller, strictly bilateral inter-parliamentary associations such as Canada-France. I participated on the IPU, et cetera.

The amazing thing about inter-parliamentary relations is that it has evolved. It seems to have evolved in the anterooms of Parliament, not so much on the floor of the houses.

This is again a very good example of what happens. There is under way a so-called major reform of the way we do business within the confines of the current structures of the inter-parliamentary exchanges "shop." Those structures filter through us, through the thirteenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Of course, you do not see in that report any mention of any inter-parliamentary exchanges. You have to, first of all, identify the proper item which takes you to a subheading, and so on. You then realize there is such a thing as an inter-parliamentary organization whose function was to coordinate the numerous activities and exchanges between parliamentarians within the associations.

I wish to speak to the important point of who should set the general policy for the way in which these associations are administered. You have to realize that, having examined everything, the House of Commons runs the show. The traditional policy has been that the Senate contributes 30 per cent of its budget and the House of Commons pays the rest, so it is normal that they should have the final say in everything. The current reform being proposed is that half of the recognized inter-parliamentary associations will be administered by the Senate and half administered by the House of Commons; nonetheless, the policy-making body will be — and I stand corrected — controlled, by force of sheer numbers, by the House of Commons.

I do not think that is acceptable for a number of reasons. I want to save some thunder for another speech when this matter again comes before the Senate, as was suggested by Senator Di Nino yesterday: that we debate this issue by way of an inquiry or some other instrument under the rules to give it a proper airing.

From my most recent experience on inter-parliamentary exchanges, I have come to the conclusion that we could do better. We could have better exchanges. We could have more frequent and more productive exchanges. That would be not only to the benefit of us as Canadians but also to the benefit of those with whom we meet, whether we meet on their turf or they come here to Canada to debate with us. The press has, on a number of occasions, decried these exchanges as junkets. I think it is basically unfair, in view of the larger objective that is sought under the umbrella of these exchanges.

Something positive always comes out of the exchanges. I have said before and, without belabouring the point, I repeat, it is good for Canadian parliamentarians to travel abroad, to meet legislators from other jurisdictions, to compare notes, to discuss policy and every other issue with which we should be preoccupied.

The press has tended to minimize the importance of these encounters, and that is regrettable. However, I am taking a side path with respect to the real issue I want to bring before the Senate.

I cannot accept the proposal now before us that the House of Commons would dominate the policy decision-making body with respect to inter-parliamentary exchanges. Half of the representatives on that body should be from this institution and half from the other side, in the name of the independence of both houses. If it is fact, and I do not know whether it is, that we participate in these associations on "invitation" from the House of Commons, that is another matter. I will decide whether I want to be a member on that basis.

However, I do not think that that is the spirit or the intention. All I am seeking is equality of representation. We do not have that, and I think we should strive for it. If we cannot obtain that parity with the House of Commons in terms of deciding on policy, then let us forget about it and set up our own inter-parliamentary associations.

I am not saying that we should not join with the House of Commons on associations such as the CPA, the AIPLF or the IPU, but I think we would gain very much by having separate associations which would deal from upper house to upper house. We should have an association which deals directly with the French Senate. I do not know if the British Lords are interested, but I think there would be tremendous benefit in having a bilateral exchange between the upper houses, and with other institutions as well, in order that we can talk shop about those matters which really interest us.

That is the reason I raised a number of questions the other day. It takes nothing away from the commoners.

Senator Gigantès: Except the pleasure of our company.

Senator Corbin: Yes, except the pleasure of our company. I would like to be more active. When the House of Commons runs things, it tends to think about its own interests and we are left with the crumbs. I want an association to be really active, not in sightseeing or tourism, but in in-depth seminars on fundamental matters of mutual interest. There is not enough of that taking place, even within the IPU. They are spread so thin and are so global that, although one does get a general education on human rights issues and that sort of thing, when it comes down to the meat and gravy, one is overwhelmed by the sheer number of people attending these affairs.

That is why I favour smaller associations, more compact programs and more frequent reports. I applaud the 50-50 split in terms of administration but it must go that additional step. We must be on an equal footing in determining the general policy of associations.

Honourable senators, I will say nothing more. We ought to adopt the report and return to this matter another day.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I found Senator Corbin's remarks quite stimulating. They led me to agree with him and others who might have suggested that we ought to take a deep look at the international activities of parliamentarians. I am not approaching this in any negative way, but we in Canada are in a period in which we must use all the resources at our disposal in the most effective way in the advancement of Canada's interests. I believe the fundamental question is: How can these parliamentary exchanges be used to advance Canada's interests and to project Canada's values? That is the real test.

In my view, the Parliament of Canada is one of the great underutilized resources in the advancement of Canadian interests abroad. One example was forcibly brought to our attention in the hearings we recently had on Canada's foreign policy. We were told that the situation has been greatly transformed in the United States, that it is no longer effective or fully useful to go to the executive branch of government in order to advance Canadian interests. That is still done but, increasingly, members of the embassy staff must go to the legislators, the senators and members of the House of Representatives, to advance Canadian interests. They do not go to the White House. The locus has changed.

Mr. Allan Gotlieb said in his testimony before the committee that there have been deep changes in the way in which the U.S. system operates. They have a decentralized power situation in Congress where the committee chairmen and subcommittee chairmen are the true exercisers of executive power.

What is the Canadian Parliament doing to take advantage of the natural affinity between legislators to advance Canadian interests? We are holding an annual event through the Canada-U.S. Parliamentary Union which is just a dim shadow of what would be possible if we paid more attention and used Canadian parliamentarians in the advancement of Canadian interests.

That is one aspect which we must consider more carefully. We must try to reform ourselves to be more effective, more forceful and more useful to Canada in Washington, where there is a natural place for us to work and achieve results.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motion.

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 14, 1995 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. William J. Petten (Acting Deputy Leader of the Government): I am sure that all honourable senators are well aware that we are subject to recall at any time.

I should like to remind all honourable senators that the Governor General will be installed on February 8, 1995 at 10:30 in the forenoon.

While I am on my feet, I would like to second the remarks of Senator DeWare. I, too, should like to wish our staff, our colleagues and their families all the best for the coming season and a happy and prosperous 1995.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

The Honourable Gilbert Parent, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995 (Bill C-63, Chapter 48, 1994)

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the said bill.

[English]

The Honourable Gilbert Parent, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Excellency,

I realize that this is not in keeping with protocol but, since this is the last occasion we will appear before you, on behalf of my colleagues in the House of Commons I should like to thank you for serving Canada so well over the last six years.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

---

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I read the adjournment motion, I wish to thank all of you for your cooperation and understanding, and wish all of you a very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

To our staff in the Senate, our thanks for all their work in the past year, and to all of them and their families, a very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

Of course, you are all invited, honourable senators, to the reception in the Speaker's chambers when we adjourn. I would extend my invitation to the pages on this occasion.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 14, 1995, at 2 p.m..

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 14, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE B. ALASDAIR GRAHAM

TRIBUTE ON APPOINTMENT AS DEPUTY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Before we proceed to the business of the day, I should like to welcome all honourable senators back.

[Translation]

To you, ladies, I wish you a very happy Saint Valentine's Day.

[English]

I should like to pay my compliments to my colleague Senator Graham who has replaced me in the role of Deputy Leader of the Government.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

ADDRESSES AT INSTALLATION PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move:

> That the Address of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, P.C., at the Installation of the Right Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, P.C., as Governor General of Canada on February 8, 1995, together with the reply of His Excellency the Governor General thereto, be printed as an Appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to call the attention of senators to two closely related matters. February is set aside as Black History Month in Canada and the United States. As well, 1995 has been designated the United Nations Year of Tolerance. Both deal with the treatment of minorities. Both are designed to call attention to the struggles of minorities for equality.

As one of the first Canadian-born blacks appointed to this chamber, I take great pride in claiming as one of the constituencies I represent in this place the black population of Canada and, in particular, the black population of Nova Scotia, the province in which I was born and brought up.

The purpose of designating February as Black History Month is to recognize, learn, celebrate and honour the accomplishments of black people. The concept of setting aside a specific part of each year to look at the history and accomplishments of black people had its origins in 1926 in the United States as "Negro History Week" which was proposed by Carter G. Woodson, a black educator and publisher who lived in New Canton, Virginia. He felt that the mainstream history texts in the schools of the United States virtually ignored the positive accomplishments of black people. In his view, the only way to celebrate this rich culture was to move outside the normal curriculum and establish special events to call attention to the history of black people in the United States.

I am of the same belief as Carter Woodson. There is in Canada this same pattern of omission to mention the achievements of the contributions of people of African decent born and living in Canada.

A knowledge of one's history is critical when looking to the future. As a people, blacks must know where they have been, what they have been and how much they have accomplished, so that they may proceed into the future seeking justice and equality — seeking an end to racism and discrimination.

How many honourable senators know that in 1608 in the French settlement of Acadia, Nova Scotia, Governor De Monts had a black man, Matthew Da Costa, as his navigator and translator?

In Canada, in 1995, it seems more important than ever to recognize the achievements of many minorities, especially black Canadians. Criticisms levelled against multiculturalism, along with cruel racist remarks and actions recently reported on our television sets, leave me gravely concerned as to the future of programs designed to bring equality to black people.

Most have seen the photographs of the dead 16-year-old Somali, Shidane Arone, taken with Master Corporal Clayton Matchee, as well as the two recently released — and there is now a third — home videos. The first video released gave graphic evidence of the feelings of certain members of the Canadian Airborne Regiment in Somalia towards Somali people. "We ain't killed enough niggers yet," is not a phrase that I would have thought would ever be heard from a Canadian soldier. The video of the initiation rite at Camp Petawawa with the same regiment depicts a black soldier being led around on a leash with, "I love the Ku Klux Klan," spelled out in excrement smeared over his back.

This is one of the many reasons why it is important that we recognize and celebrate Black History Month in this United Nations Year of Tolerance. As UNESCO's Director General stated on December 29, 1994:

> From now on, in the conscience and behaviour of each of us, tolerance should assume its strongest significance: not simply the acceptance of others with their differences, but a spontaneous movement towards others, to know them better and to know ourselves better through them, to share with them, to extend to them the hand of fellowship and compassion, so that universal values, common to all, are enriched by the previous individuality of every culture and every language, and by the irreplaceable creativity of every person.

I have previously called on the Senate leadership to establish a Standing Committee on Human Rights. I believe that Black History Month 1995 in the UN Year of Tolerance would be an appropriate time in which to establish this committee.

NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF DESIGNATION AS NATIONAL EMBLEM

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, welcome back. On a slightly different note, let me say that this is a very important day in the history of Canada. Thirty years ago today, we inaugurated our new Canadian flag. It is a wonderful thing to remember that, as Canadians, we are united under one flag. I think we ought to celebrate that date.

Today is also the fiftieth anniversary of the end of the Second World War, which was also a great day.

AMENDMENTS TO SENTENCING PROVISIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: In recent months there has been increasing concern among the public in all parts of Canada with respect to the offences committed by both young offenders and adult criminals while on periods of probation, or during periods of mandatory release. Some of the cases have been utterly gruesome, and we have read about them in our newspapers. There is also an increasing concern in regard to the commission of offences by persons recently released from prison. This is an ongoing problem in Canadian society, and one many of us believe requires parliamentary review, with a view to making further amendments to the Criminal Code in order to provide the courts with additional tools for dealing with repeat offenders.

A good example of this situation concerns a young woman in the province of British Columbia who appears to have been sexually assaulted and subsequently murdered by a person who had been sentenced to 10 years in prison for sexual assault. In passing sentence on this matter, the Honourable Mr. Justice Ross Culver commented that the accused was a "walking time bomb," and that he wished that there was more he could do to protect society. At that time, the accused could be sentenced only to a 10-year period of incarceration. A psychiatric report concerning the background of the accused indicated that clearly he would present a long-term danger to the public.

During his period of incarceration, the accused refused any treatment and was not given parole. However, on his mandatory release date, this "walking time bomb" was released into the community with no further supervision. We all know of the horrible events that transpired. The tragedy that resulted in Surrey may have been the inevitable result of these actions.

The subsequent disappearance of young children such as British Columbia's Mindy Tran and so many others in British Columbia and throughout Canada is causing increasing alarm in our communities. We need to enforce the dangerous offenders provision of the Criminal Code. However, that provision can only be used in extremely limited circumstances. Perhaps it is time to look at amending the Criminal Code in order to provide for long-term, mandatory sentences for certain types of offenders such as child molesters and any type of violent sexual offender.

This may also be true with respect to making changes to the Young Offenders Act. Some changes have already been made. What seems to generally upset and outrage the public is the prospect of a young offender committing a murder at 17 and being released, scot free, into the community at the age of 22. Perhaps provisions should be made that require ongoing supervision of that young offender well into his adult life. An example of one solution is the concept of determinate and indeterminate sentencing.

An overall review of the whole question of sentencing may also reveal some of the shortfalls of the federal and provincial correctional services. One of the ongoing frustrations for counsel in criminal courts — and they write and tell me of their frustrations, as they do you — is to see the inadequacy of the facilities that exist to deal with potential violent offenders, spousal abusers, and sexual offenders.

It is high time we took a very hard look at whether or not our correctional system is meeting the needs of the public. The courts need to be given additional tools that would allow them to effectively deal with offenders. The Criminal Code makes absolutely no provision for electronic monitoring and other techniques which are currently being used on an ad hoc basis in each province to deal with certain types of offenders. It is high time that the Criminal Code was brought into the nineties, and gave very strict guidelines for dealing with the real world where the sentencing and the handling of criminal offenders is carried out.

If there is anything that can be done to avoid a repetition of the tragedies that have taken place in this country in recent months, and have occurred elsewhere from coast to coast with dangerous offenders being released into the community, it is the duty of those who serve in Parliament to look into these matters and ensure that something is done quickly.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 14, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

SEVENTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined a proposal from the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons with respect to greater Senate involvement in the administration of Parliamentary Associations.

Your Committee recommends that:

1) a Joint Inter-Parliamentary Council, to be composed of two (2) senators representing the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and five (5) members of the House of Commons, be established to deal with all matters relating to Parliamentary Associations;

2) as of April 1, 1995, the Senate assume full administrative responsibility and staffing for four Parliamentary Associations (Inter-Parliamentary Union, North Atlantic Treaty Organization/North Atlantic Assembly, Canada-Europe and Canada-France), while the House of Commons will continue to staff and service the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, the International Assembly of French-Speaking Parliamentarians, Canada-U.S. and Canada-Japan;

3) delegates travel economy class using the least expensive fare, with APEX or excursion fares being used whenever possible; and

4) there be no subsidization of spousal participation in parliamentary delegations travelling outside Canada except by approval of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons in circumstances dictated by strict protocol considerations.

Your Committee further recommends that, pursuant to rule 86(1)(f)(i), the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders consider proposing a rule concerning reports to the Senate by returning inter-parliamentary delegations.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY BILL

Hon. John Sylvain, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 14, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-46, An Act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other Acts, has examined the said Bill in obedience to its Order of Reference dated Tuesday, December 13, 1994, and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN SYLVAIN
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Sylvain, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

• (1420)

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, February 15, 1995 at 1:30 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-53, to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other Acts.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, February 16, 1995.

IMMIGRATION ACT
CITIZENSHIP ACT
CUSTOMS ACT

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-44, to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, February 16, 1995.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE BILL

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-47, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act and to make related amendments to other Acts.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, February 16, 1995.

CANADA-JAPAN INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

REPORT OF THIRD ANNUAL MEETING OF ASIA-PACIFIC PARLIAMENTARY FORUM TABLED

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Canada-Japan Inter-Parliamentary Group, respecting its participation at the Third Annual Meeting of the Asia-Pacific Parliamentary Forum, held in Acapulco, Mexico, from January 13 to 14, 1995.

The Asia-Pacific Parliamentary Forum, which was inaugurated January 1993, is quickly becoming an important voice in dealing with political and security matters, cooperative economic arrangements and other key regional issues. At the same time, the Asia-Pacific region is becoming increasingly significant in the achievement of Canada's goals in trade and technology acquisition, in job creation, in sustaining a sound global environment and in managing the demographics of immigration.

Honourable senators, in 1997, Canada will host the heads of government and the ministerial meetings of the Asia-Pacific Economic Council. The government is considering that 1997 be declared the Year of Asia-Pacific in Canada. I am pleased to add that Canada has also been asked to host the fifth meeting of the Asia-Pacific Parliamentary Forum in 1997.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable Senators, I have the honour to present a petition, signed by certain citizens of Canada. The petitioners voice their support for the Canadian Wheat Board and request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley for export.

HEALTH

PROTECTION OF CONSCIENCE IN MEDICAL PROCEDURES—
PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am pleased again to place in the hands of the Clerk a petition expressing the plea identical to the one I read in the Senate chamber on March 17 last. The petitioners pray that the Senate and Parliament assembled protect health care workers in regard to their freedom of conscience in the workplace. These petitions contain the signatures of 998 persons from various places throughout Canada.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

APPLICATION OF SIMILAR RULES IN ALL PROVINCES—

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In early December I asked a question of the leader regarding the application of regional development dollars across Canada. At that time, I mentioned that I was in favour of repayable assistance in Atlantic Canada, the same as the policy that is applied in Western Canada. My question related to FEDNOR.

The answer I received indicates that FORD-Q in Quebec operates on repayable loans, but that with FEDNOR there seems to be a difference. As I understand it, contributions over $100,000 are repayable and those under $100,000 are evaluated on a case-by-case basis, focusing on the business details of each client application. Also, the answer indicates that the policy is under review, with further refinements anticipated for the next fiscal year.

Would the Leader of the Government inform the Senate whether a decision has been made to apply government funds in Ontario in the same manner as they are applied in the rest of the country?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to review that answer with the minister involved for further clarification.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

PROPOSED IMPOSITION OF U.S. BORDER-CROSSING TAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government. As she is probably aware, there has been a lot of speculation in the press regarding the possibility or probability — I am not sure which — of a detrimental policy taken up by the U.S. President and the U.S. Congress regarding a border-crossing tax.

Now, in my small province of New Brunswick, and it is true of other provinces as well, thousands of people live on the border, and many of them work on the American side and cross daily. Their families and relatives live on both sides of the border. For example, people on Campobello Island who want to come to mainland New Brunswick will be forced to pay for two border crossings in one day if they come over and go back the same day.

Would the leader enlighten the Senate on that intention proposed by the President before Congress? Also, will this issue be raised by the Prime Minister during President Clinton's visit next week?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as you well know, the news of this particular proposal received a very negative response in all areas on the Canadian side. I believe there has been some movement on this issue, and I will try to get the most recent update on the issue for the honourable senator, perhaps by tomorrow.

Certainly there has been the hope that this kind of development could be resolved and clarified in some way prior to the visit of President Clinton to Canada next week.

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

REPORTED ILLITERACY RATE IN CANADA—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The minister, no doubt, is aware that the Standing Committee on Human Resources and Development in the other place recently tabled its report entitled, "Security Opportunities and Fairness: Canadians Reviewing Their Social Programs." At page 81, that report speaks to the minister's own portfolio interest, namely literacy, and states that in many regions of the country the rate of illiteracy is unacceptably high.

As the minister of the government responsible for literacy, do you agree with that statement?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with the statement that, in some parts of our country, illiteracy levels or the lack of functional literacy is unacceptably high. For a country as developed and as caring as Canada, we have an illiteracy level that is unacceptably high.

The honourable senator will know that, in most recent years, Statistics Canada has provided a basis of statistics which have outlined the levels of people suffering from basic illiteracy, and then slightly above that, a huge chunk of people who are unable to cope with everyday situations without a great deal of support and effort. Statistics Canada has placed those levels at a total of 38 per cent of our adult Canadian population.

As I have said many times, and probably also in this house, we cannot be on the cutting edge of the new century and new technology if we have that many millions of Canadians who are, at this point in time, unable to participate fully and to contribute in some meaningful way to our country's future.

Perhaps that is one of the reasons the Prime Minister has put an emphasis on this issue. It is an issue with which I have been engaged for over a decade, more particularly within the last year, and with the very welcome support and encouragement, I must say, of colleagues on both sides of this house and, I hope, of an increasing number of members in the other house.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I thank the minister for that encouraging response.

The minister touches on a problem which many of us have in attempting to understand the magnitude of illiteracy in Canada. In terms of the definition of "literacy," could the minister responsible for literacy explain to the house how that department is now defining the literacy base? What is the criteria? What is the baseline?

Senator Fairbairn: As Senator Kinsella knows, the definition of literacy is an imprecise one, and a movable one as situations change in our country. There is a fundamental line, I suppose, for which we are looking, other than simply not being able to read and write, and there is clearly a small core of those people. However, we are also talking about people who do not have sufficient skills in reading and writing to do routine daily tasks which you and I would take for granted, and you will find that there are 22 per cent of adult Canadians in that category.

During this whole process of consultation on social security reform, we have talked, for instance, about areas in this country where training and retraining is a major problem. Because of such examples as our experience in Atlantic Canada and the loss there of a fundamental industry, the fishery, we are also talking about how we can use new methods of teaching. Can we use computers which themselves address a literacy component? Can we use different methods of bringing people from those areas into training situations where they can learn new occupations which have, unfortunately, not been open to them in the past? It is fundamental that we are able to do these things.

I cannot answer your question precisely because there is no precise answer. If you look at yet another level of employment in this country, you will find a literacy component there that is strongly technological. I am one who does not have sufficient skills in that area. Basically we are looking for people to learn new ways or upgraded ways of earning a living particularly, but also, as you would accept, new qualities of life. We want to enable them to participate in reading and writing, not just for work but for the enjoyment of living.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government and reflects similar concerns. I am referring to the whole issue of literacy in this country. As you know, in the Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister renewed a commitment made during the election campaign to restore funding for the National Literacy Secretariat to its original level.

I will not repeat the statistics which have already appeared in the report to which Senator Kinsella and, I believe, the minister referred. It is estimated that three million Canadians hardly know how to read and write, and that four million are unable to read an average text. Today, about a year and half since this government was elected, could the minister tell us specifically the kind of programs that have been put in place?

We just heard an interesting discussion about literacy levels and finding out the extent of the problem. But specifically, first of all, has funding been restored for the National Literacy Secretariat and second, what specific programs have been put in place to remedy the situation, and what kind of evaluation procedures have been implemented to evaluate the results of such programs?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would ask you to indulge me again for a few minutes in order to answer Senator Lavoie-Roux's question.

First of all, funding was restored to the National Literacy Secretariat. As my honourable friend knows, the secretariat enters into agreements in relation to that funding. In other words, the secretariat levers that funding with the provinces because the federal government, of course, cannot deliver services in literacy on the ground throughout Canada, nor should we, because we are too far from the ground in many respects to be able to know what are the most appropriate programs and projects that should be funded. In these agreements with the provinces, the secretariat has been enormously successful over the last almost six years since the former government brought in the program.

In the course of working with the provinces in forming and approving the types of projects on which this money will be spent, the secretariat also puts in place a procedure for annual assessments as to the viability of the efforts, as to whether they should continue and, if necessary, as to how they may be changed. Thus, there is an assessment at both levels.

In terms of the tangibles and how one can alter these statistics, I can tell Senator Lavoie-Roux that it is darned hard to influence them in any visible way. However, I could have the secretariat provide to my honourable friend a list of the projects and programs that are in place, especially those dealing with how to teach and to draw distinctions between people who have different levels of need. In the past year, it has been proven that for a certain level, one of the ways this can be done with great success is by focusing on family-oriented literacy, for example, involving single mothers in learning with their children.

In a tangible sense, we also have added to the responsibilities of the secretariat a literacy program involving the Atlantic groundfish strategy. This program will be available in communities to help to increase training and basic education levels. Such a program enables people to go on to further training. These programs have been negotiated with the provinces and are now in train.

Honourable senators, I would be more than happy to have someone from the literacy secretariat speak to the honourable senator about the specifics of the limited amount of money that is spent throughout Canada, and the degree to which those funds are enhanced because of the cooperation of the provinces, national groups, local advocates and operatives.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I am happy to know that there are assessment measures but, as the minister says, it is not very easy to assess with accuracy the results of the programs put in place. However, I think that measures may be taken in order to assess results a little more seriously.

One of the problems, either in Canada or in the provinces, for other types of programs is that we are relatively generous in implementing the health care or education programs we deem necessary, but our assessments are very weak.

Finally, I think that we may spend a large amount of money on a specific project or cause and realize five, 10 or 15 years later, for example, that the illiteracy rate has gone up instead of down. I wondered if department officials could examine this whole issue in a much more focused way to make sure that we achieve the goals we set.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I said, I would be glad to have someone from the literacy secretariat sit down with the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux to explore this matter in more detail.

Frankly, because of limited resources, assessments of how these programs are working are important because we do not want to waste resources in areas which are not productive. As the honourable senator will appreciate, we are dealing with people who are outside institutional learning. There are no tests and regulations to say that someone has graduated from one level to another. The results are not that precise. Indeed, the same is true with regard to numbers because this is a highly personal issue and one not easily shared by those who suffer from it.

I wish to emphasize that every effort is being made by the federal and provincial governments, as well as business and labour partnerships that have formed over the past two or three years. A keen eye is kept on whether or not these measures are productive.

I assure my honourable friend that it is not a question of just handing out money for the sake of handing out money. This money is precious. If one were to visit these projects and groups anywhere in Canada, one would see that in the vast majority of cases money is being used carefully. It is being spread as widely as it can be spread.

INQUIRY INTO ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This house is all too familiar with the events involving members of Canada's Armed Forces which transpired several years ago in Somalia. Senator Oliver has just reminded us eloquently of them.

The government's promise for a full inquiry into the whole of this matter was welcomed by all of us. Now, however, events seem to be taking a different twist. What was to have been a full inquiry has been replaced by a trial by video, with a new showing and a new cast of characters each week.

Honourable senators, the Department of National Defence went through a lengthy and, at times, difficult process to bring to justice those responsible for what occurred in Somalia, with the promise of a broader investigation later. Yet, as a result of leaked videotapes, the minister has summarily disbanded a Canadian regiment and fired a top-ranking general without the promised investigation.

Is the planned inquiry into the Canadian Airborne Regiment still on track? When will it take place? If it is to take place, what is its mandate, given that there is no regiment left to investigate?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Sylvain for his question. I concur with him in deploring the unfortunate and troublesome events that have taken place in recent weeks.

As all of us know, in recent days the minister has taken action concerning the Airborne Regiment as a result of information which has come to him. He has affirmed that, indeed, a full public inquiry, headed by a civilian, into the full range of issues will take place following the conclusion of court martial procedures. That is still very much the plan.

As the minister indicated recently, the public inquiry will be broadened to include the actions of officers and the upper echelons of the Defence Department, as well as the issues that caused the inquiry to be initiated in the first place.

These are difficult times, as my honourable friend knows. I can assure him that none of the actions that have been taken in recent days by the minister or the Chief of Defence Staff have been taken lightly.

• (1450)

DISCIPLINARY PRACTICES IN CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Sylvain: I agree that the minister has acted very quickly. My concern is that he has acted without the inquiry which was supposed to take place in order to inform him.

The release of these hazing videos seems to have been done with some particular motive. I am not sure what the motive is, but it can almost be guaranteed that there will be more available, and a certain publication in Ottawa seems to be quite involved in this business.

Will the Leader of the Government assure this chamber that before the Minister of National Defence fires any more of his staff, he will do the extraordinary thing and issue a level-headed, thoughtful statement as to the actions in the videos? Will he promise that this activity will be the subject of a thorough inquiry, in order that we can be told how the problem jumps from the private ranks to the general ranks? Where were the corporals, staff sergeants, second lieutenants, lieutenants, captains and majors when these events took place? How is discipline administered in the Armed Forces these days?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Sylvain, I will be more than happy to send your questions to the minister as very valid questions which need to be answered.

Honourable senators, whatever the motivation is, it has obviously caused considerable turmoil in recent weeks. I have no idea whether there will be more. The Chief of Defence Staff has convened a meeting for Thursday of this week of his commanders, his chief warrant officers and their chiefs of staff, and the personnel involved in all of these areas, in order to review the situation. These people will come from all across Canada, and from all areas of the Armed Forces to review with defence headquarters in Ottawa all forms of initiation practices within the Canadian Forces, with a view to putting forward clear regulations of what is deemed unacceptable in the Canadian Armed Forces at any level.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN— IMPORTANCE OF LITERACY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, my question has to do with literacy and women. In this government's Speech from the Throne, programs were discussed aimed at enhancing the lives of women, including measures to combat the high level of violence against women and children, with a centre of excellence for women's health to be established to ensure that health issues receive the attention they deserve, and the creation and expansion of prenatal nutrition programs for low-income pregnant women.

These are all very fine promises, honourable senators, but they will be all for naught if a key ingredient is missing — literacy. It is well documented that women with poor literacy skills are less able to use their initiative to protect their environment and keep their children healthy. They marry younger and are less likely to use family planning. They may even lack the self-confidence necessary to take the initial step and seek help from any one of these services.

It has often been said that educating women is the single most important step governments can take to improve the health of their citizens and their economies. Educated women are more productive, more competent, marry later, use family planning, and have healthy children.

Will the minister tell us her plans for improving literacy as it relates to women, given that all the enunciated programs for women promised in the Speech from the Throne cannot really be effective without proper literacy levels?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I cannot help but thoroughly applaud Senator Cohen's question and the statements surrounding it. I would like to applaud her, because she has articulated beautifully, and sadly, one of the absolute core issues which surrounds the problem of literacy levels in this country.

In my response to Senator Lavoie-Roux, I referred to the fact that one of the shifts in direction which has taken place in the last year and a half — but especially within the last year — is with respect to family literacy. It has come from the grassroots level. There has been no "Now hear this" from anyone in Ottawa, or from anyone in the provinces.

In the past year, a lot of resources have focused on getting into the communities, and in getting programs and projects together that will focus mainly on women, which is who we are referring to most often when we talk of single parents. We are also trying to get much closer to young women before they reach that stage.

In the past year I attended a national family literacy conference here in Ottawa. A group of young mothers from the Maritimes got on a train and brought their children here. I think Senator Cohen attended as well. This exercise showed us all what these types of programs can do, not only in terms of teaching children but in terms of children motivating parents to learn.

Those are the kinds of programs on which much emphasis has been placed, and will continue to be placed in the future.

The Hon. the Speaker: The time period for questions has expired, but I will accept a last question from Senator Nolin.

PUBLIC WORKS

DECISION OF MINISTER TO BUILD NEW FEDERAL BUILDING IN SAULT STE. MARIE—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CONTRACT

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Thank you, Your Honour. This will be a very short question. It is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Madam Minister, last fall, the Minister of Public Works cancelled a contract for renovating the windows at the Lester B. Pearson Building, the headquarters of the Department of Foreign Affairs. The contract was cancelled. The minister said the contract made no sense at all. This was a contract for two and half million dollars.

Yesterday, the same minister defended a decision by his government and his department, according to which in Sault Ste. Marie, in the riding of the Minister of Indian Affairs, instead of using office buildings where 18 to 20 per cent of the space was vacant, his department decided to proceed with the construction of a new building at a cost of $12 million.

Considering the spending cuts being announced by the Minister of Finance in your government, cuts that we support wholeheartedly, how does your government account for this decision by the Minister of Public Works?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Nolin for his question.

I will preface my response, honourable senators, by saying that the Minister of Public Works, as Senator Nolin knows, is quite a tough nut. I would expect that he has a very solid rationale for the activity that has taken place in Sault Ste. Marie. I will seek an answer to my friend's question which I am sure will satisfy him.

Senator Nolin: Your Honour, I have a supplementary question to follow up on the minister's answer. The Minister of Public Works did, in fact, give us an answer yesterday, during Question Period, because his officials indicated that it was preferable to spend these $12 million because, supposedly, we would save $500,000 a year for the next 25 years by borrowing those $12 million. He admitted, after Question Period, that his officials' figures seemed somewhat suspicious.

Since yesterday, Madam Minister, have you been informed of anything further that might shed some light on this?

• (1500)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I must confess that I have not done so, but that does not mean it is not there to be heard. I will contact my colleague Mr. Dingwall and see if I can get an update for the honourable senator.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, may I ask a brief supplementary?

The Hon. the Speaker: The time for Question Period has expired. Is it agreed that the honourable senator may ask his supplementary question?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, when the minister is asking for information regarding that contract, could she also ask for the details of the contract, that is, the total value of the contract, how much of it was for material and labour, how much of it would have been for consultation and/or commissions, how much of the work had been done, together with whether the material was purchased, and, if so, where that material would be now? In other words, I would like the details of the contract, please.

Senator Fairbairn: I assume the honourable senator would like "the works," and I will try to the best of my ability to get everything.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several responses to oral questions, 11 in number: A response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Pat Carney regarding Canadian pilots and clearance procedures at Mirabel airport; a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 17, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Leonard J. Gustafson regarding the Crow Rate, direct payment to farmers; a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 24, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Duncan J. Jessiman regarding the parole supervision of high-risk offenders; a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 1, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Pat Carney regarding destaffing of lightstations in British Columbia, environmental impact assessment; a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 1, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Leonard J. Gustafson regarding western grain transportation and the backhaul to Thunder Bay; a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 6, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Mira Spivak regarding the amount of export tax paid by tobacco manufacturers; a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 8, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Eymard G. Corbin regarding the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency; a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 8, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Consiglio Di Nino regarding the sale of arms to Thailand; a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 12, 1994 by the Honourable Senator J. Michael Forrestall regarding the replacement of Sea King and Labrador helicopter fleets; a response to questions raised in the Senate on December 13, 1994 by the Honourable Senator Brenda M. Robertson regarding the substitution of loans for subsidies and the application of similar rules in all provinces; and a response to questions raised in the Senate on December 14, 1994, by Senator Forrestall regarding the destaffing of lighthouses.

CUSTOMS

CANADIAN PILOTS— CLEARANCE PROCEDURES AT MIRABEL AIRPORT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Pat Carney on November 15, 1994)

On occasion, some of the crew members on domestic flights operating into Mirabel choose to enter the air terminal building through the Customs area for a variety of reasons. They have indicated that it is easier for them to access their base operations, pick up their vehicles, and that it is a shorter route for them to travel to their intended destination within the airport property.

In an effort to expedite their movement through the terminal building, Revenue Canada has accommodated this type of activity at the request of the air carriers. Crew members choosing to do this are not examined by Customs, but are provided with an E311, Traveller Declaration Card notated Domestic Crew. This card is required from each person, passenger or crew member attempting to leave the Customs area. As it is not always readily possible to differentiate between foreign arriving and domestic originating crew, all crew members present a card at the exit control.

Crew members are subject to full Customs clearance procedures only when they have been outside the country, or when they have flown a portion of an international flight carrying travellers either into or out of Canada. These types of flights are referred to as Progressive Clearance or Progressive Boarding.

Progressive Clearance flights are flights operating into Canada for the purpose of off-loading passengers and crew for Customs clearance at more than one airport of entry in Canada. An example of this would be a flight originating in Prague and arriving in Canada to deplane passengers at Toronto and Mirabel. There are instances, where for positioning purposes, crew members may enplane in Toronto and travel to Mirabel. Upon arrival in Mirabel, all remaining persons on board must deplane and clear Customs. The crew members who boarded the flight in Toronto must also clear Customs in Mirabel as they have had contact with internationally arriving passengers who had not yet cleared Customs.

Progressive Boarding flights are flights departing for a foreign destination whereby passengers and crew are enplaned at more than one authorized airport in Canada. An example of this is a flight destined for London, England. The flight boards passengers destined for London in Toronto and travels to Mirabel. In Mirabel the passengers from Toronto remain on board the aircraft, and passengers from Mirabel destined for London also board the aircraft. Again there are instances, where for positioning purposes, crew members not involved in the operation of the flight, (dead head crew) will board in Toronto and deplane in Mirabel. On arrival in Mirabel these crew members must report to Customs as they have had contact with and access to duty free purchases.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

CROW RATE—DIRECT PAYMENT TO FARMERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson on November 17, 1994)

The government is now examining how changes can be made to the Western Grain Transportation Act — changes which enable Canada to meet its international obligations, and which are a greater benefit domestically. Reform is essential to achieve compliance with the new General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, to respond to the country's fiscal realities, and to remove barriers to economic diversification and growth. Simply maintaining the status quo is an option that makes less and less sense.

Minister Goodale has written to 96 farm groups and other stakeholders outlining the issues and inviting their comments. He is also consulting with as many of the interested parties as is possible. At the same time, Transport Canada has been holding broad discussions with industry about grain freight rates and efficiency issues. Following both sets of consultations, the Ministers of Transport and Agriculture and Agri-Food will make recommendations to Cabinet covering all the various aspects of grain transportation reform. Decisions are expected early this year.

JUSTICE

PAROLE SUPERVISION OF HIGH-RISK OFFENDERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

The Auditor General of Canada report did not specifically identify which parole offices lack resources to properly manage high-risk offenders. However, the Auditor General did note [in exhibit 18.8, on page 18-18 of his report (for text, see appendix, p. 1200)] that there are significant variations between parole offices in the amount of time available for contact supervision with offenders.]

The Correctional Service of Canada responded to the Report of The Auditor General by saying that, in correctional circles, it is generally agreed that parole and probation officers should not be expected to handle more than 30 cases, yet other correctional jurisdiction caseloads may be in excess of 100.

The Correctional Service of Canada is one of the few services in North America that achieves this goal where the average number of supervision cases ranges between 20 and 28. Individual offices may differ from this range owing to geographical consideration i.e. caseload spread over a large rural area. It also depends on the mix of cases and whether the cases are direct supervision or indirect through a third party, such as the John Howard Society, and the other responsibilities borne by community correctional staff, for example, running community correctional facilities or delivering relapse prevention programs.

The Correctional Service is presently conducting a review of its community-based services. Based on the result of this process, additional resources may be reallocated to ensure that supervision interventions with conditionally released offenders continue to place public protection as paramount. Also, there are ongoing discussions with the National Parole Board regarding supervision arrangements for different types of offenders.

Despite the variations in caseloads in some offices, CSC maintains the proper management of high-risk offenders, and public safety is not at risk.

DESTAFFING OF LIGHTSTATIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA— ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT ASSESSMENT— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Pat Carney on December 1, 1994)

The Coast Guard has been operating an automatic unattended light at Cape St. James for many years. The navigation light has a solar power supply. Environment Canada used to operate a staffed weather station at Cape St. James. They removed their three weather observers from the site September, 1992 and have installed an automatic weather gathering station.

Environment Canada had an environmental impact assessment carried out at the site. The destaffing of the weather station was carried out in conformance with the environmental assessment and with the findings of Parks Canada archaeologists. The Haida people also reviewed and video taped the site prior to destaffing.

The building and other facilities on the station were disassembled. The majority of the building materials were either recycled to local communities or barged to a landfill at Sandspit. The only burning that took place was a very small amount of untreated wood material under conditions as prescribed in the environmental assessment. The site was restored to a pristine condition.

The attached document from Environment Canada provides more details.

Senator Carney has raised two issues in her question relating to the destaffing of the Weather Station at Cape St. James in the Queen Charlotte Islands.

Insofar as an environmental impact assessment is concerned, an assessment was performed by the Public Works Canada unit in Calgary which is dedicated to Parks Canada, Western Region. This assessment is available from:

Regional Executive Director
Pacific and Yukon Region
Heritage Canada
Room 1200
800 Burrard Street
Vancouver, British Columbia
V6Z 2N5
(604) 666-2060

In addition to the environmental impact assessment, Parks Canada archaeologists evaluated the site and found no significant artifacts. The Haida people also reviewed and video taped the site prior to destaffing.

The building and other facilities on the station were disassembled. The majority of the building materials were either recycled, to such places as the Haida community at Rose Harbour, or barged to the landfill at Sandspit. The only burning that took place was a very small amount of untreated wood material. The procedures for any burning were prescribed in the Environmental Assessment. The site was restored to a near pristine condition, as required.

As for the question of human safety, Environment Canada performed an internal review of the data requirements needed from this location to fulfil its human safety mandate to provide weather warnings and forecasts. It was determined that the basic elements observed by the replacement automatic weather station and buoy are sufficient to meet this mandate and that maintaining human weather observers at this site was neither necessary nor cost effective. The system of automatic weather observing equipment installed includes an automatic weather station on the same site plus a meteorological buoy moored 25KM South Southwest of Cape St. James.

The Canadian Coast Guard and Transport Canada, Air represent the interests of the marine and aviation user groups which may have been impacted by the destaffing of Cape St. James. Consultation with these agencies was conducted through an ongoing Regional Coordinating Committee.

AGRICULTURE

BACKHAUL TO THUNDER BAY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson on December 1, 1994)

The government will put an end to the practice of backhauling United States bound grain from Thunder Bay to Fort Frances or Winnipeg and then sending it south, simply to qualify for the Western Grain Transportation Act (WGTA) subsidy. Legislative amendments to end this practice were tabled in the House of Commons on December 15, 1994. These amendments will help to make the grain movement system more efficient and better able to meet the needs of Canada's grain customers.

REVENUE CANADA

AMOUNT OF EXPORT TAX PAID BY TOBACCO MANUFACTURERS—
NET LOSSES TO FEDERAL TREASURY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on December 6, 1994)

As anticipated, the re-introduction of the export tax on tobacco products as part of the anti-smuggling initiative will result in a minimal amount of tax payable.

This situation is not resulting in a loss to the federal treasury. The export tax was not designed to restrict the ability of Canadian tobacco manufacturers to access legitimate export markets for their products and the exemptions ensure that products that are not susceptible to smuggling do not bear the tax. The export tax was introduced as part of the government's anti-smuggling initiative (ASI), chiefly to help curb the smuggling back into Canada of large quantities of cigarettes exported to the U.S. ASI also included increased resources for enforcement, a reduction in the federal excise tax on tobacco products, a major health promotion anti-smoking campaign and a surtax on tobacco manufacturer's profits.

There are indications that the government's strategy is being successful. Exports of tobacco products to the U.S. have decreased dramatically while domestic sales of duty paid tobacco products have increased correspondingly. These facts tend to indicate that the government's objective of restoring the legal domestic market for tobacco products has been largely achieved.

SUBSTITUTION OF LOANS FOR SUBSIDIES—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Eymard G. Corbin on December 8, 1994)

On February 7, 1995, the Minister for ACOA announced the details of the new repayability policy. Applications received prior to February 7 will be evaluated according to the former policy. Applications received on or after February 7 will be subject to the revised repayability requirements.

No new legislation is required to implement these changes.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SALE OF ARMS TO THAILAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Consiglio Di Nino on December 8, 1994.)

- Canada is the only country to publish an annual report on the export of military goods.

- The reports for the years 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993 are presently available upon request from the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade Export Controls Division.

- Total 1994 sales of military goods to Thailand as of September 1994 is $19,933,596.

- With regards to future sales, it is impossible to comment on sales that have not taken place.

- Issuance of export permits is not confirmation of sale. Companies routinely apply for export permits as part of their marketing preparations.

- Exports of military goods to Thailand are still reviewed according to the 1986 policy on the export of military goods.

- The government is unable to release information on the issuance of export permits or reports of actual sales for specific companies because this information is considered "Commercial Confidential."

NATIONAL DEFENCE

(Response to question raised by Hon. J. Michael Forrestall on December 12, 1994)

The Canadian Search and Rescue Helicopter Project and the Maritime Helicopter Project have been initiated to continue the Search and Rescue and Canadian Forces maritime surveillance capabilities into the next century. Project teams are studying various procurement options to satisfy the operational requirements. It is not inconceivable that a rationalized fleet to perform both roles may well be chosen but both projects are too early in their respective planning stages to make any definitive statements on this matter.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Q: What consideration is being given to addressing the equity financing needs of business in this range, ($100,000 to $200,000), which create the most jobs and opportunities for Canadians?

A: While most ACOA assistance will be repayable, interest is not normally charged and repayment terms can be tailored to the needs of the client. Also, depending on the type of project, there may be a grace period of up to five years during which repayments will not be required. ACOA assistance will still act as equity during the critical start-up phase of the project.

As concerns venture capital, negotiations are ongoing with the banks and provincial governments to set up the first formal venture capital fund in Atlantic Canada.

Q: Will the Honourable Leader of Government provide assurance that the regional development dollars being spent in Ontario by FEDNOR and FORD-Q be subject to the same rules that federal government is applying in Atlantic Canada and in the Western?

A: FORD-Q in Quebec operates on repayable loans.

All business incentives provided by FEDNOR where the contribution exceeds $100,000 are repayable. Contributions under $100,000 are evaluated on a case-by-case basis, focusing on the business details of each client application, to determine if the incentive will be repayable or non-repayable. This incentives policy is currently under review, with further refinements anticipated for the next fiscal year.

TRANSPORT

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Michael Forrestall on December 14, 1994)

Will the Leader of the Government find out whether or not the term "marine-related matters" includes our request for a judicial inquiry into destaffing?

No. There a number of marine policy issues being referred to the Senate Committee on Transport but the issues do not include the destaffing issues.

Was it the Minister's intention to refer the question of destaffing to the Standing Committee on Transport?

No. This question is not being referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

Will there be a judicial inquiry into the destaffing of lighthouses on the West Coast of Canada, in Newfoundland, and other maritime centres?

On November 3, 1994, Transport Canada issued a News Release on Public Consultations on Lightstations set to begin on both coasts in November. As of January 27, 1995, consultations have been held in 60 communities on both coasts including 28 on the West Coast. By the time the consultations have been completed at the end of January, 1995, 62 communities will have been visited. The results of the current public consultation sessions will be used in the development of the final plan implementation plan for destaffing. The plan will identify any adjustments to safety services required before destaffing can be undertaken, and the timing of destaffing at different sites. Given that the decision to destaff lightstations has been taken, and that necessary safety services will continue, the government position is that there is no need for a judicial inquiry on this issue.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

RULING BY SPEAKER OF HOUSE OF COMMONS—
POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before I call the Orders of the Day, this might be an opportune time to give a ruling that has been outstanding for some time.

Honourable senators, on Wednesday, November 30, 1994, a point of order was raised by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, PC, with regard to the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy. The point of order concerned a ruling made by the Speaker of the House of Commons on November 24, 1994 in which he stated that should a reprint be required of the special joint committee's report, he would instruct his officials to ensure that the dissenting opinions of the Official Opposition and Reform Party be printed after the signatures of the co-chairs in the same volume. Senator MacEachen's specific point of order was whether a ruling from the Speaker in the House of Commons carries with it the concurrence of the Senate in a matter which, in his view, is within the joint custody of both houses.

[Translation]

The point of order generated interesting comments from several honourable senators. Arguing that the Standing Orders of the House of Commons did not apply to joint committees, Senator Gauthier suggested that the Senate should submit a set of rules relating to joint committees to both houses for approval. Senator Ottenheimer wondered if Senator MacEachen's objection would disappear if, in the Senate, the next reprint was distributed in three volumes as is now the case. Senator Lynch-Staunton expressed the opinion that, if the Senate decided to participate in another joint committee, it must see to it that the rules of one house do not prevail over those of the other house. Senator Murray pointed out some procedural difficulties faced by him and Senator Corbin as co-chairs of the former Special Joint Committee on Official Languages. Senator Stewart wondered if a bill could receive Royal Assent if it complied with the rules of only one house. In his opinion, this decision could have serious consequences, including the fact that the format of a special joint committee's report can be modified by the other house and still be presented to the public as the work of a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons when such is not the case. Senator Corbin feels that this matter should be referred to the committee for its consideration and report.

[English]

At the outset, I must say that I sympathize with what was said on November 30 regarding this point of order. I am mindful of a ruling made by the Speaker of the other place a few years ago when the Senate divided a certain bill from the House of Commons into two without seeking the Commons' concurrence. In his decision, the Commons Speaker expressed his opinion that the Senate should have respected the propriety of asking the House of Commons to concur in its action of taking a bill that had originated and passed in that place and dividing it into two separate parts. The House of Commons subsequently sent a message to the Senate, asking it to return the bill in an undivided form. I am referring, of course, to the proceedings on Bill C-103, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Bill of 1988.

Senator MacEachen's point of order does not ask the Senate Speaker to stand in judgment of whether the Speaker of the other place correctly interpreted its standing orders. This would be quite improper and unquestionably infringe the right of each house to the exclusive cognizance of their proceedings.

Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Twenty-first Edition, page 90, states:

> ... the right of both Houses to be the sole judge of the lawfulness of their own proceedings, or to settle — and depart from — their own codes of procedure is fully established. This is equally the case whether a House is dealing with a matter which is finally decided by its sole authority, such as an order or resolution, or whether, like a bill, it is the joint concern of both Houses.

This point of order more directly deals with the relationship between the two houses. The discussion that followed revealed that many senators felt strongly about this unilateral action on the part of the Commons to a report which is the product of both houses. It is important to understand, however, that I, as your Speaker, am without power to take corrective action in the matter, no matter how much I may sympathize with the points raised. If the Chair may be permitted a suggestion, it would seem more appropriate that since this question involves bicameral relations, in particular the proceedings of joint committees, the traditional methods of communications between Houses of Parliament, such as the formal message, be utilized.

It would appear to the Chair that the whole question of the practices and procedures of joint committees should be better institutionalized. If one reads the British authorities, the principles of joint committee work are quite clear. Joint committees are, in theory, to act on common authority. Erskine May's Twenty-first Edition, page 665, states:

> Generally speaking, each House gives identical powers to the members appointed by it to serve on a joint committee. A joint committee has only such authority, and can exercise only such powers, as have been conferred upon it by the two Houses concurrently, nor can the powers of a joint committee be enlarged by an order of one House alone ... For a joint committee to act on an authority which had been delegated to it by one House only would be ultra vires.

As well, the procedures of British joint committees are more thoroughly defined, particularly in cases where practice may differ from one house to the other. Again, citing Erskine May at page 667:

> The procedure of a joint committee follows the procedure of select committees of the House of Lords when such procedure differs from that of select committees of the House of Commons, whether the chairman is a member of the Commons or the Lords. For example, the practice of the House of Lords according to which the chairman of a committee votes like the other members, but has no casting vote, and the Lords' method of deciding the question if the votes are equal, are followed by a joint committee.

[Translation]

In our Parliament, the British principle according to which each chamber shall confer identical powers on joint committees is not always observed. For instance, both chambers did not give the same powers to the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations. Under Standing Order 123(1), the House of Commons confers a power on the committee that the Senate does not. The standing order reads as follows:

> 123(1)In addition to the powers granted, so far as this House is concerned, to the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, pursuant to Standing Order 108(4), the said Committee shall be empowered to make a report to the House containing only a resolution which, if the report is concurred in, would be an Order of this House to the Ministry to revoke a statutory instrument, or a portion thereof, which the Governor in Council, or a Minister of the Crown has the authority to revoke.

The procedures of our joint committees are not adequately defined in their orders of reference. There is nothing about the rules or procedures that prevail in case of differences between the two chambers. For instance, under the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, the chairman of a committee is allowed to vote only if the votes are equal, while under rule 96(1) of the Senate, the vote of the chairman is always included. When the votes are equal in committees of the Senate, the motion is deemed defeated.

[English]

I note also that many joint committees have formally requested the government to table a comprehensive response to their report within 150 days pursuant to Standing Order 109 of the House of Commons. Such requests were most recently made by the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations in its second report dealing with illegal dispensations, tabled in the Senate on December 1, 1994, and the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy, tabled in the Senate on November 15, 1994.

This discrepancy in our practices was mentioned in comments by senators last December 14 when Senator Lewis initiated debate on the adoption of the second report of the Scrutiny Committee. Nonetheless, as was admitted then, the Senate has no equivalent rule to request a response from the government.

More basically, there is not even agreement as to what are our joint committees. The Senate still lists in rule 86 the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament and the Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament. The House of Commons has not recognized these committees for many years.

[Translation]

There are other problems. One chamber may change the mandate of the joint committee and merely inform the other chamber after the fact, instead of seeking its consent. What is to constitute a quorum of members from both chambers is not always specified. How financial and administrative responsibilities are shared in the case of a joint committee has also been a problem.

[English]

I bring these matters to the attention of honourable senators in the hope that action may be taken to resolve these differences to the satisfaction of both chambers.

Pursuant to rule 86(1)(f), our Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders has the power to study procedural questions on its own initiative. Following the suggestions made during the discussion on November 30, perhaps that committee, in consultation with a committee of the other place, could propose a set of rules for approval by both chambers.

I thank the Honourable Senator MacEachen and other honourable senators for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, in rising, I do not intend to in any way question the excellent ruling which His Honour has made, and particularly the suggestion that there are differences in the operation of the joint committees and that it might be useful to have an examination of the practices, with the object in mind of producing some common understanding.

Honourable senators, the thought that goes through my mind is: What is the remedy that is presently available to the Senate in order to reprint the report of the special joint committee? The mandate of the special joint committee terminated upon presentation of its reports to both houses. Therefore, the committee no longer exists, and can take no action to order a reprinting. There is a suggestion — or maybe a hint; maybe it is a clue, or an indirect guidance from the Chair — that the Senate itself ought to move and order the reprinting of the report in the way that was determined by the co-chairs of the committee.

I base my interpretation of a possible hint on Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Twenty-first Edition, at page 90, which argues that each house has the right to judge its own proceedings and to settle its own problems. This house has a problem in that the special joint committee report is out of print. People are asking for it and, as I understand it, it is not available.

Perhaps we could reflect on that and propose a solution based upon the right of each house to the exclusive cognizance of their proceedings based on Erskine May. Or perhaps we could direct a message to the House of Commons, asking them to concur in an order calling for the reprinting of the report in the form that was determined by the co-chairs of the committee. It probably would produce a robust debate in the House of Commons, as the Bloc Québécois would obviously oppose, but their heartiness may be somewhat dissipated as a result of the elections yesterday.

However, I do not think that the possibility that one party in the other House might oppose such an action should deter the Senate from considering asking that House to concur in an order that would allow the joint committee report to be reprinted. As I understand it, that report is out of print, and people want copies. In order to satisfy that need, apparently photocopies were being made, but that practice has now been terminated.

A remedy is required, and I think His Honour the Speaker has given us a hint.

SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING SENATE COMMITTEE— INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly rose pursuant to notice of December 8, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the desirability of considering at this time the establishment of a Standing Committee on Security and Intelligence.

He said: Honourable senators, the standing committees of the Senate are currently being reviewed with a view to their possible restructuring. I propose that consideration be given to the creation of a standing committee on security and intelligence. The mandate of the committee would be to monitor all the organizations which perform security and intelligence-gathering or analysis functions. By my count, and as identified in the 1987 report of the Special Committee on Terrorism and Safety, there are about a dozen such organizations within the Government of Canada. Most of these organizations are buried within a department or agency and have no public visibility, but are important all the same.

I believe that a standing committee of this house would serve a useful purpose. In fact, it could be called essential, for three reasons:

First, it makes no logical sense that some of our security intelligence organizations have what is called an external review mechanism but that most do not. For example, CSIS and the Communications Security Establishment have been in the news lately. Why should there be an external review body for CSIS and not for CSE? This matter has been raised before in this house.

Second, those external review bodies which do exist are at arm's length from both the government and Parliament. I believe that there should be a permanent parliamentary monitoring mechanism. In any modern democracy, it makes no sense to do otherwise. I can think of no argument — practical, constitutional or otherwise — for the security intelligence establishment to be beyond the reach of, or obscured from, parliamentary review.

Third, and perhaps most important, I think that the Security Intelligence Review Committee, SIRC, which reviews CSIS is performing adequately in a technical and operational sense. The problem, however, is that SIRC is perceived by many Canadians not to be working well — and, I venture to say, by many parliamentarians.

Whether rightly or wrongly, some of the criticisms made of SIRC have stuck. Because SIRC members are appointed by the Prime Minister, they are perceived to be political. Even though appointments are made after consultation with the leaders of the opposition parties in the other place, the majority of the appointees, and usually the chairman, belong to the same political party as the government then in power. The concern which has been expressed is that SIRC may, therefore, be inclined to ignore or whitewash any actions by that government which otherwise might not pass muster.

The problems, and the potential to make partisan capital, are increased when a new government takes over and the appointees are asked to review things that happened under a previous government. It is a question of credibility, of the right of all Canadians to have confidence in their institutions, particularly those institutions designed to protect their civil rights.

I attended several sessions of the subcommittee in the other place that investigated the so-called Bristow affair involving, of course, CSIS. It is clear to me that most, if not all, of the members of that committee, and those in attendance as observers, were dissatisfied with the process, particularly with the answers they were getting or not getting. A clear sense of unease pervaded the committee room; unease that the committee was not being told everything; unease that we, as parliamentarians, do not know everything we should know.

We all need to be reasonably satisfied that there are no rogue security intelligence agencies running amok. We all need to know that the security intelligence function is being conducted efficiently and effectively within appropriate legal boundaries and safeguards. We all need to know that our security intelligence establishment is addressing the issues that have to be addressed, and are not caught up in a Cold War time warp.

With the greatest respect to those involved, the SIRC report on the Bristow affair released last December will not make those concerns go away. The mere fact that the report exonerated CSIS of any wrongdoing will, unfortunately, lead to claims of a whitewash.

The fact that the SIRC report blamed the media, particularly the CBC, for inaccurate or inept reporting likely means the report would not get a fair shake. The SIRC report did not address allegations of illegal spying on the Parti Québécois, the Bloc Québécois, or other elements of the separatist movement in Quebec. Those allegations were made frequently in the other place, and quite frankly, in style if not in substance, the SIRC report appeared to be treading very carefully, as I suppose it should have, and begged answers to some questions that remain unanswered.

I do not believe that the standing committee on security and intelligence which I am suggesting today, should perform either an oversight or a review function with respect to specific organizations or activities. Let us leave that to the SIRCs of the world. I see a broader mandate that includes identifying any need for changes in legislation, regulations, guidelines, et cetera, governing each of the security intelligence units; commenting on the degree of cooperation with law enforcement agencies such as the RCMP, and with provincial or municipal security intelligence and enforcement agencies; identifying any areas of overlap or duplication of activities, and where economies could be realized; ensuring that timely and efficient exchanges and assimilation of data and information occur from all security intelligence units; commenting on the relevance of security intelligence activities in the evolving geopolitical and domestic environments, in particular the evolving focus on economic espionage, the proliferation of nuclear weapons and substances due to the breakup of the Soviet Union, domestic terrorism and subversive groups, and so on.

It is important to note that such a mandate would not duplicate the mandate of any existing entity but would significantly enhance the political accountability of our security intelligence apparatus.

I think a Senate committee would be admirably suited to such a role. We can, I think, better than the other place, bring continuity to the review of long-term issues. We also can, I hope, rise above the temptation to use security intelligence issues for partisan purposes. Obviously the committee would often have to meet in camera. Its reports would often not be public, but I would hope that many sessions and the review of many issues would be in public in order to demystify the security intelligence establishment, encourage public participation and help to educate Canadians on the role and the importance of security intelligence functions in today's society.

I also recognize that it would take time to establish the necessary relationships of trust between such a committee and the various security intelligence organizations. However, I believe it is a step worth taking; a step that I would argue is somewhat overdue.

I would ask, therefore, in the context of the review of committees now under way, that we seize the initiative and consider the establishment of a Senate standing committee on security and intelligence.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that Honourable Senator Corbin has expressed an interest in this particular inquiry and the suggestions which have been made by Senator Kelly. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate in the name of Senator Corbin.

On motion of Senator Graham, for Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

CANADA COUNCIL

CONSULTATIONS ON THE FUTURE—INQUIRY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Louis Roux rose pursuant to notice of December 15, 1994:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Mr. Roch Carrier, Director of the Canada Council, and Ms Donna Scott, Chair of its Board of Directors, are completing a cross-Canada tour undertaken to consult with Canada's arts community on the Council's future, given that additional cuts for the coming fiscal year may seriously compromise the Council's original mission.

He said: Honourable senators, in The Tempest, through Prospero, Shakespeare asserts:

[English]

> We are such stuff as dreams are made on...

"We" refers to man — humanity. "Dreams" refers not only to fantasy, hope and vision — vision is essential for all humanity and for all societies of humans — but also to all things imaginary, creative ingenuity, "the ability to invent, to conceive, together with a talent for vividly portraying these conceptions," according to the dictionnaire Littré. Shakespeare reminds us that humanity is cut from the same cloth from which is made the culture which surrounds it and which nourishes it.

If we were to prevent someone from dreaming in his sleep, we would plunge him into a deep depression which could lead to death. In the same way, if we deprive a society of culture, that is to say of its intellectual and spiritual development and enrichment, on which it normally depends, we condemn it to asphyxiation.

The importance of arts and culture in the evolution and growth of a society has been recognized always and everywhere. The arts have an ancient lineage. The first demonstration of creative power in an artist goes back to Cro-Magnon man, more than 40,000 years ago.

But we need not necessarily look so far in the past to find defenders of culture. My own party, in its well-known Red Book, acknowledged the importance of culture to Canada:

> Culture is the very essence of national identity, the bedrock of national sovereignty and national pride. It gives meaning to the lives of every Canadian and enriches the country socially, politically, and economically...At a time when globalization and the information and communications revolution are erasing national borders, Canada needs more than ever to commit itself to cultural development...Arts and cultural activities have become the ninth largest industry in the country, with direct revenues of $11.5 billion. Liberals recognize not only that the promotion of cultural industries contributes to enhancing Canadian identity, but also that cultural products create jobs at home and bring in revenues from abroad.

Our most recent illustration in this chamber, honourable senators, came from our colleague Senator MacEachen in his speech on the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy. He said:

> Much has already been made of the committee's focus on culture and learning as a fundamental dimension of foreign policy. We know that our political influence and trade expansion are affected in large part by the image we project abroad. The committee heard convincing testimony on this. We also know that culture and education are major exports and key elements of the global knowledge-based economy. The committee recommends that the government, with the collaboration of interested provinces, give high priority to developing a strategy for Canada's international cultural, scientific and educational relations.

This concept was again formulated by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Honourable André Ouellet, when he tabled in the House of Commons a document entitled, "Canada in the World," in which is identified the projection of Canadian values and culture as one of the three key objectives of its foreign policy.

[Translation]

Certain allusions, in the statements I have just quoted, on the subject of economic aspect of culture, lead me to try to dispel a widespread myth, according to which the arts and culture cost taxpayers too much and according to which artists are professional beggars. In reality, it has been proven over and over again that the subsidies granted to production companies, particularly in the area of stage performances, do not constitute charitable donations by governments; rather they are an investment, the return often being greater than the investment.

[English]

In fact, the arts attract tourist dollars, stimulate business development, spur urban renewal and improve the overall quality of life in our cities and towns. Eloquent figures on the subject are regularly published by the Council for Business and the Arts in Canada and by Statistics Canada. Thus, in a document entitled, "Selected Economic, Financial and Cultural Indicators for the Cultural Industries Sector" it is stated that the direct impact of the arts and culture sector, as measured by the contribution of the national Gross Domestic Product, is estimated at $16.2 billion in 1992-93, or 2.7 per cent of the GDP of the whole economy; that total direct employment generated by the nine arts and culture-related fields exceeded 460,000 direct jobs for the same period; and that with its various interaction with other businesses, which supply necessary materials and services, the arts and cultural sector generates considerable spending, leading to indirect demand for goods and services from other industries. This brings the total direct and indirect impact on the GDP to over $24 billion, or four per cent of the GDP of the whole economy. Finally, the corresponding jobs created directly or indirectly numbered more than 660,000 in 1992-93.

[Translation]

The Fathers of Confederation could not have predicted what would happen 125 years after Confederation. They therefore were silent on the subject of culture. We had to wait almost until the creation of the Massey-Lévesque commission before a word appears in official texts concerning arts and culture in the life of the nation. Still, I should point out, for clarity, that Mayor Drapeau provoked the birth of the Conseil des Arts de la Région Métropolitaine de Montréal in 1955. It was only two years later, in 1957, that Royal Assent was given for the creation of a Canada Council for the Arts, Humanities and Social Sciences, which received a mission to foster and encourage the study, appreciation and creation of work in the areas of culture, the humanities and the social sciences. Later, in 1978, this council was split in two, the responsibility for arts and culture remaining with the renamed Canada Council.

[English]

The council quickly became the primary partner of artists and creators as they practised their professions. Organizations and individuals alike found that the council listened to their needs and concerns, unlike their experience with provincial ministries of culture where they were met with people who preferred giving advice to listening.

It is also true that I have rarely heard of the slightest reserve from the artistic community concerning the effectiveness of the Canada Council. Even in Quebec in the current political context, the most ardent separatists come to the defence of the Canada Council. I have here in my hand a document entitled, "Il faut sauver le Conseil des Arts du Canada" addressed to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and signed by nearly 1,000 artists, technicians and administrators of Quebec theatre, of whom almost all are declared separatists.

[Translation]

I invite honourable senators to draw their own conclusions from this. One thing is certain: To keep its support unanimous in artistic circles, the Canada Council needs the support of the general public, through the voices of Canadian parliamentarians, regardless of party. Among these parliamentarians there are, however, those who pretend that on the one hand artists and their organizations should find their funding other than from governments — that is to say in the private sector — and on the other hand, they should increase their revenues by increasing ticket prices in theatres, cinemas, museums, et cetera and the price of books.

In my opinion, apart from the fact that I should point out that artists are the primary supporters of arts and cultures by reason of the minimal financial conditions in which they accept to practice their profession, these two solutions are misleading and falsely shift our focus on the problems at hand. Their application would be dangerous for the good development of the arts and culture in Canada.

As for the private sector, both industrial and commercial, their resources are limited, and the number of requests for donations are becoming more and more numerous. This source of funding is already pushed to the limit, or nearly so. Also — and this is even more serious — the subsidies of private companies impose a form of self-censorship on the artist. The private sector, by its sponsorship, generous though it is, serves to determine the content of the art. This, of course, is forbidden in the case of government subsidies lest the government be accused of breaching freedom of expression.

The ideal solution would be for private enterprise to donate money directly to the Canada Council, provided that there are fiscal incentives to do so and provided that the council would not be competing with other arts organizations which already receive financial assistance from industrial and commercial enterprise.

By making access to cultural products more difficult, such a measure would help make art and culture a domain available only to the well-to-do. This is already too true, considering the gradual withdrawal of public resources which began several years ago.

Artists are responsible citizens. They do not claim special treatment. They are aware of the alarming financial situation Canada faces. Nor do they request an increase in current levels of funding granted by Parliament to major cultural institutions and to the Canada Council in particular. All they want is to assert that any additional cuts in this sector would cause irreparable harm. Therefore, they demand that levels of contributions be stabilized, which, in real dollars, constitute nonetheless a reduction. In reality, further cuts would lead precisely to results which are the opposite of those expected. In fact, the impact of arts and culture on the GDP would be reduced, and many of the 660,000 workers in the cultural sector would be forced to rely on welfare and unemployment insurance.

• (1540)

In an interview with The Ottawa Citizen, Brian Anthony, Associate Director of the Canada Council, declared that cuts to the council's annual appropriation of up to 32 per cent are expected over the next four years. Overall, the value of the council's total budget has declined by 30 per cent since 1986 when inflation is taken into consideration. Add this to the foreseen 32 per cent, and you have a total decline of roughly 70 per cent, in constant dollars, in less than 15 years. As Molière's doctors would put it: The cure might have been efficacious had not the patient died before its completion!

At the same time, honourable senators, consider that the entire federal grant to the Canada Council last year represented a "huge" 0.06 per cent of the total federal budget. What real effects could further cuts to the organization have on the deficit when juxtaposed with the economic and social benefits reaped from this investment?

Not that the council could not improve on itself. Mrs. Scott, who chairs the council's board, and Mr. Carrier, its director, have conceded that administrative costs of up to 20 per cent of the budget are unacceptable. Nevertheless, I object seriously to Mrs. Scott's conclusion in The Toronto Star of November 12 last. She said, "We need to spend more of our money on the arts community and less on getting it to them."

[Translation]

This sort of attitude seems to have roots in good intentions, in the goal of helping Canada reduce its deficit, but would save only a few thousand dollars a year. However, these good intentions threaten to abase irrevocably the credibility of the council, in the minds of artists. In fact, the privileged relationship between the Canada Council and the artistic world is attributable to the professional quality of its personnel at all levels. I am thinking especially of the council's agents, often practising artists of high calibre, who agree to interrupt their own carreers to devote their talent for the welfare of their colleagues, in the interest of the whole population, which has a right to cultural products and to works of art of unique quality. These agents criss-cross Canada, "a mari usque ad mare." Their presence is an inspiration for artists in the most remote regions. At the same time, being on the ground, these agents are better able to evaluate the return on the council's investments.

Any budgetary reduction having the effect of deteriorating these human contacts and of reducing the professional quality of the organisation's personnel would have harmful and irreversible consequences. The Canada Council might be more efficient from an administrative point of view, but it would have lost its dynamism, to the great detriment of all Canadians.

Certainly, there are a thousand ways to reduce the deficit: The government can increase its revenues, on the one hand, and it can reduce its expenses on the other. On the revenue side, I recently read, in the newsletter of the Rights and Liberties

League, Winter 1995 issue, an article which troubled me. I have myself verified the figures employed by the author, Mr. Denis Langlois, with Statistics Canada documents, and I have found his analysis to be sound. I will quote a few passages.

> Economic data indicate an increase in wealth of 30% from the beginning of the '80s to 1993. Society as a whole is richer than it was 10, 15 or 20 years ago. So how is it that we can no longer afford the same services, the same education and social programs as before? Where is this new money and where is it going.?
> ...It is a more pertinent question that on a number of occasions different groups of society, economists and even fiscalists, have sought to introduce into the debate the perspective, for instance, of a re-examination of the fiscal system.
> ...The evolution in percentages of fiscal receipts shows that the contribution of individuals has increased while that of corporations has decreased. By the same token, the portion of tax paid by those with the highest incomes has decreased while the middle class has seen its own increase considerably.

It is astonishing, is it not? The reworking of our fiscal system, in addressing these injustices and correcting certain abuses in the field of family trusts, for example, could furnish billions of additional revenues to the state's coffers. That is only one measure among many.

Now for the spending cuts. I will come back to what perhaps many would call my scapegoat: defence. With a budget 110 times that of the Canada Council, the Department of National Defence could be the source of much more considerable savings than those which are suggested for it. I refer to my last intervention in the Senate on December 13 last.

Much more substantial savings can also be realised in the machinery of government itself. Moreover, the government is going ahead with useless expenditures. At Public Works, for example, the repointing of the stonework of the buildings on Parliament Hill and the excavation of the tunnel between the Centre and East Blocks might have waited for better days. After all, the Senate has foregone a new carpet without much difficulty.

Honourable senators, it seems I have gone beyond the time allowed me. I thank you for your indulgence and I ask you to reflect on the words of Shakespeare:

[English]

> We are such stuff as dreams are made on...

[Translation]

Let us not prevent Canadians from enriching the stuff of which they are woven, inspired and nourished by the cultural products and works of art which are offered by their creative artists. For the greater good of all citizens, let us prevent the degradation of the Canada Council. It concerns the very survival of our country.

[English]

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Will the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Roux: Yes.

Senator Kinsella: If the honourable senator were in the position of the Minister of Finance, from a zero-based budgeting standpoint, in light of his excellent argument this afternoon, what would be a reasonable budget in real dollars for the Canada Council in the next fiscal year?

• (1550)

Senator Roux: As I said in my speech, a stabilization of those amounts would be acceptable.

Senator Kinsella: How much?

Senator Roux: Honourable senators, I am sorry I do not have the exact figure. I believe it is $98.4 million but I am not sure. I may be referring to the figure for 1986. However, I could look for the exact figure.

ONTARIO COURT GENERAL DIVISION

MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE CONDUCT AND BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND JUSTICES—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> That a Special Committee of the Senate be constituted to examine and report upon the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and officers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division), where their conduct includes
> (i) failure to take judicial notice of the Constitution, the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the laws of Canada pertaining to the Senate, and
> (ii) failure to comply with the said laws and privileges, and
> (iii) their other conduct related to the Constitution, the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, and the dignity of the Senate; and
> That the committee be further empowered to consider and report upon related matters which may concern the privileges of the Senate; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That the committee be composed of five members, three of whom shall constitute a quorum; and

That the Committee of Selection be instructed to decide and report upon the membership of the Special Committee.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Stand.

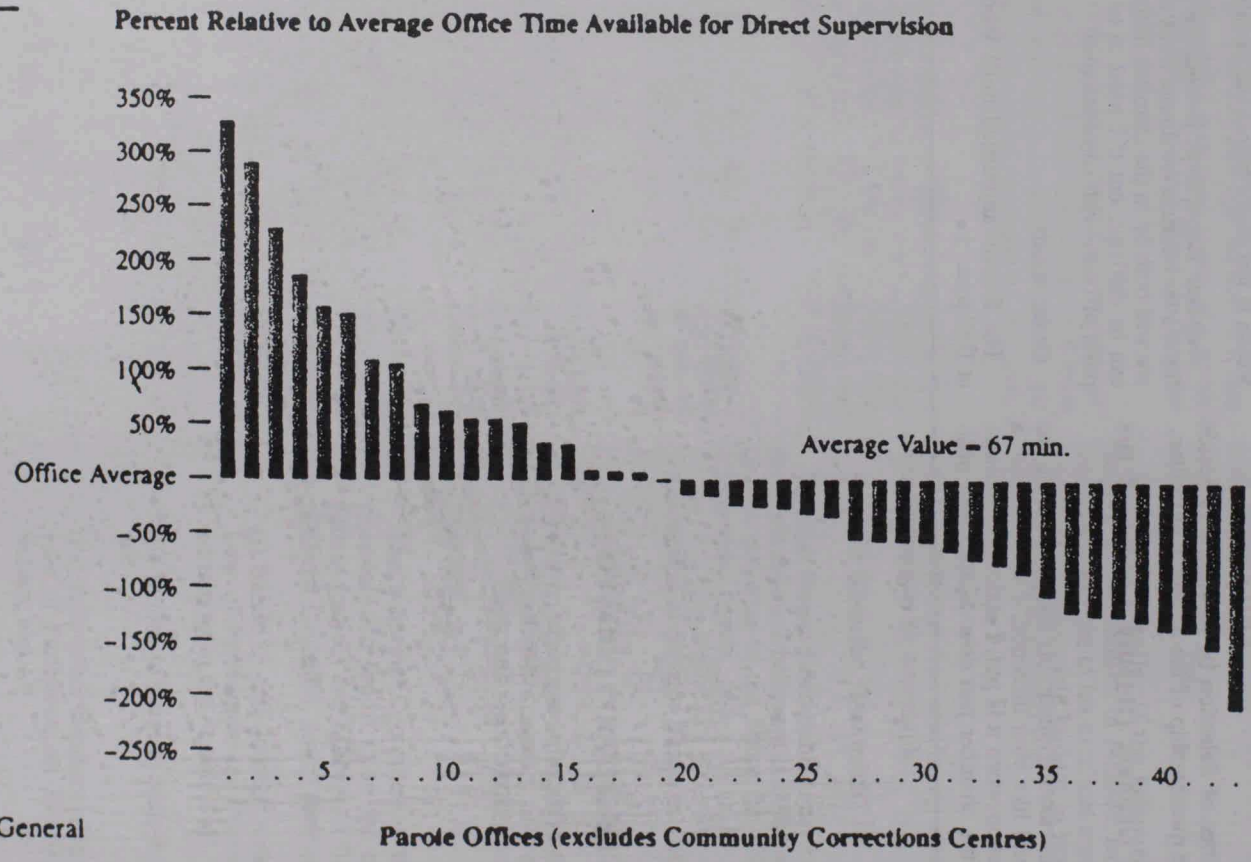
Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, before we stand this motion, I would like your direction. I wish to raise a point of order on the motion when it is put. I notice that Senator Cools is not present in the chamber just now. Shall I wait until the motion is put, or should I raise my point of order this afternoon?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there is no motion before the Senate at this time. Until such time as Senator Cools moves the motion and it is read from the Chair, there is nothing before us. A debate at this point would be on an issue which is not really before the Senate.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, that is why I raised the matter because we do not have a motion before us. I trust that we will both be in the chamber at the same time. That sometimes can be difficult, but if I need to be elsewhere, I shall leave my point of order with someone else.



Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, February 15, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

NATIONAL FLAG OF CANADA

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, 30 years ago today, with parliamentarians assembled at the foot of the Peace Tower, as was done earlier this afternoon, 26-year old RCMP Constable Gaëtan Secours raised the first red and white maple leaf national flag of Canada. I, too, was there that day as a reporter in the Parliamentary Press Gallery covering the event. When I saw Mr. Secours today, I could not help but remember the range of emotions in play as that event took place.

After a long debate, our country finally had a flag that was distinctively its own. It was born in a tempestuous context of pride, of courage, and of truly mixed emotions — indeed, even anger — because the Red Ensign had been very close to the hearts and traditions of many Canadians.

It was also a time of change. As our country was approaching its Centennial, then Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson initiated the search for a new flag that would be a strong symbol of unity for the nation and throughout the world, and so it is today. Mr. Pearson said in the House of Commons:

> I believe we should have a national flag that stands for Canada, that flies as a symbol of Canada alone, that...

— does not —

> ... dishonour the past but looks to the future; a flag that will say one word and that word is 'Canada'.

In typically Canadian fashion, an all-party committee of the House of Commons and the Senate was struck. After holding 46 hearings, examining over 2,600 designs, listening to hours and hours of testimony by experts, historians, citizens, as well as over 250 parliamentary speeches, a new flag for Canada was proclaimed on February 15, 1965.

Honourable senators, we are tremendously honoured today to have in our gallery two gentlemen who were central to the history of that moment. They are George Stanley and John Matheson.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: The red and white maple leaf flag that we know today reflects the design presented by Dr. Stanley, who was then Dean of the Faculty of Arts at the Royal Military College in Kingston, and later Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of New Brunswick. He had been approached and encouraged in his work by the member of Parliament for Leeds, the Honourable John Matheson, who was also a distinguished member of the joint committee on the flag and who, later, was named a judge.

[Translation]

Now our flag has become a symbol of freedom, excellence and generosity —

[English]

— of peace, of compassion, of home.

George Stanley said:

> A flag is more than a means of identification. It is the embodiment of what a country stands for: it is the symbol of the ethos or spirit of a people, its aspirations, its will to live and its determination to play its role in history.

John Matheson noted:

> Doubtless the flag stimulates more contemplation than any painting, any sculpture, any architecture in Canada. The flag is recreated daily in people's minds because it is of the spirit. Thus it is kept alive and vital and forever new.

Perhaps it is no wonder, honourable senators, that in our sentiments of warmth, comfort and affection for the flag of Canada, what we are ultimately feeling is our love of this magnificent country. That flag was a significant step in our growth, independence and evolution. Today, we remember that step, consider who we are, embrace our proud history and strive to build a future worthy of our past.

[Translation]

On this very day, thirty years ago, the Speaker of the Senate, Maurice Bourget, declared:

> The flag had become a pledge of Canadian unity representing all Canadians, regardless of their race, their language, their religious beliefs or their opinions.

[English]

• (1340)

The intervening decades have demonstrated the truth of his words, and the years ahead will only reinforce them.

Honourable senators, I am sure we join together to extend our sincere appreciation to our two visitors in the gallery for their special contribution. We offer Dr. Stanley and Ruth and Mr. Matheson and Edith all good wishes in the years ahead.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when George M. Cohan set about celebrating the Stars and Stripes, he wrote the song, "You're a Grand Old Flag, you're a high flyin' flag."

Canadians paying their respects on the thirtieth birthday of the Maple Leaf Ensign would still have to settle for: You're a brand new flag, but higher flyin' now than seemed possible those thirty years ago when red and white, and no blue, replaced the Red Ensign, and changed the way we looked at history.

The flag debate ranged over the parliamentary precincts for the better part of 1964 and 1965, leaving a bolder imprint on Lester Pearson's prime ministership than any of his acts of worthy statesmanship. It took nerve to introduce his flag, as he did at a Winnipeg Legion convention; it took colossal nerve to stick with it as the flag's original three maple leaves shrunk to a solitary leaf, and the nation's best-known orators wore themselves out with hyperbolic gymnastics to hoist the banner and haul it down.

Looking back now, memory holds the door to an exceptional generation of Canadian politicians — not just Pearson in close combat with Diefenbaker, but veritable queues of men and women who had served in the cabinets of one or the other.

In the Commons, the Speaker interrupts the proceedings to say that Sir Winston Churchill has written to thank the house for greetings on his ninetieth birthday. In a similar break in the Senate, the Speaker praises Chubby Power on the forty-seventh anniversary of his arrival in Parliament.

John Connolly opens the Senate debate with polite recognition of Canada's debt to Great Britain. He speaks of Imperial Conferences as discussions between mother hens and chicks. But he dwells at length on the maturing influence of wars. He speaks of Canadian tenants arriving at Rideau Hall, and then says this:

> I was told a story recently by the Turkish ambassador to Canada. He was a competitor for his country at the Olympic Games at Amsterdam in 1932. He said that, in his mind's eye — and he still has a photograph of the occasion — he can still see Percy Williams of Vancouver breaking the tape in the 100-meter dash. Williams' arms were extended; he looked like the Winged Victory of Samothrace. And the trademark of the victory was the red maple leaf emblazoned on Williams' white jersey...It is a beautiful flag. It is a symbol around which we can build our hopes and in which we can centre our pride.

No one leaves at the end of Connolly's speech. They wait to hear Mr. Gratton O'Leary, who does not agree. He states:

> I think it was Voltaire who once said, "If you would converse with me, define your terms." I think, therefore, I will stick as strictly as possible to the specifics...I submit to you, sir, that the flag which was presented to us by the motion before this house is not an embodiment of our history. Oh, you ask me why I, an Irishman, should extol the Union Jack. I think it was Cardinal Newman who once said that, though England's sins have been great, her repentances were always greater. Honourable senators, whether of Irish blood or not, who could deny the proof of that, when in two world wars...England made history's greatest atonement for her sins of the past? I want some flag which will keep some vestiges of the British on it and yet also commemorate the contributions of the French and other nations.

Then, seconded by Senator Grosart, Senator O'Leary moved his amendment:

> ...that the government suspend further action on the flag in order to give the people and Parliament of Canada reasonable time to reach agreement on the flag which will incorporate symbols of the founding peoples and which will be acceptable to all elements.

It is night — a late sitting — when Orville H. Phillips joins the debate, reminding the senators of a scene in Julius Caesar when Brutus and Cassius are conversing before the assassination. Cassius says:

> Now in the names of all the gods at once, upon what meat does this our Caesar feed, that he is grown so great?

Says Senator Phillips:

> You will excuse me for paraphrasing this by saying: Upon what votes does this our Pearson feed that he is grown so great? Honourable senators, think of the support which was used to force this flag through the House of Commons — that unholy alliance, Mr. Caouette and Mr. Fisher. I wonder if they have that much in common with the Canadian people that this alliance should be utilized to force the flag through the other place.

The amendment is lost, 23 to 39, and first to speak to the main motion is Senator John M. Macdonald. If I may use the style of the late Senator O'Leary — I think it was Senator Macdonald who said in a most Canadian and most senatorial speech:

> Honourable senators, the hour is late and already I have taken up too much of your time. You will notice, however, that I have not in any way discussed the design of the proposed new flag. I do not intend to discuss it now. To end my speech, as a word of praise or commendation for the new design, I think I can go this far, Mr. Speaker, and say that I do not consider it to be as ugly as the original design containing three maple leaves.

Honourable senators, has ever a flag been born with such a blessing? And from a Scottish bachelor uncle who, like the grand new flag itself, now holds the esteem of both sides of this chamber.

[Translation]

In concluding, perhaps I may point out that Canada has only one flag, but Canadians have twelve others, one for each province and territory. Wherever you happen to be in Canada, you will see the Maple Leaf with another flag flying next to it.

This country is the sum of its diverse parts, and its citizens are proud to express their diversity by hoisting their own individual symbol next to the symbol that denotes their membership in the Canadian community.

Those who, from time to time, try to break up this kind of partnership should realize that their attempts are doomed to fail, since the vast majority of Canadians know that the strength of our federation arises from an awareness that unity and diversity are not mutually exclusive, and that the withdrawal of any member of this Canadian partnership would be fatal to all concerned.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I must say that one of the great moments of my life was when on May 17, 1964, I accompanied Mr. Pearson to Winnipeg.

I was on Radio Canada International — RDI — just now, where I said it was the worst place, the worst province — I suppose I should rephrase my remarks and say that it was certainly the hardest place to announce the advent of a new Canadian flag. At the time, only Mary MacDonald, Mrs. Pearson and I applauded, while the rest of the audience did not seem very receptive to the idea.

The debate in the Senate was also very emotional. Finally, we adopted the Canadian flag on December 15, with 38 yeas and 28 nays.

[English]

When I speak to students — as I just did on television, very aggressively I must say — about status quo in Canada, I do not share their belief. As an example, I say that Canada is a country in the making every day.

One of the senators who vigorously opposed the Canadian flag at that time, besides two close friends who voted against it, was a gentlemen from Saskatchewan. He vigorously opposed the Canadian flag as going against every tradition.

• (1350)

To show that Canada is always a country in the making, his very proud son carried the flag across the land. The proud son was our previous Governor General, Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn. That illustrates how Canada changes and improves with every day. We respect the past, but continue to proceed forward, showing the rest of the world that Canada is a light of hope on a troubled planet. We show the rest of the world that —

My people, the French Canadian people, exist, it is a fact, and we can join forces with other Canadians to build this country. I remember the debate in the House of Commons. In fact, other survivors of that debate are here today. For example, the senator who was a member of Parliament at the time and whom I would prefer to call "Right Honourable," Senator Allan MacEachen, was there. Senator Stewart from Nova Scotia and I were both members of Parliament then, too. We are now senators. Senator Olson, at the time a Social Credit member, was also there.

[English]

He voted against the proposed new flag then, along with many others. I often ask people who at that time did not see fit to vote in favour of the Canadian flag whether they would want to revert to that time and that issue that was supposed to bring an end to our country. No one dares to say, "yes."

Mr. Pearson was courageous. He could have announced the new flag in Quebec City. He would have been welcomed because at that time very few people there opposed the Canadian flag. There was a great ceremony in Quebec City chaired by an extraordinary premier and ex-member of Parliament, Mr. Jean Lesage. Last week the press reported that only 15 to 20 separatists of the day attended a small demonstration opposing the flag.

We have our flag because there was cooperation. Léon Balcer was a big help, and we must give him credit. He told the government of the day that the time had come to take a decision and to apply closure, a measure it was reluctant to use. Léon Balcer was a great Canadian who served in the Canadian navy. A member of the Progressive Conservative Party, he represented the riding of Trois-Rivières.

We must also pay tribute to Mr. Réal Caouette. In the gallery today is Mr. Caouette's faithful secretary, Madame Judy Richard, who accompanied him all his life. She has told me that Mr. Caouette was a proud French Canadian. He was sure that that flag was for all of Canada. I applaud Madame Richard, although perhaps somewhat less than my dear friend Mr. Matheson and the others, but she should be recognized whenever we think of Mr. Caouette, who played a great role in making us so proud then and now.

To those who refused to join in the celebration, I say that John Diefenbaker has always been a friend of mine. Seventy per cent of his executive asked him to be present for the official ceremony. That is a lesson to others who aspire to become Prime Minister, Leader of the Opposition, or leader of the third or fourth party, not to neglect their duty but to attend such ceremonies. We can fight, but when a democratic decision is taken, we must respect that decision. I regret very much that some people saw fit to absent themselves from the ceremony.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, that was my first vote. I continue to believe that it was an extraordinary decision and that when a person is courageous, he or she must not be afraid of going against public opinion.

[English]

As I say to students, "When you feel in your heart, your conscience and your mind that you are right, go for it, but question your mind and your soul first to determine whether you are being honest with yourself. If you are, do not be afraid. Go for it." Mr. Pearson went for it, and today we are proud to celebrate that anniversary.

CANADA COUNCIL

RESPONSE TO QUESTION

Hon. Jean-Louis Roux: Honourable senators, I should like to give a precise and up-to-date answer to Senator Kinsella. After I delivered my speech on the Canada Council last evening, he asked for the amount of money voted by Parliament to the council. In 1994-1995, Parliament voted a total of $98,421,000 to the Canada Council.

VISITORS IN THE GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, one of my privileges as Speaker is to recognize visitors in the gallery. I would like to add my words of welcome to John Matheson and his wife, Edith, and to George Stanley and his wife, Ruth. They are long-time personal friends of mine, with whom I have worked over the years. Dr. Stanley has a particular association with my province. He is the leading Canadian historian regarding Louis Riel and has written about him over the years.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PERMIT COVERAGE OF MEETING BY ELECTRONIC MEDIA

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), moved:

> That the Senate do empower the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public meeting on Wednesday, February 15, 1995, for the purpose of hearing the Honourable Michel Dupuy, P.C., the Minister of Canadian Heritage, with the least possible disruption of the hearing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1400)

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET
DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, my second motion is motivated by an abundance of caution, in the event that the Senate does not rise by 3:15 p.m. today. With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit at 3:15 p.m., Wednesday, February 15, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

NOTICES OF INQUIRIES NOS. 30 AND 31 REINSTATED
NOTWITHSTANDING RULE 27(3)

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have standing in my name on the Order Paper two Notices of Inquiries. They are Nos. 30 and 31. Honourable senators will notice they have the number "15" in brackets beside them, which means that, unless I speak to them, they will be dropped from the Order Paper after today.

A number of outstanding matters are still not completely resolved in relation to these inquiries. I am referring to the rules, regulations and other arrangements as a result of both the NAFTA and the GATT agreements insofar as they are concerned with agriculture. Therefore I wish to leave these inquiries on the Order Paper so that if and when it is necessary for us to debate this subject, notice will have been given.

I ask, therefore, that these items be reinstated on the Order Paper, because a great deal of work will be done between now and July 1 when some of these matters are expected to be finalized. If the notices of such inquiries are on the Order Paper at that time, then I will not have to start over at square one.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—GRANTING OF MONOPOLY POWERS
FOR THE EXPORT MARKETING OF ALL GRAINS AND OILSEEDS—
PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a petition signed by 50 people from Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It reads as follows:

We, the undersigned citizens of Canada, draw the attention of the House to the following:

That a very vocal minority of citizens are requesting Parliament institute a dual marketing system for wheat and barley to export.

Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley to export. Your petitioners also request that Parliament expand further Canadian Wheat Board marketing monopoly powers to include all grains and oilseeds.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

ENFORCEMENT OF CURRENT CRIMINAL CODE PROVISIONS—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a second petition signed by Canadians, mostly from the Saskatoon and surrounding area. It reads as follows:

TO THE HONOURABLE SENATE OF CANADA IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The PETITION of the undersigned, residents of Canada,

Humbly sheweth:

THAT the majority of Canadians are law-abiding citizens who respect the law.

THAT the majority of Canadians respect the sanctity of human life.

THAT the majority of Canadians believe that physicians in Canada should be working to save lives, not to end them.

THEREFORE your petitioners pray that: 1) Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously, and that; 2) Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

AND as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present some petitions from concerned Canadians, asking for the removal of the exemption for tobacco from the Hazardous Products Act.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on October 4, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding the study of low-level military flights in Labrador.

THE ENVIRONMENT

STUDY OF LOW-LEVEL MILITARY FLIGHTS IN LABRADOR—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO CRITICISM OF PROCESS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on October 4, 1994)

The environmental assessment panel hired seven technical experts and asked each expert to do two things. The first was to review the revised Environmental Impact Statement submitted to the panel by the Department of National Defence, and provide written comments on the adequacy of the document with respect to the expert's area of expertise. The second was to make a presentation at the public hearings, commenting on the predicted impacts of the proposed project and on the proposed mitigation measures, with respect to the expert's area of expertise.

All seven experts were requested to do the same tasks, within their area of expertise. No expert was asked to comment on an area for which they did not possess expertise.

The 1987 Guidelines document referred to in the question was a document, produced by the panel, that outlined information requirements for the Department of National Defence to use in preparing its Environmental Impact Statement. After conducting a thorough review of the first Environmental Impact Statement submitted by National Defence in 1989, the panel concluded that the document was deficient, and issued a deficiency statement.

After conducting a thorough review of the revised Environmental Impact Statement submitted by DND in April 1994, the panel concluded that the information was a sufficient basis for meaningful discussion at public hearings, provided certain additional information was provided by the Department of National Defence. The panel held public hearings from September 19 to October 29. Approximately 3,200 people attended the 34 sessions held in 14 communities in Labrador and Quebec. The panel will be submitting its report at the end of February.

This environmental assessment panel is conducting the review in an impartial and fair manner that fully respects the principles of the federal Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order of 1984.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventeenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Parliamentary Associations), presented in the Senate on February 14, 1995.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, the seventeenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, dedicated as it is primarily to the administration of parliamentary associations, really had its genesis in a report of the Auditor General in 1992 when he examined inter-parliamentary relations. At that time, he reported that the current problems stem from poor communication and insufficiently timely Senate input in the decision-making process.

He also stated that the Senate committee does not have final input in the early stages of the budget process, but instead has input only at the end when deciding whether to approve the Senate's financial contribution to the operation of the directorates. In other words, the Senate has no participation in the administration other than the mailing of cheques when requested.

There have been other reports, observations and responses over the years with respect to inter-parliamentary associations. One such report was produced by our colleague Senator Prud'homme, when he was a member of the House of Commons. He will see many of his musings in our recommendations.

The report also flows from the leadership of the Speaker in the House of Commons, Gilbert Parent, and the former Speaker of the Senate, Roméo LeBlanc, who together were in the process of establishing a cooperative communication process between the two houses with respect to inter-parliamentary services. In saying that, I have no reason to believe that the situation will be otherwise in the future.

From those beginnings came the current initiative, which was taken in June of 1994 when the Board of Internal Economy in the House of Commons proposed some sweeping reforms and changes with respect to the administration of parliamentary associations, and sought Senate concurrence in that initiative. We examined the initiative over the summer and made a response on September 6, in which we recommended further changes and improvements to the initiative which would, in all cases, enhance Senate participation and representation.

Finally, on November 1, we were successful in appointing Mr. Gary O'Brien of the Committees Branch and Mr. Timothy Wilson, Clerk of the Internal Economy Committee, to engage in negotiations with their counterparts in the other place. As a result of those negotiations and the other initiatives I have outlined, honourable senators have before them the report which we believe goes a long way in answering the criticism of many with respect to the administration of these associations.

The first recommendation is the appointment of a joint inter-parliamentary council on parliamentary associations. The membership of the council would consist of seven members, two from the Senate and five from the House of Commons.

I note there have been some observations in the Senate as to why we should have only two members while five are suggested from the House of Commons. It has been the time-honoured tradition of this Parliament that there be a 70-30 per cent split with respect to delegations and the financing of joint committees. We agree it should be used in this case because it will operate and function as an inter-parliamentary committee. That is to say, there will be joint chairmen and joint clerks. We feel that that is adequate representation on the council, and it is what we recommend in our report.

The powers of the council will be to determine all budgetary and administrative needs relating to parliamentary associations, to review expenditures, identify surpluses, authorize reallocations and special conference budgets. It will coordinate the activities and determine operating policies, as well as appoint subgroups as may be necessary.

The second recommendation, of course, is the four-and-four proposal which gives to the Senate authority over the operations of four of the eight parliamentary associations. We will be responsible for the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the North Atlantic Assembly, Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association, and the Canada-France Inter-Parliamentary Association.

The House of Commons will be responsible for the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, the International Assembly of French-Speaking Parliamentarians, Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group and Canada-Japan Inter-Parliamentary Group.

We feel that we can adequately carry on the administration of these four associations which shall be assigned to us. We propose that they be administerd under the direction of the Committees Branch. We can undertake this responsibility at no extra cost to the Senate. It will offer to our staff and to our administrators career-enhancing opportunities.

We will be responsible for 100 per cent of the travel costs of senators on all eight associations or groups, and for 100 per cent of the program costs of the four associations we administer.

We have established the fact that we can operate this way and that our proposal will involve no additional costs to the Senate. We believe we can enhance the participation of the Senate by assuming the responsibility for these four associations and by playing our part in the council that is to be established.

Honourable senators, two of the other matters before you relate to the proposal that all travel be based on APEX fares or the lowest fares available with respect to travelling delegations, and to the proposal that there be no spousal participation except according to a strict protocol to be established.

The final recommendation requests the Senate to amend its rules to provide for the mandatory reporting of returning delegations to delegations that will be travelling out, and, in addition, to include a provision that they put in any such report comments on the financial expenditures.

Honourable senators, I am asking that you adopt this report. If adopted, we will take a bold step forward in the administration of parliamentary associations. It will assure the Senate an active role in the administration of these associations through the council and through our duties in operating the four associations, and offer to our staff career-enhancing opportunities.

Most important, if we adopt this procedure and join the House of Commons in this undertaking, it will grant to the public and to Parliament the accountability and the transparency that has been demanded with respect to the operation of parliamentary associations. I recommend it to you for your consideration and adoption by the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Chairman of the committee. On the last sitting day before the Christmas recess, the Deputy Chairman of the committee, Senator Di Nino, tabled some documentation on this matter. I do not have the documents in front of me at the moment; however, I remember quite clearly that the documents, which I believe had originated with the House of Commons Board of Internal Economy, specified that, in future, parliamentary associations would not be allowed to contract for outside professional services; for example, research services.

My honourable friend has not mentioned that provision in his presentation today. I should like to know the status of that matter as it applies to all of the parliamentary organizations, especially those that will be run from the Senate.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I did not refer to that provision, which was issued in a press release by the Board of Internal Economy. I am really not responsible for their press releases. However, the Senate was not consulted on that matter and we never commented upon it. Therefore, we have not agreed to it. It is one matter among others that must be resolved when we move this council into operation. That will probably be one of the first issues to be discussed.

I repeat, the Senate did not agree to that provision. It was an initiative of the Board of Internal Economy, and not the Senate.

Senator Murray: I thank the chairman for that reply. I take it this is a matter that has yet to be determined and that the inter-parliamentary associations are not bound by the provision in that press release to which I referred. In any case, since the chairman has told us that it is a matter that will be discussed at the council, let me take a few seconds of his time, and the time of the Senate, to express a view on this matter.

I think it is going too far for the Board of Internal Economy in the other place — or our own committee, for that matter — to try to regulate in such detail the activities of the inter-parliamentary associations. It is only fair that those associations should be asked to accept certain financial realities and fiscal disciplines, as we all must do. However, within those budgets and within the budget ceilings that are fixed, surely a parliamentary association, depending on its circumstances, should have the right to decide whether it needs to contract for outside professional services, such as research, or whether it can make do with the information supplied by the relevant government department or by the parliamentary library.

While I share the hope of the honourable chairman that this is a great step forward and that the administration of these associations will be improved, as one senator who is no longer active in these associations but was some years ago, I should like to caution the chairman that senators and members of the House of Commons who are members of these organizations are surely mature enough and responsible enough to make their own decisions on the allocation of their budgets, always respecting the ceilings that have been imposed by the respective chambers.

Senator Hastings: I agree wholeheartedly with what the Honourable Senator Murray has just said.

Honourable senators, Canadian parliamentarians have made a contribution in these associations to the extent that we enjoy a representation far greater, sometimes, than we really deserve. The reason we are able to participate with our colleagues in other parliaments is the advance support we have received in research and the support at the meeting. I agree that each association should have the ability to decide what research or what support it needs.

Honourable senators, I would anticipate that each association will come forward with a budget, an activity report for the future year. They will indicate, as our Senate committees indicate, where the money will be spent. If they wish to spend it on research and the money is available, they may do so. If they wish to spend it on travel, it is up to the individual committees to make that decision, and thus make their own presentations to the council.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Di Nino, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

LITERACY ACTION DAY ON PARLIAMENT HILL

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I rise today to draw to your attention the fact that this is Literacy Action Day on Parliament Hill. Throughout the day, representatives from five major literacy organizations in Canada are carrying on discussions and consultations with people in the House of Commons and, I hope, with people in the Senate. They include ABC Canada, the Fédération canadienne pour l'alphabétisation en français, Frontier College, Laubach Literacy of Canada, and the Movement for Canadian Literacy which has organized the day.

Representatives from these organizations have been meeting with representatives on Parliament Hill to try to promote literacy awareness and to inform us of the good work that is being done in the field of literacy across this country. They are also telling our colleagues about the struggle to raise literacy levels in Canada, its challenges and the ongoing and fundamental nature of the issue which is essential for a strong democracy.

Basic literacy skills enable individuals to understand and to participate actively in the democratic process. Therefore, what better place than Parliament Hill to have an awareness day?

The theme of this year's action day is the celebration of the first half of the decade following the creation by the government of my friends' opposite of the National Literacy Secretariat, an organization which came into being around the time of International Literacy Year.

There is much to celebrate. Literacy has moved up substantially on the agendas of governments, business and labour, but we have a long way to go before there will be a broad and extensive knowledge and understanding among the public of Canada about the importance and the reality of this issue.

I know that many here today have been supportive of this issue. I thank you for that, and I hope you will continue. I wish to invite each and every one of you to attend a reception, of which I think you have received notice, being held in Room 256-S this afternoon from 3:30 to 5:00 p.m. The people who have been working on the Hill today will be there. They will want to talk to you, as well as to colleagues from the other side. Attendance by as many of you as possible would be greatly appreciated.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, we welcome the statement by the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is also the minister responsible for literacy. The shared duties which the minister has might underscore in a very special way the importance of this particular area of government initiative for this particular chamber. We, too, have taken note of this special day.

Honourable senators, we must recognize that in this country a more concerted effort is required if we are to combat the terrible situation we have. Our country numbers among the G-7, yet the rate of literacy in many quarters is quite embarrassing and is a drain on the country. We join with the minister in recognizing the terrific efforts of the national literacy groups which are on the Hill today representing, in a sense, 38 per cent of adult Canadians who may be deemed illiterate.

I should like to comment on a matter of related concern. A Decima survey shows that 75 per cent of Canadians believe that government information programs, our own services, are too difficult to understand. The National Literacy Secretariat, to which the minister has referred, has suggested that "plain language" be used to remedy the situation.

Yet, on page 82 of the report of the standing committee of the House of Commons studying social policy reform is a one-sentence literacy recommendation which contains 50 words, and is difficult to understand. Honourable senators, a variety of analyses has been performed on the readability level of that recommendation and I should like to list some of the findings.

The Flesch-Kincaid Grade Level Analysis, wherein a readability score of between grade 6 and 10 is considered most effective, rated the literacy recommendation as being appropriate for someone with "grade 28"; in other words, 28 years of schooling, to be able to understand what that recommendation means. On the Flesch Reading Ease Scale, wherein the lower the score the more difficult the writing is to read, the literacy recommendation rated a zero.

On the Gunnings Fog Index, which is a measure of the appropriate grade level that a reader must have achieved in order to understand a document, the literacy recommendation rated a 32; in other words, 32 years of schooling necessary to be able to understand what the government is saying — or rather what they are not saying — on an issue of fundamental importance.

Honourable senators, perhaps a directive would be warranted, issued by our colleague the Minister with special responsibility for Literacy to government departments and to parliamentary committees, inviting them to use plain language.

THE ECONOMY

REDUCTION IN FEDERAL DEFICIT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have in my hand a publication which arrived in our office yesterday called The Fiscal Monitor. Nobody asks about that publication anymore, but I wanted to make sure that the senators opposite, particularly the Leader of the Opposition, and probably even more particularly Senator Murray, are still reading this little publication because they used to take a great interest in it.

In keeping with the new Canadian way of doing things, which is to give good news a chance, I thought I might remind senators opposite that the deficit from April to December, 1994, is down by $6 billion. That is good news for Canadians. The article goes on to point out some details, one of which is that program spending was down by $1.3 billion in this period. Furthermore — and this is a most unusual change — the deficit outlook for 1994-95 will be lower than forecast; something which I do not think has happened in the last 12 or 15 years.

I want to bring this information to the attention of honourable senators opposite so that they can join with us in making sure that Canadians know about this terrifically good news.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I, too, would like to comment on the very encouraging results, news of which has just been given to us by Senator Olson, particularly as The Fiscal Monitor, which is a Department of Finance publication, gives much of the credit to the effect of the December 1992 economic and fiscal statement, which was delivered by a Conservative Minister of Finance.

I want to remind all honourable senators that all of the measures which were legislated arising from that statement were voted against by the Liberals in this chamber, as well as in the other one. Despite that, the Liberals are now adopting those measures, which is confirmation from the other side that what we did, we did well.

EIGHTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 16, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

EIGHTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee received and considered a staff report entitled: "Task Force on the Internet."

Your Committee recommends Senate participation in the Parliamentary Internet project.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 21, 1995 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

CERTIFIED GENERAL ACCOUNTANTS' ASSOCIATION— FIRST READING

Hon. John Stewart, for the Honourable Michael Kirby, presented Bill S-8, to amend the Act of Incorporation of the Certified General Accountants' Association of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Stewart, for Senator Kirby, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, February 28, 1995.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO PRINT VOLUME I OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, February 21, 1995, I shall move:

> That the Senate order the printing, in its original format, of 500 copies of Volume 1 of the Report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy entitled, "Canada's Foreign Policy: Principles and Priorities for the Future"; and
> That an amount not exceeding $7,500 be allocated for that purpose.

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT

RECOMMENDATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT CONCERNING LITERACY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, given that today is a special day to focus on literacy, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is also the Minister with special responsibility for Literacy, relates to the report of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development in the other place entitled, "Security Opportunities and Fairness — Canadians Renewing Their Social Programs" in which the committee recommends that:

> ...the federal government continue its commitment to the recognition of a right to literacy training based on principles such as accessibility of programs, learner-centred programming, recognition of prior learning for transferability between levels of programs, and quality standards that are also applicable to learning in general.

• (1420)

That is the recommendation. Will the minister advise the Senate whether she and the government intend to accept that recommendation?

Senator Berntson: Please tell us what it means.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for drawing the attention of the Senate to that recommendation. That report, as he knows, has been presented in the House of Commons and is before the minister and the government for consideration under the whole ongoing question of social policy review. Many of the points in that recommendation are now, and will continue to be, the building blocks for the federal government in developing, in partnership with the provinces, national organizations, business and labour, the kinds of projects that will have the maximum positive effect on those who are targetted.

I know that the Minister of Human Resources Development has a very sympathetic attitude towards the issue of literacy. In fact, in his policy document put out last fall, he recognized literacy as the foundation for life-long learning; that without basic literacy there is very little else one can achieve in terms of life-long learning. The whole issue took up a major portion of that discussion document, particularly in terms of the workplace and in terms of accelerating learning and training. I was delighted that the committee chose to highlight literacy in one of its recommendations, and I will certainly be working with my colleague Mr. Axworthy to get maximum participation from him and the government on this issue.

In recognition of my honourable friend's statement earlier on the question of "plain language," the literacy secretariat has put out a small publication on "plain language" and is working on further efforts towards that end in the Public Service of Canada. Obviously we have a long way to go.

A few years ago, when the massive documents of the free trade agreement came out, Frontier College examined them and determined that, at best, 11 per cent of Canadians would not have any notion at all of what was in that very important document. That estimate was probably high. However, there is a long way to go, particularly if it is difficult to properly communicate a recommendation on the question of literacy itself.

AGRICULTURE

IMPOSITION OF U.S. IMPORT TAX ON CANADIAN SUGAR PRODUCTS—DISSCUSSION WITH PRESIDENT DURING UPCOMING VISIT

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding an agricultural matter. The minister knows that there are a number of ongoing disputes between Canada and the United States on agricultural issues. Despite the free trade agreement, the U.S. recently imposed tariffs on Canadian sugar and sugar-containing products. As well, the Americans are challenging the tariff schedule on eggs, poultry and dairy products which Canada has introduced according to the new GATT agreement. Last summer, our two countries reached an agreement on durum wheat which included a so-called "peace clause"; yet the U.S. continues to attack the Canadian Wheat Board, and recently announced that an end-use certificate would be required to import Canadian wheat.

Can the minister give us some assurance that the Prime Minister will raise these issues when he meets with the President of the United States next week in Ottawa?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can say, "You bet." The honourable senator is absolutely right in bringing this issue before us. These have been extremely trying subjects between our two countries in the last year or year and a half. The Canadian government has been very forthright in its contacts recently and over the past several months with the United States through the Honourable Roy MacLaren, Minister for International Trade, and the Honourable Ralph Goodale, Minister of Agriculture.

On the question of supply management, the Americans have asked Canada for consultation or discussion on that issue, and it is anticipated that those discussions will go ahead. They have not called for a panel hearing under NAFTA, but for a discussion. Only one week ago, Mr. MacLaren and Mr. Goodale asked for a similar discussion on the whole issue of sugar and sugar-containing products.

My honourable friend knows that I have an active interest in that particular area of dispute, and I assure him that next week these issues will be front and centre with ministers and the Prime Minister in the whole discussion of bilateral trade.

On the sugar issue, Mr. Goodale wants to hold discussions with the new Secretary of Agriculture on the question of reopening negotiations to get the sugar discussions back on track. It is understandable why they have not yet occurred. We are awaiting the confirmation of that appointment by the United States Senate.

The ministers have also been looking at other options for discussion and perhaps challenges both at the governmental level and the industry level, should there be a stalemate. In the House of Commons on Tuesday, the Prime Minister was asked whether this issue would be a topic of conversation with the President, and his answer, as I recall it, was quite succinct. He said, "The short answer to that is 'oui'."

Senator Gustafson: Honourable senators, I am pleased to hear that the Prime Minister will be taking this matter up with the President of the United States.

It appears to me by the actions of the U.S. Government that althought they have signed a free trade agreement, there is some question as to whether they believe in the agreement they signed. The most recent indication is a suggestion by the President of the United States that there be a head tax at the border. Naturally, our agricultural people are very concerned about these issues, and I cannot emphasize enough the importance of these concerns being addressed at the meeting next week.

Senator Fairbairn: I appreciate my friend's concern, and I share it. It truly is a daily preoccupation, certainly with myself.

Senator Robertson raised a question the other day on the issue of the border fee. At the end of Question Period, I had planned to advise honourable senators that this issue will be discussed with the President when he is here next week. As you know, Canada has already expressed serious concern about this development. Canadians and Americans have been moving freely across the border for 100 years or longer. Almost 100 million people enter the U.S. from Canada every year. It is a serious consideration. I understand there is strong opposition in Congress to the imposition of such a fee. It is our hope that the proposal will be dropped by Congress and the administration before there is any question of passing legislation.

• (1430)

ABOLITION OF ATLANTIC REGION FREIGHT ASSISTANCE— POSSIBILITY OF NOTICE TO STAKEHOLDERS

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, a number of questions have arisen, quite understandably I suppose, on the heels of Transport Minister Young's statement on CBC's Morningside on February 7 last, in which he said quite clearly, "Transport Canada is out of the business of subsidies and we'll be out of ARFAA and MFRA in Atlantic Canada."

My concern is twofold. First, that proposal was taken somewhat unilaterally on the part of the minister. Honourable senators will recognize that it comes as a bit of a shock to people who had been led to believe, as a result of correspondence received late last fall, that there would be ample notice, that the changes would be reasonable and fair, and that they would address the difficult and grave hardships such a measure would impose upon the some 14,000 to 15,000 workers in Atlantic Canada whose goods and products must be transported to Ontario and Western Canada for sale. Such a move will be disastrous for them. Indeed, it will put them out of business. This move, together with the continuing difficulties with sugar, will place great strains on the economy of Atlantic Canada.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate whether or not the statement by the minister should be taken as formal notice to the stakeholders in Atlantic Canada? If she is not aware of the situation herself, perhaps, as a result of cabinet discussions, will she determine what plans, if any, the government may have to offset the elimination of the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the ARFAA?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not want to venture into this important issue without first talking to the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Doug Young. I will transmit the substance of the honourable senator's questions to him.

Having lived side-by-side with beet producers all my life, I am aware of the issues surrounding sugar and sugar-containing products. I know it is an issue that stretches across this country. It is of concern not just to producers and factories but to the refiners and the companies which market the products. It is a big issue, and that is one of the reasons some of us are extremely concerned about it. We will continue to be concerned about it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPORTION OF NON-MILITARY ITEMS IN DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, my questions are for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. First, when may I expect an answer to the question I posed on November 29 concerning the budget of the Department of National Defence? I know it is a tough question and will probably take some "beavering" to get the numbers.

PEACEKEEPING COSTS CHARGED TO DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET—GOVERNMENT POSTION

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, I do not expect an answer to my other questions today, either. I think finding answers to them will take a bit of "beavering" as well.

I am told that the costs to maintain our peacekeeping forces are paid out of the budget of the Department of National Defence, which are then billed to the UN. It seems that the UN would then refund Canada according to its scales, which are often below Canada's scales. However, the refunds received are then deposited into the Consolidated Revenue Fund instead of being credited to the budget of the Department of National Defence.

Will the Leader of the Government confirm whether that is indeed the procedure that is followed? If it is the procedure, why is this amount not credited to the budget of the Department of National Defence? If it is not done in that way, then will some changes be made in the upcoming budget?

Going back to the "beavering" part of all this, will the Leader of the Government provide to the Senate the total amount charged against the budget of the Department of National Defence from the beginning of the Croatia-Bosnia operations to year-end 1994? Of this amount, will she inform the Senate what part of it has been charged to the UN? How much have we received from the UN against the particular submissions we have made?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Sylvain, too, must have been "beavering" away to research the background to the questions he has asked. I will convey them to the Minister of National Defence and get a response for the honourable senator as quickly as possible.

When I get back to the office today I will attempt to find the answer to the question the honourable senator asked on November 29 last.

HEALTH

HIV INFECTION IN WOMEN—REPORTED INCREASE IN RATE—APPLICATION OF DISCRETIONARY PORTION OF DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a couple of quick questions. I am sure the minister has read the headline in The Ottawa Citizen this morning concerning the increase in HIV rates in women. The demand for action in such circumstances should be rather obvious.

Recently, the Minister of Health, who has the discretionary power to use $1.5 million on short-term HIV needs, refused to give Canadians an assurance that her department is prepared to make use of the department's discretionary allocation. How can her position be reconciled with this latest information on the increase in the rate of HIV infection in women? I find that a bit incredible.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am aware of the stories in the newspaper. They are of tremendous concern. I will try to obtain that information for the honourable senator as quickly as possible.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO BLIGHT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGES SUSTAINED BY GROWERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, the New Brunswick Minister of Agriculture stated in our provincial legislature on Friday, February 10, that his department has completed the damage assessment in connection with the late potato blight of last year. He stated that at least 10 per cent of the potato crop was lost because of this late blight. The affected growers are waiting for a response from the federal government, since negotiations have been going on between the province and the federal government respecting compensation. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us as to when the affected growers can expect a federal decision on compensation? They are rather anxious in this regard.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to get the information from the Minister of Agriculture.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

REMOVAL OF TAX ON READING MATERIALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, I would direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns the question of literacy. When it comes to literacy and the key component of it is reading materials, the refrain from our friends opposite has been consistent: In 1990, the Liberals vowed that once they were in power, the GST would be removed from all reading materials. This policy was reaffirmed in 1992 at a major party policy conference that set the blueprint for the return to Ottawa of the Liberal government.

If memory serves me well, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, while in opposition, was quite vocal on the subject, as were the rest of her colleagues. After the election, she continued to state publicly that the fight to have the tax removed would go on.

Today, however, the election is but a memory — and so, it seems, is the Liberal's promise. Even on this very special day for literacy, the minister's response is silence — not to mention the deafening silence from the Minister of Finance, who has the perfect opportunity in his budget to take action in this regard.

My question is this: Given that this is Literacy Action Day, would the minister confirm that her government will live up to its promise and remove any federal taxation from reading materials?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I should like to be able to do that, honourable senators. The fight will go on. As I have said before in this chamber, the GST certainly has not been forgotten.

Honourable senators, we are still working with the provinces, hopefully towards a joint federal-provincial solution. That is the preferred option, as all my honourable friends know. Those discussions are continuing. I am told by the Minister of Finance that progress, so far, is encouraging.

Honourable senators, when discussions have proceeded along the way, you can rest assured that I will be arguing, as I have consistently, on behalf of the literacy movement and against the tax on books.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question, if I may.

Do I understand from the minister's answer that negotiations are going on with the provinces in this regard, and that the minister is confirming that this government is intending to keep the GST?

Senator Fairbairn: No, my honourable friend cannot make that assumption. Honourable senators, we remain committed to replacing the GST with a tax system that is fairer, simpler and more efficient. It is in that regard that the discussions are proceeding with the provinces.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then we will have it for a while yet.

Senator DeWare: As a solution, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would support the passage of Bill S-14. That was a bill that was introduced by your former colleague Senator Frith which would exempt all reading materials from this tax. That is an option that you have.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will continue to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance the concerns and fervently held views of my honourable friend on this issue. All of it is helpful.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: They are your concerns, too.

Senator Fairbairn: The Minister of Finance is constantly made aware of my concerns.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are talking for yourself. We are not at the cabinet table any more.

NATIONAL LITERACY SECRETARIAT—IMPORTANCE OF PROGRAM CONTINUITY AND VOLUNTEER PARTICIPATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, on February 14, the minister responsible for literacy assured us that the National Literacy Secretariat was being very careful to assess programs presently in existence in order not to waste resources in areas which are not productive. The minister stressed this because of the limited resources with which the department is faced.

As honourable senators are aware, most of our country's literacy programs depend almost exclusively on volunteers. Students for Literacy is an excellent example of a volunteer program that has been started at many universities across this country. Their method is to encourage one-on-one tutoring: an extremely effective way for people to improve their literacy skills. At McGill University in the current academic year, there was an enrollment of 50 student-tutor matches. Last year, this same program had 86 student-tutor matches. Why the decline in participation?

Honourable senators, since the organization is based on volunteers, there is an unfortunate turnover in the administration. These year-to-year changes do not provide the program with adequate continuity. Perhaps a full-time, paid coordinator could be the solution to this dilemma. Instead, 36 Canadians were not given the opportunity to improve their literacy skills, and 36 volunteers were turned away.

Does the minister's plan for literacy involve a strong volunteer component? If so, is the minister and her department examining what can be done in situations such as the one that I have described?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Cochrane for her question. The answer is that the government, myself as minister, and the National Literacy Secretariat in particular, are very supportive of the volunteer sector on this particular issue. It is the army that fuels activity across the country.

One of the most outstanding organizations for volunteers on literacy, as the senator well knows, is LAUBACH. That organization is strongly supported by the National Literacy Secretariat and the program. LAUBACH has a strong interest in the one-on-one tutoring and the student tutoring. Another organization is Frontier College, which has been organizing in the universities on this issue.

As an aside, honourable senators, one of the most encouraging aspects of this initiative is the degree to which young students have taken up the cause, which they find to be worthy of their time and effort, and because of the results that come from these particular one-on-one peer tutoring efforts. It is quite exciting.

With respect to the honourable senator's specific question concerning the decline in that particular program, I will look into that issue with the secretariat. As well, I will ask for their views on the question of a full-time, paid coordinator.

As my honourable friend knows, the federal government works very much in partnership with other levels and organizations in delivering the service on the ground. I will definitely follow up on this matter to see what we can do to persuade the other groups involved.

JUSTICE

FIREARMS REGISTRATION BILL—AVAILABILITY OF COPIES TO SENATORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, on February 14, the Minister of Justice stood in his place and, with much fanfare and fireworks, introduced to the citizens of Canada a bill respecting firearms and other weapons.

At that time, the minister sent to us in the Senate a publication with some information. In that publication, the minister states:

> We are able to provide members of Parliament with 15 copies of the registration brochure.

Considering the importance of this bill in the Province of Alberta, which I am sure the Leader of the Government in this house recognizes, I have been calling around, trying to obtain more copies. I was told that only one copy would be available to members of the Senate.

Would the honourable leader intercede on my behalf to determine whether or not we senators may obtain more than one copy of this bill? In fact, we would like to have the same number of copies, namely 15, that members of Parliament have been allotted. Many Albertans are interested in this legislation and wish to have copies of the bill so that they can examine it and determine whether or not they find it favourable.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do that. As well, I can tell the honourable senator that I always remind our colleagues in the other place that senators, too, are members of Parliament. I will definitely draw this matter to the attention of the minister's office this afternoon.

RECONSTRUCTION OF EAST BLOCK TUNNEL—STATUS OF PROJECT

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Madam Minister, you agreed on Tuesday to inquire of your colleague the Minister of Public Works about a building construction project in the Sault Ste Marie area. I wonder if one more question could be added to those you will put, or may have already put, to your colleague. Is it true that the plans to build a tunnel between the East and Centre Blocks have been cancelled?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Nolin, first of all, I am still awaiting the responses for both senators on the questions asked the other day.

With respect to the honourable senator's final question, the answer is "yes." I spoke with the Minister of Public Works, who confirmed to me that this decision was taken based on the fiscal realities of the current situation in Canada.

DETAILS OF COSTS INVOLVED IN CANCELLATION OF PROJECT

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Would it be possible to know how much the cancellation costs will be in this case?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will get the precise figures for my honourable friend. One figure for the reconstruction of the tunnel which has been bandied about in recent months is in the order of $3 million, but I will get the precise figures.

Senator Nolin: Honourables senators, one point of clarification: the cost to which I am referring is the cost of cancellation, not the cost of the contract itself. There is always a cost related to the cancellation of a contract.

Senator Fairbairn: I will be pleased to obtain that information.

CONSULTATION WITH INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE ON CANCELLATION OF PROJECT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, on December 15, in reply to a question by Senator Doyle on this very project, the Leader of the Government in the Senate told us that the Standing Committee on Internal Economy had been consulted at least twice on the tunnel project. My question is directed either to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, since he is here. Was that committee consulted on the cancellation?

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: I would appreciate taking the question as notice.

CANCELLATION OF PROJECTS WITHIN PARLIAMENTARY PRECINCTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): That certainly is an unusual, but still eloquent, answer.

Honourable senators, this is becoming the government of cancellations: the airport deal, the helicopter deal, the windows of the Foreign Affairs building, the Airborne Regiment, the Axworthy social reform policy, and now the tunnel.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration confirm that the grandiose program worth hundreds of millions of dollars to improve and renovate the parliamentary precinct will also eventually be cancelled and, by confirming that, tell us that the removal of the post office to open a tourist centre was another waste of money by the government, that the committee room downstairs — which this government approved, and to which we objected — will also be cancelled, and that this whole process of cancellation will cost the Government of Canada millions of dollars in damages?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot in any way confirm the hypothetical questions my friend has asked. In many of the cases, the minister involved has been very conscious of public expense and has, for that reason, cancelled or, in some cases perhaps, postponed the larger development. I will get a more precise answer from the minister.

The point I wish to make to my honourable friends is that these cancellations are being made in the interest of dealing with the very serious fiscal problems this country faces. The Minister of Finance has asked every minister of the government to evaluate programs and projects within their departments in an effort to bring government expenditures into the best possible balance for the people of Canada. That is what the budget will be all about. I will try to find more precise responses for my honourable friend on the questions concerning Public Works, particularly as they pertain to the Senate, but also to the larger project he mentioned.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The very same department which, on January 4, sent out a press release telling us about the tunnel project, one month later cancels it. In both cases, the same minister is involved.

Do not try to impress us with cost saving when the minister who claimed cost saving is the same minister who signed on the renovations, the same minister who signed for the windows for the External Affairs building, and the same minister who will one day have to cancel the building in Sault Ste. Marie for the same reasons.

"No one told me about these projects," says the minister. This is a government in which civil servants are being blamed for the responsibilities of the ministers. Mr. Collenette is saying, "No one told me," in the same way that the Minister of Public Works is telling us, "I don't know, either."

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE BILL

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill C-53, to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, it gives me much pleasure to have this opportunity to initiate the debate on second reading of Bill C-53. Only yesterday, Canada celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of the new Canadian flag, a proud symbol of the Canadian people and our identity internationally. Along with some of our colleagues in this chamber, I had the privilege in 1964 and 1965 of participating in the other place in the great flag debate on the motion of the Prime Minister of that time, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. The debate lasted for several months until the motion was passed in the other place on December 15, 1964, with an overwhelming majority adopting the unanimous decision of the special House of Commons committee on the Canadian flag. We Canadians are proud of the red maple leaf on white background, bounded on each side with the red bars, because it is the symbol of our country and is our identifying banner abroad.

It was my duty and privilege to serve as the first Minister of State for Multiculturalism from 1972 to 1974, mandated to implement the new federal policy on multiculturalism from coast to coast. In the House of Commons on October 8, 1971, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau stated that his government accepted the recommendation of the fourth volume of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, the mandate of which included the contribution to Canada of Canadians other than of English and French origin.

I should like to put on record the first paragraph of that proclamation in the House of Commons by then Prime Minister Trudeau. He said:

> It was the view of the Royal Commission, shared by the government and, I am sure, by all Canadians, that there cannot be one cultural policy for Canadians of British and French origin, another for original peoples and yet a third for all others. For although there are two official languages, there is no official culture, nor does any ethnic group take precedence over any other.

He continued by saying:

> No citizen or group of citizens is other than Canadian, and all should be treated fairly.

• (1500)

That statement, which I consider historic, was also supported in the House of Commons by all party leaders — the Honourable Robert Stanfield, Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada; Mr. David Lewis, Leader of the New Democratic Party; and Mr. Réal Caouette for the Créditiste Party — all declaring their agreement and support of that federal government policy on multiculturalism. I think it is one of the proudest moments in Canadian parliamentary history, and one for which I was proud to be present when it was stated in the house.

Today, therefore, it is appropriate that we in this chamber should pause and reflect, in order to put into proper perspective the purpose of Bill C-53, establishing the new Department of Canadian Heritage. This bill may seem to be a routine matter for parliamentarians to consider, but a sober second look reveals that this legislation actually deals with a fundamental issue, the soul of our nation, which is our cultural heritage.

Bill C-53 does not establish a new framework law. Rather, this bill amends certain acts such as the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, the Communications Act, the Official Languages Act, with respect to the specific powers, duties and functions of the new Minister of Canadian Heritage. In short, this legislation enables the new Minister of Heritage and his or her staff to administer under one roof the mandates previously held by a number of government departments in as much as they relate to Canadian heritage, our culture.

Honourable senators will recall that the reorganization of government relating to this bill was initiated by the previous government in 1993, with a view to streamlining the business of government and attempting to adapt the structure of government in order to improve the services provided to the public. The Department of Canadian Heritage was created by Order in Council in 1993, amalgamating responsibilities previously held by five former departments, including Secretary of State, Multiculturalism and Citizenship, Fitness and Amateur Sport, Parks Canada, Historic Sites and Monuments, as well as the cultural, broadcasting and heritage components of Communications Canada. This amalgamation was not duplication but rather a coalescing of central resources and a focusing to strengthen Canadian identity, developing further our cultural and natural heritage, the arts, amateur sports and other related cultural components.

These components or elements define Canadians as a multifaceted dynamic people with a rich cultural and natural heritage. They are values that Canadians share and that unite them. These values are the sum product of all Canadians, including our aboriginal peoples, French-speaking peoples, the English-speaking settlers throughout Canada, and other immigrants who settled in Canada who daily increase the distinctive diversity of Canadian society today.

The Department of Canadian Heritage reflects and responds comprehensively and dynamically to the reality of Canadian diversity in all its many facets. Therefore, this reorganization confers one dynamic mandate to synergize, as the minister stated to the House of Commons, so that the combined impact of the whole of this new department will be able to exceed that of its individual parts.

Bill C-53 regroups, for the purposes of greater effectiveness and efficiency, virtually all that one thinks of when asked, "What, for administrative purposes, is Canadian heritage?" It places such programs and authorities under one administration, one minister, with a view to streamlining the ability of the Canadian government to carry out its commitments to the sons and daughters of the many nations who still give their all to the formation of Canadian society.

Two amendments to this bill were thought advisable by the members of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage, namely copyright and fee structures in this area. At any rate the amendments, which provide for symbiosis, met with the approval of a number of representatives of artistic communities heard by that committee, and I expect that our own committee will hear more supportive remarks by way of similar representations, perhaps from artisan communities and innovators not yet heard.

Having used the word "community" twice already, I should like to emphasize that the Canadian interests which Bill C-53 clearly outlines incorporate by their nature all Canadian individuals in view of their membership in our community. The new department, as it is now structured, will have the tools, expertise, and vision to develop the resources to reflect the vision of Canadian society and to implement its mandate effectively and creatively, as the minister also stated to the Canadian Heritage Committee of the House of Commons.

According to Bill C-53, the new minister will be able to adapt and optimize opportunities in the context of the changes in our society and in our cultural life. For example, to obtain for Canada success in the new global economy, especially that part called the information society, the Department of Canadian Heritage will be able to involve itself in developing cultural objectives within a framework for broadcasting policy and ensure Canadian content on the information highway.

In conjunction with the Minister of Industry, the new Minister of Canadian Heritage has already launched an important public process seeking input from interested parties on a number of regulatory and policy matters relevant to the development of new technologies in the context of the information highway. Also, the new department will examine, in view of the amendments, the role of copyright on cultural property and any change to policy that may be required. The minister will also address the impact of new media roles on copyright. He has told the members in the other place that he enjoins the copyright committee of the Information Highway Council, which will make recommendations as to how copyright may be used to enhance the benefit of the information highway for all Canadians.

The new department is also working to strengthen the artistic community's access to audiences by the establishment of an alternative television service to support our performing artists. Furthermore, the minister said he intends to tap the great potential of tourism by bringing together the key areas that contribute to tourism, such as arts and culture, museums, heritage institutions, sport, historic sites and monuments, just to name a few.

In conclusion, honourable senators, Parliament itself is an integral part of our living heritage, and I therefore invite you, my fellow parliamentary colleagues, to take an active part in the debate on second reading of Bill C-53, as is our legislative duty, to offer your valuable suggestions to strengthen Canadian identity and to promote the values that Canadians of every heritage share and cherish.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Would the honourable senator entertain a question? We are all aware of your distinguished contribution to the field of multiculturalism as perhaps the first minister responsible.

I know our discussion here is on the principle of the bill. In principle, is the honourable senator satisfied that the multiculturalism programs, which I understand are administered by the Department of Canadian Heritage, will have within that structure sufficient prominence to meet, for example, the requirements of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, which is one of the acts administered by that department?

I recognize we are dealing with machinery-of-government legislation, but sometimes when we lift the cover from machinery-of-government legislation, we can identify some principles which may not be as congruent as we would like them to be.

Since the honourable senator has had ministerial experience in the field of multiculturalism, is he satisfied in principle that the multiculturalism programs and, in particular, the administration of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act will be adequately managed under this machinery-of-government legislation?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in answer to my colleague's question, I can say that I am satisfied that the federal government's multiculturalism principles which have been developed by various ministers of various administrations are intact and that the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship is not abolished or reppealed by Bill C-53. Rather the department is enhanced because it may have a secretary of state, a junior minister who will be in charge of the multicultural policy as it was developed by other ministers and brought to the point where a separate Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship was established by Parliament.

The secretary of state, both in her speech in the other place and before the House of Commons committee on heritage, stated that she hopes future multiculturalism project activities will be organized around four key objectives. I hope I have the indulgence of the chamber to state what the minister told the members of the committee.

The first key objective is to facilitate ethno-cultural community participation and integration into the fabric of Canadian society. The second objective is to help our institutions adapt their policies and programs to the reality of diversity. The third objective is to strengthen social cohesion by promoting harmonious race and inter-group relations. The fourth objective is to promote public awareness of the benefits of multiculturalism.

The minister also put on record the fact that all of these activities have a humble investment of just less than one dollar per Canadian per day. That is all it will cost to ensure that Canada's social cohesion and social peace is achieved through the principles of the federal government's policy of multiculturalism.

Senator Bosa: That should read one dollar per Canadian per year.

Senator Haidasz: I have "per day." I stand corrected.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I am grateful for that answer. Perhaps the honourable senator can clarify for me whether the promotion of Canadian citizenship, which used to lie with the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, is now the responsibility of not the Department of Canadian Heritage but, rather, the Department of Immigration and Citizenship? If one subscribes to the view that Canadian citizenship speaks to all 27 million of us, not just those who are acquiring new citizenship flowing from the immigration process, does the honourable senator think it is a wise move to segregate citizenship from Canadian heritage?

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, as the previous government had decided, and as the present government has adopted, certain aspects of the Ministry of Industry and the Ministry of Immigration and Citizenship dealing with the implementation and administrative process have been left in the hands of those respective ministeries as far as communication policy is concerned. I am sure that this administration and the previous administration have good reasons for that decision.

My personal views, as requested by the honourable senator, I must say, have had little to do with the way the legislation was prepared and adopted in the other place. This is a matter of personal choice. I was never the Minister of Immigration and Citizenship and therefore I do not know all the details. However, I have attended many citizenship ceremonies, which take up a lot of time and require a special process. These processes are left in the hands of the Minister of Immigration. The other examples, such as the other part of copyright and the technical examples, are left in the hands of the Minister of Industry. Once again, this is a personal view, and my view really does not matter.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, one may agree or disagree with that view. The honourable senator made reference to the fact that the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism is also the Secretary of State for the Status of Women.

Under this legislation, the Department of Canadian Heritage no longer has the women's program contained therein. The women's program is moved off to the Department of Human Resources, notwithstanding that the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women has these two programs for which she is responsible, and is doing an excellent job.

On the one hand, the machinery-of-government legislation has one plan or vision in mind, and, on the other hand, the structure of the ministry would seem to point to another plan. I do not quite understand the symmetry. However, honourable senators, this is getting into detail beyond principle and perhaps I can explore the matter in greater detail in committee.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, these are good questions and I hope committee members will enquire of the ministers as to the rationale and practicality of the problems that the honourable senator has just raised.

IMMIGRATION ACT
CITIZENSHIP ACT
CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Peter Bosa moved the second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it is an honour for me to introduce this important piece of legislation in the Senate. Bill C-44 proposes a number of amendments to the Immigration and Citizenship Acts. These acts, like any engine, occasionally need a tune-up and a clean-up, which is what this bill does. It cleans some of the substances out of our immigration and citizenship engines which should not be there.

For the past few months there has been a justified preoccupation in the media and by the public in general over a small criminal element which has used the system to its own end.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the actions of this handful of criminals who have skirted around the immigration system have caused us to waste precious time and have gripped public attention for far too long.

The present government, in its immigration plan tabled last November, stressed that the focus of its immigration policy was our country and the people who build it, and not the criminal element. This is the basis of the government's strategy.

Although the emphasis is on the long-term impact of our immigration and refugee strategy, we must not lose sight of today's reality. We must deal with this small minority of people whose actions tarnish the reputation of the vast majority of immigrants.

[English]

There is no denying that in the recent past there have been some serious crimes committed by persons who were in Canada either as refugees or as immigrants. However, let us not attempt to link immigration to crime. A number of statistics taken at various times show that immigrants are substantially more law-abiding than are Canadian-born citizens.

Immigrants are nation-builders. They are the people who will help us build the Canada of tomorrow. As our population ages and the birth rate continues to drop, immigrants fill this important need. It is a two-way street. Immigration fulfills a great economic need to our society; and Canada provides immigrants with a profoundly democratic and caring environment, as well as the economic opportunities they seek.

We are also closing some loopholes in the act, of which criminals have taken advantage. Quite simply, the amendments to the act with which we are dealing today will further move us toward restoring integrity to our system. They will allow us to continue to show compassion for genuine refugees and immigrants who are willing and able to accept the responsibilities of Canadian citizenship. This bill gives enforcement officials the implements they need to improve the system without hurting the innocent.

[Translation]

This legislation is an essential component of our ten-year immigration strategy. It is not the most important component, but it is one of two means at our disposal that will help the strategy produce the desired results.

[English]

Fair access and the rule of law are the two principles embodied in our strategy. A basic premise is that those who abuse our nation's hospitality and laws will not be given entry. People who come to Canada should either play by the rules or face the consequences. Our citizens and our government will not tolerate cheaters or criminals.

The main points in Bill C-44 are straightforward and to the point. I should like to think that all members in this chamber would consider them a valuable part of our continuous efforts to improve our Immigration Act. This legislation will prevent serious criminals — those deemed to be a danger to the public — from claiming refugee status as a means of delaying their removal from Canada.

Bill C-44 will place limits on the right of appeal to the Immigration and Refugee Board against deportation orders for certain serious criminals. Only the minister or his designate will be able to overcome the removal order. The bill also gives senior immigration officers the authority to terminate refugee hearings because of criminality.

Customs officers who routinely check international mail, on discovering suspicious documents will be able to refer such documentation to an immigration officer for examination. The immigration officer will have the authority to seize identity documents which are meant to be used to abuse the system.

Honourable senators, the bill ensures that persons with two or more summary convictions, whether obtained inside Canada or abroad, will be inadmissible.

[Translation]

Bill C-44 will also allow us to interrupt the citizenship process if the party concerned is the subject of an immigration inquiry.

[English]

As I mentioned earlier, this government is prone to listen before it acts. Since the bill's introduction in the other place, there have been a number of amendments. Transitional clauses have been added, some of which are designed to prevent costly and time-consuming court challenges.

Of a more substantive nature is the definition of what constitutes a serious crime. The government listened carefully to what citizens and representatives of various organizations had to say. We heard that the scope of the definition of "serious criminal" was too broad. As a result of what we heard, only those persons convicted of serious offences who are considered by the minister to be a danger to the public will lose their appeal rights. All others will retain all appeal rights, including those on humanitarian grounds, to the Immigration and Refugee Board.

We also heard the argument that, as a delaying tactic, criminals would still make appeals to the Immigration and Refugee Board on grounds of law and fact, even though there were no real grounds. As a result of what we heard, the legislation proposes to remove the right of appeal to the Immigration and Refugee Board on all grounds for those individuals who are convicted of a crime punishable with a sentence of 10 years or more. Those individuals will retain their right to seek judicial review in the Federal Court on questions of law.

Of course, humanitarian cases will be considered by the minister when a decision is made as to whether a convicted person is a danger to the public. The minister proposes that criminal convictions involving violence, weapons, sexual offences or drugs will be reviewed when determining whether a person is to be considered a danger to public safety.

Whenever changes to the Immigration Act take place, there are always those who say we have not gone far enough. On the other hand, there are those who say we have gone too far, that we have reacted too strongly as a result of the actions of a few wrongdoers. Those who take that stand are well-meaning people who are concerned that amendments to the act such as the ones being proposed might bring hardship to some poor souls who deserve understanding and compassion. Those people must understand that this government cannot sit idly by while a good system is eroded and corroded by a few. Every precaution is taken to ensure that not everyone is caught in the same net. I wish to assure honourable senators that these amendments have struck a middle course between the two extremes.

[Translation]

This is a good bill. It will help eliminate the negative image a handful of criminals have given to immigration.

[English]

Wrongdoers and criminals can expect no safe haven here. Canada welcomes true immigrants and genuine refugees. That is borne out by our history. We are reassuring the Canadian people that the government is in firm control of its borders. At the same time, we are reassuring the world that Canada's commitment to a progressive immigration and refugee policy remains unchanged.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Di Nino, debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier moved the second reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act and to make related amendments to other Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to support Bill C-47, entitled an Act to amend the Department of External Affairs Act.

At the time it was sworn in, the present government committed itself to changing the name of the Department of External Affairs to the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade. This name change reflects the changes in the department's mandate over its 85-year history.

The Department of External Affairs was established in 1909 by Prime Minister Wilfrid Laurier to look after Canada's foreign policy. Its mission has been considerably changed to keep up with Canada's increasing prominence in the world.

During the First World War, Canada played a vital role on the international stage, both through its participation in the allied forces and its membership in the Imperial war cabinet. This involvement led to changes in the young department. In the 1920s, under the guidance of Under-Secretary of State O.D. Skelton and of advisor Loring Christie, it began to become the department it is today. It was at this time as well that the Canadian Diplomatic Corps was established in order to ensure Canadian interests were well represented abroad.

Following the Second World War, and Canada's involvement in the conflict, the department grew somewhat. Canada took an active role in world events.

Canada is a founding member of the United Nations and is a member in good standing of many other international organizations, including the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the Commonwealth.

In the past few years, we have joined more organizations, such as the G-7 — the group of seven leading industrialized countries — Francophonie internationale and the Organization of American States, so as to constantly expand our influence on the international scene. The department has diligently fulfilled its mission, which is to represent, promote and defend Canada's interests and values everywhere in the world, to increase Canada's knowledge and understanding of the rest of the world and to serve Canadians at home and abroad.

Bill C-47 will amend the Department of External Affairs Act in order to change the department's official name as well as the minister's and senior officials' titles. From now on, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be the Minister of Foreign Affairs. It changes the French version of the title of the Minister for International Trade — ministre du Commerce extérieur — to ministre du Commerce international. The Minister for External Relations becomes the Minister for International Cooperation. Lastly, the titles of senior officials containing the term "under secretary" will also change to stay in line with the department's new name. Thus, the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs becomes the Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs and the three related associate under secretaries assume the title of associate deputy minister.

Under the current act, one of the persons holding one of these offices could be designated Deputy Minister for International Trade or Deputy Minister for Political Affairs.

The current act provides for the naming of a Coordinator, International Economic Relations, without a change to the title.

The bill in no way changes the department's basic structure. It merely gives it a name that is better suited to its current mandate. I recommend that the bill be passed.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Kelleher, debate adjourned.

[English]

SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING SENATE COMMITTEE— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the Inquiry of the Honourable Senator Kelly calling the attention of the Senate to the desirability of considering at this time the establishment of a Standing Committee on Security and Intelligence.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I want to have that item remain standing in my name, but I would invite other senators who wish to speak to it to do so. I will gladly yield. Nevertheless, I want the item to remain standing in my name until such time as I complete my research.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 21, 1995 at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 21, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR

CHIEF OF STAFF OF FEDERATION COUNCIL,
FEDERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE RUSSIAN FEDERATION

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed to the normal business of the Senate, I should like to take this opportunity to introduce a distinguished guest who has been accorded the honour of sitting at the Table with our Clerks, the first person of that rank from outside the Commonwealth ever to do so. He is Mr. Vladimir Nikitov, Chief of Staff of the Federation Council, the Upper House of the Federal Assembly of the Russian Federation.

Mr. Nikitov, who is the equivalent of our Clerk of the Senate, is here for several days to learn about Canada's parliamentary system of government and the administration of both the Senate and the House of Commons, as well as the Library of Parliament. His visit is part of an ongoing program which was established a few years ago, a program designed to promote exchanges between our Parliament and the Russian Federal Assembly.

[Translation]

As I said, Mr. Nikitov is Chief of Staff of the Upper House of Russia, the Federation Council. I also call your attention to the presence in our gallery of two of his colleagues, Messrs Leonid Soukhov and Anatoliy Sdizhkov.

It is indeed a pleasure and an honour to have you among us today.

[English]

I trust that you will enjoy your visit. We are delighted that you will have this opportunity to observe some of our proceedings during your time with us.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

1994 EXPORT STATISTICS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last week Senator Olson spoke about giving good news a chance, so I am sure that he and other colleagues will be delighted if I spend a few minutes talking about Canada's export performance in 1994.

According to Statistics Canada, in 1994 exports advanced 21 per cent, compared to 16 per cent in 1993. The trade balance last year was $17.1 billion, compared to $9.5 billion in 1993. I know that our friends opposite will be particularly interested in learning that 82 per cent of our exports last year were to the United States, compared to 80 per cent the year before. The comparative figures for Mexico are 4.8 per cent and 4.5 per cent, respectively. This outstanding performance would have been impossible without the free trade agreement, which went into effect at the beginning of 1989, and the North American Free Trade Agreement which took effect at the beginning of last year.

Honourable senators will recall that the Liberal Red Book — which, it is now obvious, should more properly be called the "Misread Book" — spoke of a Liberal government not only renegotiating the free trade agreements but even abrogating them. In fact, not only was the NAFTA enabling legislation proclaimed without a comma being changed but the Prime Minister is now anxiously trying to widen his circle of amigos, and even smiles approvingly when he is called "the godfather of free trade."

Surely, no conversion has been so startling since St. Paul's, and hopefully it is the result of conviction and not, as some may suspect, of political opportunism.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I do not wish to get involved in what happened to St. Paul on the road to Damascus, because there have been some other equally startling conversions. I think it is beneficial for Canada to have the Leader of the Opposition draw attention to this good news. From time to time we may argue across the aisle about who deserves the credit. That is not terribly important to me. As I mentioned the other day, I give credit where it is due. We took most of it, to which we were entitled.

I am pleased that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition has gleaned these favourable statistics from wherever he found them and has drawn some attention to them. It is an indication of what Canadians can do when they have confidence that everyone in this country, including the government, is working with them and for them.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I want to say how much I appreciate the statement the distinguished Leader of the Opposition has made this afternoon regarding buoyant good news from the trade front. It is good that most Canadians are part of the building team rather than members of the wrecking crew. Everyone knows that psychology plays an important role in determining our degree of economic success. The more we spread the good news the better.

I suppose that, in a sense, there has been an "agonizing reappraisal of our policies." I believe it was John Foster Dulles who first used that expression.

We should attempt to spread the good news. Some people have erected clocks in various parts of Canada indicating the increase in the national debt every second. I wish we had a few "asset clocks" in the country measuring the improving conditions and the resources and productivity of our people. That would be an encouraging thing to see. While we should be reminded of the debt, we should also be reminded of the inherent assets of our country. I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his statement.

JUSTICE

FIREARMS REGISTRATION BILL—
AVAILABILITY OF COPIES TO SENATORS

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, on Thursday last I asked the Honourable Leader of the Government whether we could get copies of the gun control legislation which is of great interest in the Province of Alberta. I merely wish to thank publicly the honourable leader for responding quickly, and immediately providing me with 10 copies of the legislation, which I have now sent to Alberta.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, February 22, 1995 at 1:30 in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PICTOU LANDING INDIAN BAND AGREEMENT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-60, respecting an agreement between Her Majesty in right of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian Band.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, February 23, 1995.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET
DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Joan Neiman, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), moved:

> That the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, February 21, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

IMPROVEMENT IN INTERNATIONAL GRAIN MARKET—
REQUEST FOR ANALYSIS OF SITUATION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the international grain situation. There have been some satisfactory improvements in the situation respecting the international grain market that have recently resulted in the initial price for durum wheat rising by $25 a tonne, and that of the regular bread wheat by about $20 a tonne.

Senator Berntson: Is this a preamble?

Senator Olson: It is a bit of a preamble, yes. I am asking this question because there have been some disturbing predictions that this improvement in the international grain market is not expected to last very long.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to obtain an analysis of this situation from the Minister of Agriculture, who is the minister responsible to Parliament for the Canadian Wheat Board, and also the Minister of International Trade? It may well be that the tidings will be favourable because, from all appearances, the current situation in the international grain market seems set to continue for several months to come.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. I would be delighted to ask my colleagues to prepare such a report.

THE BUDGET

TAX INCREASES FOR WEALTHY CANADIANS—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the upcoming budget.

The Minister of Finance has stated that the increased taxes in the upcoming budget will tax only wealthy Canadians. I should like to ask: What is the government's definition of a "wealthy" Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I appreciate the honourable senator's question. At this point in time, I would encourage him to wait until the budget is presented to see exactly what measures are contained therein.

Senator Tkachuk: I am not asking what the measures are in the budget. I am asking a question as to what basis in fact they are using to arrive at the budget. It was the government — not the opposition, nor members of the public — which said that it would tax only wealthy Canadians. The Leader of the Government in the Senate participates in discussions of that nature, and I am sure participates in budget discussions in cabinet.

I will rephrase my first question: What is the personal definition of the Leader of the Government in the Senate of a "wealthy" Canadian, and what income group does she, personally, feel is not paying their fair share of taxes?

Senator Fairbairn: I appreciate the honourable senator's question. However, as honourable senators know, these are all hypothetical questions until the budget is produced by the Minister of Finance. At that time, hopefully, all will become clear.

Senator Tkachuk: My definition of a "wealthy" Canadian is someone who makes over $200,000 a year. However, that is a Tory definition. A Liberal definition is that anyone who makes over $20,000 a year is a wealthy Canadian, and that is how I think they will tax.

If the minister is participating in such ongoing discussions, surely she must have an opinion on who should be taxed. We are not the ones who are saying that people are not paying their fair share; that people are using tax loopholes. It is the government which is saying all of these things.

Personally, how does the Leader of the Government in the Senate perceive this situation on behalf of Canadians? Who in Canada is not paying their fair share of taxes? If everyone is, indeed, paying their fair share, I assume there will be no need for tax increases in the budget.

Senator Fairbairn: My honourable friend will know that I am not, nor do I wish to be, the Minister of Finance. All Canadians know, through our public consultations and our program review, that over the past several months and days the Minister of Finance has made it clear that his preferred method of approach for this budget is to cut expenditures and to deal fairly, and in a balanced way, with all regions of Canada and with the Canadian people. That is what the budget will reflect, including moving us further — and most optimistically — down the line towards the goal of 3 per cent of the GDP reduction in the deficit in three years as a strong —

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In two years, now.

Senator Fairbairn: A total of three years, my honourable friend. We are well on our way to the total objective of the government, which is a balanced budget.

THE ECONOMY

TARGET FOR REDUCTION OF DEFICIT— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question relates to the 3 per cent of GDP mentioned by the Leader of the Government in the Senate as the target for the deficit. In spite of the fact that foreign investors, those who are investing in that portion of our debt, have clearly indicated that 3 per cent is not acceptable as a level of deficit for this country, is the honourable leader stating, as a member of cabinet, that this particular figure has not been reconsidered in light of what has taken place and the statements that have been made just this past week by one of the credit-rating organizations?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend will know that one of the greatest attributes of this country at this point in time is the stability of its economy. The indications throughout our economy, including my honourable friend's intervention today on the side of trade, is that we have never had as strong a trade performance as we have experienced in the past year. Well over 450,000 new jobs have been created in this country in the past year and several months, since this government came into power. These are mainly full-time jobs. Business and consumer confidence is higher than it has been in years.

We have an inflation rate that is lower than that of any other members of the G-7. In fact, we are the country that both the IMF and the G-7 say will have the strongest performance, the lowest inflation, the strongest growth, of any of our industrial competitors. Those are the fundamentals of the Canadian economy that are strong. They are stable. They are consistent.

There is something else I should like to say to my honourable friend. The Minister of Finance is aware of what Moody's has to say, but the Minister of Finance has a larger responsibility, and that is to the people of Canada. He will respond to the people of Canada in a fair and balanced way that will bring the trends of our deficit consistently down. The message to foreign investors will be that Canada's deficit is being steadily reduced, just as we said it would. Our goal is to make that deficit disappear, and to replace it with a balanced budget. That is the trend that the world will see, supported and elucidated in this budget. It is a budget for Canadians, and it will send a strong message beyond our borders.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, there is no question that the fundamentals and the direction in those trends were set by the previous government, as was so deftly pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition. The direction was not set by the administration which is now in place. The honourable senator from British Columbia just said, "Be patient." How can we remain patient when this government has been in office for 16 months and has done nothing?

I ask the Leader of the Government, why is the government not heeding the warnings of the likes of Moody's? Although she may say it is a budget for Canadians — and I agree that it should be for Canadians and for no one else — the fact is that our debt and deficit are now influenced by foreign investment. I ask again, why is serious consideration not being given to these warnings? Given the low rate of inflation, the trade we have in this country is not as a result of any Liberal initiative; rather it is the result of initiatives taken by the previous government.

Honourable senators, why is the Leader of the Government in the Senate, a cabinet minister, not pushing more aggressively? It would be in the interests of Canadians to reduce the deficit by more than 3 per cent of GDP. Why is the leader not taking a stronger stand in cabinet? Logically, the leader should be speaking out in cabinet as the voice of the Senate and as a senator representing all of Canada.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I can assure you that, with regard to this government's deficit reduction program and its targets, I have strongly supported the efforts of the Minister of Finance to show the world that we are meeting our targets for this year. We met our targets for last year. We will meet our targets for next year.

If we want to get into a discussion on the deficit and the debt and why foreign investors are so jittery and nervous, we could look back a few years to the projections the ministers of finance of the former government put forward, which were then missed by more than a country mile. This government is meeting its targets, and we will continue to meet those targets.

MARKET FACTORS AFFECTING FOREIGN INVESTORS— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. You have stated your points. Why are foreign investors more concerned with your Finance minister this year than last year? This year, they are concerned. What is going on?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is something happening this year which may well cause a more subdued and anxious mood among our foreign investors and friends of Canada from countries abroad. This year we have the added distraction of the proposed referendum in the province of Quebec. There is no question that the volatility in the markets is for a variety of reasons. One reason is the deficit and the debt situation, and another reason is the volatility in the American money markets.

However, as a result of events within our own country, we are also putting forward an image which causes concern to others. That is why every member of this house — unfortunately the same is not true of the official opposition of the other house — has a fundamental concern for the unity and strength of a united Canada. That is one of the reasons that there is concern abroad; concern that perhaps was not there last year or the year before that. It is certainly there in 1995.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Honourable senators, I fully agree with you that Canadian unity would considerably improve opinions abroad regarding our commitments. Could you tell us whether your Minister of Finance has directly or indirectly contacted these foreign evaluators to find out why they have placed us under review?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am sure my honourable friend would expect the Minister of Finance to be well aware of all of the details and the pushes and pulls within the international money markets. The minister has a message which he is sending forward. He is doing perhaps the most responsible thing that a Minister of Finance of Canada can do: He is levelling with the Canadian people; he is levelling with the international community. He is saying that this is what we will do, that these are our goals and we will not be pulled from them, that we will meet those goals and move our deficit and our debt ever downward in the years ahead.

We must be courageous in this budget, and we must also be conscious of the people in this country who are in distress, and who must be supported. However, we will meet our targets.

THE BUDGET

REQUEST FOR DATE OF PRESENTATION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate this question: Has a date been set for the budget?

An Hon. Senator: Yes, but we do not know it yet.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the date for the budget is for my colleague the Minister of Finance to announce. He was contemplating making that announcement today, and I certainly would wait for him to do so.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is he waiting to consult President Clinton when he comes to town this week, as he did last year?

Senator Perrault: The President wants some advice from him.

Senator Murray: Will the budget be presented during the month of February? Is the answer to that question "Yes"?

STATE OF THE ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, I had no intention of participating in this discussion. However, after hearing the words of the Honourable Leader of the Government, I must say that I see a different Canada than the rosy picture she has painted today, with all of the forthcoming applause by her colleagues. I see a Canada today where interest rates are rising, probably by as much as one-half of 1 per cent today. I see a Canada today where the dollar has not been so low for many years. I see a Canada today where the middle class are being squeezed, where the infrastructures are falling apart, where the average family is facing more and more costs for day care, health care, care of any nature or kind to which they were previously entitled.

I do not have the same optimism as the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. I do not think the average Canadian taxpayer can be that optimistic while facing pressure from every side and every corner. It is fair enough for the honourable leader to stand up and say how wonderful are our trade balances and our exports — all of which, I might add, are due to the courage and determination of the past government — but I want to know who is speaking for the middle class of Canada today? Who is standing up and talking about the increased tax loads and increased costs they are facing?

I say that this government will not have the courage to stand up on budget day and do the things which are required to bring our economy back to where it should be. Three per cent of GDP is not even scratching the surface of the overhaul that this country needs.

I am looking forward to this budget. I will challenge this government when the time comes for the lack of courage that I am predicting on their part. They will try to wash away the problems with rhetoric, such as we have heard today, leaving nothing for the middle class and leaving again the same ongoing situation that Liberals have left from time immemorial; trying to spend, spend, spend their way out of the deficit with programs that will not help anyone.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I welcome my honourable friend's question, spoken as a true Alberta Tory. I can understand why he has a touch of pessimism when he looks at some of the effects of recent provincial budget cuts on Canadians in the province of Alberta. I assure my honourable friend that it is an extra load for an Albertan to be optimistic at this point in time, given what we have been going through for the last year.

However, I shall not use rhetoric today in answer to my honourable friend. Rather, I am using facts about where the fundamentals of the economy of Canada are today. There is strength. I am not saying that the situation is perfect; obviously it is not. That is why there will be a tough budget.

However, I do challenge the statement of my friend when he says that bringing our deficit down to 3 per cent of GDP is worth nothing. On the contrary, it will be worth a great deal. First, we will get our fiscal house in order to the point where we can support and protect the people in Canada about whom he is so concerned. They have a vested interest in the fairness and the balance of this budget. That is what the Minister of Finance will be doing.

Honourable senators, I believe my honourable friend should keep an open mind until the budget comes forward.

THE ECONOMY

PARTISAN NATURE OF THE OPPOSITION IN THE SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Will the Leader of the Government agree with me that the Canadian people rendered rather devastating judgment on the economic policies of our friends on the opposite benches just a few months ago?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You adopted them all.

Senator Perrault: They are the only party in the last century which is able to hold their national convention in a phone booth.

My question is this: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain to some of us, who fail to understand why there are so many partisan, negative statements being made by the honourable senators on the other side, why so few of them want to give good news a chance?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot delve into the hearts, minds and souls of my friends opposite. I do know that Senator Ghitter is normally a fair, reasoned and cheerful sort of guy.

Senator Ghitter: I take back everything I said.

Senator Fairbairn: I am sorry that he is in a pessimistic mood, but I do know that his mood will be strengthened by the budget when it comes. He will know that this country is on track, and that the government is conscious of the well-being of all Canadians.

POSSIBILITY OF ACCELERATED DEFICIT REDUCTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate: She has painted a glowing picture of a strong economy in Canada. God bless her; I hope she is right. I hope she is vindicated when the final figures come out.

Given that we have this strong economy, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate not of the opinion that if we are producing optimally at this time, honourable senators, and if we cannot address our deficit in the way that investors investing in our debt want us to, what will we do when we find ourselves in a downturn? If we cannot deal with the issue effectively now and respond in excess of 3 per cent of GDP, when will we ever be able to do so?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): God bless you for your confidence, too, Senator St. Germain.

I will only repeat, honourable senators, what I have been saying this afternoon. I know that upsets Senator Doody, because he thinks this is the answer period. There are two issues at play here. Of course we are aware of what the money markets are saying to us. The honourable senator reads the same newspapers as I do, as does the Minister of Finance. We know what Moody's is saying. We know there is a concern about Canada's position.

One of the most fundamental ways of sending a message abroad is to tell those people that we are confident in the strength of our country, and that we are determined to move in the direction of the goals we have set. We have said publicly — and repeatedly — that we will meet those goals. Those goals are in the best interests of the people of Canada because they are balanced goals. After the budget, those messages will get through to the money markets.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL—INVITATION TO MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE TO RESPOND TO SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. In June of 1994, that committee tabled a report on the mandate and funding of Radio Canada International.

On February 7, 1995, the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy made two excellent recommendations, among many others. The first recommendation was that the government continue to give strong support to the promotion of Canadian studies in universities in approximately 35 countries which, in the past, have conspicuously depended on the information emanating from Radio Canada International. The second response took note of the importance of the programs on RCI, and urged that every effort be made to exploit its potential.

Honourable senators, the government is to be commended on its reaction to these recommendations, which is most encouraging news for the chairman and members of this Senate committee, and particularly for Senator Ray Perrault, who initiated the inquiry.

My question is this: When does the committee intend to invite the Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Trade to respond to that committee's report?

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the honourable senator for his question.

The committee has done several things to follow up on its report. For instance, on September 27 last, I wrote a letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, the Honourable André Ouellet, reminding him of the committee's recommendations and telling him that we wanted to meet with him in February of 1995 or earlier, if it was convenient for the minister.

On December 8, the minister wrote to me and replied that our report was under very active consideration. The minister told me that he has had discussions with Mr. Manera, chief of the CBC. As well, there have been meetings with the deputy minister and other officials. As recently as last week, we were in touch with the minister's office again. The matter is still under study. We are asking that they consider ways of overcoming the problem of gross underfunding of this important part of Canadian life.

We hope, honourable senators, that the minister will come before us sometime in March, and be in a position at that time to answer our direct questions on the underfunding of this important agency.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I ask leave to make a brief comment with respect to the Radio Canada International statement, if I may, since my name was mentioned in the course of the discussion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator MacDonald for his statement today. As well, I thank Senator Oliver for the effective work he has been doing as chairman of the committee.

I am in agreement, as are many senators on both sides of this house, with the statement that Radio Canada International is underfunded, and that it could become a very effective supporter of many of our efforts in economics, trade and culture abroad. I support the idea of having a meeting as soon as possible with the minister to discuss with him the contents of the recent joint committee report on foreign affairs.

There is a good degree of unanimity on both sides of the house. I think we should move now into meetings to see if we cannot implement some of those recommendations.

REQUEST FOR DATE OF PRESENTATION— GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, in response to an earlier question from Senator Murray, I can say now with conviction and clarity that the budget will be tabled in Parliament on Monday, February 27, at 4:30 p.m.

• (1450)

REQUEST FOR FORMAL DEBATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in view of the information that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has just given us as to the date of the budget, will the Deputy Leader undertake to have a Notice of Inquiry placed on the Order Paper, drawing the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the budget? Will he arrange to have one of the supporters of the government open debate on such an inquiry so that we will have an organized forum for discussing the budget policy and all of its provisions?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): It is open to any honourable senator to initiate an inquiry. However, I will be happy to discuss the matter with the leadership on this side and take whatever appropriate action is necessary.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 27, 1994, by the Honourable Richard J. Doyle regarding Metropolitan Toronto and concerning proposals for social reform, lack of representation on working group and national forum on health, lack of representation of region.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO

PROPOSALS FOR SOCIAL REFORM— LACK OF REPRESENTATION ON WORKING GROUP— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Responses to questions raised by Hon. Richard J. Doyle on October 27, 1994)

The role of members of the Working Group on Seasonal Work and UI is not to represent a region or a city, but rather to look for practical solutions to address the particular concerns of workers and employers in seasonal industries while still achieving the objectives of UI reform.

The five members of the Group were appointed solely on the basis of expertise, not on the basis of regional or local representation. They represent the interests of both seasonal and non-seasonal workers and employers. This being said, the members of the Group do provide some regional balance. The five members come from: Ontario, Quebec, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and British Columbia.

As of this date, the Working Group met with or received input from almost one thousand individuals from coast to coast to gain a better understanding of their concerns, including three days of hearings in the Toronto area in early December. While in the Toronto area, the Working Group met with organizations such as:

- the Business Coalition on UI Reform,
- the Canadian Tourism Human Resource Council,
- the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers Association, and
- the Provincial Building and Construction Trades Council of Ontario, to discuss their concerns about seasonal work in this part of the country and elsewhere in Canada.

The Group has reported some of its preliminary findings to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development. These findings were considered by the Committee as it prepared its recent report on social security reform.

On a final note, and in response to the very legitimate concerns of the Honourable Senator, over 29,000 jobs have been created over the past year in the immediate Toronto area, almost all of them fulltime.

NATIONAL FORUM ON HEALTH—LACK OF REPRESENTATION OF REGION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Several weeks ago my colleague, Senator Richard Doyle, asked about representation on the National Forum on Health — specifically why there is no representative of Toronto given its many health care facilities and three million residents.

In addition to the Prime Minister who is the chair, and the Minister of Health who is the vice chair, there are 22 members of the National Forum on Health.

In selecting members, the Government did not attempt to ensure that every region, every major city, or every particular health interest would be represented.

Each one of the twenty-two members has been appointed because she or he brings expertise and a unique perspective to the work of the Forum. As a group, the Forum members comprise a cross-section of the Canadian population and the diversity of views on how we can maintain and improve the health of Canadians.

In his remarks to Forum members at its inaugural meeting on October 20th, the Prime Minister stated that what the Forum is all about is "contributing to the development of a new vision for health for the 21st century."

We are confident that the 22 Forum members will effectively promote a dialogue with Canadians about their health system, set priorities for the future, and help Canadians develop a consensus on necessary changes. These are the tasks the Prime Minister has asked the Forum to undertake.

Forum members will not do this work on their own. There will be many opportunities for Canadians who are not members of the Forum to participate in its processes.

The Forum met in November and will meet again early in the New Year to identify its thematic priorities and to establish processes for its work. Conferences, town hall meetings, regional meetings, consultations on specific issues, electronic communications et cetera, are just some of the instruments the Forum will use to conduct a dialogue with and among Canadians. Canadians — both laypersons and professionals — from all parts of the country will have many opportunities and modes through which to participate.

Not surprisingly, some groups would like to have been represented on the Forum. But Forum members have been appointed to represent their own personal insights and views on how we can improve Canada's health system. They do not represent stakeholders, particular communities or professions.

It is possible that some further appointments may be made to the Forum, but if so, they would be very few in number.

The Forum, with its current roster of members can and will make a substantial contribution to the current debate about the future of our health system. They will do this in consultation and collaboration with Canadians. We encourage all Canadians to participate in this important process and the means will be provided for such involvement.

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Gauthier, for the second reading of Bill C-53, to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other Acts.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks with reference to Bill C-53. Recognizing that this legisaltion is a piece of machinery of government, it is best to get into the detail of such matters in committee. We look forward to that detailed study, understanding that perhaps the bill will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

However, we would be somewhat remiss if at this stage of debate on principle we did not point out what might appear to some as a flaw in a bill that is establishing a ministry as multi-faceted as the Department of Canadian Heritage.

The first flaw is the apparent lack of a provision requiring the minister to table in Parliament on an annual basis a report of the activities of that ministry so that Parliament can provide oversight and scrutiny to the activities that will be undertaken by that ministry. We should explore and understand better the rationale or the policy that underlays the absence of such a provision.

In terms of the substance, honourable senators, and again recognizing that this is machinery legislation, the bill, perhaps, does speak to a matter of some concern to a great many Canadians — certainly this Canadian. Many administrations have devoted a great deal of time and effort to promoting the activities of Canadian diversity. Indeed, we have in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms a clear constitutional value that multiculturalism or our diversity is a fundamental characteristic of Canadian society.

We must understand that Prime Minister Chrétien's plan, which in part was brought forward by the previous government, significantly modifies Prime Minister Campbell's vision of the ministry in one major respect. The major difference is that this plan leaves out of the responsibilities of the Minister of Canadian Heritage the promotion of Canadian citizenship.

Honourable senators, if the citizenship shared by all 27 million of us is not fundamental to our Canadian heritage, then what is? One ought to avoid exaggeration. However, I worry, quite frankly, that the right-wing agenda has seeped through into the benches of our friends opposite in an unfortunate way. Fortunately we do not search in vain. One can discover a number yet in the opposite benches who represent the liberalism that in the past was so supportive of multiculturalism and the promotion of our Canadian citizenship.

I should like to illustrate what I am speaking of here by drawing to honourable senators' attention the government's telephone directory. I do not have the research team I would need to analyse what is envisaged by the new Department of Canadian Heritage, so I went to the telephone directory. I wanted to determine the importance which the government is giving to multiculturalism and diversity as a result of removing the old Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, which was a discreet ministry devoted to the promotion of this fundamental characteristic of Canadian society — multiculturalism — and to which my honourable friend Senator Haidasz eloquently spoke at second reading last Thursday. As honourable senators know, the Honourable Senator Haidasz was the first minister of state responsible for multiculturalism.

Honourable senators, there are 39 columns in the telephone directory of the Government of Canada outlining the various divisions of the new Department of Canadian Heritage, of which two columns focus on multiculturalism. It seems to me that this speaks to the importance, or the lack of importance, that this government is placing on multiculturalism. Honourable senators will want to get to the bottom of this matter. We will want to be assured that the Canadian Multiculturalism Act of the Parliament of Canada — we have not repealed that act — will have the necessary infrastructure in place. The Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women is responsible for the administration of that act, and it is important that he or she have a sufficient infrastructure to be able to meet the objectives of that act of Parliament.

The second point I wish to underscore, honourable senators, is that 80 per cent of this new Department of Canadian Heritage involves Parks Canada — 80 per cent about parks and natural resources and a small percentage about human rights, citizenship and diversity. It is as if, in principle, there is a shift away from people to trees.

I do not understand the rationale for removing from the Department of Canadian Heritage the responsibility for citizenship, which was the vision of Prime Minister Campbell's government and ministry, and putting it with the Department of Immigration. The danger in that is that today in the Government of Canada we have a focus on Canadian citizenship which speaks to, as I said, the 27 million of us, focusing only on new Canadians or immigrants who seek to be integrated and to acquire Canadian citizenship. There is a fundamental shift here from what we had in the former Department of Canadian Heritage under Prime Minister Mulroney's government. Under that government, we had a free-standing ministry of multiculturalism and citizenship.

Therefore, honourable senators, we will want to examine this bill carefully in committee, and to hear from witnesses who will focus on this apparent shift from, as I see it, 80 per cent of the Department of Canadian Heritage not being about people. If the data from the 39 relevant columns of the telephone directory are any indication, only two of those relate to real people issues of our diversity and citizenship.

This change is occurring at a time when all of us are concerned about racism and the need to combat racism. All of us recognize that the richness of Canada in many ways is its diversity; that our heritage languages are the trading languages; that globalization impacts on us on every street corner of every city in the country, and in every village in all of the provinces. All that, and less than an inch of telephone numbers in this new department relates to the struggle to combat and to eradicate racism in all its forms.

This is not a bill that is purely machinery-of-government legislation which was, perhaps, what we thought it might be at first blush. Rather, this bill raises some fundamental questions of a shift away from people and our values. It is something we will want to examine.

With those remarks, honourable senators, we on this side at least will be looking forward to an examination of the bill in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

EIGHTEENTH REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eighteenth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Internet), presented in the Senate on February 16, 1995.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, the Internet is not a new phenomenon, even if it has only recently come to the notice of the general public. Government and business are now following the lead of the scientific and academic communities with respect to this means of communication which those communities have been using for more than a decade.

Parliament now has before it a proposal to join Internet. Your committee has completed the cost-benefit analysis and has come to the conclusion that for the relative sum of $600 per month, which would be our share of the parliamentary line, the Senate would be able to participate in this parliamentary initiative. For this fixed price, the Senate would be able to send e-mail worldwide. Furthermore, pricing costs could be reduced as more and more people have access to our parliamentary documents on line. Potentially, all senators and authorized staff could have access to Internet.

In summary, Internet is just another way for Parliament and for the Senate to communicate with its constituency. That is the purpose of the report of the committee. It is to recommend to honourable senators that we enter into this agreement with the House of Commons and share the parliamentary line.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SEVENTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roux, for the adoption of the Seventeenth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Parliamentary Associations), presented in the Senate on February 14, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Di Nino).

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, in my absence — one of the very few from this chamber — this particular item was adjourned in my name. I must presume that someone felt that I had great knowledge and wisdom to impart on this issue to my colleagues.

The issue deals with parliamentary associations, an area with which I am not so very familiar. However, that issue was widely discussed at a meeting of the Internal Economy Committee. The only thing I have to add to what my colleague Senator Hastings has reported is that, having dealt with this particular matter over the last two or three months, in concert with Senator Hastings, we feel that it would be at least as beneficial to the Senate as the relationship had been prior to the establishment of this new council. We hope that honourable senators in this chamber will agree with us, and that they will give the matter their support, on the understanding that the council will continue to deliberate on behalf of this chamber with the members appointed to the council by the House of Commons.

I suggest that we adopt the report tabled by Senator Hastings one or two days ago.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have a word to say concerning this report, which I support. I do not have the report before me. As I recollect from my reading of it, it stated that two members of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration of the Senate should act on behalf of the Senate with respect to the management of parliamentary associations.

It occurred to me that, inasmuch as these parliamentary associations have most to do with international affairs, it would be reasonable to have one member of that council from the Senate drawn from the Internal Economy Committee and the other drawn from the Foreign Affairs Committee. In that way, our delegation would reflect the international context in which these parliamentary associations operate.

I know that there are certain members of the Internal Economy Committee, including the chairman, who have a vivid interest in international affairs. It appears to me that we would address our needs more directly by having a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee on the council. Thus, I will at least test the possibility of moving an amendment to bring that about. Unless someone has a violent objection, and because I am not violently in favour, I would not take on anyone who violently objects to it.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senators, personally, I do not object to the suggestion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen. If he wishes to propose an amendment, at least from my standpoint as vice-chairman of the committee, I would find it more palatable as long as the two representatives were from each side of the chamber.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I rise simply to answer the question posed by my distinguished colleague Senator MacEachen.

• (1510)

We chose the chairman and deputy chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration in observance of a suggestion by the Auditor General, who wanted to make the council responsible to the Senate. He said that the way to make it responsible to the Senate was through the Internal Economy Committee. The logical members would always be the chairman and deputy chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, who would make their representations to both parties in the Senate.

I would reject the amendment.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I do not think there is an amendment before us, but I wish to speak to the main motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: There is not an amendment before us.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I do not wish to take issue with the gist of the report. However, there may be omissions in the general thrust of the report.

Senator Hastings has mentioned that the report flows from the leadership of the Speaker in the House of Commons and the former Speaker of the Senate, who is now our Governor General. I do not wish to take away the credit which is due them, but matters have to be put into context. This thing did not just happen out of a clear blue sky over the course of the summer months and last fall. The matter which this proposal attempts to address has been with us for many years. I find it strange that people lose their memory around here.

When Madam Jeanne Sauvé was Speaker of the House of Commons, from time to time she would hold general meetings of the presidents of the inter-parliamentary associations, and to those meetings she would invite the leadership of the Senate.

Policy matters respecting the general governance of the inter-parliamentary associations were put on the table, debated, and many times resolved. We should not leave the impression that up to this point in time things did not happen, had not happened, and that somehow both houses were forever in confrontational positions.

As well, after Madam Sauvé, initiatives were taken by other speakers of the House of Commons. I know this because I was an active member of at least one parliamentary association and I was given the opportunity to sit in on these meetings. They were meetings held at the highest level, if I may use the expression. They generally proved successful.

When Senator Charbonneau took the speakership of the Senate, Senator Tom Lefebvre and I asked to meet with him with respect to the general administration of the inter-parliamentary association. He received us in his office. Senator Charbonneau was also Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration in those days. A program was set afoot to allow personnel of the Senate to be seconded to the administration of the inter-parliamentary association, or whatever that shop is called. That was a good step forward.

Another matter that happened over the years in the course of the examination of the Senate budget was that we were able to extract from that inter-parliamentary administration shop the travel of members. As has been said by Senator Hastings, the House of Commons pays 70 per cent of the expenses, while the Senate pays 30 per cent. That shop in particular, because it was under the control of the Speaker of the House of Commons, or the House of Commons, would never want to put on the table their activities of past years. We could not learn who travelled where and how often, and so on and so forth.

People like Senator Tom Lefebvre and I and others — I hope they will forgive me for not mentioning their names, but there were a number of us — said, "Unless you tell us what has been done with the money, you will not get any more money." They coughed, we got the information, and the budgets were approved.

I personally intervened in private on a number of occasions with the Chair. Indeed, I intervened frequently when I was a member of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, requesting reform of the administration of that shop. I was known as the great complainer in those matters. However, over the years, that has produced results.

There has been an accretion of initiatives to the point where all of a sudden Speaker Parent and Speaker LeBlanc are being put on the altar and lauded as the ones who made it all possible. It may well be that circumstances came together and gelled to make it possible, but a heck of a lot of groundwork was done in the intervening years in back rooms, smoking rooms, caucuses and in the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to bring this about. It took a number of years before we even reached this point.

I will support this budget. However, as I pointed out in letters to Senator Hastings and others last summer, I think we could have gone further. The Senate could have taken more responsibility upon itself and formed its own parliamentary exchange associations with other jurisdictions in matters which are of special interest to the Senate, rather than being lumped jointly with the activities of the commoners, who do not share the same preoccupations or the same degree of interest in matters that preoccupy us. I think that ought to be the next step.

• (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Hastings speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I wish to thank those who have participated in the debate.

In response to Senator Corbin, in fairness I did not say that this agreement had its beginnings with the cooperation that came about between the two speakers. I said that it probably had its beginnings in 1992 with the report of the Auditor General, who drew attention to the divisions at that time, and recommended certain procedures to alleviate those divisions.

In fairness, I did say that the report resulted from a great deal of work by a lot of people. The two speakers did contribute to the report in that they encouraged us and inspired us to cooperate, and get on with the business of the report.

In response to the question raised by Senator Murray, I am pleased to advise that at a meeting of the negotiators for both sides on February 7, it was agreed that research would be part of the application which each association would bring to the committee for approval. As I indicated at that time, that has been accepted by the two negotiators, and presumably we will accept it at the first meeting of the council.

I thank honourable senators for their kind words and participation, especially those of the deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Di Nino.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roux, that this report be adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA COUNCIL

CONSULTATIONS ON THE FUTURE—INQUIRY DEBATED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Roux, calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that Mr. Roch Carrier, Director of the Canada Council, and Ms Donna Scott, Chair of its Board of Directors, are completing a cross-Canada tour undertaken to consult with > Canada's arts community on the Council's future, given that additional cuts planned for the coming fiscal year may seriously compromise the Council's original mission. — (Honourable Senator Berntson).

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I just want to comment briefly on Senator Roux's presentation to which I listened and which I read very attentively, being aware of his great knowledge of the arts community. However, I have a few comments on certain aspects of his presentation which struck me upon reading the text, and I would like to quote the following:

> Also — and this is even more serious — the subsidies of private companies impose a form of self-censorship on the artist. The private sector, by its sponsorship, generous though it is, serves to determine the content of the art.

As far as I am concerned — and I am sure I am not alone in this house in having had the experience — I was very active both as a fundraiser and a donor when I was in the private sector, and there were never any strings attached to such funds.

I know of no private company that imposes a form of self-censorship on an artist or a group of artists, nor of any artist or group that has had that experience. I hope that when Senator Roux concludes the debate on his inquiry, he will clarify his comments and perhaps make some adjustments, because if his comments stand, they reflect unfairly on those who have helped many Canadian artists pursue their careers without qualifying their support.

I hope that when it is his turn to reply or add to what he has already said, he will be able to clarify his comments which, to me, are most unfair.

Hon. Jean-Louis Roux: Honourable senators, may I respond to what Senator Lynch-Staunton has said? Honourable senators, self-censorship is not imposed. That is what is so insidious about it. You are absolutely right: No private company has ever imposed self-censorship. Self-censorship imposes itself. For instance, a theatre group is not going to perform Capitaine Schelle, Capitaine Eçço by Rezvani if the group gets funding from Imperial Oil.

Similarly, a dance group may refrain from programming an overly explicit choreography of Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune if the Royal Bank's name and logo appear on the theatre marquee. That was the point I was trying to make. Obviously, no private company would attach any strings to its donations to culture and the arts. They do not have to. Self-censorship kicks in automatically.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, once again, this issue may not interest everyone, but I do not think this example in any way contradicts what he said. Senator Roux made it clear that subsidies from a private company impose an insidious form of self-censorship on the artist. The implication is that any group or individual receiving a donation from the private sector must immediately make sure, when selecting their programs, that the donor will not be offended. I must admit I do not know of any that would react in this way.

When I was working for a company, a distillery, and we gave money to theatre groups, we did not enquire or make sure that they not perform a play in which people were drunk on the stage. I do not think a theatre group would argue that since the company gave us the money, we have to be careful about the kind of plays we perform. I think you are exaggerating, to say the least.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

MOTION TO PRINT VOLUME I OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, pursuant to notice of February 16, 1995, moved:

> That the Senate order the printing, in its original format, of 500 copies of Volume I of the Report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy entitled "Canada's Foreign Policy: Principles and Priorities for the Future"; and
> That an amount not exceeding $7,500 be allocated for that purpose.

He said: Honourable senators, regarding the background of this motion, you will recall the report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's Foreign Policy, which was tabled in the Senate at the end of October or early November.

The co-chairs of the committee, following advice, decided to print the report in the form of three volumes. The first volume was entitled, "Canada's Foreign Policy: Priorities and Principles for the Future" and it constituted the main report of the committee. Under the rules, that volume constituted the committee report. The second volume was made up of dissenting opinions.

The third volume was devoted to four position papers which had been commissioned by the committee, including a paper on each of trade, finance, culture, security and international development.

• (1530)

In the House of Commons, the Bloc raised a point of order against the form of the report, arguing that the dissenting opinions ought to be included as part of the main report. Presumably this is because it would give the dissenting opinions a momentum which they would not have on their own, since insofar as the Bloc was concerned, the dissenting opinion was a stand-alone report which could be regarded as an outline of the foreign policy of an independent Quebec. Presumably it was their intention to have that foreign policy statement integrated within the foreign policy statement for Canada. I can only suggest and speculate upon that objective because, from a reader's point of view, it would be more convenient to read these reports in separate volumes.

That is what the co-chairs had in mind. The Speaker of the House of Commons made a ruling to the effect that, in the future, if a reprinting was required, the dissenting opinion should somehow appear within the main report, right after the signatures of the co-chairs. It was at that stage that a point of order was raised in the Senate by myself, arguing that, inasmuch as this was a joint report of two houses of Parliament, it was beyond the competence of the House of Commons to decide unilaterally on the configuration of the report.

In any event, the Speaker of the Senate ruled last week. I interpreted his ruling, at least from my point of view, to provide a remedy for the present unsatisfactory situation. The 5,000 copies originally printed have all been distributed. Those who come now asking for a copy of the report cannot obtain one. It seems to me that it would be desirable to make available additional copies.

Based upon the Speaker's ruling, I gave notice of this motion, receiving encouragement from the ruling of the Speaker and also from other members of the Senate. For example, Senator Kelly came to me after I made my statement following the Speaker's ruling and said, "Why not put a motion down and order the reprinting of the report?" That is what I have done.

This motion asks the Senate to order the reprinting of 500 copies of the main report, and stipulates that not more than $7,500 be allocated for the reprinting. Presumably it is an instruction, in a sense, to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to allocate their funds as available for this purpose.

Out of my respect for the autonomy of the particular role of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I have given the chairman of that committee advance warning that I intended to move this motion. I have also consulted with Senator Kelleher, who, as honourable senators may know, was the lead member of the opposition on the Special Joint Committee. My consultations with him have elicited his strong support for this motion.

I recommend this motion to honourable senators on the grounds that the report is still in demand. Even if the demand were less than it was, it is important that this document be made available for some time in the future. An additional argument, of course, is that the government recently responded in a detailed way to the report of the special joint committee. The government response follows the recommendations of the committee consecutively. You can take a copy of the report and look at the first recommendation, and then find in the government response the precise answer or the precise attitude toward each particular recommendation. It would be useful for people still interested to have an opportunity to obtain this report. That is the purpose of my motion.

I should add that there are still copies available of the dissenting opinions. They have not all been called upon. Many copies of them have been taken, but there are still copies left. If they are exhausted, I would look to the Bloc to join up with the Reform Party in the House of Commons to have the reprinting of the dissenting opinions financed by the two opposition parties in the House of Commons.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, February 22, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

MULTICULTURALISM

TERMINATION OF REDRESS DISCUSSIONS WITH ETHNOCULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: I rise today to speak on behalf of six ethnocultural organizations which were affected by the December 14, 1994 announcement of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. On that date, the minister unilaterally terminated discussions with the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Chinese Canadian National Council, the German Canadian Congress, the National Association of Canadians of Origins in India, the National Congress of Chinese Canadians, the National Congress of Italian Canadians, the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association on the claims for redress made by these organizations.

As a sop to these organizations, and to all ethnic minorities in Canada, the minister announced that sometime this spring, the spring of 1995, the government would proclaim into force the statute which establishes the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. This action taken by the minister in terminating the redress discussions is unacceptable to me and to all other Canadians who value human rights in this country.

In my writings, and in the speeches I make in this chamber on the subject of minorities, I often state that the degree of political sophistication of a country can be determined by the treatment afforded to its minorities.

The work of the previous government in this field made me feel proud to be a Canadian and a member of the Progressive Conservative Party. The elevation of Canada's aboriginal peoples to near self-government status and the settlement reached with the Japanese Canadian community concerning redress are only two examples of work done in this area between 1984 and 1993.

Since taking office, the Liberal government has retreated from its Red Book position of support for minorities. Its appointments to the National Crime Prevention Council, changes in immigration policy and omission of visible minorities from the social policy review are glaring examples of this change of position. The unilateral termination of these discussions on redress is just the latest example. I urge the minister to reconsider her decision in relation to the redress discussions.

I further urge the minister to move as quickly as possible to bring the Canadian Race Relations Foundation into existence and to fund it at a level that will allow it to do meaningful work on behalf of all minorities.

THE ECONOMY

BUDGET PAPER PRODUCED BY REFORM PARTY

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, yesterday I rose to suggest that, in my view, this government will not have the courage to implement the necessary measures to attack the debt-deficit problems of this country.

Lest I be misunderstood, I wish to clearly disassociate myself from the views expressed by the Reform Party in their so-called "Taxpayer's Budget," which they released yesterday. Never have I read such a narrow-minded, mean-spirited, elitist document as this draconian plan to allegedly "provide social and economic security to Canadians in the 21st century."

In a blind assault on the federal budget, the Reform Party would have the Government of Canada cut social programmes by $15 billion, turn the care of our elderly and unemployed over to charities, cut back pensions to our seniors, cut transfers to the provinces by $6.6 billion, or 25 per cent, and reduce $1 billion from federal support for health and education.

Who will carry the burden of the Reform Party's endeavour to balance the federal budget in three years? It will not be the rich, that is certain. These measures will again be carried on the backs of our middle class and our poor, who will face added indirect taxation that they can ill afford.

The result of this economic plan by the Reform Party and the downloading of additional financial burdens on the provinces will be reduced services and programs, reduced public education programs, public libraries will be closed, additional increases in tuition costs, declining services in hospitals, declining transportation services, higher property taxes, higher rents, higher housing prices, and reduced police services.

Ultimately, these plans — if, heaven forbid, they should ever become a reality — would drive this nation into a recession, and all of the Reform Party's desires to restore confidence in the Canadian economy by their American-style "survival of the fittest" philosophy would be to no avail.

Let it be known to Canadians that the Reform Party, rather than being representative of the people and populist, as they allege, is merely a puppet party dancing to the tune of the business elite; a party that has forsaken Canadians, and is willing to meet their political ends on the backs of the middle class and poor Canadians. Theirs is not a solution of fiscal or social responsibility; it is a solution designed to gain attention and notoriety without such responsibility.

However, one humorous aspect which honourable senators who read this document will enjoy is the statement by the Reform Party that they wish to repeal mandatory retirement wherever it exists. This means that the Reform Party would support the rights of those senators who wish to stay in the Senate beyond the age of 75, and as long as they so desire. A nice, unusual turn by the Reform Party.

Honourable senators, I believe it is time that the duplicity of the Reform Party is exposed, and that Canadians come to realize that they are merely a party representative of the rich, with little care for average Canadians.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

USE OF MALE EMERGENCY RESPONSE TEAM TO STRIP-SEARCH INMATES AT KINGSTON PRISON FOR WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, by this time, most Canadians have had a chance to witness the appalling and degrading treatment of women inmates at the Kingston Penitentiary, as shown on the CBC public affairs program The Fifth Estate on February 21, 1995. While it is commendable that the Solicitor General has moved to establish an independent investigation into this incident, some questions remain.

The incident at Kingston Penitentiary took place in April of 1994. The special report of the Correctional Investigator, which was completed on February 14, 1995, was released to the public yesterday, February 21, 1995. One wonders why it took so long for the government to complete the report and to release it.

While no one would condone the violence by the women inmates, it is even more difficult to condone the sadistic actions of the emergency response team. Contrary to the assertion of the board of investigation report, the response team's raid took place in what appeared to be a non-emergency situation. According to the Correctional Investigator's report, an obvious level of cooperation was being displayed by the inmates. During this time, women inmates were stripped, searched by male guards, and forcibly held in poses and positions which depicted them in degrading and dehumanizing terms. The video shows images of female bondage. Subdued women inmates were poked and prodded with batons and shields while their clothes were being forcibly removed by the male guards.

Much of how this incident unfolded is at variance with the initial report of the board of investigation, which appeared to "sugar coat" the incident. There is a strong indication that the warden responsible for calling in the emergency team was part of a cover-up. I hope the Solicitor General will consider suspending the warden until an independent investigation is completed.

In the event that the independent inquiry confirms that the actions of the ERT were inconsistent with the guidelines set by the Correctional Service of Canada, then members of the ERT should be charged with sexual assault.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 28, 1995 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-59, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, February 28, 1995.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-216, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Stollery, for Senator Gigantès, bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, February 28, 1995.

THE BUDGET, 1995

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, February 28, 1995, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the state of the Canadian economy and the budget to be presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.

THE ENVIRONMENT

SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, March 1, 1995, I will call the attention of the Senate to the environment and to the issue of sustainable development.

REVENUE

INCOME TAX—CAPITAL GAINS ELECTION—EFFECT ON SENIORS

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. A problem from last year's budget has been brought to my attention. It concerns an elderly woman with virtually no income but who is lucky enough to own a small cottage. She faces a very unpleasant choice. She can either give up her entire supplement and live on virtually nothing this year, or she can lose the exemption for previous capital gains on her cottage.

By way of explanation, last year's budget took away the capital gains exemption, but allowed taxpayers to lock in the exemption for gains up to budget day if they declared them on their 1994 returns. However, to do so, you must inflate your net income. You then take out the gains so that your taxable income is not affected. However, net income is the test not only for the seniors' supplement but for the child tax benefit, the pension clawback, and the GST credit.

Will the minister make representations to her colleagues the Ministers of Revenue and Finance so that no senior will be deprived of his or her supplement this year simply because they want to lock in their capital gains, for example, in a cottage?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his question, and I will send his comments as they appear in Hansard over to my colleague as soon as they appear. I would also be pleased to forward any supporting information which he might have that would be helpful in this case.

CAPITAL GAINS ELECTION—DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION TO PUBLIC—REQUEST FOR STUDIES ON EFFECTIVENESS OF MEASURE

Hon. Terry Stratton: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. A second problem arises with the manner in which this senior citizen found out about her choices. Like many Canadians, she gets her taxes done at a tax preparation firm. If they had not asked her if she owned a cottage, she would not even have known about the capital gains election. I have seen several examples of this.

Honourable senators, this measure affects everyone who owns shares, a cottage, a coin or art collection, rental property, or an unincorporated small business. Can the minister report back on exactly what has been done to inform Canadians that they must make a capital gains election this tax season? At the same time, could she report back on any studies that have been made as to the effectiveness of these measures? It is a fairly critical question, because as I talk to people who have cottages and other such assets, they are not aware that they must make a capital gains election this year, even though the perception out there is that a lot of people do know about it.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will transmit that question to the minister as well.

THE BUDGET

DEFINITION OF TAX LOOPHOLE

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of Finance and other government ministers have said that they expect to close tax loopholes in the upcoming budget. There has been much discussion in Canada, in the newspapers and media, about what tax loopholes are. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate what the government's definition of a tax loophole is, so that all Canadians may know what they are talking about.

• (1350)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a question which should await the presentation of the budget.

STATUS OF RRSP AS TAX LOOPHOLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, that is the same kind of answer I was given yesterday by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is not a question which need await the budget. We either have tax loopholes or we do not. After all, what is a tax loophole? I do not think an answer to this type of question would be giving away any government secret.

Let us go one step further, honourable senators. Is an RRSP a tax loophole?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to transmit the honourable senator's questions to the Minister of Finance for his comments.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I am becoming somewhat frustrated. I did not raise the matter; it was raised by the government. It is the government that is talking about closing tax loopholes. It is the government that is telling the people of Canada that there are tax loopholes, and that people are not paying taxes that they should fairly pay.

As a representative of the government, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has the responsibility to tell honourable senators what a tax loophole is, or else the government should not talk about them at all.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the question raised by my honourable friend will be transmitted to my colleague, and I will get the answer to him as soon as possible.

As far as the budget is concerned, it will be presented at 4:30 p.m. on Monday next. It will be a tough, fair and good budget for Canada.

REDUCTION OF GRAIN TRANSPORTATION SUBSIDIES— ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS FOR INCREASE IN RAIL FREIGHT COSTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns grain transportation subsidies. Given that the Minister of Agriculture has warned farmers that transportation subsidies will be reduced, or possibly eliminated in concert with a one-time pay-out, farmers will be required to pay the full cost of shipping grain to ports for export.

Currently, Manitoba farmers, whose grain typically travels a distance of 600 miles to Thunder Bay, have $10.68 per tonne deducted from their initial payment. If the Crow benefit paid to railways is phased out and farmers are required to pay the full shipping costs, they would face increases in the order of $22 per tonne.

I also understand that the government is contemplating allowing the Canadian Wheat Board to change the method of determining the cost to individual producers. If these measures are implemented for Canadian farmers as a whole, a movement from "pay the railways" to "pay the producer" would mean an increase in freight costs of roughly $15 per tonne. However, in Manitoba, because of additional factors, farmers could face a stunning $30 per tonne increase.

Will the Leader of the Government lobby the Minister of Finance and ask him how he intends to alleviate this exceptionally heavy burden on Manitoba farmers if these measures are undertaken?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Spivak will understand that any comment on the WGTA will have to await the budget. As the honourable senator may know, over the course of the last few months the Minister of Agriculture has been consulting widely among farm organizations, the provinces and other groups who are particularly interested and affected by this measure. Various suggestions have been made. We will have to await the budget. I am sure that in any calculations that are being contemplated, fairness to Manitoba will be a consideration.

REDUCTION OF TRANSPORTATION SUBSIDIES— EFFECT ON MANITOBA ECONOMY

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for her emphasis on fairness, which I think is the issue here. Will she also speak to her colleagues about the impact of these changes in subsidies? Apparently, these relatively straightforward technical adjustments in subsidies for the transportation of grain will change the economy of Manitoba from a wheat-based economy to a beef-based economy and will also have an impact on railway lines, as well as the environment.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know that a tremendous amount of thought has been given to this particular issue. This issue has a history not only in Western Canada but also in this place in that it is regarded as one of the most difficult western issues to come before Parliament. I know that the Minister of Agriculture is conscious of the situation. He has been careful in his considerations. I will certainly bring the comments of my honourable friend to his attention.

THRESHOLD FOR CLAWBACKS— CONSULTATIONS WITH SENIOR CITIZENS

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I refer the Leader of the Government to an article in the February 13 issue of Maclean's entitled, "Martin's Options" in which it is reported that over 100,000 Canadians have written the government to express their concerns about the impending tax hike. They believe that they are already overtaxed and that the government should clean its own house before it turns to taxpayers' pockets.

Of particular concern to senior citizens is a possible tightening of clawbacks. Last year's budget imposed a clawback on the age credit of anyone with income above $26,000. Can the minister assure us that that amount will not become the new threshold for clawbacks to Old Age Security? I realize that the minister cannot comment on what is in the budget, but can she tell us what type of consultations have taken place with seniors groups in the areas of taxation that may affect them?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will appreciate that many of the questions that have been asked in the last few days are matters which may or may not impinge on the budget. As such, I cannot offer comment on them.

Concerning the question of consultation, I know that, as a follow-through from last year's budget when such discussions were undertaken, there has been considerable consultation in this area during the past year.

More specifically, I will place the question raised by the honourable senator before the ministers involved to see if I can obtain a more precise answer. However, I know from my colleagues that there have been numerous discussions with seniors groups. I shall try to obtain a more specific response for Senator Cochrane.

PRIVATE PENSION INCOME—POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF TAX CREDIT—CONSULTATION WITH SENIOR CITIZENS

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, when the Leader of the Government is consulting with the minister, perhaps she could also find out about the rumour that is circulating that the government may eliminate the 17 per cent tax credit on the first $1,000 of private pension income. I should like to know if there has been any consultation on this subject with seniors.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will give my friend the same answer: I will be pleased to pass on her question to the minister.

THE ENVIRONMENT

GREENHOUSE GAS REDUCTION STRATEGY— FAILURE TO REACH AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the greenhouse gas strategy. This week, federal and provincial ministers of the environment failed to reach agreement on an adequate greenhouse gas reduction strategy to achieve the very modest goal of stabilizing greenhouse gases at 1990 levels by the year 2000. The gap between what they pledged and what can be achieved is in the order of 13 per cent.

Failure on this issue is a serious matter that could devastate our forestry, fisheries, agricultural productivity, and inexorably alter the lives of Canadians. Many political spokesmen and environmentalists have suggested that regulatory measures, as well as voluntary measures, are necessary to reach the desired goal. Redirection of tax incentives and subsidies to energy efficiency and energy conservation programs which would create thousands of jobs would also help.

Is the government still prepared to honour Canada's commitment, and its own tougher commitments contained in the Red Book, by regulation and a redirection of subsidies to fossil fuels instead of the voluntary measures that have been discussed?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will need to ask my two colleagues Ms Copps and Ms McLellan for specific responses to those questions.

At the conclusion of the recent conference, the Deputy Prime Minister indicated her disappointment that the objectives had not been met to the degree to which the federal government would wish.

As my honourable friend knows, the Red Book indicates that one of the initial ways of reaching the goal is through discussions with the provinces. The government knows that real progress on climate change still depends on the active participation of the provinces, the municipalities and the energy sector. Considerable effort will continue to be made in those directions.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for her answer. Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether all of the provinces present at the recent meetings were indeed in favour of mandatory regulation and other measures, except for one, that being Alberta, which insisted on voluntary measures only?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to verify my response to that question.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

INCIDENCE OF TUBERCULOSIS IN ONTARIO PENITENTIARIES— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and ask her to consult her colleague the Solicitor General with respect to the rampant epidemic of tuberculosis which is prevalent in Kingston penitentiary. I understand that over 122 staff and inmates have tested positive for tuberculosis, and that the disease is spreading to Millhaven and Collins Bay penitentiaries in the Ontario region.

Can we have a definitive answer from the government on that situation, and on what steps are being taken by Correctional Service Canada with respect to this epidemic?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank my honourable friend for his question. I was not aware of those details. I will pass them on to the Solicitor General in order to get a response.

REFERRAL OF TUBERCULOSIS PROBLEM IN PENITENTIARIES TO MINISTER OF HEALTH— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable minister might put a question concerning that matter to her colleague the Minister of Health. One does not wish to be alarmist, but there have recently been suggestions from qualified sources that tuberculosis, which many of us had thought was a disease of the past, is coming to the fore again in this country as a serious health problem. The Minister of Health may have some information to bring to the house on that matter.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do that. I am aware, as is the honourable senator, that this disease seems to be rejuvenating, not only in Canada but elsewhere. The comments of Senator Hastings are very disturbing. Also disturbing is the rate at which this disease advances, particularly within groups of our native population on reserves.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, what disturbs me more than the fact that the disease is rampant is the complete cover-up by Correctional Service Canada of the situation in the Ontario region. It is for that reason I am asking the minister to clarify the situation, and to give us a definitive statement on what is transpiring.

Senator Fairbairn: I will be pleased to follow up on that. As my honourable friend knows, the Solicitor General is very assiduous in his pursuit of facts on these issues as they develop in the prison system. I will certainly ensure that my honourable friend receives what we hope will be a satisfactory response to his questions.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers. One is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 29, 1994, by the Honourable Senator John Sylvain regarding the proportion of non-military items in the defence budget.

I also have a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 13, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding a threat to the sugar industry under the new GATT rules.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPORTION OF NON-MILITARY ITEMS IN BUDGET— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by Senator Sylvain on November 29, 1994)

The Department of National Defence does not maintain two sets of books, one for defence expenditures and one for regional development; therefore, a detailed quantified answer to this question is not possible.

Government spending in general serves a broad range of public policy interests. Indeed, there are existing Government policies which direct Public Works and Government Services Canada (PWGSC) and individual departments in this regard. Defence spending, while specifically focused on national security interests, also often results in benefits in other fields such as regional development. This is particularly true given the scale of the Defence capital budget (approximately $2.5 billion) and the importance of defence procurement in sectors such as aerospace, shipbuilding and high technology generally.

Within its Capital program, the Department identifies the industrial and regional development benefits associated with each major project. This information is detailed in the National Defence Estimates Part III, by project. These benefits are negotiated with individual companies by PWGSC, in concert with Industry Canada (IC) and regional agencies, usually as part of a major equipment contract. Consequently, while the benefits are usually specifically identified, the cost of these can not be isolated from the cost of the equipment.

As indicated in the 1994 Defence White Paper, in order to make more effective use of its resources, the Department will increase its procurement of off-the-shelf commercial technology and enhance partnerships with the private sector on a business-case basis. This new approach to procurement will limit opportunities for defence spending to directly contribute to other public policy interests.

The Department's Canada-wide infrastructure also has been viewed by some as being the product of regional development interests, with under-utilized facilities continuing to be maintained for non-defence reasons. It should be noted that, for readiness and mobilization purposes, we maintained, until recently, an infrastructure designed for the support of a Force considerably larger than that which existed. Recent changes in the international strategic situation have allowed DND to implement significant reductions in its support infrastructure, namely to operate fewer, generally larger, multi-purpose support bases. While these facilities will be important in the local economies, their purpose will be unequivocally military.

Concerns about the use of the defence budget for non-defence purposes are not new to DND. The issue has been raised by the Auditor General, as well as many others in the Defence community. The recent significant reductions to defence funding make it imperative that we extract the last ounce of military capability out of every dollar spent. To that end, while there may be industrial benefits associated with specific defence expenditures, all reasonable steps are being taken to recognize and limit any additional costs imposed on the Department.

THREAT TO SUGAR INDUSTRY UNDER NEW GATT RULES— GOVERNMENT POSITION

The Government of Canada has been seeking a satisfactory resolution to the issue of access to the U.S. market for sugar and sugar containing product in a way that would protect existing levels of trade. More recently, the Government made vigorous efforts to have the new U.S. restrictions affecting sugar containing products postponed from the January 1, 1995 implementation date in order to provide more time for a mutually acceptable negotiated solution. Despite these efforts the U.S. Administration was unwilling to consider a deferral and the new restrictions took effect on January 1, 1995.

On December 16, the Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, the Honourable Ralph Goodale, met with representatives of the Canadian industry and spoke to the provincial governments to advise them of this outcome. The Government is sensitive to the industry's concerns and will continue to consult closely with the industry and the provinces to develop a strategy for defending Canadian interests.

On January 31, the government has placed export controls on sugar-containing products so as to ensure fair access for Canadian producers to the U.S. quota.

It is continuing its discussions with sugar refiners and other participants in the industry as to the options that are open to it. A formal response to the U.S. actions can be expected soon.

On February 10, Minister MacLaren requested formal consultations under NAFTA related to Canadian concerns about access to U.S. market for sugar and sugar-containing products.

More recently, the Prime Minister has indicated that he will raise this matter when the President of the United States visits Ottawa on February 23 and 24.

IMMIGRATION ACT
CITIZENSHIP ACT
CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bosa, seconded by the Honourable Senator Watt, for the second reading of Bill C-44, to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, no one in this chamber will disagree with the statement that Canada has benefitted greatly from immigration. This country has been built, both literally and figuratively, by immigrants. Canada is not only a country which receives immigrants but a nation which actively promotes immigration as a means of enriching itself culturally and economically.

As stated by our former colleague the Right Honourable Roméo LeBlanc in his first address as Governor General last week:

> We are all immigrants to this land. It's just that some of us came earlier than others. And those who came earlier were welcomed by First Nations Canadians already here for quite some time.

As an immigrant to this wonderful country, I take the entire issue of immigration to heart. Since I have had the privilege of serving Canada and my fellow Canadians in this place, I have always taken a careful and considered view toward the legislation we are asked to debate and decide upon. With respect to bills involving social policy, I believe it is imperative to examine these proposals with both an objective and a subjective eye. As a representative of the Canadian people, the reason for objective judgment is clear.

However, as an immigrant to this country, a degree of subjectivity on my part is unavoidable. Even with the initiatives of former governments and their immigration reform, I have consistently viewed these bills with an eye to how they would affect my family and their dreams. Additionally, I ask myself, "How does this legislation affect my community and, most important, how does this reform affect all Canadians: new and old immigrants, children and grandchildren of immigrants, and those who have come to Canada seeking our protection?" All these Canadians must be held in mind when we assess this and similar legislation.

In reviewing Bill C-44, it is important to be mindful of the fact that it deals with only one, yet very vital, aspect of Canada's immigration program: that of enforcement. Today, immigration alone is a topic which stirs emotions and elicits frank opinions from all directions.

• (1410)

Canada is not alone in its self-examination of immigration policy. With 23 million people on the move worldwide, immigration will continue to dominate the international legislative agendas as one of the primary social issues of our time.

Immigration enforcement, in the Canadian context, is a social issue unto itself. Our world is changing very rapidly, and we must be prepared to deal pro-actively with the challenges we now face with respect to the protection of our borders.

The last annual report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee stated that the first concern of national security is the entry into Canada of those persons who have committed serious crimes or human rights violations in their country of origin. Honourable senators, are we doing our best as legislators in confronting this extremely significant problem? Will Bill C-44 be sufficient to handle the degree of threat our country now faces with respect to the vulnerability of our borders?

Just three months ago, an international symposium on organized crime was held in Toronto. Chief among the discussions at this conference was that Canada is fast becoming a haven for criminals as a result of the permeability of our borders. The easy movement of people and the absence of strict laws regarding laundering of money was the focus of their discussion. One drug trafficker, interviewed in January of this year for Mike Duffy's program, Sunday Edition, is quoted as saying:

> Canada is so easy. So nice to work with. A lot of the big drug lords are investing money in Canada. If you're going to get caught, get caught in Canada.

Without proper management and sure direction, the enforcement component of Canada's immigration program is certain to fail. Clearly, if this part of the system is jeopardized, so too are the other fundamental principles that form the basis of Canada's commitment to immigration. Canada's internationally renowned system of providing a safe haven to those who are fearful for their lives from oppressive regimes and our proud tradition of welcome and tolerance for immigrants and visitors will be in serious jeopardy if the mechanisms to control illegal immigration falter.

Honourable senators, at this time in our history, Canada cannot afford ill-conceived policy or leaders void of clear direction at the helm of the immigration portfolio. Although Bill C-44 touches on aspects of immigration enforcement, it is mere tinkering, and it does very little to signal to Canadians that their protection is paramount. This bill does not address the serious systematic and management problems that have come to the fore over the past year within the immigration department. Nor does this bill respond to the outstanding issues of fairness and due process that have been repeatedly broached by concerned Canadians and put forward by many organizations when this bill was first introduced.

I am tempted — and I will succumb to this temptation — to recall to my colleagues a time not too long ago in this place when we debated the recent significant overhaul of the Immigration Act, Bill C-86. A number of senators opposite forcefully — and at times stridently — expounded on the importance of limiting the powers of the Immigration Minister in ensuring equity and due process. In fact, as many of you will recall, a number of my honourable friends denounced the extensive criminality provisions contained in Bill C-86 as extremely harsh. These provisions are now used very effectively in barring serious criminals from entering Canada, and also in removing those who have previously eluded authorities and entered illegally.

Even the present Minister of Immigration has allegedly risen in his place in response to particular cases and has outlined how he has used the criminality provisions that the former government fought hard to implement. The bill we are now asked to examine is clearly not a dismantling of the enforcement initiatives contained within Bill C-86. It is, therefore, with some irony that I speak to Bill C-44, a bill involving immigration enforcement and introduced by this Liberal government, a government, while in opposition, that voted against any and all legislative amendments with respect to dealing with criminals seeking to enter or remain in Canada.

Honourable senators, concern over immigration enforcement was not on the Liberal agenda in December 1992 when Bill C-86 was proclaimed. It was not an integral part of the Liberal agenda leading up to the fall of 1993, as demonstrated in the "Red Manifesto"; so when did the protection from foreign criminals make its way on to the Liberal platform? Tragically, it was the spring of 1994, following two separate heinous murders on the streets of downtown Toronto that ended the lives of both a young woman and a young Metro Toronto police officer. In both situations, individuals facing deportation are standing accused of these horrible crimes. These despicable acts marked the forcing of this government's hand. They then had to face the fact that they could no longer ignore the enforcement element and control issues that are inherent parts of the immigration program.

Before I deal in detail with the Liberal panacea for all that ails the immigration department, I wish to make something very clear. It does not serve the interests of Parliament nor the interests of Canadians to seek to lay blame either on the officials of the Department of Immigration or on the present or former immigration ministers. What would be unforgivable, however, is not to seek out the real solutions that will serve to prevent these systematic breakdowns from reoccurring.

Is Bill C-44 the solution? Would Bill C-44 have prevented the tragic incidents in Toronto or other cases involving violent crimes that the media appear to highlight with troubling regularity?

It is true that we are seldom treated to the good-news stories of immigrants and refugees regularly triumphing over adversity — those who strive to support their families and settle within our communities, and those who contribute so much to this magnificent country. These are the stories — and I believe all in this chamber would agree — that reflect the rightful history of Canadian immigration. These are the stories that we commemorated this past year on the 125th anniversary of Canada's first Immigration Act and the creation of the first federal immigration service.

Honourable senators, these are the stories that Canada must continue to celebrate. I truly fear, however, that if we are not duly diligent in pursuing a close examination and fine tuning of the proposed enforcement measures within the Immigration Act, Canadians will move closer to the edge of abandoning their spirit of generosity and commitment to immigrants and refugees.

As we begin to scrutinize Bill C-44, I cannot state that I am categorically opposed to all of the proposed amendments. To do so would fly in the face of my steadfast support of Bill C-86 and what those changes have already accomplished. Testimony to this exists, in part, in the fact that Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi has not altered the main tenets of the Immigration Act, irrespective of his promise to do so, as put forward by the former government in Bill C-86: our humanitarian commitment to genuine refugees; the facilitation of immigrants and visitors; and the protection of society.

Minister Marchi has, through his overall policies, however, subjected the immigration portfolio to such haphazard guidance that even his senior officials arrive at work each day and hold up their dampened forefingers in order to catch the direction of the wind.

Agnes Gruda said it best in her commentary reviewing the objectives and actions of Sergio Marchi printed last spring in La Presse, entitled "Marchi does the cha cha," and I quote:

> One step to the left, one step to the right and a shuffle to the middle: this dancing around can scarcely pass for the logical and sensitive reform that we were promised.

With all due respect, Mr. Marchi is a young and ambitious man with a demanding and complex portfolio to manage, and I am sure he is now learning to appreciate that fact. I am heartened by the fact that protecting the safety of Canadians has not been entirely forsaken by this minister. I will review his proposals, holding that principle as paramount.

Honourable senators, I view some of the proposals contained in Bill C-44 as somewhat of a vindication of our work on Bill C-86. Some of the amendments clearly complement and fine tune many of the legislative provisions of the previous legislation — for example, the ability to seize bogus identification and passport documents from the mail that are intended to defraud the immigration system. This echoes the work we achieved in Bill C-86 with respect to the search and seizure provisions — provisions that my honourable colleagues opposite adamantly voted against throughout the legislative process.

Within Bill C-44 is a provision halting the issuance of any unsupervised day passes or granting of parole for those foreign offenders awaiting deportation. This is completely in line with work which the former government began in the summer of 1993 with the development of the interdepartmental Working Group, comprised of officials from the Departments of Immigration, Corrections, and the Solicitor General's Office.

The former minister responsible for immigration organized this group, given his very real concerns over the temporary release of offenders — certainly violent offenders — who were facing imminent deportation.

What we see in Bill C-44 appears to be the initiatives of this group responding to loopholes and communication breakdowns with respect to the removal of foreign criminals. This may be an amendment worthy of serious consideration, and certainly one to which I believe a great many Canadians will lend their support.

One of the proposals of Bill C-44 seeks to prohibit individuals convicted of crime punishable by 10 years or more in prison, and whom the minister deems to be a danger to the public, from appealing to the Immigration and Refugee Board on all grounds. Applicants, however, would still maintain the right to seek judicial review of their cases at the Federal Court.

In addition, instead of the independent adjudicator within the IRB reviewing the applicant's claim to humanitarian and compassionate relief, the minister would now be responsible for rendering that judgment. It is to be noted that these, and in fact most of the amendments, will be retroactive.

These changes were severely criticized by a great number of participants invited to speak before the Standing Committee on Immigration and Citizenship: the Canadian Bar Association, the Quebec Immigration Lawyers' Association, the Refugee Lawyers Association, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the Canadian Council on Refugees, the National Action Committee, the Mennonite Central Committee, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations, and Amnesty International — all of these organizations, honourable colleagues, have condemned the foregoing provisions.

I ask my friends opposite: Who will they get to pen their speeches now?

I have not even begun to delve into the details of the bill, and we are already witness to arbitrary thresholds, more powers to the minister, a suspension of quasi-judicial due process; possible Charter and international covenant violations; and retroactivity.

The shoe is on the proverbial other foot, as it were, honourable senators. I look forward to hearing the views of Senator Grafstein, and I am glad he is here today. Senator Grafstein spoke so eloquently when debating a previous change to the Immigration Act, Bill C-84 on September 16, 1987, and I quote:

> Canadians are humanitarians. Canadians want fairness. The role of this chamber is to defend against any obvious breaches of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms and any obvious breaches of our international obligations.

I know very well that Senator Grafstein is committed to these protections. In fact, when he was debating a subsequent change to the Immigration Act, Bill C-55, on May 17, 1988, he stated, and I quote:

> ...having passed the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is it not our duty as legislators to ensure that all legislation meets the contours... of the Charter? Is this not the best way to foster the rule of law in Canada? When we pass legislation, we must also ensure that it meets our international obligations, which are also based on the rule of law. Only then can we expect our strong... global voice to be respected. Only then can we avoid the trap of hypocrisy by preaching to others about the rule of law, while failing to fulfil the rule when it comes to our own domestic legislation.

Senator Hastings: Are you quoting Senator Grafstein?

Senator Di Nino: Yes. I have a few questions for my honourable friends. The first question is: Will my friends opposite fall into this "trap of hypocrisy"? Will my friends opposite convey their deeply held views on civil rights to Minister Marchi? My final question is: Has Senator Grafstein quoted his favourite passages of the Magna Carta to this young and ambitious Minister of Immigration?

I look forward to also hearing the views of Senator Hébert, since I firmly recall his articulate oration of December 3, 1992 during a debate on Bill C-86, and I quote:

> One of the bill's major flaws is its emphasis on enforcement, as opposed to fairness and humanitarian values...the government seems to be playing to the lowest common denominator of Canadian society, which fears immigrants and refugees.

Senator Hébert spoke forcefully that day when he went on to say:

... it —

— by which he meant Bill C-86 —

> — will open the door to inequity and capriciousness in the selection of immigrants and refugees; it suspends legal safeguards, like deportations without hearings... suspensions of rights through retroactive provisions... Finally, too much authority has been transferred from the law and Parliament to the minister and his officials, which leaves the whole process open to abuse.

I am curious now as to whether Sergio Marchi listened to any of these thoughtful, elder statesmen when he drafted his bill, and I am curious as to whether he is more concerned with how they will react to his provisions, as opposed to how my friends on this side of the chamber will respond?

I can assure honourable senators of one thing: We on this side of the chamber will afford all of the amendments a fair and dilligent assessment; an assessment that will be ever cognizant of the protection of Canadians and the security of our borders. We look forward to meaningful exchanges and dialogue at committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Bosa, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gauthier, seconded by the Honourable Senator Pearson, for the second reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act and to make related amendments to other Acts.

Hon. James F. Kelleher: Honourable senators, I rise to speak in support of this bill. In one sense, it is not an important bill in that it could best be characterized as a housekeeping bill because it deals merely with a name change and a different departmental structure. In that sense, it could be characterized as housekeeping.

However, speaking as a former minister for international trade, I think it is about time the name of that department was finally changed to recognize the importance of trade and international trade to this country. It was something which Minister Clark and I attempted to do back in 1986, but obviously we were not successful in that endeavour. I am glad to see that it has finally occurred, and I support it strongly.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

MOTION TO PRINT VOLUME I OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE REPORT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:
> That the Senate order the printing, in its original format, of 500 copies of Volume I of the Report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy entitled "Canada's Foreign Policy: Principles and Priorities for the Future"; and
> That an amount not exceeding $7,500 be allocated for that purpose. — (Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton).

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a few comments to make about Senator MacEachen's motion.

The research I have done to date, with the help of the Table, has not revealed any motion in the past similar to this one; that is, a case of a senator coming to the Senate and asking for funds without first having the request studied by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. That by itself should question the propriety of Senator MacEachen's motion without going to the purpose of it. Do we wish to set a precedent and vote funds directly out of a budget which is the responsibility of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration? It is the guardian of that budget, and without its approval I do not believe funds should be released.

Also, Senator MacEachen is asking for the monies to print one volume of a three-volume report of a joint committee. Again I question whether we should carry the total cost of an item which is the responsibility of both houses. Why only publish Volume I? I gather from his remarks that it is because it is more favourable to the government's position than Volume II, which includes dissenting opinion. If we wish to take on the responsibility for printing committee reports, whether reports of joint committees, standing committees or special committees of the Senate, we should take the responsibility of publishing the entire report, not only that section which is more favourable to a position which we may uphold.

Finally, it is ironic, and I am sure only coincidental, that this request comes at a time when the House of Commons is seriously considering abolishing the printing of the proceedings of its committees. No doubt the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is also struggling with the possibility that we should be dropping the printing of the proceedings of our committees. I find it somewhat contradictory to be asked to print part of a report of a joint committee along with the possibility of losing our own committee reports.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Therefore, honourable senators, unless there is general agreement, I will move that we should send Senator MacEachen's motion to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for study and eventual report back to the full chamber. If there is no general agreement, I will move the motion as an amendment to the motion before us.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Is the honourable senator amending the motion of Senator MacEachen?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will do so. I move, seconded by Senator Berntson:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have no objection to the amendment, providing it is with respect to the authority of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration to allocate the funds. However, I would be distressed if the Senate were reaching a conclusion not to have this report reprinted, and allowing the decision to be made by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. Surely the Senate ought to adopt in principle the desirability of having the report reprinted, and send the matter to the committee to work out how the funds are to be provided, and so on. I certainly could not support an amendment which contains the notion that the Senate is disapproving of the reprinting of the report.

Senator Lynch-Staunton has talked about the fact that the motion does not contain a provision to reprint Volume II. The fact is that there are supplies of Volume II available, and when they run out, the senator, if he wished, could ask the Senate to have that volume reprinted. However, that issue is not before us at the moment because there are copies available.

If Senator Lynch-Staunton is favourable to the principle but would like to have the details examined by the committee, I would accept the amendment.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The purpose of the amendment is to refer the request to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for its advice and recommendation. My views are known. So far, I am not supportive, but I do not want the final decision to be taken today. I would like the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, which is responsible for the authorization of the release of funds, to tell us whether the funds are available, and whether this is a proper expenditure in which to engage the Senate of Canada.

Senator MacEachen: Surely it is the Senate which ought to decide whether it is proper, not a committee which is the servant of the Senate. Surely the Senate ought to say yes or no on the principle and then allow the committee to work out the financial details. I find it offensive that the notion is advanced that a committee should tell the Senate what to do on a question of principle.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is not a question of telling the Senate what to do. It is a question of seeking the advice of the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and the officials who serve it to find out what their recommendation is. We are not asking them to tell us whether it is good or bad; we want to know their feeling about it. We want to know whether the money is available and whether it is proper for the Senate to engage itself in the printing of a report, or part of a report, which is the product of a special joint committee of two houses.

The fundamental point which I raised is whether it is customary for a senator to ask for funds, for whatever legitimate purpose, without first seeking the guidance of the Internal Economy Committee.

Senator MacEachen: That is a point of order.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is an opinion. I can turn it into a point of order.

Senator MacEachen: On that point, it appeared to me that the Speaker's ruling opened the door for this particular motion. There was a remedy within the Senate itself to deal with a report of a joint committee. That was my interpretation of the ruling.

However, if Senator Lynch-Staunton has this view, I do not intend to pursue the matter further, although I regret very much indeed that the impression is left that the Senate of Canada is not prepared to authorize the reprinting of a report on Canada's foreign policy which is in demand in the country, and which is a contribution to the discussion on foreign policy. I think that is a rather backward-looking approach to the field of foreign policy, and that the Leader of the Opposition would divide the Senate on an administrative matter affecting foreign policy I find rather unfortunate and offensive. However, he has the majority, and we shall let him do as he wishes.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I take offence at that comment. This has nothing to do with the majority. Senator Hastings as chairman and I as deputy chairman of the Internal Economy Committee have been entrusted with the serious responsibility of ensuring that the expenditures of funds fall within the mandate of the Senate, and that there is some semblance of order in how those funds are expended.

If the Senate is intending to authorize the expenditure of funds directly from the chamber, so be it. I would have no problem with that, but I would certainly feel that my responsibility is redundant. One would be relegated solely to being a bookkeeper, and I could spend that time better elsewhere.

I think it is appropriate that any funds to be expended by the Senate should be authorized through the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, as long as we have the authority.

• (1440)

Senator Doyle: Not authorized; recommended.

Senator MacEachen: That is the point I was attempting to make; namely, let the Senate decide in principle upon the desirability of a reprint, and give the decision regarding the question of funding to the committee. If there are no funds, of course, the Internal Economy Committee is not obligated to go any further. It must consider the availability of funds.

In the meantime, it would be nice to have the Senate approve this measure in principle, and leave the next step to the committee, whatever it may be.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have before us an amendment. In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Berntson:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

An Hon. Senator: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: On division? We then go to the main motion, as amended. The main motion was made by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert. Do you wish me to read that motion?

Hon. Eric A. Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No. Take it as read.

Senator MacEachen: Please read the motion, as amended.

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion is:

> That the Senate order the printing in its original format of 500 copies of Volume I of the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy, entitled: Canada's Foreign Policy; Principles and Priorities for the Future; and
> That an amount not exceeding $7,500 be allocated for that purpose.

That motion has been amended by adding the words:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

It is your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion as amended?

Senator MacEachen: The substance of the motion itself now comes forward to the Senate. Because of the way in which the amendment is worded, the motion has not been amended at all; there has been an addition to it. How can you approve the motion and then say that "it not be adopted?"

The Hon. the Speaker: The main motion will be referred to the committee.

Senator MacEachen: That is why I asked you to read the motion, as amended. How is it amended?

Senator Di Nino: By the addition.

Senator Stewart: Nothing is struck out. It is contradictory.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is being referred to committee. That is the action that the Senate will be taking.

Senator Di Nino: Surely the addition of anything to a motion is an amendment to that motion. It is not the same motion; it is a motion together with something else. Is it not an amendment or an addition?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I misread the motion. The motion is to refer the main motion to committee.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is correct.

Senator MacEachen: All that we ask is that the motion, as amended, be put before the Senate. We are entitled to have the motion as amended put to us, and then we will decide whether or not we can support it.

The Hon. the Speaker: But the amendment, as proposed and as voted on, has referred the main motion to the committee. That was the decision of the Senate, namely:

> That the motion be not now adopted but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

That was the amendment.

Hon. John B. Stewart: May I then speak to the proposal, honourable senators? If the proposition that is now being read out by the Chair were to carry, the Senate would have ordered the printing in its original format of 500 copies of Volume I. That is a clear proposition.

We then have this other proposition, that the motion be referred to the committee. We have two contradictory propositions here. I do not see how a sane body could vote either yes or no when we have a collection of propositions which are contradictory, one to the other. Clearly, the Senate will have ordered the printing. Does that bind the committee or not? It does, in explicit language.

Senator Berntson: No, the motion states that it "not now be adopted but be referred to the committee..."

Senator Stewart: The amendment then should have read: "That all the words after the initial 'that' be struck out —" and then the words, "That the proposed motion be referred to the Standing Committee..." should be inserted.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is quite clear. Senator MacEachen has made a motion that the Senate vote $7,500 for the purpose of we know what. My amendment reads "that the motion be not now adopted" — that is, Senator MacEachen's motion — "but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy...." I do not see any contradiction. One amendment simply says, "Let's have the Internal Economy Committee have a look at it; they will eventually report to us and then we will make a decision following its recommendation and study." That amendment has been passed, as far as the Senate is concerned.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, there is a main motion on the Order Paper, and an honourable senator sought to amend that main motion. In any civilized Parliament of which I have been a part, when an amendment is carried, the main motion is put in "as amended."

Senator Lynch-Staunton: From that point of view, yes.

Senator MacEachen: It has to be done that way. However, when you put the main motion "as amended," it contains the obvious flaws that have been so carefully pointed out by Senator Stewart; namely, that the first part of the main motion approves the printing, and that the second part states that it go to the committee and that it not be approved.

We therefore must clean up this amendment. It should be ruled out of order, and the Leader of the Opposition should go back to the drawing board. It is out of order, because there is no way that he can slip the main motion out of our minds. It has to be dealt with. He tried to amend it and he received a result. We should now have before us the main motion, as amended. But when that is produced, it has the unsightly appearance of a contradiction. In the first part, it authorizes the printing, but in the second part it says, "No, we do not authorize it."

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, the amendment does not say "authorize or do not authorize"; the amendment simply says, "Let's not accept Senator MacEachen's motion for the time being but, instead, refer it to the Internal Economy Committee."

Senator MacEachen: But it is an amendment to the main motion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I agree.

Senator MacEachen: After an amendment is made, and carried — which your amendment was, senator, we then must have presented to us the main motion, as amended. When His Honour reads the main motion, as amended, we will see what happens.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We should hear it, then.

Senator MacEachen: As I have it, His Honour read it and added your amendment to the main motion. In logic, however, the main motion comes first. The whole business is approved by the Senate.

Senator Di Nino: The Leader of the Opposition is trying not to deal with the main motion — and possibly have it defeated — until there is an opportunity for the Internal Economy Committee to evaluate and check the fiscal aspects of it.

The question I have is: Why are we, as a Senate, being asked to spend money — on a report of a joint committee — when the House of Commons is not spending any money? Those are questions I will ask.

Also, when we send out this report, are we sending out Volume I and Volume II, or do we just send out Volume I? If we are to serve the public interest, then we must make sure that all the views of this report be given the same validity, rather than just those of one side.

If Senator MacEachen wants us to deal with the main motion, we will deal with the main motion; but if it is defeated, then that is the end of it. If that is what he wants, then maybe we will do that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I probably added to the confusion in this matter. Senator MacEachen is correct in saying that when we have before us a main motion and an amendment, we deal with the amendment first. If the amendment carries, then we go to the main motion, as amended. That is what I was doing.

• (1450)

However, I believe I was wrong. This is not really an amendment to the main motion. This is an amendment to the question. I refer honourable senators to rule 59, which you will find on page 63.

> Notice is not required for: (2) Referral of a question to a committee;

It is always open to the Senate, as I understand it, to refer any matter before it to a committee.

What we have here is a question. The question was: Shall this motion be adopted? The amendment was to that question, that it be not now adopted but that it be referred to committee. Therefore, the motion was no longer before the Senate once that motion in amendment had been passed. It has been referred to committee.

Honourable senators, I am making an impromptu ruling here. If it is the wish of the Senate, I am quite prepared to take the matter into consideration and come back with a ruling. However, I must ask for your agreement, because the motion in amendment has been passed.

Is it your wish, honourable senators, to rescind the vote and to return the matter so that I may make a ruling at a later date?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Debate adjourned to await ruling of the Speaker.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 28, 1995, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 28, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m, Senator William J. Petten, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

WILLIAM J. CLINTON
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF THE SENATE
AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Address of the President of the United States of America, delivered on February 23, 1995 to members of both Houses of Parliament, together with the introductory speech by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada and the speeches delivered by the Speaker of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

VISIT OF UNITED STATES PRESIDENT TO OTTAWA

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is very appropriate that my statement comes right after approval of Senator Graham's motion to have the address by President Clinton printed in our Hansard.

Canadians were, no doubt, most impressed with the success of President Clinton's visit to Ottawa last week, particularly with the close personal relationship so evident between the President and the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chrétien's admiration for the President is so strong that not only did he endorse his re-election, he smiled without a blush as Mr. Clinton listed Canadian achievements which had raised this country's esteem in the eyes of the President: NAFTA, the support for Mr. Aristide in Haiti, the open skies treaty, all initiatives of the Mulroney government. Mr. Chrétien did not even flinch when Mr. Clinton praised Canada for its contribution to the Gulf War. Apologists will no doubt justify this by explaining that any differences were minor — Mr. Chrétien simply wanted troops removed right after the first shot was fired, while Mr. Mulroney insisted they stay until after the last shot.

The Liberal Red Book, better known as the "misread" book, says that Canadians:

> ...do not want Canadian foreign policy to be determined solely through special personal relationships between world leaders.

When in opposition, Liberals gleefully ridiculed the special personal relationships which existed between first Mr. Reagan and then Mr. Bush, and Mr. Mulroney — relationships which allowed the achievements which earned Mr. Clinton's praise, and which the Prime Minister and Canadians know belongs largely elsewhere.

I expect that when they next meet, perhaps at the G-7 meeting in Halifax, it will surprise no one to see Mr. Chrétien take Mr. Clinton — or should we more accurately now say Jean take Bill — onto the stage of the Citadel to lead him and the audience in a rousing rendition of Alouette.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CHANGES TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING JURY SERVICE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, later today you will be asked to approve second reading of Bill C-216, a bill which has been passed by the House of Commons and which was sponsored through its various stages, over a period of years really, by Guy Arseneault, one of our colleagues in the other House. It repairs one of those peculiar little bureaucratic injustices. It took only one word to change the Income Tax Act so that unemployed people who are called to perform jury duty do not lose their unemployment benefits while performing jury duty. That was the case and will remain thus until the proclamation of Bill C-216. This bill that Mr. Arseneault has finally steered through the House of Commons will repair this small injustice.

For personal reasons I cannot be here during the second reading debate. I ask for your indulgence, honouorable senators, and I commend the bill to the Senate.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

GOVERNMENT TREATMENT OF MILITARY

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on the issue of the government's handling of the Canadian Airborne Regiment and other defence-related matters.

I do not have to tell the members of this chamber that the Canadian military establishment is reaching critical mass in terms of the morale of its troops and in terms of the military command and control structures in the Canadian Armed Forces. Continuing cuts to the military establishment in this country have and continue to take their toll on the men and women who together, form the finest military force in the world, second to none.

Honourable senators, one can argue that the fiscal situation in this country is such that it is necessary that the government get its house in order to sustain a military force over the long term. I, of course, agree. However, I also share the opinion of many of my colleagues, defence experts and economic bodies who, together, believe the Canadian Armed Forces have taken their share of cuts and that any further cuts would severely impair the efforts of the government to send troops abroad to meet Canada's foreign obligations.

Honourable senators, it is the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces that I wish to speak to. People are at the heart of our armed forces. The best planning, the best weapons and the best strategies will have little impact if military personnel are not fully motivated and trained.

Over two world wars and innumerable peacekeeping and peacemaking missions, we created the most highly professional, trained and motivated force in the world. Canadians do not have to look far to see the results of these efforts. To meet the new dangers and seize the opportunities of the new world order, we must maintain those qualities in the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces.

However, in little more than 15 months, the Liberal government has done more to undermine the morale, the esprit de corps and the tradition of Canada's military than all the budget cuts of the last 20 years. As a result of the political decisions taken at cabinet, presumably on the advice of Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Mr. David Collenette, the Minister of Defence, the federal government has decided to dismantle the entire Canadian Airborne Regiment as the result of the actions of a few. This political decision was indeed made in haste.

For reasons unknown, the government decided not to heed the advice of the military staff, decided not to await the outcome of the government's own inquiry, and, instead, decided to react in a clearly knee-jerk fashion to an uncertain wave of public opinion by dismantling the regiment, thus wreaking havoc on the men and women of the regiment and their families. To the best of my knowledge, this is the first time a regiment has been dismantled since the French government dismantled a regiment that had turned against the government in the Algerian War.

As I have stated, the decision of the Liberal government was clearly motivated by the Prime Minister's idea of political correctness. The Prime Minister has, over the last 15 months, shown Canadians that his government prefers to follow rather than lead. Members of this chamber are well aware that decisions based solely on the politics of the day will undermine Canada's institutions which are so necessary to the future prosperity and security of this nation.

This is not to say that the government only reacts in a knee-jerk way to the actions of some members of the Canadian Airborne Regiment. Rather, the government has institutionalized its political correctness in its decision-making process and, as such, makes decisions in this knee-jerk way for all problems arising in the military. One need only look to the naval traditions involved in crossing the equator. Although these traditions have been in place since ships first crossed the equator, they are now deemed not to be politically correct by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. I believe public opinion changes when Canadians are given an opportunity to view the situation in the context of military tradition, not to mention life at sea. However, I reiterate, the Liberals choose to follow rather than to lead.

Therefore, honourable senators, if the other parties in the other place do not have the courage, the conviction and the will to call for the resignation of the minister, then I, as a member of this chamber, will take on the responsibility of ensuring that someone is held ultimately responsible for the actions of the military and the decisions of the government.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I regret to inform the honourable senator that his time has expired.

Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to allow Senator St. Germain to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, it is my belief that, given the deteriorating level of the morale of the people who serve in the Canadian Armed Forces, the Minister of Defence should take political responsibility for his inability to convey a level of competence and understanding of military structures, tradition and respect and, as such, resign his ministerial position. I firmly believe the resignation of the minister will convey to the men and women who serve in the Canadian Armed Forces that those in charge are ultimately accountable for their actions, and it will show that he has taken his responsibility seriously, in the best interest of the morale, esprit de corps and traditions of our military.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE ESTIMATES, 1995-96

TABLING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the Estimates for the fiscal year 1995-1996.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 1, 1995 at one-thirty o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1995-96

REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1996.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

NOTICE OF MOTION TO EMPOWER COMMITTEE TO PERMIT COVERAGE OF MEETING BY ELECTRONIC MEDIA

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, March 1, 1995, I shall move that the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be empowered to permit coverage by electronic media of its public proceedings with the least possible disruption of its hearings.

HEALTH

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am pleased to place in the hands of the Clerk at the Table petitions expressing a plea identical to that which I read in the Senate chamber on March 17, 1994.

These petitioners pray that the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled protect health care workers with regard to freedom of conscience in the workplace.

These petitions contain the signatures of 872 people from various places throughout Canada.

THE BUDGET 1995

PRECEDENCE OF BUDGET STATEMENT OF FINANCE MINISTER OVER RED BOOK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On page 19 of the Budget in Brief, it is stated that Canadians should judge the government not on its rhetoric but on its results. Does this mean that Canadians should no longer refer to the Red Book rhetoric of 1993 and take the "grey book" cuts of 1995 as the new modus operandi?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Oliver for his question. Yesterday's budget represents the government's adherence to one of the most fundamental commitments made in the Red Book; that is, the determination of the government to stand by and carry out its commitments to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in three years. The underlying motivation of that commitment is to permit Canada and Canadians, through the stability of the economy, to have access to the services and programs which they need and deserve.

The adherence to the 3 per cent of GDP, forcefully outlined last night in the budget, is on track; in fact, it is better than on track. The deficit for this year is coming in lower than had been expected. The ongoing, but prudent, expectation by the Minister of Finance is that we will exceed our target, which will put us on a stretch that will continue toward the reduction and elimination of the deficit.

REDUCTION TO INTERNATIONAL ASSISTANCE ENVELOPE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have a more specific question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As a preliminary, I will quote directly from the Red Book. It is stated on pages 105 and 106 of the Red Book:

> The Liberals will play a more active role in this world of change...by supporting human rights worldwide, by eradication of poverty and social inequality.

The "grey book" of cuts states on page 48 that $532 million, or 21 per cent, of the international assistance envelope will be cut. It refers to the Liberal intention to cut overseas development agency assistance and programs, and to cut contributions to international financial institutions.

My question is: What is the real figure? Is it the figure set out in the statement in the Red Book, or does it relate to the cuts of $532 million?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all my friends opposite will know that the budget brought down last night reflects a reality in our country that did not exist last fall. Economic pressures and changes throughout the international markets, as well as by way of interest rates, have occurred in recent months and have forced the government to shoulder its responsibility and to produce the kind of strong, tough but fair budget that was issued last night by my colleague the Minister of Finance.

The government's commitment to assistance in the world, whether it be economic aid or military aid, is absolutely secure. As the economy and the fiscal situation in this country improve, there will be opportunities to improve in the area in which my honourable friend has expressed an interest, just as there will be improvements in the many areas of social assistance that we are pursuing in the budget.

The government would not be carrying out its responsibility to this country, nor to Canada's place in the world, if it did not meet the demands of today which will permit us to take the actions of tomorrow.

CANCELLATION OF GOODS AND SERVICES TAX—
GOVERMENT POSITION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Yesterday's budget imposed a tax on gasoline of 1.5 cents per litre, which became effective at midnight last night. Did the cancellation of the GST become effective at the same time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, had that been the case, Senator Phillips would have been the first to know.

RATIO OF SPENDING CUTS TO TAX INCREASES—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question concerns the budget that was delivered yesterday.

Over the past number of months, the Minister of Finance has stated repeatedly that he would undertake $7 of spending cuts for each $1 of tax increases. Since in the 1995-96 budget there are $4 billion of spending cuts and close to $1 billion in revenue, how does the Finance Minister arrive at his one-to-seven ratio?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will not get into number crunching on the floor of the Senate. However, my colleague the Minister of Finance firmly advised Canadians last night that, as he put together his expenditure cuts and the tax measures, his overall conclusion was a ratio of seven to one.

Senator Tkachuk: Honourable senators, despite what the numbers say, and since I was half expecting what I just heard, I will ask myself this question: How did the Minister of Finance arrive at the seven-to-one ratio? The fact is that he did not manage a seven-to-one ratio; he achieved only a four-to-one ratio.

What occurred was that, in the first two years, the Minister of Finance declared that he had savings of $10 billion and over $2 billion in revenue, which represents a five-to-one ratio. However, in reality what he did was look down the road to 1997, 1998 and 1999 and say, "This is how much we will save."

My question is: Does this mean that there will be no tax increases in the next budget, nor in the following two budgets, in order for the Finance Minister to meet the seven-to-one target he is talking about?

• (1430)

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have the utmost admiration and respect for Senator Tkachuk, and indeed for his prowess in mathematics. However, I have an even higher regard for that of my colleague the Minister of Finance, and I will hang my hat on his seven-to-one ratio.

ELIMINATION OF PUBLIC UTILITIES INCOME TAX TRANSFER ACT—EFFECT ON PROVINCE OF ALBERTA—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ron Ghitter: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government, although my colleagues from Alberta, Senators Hays, Olson and Hastings, might also wish to respond because I know my question will raise their concerns, in the same way as my own have been raised.

I quote first from the budget speech of the Honourable Mr. Martin, where he says:

> Finally, we must never, ever lose sight of the need to be fair; fair among our regions and fair among individual Canadians.

It is the fairness among the regions that I wish to deal with for a moment, since there are many examples in this budget of unfairness to the regions. Let me give but one example, to which I would request a response from my fellow Alberta senators.

The budget will eliminate the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, known as PUITTA, under the suggestion that it no longer can be justified in today's fiscal circumstances. As honourable senators may know, under this act the federal government transfers to provinces and territories a portion of federal corporate income taxes paid by privately owned electric and gas utilities. These payments were intended to help level the playing field between privately owned utilities, which pay income taxes, and provincially owned utilities, which do not. These transfers now will be eliminated, thus reducing federal expenditures by an estimated $200 million in 1995-96 and by an estimated $276 million in 1996-97.

What does this mean for the province of Alberta, where such utilities are privately owned? Of the $200 million that will be saved by the federal government, $170 million will come from Albertans. Alberta will see an increase of 5.2 per cent in the cost of its electricity, and an increase of 2.4 per cent in the cost of natural gas. In effect, the City of Calgary, with all of its other notifications on utilities, will now be telling the good citizens of that city: "The federal budget brings unfair tax."

How am I affected by this unfair tax? Taken together, Albertans will pay an additional $170 million in federal taxes because we are customers of electric generating utilities and gas utilities which are privately owned, while the rest of the nation does not have to face this situation.

I then ask the honourable leader, how is it that the Government of Canada can so discriminate against the province of Alberta, charging Albertans another $170 million, when the rest of Canada does not face this tax?

I can see that the Honourable Senator Olson is anxious to get to his feet, and I eagerly await his comment.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regarding Senator Ghitter's question, the first point I wish to make is that this measure is not directed solely at the province of Alberta. Other provinces in this country will also be affected by the removal of the PUITTA. That includes most particularly the province of Nova Scotia, which also has the same kind of situation, as do Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island. In addition, there are other costs for other provinces across this country.

I suggest to my honourable friend that the notion that this is a move against Alberta is not accurate. It is certainly not in the spirit with which this government has tried to balance its moves in the budget across the country.

I would also mention to my honourable friend that this tax has a long history in the province of Alberta. In fact, it goes back to the late 1940s, when then premier Manning —

Senator Berntson: It was 1947.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Berntson — when then premier Manning worked with the federal government to form a federal-provincial agreement, which was later confirmed by the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker in the 1950s. This tax agreement between the two levels of government was sustained until the year 1990, when the government of Alberta, under the premiership of Mr. Donald Getty, reneged and pulled out of the tax. It has been upheld since then by the federal government, of necessity in a diminishing manner.

Given the fiscal situation in this country today, as the Minister of Finance forthrightly said last night, the federal government can no longer afford to support this tax.

Honourable senators, this is far from a move against the province of Alberta. It also involves smaller provinces which have perhaps an even tougher time accepting the reality of the current situation. However, as my honourable friend knows, it takes two to tango, and our partner bopped away in 1990 in the province of Alberta.

Senator Ghitter: Honourable senators, if other provinces wish to join in my plea to the government with respect to this unfair approach by the federal government — of which $170 million will be paid by Alberta and the other $30 million by Newfoundland and Nova Scotia — let them join me. Let them get to their feet and again cry discrimination.

When we have, in a sense, a federal government that is talking in terms of the benefit of privatization, of moving out into the private sector — which I totally endorse — and when there are in existence privately owned utilities, those utilities should not face discriminatory taxation vis-à-vis the publicly owned utilities in Ontario and British Columbia, as examples, which will reap the benefit of that situation. I regard this measure as being discriminatory and unfair to Alberta, notwithstanding the comments of the honourable leader.

REFORM OF OLD AGE SECURITY—EFFECT ON OLDER MARRIED WOMEN OF APPLICATION OF CLAWBACK TO HOUSEHOLD INCOME

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, the reference that the Leader of the Government made a moment ago to the Right Honourable Mr. Diefenbaker reminded me of comments that that late, great, honourable gentlemen used to make in defending the old age security system, especially with regard to means tests and the like.

I note in the budget documents that one of the principles for the new regime governing Old Age Security is that the clawback, which is presently applied in respect of individual income, in the future would be applied in respect of family or household income.

The Leader of the Government will know that the principal victims of this change would be older married women, especially women who have stayed at home most of their lives and whose husbands might have some other source of income. However, older married women are the people who would be deprived under this change.

This was announced as a principle for reform of the OAS in yesterday's budget. It raises the question whether the honourable leader believes that something might be done between now and the time such a reform is cast in stone to dissuade her colleague the Minister of Finance from proceeding in that way with the penalties it would inflict on many older married women.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as my honourable friend will appreciate, and as we have all known for some considerable period of time, there has been and will continue to be growing pressures on the resources of Canada in terms of pension security for our senior citizens. It is the stated commitment of this government to secure for present and future pension recipients an absolutely firm pension security going into the new century when the pressure will be even greater.

There are two elements, as my friend knows: the Canada Pension Plan, which needs help, and a statutory requirement for federal-provincial review and discussion, which will begin in the fall.

On the question of Old Age Security, the honourable gentleman is correct in saying that principles were set out in last night's budget for a discussion that will take place in the fall after the tabling of the paper on aging, which has been worked on over the past year and was set out in the previous budget. When that paper is produced, there will be consultations with seniors themselves and with others in order to determine the very best way to make our pension plan affordable, secure and sustainable for all of them.

The Minister of Finance has been clear that the consultations will take place. He has set out, as he did last night, a series of principles which will govern the discussions of those reforms. They include undiminished protection for less well-to-do seniors, a continuation of full indexation of benefits, greater progression of benefits by income level, control of program costs, and the item that my honourable friend has mentioned in this house today.

Senator Murray: Say it! Say it!

Senator Fairbairn: As a result of last night's budget, there are several changes in the way pensions are delivered. Instead of having the clawback that was introduced by my honourable friend's government come back in one lump sum at the end of the year, now it will be moved up front and reflected each month in the pension cheques to the seniors of this country.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the budget document entitled "Budget Plan" states the basic principles for reforming OAS and GIS, and one is the provision of OAS benefits on the basis of family income, as is currently the case with the Guaranteed Income Supplement. It then indicates that there will be consultations with seniors and Canadians generally on the precise nature of needed changes when the paper is released later this year.

It appears to me that this change is fixed, that the decision has been made, and that OAS benefits will be paid on the basis of family income. If that is subject to change as a result of consultations, it will be good to know. It would be welcome if that were the case because the principle bears an unhappy resemblance to the Reform Party's approach to these matters, and, in particular, to the basis of their attitude that the husband is in control and women are chattels of husbands.

The honourable leader raised another matter concerning the clawback. Can the minister help me with this? If a person retires from a job in which he or she had an income over the threshold, would that person be subject to the clawback in the first year of retirement and receive no payments at all?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question precisely and will obtain an answer for my honourable friend.

As to the honourable senator's earlier comments, I cannot tell him that the principles will be changed. The Minister of Finance has indicated that the discussions in which he and the Minister of Human Resources Development have been involved over the past year will continue to take place with the assistance of seniors and guided by the principles set out in the budget last night. Neither my friend nor I can tell how those discussions will proceed; however, those are the principles under which they will proceed. These principles will be the guide in establishing the most secure and the best pension arrangements our country can provide our senior citizens.

I must say that my honourable friend lost me a bit when he talked about the husbands being in control and women as chattels. I do not believe that that has any place in any discussion or series of principles that would be brought forward by any government led by Jean Chrétien.

KINGSTON PRISON FOR WOMEN—BRUTAL CONDUCT OF EMERGENCY RESPONSE TEAM TOWARDS INMATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and pertains to the unconscionable and brutal conduct of officers of the Correctional Service of Canada as portrayed in the video taped at the prison for women recently.

This is not a unique experience. This is standard conduct for this emergency response team. In view of the fact that their conduct is now recorded on tape for public discussion, would the minister consider disbanding the emergency response team until completion of the investigation?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. As a result of the video tapes that came out a week ago, the Solicitor General has ordered a complete review of that incident. I will relay the comments of my honourable friend directly to him.

CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT—INQUIRY INTO CONDUCT—POSSIBILITY OF REINSTATEMENT

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the question of the Canadian Airborne Regiment.

The government has undertaken its own inquiry despite the fact it has disbanded the regiment at this time. If the findings are that the problems were not systemic but lay with just a few individuals, will the government be in a position to reinstate the Canadian Airborne Regiment?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my initial response is that one would not wish to prejudge the outcome of such an inquiry. The minister has taken decisive action in the case of the Airborne Regiment, and I should think his action speaks for itself.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, just last week the President of the United States thanked Canada and the Prime Minister for our contribution to the Gulf War. In the House of Commons Hansard of January 15, 1991, Mr. Chrétien, the Prime Minister, is reported as saying that if there is no war in the Gulf, our forces should stay, and if there is, they should be called back.

I served in the Royal Canadian Air Force. I find it upsetting that the Prime Minister of this country would come out with such confusing statements and be part of the decision to remove a Canadian regiment before an inquiry. Does the minister have any comment?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, my honourable friend can read Hansard if he wishes. Everyone in this house knows of the support, the encouragement and the confidence that this Prime Minister has demonstrated towards our armed forces and the work that they have done in Bosnia, Rwanda and Somalia.

Members of this house have participated in an excellent joint committee on a review of our defence policy. A white paper which drew heavily from that committee report has been produced. That paper sets out suggestions to redirect and recoordinate our military forces for the future so that they will be able to sustain the demands upon them as peacekeepers within the framework of the fiscal demands within this country. The Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister are extremely strong in their support of our forces.

As far as the Airborne Regiment is concerned, I can only repeat to my honourable friend that such a decision is not taken lightly. It is not taken just simply from the view of political correctness. It was taken with great care and seriousness, and I commend the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence for their decision.

CONSEQUENCES OF CUTS TO TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday, in his budget speech, the Minister of Finance made numerous references to flexible federalism. I would like to know if, in preparing this budget, your government took into account the economic impact cutting $1,623,000,000 in federal transfer payments will have on the various Canadian provinces?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am certain that the Minister of Finance, who has been labouring on this document for some time now, is very aware of the situation in Canada. It is for this reason that he has done everything within his power to achieve the reasonable though tough goals of bringing the federal deficit under control and propelling it into a downward trend, hopefully in the earliest possible time frame, leading to its total elimination in the years ahead. He has taken care to do this with a sense of fairness, balance and sensitivity to the situation in various parts of this country.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: Am I to understand that the financial implications to the provinces have been considered? If so, what are they?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance and those of his colleagues who have been involved in this process have crafted the budget very carefully. All are aware of the different situations that exist across this country, particularly the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, who has conducted a program review the likes of which I do not suppose we have had in an organized way in this country as part of a budget exercise. As you look through the budget, I believe you will see evidence that the regions have been treated fairly. The whole question of transfers to provinces will be carried out in discussions with those provinces. I believe that my honourable friend will find that process to be a positive exercise everywhere in Canada.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: If I may, honourable senators, I would like to restate my question in clear and unequivocal terms. You have assured me that your finance minister, in collaboration with his colleague, the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations, have reviewed and taken into account the financial implications of a $1,623,000,000 cut which, I remind the honourable minister, will not come about until next year. Could these reviews be communicated to me?

I understand that I will not be getting an answer today, but could these documents please be communicated to me?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, one of the things the federal government has done since coming to office is to tell the provinces that they will have the security of two years in the process of transfers between Ottawa and the provinces. Next year is the second year. That predictability will allow provincial governments to put together their own plans and their own programs in the knowledge of what the federal government is doing. That is something all provinces have appreciated, in one way or another.

My honourable friend will know that the Government of Canada has an obligation to the entire country. That obligation has been carried out by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister in this budget, as well as in a number of other efforts. It is all geared toward providing growth, jobs and economic stability in this country. That is the exercise in which we have been involved, and I believe we have conducted matters in the fairest way possible in terms of considering the provinces in recent years.

PRIVATIZATION OF CANADIAN NATIONAL— REOPENING OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH CANADIAN PACIFIC— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of Finance indicated yesterday that CN would be privatized. Does that mean they will be opening renegotiations with Canadian Pacific?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice and seek further information on it.

Senator Atkins: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. If the government intends to open discussions with Canadian Pacific, will they open the process to corporations or companies outside the borders of Canada?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question. However, I should note to my honourable friend that the item mentioned in the budget refers strictly to Canadian National.

SECOND READING

Hon. Len Marchand moved second reading of Bill C-60, respecting an agreement between Her Majesty in right of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian Band.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to address Bill C-60 the legislation on the Pictou Landing Indian Band Agreement Act.

Bill C-60 will give the force of law to two important provisions of the Boat Harbour Final Agreement. Specifically, it will ensure that the federal government will not be liable for any further damages or claims related to the operations of the effluent treatment facilities at Boat Harbour, Nova Scotia. As well, Bill C-60 will ensure that the government will not be held responsible for managing the compensation dollars paid to the Pictou Landing Micmac under the Boat Harbour Final Agreement.

Honourable senators, the Boat Harbour Final Agreement arose out of events that occurred in the mid-1960s when Scott Maritimes Limited opened a pulp and paper mill in Pictou Harbour. At that time, the provincial government selected the Boat Harbour estuary as the site for a facility to treat effluent from the mill. The province then negotiated with the federal government to secure the Pictou Landing Micmacs riparian rights on reserve lands adjacent to the estuary. Of course there is much more behind the story of Boat Harbour than the loss of riparian rights.

Soon after the treatment facilities opened, environmental problems began to arise and the quality of life on the reserve deteriorated. As well, the damming of the mouth of the tidal estuary flooded some 12 hectares of reserve land. Despite many appeals of the First Nation, the corrective action the provincial government took did not effectively correct the environmental problems.

In 1982, the First Nations submitted a specific claim to the federal government, arguing that the Crown had breached its fiduciary duty in surrendering the First Nation's riparian rights. Four years later, the Pictou Landing Micmac filed suit against the government, which led to the negotiation of an out-of-court settlement — the Boat Harbour Final Settlement Agreement — in July of 1993.

Honourable senators, this agreement includes a $20-million compensation package for losses and damages resulting from the operations of the treatment facility. Also included is a $15-million relocation fund. This $35-million settlement is considered by most parties to be a reasonable amount to settle this claim.

The compensation package includes an $8-million fund to be distributed among the members of the First Nation for individual compensation. As well, a continuing compensation fund, worth an additional $9.725 million, has been established to address special claims by members of the First Nation related to the Boat Harbour environmental problems. Other funds have been set up to support projects which will benefit the First Nation and to support the possible relocation of the Pictou Landing community.

In return for this compensation package, Canada has been released from all responsibility and liability for past, present and future effects related to the Boat Harbour treatment facility. However, a key provision of the final agreement was that legislation be enacted to ensure that this compensation package is the sole source of restitution for claims related to Boat Harbour.

To ensure that this is the case, Bill C-60 provides that claims that go beyond the scope of the $8-million individual compensation fund can be made only against a continuing compensation fund. From the federal government's perspective, this guarantees that $35 million is the full amount it will pay related to the Boat Harbour claim. This provision of Bill C-60 also protects the Pictou Landing Micmac against similar types of claims by limiting them to the amount available in the continuing compensation fund.

The second provision of the final agreement which is legislated through Bill C-60 is the government's commitment to ensure that settlement funds are not Indian moneys as defined by the Indian Act. This stipulation confirms that the First Nation, and not the federal government, is responsible for the moneys once they have been transferred. In addition to giving the Pictou Landing Micmac complete control over their compensation dollars, this reduces the administrative responsibilities of the government.

Honourable senators, Bill C-60 is essentially an administrative bill which confirms and formalizes some elements of an agreement which has already been implemented. Nevertheless, it is important both for what it achieves and for what it stands for. Bill C-60 achieves legal certainty that neither the government of Canada nor the Pictou Landing Micmac will be liable for any future claims related to the operations of the Boat Harbour treatment facility. It also achieves legal certainty that the government will never be held responsible for the management or dispensation of settlement funds.

What Bill C-60 stands for is equally important. This legislation is further evidence of the government's intention to live up to the commitments which have been made to First Nations people. The honour of the Crown must be upheld and promises must be kept if the federal government is to build a new partnership with aboriginal peoples.

The Boat Harbour final agreement is already bringing many benefits to the Pictou Landing Micmac, including improved living conditions and the opportunity to relocate away from the waste treatment site. We are simply being asked to give some elements of this agreement the force of law to ensure the future protection of both the Crown and the First Nation. This is not an unreasonable request. In fact, it makes a great deal of sense for everyone involved.

Honourable senators, I ask that you join me in supporting Bill C-60 so that it can be proclaimed into law as soon as possible.

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words about this bill. Senator Marchand has pretty well covered the contents of the bill itself and the specific parts of the agreement. I am one who has lived and — if senators will pardon the pun — breathed the Boat Harbour situation for many years, along with other members of this house including Senator MacEachen, Senator Graham, Senator Marchand and Senator De Bané. We were all very much involved over the years in the problems at Boat Harbour. Those problems certainly are not totally resolved by this bill, but I think it will go a long way toward compensating the Pictou Landing Indian band for the problems caused by Boat Harbour over the years.

I will not go into the details; Senator Marchand has already done that. I certainly do commend this bill to every member of the Senate. One of the intriguing and very important parts of this bill is that it will in no way impinge upon the Pictou band's Indian moneys. That has already been pointed out by Senator Marchand. This fund is separate and apart. The bill will set up a trust fund, part of which will be a compensation fund for other claims against the trust fund.

I wish to commend the bill to the members of the Senate. It is an important bill, in terms of the Pictou Landing Indian band. I also wish to commend the work done by the former federal government in initiating the mandate to ensure that the agreement was finalized, and also to commend the current government in recognizing the importance of concluding this matter and concluding the agreement which will result in this $35-million trust fund set up for the Indian band at Pictou Landing. I urge my colleagues on both sides to support the bill and pass it expeditiously.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Len Marchand: With that kind of support, is the disposition that the bill go to third reading directly, without the committee studying it? What is the wish?

Senator Berntson: Refer it to committee.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Marchand, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John G. Bryden moved the second reading of Bill C-59, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-59, to amend the Income Tax Act, will put into law several measures announced in the 1994 Budget. All these measures are largely familiar to most Canadians, and most of them have been incorporated in the tax planning of Canadians for the 1994 and subsequent taxation years.

• (1510)

The rationale for these measures is well known and, indeed, has been stated clearly and further advanced by the budget of the Minister of Finance which he presented yesterday afternoon. Because of the passage of time, and with the tabling of the budget for 1995, these measures are old news. Nevertheless, they have worked their way through the system to this place and require our careful attention. I will now deal briefly with some of the measures in this bill.

First, Bill C-59 eliminates the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. However, gains accruing up to last February 22 will continue to be eligible for the exemption, if an individual so elects in his tax return filed for the 1994 year.

Second, the premium paid by an employer for an employee's life insurance will be subject to tax. Currently, the premium on the first $25,000 of life insurance is not subject to tax. This bill puts both employees and self-employed Canadians in the same tax position with regard to life insurance premiums.

Third, this bill subjects the age credit to an income test. Currently, all Canadians 65 and over receive a credit that reduces their combined federal-provincial tax by about $950 a year. Under this bill, individuals with net incomes below $25,921 will retain the full credit. Those with incomes between $25,921 and $49,134 will have their credit reduced by 15 per cent of their net income exceeding $25,921. The 6 per cent of seniors with net incomes over $49,134 will no longer receive the age credit. This provision is to be phased in over the 1994 and 1995 taxation years, with one-half taking effect in 1994 and the remainder in 1995.

Fourth, Bill C-59 extends, on an ongoing basis, the RRSP-based Home Buyers' Plan. First-time home buyers can withdraw up to $20,000 tax free from their RRSPs to buy a house and repay the money over 15 years. Up until last February, about 234,000 people had participated, and an additional 30,000 are expected to take advantage of the program annually in the future.

Fifth, until now, taxpayers received a credit of 17 per cent on the first $250 of charitable donations, and a 29 per cent credit thereafter. This bill lowers the threshold from $250 to $200.

While the above five measures relate to individual taxpayers, this bill also deals with a number of measures that relate to business and corporate taxation.

First, Bill C-59 reduces the tax deduction for eligible business meals and entertainment expenses to 50 per cent from 80 per cent.

Second, this bill tightens up the flow-through of tax deductible losses from certain tax shelters and thereby prevents claiming greater losses than the cost of their investment in a sheltered partnership, for example, by requiring the excess loss to be reported as a capital gain.

Third, this bill extends the rules that restricted cross-border so-called "butterfly transactions" to all purchase "butterfly transactions." By the way, a "butterfly transaction" allows a corporate property to be divided pro rata among its shareholders on a tax deferred basis, resulting in many people paying no tax at all. Thus, we removed the butterfly advantage from all corporate asset sales.

Fourth, Bill C-59 eliminates or reduces regional investment tax credits. The special investment tax credit and the regional component, Atlantic-Gaspé, of the scientific research and experimental development tax credit will be eliminated. The Atlantic investment tax credit rate will be reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. These provisions do not apply to projects under construction before last February 22 or property contracted for before February 22, 1994.

Fifth, there is a provision in the bill to prevent large corporations with $15 million of capital or more from taking advantage of the small business deduction.

Sixth, under the current income tax rules, mine reclamation expenses are deductible only in the year in which they are incurred. This bill allows a deduction for contributions to government mandated mine reclamation trust funds in the year in which they are made.

Honourable senators, this very briefly summarizes the provisions in Bill C-59. Although with yesterday's budget some of these provisions now appear less than exciting, nevertheless, they form an important basis on which yesterday's budget and future budgets will build. I therefore ask for the full support of all honourable senators for this bill.

On motion of Senator Berntson, for Senator Oliver, debate adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John G. Bryden moved the second reading of Bill C-216, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service).

He said: Honourable senators, Senator Gigantès rose to speak about this bill during Senators' Statements. Because he had to leave the house, he asked that I move second reading of the bill.

The purpose of this bill is to remove an oversight and an inequity which prevents a person who is on unemployment insurance from continuing to participate in that program if, indeed, they are called for jury duty, because that would make that person unavailable for employment. I am happy to support this bill. It was sponsored in the other place over a period of a couple of years by a fellow New Brunswicker. I would ask that honourable senators support this bill.

PRIVATE BILL

CERTIFIED GENERAL ACCOUNTANTS' ASSOCIATION—
SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Michael Kirby moved second reading of Bill S-8, to amend the Act of incorporation of the Certified General Accountants' Association of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill S-8 is to modernize the act of incorporation of the Certified General Accountants' Association of Canada, commonly known as the CGA-Canada. This bill brings up to date an 83-year-old statute in terms of its language and concepts as well as in terms of its structure and detail. Bill S-8 does not make any fundamental change to the structure, character, nature or activities of CGA-Canada, nor is CGA-Canada seeking new or expanded powers by this bill.

• (1520)

The Certified General Accountant's Association of Canada is the national professional body of 4,700 certified general accountants. It represents one quarter of Canada's professional accountants. The national organization, which was first formed in Montreal 88 years ago, has affiliated associations in every province and both territories. In two provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia, the CGA is the largest professional accounting body.

Certified general accountants are employed in all aspects of the accounting profession: government, industry and commerce. They are public practitioners as well, providing counselling to numerous small- and medium-sized businesses.

The success of the CGAs in Canada is mirrored in their success worldwide. As many developing nations and former East Bloc countries begin active participation in the global economy, they quickly realize that a sophisticated accounting profession is essential to economic integrity, financial credibility and commercial success. The search for a way to deliver the necessary education and training has led many of these countries to the door of CGA Canada.

It is interesting to note that CGAs have become this country's leading exporter of professional accounting experience. Recently, CGA Canada signed agreements with eight major universities in the People's Republic of China and four universities in Vietnam to provide the CGA training program in those countries. In Hong Kong, the program is presently offered through the School of Professional and Continuing Education at the University of Hong Kong. In addition, the CGA offers programs overseas in the Bahamas, Bermuda, and various countries of Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

CGAs sit on the major working committees and the Council of the International Federation of Accountants — the United Nations of the world's accounting profession. They sit on the International Accounting Standards Committee, the international body seeking to harmonize accounting standards so that accountants speak worldwide with one financial language. CGA-Canada has been accredited by the Department of Foreign Affairs to represent the Canadian profession in several international venues, including committees of the OECD and the United Nations.

Bill S-8 will enable CGA-Canada to continue its significant work at the national and international level of the accounting profession by modernizing their incorporating act, bringing it up to date. That act is 88 years old and has not been changed in that period of time.

This bill also provides CGA-Canada with a French counterpart for its English name. Since one-third of Canada's CGAs are francophone, this bill will allow the national association of CGAs to be designated in French as "comptables généraux agréés." The CGAs current governing statute of incorporation provides no French counterpart to the English name, clearly an oversight that needs correction. I bring the issue of the French name to your particular attention because the current act effectively prevents the CGA association from using its correct French name in its national and international dealings because it is not included in the act. This omission has created many difficulties for CGA-Canada at the international level. The granting of an official name in French is being sought solely in respect of the national association and in no way infringes upon provincial legislation. Neither does the granting of a French name for the national association infringe upon provincial authority to stipulate what designation may be used by persons practising accounting within their province.

In short, honourable senators, this bill updates an act that is 88 years old. The CGA does important work. It is for these reasons that I recommend passage of this act by the Senate.

REVIEWING CANADA'S FOREIGN POLICY

RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT TO REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 16, 1995:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the government's response to the recommendation of the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee Reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy, tabled in the Senate on February 14, 1995.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise in this place where I have been welcomed so warmly. I want to thank you all for easing my transition in what I consider as one of the most important moves in my life.

Indeed, upon my arrival, I was greeted with praise from my leader, the Honourable Joyce Fairbairn, and a very friendly reception from all of you. I was also greeted with rather phlegmatic and satiric comments, from the Leader of the Opposition in particular. This reminded me that we are not unlike a family. I was pleased to notice that, while some people may be mildly irritating and annoying, the majority of those I have dealt with until now were very pleasant, and I am truly fascinated by the society we live in.

I have had three careers so far. I was a school trustee for 12 years in Ottawa. I was involved in the Ontario education sector. I started back in 1960 to try and convince governments of the desirability of French-language schools in Ontario.

I must tell you that when I left in 1972, I was pretty happy with our success because we had managed to have a French-language elementary and secondary system established in Ontario. I am therefore very proud of the progress made, but there is still a way to go, and, even today, improvements are required to ensure equity between the two official language groups in terms of education across Canada, and particularly in Ontario, where I was born.

Ontario has yet to give its francophone minority governance over schools, despite the fact that, for the past 13 years, this country has had a new constitution, which guarantees official language minorities the right to school governance and the right to their own schools.

Claims that the French Canadian minority in Ontario is having problems should come as no surprise. The rate of illiteracy is very high. In Ontario, 31 per cent of the francophone population is illiterate. The figure is 16 per cent for the anglophone majority. The discrepancy is quite significant and warrants attention. The rate of assimilation for francophones in Ontario is 40 per cent.

This is distressing because if the rate of assimilation remains unchanged, there will be no need to talk of separation. It will happen ipso facto. French will be spoken and respected in Quebec, and English will be spoken everywhere else in Canada. A strong and united Canada is a Canada where people respect others' right to speak in the language of their choice and where life is good, in both English and French.

I became a member of Parliament in 1972 and was appointed to the Senate in November 1994. I had the honour of representing one of the most privileged ridings in the nation's capital. Ottawa—Vanier is a riding where you find a mix of linguistic, as well as socio-ethno-cultural groups, where people live in harmony, where the rich get along with the poor, and where Rockcliffe is right next door toVanier and Overbrook. That riding is in the heart of the nation's capital and is a vibrant reflection of the country. Ottawa-Vanier has the largest number of bilingual people; indeed, 57 per cent of the residents speak both official languages. I was born in that riding and I spent my whole life there trying to understand the reluctance of the majority to recognize the validity of the claims made by official language minority groups.

I have had good times as member for Ottawa—Vanier, but I also experienced difficult situations. On the positive side, I could always feel the support of my constituents. I am extremely proud of that and I thank them from the bottom of my heart.

There are several concrete examples of that complicity between myself and my voters. Let me simply say that there are initiatives which still exist, and which will continue to exist for a long time, such as buildings, monuments and museums, including some which benefit Canadian society as a whole, such as educational or learning institutions of which all Canadians are proud.

Honourable senators, I simply wanted to take a few moments to reflect on the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy.

I am pleased to be able to speak on this topic and am especially pleased that the government generously accepted most of our recommendations, giving us hope that things will soon change.

As you know, I had the pleasure of co-chairing this committee with the Honourable Allan MacEachen. I must tell you from the start that our report is the fruit of vast consultations country-wide. We met close to 500 groups, whose representatives came before us to state their opinion on the future of this country's foreign affairs. We held 70 hearings. We received 550 briefs. The committee members worked very hard, and I must commend each of them for taking part in this democratic exercise.

I was very proud to work with so many members from every party — from the Liberal Party, the Progressive Conservative Party, the Bloc populaire — I meant the Bloc Québécois — and the New Democratic Party. The Bloc populaire brings back memories for me. My grandfather, Philippe Gauthier, lived with us in Sandy Hill; someone drew a big block on the street because he was a member of the Bloc populaire in the fifties.

We hope that our report — and the government's response is encouraging — can serve as a point of reference at the dawn of the twenty-first century.

After much reflection, the government tabled its Foreign Policy Statement, which is quite lengthy, but nevertheless adequate.

The government shares our view that Canadians would like our country to maintain its international commitments. Our prosperity, our security and the influence of our values and culture are at stake. Now is not the time to turn inward in the name of a principle which I might call "putting our house in order." Certainly we must tackle our domestic problems directly and courageously, especially in regard to public expenditure and deficit reduction. However, at the same time, we must acknowledge that a more prosperous, just and equitable society is achieved within a more prosperous, just and equitable world. I am therefore very pleased that the government wishes to focus its energies on three main objectives which are, to remind you, firstly, fostering growth and employment; secondly, safeguarding our security within a stable global framework; and thirdly, promoting Canadian values and culture.

Canada's new foreign policy innovates in several sectors. It clearly underlines the importance of trade and investment in achieving economic prosperity and creating jobs for Canadians and formulates a broader concept of security that includes non-traditional threats to peace and stability such as environmental degradation — which, as you know, threatens our own security by giving rise to uncontrolled migrations, for instance. In all its operations, the government will endeavour to address these issues in a consistent way.

Promoting Canadian values and culture both overseas and here in Canada becomes one of the pillars of our foreign policy. Our values, such as respect for human rights and the rule of law, are essential to our security and our economy, since international acceptance of these values would increase stability around the world. Our foreign policy will celebrate Canadian culture and know-how and use them ot promote our interests. The success of Canadian higher education and culture at the international level will also contribute to our prosperity.

The government gave itself an official development assistance framework within the broader framework of the Canadian foreign policy. This way, the various foreign policy instruments, such as trade and assistance policies and programs, are now fully integrated.

On the eve of the 21st century, the people of Canada cannot expect to achieve their national goals if they do not stick together. As a strong and united nation, Canada has greatly contributed to making this world a better place to live in. As a strong and united nation, Canada will fulfil our aspirations and our children's aspirations. As a strong and united nation, Canada will remain a symbol of peace, tolerance and internationalism in a world in want of peace, tolerance and internationalism. Our government's foreign policy will serve a strong and united Canada and strengthen our union. These make for sound bases that every member of this place can approve.

Honourable senators, I would like to elaborate on this foreign policy as certain aspects of this new policy thrust are of great interest to me and great importance for the development of our country.

If we take only the area of culture, the impact and importance of this industry are enormous. I know that we have a number of people in this chamber with a specific interest in this field. I share their enthusiasm and their desire to tell Canadians about the importance of arts and culture and what the issues are.

As you know, 600,000 jobs in this country are created by these two components: arts and culture. We absolutely must continue to encourage our artists. This morning, in my district, I met a group called Théâtre Action that wants to set up a French theatre in the national capital. They are having a few problems and need support. I wish that we in Canada could make young people and the not so young feel they enjoy public support, because I am convinced that Canadian performers are our best ambassadors on the international scene.

In the report we submitted to Parliament, we recommended that from time to time government ministers or presidents of federal agencies when travelling outside the country should be accompanied by members of the arts community in order to show the world that we in Canada have something that is very very strong and very marketable. I say this because I know that the French do this regularly.

Recently I saw the President of France who was accompanied by a famous French performer on a trip to sell the TGV. In Africa I saw French government representatives who were always travelling with French performers. There is no reason why the Canadian government should not do likewise and encourage members of the arts community in this way and occasionally take steps to make them better known outside the country.

In concluding, honourable senators, I simply want to say that there is a great deal in this report, and I hope you will take an interest in the subject. This is very important, and I will get back to this some other time. I will certainly find another occasion to bring this up again.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: In your committee's study, of course, you examined the question of international assistance. I wonder whether you could explain briefly what the joint committee thinks Canada's contribution to international assistance should be. On page 106 of the Finance Minister's budget plan, regarding the International Assistance Envelope, it is said that expenditures will be reduced by $532 million in the coming years.

Could you explain, from the point of view of the joint committee, the principles on which Canada's contribution to international assistance is based?

Second, what percentage of our resources should be earmarked for developing countries?

Senator Gauthier: Canada's envelope for international assistance to developing countries amounts to roughly $2.6 billion, divided roughly as follows: $600 million to financial institutions, $2 billion to international development assistance, 47 per cent to Africa, about 15 per cent to South America and the rest to Asian countries.

We recommended that assistance to Africa be maintained and, possibly, improved if this ever becomes possible. We also recommended that our presence in South America be increased because this would allow us to make the more palpable improvements.

What percentage would it be? Of course, the target set by Mr. Pearson some years ago was 0.7 per cent of the GDP. That target has not been reached. The best we ever managed was in 1993, when we reached 0.4 per cent. That is not bad compared to the others members of the OECD, for example, where we rank fairly high.

The government, in its wisdom, did not accept the committee's recommendation to maintain or freeze international assistance at 0.4 per cent and perhaps try to reach the targetted 0.7 per cent when the Canadian economy had recovered and we could afford it.

I must say I was a little disappointed. It may be what was announced yesterday. I will have to check what was said exactly. I knew that cuts of over $400 million would be made in development aid. I admit I have to examine that more closely, but I know the committee was not happy with the government's response regarding international aid.

Could you give me your first question again, Senator Kinsella?

Senator Kinsella: Certainly, Senator Gauthier. My question was about the vision or principles which formed the basis for the committee's studies.

Senator Gauthier: The committee had made recommendations about fundamental principles to be applied to development aid. We even recommended to draft legislation so that all Canadians would know exactly what is, for example, the role of CIDA in development aid. The government was reluctant to legislate with respect to CIDA. Instead, it will undertake to negotiate just how accountable these federal agencies should be, and perhaps also how transparent. In other words, it will determine how they work so that Parliament can know exactly how their funds are spent. I know we are far from the goal in that area. Those agencies must be more accountable and transparent. Maybe the committee should follow up on this recommendation and pressure the government to demand accountability and transparency. I agree with you that the debate must be pursued.

On motion of Senator Andreychuk, debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET 1995

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 22, 1995:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.

She said: Honourable senators, I will yield the floor today to Senator Murray.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, our friend Senator Spivak has indicated that she will be speaking on this matter at a later day and has encouraged me to launch the debate today.

I must explain that my observations of the budget are not nearly as comprehensive as they might have been had I had more time to do more research and to prepare. However, I do have some comments to make which I hope might stimulate debate and elicit a response from the government side on several important aspects of the budget tabled yesterday by the Honourable Minister of Finance.

The overnight reaction of the financial markets to Mr. Martin's budget, according to reports, has been largely positive — "Very good," says Senator Olson — to the extent that this reaction and response by the financial markets, over time, will be translated into a stronger dollar and lower interest rates. These developments, of course, will be good for the Canadian economy and will be welcomed by all Canadians.

That being said, I have to point out that the minister himself, in his interest rate projections yesterday, expected that interest rates over the course of 1995 will be higher than they are today. If you examine his short-term forecasts of interest rates and, notably, his longer-term forecast for this year, you will see that for the short term he projects interest rates at 8.5 per cent, and for the long term at 9.7 per cent. The bank rate today is at 8.02 per cent, a drop of some 36 basis points from yesterday. Whether it is out of an abundance of caution, as he would have it, or by reason of some more detailed analysis, it is clear the minister expects interest rates from now to the end of this year to rise.

Honourable senators, I ask the question: What will be the economic impact of this budget in general? I do not think anyone would argue that this budget is a stimulative budget in the traditional sense. To what extent then might it have a dampening effect on economic growth? I am not well enough schooled in economics to give an expert reply to that question. However, the raw numbers speak for themselves: $25.3 billion dollars in expenditure reductions over three years; $3.7 billion in tax increases over the same period. Those amounts are coming out of the economy.

Senator Olson: That is a seven-to-one ratio.

Senator Murray: If you look at the components of the reductions, it is pretty clear that the reductions, in economic terms, will bear more heavily on certain sectors and on certain places in this country. The most obvious example is the decline of 45,000 people in federal employment. Then, of course, there is the very substantially reduced support for agriculture. Gone is the Crow rate. Down are the dairy subsidies, not to mention the very considerable reduction in the safety net as represented by GRIP and NISA, and so forth. I believe there was a 30 per cent reduction and a vague promise of some replacement, unspecified and unstated, for these agricultural support programs.

Then there is a $211 million hit over three years for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans; a $227-million reduction in the regional agencies; $2.6 billion from the Department of Transport, including the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Provinces Freight Rates Assistance Act. The MFRA has been a part of the Maritime economy since 1927. Now it has gone.

One of the more interesting and least specific items in a rather vague recitation of departmental cuts is the $2.8 billion coming out of the Department of Human Resources. The budget plan is, however, clear in indicating that most of that $2.8 billion will come out of the Canada Jobs Strategy. Then there are further base closures in British Columbia, Alberta and elsewhere.

Honourable senators, this money is being taken out of the economy. It is bound to have an economic impact. It is bound to have an impact on unemployment and economic growth which will be more severe in some sectors and in some places in this country. I have not yet seen an analysis. I do not believe the Department of Finance has published any such analysis. However, we can be certain that we will be hearing a great deal more about it from the sectors and the localities affected over the next year and more.

Within the next 13 months — that is, by 1996-97 — program spending will be $10.4 billion less than in the fiscal year coming to an end next month, 1994-95. More than $4 billion of this will come out of the cash transfers to provinces for medicare, post-secondary education and welfare under the new Canada Social Transfer.

Among the lockups they had yesterday, there was one for representatives of opposition political parties, and I was there on behalf of the Conservative Party. I had an opportunity to ask questions and get clarification from the officials on some of these matters. They confirmed that the reduction in the transfers to the provinces for Medicare, post-secondary education and welfare, as announced yesterday, are on top of the reductions contained in last year's budget. I remind honourable senators that last year from these programs they cut $466 million for the fiscal year 1995-96 and, as they said, at least $1.5 billion for the fiscal year 1996-97. These are big sums of money. I am not here to bleed for provincial treasuries. A lot of the media attention has been on the difficulties of the provincial governments in absorbing these reductions.

Honourable senators, they will not absorb them in the usual sense of the term. There is no way that reductions of this magnitude will not hurt at the level of the recipients of these benefits and services. You can expect that it will hurt at the level of the most vulnerable — welfare recipients, students, the sick, the unemployed.

Take the Atlantic provinces, for example. During the lockup yesterday, I received a document which I think is generally available. It is called "Budget 1995" and it has a table indicating the probable amounts of entitlements to the provinces for these programs — that is to say, medicare, post-secondary education and welfare as they exist today and as they will exist in 1996-97. You will find that in the Atlantic provinces, 13 months from now, there will be $233 million less in federal funding for medicare, post-secondary education and welfare than there is today. This will be difficult to absorb. The recipients will hurt because, as we know, those provinces, like provinces elsewhere in the country, are already implementing quite severe cuts in all of those programs.

I am not as familiar as I should be with what is happening in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. However, I do know that the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick governments have been making very substantial compressions in their budgets for health and social programs, most notably for health.

Honourable senators, I say this with some affection, but an unholy alliance has grown up around here in the last couple of months between the Department of Finance and the folks who are in charge of federal-provincial relations. They have managed to convince each other that, in one fell swoop, they can solve the fiscal problem and win the referendum at the same time; that this massive offloading in the guise of decentralization can be dressed up as flexible federalism and sold in Quebec and elsewhere.

It is the height of political naïveté for anyone to think that drastically reduced federal contributions for health, for post-secondary education and for welfare will reinforce the sense of belonging to Canada in Quebec or in any other part of the country. That is highly naive.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the honourable senator's time has expired. Does the honourable senator have the unanimous consent of the Senate to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: I will try not to abuse the privilege that the house has given to me.

These cuts, of course, are related. Severe cuts in unemployment insurance will place greater strain on the welfare budgets in the provinces.

What do we find in relation to unemployment insurance? Unemployment insurance reforms, which will be announced in some detail at some future date by Mr. Axworthy, will reduce UI by $700 million in 1996-97. This is on top of the cuts that were announced last February. In last February's budget, the government took $725 million out of UI for 1994-95 and $2.4 billion per year thereafter. These are sizeable cuts.

What the UI program will look like in the future, we do not know. It will certainly be a radically different UI program; leaner and certainly meaner. When I compare the changes made by the previous government to the unemployment insurance system during our second mandate, chiefly to transfer funds from passive to active support for the unemployed, it occurs to me that the severity of those changes brought in by the Conservative government pale in comparison to what is being done by the present government.

How well I recall the outrage of honourable senators opposite. Will anyone ever forget the travelling road show, the committee that travelled all over the country to hear the views of Canadians about these changes? Will anyone ever forget them?

Hon. Anne C. Cools: We did not travel all over the country. We went east. You and your government would not let us travel all over the country.

Senator Murray: I have an offer for my honourable friend: We should reconstitute that committee so far as possible with the same members, and when Mr. Axworthy brings in his reforms and we have the legislation before us, my honourable friend can go to Canso again, as she did with the previous committee, and to other places in the east and explain and defend what is happening. See for yourself how these reforms are biting, because they will bite very severely for the unemployed in this country.

It is obvious to everyone that cuts of this kind in unemployment insurance, medicare, post-secondary education and welfare will have a disproportionate impact on the poorer regions of this county and will put a greater strain on the budget of these poorer provinces. We all know that.

Senator MacEachen told us a few years ago, during the NAFTA debate, that it was always fair and necessary for parliamentarians to consider who the losers would be in any government policy or government measure. Well, we could make quite a list of losers from this budget, and other honourable senators will deal with specific aspects. It is fair to say that the government has wasted a year.

Time and again in the budget speech, we heard the phrase "getting government right"; that they will get government right. Honourable senators, they have not managed to get government right and, in particular, they have social policy wrong, wrong, wrong.

On January 31, 1994, Mr. Axworthy stood in the House of Commons and announced reform of social policy. I invite you to go back and read the speech, although today it makes rather sad reading. He was to reform six or seven areas of social policy, only one of which, by the way, was entirely within the jurisdiction of the federal government. However, it was his intention to do it. He set out a timetable, which of course has gone by the board because the whole exercise has collapsed. He tried to say that his social security review was not fiscally driven. Three weeks later, Mr. Martin brought in his February 1994 budget in which he booked the savings from the social security review two years down the road.

Mr. Axworthy is one of the most experienced and capable ministers on the other side. He should have seen the handwriting on the wall. His whole exercise was overtaken by Mr. Martin in his 1994 budget three weeks after he had announced it. Despite that fact, Mr. Axworthy took us through this elaborate routine for almost a year of hearings, briefs, speeches and communications plans, all relating to social security review. However, nothing has happened.

Then we come up to Mr. Martin's 1995 budget, and in a classic improvisation, we have unilateral cuts imposed upon the provinces and upon the recipients. Mr. Martin has the temerity to say that there will be consultation when, in fact, he has already determined the outcome of the consultation in his budget.

There is no plan with regard to social security. There is no vision. There is no concept of the government's social responsibility. Even allowing for the seriousness of the fiscal situation in the country, it need not have happened this way. They wasted a year, when a joint approach with the provinces would surely have produced a more considered and realistic plan.

Well might we consider who the losers are from this budget, because they are generally the most vulnerable people in the country. Our old friend, the former Speaker of this place, when he was named Governor General of Canada, chose as his motto a Latin phrase which, translated into English, reads, "Always remember those whom society tends to forget." Far be it from me to try to bring the Governor General back into the partisan fray, but I could not help but wonder this morning what His Excellency must be thinking.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, as I listened, it became clear to me, for the first time, how the Tory government got us into such a mess. Every time they produced a new budget, it was always amazing to me that they looked at only one side of the ledger, the spend side, and never seemed to have any concern whatever for the revenue side or the balance between the two.

Earlier today, Senator Murray, who was one of the leading lights, the chief economist in that government —

Senator Balfour: The only one.

Senator Olson: — went through the whole analysis of the budget without once mentioning the resources. We have to look after all of the financial requirements of the federal government. All he talked about was the cuts. When his party was in office, all they ever talked about was the spending on the one side of the ledger. They never even considered from where it was to come.

The inevitable conclusion of that nine years is absolutely horrendous. The total federal debt when the Tories took office in 1984, after approximately 120 years of Confederation, was a little under $200 billion. That includes paying for two world wars and the Korean war: the total accumulated debt was about $200 billion, or a little less.

Senator Tkachuk: A little more.

Senator Olson: No, a little less. Nine years later, after the Tories had been in office, the debt was over $500 billion. Their management, in nine years, borrowed twice as much money as all previous governments in Canadian history. That is a disgraceful record.

The honourable senator asks a number of questions: Why are we doing this? Why is the Minister of Finance doing this to some program or another? The simple truth is that you have to cut them all.

Senator Murray: Tell us about agriculture.

Senator Olson: I will come to that topic. I recommend to Senator Murray and several senators opposite something published by the Department of Finance called "Budget Plan, 1995." It does not matter how you add it up.

By the way, Senator Tkachuk's question is answered in there as well. He wants to see what the seven-to-one ratio is. Senator Murray pointed directly to what the increased revenue will be and what the total amount of the cuts will be, and it is about a seven-to-one ratio. It is in this little book that was sent to honourable senators' offices. It was certainly sent to my office and to Senator Murray's office, so he must have received it as well.

• (1620)

Perhaps honourable senators would like me to be more specific, but I am not sure they want me to talk about all of it.

Senator Hastings: Read the book.

Senator Olson: The senator also talked about getting it right. There is no question about it; it is there in chart form with an explanation. You can find it in several ways.

During those nine years, The Tories sank Canada into a morass of debt and actually put the Canadian financial structure in jeopardy. That is why interest rates keep moving up. It is important to remember that the Tories took over on September 17, 1984. That fiscal year goes all the way around to April. They were in office for more than half of that year. What did they do about correcting the deficit problem? They did nothing; they made the situation worse. That is exactly what happened.

Canadians understand that we need a tough budget, a difficult budget. There is no question that we must cut expenses. You do not need to be a rocket scientist or a great economist such as Senator Murray to understand that fact. Canadians realize that we are in such a financial mess and that a tough budget is required.

Honourable senators, there will be another tough budget next year as well because this government is determined to achieve, in the eyes of Canadians and the world's financial establishment, a sense that Canada will be a financially sound and stable country. That will take more than one year.

I do not understand how Senator Murray could raise his litany of complaints without mentioning that resources are gone. Why did he not tell us that it is now costing more money to service the debt — that is, the debt service charges on the amount of money the Conservatives borrowed over nine years — than the total cost of the Old Age Security Act — $42 billion.

Senator Murray: Did you just find that out?

Senator Olson: No, I have known it for some time.

Senator Murray: You simply did not tell us.

Senator Olson: I pointed it out before, but I do not have as many opportunities to make this speech as I used to have.

Senator Murray wanted to talk a little bit about farm support. That worries me. It is troubling.

Senator Murray: What do they say in Medicine Hat?

Senator Olson: They say that we should get our financial house in order first. Only then can we have confidence in Canada's future.

It is true, honourable senators, that farmers are not happy with, for example, the termination of the WGTA. That is not good.

Senator Gustafson: It amounts to at least $6 billion.

Senator Olson: You can use those funny numbers on the one side, but where will the money come from? That is the question. Canada must slow the pace of borrowing money and must stop its slide into debt. In Medicine Hat they say two other things — cut expenses and increase taxes only as a last resource. That is what the budget does.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What about the GST?

Senator Olson: Just a minute. I should like to finish off by talking about farm subsidies. Let us talk about the rest of the farm safety net, especially the WGTA. It is the successor to the Crow benefit. Do honourable senators know why the Crow benefit was instituted in the first place? It was instituted by a Liberal government, and $720 million per year was made available. The so-called "Crow benefit" was an undertaking by the railways to deliver grain to point of export in perpetuity in exchange for about $40 million acres of land in Western Canada.

An oil company called Pan Canadian is based on land grants that were given in exchange for the Crow benefit. They got the mineral rights. By the way, that company showed a profit last year of several hundred million dollars. Had I known that Senator Murray was making a speech today, I would have looked up the precise number. I think the figure is about $400 million. That was based on the assets that Canada gave to the railways for hauling grain under the so-called "Crow benefit." Who started to whittle away at that fund of $720 million? I had better keep this in order.

Honourable senators, if you are to cut things from one side of the ledger, you had better cut from the other side as well. In other words, in exchange for the 40 million acres, there was a contractual arrangement to haul grain to point of export in perpetuity. Look up your history. The assets given to CP are still there. They are profitable. Why are we now letting them out of the deal?

Senator Murray: What do you suggest?

Senator Olson: If honourable senators don't mind, I am making this speech, and I should like to place before you my arguments in the order I choose.

In any event, there was an agreement on both sides.

When I was a part of the federal government, it knew very well that there needed to be a sense of justice in this matter. We could not let the railway get away with charging farmers the full price. We have a difficulty delivering grain for export with respect to our most important competitor, the United States. They ship most of their grain down the Missouri and Mississippi river systems and load it at New Orleans. Who pays that cost? The United States Army Engineers pay for the operation and maintenance of that waterway. When the United States complains that we have a little subsidy for hauling grain out of the most inland portion of Canada, we should remind them of that.

Senator Gustafson: Why did we cave into them?

Senator Olson: That is what I am asking. Why did the Conservative government three years ago begin reducing the amount paid? It was $720 million. The following year, it became $640 million. Last year — the last year the Tories were in office — it was down to $560 million. It was on a very steep decline.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Where is it going now?

Senator Berntson: Not as steep as it is today.

Senator Olson: The senators on the other side of the floor should read this book. There is $1.6 billion in the budget plan to pay farmers in exchange for termination of existing arrangements.

Did you notice that, Senator Berntson? Do you know which page? I can find it for you.

I do not quite agree with my government in this area. However, it is better than the Tories could do. I think the time will come when we will need that deal that was made with the railways to remain competitive in the world market. I do not think the United States will change how it delivers grain to New Orleans for export.

We will work on that. In the meantime, however, we must get our financial house in order. There is no doubt that the farmers had to take their share of the hit to get things in order.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senator, I must inform you that your time has expired.

Is it agreed that the honourable senator continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The pages are not numbered in this book, which is probably deliberate.

Senator Olson: I thank honourable senators.

I wish to come back to some of these historical facts. They are difficult for both sides, and it seems to me that we should now be cooperating. I am amazed at how infrequently the present Minister of Finance and other members of the government bring up the past and the mess the Tories got us into. I am not so generous.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It goes back to 1969. Bring it back.

Senator Olson: The electors realized what the Tories had done to our financial system and turned them all out. Perhaps that is enough. However, this government is not very critical of the previous government. They created $300 billion of additional debt and the debt service charges that go with it, all in nine years. Can you believe it?

Honourable senators, I want you to understand that there are financial problems. You can go through all the little numbers and the big numbers. Alberta has decided that it will phase out GRIP completely because the program is not doing what was intended by it. In any event, the government has said to farmers that until March 31 they can now get out of the GRIP and the NISA programs without having to buy their way out.

Senator Murray: Mr. Martin facilitated that with the 30 per cent reduction, did he not?

Senator Olson: I do not know. We will have other programs when we have reached an agreement.

Honourable senators, let us not kid ourselves about what is coming. Senator Berntson knows it is not easy to farm in Saskatchewan or Alberta and have tremendous debt and debt service charges overhanging the Government of Canada. From time immemorial, the federal government — mostly Liberal governments — has come to the rescue of farmers when they needed it.

Senator Berntson: In a big way.

Senator Olson: You will remember James Gardiner. He brought out several programs at different times. Then there was Senator Hays. I was there to help once in a while as well.

Senator Murray wishes to speak about the losers. Everyone loses if we do not act in a responsible way with the budget. We must get the deficit down to zero. It is going down to 3 per cent in the next three years, and that is probably as fast as it can go down without inflicting terrible pain on some Canadians. However, that does not change the fact that you need resources to provide services. The Minister of Finance projected that by the end of this decade, the debt service charges will probably be up to $50 billion. That is more than we spend on medicare; it is more than we spend on many important programs. The Minister of Finance has said, over and over again, that unless we get our financial house in order, nothing else will matter.

• (1630)

It seems to me that we should have the message by now that this is what the Government of Canada is up to — trying to correct this situation. We are on track.

Honourable senators can take polls of Canadians in their own part of the country, in the Maritimes or out in Western Canada. Everyone agrees that it is time for the government to act in a financially responsible way.

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Olson. That was a wonderful speech. However, there is something that no one is dealing with: That is the fact that the debt is still growing faster than it ever did before. If the deficits for last year and this year are calculated, we are looking at $65 billion to $70 billion tacked on to that huge, existing debt.

The point is that somewhere along the way, someone has to deal with this problem in a long-term fashion. There was no attempt to do that at all in this budget. I admit there was no attempt to do it either while the Conservatives were in power. However, this whole cascade phenomenon started under Prime Minister Trudeau. It just keeps going and going. Somewhere along the line, governments of every political persuasion and every jurisdiction must come together and work out a financial strategy for dealing with this problem. It cannot go on forever. No matter what happens, it seems to go on despite all the efforts.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could not agree more with the Honourable Senator Keon. He has created an abbreviated version of what I was trying to say in a few longer sentences. The honourable senator is right on. We must get at it now. We cannot wait until next year.

However, I would disagree with the honourable senator on a couple of points. One of those is to dispute your statement that nobody is doing anything about the situation. We are making an attempt. That is why there are so many cuts about which Senator Murray has complained.

Senator Murray: You have wasted a year already.

Senator Olson: The only thing that could have brought this about sooner would have been to get the Tories out of office sooner. The people of Canada did it as fast as ever when they got the chance. There was no election in 1991 or 1992. The election did not come until 1993, but the Canadian people sure did it in a most decisive way then. They were pretty straightforward in their decision, and now there are just two members of that party left in the House of Commons.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You adopted our policies.

Senator Olson: I cannot believe what I am hearing. Do you not have the message yet? It is impossible to comprehend that you do not believe that the people of Canada do not want their federal affairs run in that way.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: But you misled them. They believed the Red Book.

Senator Olson: The promises of the Red Book are being kept almost in their entirety.

Senator Berntson: When do we get the GST bill?

Senator Olson: The GST is still under consideration. Do you want us to get rid of $18 billion of revenue? In that event, you would have some more problems.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: "We shall replace it," you said.

Senator Stanbury: You are the guys who replaced the old regime with the GST.

Senator Olson: I could not agree more with Senator Keon that we must get on with it. This should have been done a long time ago, but we were not in office then.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, after having heard certain remarks, I would like to make a wish. Would it be possible for us to discuss this financial problem of Canada without being partisan?

The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada has definitely made errors, and so have you. I believe that Senator Keon pointed that out quite clearly, and that we all take it for granted. This having been said, is it possible for us to discuss the problem in a civilized, intelligent and reasonable manner instead of exchanging jeers and pointless remarks? Canadians do not want to hear us pester each other or haggle over something they understand. That is my first wish.

Senator Murray instigated this debate, and it is fundamental. I hope that each and every one of us will be able to take part in it because it is of the utmost importance. It is basic to our ability to survive as a federation.

In the months leading up to the tabling of the budget by the Minister of Finance, I was taken with the open-minded approach of flexible federalism as expressed in some speeches by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. I believed then and I believe now that this is the way to go to solve problems such as Canada's financial problem.

Canada's financial problem is not only federal it also has a provincial dimension. When Canadian and foreign financial analysts examine the debt situation in Canada, they are not only looking at the federal government's debt; they are also looking at the debts run up by the provinces. They look at the whole debt picture.

The Minister of Finance referred to flexible federalism in his speech yesterday. I trust his attitude toward the provinces is a reflection of a willingness to solve this problem, which will not be solved in one or two years. It will have to be solved over several years, maybe five, six, or even seven years. Let us hope, at least, that the discussions with the provinces will be conducted in an atmosphere of cooperation.

I made a wish. I wished for an open debate where we would set aside our partisan biases. In any case, both parties have done some wrongs and we all know it. Let us put that aside and discuss the current problem with an open mind.

Let us not forget that the federal government and the provinces all reach into the same taxpayer's pocket. There is only one Canadian taxpayer. When that Canadian taxpayer hears about taxes, the deficit or the debt, he or she does not make the subtle distinction that we make or that the Minister of Finance makes. It is fairly easy to offload the problem to the provinces. It is much more difficult to sit down and discuss the problem with the provinces to try to come to an agreement which would set rules on the way to dig into this taxpayer's pocket.

I had a feeling that the Minister of Finance was opening a door when he talked about flexible federalism, but now I have the distinct impression that he is closing it. I hope he will reopen the lines of communication during this year leading to the first cut in transfer payments.

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I should like to comment on the remarks of Senator Nolin. I will deviate from the rules a little. I think Senator Olson has a very selective memory.

I was elected in 1979. At that time, the debt of the country was $68 billion. We were kicked out in eight months. Joe Clark said we would bring in an 18-cent hike in the gas tax, eliminate the deficit and go to work on the debt. Of course, we all know what happened: We were booted out, and we were very disappointed. Nevertheless, four years later, we came back with 80 seats, I believe.

When Mr. Trudeau was through with us in 1984, the debt of the country was $208 billion and interest rates were at 20 per cent. All one has to do is compound those rates through the years. We would have had a balanced budget during every year of our government if it had not been for that inherited debt of the country.

I want to clarify the selectiveness of what we have been told by Senator Olson. I think this needs to be on the record. That was a disappointing day for us Conservatives.

The country did not want to deal with the very difficult issues that were before us. By the time 1984 rolled around, gasoline cost 93 cents in Macoun, Saskatchewan. It was close to $2 when Mr. Trudeau got through with us, and the debt had escalated. A lot more could be said about that issue, and I think the record should be made straight.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of Senator Gustafson? I should like to ask Senator Gustafson if he believes that any government in office should deal with only some of the expenses. You have to deal with all of the expenses, including the debt service charges. He talks about programming, but we have never been dishonest enough to try to tell Canadians that you can only deal with some of the expenses. The federal government has to pay all the expenses, including the debt service charges.

Senator Tkachuk: I should like to ask a question of Senator Olson. The honourable senator has tried to help me on the seven-to-one ratio. Going back to the book to which he referred, entitled "Budget Speech," the honourable senator noted there is $118 billion in expenditures in 1994-95. It then drops to $114 billion. Remember, I have to answer my own question here because I have not been getting any satisfaction from the government side. It then drops to $107.9 billion, or about $108 billion. The way I calculate it, at the end of two years, it is a five-to-one ratio. In the first year, it is really four-to-one, not seven-to-one. In the second year, it is five-to-one. Then we have to draw a long bow to 1996-97, election year, conveniently, where we have a list of expenditures based on the assumption that there will not be another dime raised through taxes.

I asked the Leader of the Government this afternoon whether that meant that there will not be one more dime of increased taxes between 1996-97 and whether there were assurances to that effect. That is all I want to know because that is the only way the Minister of Finance can keep to his seven-to-one ratio.

Senator Olson: Senator Tkachuk knows very well that the Minister of Finance was not delivering a budget for the next three years.

Senator Tkachuk: Yes, he was.

Senator Olson: He did what ministers of finance have always done. I think it is what they are required to do, either by law or convention. They take the changes they have made and project them over several years. I think that is what the Minister of Finance did.

What comes out of that is that there are some $3.8 billion in additional revenues in this budget that will come out in that period of time; and there are $22 or $23 billion dollars in cuts in expenditures. That will be savings, if you want to call it that, or at least a cut from what was in effect last year. If the honourable senator calculates that out, it works out to about seven-to-one. That is not hard to understand.

Senator Tkachuk: I did figure it out, Senator Olson, which is why I am trying to get your help.

Senator Berntson: You are the chief economist on that side.

Senator Tkachuk: The honourabe senator wants to discuss this matter; I do not, quite frankly. I am not the one who assured the Canadian people that there will be only a $1 increase in taxes for $7 worth of expenditures. iI was the Minister of Finance himself who said that. He certainly did not tell the Canadian people, "By the way, the trick is that we will get the $1 this year, and you will get the $7 three years from now." I do not believe that is what the Canadian people thought would happen. They thought we would have a $1 increase in taxes and $7 in cuts this year. The Minister of Finance did not tell them, "We will take the dollar this year, and we will give you the cuts three years from now." That is not what he said.

In order for him to keep his promise, he must not increase taxes in the three years. I am asking whether that is his intention, because he certainly did not state that in the budget document.

Senator Olson: I do not understand why Senator Tkachuk cannot get that straight.

Senator Tkachuk: I do not understand Liberal economics. I am trying to get some help here.

Senator Olson: It is very simple. As he said in his budget, if you project what he has done with respect to increased taxes — that is, on the revenue side — it will amount to something over $3 billion for the three years. We are not going to get all that money in one year. The cuts, or the downsizing of various expenditures over that same three-year period, will be somewhere around $23 billion. You do not need to be a rocket scientist to divide three into twenty-four. It comes to seven-to-one. That is exactly what the Minister of Finance said it was. There are $7 of cuts for every $1 of revenue.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: I should like to ask a question of my honourable friend Senator Olson, knowing his vast experience both in the House of Commons and in this place, not to mention in cabinet.

We must always have the role of the Senate in mind. As we all know, the Senate should be representative of the regions. It should be the guardian and protector of minorities. When we speak of minorities, we must abandon the idea that we always mean linguistic minorities. There are all kinds of minorities.

Modernization of the Senate is an idea that I have been trying to put forward in the press and over radio on hot-line shows. The reaction is interesting.

I read the highlights of the Main Estimates late last night and this morning. I also read the government expenditure plan. We all agree we have to kill this monster called the deficit. Only then can the country again allow itself to be generous, create new programs and do the things that a government is supposed to do well. However, we first have to get out from under this debt problem.

What does the honourable senator think of putting a group of senators together to transform the Senate into a vast public accounts committee with subcommittees that would look into this matter year round?

We would not examine only a department or two, as the House of Commons tries to do. We all know from experience that when the House of Commons says they will look into the estimates of one department in a given year, the other departments say, "Oh, boy, I avoided being scrutinized this year." It is like a lottery. If it is an election year, we know that attendance at committee hearings is not as good as we would expect, because in order to be re-elected, every member must become involved in other activities that deprive them of being as attendant as they would like to be. Sometimes the whips fill the empty seats with members who have no interest at all in the expenditures.

What would be the honourable senator's opinion of that kind of committee, a multiplicity of smaller committees looking into each envelope of the budget? We have the right to call in any witnesses that we want on a yearly basis. I agree that we should not do it five days a week, twelve months a year, but we could be regularly calling in people and asking, "What is this, and what is that?"

Looking into the details of the budget, I am still of the strong opinion that we could help the country get back on its two feet by cutting here, transforming there, or calling on deputy ministers or ministers to explain why we have such and such a program in 1995 or the year 2000.

Does the honourable senator believe that something along these lines could be done, given the honourable senator's vast experience in the House and Senate administrations?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there is today a structure called the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that will achieve almost everything for which Senator Prud'homme is asking. Senator Doody is now the chairman, and his committee will be meeting on the Estimates in a few days. They were tabled in the House of Commons today.

Senator Graham: They were also tabled here.

Senator Olson: We have them here as well. The vehicle is already there. We could make good use of it. I know that members on both sides have taken a deep interest in that process. They did particularly when I was chairman of the committee.

• (1650)

I believe that committee chairmanship of the National Finance Committee belongs to the opposition. We had it when we were in opposition and the opposition has it now. If that committee decides to take up the matter, it is possible to get into any department you like as deep as you like. It has one great advantage over the so-called Public Accounts Committee in the House of Commons. That is that matters can be examined before they spend the money, as opposed to after. The Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons looks at the Public Accounts long after the money has been spent. The National Finance Committee of the Senate can take a look at the so-called "blue book of Estimates," which is now in our possession, and thoroughly examine any parts of it we want before the money is spent. That is a great advantage.

I want to caution the honourable senator that if he wants to carry matters farther and have that committee assume control and authority over expenditures, then he must change a lot of other things. It is a long-established fact that the House of Commons has control of the purse strings. I am not about to challenge that authority. I believe the elected members ought to have that control, as they do through the appropriations, the supply bills that they pass from time to time, including the main supply bill which is usually dealt with near the end of June each year.

The honourable senator is right. If any member of this chamber wants to take an interest in the National Finance Committee and discuss that matter with the Chairman, Senator Doody, I am sure they can achieve exactly what the honourable senator is suggesting.

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I totally agree that that is the committee for that job. My idea goes a step farther. If you ask some senators to attend that particular committee and take an overall interest, it will not work. One who is a specialist in everything ends up being a specialist in nothing.

My idea is to subdivide the work of the National Finance Committee, where members who have greater affinity for certain issues and departments — for instance, the Honourable Senator Olson's interests are in agriculture, energy, foreign affairs, external aid and national defence — could quietly, year-round look into every program and make strong recommendations on how money could be spent and saved.

I am talking about a specialized Senate. I agree with the honourable senator, but you cannot ask the National Finance Committee to look into the details of every program or every department. It is along these lines I would like to continue my conversation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that has not been my experience. My experience is any member who showed up at National Finance Committee meetings could ask any question he wanted about any expenditure in the entire book, and could go into it as deeply as he wanted. Sometimes as many as seven or eight people from the Treasury Board were present, and they would give detailed answers on every question raised. I certainly have no objection to the honourable senator promoting his idea. He may have difficulty achieving high attendance all the time.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask a question of Senator Prud'homme? My purpose is to determine the soundness of his proposal. I agree with Senator Olson that the National Finance Committee has done some pretty good work. It was my experience that the committee did its best work, not when it was dealing with the Main Estimates, but when it was dealing with Supplementary Estimates. Why? Because the votes in the Supplementary Estimates tended to be very specific. They dealt with specific projects or the supplementing of the funds for specific purposes.

Senator Prud'homme has come to the Senate recently from the House of Commons. Prior to December of 1968, the spending estimates were dealt with ultimately in the House of Commons Committee on Supply. In December of 1968, the rules were changed so that the spending estimates of each of the departments and agencies were sent out to the standing committees.

My impression is that that technique has not worked out very well in the House of Commons. The standing committees do not do the work on the Estimates that it was anticipated they would do. It may well be that part of the problem of the debt is not attributable to the executive government, whether it is Tory or Grit, but to the fact that the backbenchers in the House of Commons have not tried to pare the Estimates. They have not put pressure on the Estimates. I am not suggesting that they would cut the votes at any particular year, but by expressing uncertainty as to the value of the vote, they would assure that it would be lower in the following year.

I am looking for an explanation as to the nature of the business and of the procedure. Why does the honourable senator think that we could do a better job than a much larger house could do with regard to the spending estimates?

I am asking him indirectly, and I know he would not presume to do this directly. How could the House of Commons change its procedure so it could do the job that is more properly its job than ours?

Senator Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I must say I recognize a scholar and a teacher when I see one. I appreciate this exchange. This is probably why I became a senator.

Yes, I do believe that the Senate could do better. Why? First, there is continuity. The fact is that senators generally spend a longer period of time in the parliamentary process. In the other place, there is a continuous flow of people on committees. That does not develop expertise. That is my experience after 30 years in the House of Commons.

There is another fact, and it is the way committee members are chosen in the House of Commons. I am not critical because that is the system, although I must say that I never liked it. It is a question of protecting the government, a minister or a department. In my estimation, some of these people never develop an expertise in a department. The necessity of having to be elected subjects them to an immense amount of pressure when they have to comment on government programs.

I have very rarely heard a member of Parliament say that a popular program should not be a federal government program, because politically speaking that is very dangerous. As I said earlier, continuity is immensely important.

We do not need protection here. We concern ourselves with the best interests of Canada. We have expertise. Each of us goes to various committees. I attend the committee on foreign affairs because that is where I feel most at ease. I have 30 years of experience in that field. Perhaps I have something to offer Canadians.

The problem in the House of Commons is the lack of continuity. Half of the members of Parliament are extremely devoted and they develop expertise. However, they are always surrounded by new members, because the Whip will decide that a new member should replace someone because they have to be elected. There is no continuity. Members who have done their duty and are faithful to their committee and their mandate sometimes have to go back to square one on new programs because new members have joined. In my view, this gives strength to members of the committee.

We have all heard confidences from various bureaucrats. I will quote one to which a good friend of mine, Mr. Mazankowski, was a witness. I do not think it is unfair to quote him. He was in the company of two other ministers one night, having coffee. There was one Liberal there and myself. I am still liberal-minded, even though I now sit far away.

He said, "I was always more afraid to go to a Senate committee." Mr. Mazankowski was there as a witness. He said, "There is nothing more difficult for a minister than to appear before a Senate committee. I prefer at any time to appear before a House of Commons committee."

It is not that they are not serious, but as I said, they lack continuity and long-term expertise. They were less afraid to appear before a House of Commons committee because they felt they had a majority to protect them there.

Protecting a minister is contrary to what a committee should be about. I was chairman of the committee on foreign affairs and national defence. I was a fair chairman, but I always had in mind protection for ministers who would appear. I say that openly.

I do not think this would happen in the Senate. This is only food for thought. I hold no grudge. I am not a pusher. We must think of what is best for Canada using an existing institution. That is very important to me.

I went on television recently. Viewers were offered the opportunity to destroy me. I did not mind. I said that I was not there to defend the Senate, but to talk about it. What can the Senate do? Why does the Senate exist? Can we use it? Why hit your head against a wall? If the Senate is to remain in place until Canadians decide that it should not exist, why do we not use it?

My small contribution is to say that that may be a way to use the talent of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I ask leave to revert to "Notices of Motions" —

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: I rise on a point of order. Honourable senators, rule 9(2) of the Rules of the Senate reads:

> During any sitting of the Senate, when a Senator draws the attention of the Senate to the possible lack of a quorum...

Honourable senators, I do not think we have the authority to continue to conduct business. There is no quorum.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, March 1, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

Address of
Mr. William J. Clinton,
President of the United States of America, to both Houses of Parliament in the House of Commons Chamber, Ottawa, on Thursday, February 23, 1995

• (1505)

[English]

Mr. and Mrs. William J. Clinton were welcomed by the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, Prime Minister of Canada, by the Honourable Gildas Molgat, Speaker of the Senate and by the Honourable Gilbert Parent, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. Gilbert Parent (Speaker of the House of Commons): My colleagues, I call this meeting to order.

Mr. President, it is a great privilege for Canadians to have you address this joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons. We are honoured to have you with us today.

I now call upon the Right Hon. Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to introduce our distinguished guest.

• (1510)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister): Mr. President, it is an honour to welcome you to Parliament on behalf of all Canadians. Before speaking a word in this Chamber, I must say you have already given eloquent proof of the friendship between our two nations by agreeing to visit Ottawa in February.

I would like to tell you, Mr. President, that something very unusual occurred yesterday in this House. By unanimous vote of all members of the House of Commons it was resolved that, very rare in the month of February, we were to have a good spring day for you today.

Mr. President, the cold weather outside that we normally have may be typically Canadian, but so is the warm welcome for you inside today. It is a warmth that we reserve only for our closest friends.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: A great deal has been written and said about the friendship between our two countries. It has not always been an easy friendship, which is normal considering one friend is a relatively small nation and the other is the most powerful nation in the world. As one member of this House put it three decades ago, the Americans are our best friends, whether we like it or not.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Our relationship has grown and evolved through the years. Today, like any mature, healthy friendship, it is a friendship between equals. As friends and neighbours, we are able to separate business and friendship when we must. In the vast majority of cases, we are able to work together, as we always have, toward common goals.

The fact is, Mr. President, that both our administrations were elected on a platform of jobs and growth. We have both focused on a job and growth agenda in office. In each country our agenda has been working with strong, steady and lasting economic recoveries in Canada and the U.S.

[Translation]

You can listen to the translation now, Mr. President.

[English]

That is the way we do things in Canada, you know.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

• (1515)

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Our economies have strong links. More trade goes on between our two nations than any other two nations in the world — almost a billion dollars a day, every day. If one country does well, the other benefits. And if both economies are going strong, there is no stopping us. Jobs in British Columbia mean jobs in Washington State. Jobs in Ontario mean jobs in Michigan. Jobs in Quebec mean jobs in New York State.

But our shared goals go beyond our immediate relationship. Both our administrations understand that increased and liberalized trade everywhere means jobs and growth in our countries.

You and I were together in Jakarta in November when the Asia-Pacific countries committed to a free trade zone by the year 2010, and at the conference you chaired in Miami in December, where all the countries of the hemisphere agreed on a Free Trade Area of the Americas by the year 2005.

I want to salute you, Mr. President, for the role you have played in realizing this new vision. And you have not confined this vision to economic matters. You took decisive action in leading the restoration of democracy in Haiti, and you have played a key role in the remarkable breakthroughs in the peace process in the Middle East.

[English]

Mr. President, you have understood the forces shaping the modern global economy. You have worked to ensure a new unity and optimism in the hemisphere. You have worked to bring people and countries together. These are all goals that this House and the people across Canada share with you. We are committed to working with the United States and other nations to achieve them.

My recent travels to Asia and Latin America have reminded me that it is more important than ever to have a strong U.S. role in the world. The upheavals of the post-cold war world mean that the United States can and must play a bigger leadership role than ever.

Our own government has outlined our new foreign policy direction. We want to continue Canada's long tradition of promoting global peace and security. We all learned long ago that isolation is much more costly and dangerous than international cooperation.

Mr. President, you may not know it, but among your predecessors who have addressed the Parliament of Canada during your lifetime are Harry Truman, Dwight Eisenhower, Richard Nixon and Ronald Reagan. They all had one thing in common. They were all elected for a second term.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Now, that might not seem like such a remarkable coincidence. But look at the recent presidents who have not addressed the Canadian Parliament: Gerald Ford, Jimmy Carter and George Bush.

[Translation]

I will, however, refrain from drawing any conclusions from that, Mr. President.

As you know, Canada adheres strictly to a policy of non-interference and non-intervention.

[English]

Any way you look at it, Mr. President, we are delighted that you have accepted our invitation.

Mr. Speaker, honoured members, senators and dear guests, I give you our friend and neighbour, the President of the United States of America, William J. Clinton.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1520)

Mr. William J. Clinton (President of the United States): Mr. Prime Minister, Mrs. Chrétien, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, honourable senators and members of the House of Commons, distinguished members of the diplomatic corps, ladies and gentlemen; I have pondered for some time the differences between the Canadian political system and the American one. When the Prime Minister pointed out the unanimous resolution you passed yesterday, I realized that in one respect clearly you are superior. We do not control the weather in Washington, D.C. and I am grateful that you do.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clinton: I also thank the Prime Minister for his history lesson. I have never believed in the iron laws of history so much as I do now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: I thank the Prime Minister and all of you for welcoming me to this magnificent capital city. The Prime Minister first came to this Chamber to represent the people of Canada when President Kennedy was in the White House. I resent that because when President Kennedy was in the White House I was in junior high school. Now the Prime Minister has less grey hair than I do. And he does, in spite of that fact that since that time he has occupied nearly every seat in his nation's cabinet. The first time I met him I wondered why this fellow could not hold down a job.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: I can tell you this, we in the United States know that his service to this nation over so many years has earned him the gratitude and the respect of the Canadian people. It also has earned the gratitude and the respect of the people of the United States.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: I know it is traditional for American presidents when they address this body to speak of their affection for their ties to the Canadian people. On behalf of the United States let me stay with that tradition and say l'amitié solide, but let me say to you that it is a big part of our lives.

I remember so well more than a decade ago when Hillary and I with our then very young daughter came to Canada to celebrate the New Year. We started in Montreal and drove to Château Montebello. Along the way we drove around Ottawa and watched all those wonderful people skating along the canal. I come from a southern state. I could not imagine that anybody could ever get on skates and stand in any body of water for very long. I can see that Hillary has had in the back of her mind all this long time how much she would like to be skating along this canal. I think tomorrow Mrs. Chrétien is going to give her her wish. We will be looking forward to that.

My wife has visited Toronto and we had a wonderful, wonderful family vacation in Western Canada in Victoria and Vancouver back in 1990. It was one of the best times that all of us have ever had together anywhere.

We are deeply indebted to your culture. Our daughter's name was inspired by Canadian songwriter Joni Mitchell's wonderful song "Chelsea Morning."

All of you know that in the spring of 1993, the first time I left the United States as president, I came to Vancouver for the summit with President Yeltsin. Both of us at that time were under some significant amount of stress as we tried to reaffirm our relationship and solidify democracy in Russia. I can say without any equivocation, the reception we received from the people of Canada as well as from the government and the Prime Minister made it very, very easy for us to have a successful meeting. For that we are very grateful.

• (1525)

I come here today to reaffirm the ties that bind the United States and Canada in a new age of great promise and challenge: a time of rapid change when both opportunity and uncertainty live side by side in my country and in yours; a time when people are being lifted up by new possibilities and held down by old demons all across the world.

I came here because I believe that our nations together must seize the opportunities and meet the challenges of this new age. We must, I say again, do this together.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: From the oil from Alberta that fires factories in the United States to silicon chips from California that power your computers, we are living proof of the value of partnerships and cooperation.

Technologies produced in your nation saves lives in our hospitals, while food from our farms line your supermarkets. Our horizons have broadened because we have listened in the United States to the CBC.

Our culture is much richer because of the contributions of writers like Robertson Davies, who Hillary had the pleasure of meeting last week after reading him for years, and Margaret Atwood; also, the wonderful photography of Yousuf Karsh, whose famous picture of Churchill I just saw. He took some pictures of Hillary and me that are not so distinguished, but I love them anyway.

As a musician, I have to thank you especially for Oscar Peterson, a man I consider to be the greatest jazz pianist of our time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: Ours is the world's most remarkable relationship. The Prime Minister said, "whether we like it or not." I can tell you that on most days I like it very, very much.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: We have to strengthen that relationship. We have to strengthen it for our own benefit through trade and commerce and travel. We have to strengthen it because it is our job to help to spread the benefits of democracy and freedom and prosperity and peace beyond our shores.

We are neighbours by the grace of nature. We are allies and friends by choice. There are those in both our nations who say we can no longer afford to, and perhaps we no longer even need to, exercise our leadership in the world. When so many of our people are having their own problems, it is easy to listen to that assertion. But it is wrong.

We are two nations blessed with great resources and great histories. We have great responsibilities. Our countries were built, after all, by men and women who fled the tyranny and the intolerance of the old world for the new.

We are the nations of pioneers, people who were armed with the confidence they needed to strike out on their own and to have the talents that God gave them shape their dreams in a new and different land.

Culture and tradition, to be sure, distinguish us from one another in many ways that all of us are still learning about every day. But we share core values and that is more important: a devotion to hard work, an ardent belief in democracy, a commitment to giving each and every citizen the right to live up to his or her God-given potential in an understanding of what we owe to the world for the gifts we have been given.

These common values have nourished the partnership that has become a model for new democracies all around the world. They can look at us and see just how much stronger the bonds between nations can be when their governments answered the citizens' desires for freedom and democracy and enterprise, and when they work together to build each other up instead of working overtime to tear each other down.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: Of course we have our differences. Some of them are complex enough to tear your hair out over. But we have approached them directly and in good faith, as true friends must. We in the United States come more and more every day to respect and to understand that we can learn from what is different about your nation and its many peoples.

• (1530)

Canada has shown the world how to balance freedom with compassion and tradition with innovation in your efforts to provide health care to all your citizens, to treat your senior citizens with the dignity and respect they deserve, and to take on tough issues like the move afoot to outlaw automatic weapons designed for killing and not hunting.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: I might say, since you applauded so, that you were doing it in a nation of people who respect the right to hunt and understand the difference between law and order and sportsmanship.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: Those of us who have travelled here appreciate especially the reverence you have shown for the bounty of God's nature from the Laurentians to the Rockies. In a world darkened by ethnic conflicts that literally tear nations apart, Canada has stood for all of us as a model of how people of different cultures can live and work together in peace, prosperity and understanding.

Mr. Clinton: The United States, as may of my predecessors have said, has enjoyed its excellent relationships with a strong and united Canada but we recognize, just as the Prime Minister said with regard to your relationships to us a moment ago, that your political future is of course entirely for you to decide. That is what a democracy is all about.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: Now I will tell you something about our political system. If you want to know why my State of the Union Address took so long, it is because I evenly divided the things that would make the Democrats clap and the Republicans clap, and we doubled the length of the speech in common enthusiasm.

I ask all of you to remember that we do look to you and to remember what our great President of the post-war era, Harry Truman, said when he came here in 1947: "Canada's eminent position today," he said, "is a tribute to the patience, tolerance and strength of character of her people. Canada's notable achievement of national unity and progress through accommodation, moderation and forbearance can be studied with profit by sister nations". Those words ring every bit as true today as they did then.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: For generations now our countries have joined together in efforts to make the world more secure and more prosperous. We have reached out together to defend our values and our interests in World War I, on the beaches of Normandy and in Korea. Together we helped to summon the United Nations into existence. Together we stood fast against communist tyranny and prevailed in the cold war. Together we stood shoulder to shoulder against aggression in the Gulf War. Now our nations have stepped forward to help Haiti emerge from repression and restore its democracy. I thank the Prime Minister for what he said about that. When it was not popular anywhere in the world to worry about poor, beleaguered, abandoned Haiti, Canada was truly a friend of Haiti.

• (1535)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: In one international forum after another we stand side by side to shape a safer and a better world. Whether it is at the World Population Conference pushing together for an indefinite extension of NNPT in any number of ways we are working together.

We know that for Canada this history of action is a matter of deep tradition and personal conviction. The tradition runs from Lester Pearson to Jean Chrétien. It says that we must be engaged in the affairs of the world.

You have always shown the wisdom of reaching out instead of retreating, of rising to new responsibilities instead of retrenching. Your tradition of engagement continues to this day and, believe you me, it earns respect all around the world from people of all races, ethnic groups and political systems.

In places like Cyprus and the Sinai, Canadian troops have played an invaluable role in preventing more violence in those critical hot spots. Today your 2,000 peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia are courageously fulfilling their mission in the midst of one of the most intractable, difficult problems in our lifetime.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: For a half century the United States has shared your philosophy of action and consistent exercise of leadership abroad. I am determined, notwithstanding all the cross-currents in our country, that we shall preserve that commitment.

These times may be turbulent, but we have an historic opportunity to increase security and prosperity for our own people and for people all around the world. I want you to know that I intend to do everything in my power to keep our country constructively involved in the problems that we must face if we are going to guarantee that our children will live in a peaceful, sane and free world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: Imagine what the Persian Gulf would look like today if we had not risen to the challenge of Iraqi aggression. Imagine what tariffs and barriers would plague the world trading system if we had not worked so hard together over such a long period of time from the end of World War II to the events which the Prime Minister described, to the NAFTA, to the GATT, to the Asia-Pacific cooperation, to the Summit of the Americas that was held in Miami in December. Imagine how different it would have been. Imagine how much worse the horrible tragedy in Rwanda would have been if we had not been there to try to provide essential help in those refugee camps to keep people alive.

We cannot let anyone or anything break this great tradition of our nations. In our partnership we will find the key to protecting our people and increasing their prosperity and the power to reach beyond our shores in the name of democracy and freedom not only because it is right but because it is our interest to do so.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: Just before we came down here, the Prime Minister and I agreed again that if we are to going meet these new challenges in the 21st century, we must adapt the institutions that helped us to win the Cold War so that they can serve us as well in the 21st century. We have to do that.

Some have evolved with the changing world. Some have clearly already discarded their old missions and assumed new roles. We have also seen at the end of the East-West conflict the advent of 24-hour financial markets, sudden environmental disasters, the rise of international terrorism, and the resurgence of ancient ethnic hatreds. All these things have placed new demands on these institutions that the statesmen of 50 years ago simply did not imagine.

The 21st century will leave behind those who sit back and think that automatically these problems will be solved. We simply have to face these challenges and ask ourselves what we have to change and how we are going to do it.

For example, to meet the security needs of the future we must work together to see that NATO, the most successful military alliance in all of history, adapts to this new era. That means we must make certain that the inevitable process of NATO expansion proceeds smoothly, gradually and openly. There should be no surprises to anyone about what we are about. We will work so that the conditions, the timing and the military implications of NATO expansion will be widely known and clearly understood in advance.

To parallel the enlargement of NATO we have to develop close and strong ties with Russia. I have worked hard for that and so has the Prime Minister. We must continue working together at the United Nations where our nations have together taken the lead in efforts to reform our peacekeeping operations, to control costs, to improve information gathering, and to make sure we have the right kind of command and control system before the young people who put on our uniforms are put in harm's way.

We have to continue also to work at reforming international economic institutions. We have already made some great strides in reshaping the global economy with the passage of GATT, which is the most comprehensive trade agreement in history. The work is only beginning.

At the upcoming G-7 summit in Halifax, which we are very much looking forward to, we will be working to ensure that our international trading institutions advance the cause of trade liberalization in ways that produce tangible gains for the people of the countries involved.

We also have to re-examine the institutions that were created at the time of Bretton-Woods, the IMF and the World Bank, to make sure they are going to be able to master the new and increasingly complex generation of transnational problems that face us, problems like explosive population growth and environmental degradation, problems like those that we have been facing together in Mexico and throughout Latin America and the recent financial crisis.

Real progress in all these areas will depend not only on our willingness to be involved but our willingness to lead as partners. Together, Canada and the United States are striving to seize all the advantages the new global economy has to offer.

We know that trade produces high-wage jobs, the kinds of jobs that give our people the opportunity to care for their families, to educate their children and to leave the next generation better off than they were, a dream that has been called into question in many advanced economies in the last few years.

The success of NAFTA, which is generating new jobs and creating new markets from Monterrey to Medicine Hat, is the proof. As the Prime Minister has said so well, we in NAFTA are on our way to becoming the four amigos. That phrase will go down in history; I wish I had thought of it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: We will soon start our consultations with Chile for accession to NAFTA and it will be a very good partner. The addition of that thriving economy will only continue to increase the benefits for all of us.

I want to take another moment here to thank Canada for its recent support and help in the financial crisis in Mexico. You understood what we had on the line, that more than Mexico was involved, that jobs and trade and future and our support for democracy and stability throughout Latin America were at issue. You understood it and we are grateful. Because we stood shoulder to shoulder we have a chance to preserve this remarkable explosion of democracy that we saw at the Summit of the Americas, and we should continue to do that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clinton: I want to say a word, if I might, about the environment. As we expand trade, we have to remember we must defend that which we have inherited and enhance it if we can.

• (1545)

The natural riches of this continent we share are staggering. We have cooperated to such great effect on our continent in the past: our air quality agreement is solving the acid rain problem; the Great Lakes are on the road to recovery; the eagles have returned to Lake Erie. Now we have to build on those accomplishments.

With the NAFTA Environmental Commission located in Montreal, your country will play a key role in ensuring that we protect the extraordinary bounty that has been given to us for our children and our grandchildren. NAFTA is only one of several fronts on which we can work together to both increase our prosperity and protect our environment. But we must do both.

Our nations are building on the progress of last year's Summit of the Americas as well. It will create a free trade area embracing the entire hemisphere. Across the Pacific, as the Prime Minister said, we have paved the way for new markets and for free trade among the dynamic economies in the Asian-Pacific area. That was a very important thing for us to do because those nations are growing very fast, and we do not want this world to break up into geographical trading blocks in ways that would shrink the potential of the people of Canada and the United States for decades to come.

All these efforts will only enhance what is now the world's greatest trading relationship; yours and ours. Every day people, ideas and goods stream cross our border. Bilateral trade now is more than a billion Canadian dollars every day — I learned to say that — and about $270 billion United States dollars last year. It is by far the world's largest bilateral relationship. Our trade with each other has become an essential pillar in the architecture of both our economies.

Today 4.5 million Americans have jobs that involve trade between our two countries. Those are the concrete benefits of our partnership. Between 1988 and 1994, trade between our nations rose about 60 per cent. Last year alone it increased by 15 per cent. But the statistics do not give the human reality behind the flourishing exchange of goods and ideas. Our trade is creating real jobs for real people.

In Boscawen, New Hampshire, for example, a small company called Secure Care Products produces monitoring systems for patients in nursing homes. Recently Secure Care began exporting its products to Canada. Sales are already growing fast and the company expects them to triple this year. And so Secure Care is hiring people like Susan Southwick, the granddaughter of a Quebecer, the mother of two and now the company's 26th employee, giving Susan and her husband a shot at the dream which Canadian and Americans share. That is what this partnership is all about.

Much further away from you in Greensboro, North Carolina, another small company called Createc Forestry Systems is showing how our trade helps people turn their hopes into realities. Founded by a man named Albert Jenks in his family's kitchen, Createc makes hand-held computers that track lumber mill inventories. Those computers help managers assess their needs better, so fewer trees are cut unnecessarily.

A few years ago Createc began to export to Canada, and now those sales accounts have risen to nearly 20 per cent of their total business. That means a more secure future for the company, for Mr. Jenks, for his son, Patrick, who works with his father in the family business. It shows how our trade can increase our prosperity and protect the environment as well.

Your companies are thriving in our markets, bringing tangible benefits to Canadians. Whether it is repairing the engines of some of the U.S. air force's largest planes or manufacturing software to manage our natural resources or building some of the Olympic village for Atlanta's 1996 games, Canadian firms are a strong presence in the United States. Their successes there help your people to turn their hopes into facts and their dreams into reality.

The example of our biggest industry shows another side of this remarkable story. Working together, U.S. and Canadian companies have integrated North America's auto industry and staged one of the most remarkable comebacks in all the history of the industrial revolution. We have drawn on each other's strengths, and today our companies work so closely that we do not speak any longer of U.S. or Canadian content in these vehicles, but of North American content, whether it is a Chrysler Minivan made in Windsor or a Chrysler Jeep made in Detroit. I think that was the ambassador from Michigan — I mean from the United States — clapping down there.

Productivity and employment have risen to such a point that when I visited Detroit last fall, the biggest complaint I heard from the auto workers in a state that was given up as being lost economically a decade ago was that they were working too much overtime. Where I come from that is known as a high-class problem. The auto industry now provides more than one million jobs in our countries.

To reinforce our commitment to NAFTA and to dramatically expand an important market tomorrow, our nations will sign an agreement to open the skies between our two nations. This agreement, which allows for a dramatic expansion of U.S. and Canadian service to each other's nations, will create thousands of new jobs and billions of dollars of economic activities in our cities, yours and mine.

We have reached a fair solution that will make life easier for travellers on both sides of the border, that will profit both Canadian and U.S. airline carriers, that will increase the mutual travel and interconnections of our people. That we have done so amicably provides yet another model of how neighbouring nations can settle their differences.

Friendship and engagement. Canada and the United States have shown the best there is in partnerships between nations: all the great potential that awaits all the free peoples of this earth if they can join in common cause. We are, as the monument at the St. Lawrence Seaway declares, two nations whose frontiers are the frontiers of friendship, whose ways are the ways of freedom, whose works are the works of peace.

Every day we see the enormous benefits this partnership gives to us in jobs, prosperity and the great creative energy that our interchanges bring. We have only seen the beginning. For the Susan Southwicks who want a chance to build better lives and the companies like Createc that are trying to build solid businesses that will last, this partnership holds a great promise with all the vast horizons of our great continent.

Together we have turned our energies toward improving the world around us for nearly a century. Today, more than ever, let us reaffirm and renew that great tradition. Let us engage and confront the great challenges of the end of this century and the beginning of the next. We must sustain our efforts. We must enhance our efforts. We must maintain our partnership. We must make it stronger.

This is our task and our mission. Together we will be equal to it. A border separates our peoples, but there are no boundaries to our common dreams.

Thank you and God bless you all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President and Mrs. Clinton, monsieur le premier ministre et madame Chrétien, monsieur le Président de la Chambre des communes, Your Excellencies, membres distingués du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes, mesdames et messieurs.

• (1555)

Mr. President, it is my pleasant task to thank you, but no words that I could express could thank you better than the applause and the standing ovations which you received this afternoon.

We are all honoured, Mr. President and Mrs. Clinton, by your presence and we welcome the many American friends who have joined you in this voyage to Canada.

We appreciate your warm expressions of friendship and assure you that we hold you and your great nation in great esteem, our valued neighbours.

Many statesmen from across the world have addressed both Houses of Parliament in the past, but none have been more welcome than the American presidents and all have spoken eloquently, as you have today, of the close friendship between our two nations.

Mr. President, you referred earlier today at lunch time to the words of President Kennedy when he addressed our Parliament in May of 1961. I will repeat part of his comments which you mentioned: "Geography has made us neighbours. History has made us friends. Economics has made us partners and necessity has made us allies. Those whom nature has so joined together let no man put asunder. What unites us is far greater than what divides us."

[Translation]

Mr. President, the world has changed a great deal since 1961, but his remarks hold just as true today.

[English]

Mr. President, while history and nature have joined us together for many purposes, they have also made our two countries very different. It is therefore very important that we not take each other for granted.

It is important that our leaders and the members of their respective cabinets meet on a regular basis to coordinate policy and hopefully to iron out difficulties and disagreements before they arise.

Mr. President, we are happy to have you with us. We thank you for your inspiring words. We hope you will return.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker Parent: Mr. President and my colleagues. Mr. President, when you were in my chambers a little earlier I was explaining to you how we got the name to be Speaker. For about a year now, although I have been Speaker, they have not allowed me to speak in this, our own House of Commons.

Mr. President, your words and your presence in this Chamber underscore the profound friendship that our peoples have developed over many generations. Our relationship does stem from the fact that we are neighbours but its strength, Mr. President, derives from the fact that we share more than a common boundary. The 49th parallel is not so much a line that divides us as a place where two great nations come together.

Canada and the United States were built by immigrants, men and women who shared similar aspirations, a spirit of adventure and a sense of freedom, of equality, of democracy. When these immigrants came here they were met by our aboriginal people, whom we must never forget.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1600)

Mr. Speaker Parent: Our common values are embodied in our institutions, and while Congress and Parliament may be similar, they are a study in contrast because they reflect our distinct traditions and national characters. However, Mr. President, they are built with the same mortar, democratic values and liberal values that form our common heritage.

Proximity also has its rewards. Like many Canadians I had the chance to attend American universities and many Americans have studied here in Canada. You may be interested in knowing, Mr. President, that five of our parliamentarians were born in the United States.

[Translation]

Our friendship is not based so much on our personal interests as on the values and ideas shared by our two countries. Throughout this century, we have worked together to promote these values. Our soldiers fought side by side and many of them died defending them.

Fifty years ago, we paid an enormous price in human lives to help bring peace to Europe. Together, Canadians and Americans helped create the United Nations and establish an international order dedicated to peace and democracy.

[English]

Our international co-operation has taken many forms. Together we have been liberators and we have been peacekeepers. We have liberalized world trade, promoted human rights and fostered the rule of law.

Mr. President, very gently I remind you that 15 years ago a Canadian diplomat sheltered and secured the freedom of American citizens in danger. On that occasion we were reminded that we can and we will count on each other when it really matters because our friendship is so sacred.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker Parent: The men and women before you in this Chamber, Mr. President, are the face of Canada and they are the expression of our democracy. Yes, Mr. President, you do us great honour by speaking to Canadians in this Chamber.

As Speaker of the House of Commons may I offer a renewed expression of our respect and warm affection for you, for Mrs. Clinton and for all of our American friends.

Thank you, Mr. President.

I now adjourn this meeting.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

BUDGET 1995

CUTS TO CANADA COUNCIL AND OTHER ARTS ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Jean-Louis Roux: Honourable senators, last February 14, I made a statement in this chamber concerning the Canada Council in which I steadfastly objected to comments made by the chair of the council's board, Mrs. Donna Scott. She said, in an interview with The Toronto Star:

> We need to spend more of our money on the arts community and less on getting it to them.

My concern was that such an attitude would save only a few thousand dollars, while jeopardizing the professionalism of the Canada Council's agents and deteriorating the quality of their relationship with artistic organizations.

One week ago, I received a letter from Roch Carrier, Director of the Canada Council, giving me some interesting information.

[Translation]

> Let it be said in strict confidence that one of the goals of our strategic plan will be to transfer a few million dollars from the administration budget to the assistance to arts budget, where they belong, without compromizing the traditional values of the Council. Program administration costs are very high sometimes. When we have to spend 40 cents, 59 cents or $1.63 to give a dollar, you must admit that decisions have to be made. In addition, wage costs have grown stout when the economy was booming. Finally, duties have built up and become more complex, thus creating duplication, overlap, permanent discrepancies, isolating effects. We need to review our operations with a view to providing better services at a lower cost. That is what we are working on.

[English]

This shows, as I said on February 14, that "artists are responsible citizens." If those cuts can be made without damaging "the respect of the traditional values of the Council", as Mr. Carrier says, I can only rejoice with the entire artistic community of Canada.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I might add that it broke my heart to see great cultural agencies such as the Canada Council and the National Film Board be subject to cuts. On the other hand, as I said, artists are responsible citizens. I gather there is no other way to pull the country out of the current economic slump. I just wish that cuts representing 3 per cent of the deficit imposed by Mr. Martin and the Liberal government on the Canada Council for each of the next three years, 4 per cent per year for the next three years imposed on the CBC and 5 per cent per year for the next three years imposed on the National Film Board will not alter the essence and mission of these agencies. I do hope that management will find imaginative ways of making the administrative structure lighter without endangering in the process the creative thinking of the producers and directors who work for these agencies.

[English]

THE SENATE

PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT REGARDING MOTIVES OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, the opportunity to serve the Parliament of Canada as a member of this chamber is a very distinct honour. From the moment I took the oath of office to do my duty and meet my responsibilities as a senator, whether sitting on the government side of this chamber or on that of the loyal opposition, I have learned a great deal from all honourable senators from every quarter of this house. I have been immensely impressed by the high integrity and the distinguished interventions which all senators bring in dealing with matters which come before this chamber.

Honourable senators, it was with the greatest of distress and sadness that I listened this morning to a minister of the present executive making a statement on national television. When asked about the Pearson airport matter, the Minister of Transport stated:

> We are not going down that road of trying to line our friends' pockets with money, which the Conservative majority in the Senate is trying to protect now.

Honourable senators, as the Whip of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this chamber, the Progressive Conservative Party, I must confess that to hear a minister of the Crown imply that, in dealing with matters of a public nature, and in particular the examination of a bill before this house, distinguished and honourable members of this chamber would conduct themselves in a manner that would have the consequence of lining the pockets of their friends with money, is outrageous.

Honourable senators, my background is not one of high finance, nor is it one of party politics. I came to this chamber to do my duty. I swore an oath to that effect, and I shall abide by it. It has been my experience that each and every member of this chamber does so according to a sense of responsibility and high integrity as well. I should hope that honourable senators will want to disassociate themselves immediately from such intemperate language from a minister of the Crown.

ONTARIO COURT GENERAL DIVISION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE CONDUCT AND BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND JUSTICES—NOTICE WITHDRAWN

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I should like to withdraw the notice of motion currently standing in my name and replace it with another notice of motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Cools can withdraw her notice of motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Notice of motion withdrawn.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT UPON THE CONDUCT AND BEHAVIOUR OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND JUSTICES

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, pursuant to rules 57(1) and 58(1), I give notice that on March 3, 1995, I shall move:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be constituted to examine and report upon the conduct and behaviour of certain justices and barristers of the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division), raised by the Honourable Senator Cools in her speeches on Parliamentary Privilege in the Senate in terms of:

(i) failing to take judicial notice of the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, and the laws of Canada pertaining to the Senate;

(ii) failing to uphold and enforce the said laws, and the immunities and privileges of the Senate;

(iii) interfering with and frustrating the enjoyment and exercise of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(iv) inducing failure to observe and comply with the said laws, immunities and privileges;

(v) impeaching proceedings in Parliament;

(vi) threatening sanctions on the vindication of the said laws, immunities, and privileges;

(vii) their conduct and behaviour generally relating to the Law of Parliamentary Privilege, the Constitution of Canada, the independence of the judiciary, constitutional comity, the dignity of the Senate, and the due administration of justice.

That the committee be further empowered to consider and report upon related matters which may concern the privileges of the Senate; and

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee; and

That the committee be composed of seven members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum; and

That the Committee of Selection be instructed to decide and report upon the membership of the Special Committee.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—NOTICE OF MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO PRIVATIZATION CONTRACTS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I too rise to give notice of a motion. This is something which I do with very little enthusiasm, but it follows upon a number of statements made today by ministers of the Crown, culminating in the one quoted by Senator Kinsella a moment ago.

On Tuesday, March 21, 1995, I will move:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon all matters concerning the policies and negotiations leading up to, and including, the agreements respecting the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 of Lester B. Pearson International Airport and the circumstances relating to the cancellation thereof;

That seven senators, designated by the Standing Senate Committee of Selection no later than two weeks after adoption of this motion, act as members of the special committee, and that three members constitute a quorum;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate;

That the committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical, stenographic and such other staff as deemed advisable by the committee;

That the committee have power to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings; and

That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than one year following the striking of the committee.

AGRICULTURE

REINSTATEMENT OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I have two petitions to present today:

To: House of Commons/Senate in Parliament assembled,

We, the undersigned citizens of Canada wish to draw the attention of the House of Commons/Senate of Canada that the present Crow Benefit, legislated via the Western Grain Transportation Act (WGTA) is being proposed for extinction.

Therefore your petitioners voice their support for the $720 million WGTA and request that Parliament continue the present "Crow Benefit" payment to the railroads.

Your petitioners further request that legislative powers be enacted that will require the railroads to have joint running rights on all lines, and that penalties and efficiencies be policed through a system of rewards and penalties to ensure efficient service. Rail transportation should be classified as an instrument of national unity.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—CONTINUATION OF MARKETING MONOPOLY—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: I have a further petition, honourable senators:

We, the undersigned citizens of Canada, draw the attention to the House to the following:

THAT a very vocal minority of citizens are requesting Parliament institute a dual marketing system for wheat and barley to export.

THEREFORE, your petitioners request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley to export. Your petitioners also request that Parliament expand further Canadian Wheat Board marketing monopoly powers to all grains and oilseeds.

These petitioners are mainly from the eastern part of Saskatchewan.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

COMMITTEE AUTHORISED TO EXTEND DATE OF FINAL REPORT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

That notwithstanding the order of the Senate adopted on Tuesday, November 29, 1994, the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, which was authorized to examine the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide, be empowered to present its final report no later than May 10, 1995; and

That the committee retain all powers necessary to publicize the findings of the committee contained in the final report until May 24, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE JEAN-MAURICE SIMARD

BEST WISHES ON RECOVERY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we begin Question Period, may I be permitted to welcome Senator Simard back to the Senate. Senator Simard has undergone an ordeal that has been crowned with success. Believe it or not, we are good friends. I have missed you, Senator Simard, and I am glad you are back — for today, anyway!

THE SENATE

PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT REGARDING MOTIVES OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, earlier, we heard Senator Kinsella quote a statement made by the Minister of Transport which was originally broadcast early this morning and rebroadcast in its entirety around noon, so one can only assume that the minister is sticking to his statement.

In an answer regarding his opinion of what was going on at Pearson, he said, in part:

> If I was going to do anything like what was done at Pearson, I would shoot myself before doing that. I think it was one of the most dastardly deals ever put together in the history of the country, but that's another story. We are not going down that road of trying to line our friends' pockets with money, which the Conservative majority in the Senate is trying to protect now.

We may have disagreements on the Pearson agreements, but I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us whether she agrees with a statement by her cabinet colleague that her colleagues' on this side sole interest in their approach to Bill C-22 is motivated by its attempt to line our friends' pockets with money.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for his question, and I also thank Senator Kinsella for his observations during Senators' Statements.

As the Leader of the Government in the Senate and as an individual senator in this place for close to 11 years, I do not impute motives to any colleague in this house, no matter where they sit.

• (1350)

There is no question that the Pearson airport is a controversial issue for both Houses of Parliament and for both sides of this chamber. The Senate has taken its responsibility as per its legislative mandate under the Constitution. It has done, and is continuing to do, its job.

As a government, we have responded to the work that the Senate has done by providing amendments to our legislation, as a result of the very credible and fine testimony heard on both sides of the issue before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. There have been further hearings on those amendments and further suggestions arising from those hearings, and the government is currently in the position of studying those suggestions with a view to a further response.

As the Leader of the Government in this place, it is my responsibility to fulfil the commitment of the government to reach a legislative resolution of this issue. That is my motivation and responsibility. I will continue to work in association with all members of this house to resolve the problems and, hopefully, bring this matter to a conclusion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, perhaps I should restate the question.

Will the minister ask her colleague for an apology? If one is refused, will she agree to second a motion of this chamber asking for one, since what the minister said this morning is highly contemptuous of every member in this chamber?

Senator Fairbairn: In reply to my honourable friend, I should like to repeat what I said at the beginning of my response and perhaps add to it.

In no way do I impute motives to any senator in this chamber — to any senator at all. I agree with Senator Kinsella that people who have been appointed to this chamber, men and women from across the country, have accepted the responsibilities of their office seriously and with a sense of honour. It is a privilege to serve in this place.

We are conducting our role as senators. There is no question that this legislation has been before Parliament for almost a year. I think it was in the House of Commons in early April; in June, it was introduced in this place. There is no doubt that the delay has caused difficulty for the government in terms of the administration of public policy towards the airport. The role of this Senate is to do its job as it conceives it in response to legislation.

The delay in the legislation has obviously caused frustration and pressure on individuals. My colleague the Minister of Transport is vigilant in his responsibilities, and he is outspoken. His goal is for a legislated solution to this problem, and I share that goal.

Again, as Leader of the Government in this place, I share with my colleagues respect and admiration for every senator in this house.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will try once again, honourable senators.

The way in which the Leader of the Government in the Senate is pleading, we should be apologizing to the minister for having delayed legislation. By his remarks, in fact, the minister has spread contempt about every member of this house. We should like to know, is the minister speaking for the government, or just for himself? Does he have the support of the Leader of the Government in the Senate for that statement? If not, is the Leader of the Government in the Senate willing to repudiate him in this place? If she does not, and defends the fact that he is frustrated because we are not kowtowing to his wishes, then we can only feel that she supports such scurrilous and defamatory language.

Senator Fairbairn: I say to my honourable friend that I will clarify and repeat that I believe this Senate has done its job on Bill C-22. That is the crux of the issue that has prompted this exchange today. Whether I agree with the pace or agree with some of the views of my friends opposite is not the point.

Honourable senators, I absolutely agree with the fact that the Senate has the right to do its job. It has been doing its job; it will continue to do its job. I hope that, in the context of this upper chamber and of working together, we will conclude this operation.

In answer directly to my friend, I have not spoken to my colleague. I will certainly speak to him and draw to his attention the exchange in this house.

Again, it is the commitment of the government to seek a legislative solution to this very controversial issue; one which has spanned the beginning of an election and the period following that election. It touches us all. I am here to assist in a solution to that issue.

I also repeat that, as a senator and as the leader of this side of the house, I impute motives to no one in this place, and share with my colleagues respect for every senator from every part of Canada who sits in this house.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: May I try one last time honourable senators? I have yet to get an answer. The question is simple, and the answer should be equally simple.

A cabinet colleague of the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that the only reason we have acted as we have, and continue to do so on Bill C-22, is not our interest in the legislation as such, but that we are, to quote him:

...trying to line our friends' pockets with money.

That is what the Minister of Transport has said.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Does she agree with the minister, yes or no, that our whole approach since last April on Bill C-22 has been solely motivated by an attempt to line our friends' pockets with money? Is this the government view? Is this a loose cannon's view? Whose view is it, other than the minister's? So far, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has not told us, either yes or no, that she shares that particular view that we are here to line our friends' pockets with money.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in response to my honourable friend, and to all honourable friends, my view is that senators on the opposition side, as senators on this side, are here to do a job for the people of Canada.

I understand clearly that my colleagues on the other side of the house have viewed this issue as one of legal and constitutional discussion. That is why the matter has been before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs since last September. That committee has heard witnesses — government witnesses, ministerial witnesses, and other official witnesses. We have also heard from eminent legal scholars and practitioners on both sides of the issue, sometimes in opposition and sometimes agreeing, as they did in the last round of hearings before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. That is how I view the role of the opposition on this issue.

As stated clearly by my friend opposite again and again, the purpose of the opposition in this chamber, and in the committee, has been to ensure that the legislation conforms legally and constitutionally to the law of this land. That is what I believe the opposition has been doing. That is why we are holding hearings. Undoubtedly, that is why we will hold further hearings.

• (1400)

The ultimate goal is to reach, together in this chamber, a conclusion that will resolve this piece of legislation in the manner in which all senators have conducted themselves assiduously for the last many months. That is how I read the motivation of my friends opposite.

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY—EFFECT ON GRAIN SHIPPING PORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns the elimination of the subsidy under the Western Grain Transportation Act, known by many as the Crow Rate, which will have an immediate impact on Saskatchewan and the prairie provinces.

Has the Department of Transport undertaken any studies on the effect that the elimination of this subsidy will have on the St. Lawrence Seaway and the Ports of Thunder Bay and Vancouver?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to Senator Tkachuk's question, I will ask both my colleagues the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Agriculture for a response on that issue, which is of monumental importance in our region of the country.

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY—END OF GRAIN MARKETING MONOPOLY OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, there has been an ongoing debate about whether the farmers or the railroads should get the money under this form of subsidy. When the government eliminated the subsidy under the Western Grain Transportation Act, it was to allow farmers more freedom in choosing their own means of transportation. Nevertheless, that subsidy is now completely gone, and there is no control through the power of a subsidy to make farmers sell their grain through the Canadian Wheat Board.

There has been talk on the prairies that this will lead to what many have called a "black market" in grain. Since farmers will no longer be subsidized, they might want to ship their grain at the cheapest possible transportation costs. This means that they may want to sell their grain to the farmer across the road for barter or cash. Some may be tempted to sell grain that would normally be sold to the Canadian Wheat Board to American interests for movement down the Mississippi and export out of the country.

Has the government given any thought to how it will deal with farmers who will attempt to do this in the next couple of years as the shortfall created by this eliminated subsidy falls on their shoulders?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is important to note that while it was announced in the budget that western grain transportation subsidies will end, it was also announced that an up-front, capital sum of $1.6 billion will be shared among farmland owners. Given the fact that this money will not be subject to taxation, it has been suggested to me that it is worth the equivalent of about $2.2 billion. In addition, another transition fund of $300 million will be spread over several years in order to help farmers adapt and adjust to the new conditions.

My honourable friend asks me if there might be a compulsion on the part of the farmers to use an "underground railway" or black market route to sell their grain. I suggest that the compulsion among farmers will be to utilize, to the greatest extent possible, what is available to them through the Canadian Wheat Board, and to take maximum advantage of the export marketing opportunities for Canadian grain, which remain strong. Indeed, after tough negotiations with the Americans last year, we have a strong and high market for sales in that country, which, of course, is our biggest market. I suggest that that will be the motivation of farmers.

I would also suggest that those of us who live in areas where grain is a prime industry might encourage our farmers to take advantage of the opportunity that has come about as a result of this change, which is also an opportunity to diversify across the west. I hope that all our farmers would be encouraged to take the maximum opportunity to do that, as well as to take advantage of the benefits inherent in the Canadian Wheat Board.

We all know that for a great many years — and even prior to that, in the lead-up to the trade negotiations of the original agreement many years ago — there was a passionate desire on the part of the United States to get rid of the Canadian Wheat Board. I suggest that we in this chamber, in particular those of us who hail from Western Canada and who represent Canadians on the farmlands of the prairies, should take a hard look at the Canadian Wheat Board, and in particular its value to Canada in marketing our wheat and grain.

If there is a passionate reason across the border to wish the Canadian Wheat Board gone, then there should be an equally passionate reason on our side of the border to strengthen and improve it, as the Minister of Agriculture has said, and to use it to the utmost to attract the grain sales that will keep our Canadian prairies strong.

TRANSPORT

IMPORTANCE OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-22 TO DEVELOPMENT OF PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, did I understand the Leader of the Government in the Senate to imply, in response to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, that our apparent failure to find a legislative solution to Bill C-22 is in some way holding up the development of Pearson International Airport under a new authority?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I believe Senator MacDonald and I have exchanged questions on this matter before. In terms of official appointments to the authority, until that law is passed, I believe there is an impediment to the full and formal ability of that board to get on with its job.

• (1410)

THE SENATE

PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT REGARDING MOTIVES OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have stood in this place and stated categorically that I would support cancelling the Pearson Airport Agreement if it were not constitutionally and legally correct. I asked for a judicial inquiry and a public inquiry. Will the Leader of the Government please tell me, now, if she believes that I am trying to line the pockets of my friends' with money — yes or no?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe Senator St. Germain is trying to do exactly as he has just stated, to ensure that that piece of legislation passes through this chamber in the appropriate legal and constitutional manner, as does every piece of legislation.

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY—MAINTENACE OF GRAIN ECONOMY IN MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a follow-up question on subsidies under the Western Grain Transportation Act. One of the bad raps given to this subsidy, at least by its critics, is that it has prevented Western Canadian farmers from developing value-added products. It is a well-known fact that durum wheat produced in Canada is the best in the world. One sees packages from the United States saying, "Number 1 Durum Wheat, Made in Canada."

The cancellation of the western grain transportation subsidy will hit Manitoba especially hard. It will cost farmers who wish to transport their wheat through the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway anywhere from $20 to $30 per tonne more.

Given the government's cancellation of this western grain transportation subsidy, have there been any studies or any moves on the part of the government to help maintain the grain economy? Heaven forbid we should have to change to a beef economy or to some other kind of grain. Has the government made any attempt to assist Manitobans and those in Western Canada to produce value-added products by establishing their own factories or mills? There has been some talk, but can the Leader of the Government tell us exactly what the government is doing in its role as the protector of the public interest of all Canadians, including those in Western Canada?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will have to get some help to answer the detail of the question. There are many reasons behind the change of this historic transportation act. One reason is to eliminate the freight rate discrimination against value-added production and processing, diversification and economic growth in the very area of which Senator Spivak speaks.

As to the detail, I will have to ask my colleagues. Certainly, as I mentioned earlier, there is an initial one-time-only payback which I think is familiar to most of the people in Western Canada. There is also a transition fund, and new credit arrangements have been put in place to facilitate agri-food development. These all are part of this package.

Senator Spivak will know that, not just this government, but almost every government has wrestled with this issue. The issue has come to a head, not just because of the fiscal times we are in, but also because of the GATT hearings last December and the forming of the World Trade Organization. The government decided that it was time for action.

I will ask my colleagues, particularly the Minister of Agriculture, for a more detailed response for my honourable friend.

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY—POSSIBILITY OF ASSISTANCE FROM WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, perhaps I should add that I do know about the one-time compensation payments announced in the budget. I also know that the Western Economic Diversification portfolio, which falls under the responsibility of the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, has been reduced. Has that portfolio provoked any thought in this area of diversification and assistance? Money is not the only issue. We need know-how and assistance. Could you please speak to your colleague Minister Axworthy on that question as well?

THE SENATE

PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT REGARDING MOTIVES OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary to my original question. I appreciate the response which has been given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. However, she did not respond to my question.

The integrity of each one of us has been put on the line by the comments of the minister. I am asking directly whether the leader feels that I am going down the road, trying to line the pockets of my friends with money? I want a yes or no answer if at all possible, honourable senators.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answered Senator St. Germain's question. I will repeat my answer and I will repeat it to him personally. I have every confidence and respect in his integrity as a member of this Senate, in the work he does in this Senate and in his work as a member of the opposition in this chamber to ensure that this issue is brought to a conclusion based on legal and constitutional propriety. That is my direct answer to the honourable senator.

CLOSURE OF AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH STATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with regard to the budget as well. The report "New Realities and Tough Choices" which was presented by the standing committees of both Houses suggested one thing in particular — that research and development in agriculture should continue and that it was very important. All witnesses who have appeared before the two committees have brought that message. Yet we are closing seven research stations, according to the budget that I read. Could the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate give some consideration to this matter and give us a reason why?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend Senator Gustafson would know that the Minister of Agriculture has always stressed the importance of excellence in agricultural research. Such excellence is attributed to Canada worldwide.

My honourable friend will know that we are operating in a time of fiscal restraint. The underlying effort of the government in this budget has been to confirm our commitment to getting the deficit down to 3 per cent of GDP in three years. That commitment will be met. In order to meet it, sadly and unfortunately, restrictions have been imposed in virtually all areas of government.

In terms of research, my honourable friend will have seen the list of the establishments in this country which operate under the aegis of the Minister of Agriculture. I do not have the paper in front of me at the moment, but my friend will know which ones are staying open and which ones are to be closed.

• (1420)

The Minister of Agriculture is attempting to maximize the research opportunity by creating, in these stations, research centres of excellence in agriculture across this country. Details of that plan are probably also contained in the document my friend holds. Those stations are protected in order to do the job which those institutions have done so well for Canada and, through Canada, for the world for so many years.

REFORM OF OLD AGE SECURITY—
EFFECT ON ELDERLY WOMEN OF APPLICATION OF CLAWBACK TO HOUSEHOLD INCOME

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Government Leader in the Senate. Yesterday, in the other place, the Prime Minister did not seem to know the contents of the budget of his own Finance Minister, denying measures which are clearly printed on page 58 of the budget plan.

In its budget the government announced a major review of Old Age Security. One of the five principles given for OAS reform in the budget is "the provision of OAS benefits on the basis of family income, as is currently the case with the Guaranteed Income Supplement"; another principle is "control of program costs." This, of course, suggests that the government is looking to achieve savings in this area.

The current clawback is based on individual income. As the minister is surely aware, elderly women rarely have anywhere near the incomes of their husbands.

Would the minister confirm that changing the basis of clawbacks from individual income to family income would have the effect of denying benefits to women based on the incomes of their husbands? Would she also confirm that far more women than men would be affected by a move to base the clawback on family income?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): No, I will not, and cannot, confirm the statements which my friend has made. As she will know, guiding principles have been set out in the budget for some very serious discussions which will take place when the paper on aging and pensions is released in the fall. Those discussions will take place in the context of those principles, two of which have been enunciated by my friend. They will include, in a very active way, seniors and representatives of seniors in this country.

I think everyone, including seniors, knows that our pension system, which is the best in the world, is under considerable stress for demographic reasons. We must ensure that we continue to have a pension system which will offer security and sustainability for our senior citizens into the future. Very serious negotiations will take place, and the seniors of this country will have every opportunity to help mould that plan for the future under the guiding principles that were set forward in the budget.

Senator Lebreton mentioned the clawback. My friend Senator Murray raised a question with me yesterday expressing a concern that when a person retires and his or her income falls substantially, he or she would be deprived of an OAS pension if the salary of the previous year were used as the guideline. I inquired about that, and I was advised by the Department of Finance that an allowance will be made for this and other events that may cause major changes in a person's income. Individuals will be allowed to file statements of anticipated income for the year. I understand that such a procedure is already in place in relation to the Guaranteed Income Supplement.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, after the honourable leader's reply to Senator Lebreton's question, I was a bit unclear as to whether the principle of changing the clawback to having it based on family income is, as she said, a guiding principle or whether it is a firm principle representing a change in policy. Will she tell us which it is?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the principles surrounding the debate that will take place to change and adjust pension policy in this country were laid out in the budget on Monday night. To my knowledge, that is the umbrella under which those discussions will take place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I regret to inform the Senate that the time allotted for Question Period has expired.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bryden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the second reading of Bill C-59, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I rise today to lead off the second reading debate for the opposition in the Senate on Bill C-59. Bill C-59 is an income tax bill. It changes income tax in relation to more than 12 matters. I want to thank the Honourable Senator Bryden for explaining in great detail the main changes which this bill makes.

This afternoon I wish to address three specific issues in connection with Bill C-59. The first deals with the process by which we in the Senate are debating a tax bill emanating from last year's budget just a few days after the 1995 budget has been delivered.

I will then comment on a number of the changes proposed in the bill, and close with particular comment on the abolition of the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption.

Honourable senators, it makes little or no sense that we are here on March 1, 1995, debating the pros and cons of a tax bill based on the February budget of 1994. What position are we in, in relation to this bill? What if we found a grave error? What if we, in our debate here in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, found that the policy behind the bill was ill-founded? What amendments could we then put?

• (1430)

Legally, of course, we could amend whatever we like, but being realistic, we are dealing here with a bill which has been acted upon for more than a year. Taxes have been collected. Tax forms have been made up for people to fill in for the 1994 calendar year based on the changes in this bill. The revenues which will come from this bill, which is not yet law, were taken into consideration by the Minister of Finance in his 1995 budget of Monday night.

Such delays in dealing with the preparation and processing of tax legislation makes a mockery of the parliamentary system. The Senate is not the only institution affected by these delays. The bill was not debated at second reading in the other place until December 1, 1994.

The bureaucracy which drafts these bills, either in the Department of Justice or Department of Finance — I am not sure — must be forced to show at least a little respect for our parliamentary form of government and its traditions. The Minister of Finance, who is responsible for the introduction of these bills in the House of Commons, should insist that these bills, based upon the changes in the budget, be available for tabling within a reasonable time — say 30 days — after the budget is delivered.

By delaying these bills, confusion can be created in the business community and among other taxpayers as to the exact wording of the tax bill. If the tax bill was required to be tabled immediately after the budget or at least within a few days of budget day, its exact wording would be known. People could adjust their financial affairs on the basis of legislation, not simply on the basis of the finance minister's budget speech.

As most of you know, I have been involved in the issue of Senate renewal for much of the past year. One of the proposals of the renewal process is a closer linkage with the House of Commons. This would enable honourable senators to better determine the time lines on legislation destined for the Senate. This relationship with the House was to take the form of a house leaders' joint committee. If such a committee were formed, perhaps it could address this intolerable situation — a situation where we, as legislators, are to give scrutiny to a bill which implements part of a budget that is more than a year old. Not only that, the bureaucracy has been enforcing it for the past year.

Honourable senators, tax bills should be tabled within 30 days of the budget and be in the Senate for action at least by the middle of May if we are dealing with a February budget. If these time lines were adopted, we could at least deal with a bill in a constructive manner rather than as a fait accompli.

Moving to the specifics of the bill, honourable senators, this bill, like other taxation measures, is long and convoluted. In my law practice I am a litigator, not a tax expert. I, like most Canadians, have enough difficulty trying to figure out my own income tax form. The length of tax bills and the arcane wording must be addressed soon. We, as legislators, have really created a monster in the Income Tax Act. It is unfair to Canadians to create an act which is so obtuse as to be incomprehensible, yet costs each Canadian a great deal of his or her income every year.

Bill C-59 has both good and bad aspects. On the good side, as Senator Bryden carefully explained yesterday, it extends indefinitely the Home Buyer's Plan. This, of course, was a plan introduced by the previous Progressive Conservative government. It increases the amount of a charitable donation, which is subject to a larger tax deduction of 29 per cent.

On the minus side, I am not sure I agree with the elimination of the special investment tax credit, a reduction in the Atlantic investment tax credit, and a reduction in the Atlantic scientific research and experimental investment tax credit. We know from the budget documents how much money the government hopes to gain by either reducing or eliminating these items, but we do not know the impact this will have on the regions, especially Atlantic Canada. We simply do not have the figures.

The Atlantic investment tax credit is reduced from 10 per cent to 15 per cent. This is a credit available for certain capital investments in Atlantic Canada. The Atlantic scientific research and experimental investment tax credit is reduced from 30 to 20 per cent.

Honourable senators, when I spoke in the budget debate last year, I complained that the government was doing nothing to help promote the entrepreneurial spirit in Eastern Canada. I set forth an argument that government should act as a catalyst for industry, opening doors for industry, offering encouragement, but leaving it for industry to walk through these open doors. What did I mean by a "catalyst"? Well, I mean programs such as these tax credits which encourage business to expand or invest. This ability to reduce taxes through capital investment or investments in research are good examples of the government getting out of the way. Atlantic Canada needs this kind of tax relief. It is unfortunate that the government chose these two programs to help gather more revenue.

Honourable senators, my main criticism of this bill is the fact that through it, the lifetime $100,000 capital gains exemption is abolished. Under this bill, those who wish to benefit from the exemption for assets held on budget day must declare their accrued gains on their 1994 tax returns. When the previous government reduced the capital gains exemption from $500,000 to $100,000, it was thought that $100,000 was in the range which would be helpful to middle-class Canadians. It would benefit those who had saved and, say, bought a rental property. It would help those who had a modest portfolio of investments put away for retirement. Honourable senators, this elimination may result in the government collecting more revenue, but it will hurt ordinary Canadians. It will hurt the small investor and the small business owner.

However, not only does it hurt these people, but its application as a practical matter has widely varying results when applied to different taxpayer groups. The finance committee in the other place spent a day trying to understand the various applications of Bill C-59. I gather from reading that evidence — and again, I am only a trial lawyer, not a tax lawyer — that the tax consequences vary remarkably as one goes through the various tax-paying groups. In the evidence supplied to the finance committee, it seems that the category including single, middle-aged persons with only employment income benefitted the most. Those struggling at the bottom of the income scale received the least amount of relief from claiming the exemption.

The committee in the other place was told by finance officials that this uneven treatment was a product of our taxation system. Our system does treat different groups in different ways. However, I believe we always felt that the low income earner was not punished by the Income Tax Act.

Honourable senators, I look forward to the discussions in committee on this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bryden, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

THE YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved second reading of Bill C-37, to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to rise today to open the debate on the second reading of Bill C-37.

• (1440)

Since well before the turn of the century, our society has known that crimes committed by young persons should be dealt with in a way different from those committed by adults. By 1908, the Canadian government had accepted the responsibility of legislating the Juvenile Delinquents Act to codify the common law rules and to set up a special court and corrections system for young offenders.

I well remember that when my father was appointed a County Court Judge in Lincoln County, Ontario in 1936, at a salary of $5,000 a year, he was paid an additional stipend of $1,000 a year for his duties as a Juvenile Court Judge.

My father took a keen interest in his work with youth, perhaps naturally, since he himself had five sons and three daughters. He founded a chapter of Big Brothers and involved himself personally in overseeing the reclamation of many youngsters to a productive life. However, that system gave judges and the police tremendous discretion. Unfortunately, all juvenile court officials were not so generously motivated.

After years of study, Parliament finally moved in 1981 to regulate that discretion and to provide more certain guidance for and limitation on the official's discretion. With the support of all parties, Parliament passed the Young Offenders Act.

That act was based on well-defined principles, including young offenders being responsible for their acts, the protection of society, the protection of the rights of children, and the responsibility of parents. The principles were excellent, but since the Young Offenders Act came into force in 1984, and experience has been gained with its practical operation, there has been much public criticism. Parliament tried in 1986, and again in 1992, to make amendments to meet these public concerns. However, the criticism continues to this time.

The problem seems to be to find the acceptable balance between protecting the rights of young people who violate the law and protecting the public from those who commit such illegal acts. That problem has been exacerbated by the radical changes taking place in our society. We are surrounded by violence in television and movies, in games and sports, in news coverage of civil and regional wars throughout the world, and even, sadly, in the happenings in our own neighbourhoods. Our children are necessarily affected by that atmosphere. It is bound to affect their behaviour, their attitude toward adults and our perception of their world.

When I was a boy, some childish tricks, such as dumping over someone's privy on Hallowe'en or harassing a vulnerable teacher, were accepted as such, but we did not carry knives or guns. The quality, extent and effect of childish tricks has changed. The earlier, casual treatment of them has encouraged their extension into vandalism and mayhem.

Society has run ahead of the legislators in understanding these changes. Legislators must try to catch up by modernizing the law, the courts and the correctional system. The question is how best to accomplish this crucial task. Bill C-37 is, at best, a partial solution. These amendments are the first phase of a process that will continue, in a second phase, with a broad and thorough examination of the entire Young Offenders Act, to be carried out by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Bill C-37 amends key aspects of the act, following through on commitments made to the Canadian electorate in the last election. The general approach of these amendments is to seek a balance, to protect the public against violent crime and to assist in the rehabilitation of young offenders. In order to do this, the bill distinguishes first between violent and nonviolent crime, and then between older and younger young offenders.

For those young people guilty of nonviolent crimes, the bill would focus on their assuming concrete responsibility for their acts. The bill directs the youth court, in deciding on a sentence, to take into account that the young person should be held accountable to the victim and to society. This can include payment of compensation, making restitution, compensating by way of personal services and performing community service, to name only a few.

The bill would provide explicitly that imprisonment is to be imposed only after consideration of all reasonably available alternatives. If imprisonment is to be ordered for nonviolent crimes, the youth court must give reasons for the sentence in its decision. In this way, the bill seeks to ensure rehabilitation and integration, which are the primary objectives for young people who commit minor offenses.

As honourable senators know, this was the original concept behind the Young Offenders Act when it was first enacted over 10 years ago. Unfortunately, the reality has been quite different. Over 30 per cent of those young offenders found guilty in youth court receive a sentence involving custody, and over 80 per cent of those in custody are there for nonviolent crimes. The Department of Justice estimates that it costs between $70,000 and $100,000 per year to keep a young person in custody. More important than the cost is the fact that custody is not the best way to rehabilitate and reintegrate young offenders into society. Studies establish that the outcomes for those held in custody are not as good as for those who are not.

The need is for strong community-based sentences. Bill C-37 lays the ground work for the shift to these sentences from custody sentences. The next step is to work closely with the provinces to develop effective, community-based alternatives.

This bill takes a very different approach with respect to those individuals, especially older offenders, who commit violent crimes. First, the bill would increase the maximum penalties for murder. It has become clear that the current maximum penalty of five years for first degree murder is wholly inadequate. Murder is unquestionably the single most serious crime we know. The sanction, even when the perpetrator is a young person, must demonstrate the condemnation by Canadians of this unspeakable act.

Bill C-37 would increase the maximum penalties in youth court to 10 years for first degree murder and seven years for second degree murder. Second, 16- and 17-year olds who are charged with the most serious crimes of violence, that is, first and second degree murder, attempted murder, manslaughter and aggravated sexual assault, would be tried in adult court unless they can satisfy the youth court that their trials should be held in youth court. The youth court judge would have to be persuaded that the interest of society, which includes the objectives of protecting the public and the rehabilitation of the young offender, can be reconciled with the offender being tried in youth court.

These criteria are the same as those which exist under the current law. The bill would simply reverse the onus for 16- and 17-year olds charged with these most serious of offenses. Further, there would not be an automatic transfer of all 16- and 17-year olds to adult court. Rather, the bill reflects this government's conviction that those alleged offenders at the highest ages of the range covered by the act who are charged with the most serious crimes of personal violence should bear the burden of persuading the youth court judge that they should be tried and sentenced in youth court.

The law will remain unchanged for young persons between the ages of 14 and 16. They will be tried in youth court, unless the judge is satisfied that the criteria require transfer to adult court. Those young offenders tried in adult court would face the same penalties that the law provides in adult court.

For 16- and 17-year-olds convicted in adult court of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment, the bill would amend the Criminal Code to increase the amount of the sentence which must be served before becoming eligible for parole to between seven and ten years. For young people under 16 convicted of murder in adult court, this period is increased to between five and seven years.

The bill would also include provisions to ensure that rehabilitation and treatment are more widely available to convicted young offenders being held in custody. The bill would do away with the existing criteria for deciding whether a young person should be placed in open or secure custody. Open custody includes a community residential centre, a group home, a childcare institution or a forest or wilderness camp. Secure custody is a gaol.

For the most part, the sentence depends on the sentence that an adult would receive for that offense. Under Bill C-37, the principle to be applied is that a young person should be placed in a level of custody involving the least degree of containment and restraint having regard to the seriousness and circumstances of the offense; the needs and circumstances of a young person, such as family, school work and so on; the safety of other young people in custody; and the interests of society. This bill would also expressly provide that the level of custody should allow for the best possible match of programs to the young person's needs and behaviours.

The bill introduces victim impact statements into the youth court procedure. At present, these are used only in adult court. The role of victims and their families in the criminal justice system has changed dramatically in the past few years. It is now evident that they want a role to play, particularly with respect to young offenders. Their pain and loss should be acknowledged and heard in the sentencing process. Again, one of the aims of the act is for young people to bear responsibility for their contraventions. A fundamental part of this measure is that the young offenders be aware of the consequences of their actions for the victims and their families. The fact that the court is able to order restitution emphasizes the importance of an assessment of the impact of the crime on the victim.

The next issue I want to address concerns the use of information about young offenders. This has been a source of great controversy, as we all know. It involves balancing the right to privacy of a young offender against the risk to society, understanding that disseminating information about a young offender's criminal past will make reintegration into normal life significantly more difficult.

The amendments would provide for the longer retention of records of young offenders convicted of certain serious offenses. At the same time, young offenders convicted of minor offenses will have their records retained for shorter periods of time. Again, the more effectively we can reintegrate young offenders into society, the less crime we will have to worry about. By contrast, the less successful we are at reintegrating young offenders, the greater the likelihood that these people will continue the cycle of criminal activity. However, for young offenders convicted of serious crimes, these records should be kept for a longer period and the bill will provide for that. Records of convictions for first and second degree murder will be kept indefinitely.

The bill would also provide for the sharing of information between the police and the provincial director for youth justice and school boards, schools and professionals, or others engaged in providing services or care to young persons. The information may also be shared with selected members of the public, if the court authorizes it for purposes of public safety. In this way, students, staff and others can be better protected when young people are prone to violence.

At the same time, the bill would require the information to be kept as private as possible and separate from the student's educational record. It would be destroyed when the information is no longer required; for example, when the young person has left the jurisdiction of the school board.

Honourable senators, I believe that Bill C-37 is a strong move in the direction of assisting our young people who unfortunately misstep and need assistance back onto the right path, while protecting society, and particularly our youth, from those young offenders who pose a real threat to the community. These in my view are the right goals. I urge you to support this bill.

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, I wish to make a few remarks in regard to the budget because, along with a lot of other farmers across the country and in Western Canada particularly, I believe that the budget was very unfair to agriculture.

I will lay out a few facts to begin with. First of all, in the balance of payments recorded by the agriculture minister himself, agriculture was accountable for about one-third of the balance of payments to this country. It would appear to me that we may be trying to kill the goose that lays the golden egg. It is so very important that we maintain a productive agriculture industry in Canada.

The one industry in Canada which has been overproductive is agriculture. If one can fault our farmers for anything, it is for being too productive. From that standpoint alone there is a different qualification with regard to budgets. We have had cuts in agriculture in the areas of research and transportation. Transportation subsidies were cut by 100 per cent.

I took part in the debate in the House of Commons on the Crow Rate. I am told that it was the second longest debate in the history of this country. The only debate which was longer was a Senate debate in 1918. We debated for hours about how the subsidy should be paid out, about whether it should be paid to the railroads or to the farmers. We went on and on about it, and there were different opinions on how it should be done.

It is interesting to note that it now looks as though no one will get paid. Landowners will get a once-in-a-lifetime, minimal payment.

On that point, my colleague reminds me that 40 per cent of farmers rent some land. Those farmers will not get a cent under this agreement. Yet, they will have to adjust to a possible increase of $18 to $20 a tonne for shipping their grain, which will bring the price of the grain down. The farm groups which appeared before the committee recommended that there be a payout to farmers of approximately $7 billion. We are getting $1.6 billion.

A number of things come into question with regard to how this will affect agriculture in Canada in the long term. Although there are some positive aspects, I want you to consider the following aspects. The first is the drop in the price of grain. In 1985, the price of wheat was between $5 and $6 a bushel. I delivered some grain two weeks ago for which I received just over $3 a bushel. That is half of what I would have received in 1985.

We must deduct from that $3 a bushel increased freight rates, which could be 50 cents a bushel. A bushel of wheat does not bring a great deal of money to farmers, and we do not have a program to help them make the transitions relevant to GATT and to competing in the North American market with the U.S. We have to compete in that market. In fact, we have no guarantee that the Export Enhancement Program in the United States will be removed, and I question that. In this budget we have sold out a very important part of the price of grain, and that will impact on the future of our farmers.

What does this do to the price of land? It is bound to drop, at least in the immediate future. The price of land which is on branch lines up to 80 miles from a main line will drop more significantly. Farmers who happen to be located on a main line will have a certain advantage; they will get their grain out more cheaply. However, farmers on branch lines will have to pay to truck that grain to the main line. There is no question that this will devalue the price of the land. I do not know whether the government took these things into consideration.

I sat on the St. Lawrence Seaway Committee. At one time, 75 per cent of our grain went out through the St. Lawrence Seaway. Today, only a small percentage of our grain goes out that way. It is obvious that on this point the Minister of Transport won out over the Minister of Agriculture. Mr. Goodale lost the battle and got skinned badly. Western farmers are well aware of that.

This will be another nail in the coffin of the St. Lawrence Seaway, and could even close it, because there will not be sufficient funds to transport grain through it, and we will have to go out through the West Coast ports. There is just no other way to get the maximum price for our grain. Without a doubt, this will have a major impact on the St. Lawrence Seaway.

What about the advantage to the U.S.? Through the years, I have had opportunities to speak with people from the CPR and CNR who have come to my office. We always used to tell them that if they got too tough with us we would have no choice but to take our grain down through the Mississippi. It is interesting to note that the largest percentage of wheat is grown within 100 miles of the U.S. border. It is also interesting to note that the CPR has bought the running rights into Minneapolis. The Sault line goes right by my door. It is obvious to me that they are pretty well prepared for it. A lot of this grain will go south.

We have a problem there. Our government does not really believe in the free trade agreement, so it is not fighting for farmers on issues dealing with the U.S. One need only compare the prices. We have now given up the Crow because the Americans were demanding it. Have they given up their Export Enhancement Program? According to Senator Olson yesterday, the American army bears much of the cost of keeping the Mississippi waterway open. That is not seen as a subsidy. We never argued that it was a subsidy, so we will have some real problems competing with the U.S.

This winter I had the opportunity to drive through Kansas. I did that intentionally to find out what the feed lots are doing down there. Cargill is feeding 150,000 steers in Garden City, Kansas. Two-thirds of all the cattle produced in feed lots are produced around Garden City in the state of Kansas and packed out of there. Feed lot after feed lot feed 30,000 to 40,000 steers. Iowa beef producers are the biggest beef producers in the United States. They bought out the biggest feed lot in Alberta and they are going to double the size of it.

Canadians need to wake up and smell the roses. We must seize the opportunities that are available to us. Instead of cutting our farmers into the dust, let us do something positive for them. We are a productive people, but we will be on the short end of the stick when it comes to trade with the United States because they are moving forward. We too should be moving forward. I am for a continental market. I am also for a level playing field. If our government will not fight for a level playing field through taxation and through the way in which it deals and negotiates with American farmers, then we will be lost.

In November 1993 I compared the prices of grain grown in Canada and sold at my own elevator in Macoun with the price of Canadian grain sold at an elevator in Crosby. In Macoun, we were getting $2.40 Canadian for our wheat. The Americans were getting $6 and change in Canadian dollars for hard wheat. They were getting over $8 for durum while we were getting $3.50. How can one compete? Yet, the Americans cry about a level playing-field while looking at our Crow Rate, which we gave to them voluntarily in this budget without expecting anything from them in terms of competition It is important that we as farmers compete in the continental market. That is a reality.

When we were introducing the NAFTA and talking about the importance of competing in the international market, the Liberals said, "We do not want any part of that." They signed it, but they do not understand it well enough to defend it. It is obvious in this budget that they do not understand it. They have sold our farmers out.

There is an east-west faction involved here as well. In terms of the marketing, there was a cut of 30 per cent. In terms of the Crow Rate, there is a cut of 100 per cent. That affects Western Canada very significantly.

Other areas have been cut as well. I mentioned in my question earlier the closing of seven research stations. Of the farm groups that have appeared before the joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate, every one has said it is important to have research and development. Why? It is important in order to have better varieties of grain.

In terms of research and development, I voted for the check-off that was introduced. Some 90 per cent of farmers asked for their money back because on many farms they were deducting as much as $1,000 a farm. The government is closing seven research stations in an industry that is productive and adds to our balance of payments. This is not a handout. The average Canadian spends 10 per cent of his income on food. That is the second lowest figure in the world. Canadians eat well, thanks to the farmers. Somehow or other, the government of the day does not understand that.

I want to refer to a motion in regard to the budget that was introduced in the Saskatchewan legislature. It sends a message to us all. It condemns the federal government for being grossly unfair and ignoring the needs of the western provinces of Canada by cutting grain transportation subsidies by 100 per cent and offering a minimal $1.6 billion one-time payment to landowners. As a result of this decision land values in Saskatchewan will drop. The moratorium on closing branch lines will end. The ultimate result of this action will be a dramatic and devastating effect on Saskatchewan as a whole. Following the adoption of that motion in the legislature, it was moved that a verbatim copy of the debate be forwarded to the Prime Minister and the federal Minister of Agriculture for immediate attention and consideration.

Honourable senators, this is a serious budget for agriculture. It will have a long-standing impact. We farmers are an optimistic bunch. We do not mind working hard. We know what production is all about, however, we have to be given a level playing field and a chance. This budget really straps us severely.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Carstairs, debate adjourned.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to revert to Commons Public Bills:

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bryden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, for the second reading of Bill C-216, An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service). — (Honourable Senator Berntson).

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this is neither the most compelling nor the most exciting bill that has been presented to the house. Thus, I will not spend a great deal of time on debate at the second reading stage of Bill C-216.

We are prepared to see it go to committee at this time. There we will seek clarification on a couple of issues.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Bryden, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

PRIVATE BILL

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kirby, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lawson, for the second reading of Bill S-8, An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of the Certified General Accountants' Association of Canada. — (Honourable Senator Berntson).

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the spirit of cooperation which seems to have settled over this place, I would, likewise, suggest that this side not oppose this bill going to committee at this time.

There are a couple of questions on this bill as well that will need clarification. They can be amply handled in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO PERMIT
COVERAGE OF MEETINGS BY ELECTRONIC MEDIA

Hon. Colin Kenny, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, February 28, 1995, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be empowered to permit coverage by electronic media of its public proceedings with the least possible disruption of its hearings.

He said: Honourable senators, briefly, this is a motion to empower the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources to admit electronic media from time to time if it has witnesses that it thinks would be of particular interest to the general public.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: When is the meeting, Senator Kenny?

Senator Kenny: It is not for any particular meeting. It would still require a motion by the committee in each and every case, but it is necessary to get empowerment from this body first for it to do that. The committees that have that authority have requested it from the chamber. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is one and the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources is attempting to do the same.

Senator MacDonald: When is your next meeting, senator?

Senator Kenny: The next meeting is scheduled for March 28.

Senator MacDonald: I congratulate the senator, because I have noticed instances where there have been requests for television coverage of a committee that was to meet within half an hour. Honourable senators realize that it usually takes a little more time than that to carry a camera into a room. There is that presumption.

I would suggest, honourable senators, that those wishing television coverage at least give a week's notice. It is taken for granted that people will cover the committee, but a week's notice would be in keeping with the tradition.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Would the Honourable Senator Kenny take a question?

Senator Kenny: Certainly.

Senator Di Nino: I also agree with the principle behind this motion, but I assume he is talking about public media being invited to attend to televise the proceedings as opposed to setting up our own service.

Senator Kenny: Yes, that is quite correct. We are not talking about anything owned or operated by the Senate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is nice to know that Senator MacDonald from Halifax has had experience both behind and under the camera, as well as in front of the camera and carrying the camera.

This being Wednesday, honourable senators, I also observe that a number of standing committees are scheduled to meet at 3:15 p.m. They are overdue, and some have witnesses from out of town. I encourage all honourable senators to go to their committee meetings as soon as possible.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 2, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—
IMPORTANCE OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-22 TO DEVELOPMENT—
STATEMENT BY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in reply to a question asked yesterday by the Honourable Senator Finlay MacDonald with respect to whether any development at Pearson airport is being held up because of the impasse over Bill C-22, the Leader of the Government replied, and I quote:

> ...until that law is passed I believe there is an impediment to the full and formal ability of that board to get on with its job.

The board referred to is the Canadian Airport Authority which is to administer Pearson airport.

I do not envy the leader's position during Question Period. She must often rely on briefing notes and other government material to answer questions covering a wide variety of topics. It is unfortunate, but perhaps not surprising, that her answer to Senator MacDonald is in error, as it was no doubt based on information provided by the Minister of Transport, who has become notorious for engaging in calumny and distortion.

The facts are as follows: On January 16, 1995, the Honourable Mr. Justice Borins of the Ontario Court of Justice, General Division, rendered a judgment which ordered the deletion of the registration of the lands and premises subject to the Pearson Airport Agreement. What this means is that T1-T2 Limited Partnership has no interest whatsoever in any property which was the subject of negotiations between it and the Government of Canada.

Mr. Justice Borins' judgment is a public document. It is certainly known to the Department of Transport. It must have been brought to the attention of the minister. Yet he persists in engaging in smear, distortions and insults while referring to a favourite muck-raking author for guidance rather than relying on the facts as provided by his officials.

It is deplorable that by having the Leader of the Government in the Senate unknowingly repeat the same misinformation the minister shows so little respect for her responsibilities in this place on behalf of the Government of Canada.

ELIMINATION OF ATLANTIC FREIGHT RATE SUBSIDIES

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, it is clear from the recent budget that the government has taken a fair shot at Western and Atlantic Canada. Just as the elimination of the WGTA in Western Canada will weigh heavily on grain producers in that part of our country, the dismantlement of the Maritime and Atlantic freight rate subsidies, which trace their roots to Confederation, will have a devastating impact on our region's manufacturers, producers and shippers.

Given our remote location from markets, these subsidies over the years had helped at least to minimize the disadvantage and allow producers and manufacturers to compete on a level playing field with their counterparts in Central and Western Canada and, indeed, even in the United States. With these subsidies eliminated, rail and truck transportation costs will increase by as much as 35 to 40 per cent, not to mention the direct impact on some 12,000 jobs.

I noticed that announced in the cuts to the western freight subsidies that an ex gratia payment of some $1.6 billion will be made to western farmland owners. As well, they will be recipients of a multi-year WGTA adjustment package of $300 million to assist in the transition period, all of which we support. I am not questioning that.

However, some clarification is required on the part of someone. Was it simply an oversight that a similar program was not announced for Atlantic Canada? Should we eagerly anticipate just such an announcement? I hope that the $326 million allotted under the Transportation Adjustment Program is not what Paul Martin and Doug Young consider to be an adequate replacement for a program that totals some $100 million annually. Our infrastructure is certainly important, and any assistance in that regard is most welcome. However, it does not address the issue of providing direct assistance to our hog producers and our potato farmers who rely on these programs to remain competitive with our neighbours in the west and south of the border.

Honourable senators, later on, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether she can shed some light on this matter and whether Atlantic Canadians might look forward to further announcements from the government in this regard.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, because it appears that we will not be sitting next week, I draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that on March 8 the world will be celebrating International Women's Day.

• (1410)

The theme in the country in which we are all fortunate enough to live will be "Creating a World of Equality," and that is exactly the same theme which will be brought by this government to the fourth United Nations' world conference on women to be held in Beijing, China, in September of 1995.

Canada has been an international leader in the advancement of women, and that is true no matter what political party has been in government. Despite the UN goal of full equality for women worldwide by the year 2000, we know that for many women it has been a backward step, not a forward advancement. However, that has not been the case in our country, and I would draw the attention of senators to a number of changes which have taken place just within the last year.

In December 1994, legislation was introduced to extend the Employment Equity Act to cover the entire public service, as well as publicly regulated companies with more than 100 employees. Women who own small businesses have benefited from moves to improve access to capital and the opening up of the loans approval processes. The Court Challenges Program was reinstated in October 1994, and this will make challenges, particularly under section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, more possible. The Canada Student Loan program was amended in order to allow new grants for certain women pursuing doctoral studies. There have been clarifications to specific provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act which will allow women to leave their jobs due to sexual or other forms of harassment. Positive measures with respect to breast cancer research have been introduced in this country.

All of us will want to rejoice in the greater equality of opportunity for women in this country and the promotion of that equality worldwide.

IMMIGRATION

IMPOSITION OF RIGHT OF LANDING FEE— EFFECT ON POOR IMMIGRANTS

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, Minister Martin's budget contains a particularly offensive proposal.

Senator Berntson: More than one!

Senator Di Nino: This budget imposes a head tax on all new immigrants and refugees. On top of the present processing fee of $500, there will now be an additional right-of-landing fee, as they call it, against each immigrant or refugee in the amount of $975. The move is purely a cash grab that will net the federal government $146 million in 1996-97. The cost to a family of four immigrating to Canada would be $3,160. Compare this to the fee in the United States of $1,644. This government was also the first to establish a fee for landing of genuine refugee claimants. This is the Liberal way of welcoming immigrants.

Honourable senators, my mother, my father and I arrived in Halifax at the historic Pier 21 in August, 1951, with paper suitcases full of dreams. Like those before us and those who followed us, we have helped to shape and build the best country in the world. I know we would not have been able to afford the type of fees Minister Marchi and this Liberal government have now imposed on each person wanting to build a new life in Canada. I wonder whether Minister Marchi and his family had the resources to pay such a fee when they came to Canada.

I believe that it is a privilege to be admitted to the Canadian family, but I believe it is a privilege which the largest majority of new Canadians pay for with their broad and strong backs, their determination and drive, their ingenuity, and some with their lives, all while making Canada stronger and better. Yet, this Liberal government, the protector of Canadian values, the friends of immigrants, in fact Canada's political hypocrites, have now imposed a head tax on each new immigrant and refugee. How many will not be able to come to Canada because they will not be able to afford these fees?

The "Red Manifesto" of the Liberal Party contains commitments and promises which continue to be broken, but this provision to impose a head tax on all those who come to Canada is a blatant betrayal of the principles espoused by Liberal promises over the years and the promises contained in the Red Book. I hope my colleagues opposite feel a little shame and anger, and I hope they let Minister Marchi know.

DISBANDING OF CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, as I was growing up in this country, every year the words "Lest we forget" served to remind us of the contribution that individual Canadians have made to give us the freedoms and opportunities that we enjoy. There is no greater calling than to serve one's country and to be prepared to stand in harm's way, or in fact to risk one's life, or indeed to pay the ultimate price. That is precisely what many Canadians did when they served with honour in the Airborne Regiment for some 27 years.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Andreychuk: That calling and sacrifice was shared, not only by the members of the Airborne Regiment, but also by their families and friends. It is not an easy task.

Yesterday, the Airborne Regiment was disbanded. While individual members may be reassigned when an institution in which they are involved is disbanded, they are dishonoured nonetheless. Individuals, no matter what their personal success or contributions, are affected by this action and are tainted.

In the haste to correct the wrongdoings and perhaps the unlawful acts in the regiment, the Government of Canada has committed a wrongdoing to the innocent of that regiment. Our system of justice has always been one that stated, "Let a guilty go free lest an innocent be hung." I believe that, in disbanding the regiment this principle was violated.

I urge the Government of Canada to reconsider its decision, or at least to come forward with a plan to ensure that those who served well and with honour within the regiment for some 27 years can in fact be proud of their history and their contribution. We must not forget them.

FARM SAFETY WEEK

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, next week is National Farm Safety Week. The declaration of that time to draw attention to farm safety marks the start of a national farm safety campaign supported by farm groups, organizations and government departments across Canada. This year, the agricultural community is being urged to take the challenge to focus on farm safety and health, not only during the designated week but as a year-round, daily concern.

During this week, several unsettling facts about farm safety will be highlighted. We lose approximately two people a day in farm accidents. Disabling injuries are suffered by agricultural producers on more than a daily basis. There are needless injuries and fatalities suffered by young children and senior citizens in the rural community, a matter which is all the more the case because in the agricultural setting the home is located on the work site and is often also the playground for children. As a result, it creates a hazard of which we must be more conscious. We must do more to ensure that these terrible accidents we hear about so often do not occur.

Certainly the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is aware of the hazards faced by our agricultural producers and their families. On September 22, 1992, Senator Barootes, our former colleague, then Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, sought the Senate's consent for the committee to examine farm safety and farm-related health issues. On June 21, 1993, Senator Berntson tabled an interim report entitled "Farm Stress: Its Economic Dimension, Its Human Consequences."

The committee continued its examination of farm safety and health-related issues by receiving testimony related to machinery use, a particularly important issue given the prevalence of fatalities and injuries associated with the operation of farm machinery. A report summarizing the testimony received by the committee will be tabled in the near future, as the issue of farm safety and farm health remains a critical concern, not only to members of the committee and farmers, but to all Canadians.

As noted by Minister Martin in the budget on Monday, all Canadians must take greater responsibility for their lives. Certainly National Farm Safety Week would be an opportune time for farmers and farm families to take the challenge of safeguarding their own safety and health.

In closing, I encourage all honourable senators to take the time during Farm Safety Week to learn about farm health and safety and to take back to your provinces the message of the importance of farm health and safety.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with the usual admonition that we could be recalled under very special circumstances, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 21, 1995 at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-CHINA RELATIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS IN CHINA AND TIBET—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, March 21, 1995, I will move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cohen:

> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to express concern over continuing reports of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in China and particularly Tibet by local, provincial and national authorities and severe restrictions on the rights of citizens to freedom of assembly, association, expression, religion, as well as to due legal process and fair trial; and
> That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to encourage the People's Republic of China to take further measures to ensure the observance of all human rights, including the rights of women and children, and to improve the impartial administration of justice; and
> That the Senate request the Government of Canada to encourage the government of the People's Republic of China to allow foreign delegations to Tibet to study the human rights situation, the state of religious freedom, the status of women, the treatment of Tibetan children and prison conditions; and

That the Senate urge the Government of Canada to extend support to Tibetan people in their struggle to regain their freedom and the presentation of their culture; and

That the Senate encourage the Government of Canada to support the non-violent efforts of his holiness, the Dalai Lama, to resolve the issue of Tibet, particularly the Dalai Lama's campaign to make Tibet a zone of ahimsa, non-violence, through demilitarization and the protection of Tibet's natural environment; and

That the Senate implore the Government of Canada to ask the Chinese authorities to commence negotiations with his holiness, the Dalai Lama, and to the Tibetan Government in exile and representatives of the People's Republic of China on the future of Tibet without preconditions.

PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF TRANSPORT REGARDING MOTIVES OF CERTAIN SENATORS— POSITION OF LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I brought to the attention of the Leader of the Government a statement made by the Minister of Transport to the effect that, in his opinion, the position of 52 of her colleagues on Bill C-22 was motivated largely, if not solely, by the fact that they were trying to line their friends' pockets with money.

Now that 24 hours have elapsed and the leader has had a chance to reflect on this statement, can she give me a more direct answer to my question of yesterday: that is, "yes" or "no," does she agree with her colleague the Minister of Transport's statement regarding our motivation, and is this also a sentiment shared by the Prime Minister and other cabinet colleagues?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday I undertook to draw to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Transport the discussion that took place in this house, and I did so. The minister assured me of his strong support for the work of the Senate in finding a resolution to Bill C-22. Second, he assured me that it was not his intent to cause personal affront to any member of this place.

Honourable senators, I spoke to my colleague today. I know in the heat of the moment words are used on both sides of this house, and they are used on both sides of the other House. I respect the integrity of my colleagues, and when the Minister of Transport assured me this morning that he had no intention of causing personal affront to anyone in this place, I accepted the word of my colleague.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for having revealed the particulars of what was obviously a private conversation, since none of those sentiments have been revealed by the minister, himself, publicly.

As a matter of fact, the minister, rather than retracting or amending his comments, or better still, what he should do, which is resign from the government for the contempt that he has heaped upon this Senate, has kept on along the same lines. Yesterday afternoon during a scrum, he said:

> So I will just let the Conservative majority in the Senate continue to try to take care of their friends, and I am going to try to take care of Pearson airport.

Then, blaming us for the delay in renovations and essential works to be done at Pearson, he spoke of:

> ...the enormous potential that is being stifled because of people who have no concern at all for the public interest in Canada...

Again, he is talking about 52 members of this place.

It is only fair to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether her colleague's repeated statements about the motivations of 52 of her colleagues are shared by her and by other members of the cabinet.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the first statement that I made in this chamber yesterday was that, as Leader of the Government here, and as a senator, on no occasion would I impute motives to any individual in this chamber, regardless of where they sit.

As I said to my honourable friend, I have had a conversation today with my colleague. I have reported to the members of this Senate, as I indicated I would, and as he encouraged me to do, that it was not his intent to cause personal affront to any member of this place.

He also went on at some length, and with some degree of passion, regarding his support for any continued effort that members of this chamber together can make to accomplish what is at the centre of this issue: the successful conclusion and resolution of the Pearson airport issue, including Bill C-22.

In a number of comments to me, he urged every effort and offered every support for the conclusion of this particular piece of business, which has caused very heated emotions to be expressed on either side of this house and, indeed, in the other place.

The motivation for all of us, and the motivation for the Minister of Transport, is to reach a solution that will permit the development of the largest airport in this country, serving millions of the travelling public, and producing thousands of jobs during the development process itself. Honourable senators, I hope that we will all make every effort to find a mutually agreed upon solution to permit that to happen.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I have a final question. The question I have been asking for the last two days has nothing to do with Bill C-22. Whether Bill C-22 is delayed indefinitely, the proof exists that the Government of Canada can proceed with whatever renovations are required.

• (1430)

The question has to do with repeated statements by a minister of the Crown heaping contempt and suggesting motives of illegality by members of the Parliament of Canada who happen to be in the Senate. To whisper to his colleague, "I did not really mean it, you know; I hope I did not offend anyone" is cowardly, and to refuse to apologize in public can only be confirmation that everything he said he believes, since he refuses to retract.

Honourable senators, these are not impulsive, emotional sentiments which one regrets once having said them. He has been constantly heaping abuse on this side of the chamber for nearly a year. Yesterday afternoon he made the most recent of many outbursts. He said:

> Look, let's be clear on this. This bunch — that is, 52 of your colleagues in this place —

> This bunch did not give a damn about the Canadian public interest when they did this. They don't care about it now.

How much of this can we take and how long will the Leader of the Government in the Senate defend such irresponsibility?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, further to the comments of my honourable friend, of course the future of Pearson airport and Bill C-22 are part of what we are discussing in this chamber.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That was not my question.

Senator Fairbairn: It is fundamental to the questions which are being asked in this chamber because it is the very heat and controversy of this issue which has caused colleagues on both sides of Parliament to make unparliamentary comments — in this house even my honourable friend has periodically found himself using colourful language.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I never called the minister a crook.

Senator Fairbairn: I do not believe the minister has ever called anyone a crook either.

My honourable colleague, and he is an honourable colleague, has taken his responsibilities as the Minister of Transport very vigilantly. As I said, he is committed with passion and emotion to getting the job done. He is also assuring me very strongly of his support for this chamber, my friends opposite and my friends on this side of the house, to work together to get the job done for the people of Toronto, all the people of Canada, and all those who travel on the airlines.

He has said to me today, honourable friends, that he intends no personal affront to anyone in this chamber. I accept his words.

AMENDMENTS TO BILL C-22—REFUSAL BY MINISTER TO APPEAR BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In this new-found spirit of cooperation, could the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate explain why the minister refuses to come before the Senate committee to deal with the amendments to Bill C-22?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been told by colleagues on the other side of their understanding that the Minister of Transport or his office has said that he would not come before the committee. I shall verify that with him personally. I hope that in the days ahead we will be able to bring forward propositions which can be studied by that committee, and that we will be able to come to a conclusion on the outstanding points which Senator Beaudoin has indicated in the conclusion of the latest testimony. Perhaps that will move us forward on this legislation.

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Today, I read the transcript of the remarks of the Minister of Transport at yesterday's scrum. Mr. Diefenbaker once said of Otto Lang that if there were three patches of cow dung in a field, he would step in all of them. I would say of Mr. Young that if there was one patch of cow dung in a field, he would step in it.

An. Hon. Senator: Young dung!

Senator Tkachuk: I can understand that the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows that there may be a cabinet shuffle coming up. At least those are the rumours around Ottawa. I can understand her reluctance to do the Conservatives a favour. I beg her to urge the Prime Minister to keep Mr. Young in cabinet and perhaps to elevate him to the post of Deputy Prime Minister and give us Sheila Copps. On second thought, forget I said that.

Would she undertake, on our behalf and on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, to urge the Prime Minister to ensure that Mr. Young continues in his post as Minister of Transport?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am not aware of any substance to the rumours which my friend Senator Tkachuk has just shared with us. I will certainly pass on the honourable senator's views, on behalf of his colleagues, to the Prime Minister.

Honourable senators, in the past year I have watched my colleague the Minister of Transport go through an incredibly difficult task in an incredibly difficult department. I join with my friend Senator Tkachuk in hoping that the minister will retain his Transport portfolio so that he can continue to work for Canadians with vigour and enthusiasm and with an eye to making it the best, most productive and efficient system that this country can possibly have, now and in the future.

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be good enough to suggest to her colleague the Minister of Transport that he spend less time nosing through Ms Cameron's fictional account of the Mulroney government, now thoroughly discredited by most serious journalists and political observers, and spend some time reading the official documentation concerning the Pearson agreements, perhaps even the contracts themselves?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I wish to tell my honourable friend Senator LeBreton that I am certain that the Minister of Transport is very knowledgeable about every aspect of the Pearson airport. He is indefatigable, and I am sure that he can manage a wide range of reading material. I will certainly pass my friend's views on to him.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—POSSIBILITY OF JUDICIAL INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. With regard to the issue of the comments by the Minister of Transport, it seems that she intends to protect the position of the minister. Given this situation, the controversy and the fact that the leader is concerned about the credibility of this establishment and all its members, is the government now ready to set up a judicial or public inquiry, as has been requested by this side of the house on numerous occasions, in order to clarify this entire situation, to bring forward the facts pertaining to the entire disagreement, to clear the names of all of those involved, or to bring to justice those who are alleged to have done something wrong? Is the government now prepared to call for this judicial or public inquiry?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, over the past year the government's prime responsibility in this area has been to try to legislate a conclusion to the original Pearson Airport Agreement, as it promised to do prior to the election in October of 1993. Obviously it has been a long road. I would hope that, in terms of this legislation, we may be coming close to resolution.

The question of an inquiry has come up a number of times, honourable senators, as far as this house is concerned. You are absolutely right, Senator St. Germain. I will go to any length, and in whatever way I can, to ensure the integrity of this chamber and those who serve in it.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has proven itself to be a fine committee in dealing with some of the issues it has had to tackle in recent years. I believe the committee has been doing its job. As I said yesterday, my friends on the other side may not like — indeed they do not like — certain parts of the legislation or the program of the government on this issue. Obviously, there are people on this side who disagree honestly with friends opposite. There were disagreements among some of the most credible legal spokespersons in this country who appeared before the committee.

Senator Berntson: Not very much.

Senator Fairbairn: All of this, in the end, is narrowing the issues down to what I believe could be very productive ground for an agreement.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Why will the minister not come and speak to the committee?

Senator Fairbairn: The issue which has been of prime importance to my friends opposite, and which has been underlined time and again, particularly by the Leader of the Opposition, has been their overriding concern on the question of law and due process, and the constitutionality of this legislation. However, yesterday my honourable friend put forward a notice of motion in this chamber for a public inquiry on quite another track on this particular issue. If you go back into the testimony of the Minister of Transport when he appeared before the committee some time ago, this issue, in fact, arose —

Senator Berntson: When he asked us who we represented.

Senator Fairbairn: The minister said that if honourable friends were interested in pursuing that matter, then so be it. We know the situation in this chamber. As the Leader of the Opposition indicated yesterday, if my friends opposite wish to proceed with such an investigation, then so be it.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, the minister himself, at one point I believe, threatened or attempted to threaten this particular house with an inquiry. Now we are simply asking the government to come forward with a judicial inquiry or a public inquiry so we can clear the names of those who are being accused of doing something wrong. Whether the Leader of the Government wants to admit it or not, the statements in the last couple of days have clearly indicated that there is a possibility — at least the minister seems to think there is. Why not have a public or a judicial inquiry and clear up the question once and for all? Then we can get on with the business of the country. It is the Minister of Transport and your government who are holding up the entire process.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I honestly would like to read over that question in the Debates of the Senate and think about it over the next two weeks. The intent and the fervent desire of the government is to get on with the passage of this legislation, to get on with the development of Pearson airport, to do the kinds of things we had promised to do in the election; the kinds of things that people are expecting in terms of that airport and the travelling public.

Senator Berntson: You can do all of that.

Senator Fairbairn: There is a strong desire to get on with that. Given the fiscal considerations within our country, as were underlined in a tough but fair budget the other day, there has always been a concern in relation to this matter about making the taxpayers of Canada vulnerable to possible payments of up to half-a-billion dollars. All of these elements contribute to the tremendously difficult positions in which both sides of this house find themselves. Perhaps it is a credit to the integrity and the workmanlike relationship we enjoy in this chamber that the committee has proceeded in the way it has. It is taking a long time, but that does not preclude the possibility of a positive result.

JUSTICE

APPOINTMENT OF SISTER OF MINISTER OF TRANSPORT TO COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF NEW BRUNSWICK— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday, while Transport Minister Doug Young was making blatantly false accusations against senators on this side of the house, he had his sister appointed as a justice of the Court of Queen's Bench in New Brunswick.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: A great Canadian, no doubt!

Senator Phillips: That appointment is worth at least $2.5 million during her expected term, not allowing for any increases in judges' salaries. That should be enough to line one handbag, unless she is the Imelda Marcos of the handbag industry.

How does this appointment reconcile with the promises made in the Red Book about no patronage?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must confess I was not aware of this appointment. However, I would urge my honourable friend to consider the merit of the individual who has received the appointment.

Senator Berntson: Everything being equal, it will go to a Liberal.

Senator Fairbairn: First, as my honourable friend knows, unlike the myriad of appointments that were available in the past, there has been a significant reduction in the numbers of these kinds of openings available across this country.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Not judges.

Senator Phillips: Not in New Brunswick.

Senator Fairbairn: Not in New Brunswick? In terms of the particular appointment brought to my attention by my friend, that person should be judged on the merit she is bringing to the job.

Senator Berntson: I think she is a Tory, anyway.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am quite willing to concede that Madam Justice Young has a great many qualifications, but so did the people who were involved in the Pearson consortium. That has not been taken into consideration here.

I have a two-part supplementary question. First, does the minister have any brothers or sisters awaiting appointment? Second, would the recommendation by a minister of the Crown of a relative for an appointment be considered to fall within the double-dipping legislation proposed by the government?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Like a nephew?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have no brothers. I have a very fine elder sister who lives in Wisconsin, of whom I am extraordinarily fond. I am quite sure she is content and happy in her life where she is, and my friend need not worry about anything along that line.

Senator Phillips: I really had Doug Young in mind, rather than the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate.

• (1450)

Senator Fairbairn: That gives me an opportunity to pay tribute to my sister.

I must confess that I got so carried away that I forgot the second part of my friend's question. However, I will look it up and take it seriously, as I always do, Senator Phillips.

[Translation]

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT— DELAY IN REDEVELOPMENT OF TERMINALS 1 AND 2

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I did not know that in coming to the Senate I would get a lot more exercise simply by rising in my place time and time again.

Honourable senators, let us talk about the development of the Pearson airport. For about a year, the Minister of Transport has been saying that the Senate's attitude is blocking development of the Pearson airport. You, yourself, referred to this excuse just a while ago.

For my first question, I would like you to tell us or explain to us what is preventing the transport minister from going ahead with the development of Terminals 1 and 2 at Pearson International Airport.

I will help you with your answer. A month and a half ago, the Ontario Court General Division decided that the deeds are clear. The airport is yours, in the sense that it is the government's, and no one can claim any right to these terminals.

Honourable senators, what is stopping the government from going ahead, tomorrow morning, with the maintenance, renovation and development of the Pearson airport for the multitudes of tourists and travellers who want to use this facility?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have listened carefully to Senator Nolin's question, as I did to the statement made by my friend, the Leader of the Opposition, at the beginning of today's sitting. One point I wish to make to him and to colleagues on both sides of this house — and I am sure Senator Murray would echo this point after the years he spent in occupying this seat — is that I appreciate very much the cooperation and the attention that my colleagues in the government and the people who work with them give me in the rather different responsibility I have in this chamber.

I say to my honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition that I have every confidence that the material that is provided to me in order to convey answers in this house is provided to me with great skill, great honesty and great ability. As best I can, I attempt to relay that information to honourable senators.

When Senator Lynch-Staunton rose today in the house, I was prepared to answer, perhaps, one or two questions concerning this particular area of concern. Senator Nolin has also asked me a question in this regard. I will not answer those questions now. I should like to take the information that I have been offered by my two honourable friends to the Department of Transport to check it out. If I am permitted to do that, I will come back to this place when next we convene to answer those questions.

[Translation]

Senator Nolin: I have just sent you a copy of a very short decision, four paragraphs to be exact, if we cut out the verbiage. Your government has every right to begin any work it feels is needed at Pearson airport right now.

Yesterday afternoon, the Minister of Transport repeated that he had no intention of taking part in a senatorial inquiry or any other for that matter regarding the circumstances surrounding the Pearson airport contracts and their cancellation, in particular those regarding Terminals 1 and 2. Honourable senator, is this still the opinion of the Minister of Transport and of your government?

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, with respect to the second part of Senator Nolin's question, I will certainly have a conversation with my colleagues.

With respect to the first part of the honourable senator's question, I wish to reiterate that I want to look at what he has said. He and the Leader of the Opposition have expressed themselves in simple terms, but I suspect there is a bit of complexity to be had in providing comprehensive answers to the questions. It is for that reason that I should like to go back to my colleague and get through the whole panorama of exactly what the situation is in terms of developing the local airport authority and all that springs from it.

Honourable senators, obviously, I respect the comments that have been made today. I will take them with me. I hope to be able to bring back a full and balanced answer to the satisfaction of not just my honourable friend and the Leader of the Opposition, but of myself.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the time allotted for Question Period has expired. I have on my list still the names of Senators Comeau and Carney. I see that Senator MacDonald is also on his feet.

I am your servant. Is it the wish of honourable senators to extend the time allotted for Question Period?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Therefore, we will continue.

INEQUALITY IN FUNDING TREATMENT OF ATLANTIC AGENCIES

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to the budget documents which I have been looking at over the past few days. I was struck by the fact that the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was hit with a cut of $31.6 million. However, at the same time, the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation received an increase of $7.2 million. I do not quarrel at all with the people of Cape Breton being provided with increased funding because the people of that area very much need it. I have many relatives and friends in that area.

More cynical people than I might question, however, the political agenda of the minister from Nova Scotia and his bias to one region over other regions, something which he has demonstrated on many previous occasions.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate remind the minister from Nova Scotia that he is the minister for all of Nova Scotia, as well as the minister responsible for all of Atlantic Canada through ACOA? At budget time one has to present a certain image. It does not look good for the minister responsible for such cuts to have every regional development agency in the country slashed while his own area receives an increase in funding this year.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as my honourable friend knows, there have been cutbacks in all regional agencies. I know there was a good whack taken out of the Western Economic Diversification Fund, and one must be zealous in using what remains in a more creative and innovative way and, perhaps, even be able to lever it.

ACOA has also been cut back, as have all the other agencies. Part of the reason economic entities such as ACOA exist is to be able to pay special attention to small and medium-sized businesses, innovative enterprises and technologies and small entrepreneurs who are looking into the export market. Another reason these entities exist is to do all of that in a way that will assist where it is most needed. Those are the general principles with respect to how these organizations operate.

I would be pleased to send my honourable friend's questions to the minister. Cape Breton is one of the most beautiful parts of this country. No matter what operations take place in that particular area, Cape Breton is still one of the most beautiful parts of this country, the citizens of that part of the country have always been under considerable economic pressure. The interests there, as in other parts of Atlantic Canada that face similar situations, will be of great concern to the minister.

AUTOMATION OF WEATHER STATIONS—
RELIABILITY OF TECHNOLOGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I am sure she will wish to raise this with her cabinet colleagues as well as answer in this chamber. In the Liberal budget, Environment Canada is closing 50 local weather stations, including one in Lethbridge, the minister's home town, in favour of automated weather stations. The Department of Transport, Minister Young's department, has already issued a warning to pilots saying that this new technology is unreliable and that pilots should not rely on it.

Why is Environment Canada closing local weather stations in favour of a technology that the Department of Transport admits does not work?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be very pleased to look into the statements Senator Carney has made and provide her with a factual answer to them.

TRANSPORT

EXISTENCE OF ANY IMPEDIMENT TO REDEVELOPMENT OF PEARSON AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. After I ask this question, I swear on my grandmother's grave — as we say in Palermo — that I will never ever return to this subject again, in this precise form. After the evidence produced by Senator Nolin respecting the leases and the other matters which were purported to hold up the development of the airport as a result of the government's inability, so far, to find a legislative solution to Bill C-22, would the minister, over the next few weeks, determine if there is any impediment whatsoever respecting the immediate redevelopment of Pearson airport which we might have missed?

Senator Berntson: Only money.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Approximately $700 million.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is exactly what I wish to do. As I have said, I have listened carefully to the statements here in this house today, and I have read carefully the information that I have received. I wish to put it together and find out exactly what that fundamental answer is, in all of its aspects. I will be more than pleased to have it in as much detail as I can provide.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to an oral question raised in the Senate on February 16, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Robertson, regarding potato blight in New Brunswick; a response to a question raised in the Senate on February 22, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Spivak regarding the greenhouse gas reduction strategy; and a response to a question raised in the Senate on December 15, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Gauthier and by the Honourable Senator Corbin regarding the precincts of Parliament.

POTATO BLIGHT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—COMPENSATION FOR DAMAGES SUSTAINED BY GROWERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to questioned raised by Hon. Brenda Robertson on February 15, 1995)

Crop loss assistance is the responsibility of the provincial government. However, the federal government makes substantial contributions towards premiums and administration costs of crop insurance programs, in the order of $2.2 million for 1994 in New Brunswick. This substantial contribution emphasizes the fact that crop insurance is the federal government's preferred vehicle to assist in crop loss situations.

Blight in potatoes is an insured peril under the Canada-New Brunswick Crop Insurance Program. In general, if the harvested production of insured growers is less than their production guarantee, they are eligible for crop insurance payments.

Recently released Statistics Canada figures show the New Brunswick potato cash receipts for 1994 are above average. In fact, they are the highest on record. However, it is recognized that blight has had a major impact in localized areas of the province. Luckily, crop insurance participation in the affected areas is high and crop insurance claims are being settled and payments are being made. There are still a fair number of outstanding crop insurance claims for seed potatoes. These claims will only be finally settled in April/May when the storage bins are opened to move the product to market.

In the meantime, federal officials are continuing to monitor the situation. In addition, they are working closely with provincial officials to find ways of using existing programs to provide relief to New Brunswick potato producers who are severely affected.

GREENHOUSE GAS REDUCTION STRATEGY—FAILURE TO REACH AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Mira Spivak on February 22, 1995)

The following outlines Canada's existing Climate Change Commitments, which the government is prepared to honour:

International: Take actions aimed at returning greenhouse gas emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2000.

Federal: Liberal "Red Book" commitment: "Seek to work with provincial and urban governments to improve energy efficiency and increase the use of renewable energies, with the aim of cutting carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent from 1988 levels by the year 2005."

In the Spring of 1994 — Ministers agreed to a phased approach:

a) Work to meet stabilization target and develop sustainable options for reductions beyond 2000.

b) Continue to work with provinces, urban governments and key stakeholders to assess the impact of cutting greenhouse gas emissions by 20% from 1988 levels by the year 2005.

National: Federal and provincial energy and environment ministers agreed in Toronto on February 20 , 1995 to:

"Continue to proceed with the development of options that will meet Canada's current commitment to stabilize greenhouse gas emissions by the year 2000, and to develop sustainable options to achieve further progress in the reduction of emissions by the year 2005."

Energy and Environment Ministers' Meeting

Decisions Made:

Federal and provincial energy and environment ministers approved Canada's National Action Program on Climate Change (NAPCC) at their joint meeting in Toronto on February 20, 1995.

The National Action Program is a national consensus document that sets the strategic directions which will guide us in pursuit of Canada's objectives to stabilize greenhouse gas emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000. The document also provides guidance for further actions beyond the year 2000.

Ministers agreed to proceed with the development of options that will meet Canada's current commitment, and to develop sustainable options to achieve further progress in the reduction of emissions by the year 2005. Ministers also agreed to report on their evaluation of the full range of options at their next joint meeting in November.

Ministers agreed the Voluntary Challenge and Registry Program is an important element of the NAPCC and committed to jointly develop a process to engage participants in the preparation of voluntary action plans.

The Program is not based only on voluntary measures. There are a number of regulatory and information initiatives in place and under development. The department of Natural Resources Canada has a number of programs in place to improve the energy efficiency of building, appliances and engines and will continue to explore opportunities for new actions in these areas.

Reducing Barriers/Reviewing Subsidies:

According to my colleague Ms McLellan, the fossil fuel industry does not receive special treatments through subsidies. Virtually all of the incentives unique to the oil and gas industry were eliminated with tax reform. Only the accelerated deductions associated with exploration and development investment remain in order to reflect the inherent risks associated with these activities. Moreover, there are other elements of the tax system that benefit renewable energy.

However, Minister McLellan supports the need to continue to explore opportunities for the development of less carbon-intensive forms of energy. The federal government provides significant support for renewable energy through R&D programs and selected tax incentives.

REQUEST FOR DEFINITION

(Response to questions raised by Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier and Hon. Eymard G. Corbin on December 15, 1994)

Maingot, J., in Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, Butterworths, Toronto, 1982, defines the precincts as follows:

"In the parliamentary sense, the precincts are the premises which the House of Commons and the Senate occupy from time to time for their corporate purposes. It includes those premises where each House through its Speaker exercises physical control to enable the members to perform their parliamentary work without obstruction or interference."

Maingot identifies as the permanent precincts of each House not only the Centre, East and West Blocks, but also the Victoria Building, the Confederation Building and the Wellington Building.

Maingot also specifically states that the permanent precincts do not include the grounds of Parliament Hill.

Section 18 of the Constitution Act, 1867 gives to each House the privileges, immunities and powers enjoyed by the House of Commons at Westminster. These privileges include exclusive control over the precincts and over the internal administration of the House.

The government, as represented by the Minister of Public Works and Government Services, is the owner of buildings and grounds and is responsible for capital projects and maintenance of the buildings and is the user of the grounds.

CENTRAL HEATING PROBLEMS—REQUEST FOR REMEDY

PWGSC has inspected Senator Corbin's office. Adjustments to the heating system have been made. In addition, a temporary plexiglass panel will be installed on the interior of the window and an electric heater will also be provided.

PWGSC is aware of the antiquated nature of the building's heating system. Accordingly, the renovation of the heating, ventilation and air conditioning systems have been included as part of the future renovation of the Centre Block. This project is tentatively scheduled to commence in 2001.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Carstairs).

Hon. Sharon Carstairs: Honourable senators, I rise today to participate in this inquiry on the budget tabled by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.

It is indeed a tough budget; there is no doubt about that. No one anywhere has tried to indicate that it is anything but a tough budget. It has generally been accepted across the country, however, as a necessary budget, and that it is time for Canada to get its economic house in order. One way to do that is to make a substantial reduction in government expenditures.

This chamber must discuss the fairness of the budget because it is our duty, in its broadest meaning, as parliamentarians. One of the good things about this chamber is that it tends to get away from the partisanship of debate that goes on in that other place. We can deal with issues on the basis of the issue itself.

Honourable senators, I picked up the newspapers with great interest. I listened to the Premier of Ontario saying that 54 per cent of all of the cuts were in Ontario. Then I listened to Lucien Bouchard, the opposition leader in the other place, and he said that 42 per cent of all cuts were in the province of Quebec. I added those two figures together and I came up with 96 per cent. I then thought about what had happened in my province to the Western Grain Transportation Agency and the closure of Air Command, and I looked at what was happening in Atlantic Canada and British Columbia and in the north. I said this is impossible. They cannot be getting 96 per cent of all of the cuts because if they did, there would only be 4 per cent left for the rest of us, and I know that we are paying a much higher price than that for what is so necessary in this economy.

I began to examine the budget documents, specifically with respect to my region, the province of Manitoba, and I equated it with what was happening in other parts of this great country of ours. Yes, Manitoba has been hit. We will lose Air Command, and that will be quite devastating, not only in terms of the personnel that will be leaving my city, but also in terms of the spirit as a result of the Air Command, a third of our services, being located in the province of Manitoba. I grew up in Halifax. It is almost inconceivable for me to think of Halifax without Naval Command. I am sure it is equally inconceivable for Quebec and Saint-Hubert to think about not having Army Command.

There is a sense of fairness here because we know that we have far too many officers in relation to service personnel. If we bring these three together, we can look at some downsizing and perhaps make some sense of our military expenditures in this country. So yes, I am deeply saddened about the loss of Air Command in Winnipeg, but I can understand the decision that has been made.

Senator Gustafson spoke quite eloquently yesterday, as did Senator Olson, about what has happened with regard to the Western Grain Transportation Agency. Those of you who have been involved in agricultural issues and certainly anyone who has lived in Western Canada knows the history of the WGTA and its mother or father, if you wish, the Crow benefit. It has been an essential part of grain transportation for 98 years, though it has not been without its faults. It has distorted the means by which we transport grain in Canada. It has caused us to do some very peculiar things, such as shift grain down east only to ship it back west so that it could go to market. That kind of action cannot be considered to make economic sense or good business sense, or even good grain sense. Branch lines which have been inefficient have remained because the WGTA encouraged this inefficiency.

What has the government decided to do? The government has decided to offer the farmers, the grain growers of this great country, a buyout of $1.6 billion. The money will be given as a capital grant and not as an income grant; therefore, in realistic terms it amounts to a $2.2 billion buyout.

They have also said there will be an additional $300 million for an adjustment strategy. Is that enough money? It is never enough money, honourable senators. There are certainly grain farmers who will tell you that that is not enough money, but it is all that the government of our great nation can afford at this particular point in time. There is no more money.

This move also gives to the grain farmers an incredibly new opportunity to look to new ways of doing things, and that $300 million will allow them to do that.

Honourable senators, we have heard a great deal in this chamber about the Red Book. Some have indicated that, in their view, the Red Book has not been followed, but I want to read to members of this chamber parts of the Red Book that have not been quoted here in this place. These are extremely significant points in terms of what this government did on Monday.

The Red Book said, and I quote from page 16:

> A Liberal government will adopt a two-track fiscal policy, matching a drive for jobs and growth with a comprehensive approach to controlling debt and deficits. The two tracks run parallel; fiscal discipline will support economic growth, while growth and jobs will enhance government revenues.

That is on page 16 of the Red Book, of which those of us who are Liberals are so very proud. I quote now from page 20:

> The Liberal approach is to set realistic targets and to implement the policies necessary to meet them. This philosophy will do more than any other single measure to restore international confidence in Canada.

And we did that. Again, at page 20:

> Any responsible government must have as a goal the elimination of the deficit. That is our goal.

Honourable senators, we made major efforts towards meeting that goal on Monday.

The Red Book also went on to talk about a major re-examination of social programs. It said at page 80:

> A Liberal government will, in the renegotiation of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, engage with the provinces in a major re-examination of the funding of the health care program within the framework of our unwavering commitment to the five fundamental principles of medicare.

That is what was reiterated in the budget on Monday.

The Red Book states elsewhere:

> It is essential to provide financial certainty and predictability for our health care planning.

Finally, because I do not think we will necessarily get this quote from the other side, it said:

> It is time for the federal government and the provinces together to redesign social assistance to meet the needs of the 1990s and beyond. A Liberal government will work with all the provinces to use established funding mechanisms such as CAP in more innovative ways in order to move from passive to active support of people in need.

Honourable senators, there are still a great many people in need in this country. I want to talk very briefly about some of those who are in the greatest need and the reason why we must get our economic house in order.

We know that a strong economy is essential to the long-term health of our social programs. We also know, very tragically, that research into child abuse and neglect has suggested that the family structure is an important factor in a child's risk of abuse. It is not that abuse does not cross socio-economic lines — it does. It happens in poor families; it happens in rich families.

However, we also know that there are some factors which put children at higher risk. Among those factors are poverty; single parent families, because of the stress in that family dynamic; alcohol or drug abuse within the family; numerous siblings; the age of parents, particularly if they are very young; and poor health of children, particularly if the child is a disabled child. All of these factors put enormous stress on families.

Honourable senators, we learned in a recent report on family violence in Canada, published by Statistics Canada, that women with a household income of less than $15,000 showed rates of wife assault that were twice the national average. That is why we must get our economic house in order so that we can help those who are among the poorest in our nation.

Honourable senators, we know that in 15 per cent of the 951 cases in the same study, the child who suffers from abuse is disabled or has a medical condition. We know that many of these children live in poverty.

We know from the study that the rate of wife assault for women currently living with men who drink regularly — at least four times per week — is triple the rate of those whose partners never drink. We know from this study that women are at six times the risk of violence at the hands of partners who frequently consume five or more drinks at one time, compared to women whose partners never drink.

We know — and perhaps this is the most tragic situation of all — that children who witness violence by one parent against the other are considered children at risk, both psychologically and emotionally. All too often they too will go on to abuse or to be abused.

Honourable senators, in the present economic circumstances, we cannot expect that any more dollars will be found. What we must do is take the dollars that we have and redirect and refocus them. That is why a review of programming is so absolutely essential.

If we are to be a modern government, and if we are to be an effective one, then we must do that review. This budget has started us in the right direction, but there is more to be done. There is still a long road to travel, but at least we have started along the way towards economic recovery for Canada and a new focus on those most in need.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, with all due respect to the very eloquent and well-honed communication skills of my friend opposite, I believe the rational response to this budget and our economic situation should be one of outrage and sorrow: Outrage at the decision-makers of the last 20 years who allowed us to reach this particular place in time; sorrow because the political decision-makers are allowing the federal government to retreat from its traditional role in Canada as the advocate of the disadvantaged and the protector of the national interest.

Honourable senators, Mr. Martin stated openly "the very redefinition of government" — a government, to all appearances, in tune with corporate values rather than the traditions of the public utility, public interest, collectivist role that has traditionally been that of the Canadian federal government. Given the scale of retreat, the question is this: How does the federal government maintain its role as a national force, instead of reducing Canada to a collection of 10 provinces?

Mr. Martin is to be congratulated for tackling the public debt squarely, which is a major issue in politics today. However, questions must be asked as to the impact of that tackling. How fair is this budget? What is the core view — the Canadian view of social policy, employment policy, transportation, and industrial strategy?

Thirty per cent of all federal cutbacks are transfer payment cuts. Provinces, some of which have just finished balancing their budgets and making plans for the next few years, are now faced with Hobson's choice. The federal government's decision to slash $7 billion from its social program transfers — transfers for post-secondary education, health and the Canada Assistance Plan over the next three years — means that they will either have to raise taxes or cut welfare payments to make up for lost federal revenue. In my home province of Manitoba, the cuts will amount to $107 million in one year alone.

It is interesting that The Globe and Mail, in its February 27 editorial, arrived at the same level of cuts, $24 billion. The Globe and Mail, not exactly a small "l" Liberal paper, advocated only $3.5 billion in cuts to transfer payments to provincial governments. That is less than half. There are a number of other areas in which The Globe and Mail suggested cuts could be made, particularly in the business and corporate setup.

Here is what will happen. At present when welfare case loads go up, the provinces get more money as a result of the cost-sharing agreements. Colleagues opposite know that very well. Under these budget provisions, at the very time that more Canadians will be in need of help, in recessionary times, the federal government will offload its compassion and its presence as it downloads its deficit to the provinces. It is important to remember that the $7 billion reduction in transfer payments is only the cut announced earlier this week, because the de-indexing of established programs financing, begun in 1990, is still in place. Of course, there will be additional cutbacks after 1997-98 when the deficit will still be at $19 billion or $20 billion.

Other likely repercussions of the loss of federal revenue combined with block funding to the provinces could include a further delisting of medical services, since the federal government will no longer have the moral or financial leverage to enforce the requirements of the Canada Health Act as it once did. If no new federal money is put into cash transfers in 1998, and we know what the prospect of that is, the federal cash contribution will disappear as early as 2010, and that is very likely. There may be user fees. Each province will have to determine what it must do. There will be cuts in social assistance programs such as child care. By the way, forget the promised national child care program. There will be no meals on wheels for seniors or homemaker services. The provinces will no longer be required to put their share of the funding up front in order to gain federal moneys, which has always been the lever. That is gone.

Can home-care and other services compete with such priorities as arenas, assistance to forestry companies and subsidies to large-scale development? How will the federal government ensure that social and medical services such as these receive adequate funding? The real danger is that the security of these services will be lost as Canada becomes balkanized. Should we not have been informed of what Lloyd Axworthy's vision of the future for social programs looked like before all the cards were dealt, or does the new federal-provincial theory consist of the federal government saying to the provinces, "We will give you less money. You figure out how to spend it"?

How are national standards — not mentioned in the budget, which contains only goals and principles — to be enforced by a federal government with limited moral authority and financial clout?

Mr. Martin also stated on Monday that Canadians need a budget designed to promote growth in jobs, but 45,000 federal public servants will lose their jobs. In Manitoba, about 2,000 will lose their jobs. The closure of Winnipeg's Air Command Headquarters alone will deprive hundreds of their livelihoods, and a 75 per cent reduction in the Western Economic Diversification Fund, designed originally to create jobs, will also mean more unemployed. The Crow Rate change will cost jobs.

Officials of the Ontario government suggest that up to 90,000 residents in that province will be put out of work. The head of the economics department at the University of Manitoba suggests that, nationwide, the government spending cuts will cause the loss of up to 300,000 jobs.

What is the strategy to create employment for these people when the private sector's religious devotion to downsizing continues? Figures in the budget indicate that despite a buoyant economy the government does not expect unemployment to decline significantly this year or next. Of course, unemployment insurance benefits will be reduced.

A basic theme of the budget presented on Monday was fairness, yet tax experts such as Neil Brooks of the Osgoode Hall Law School and Allan Maslove of Carleton University do not give the government a passing grade on fairness. RRSP changes are described as utterly trivial since these changes will only bring in about $270 million worth of revenue out of $5.5 billion in forgone taxes. An end to tax breaks for family trusts was announced, but this will not take effect until 1999. By then the principals of these trusts will have had time to dismantle them and transfer millions of dollars to other tax shelters. Increases in large corporate taxes will generate $265 million a year, but subsidies to business will still total $1.5 billion in 1997.

No action has been taken on foreign tax havens for bogus Canadian subsidiaries which the Auditor General cited as a problem, nor has the tax system been reformed to prevent profitable Canadian companies from paying no tax at all.

George Baker, the Liberal MP from Newfoundland, has done some unbelievable work on this with his computer and the figures are staggering.

The big six banks, which recorded a record $4.28 billion in profits in 1994, were given a temporary tax increase which will generate $100 million. This represents an increase from 1.25 per cent to 1.4 per cent of capital. Can the sacrifice which will have to be made by the poor due to cuts in social transfers, unemployment insurance, et cetera, be compared to these tax increases, or the lack of them, at the top end?

Is it fair to cut the Department of Natural Resources and a quarter of the employees of the Department of the Environment while leaving the Department of National Finance almost intact, the very department whose predictions and analyses, judging by the results, have been, to say the least, not all that helpful in resolving Canada's fiscal problems, not to mention monetary policy? Is it fair to cut the CBC by 23 per cent over three years while not touching Atomic Energy of Canada Limited?

No discussion on fairness in the budget can be complete without a look at the budget proposal to end the Crow benefit this August, which will place an extraordinarily heavy burden on prairie grain producers. Grain producers will face an increase of freight rates to as high as $40 a tonne. They will have to either move grain south or switch to livestock products. The $1.6 billion payout presents some problems. Who will get the payout? Fifty per cent of the land in Saskatchewan, for example, is not owned by those who farm it, the lessees, but by banks, railway companies and the Farm Credit Corporation. While the elimination of the Crow Rate was not a surprise, it was done without giving us an idea of the vision of transportation for the 21st century, of the impact on ports, on the St. Lawrence Seaway, on the east-west link in Canada and on the environmental impact of increased truck travel. Canada produces the cheapest, best-quality food in the world, but can it compete, once subsidies are removed, with the U.S. market where subsidies and predatory market practices for international grain markets remain in place?

Agriculture will be particularly hard hit, suffering a reduction of $429 million or fully 29 per cent of all so-called business subsidy cuts by fiscal year 1997-98. The agricultural safety net will be reduced by 30 per cent over three years, contrary to the recommendation of the parliamentary committee on agriculture, on which I have the honour to sit. The committee said explicitly in its December report:

> Since Canada has already exceeded its World Trade Organization commitments in terms of domestic subsidy reductions, the committee recommends that income protection expenditures be frozen at their current levels until the end of the century.

Honourable senators, I want to offer the government a little more gratuitous advice for future budgets, based on five complementary reports, one of which was commissioned by the Finance Minister from the Task Force on Economic Instruments and Disincentives to Sound Environmental Practices. What do these reports suggest? They suggest eliminating the tax concessions and subsidies to the conventional energy sector, subsidies variously estimated in the range of $1.5 billion to $4 billion annually. The budget proposes only to reduce grants and contributions by some $400 million within four years. The reports question the transfer of income tax deductions by mining and petroleum companies to investors through flow-through share financing. They suggest an end to the $88-million federal contribution to nuclear industry research in support of utilities that operate CANDU reactors. They suggest that senior government officials no longer receive subsidized parking. They suggest that ordinary Canadians be allowed to withdraw RRSP savings to save money by improving the energy efficiency of houses. The finance department's response to the advice of its advisors is largely, "Wait," or worse, silence. As a matter of fact, it has been estimated that forgone taxes alone are anywhere from $26 billion to $35 billion.

The minister's only additional major move among all those recommended was to increase the gasoline tax, a measure that task force members believe will have little or no impact on emissions of greenhouse gases, a measure that will cost Canadians $500 million.

I am really not in opposition to this tax. It is a good thing. However, as Jim McNeil, the distinguished former Secretary-General of the Brundtland Commission, wrote to the Finance Minister:

> It may be necessary at some point to increase fuel taxes significantly in order to reduce emissions, but before the government does that, it can and should take the oil and gas industry off the backs of the Canadian taxpayer. If the government wishes to cut the deficit, these and other economically and ecologically preferred subsidies and tax breaks are the place to start.

Honourable senators, I sincerely hope the Finance Minister is right when he says he has broken the back of the deficit. If that occurs, perhaps governments will buy back our sovereignty so that Canadian budgets need not be dictated by international currency speculators, transnational corporations threatening to withdraw investments or the Wall Street Journal. Can any of us forget Don Newman on budget night meekly questioning some callous, callow, patronizing journalist of the Wall Street Journal who allowed as how, yes, the Canadian budget might not be that of a Third World country by U.S. world-class standards. Perhaps we will have more than one minister's view — that of the Finance Minister — dominate the cabinet table so that Canadians who believe they have elected politicians to tend to the environment, to social programs, to cultural programs, to agriculture, will not see them grow invisible as their programs disappear. All those copies of the little Red Book — as outdated as its famous predecessor written by Mao — can then be dumped and recycled for some future useful purpose.

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, to be fair, I compliment the Minister of Finance for beginning the budget process. However, we know that the proof of the pudding is in its eating. It is still too early to be issuing congratulations.

I did sense in the minister's comments at least a willingness to begin to deal with some of the problems stemming from our nation's debt. Some Canadians will wonder what led to this conversion. Now we hear very little about the Red Book and with good reason, for though it was a supreme piece of election propaganda, it was a very unrealistic blueprint for the future of a nation's finances.

Some of us suspect it was the clear message of the international marketplace that strengthened the minister's resolve. His response seems to have quelled their fears for the moment, and that is good news for all Canadians. At a time when the actions of separatists are discouraging those who want to invest in our country's future and create jobs here, we cannot afford to add to investors' concerns by refusing to face our debt problems.

I know that politics is partisan, just as all my colleagues here know that I am not a member of the Minister of Finance's party. However, I will say this in all sincerity: I want the Minister of Finance to succeed and I wish him well. This nation had to confront its debt problem, and, if this minister helps us to do that, he will have my thanks.

In that regard, however, I want to urge the minister to face directly the problem of the deficit. It is not enough to just focus on a 1996-97 target of $25 billion as the minister does in this budget. This budget should have outlined a credible plan to balance the budget soon thereafter. Not doing so continues to put Canada at risk — at risk that interest rates will rise as Moody's again puts us on notice and at risk that more and more of our hard-earned dollars will go toward feeding an ever-growing debt monster.

This is the second budget of this administration. There will be two more before Canadians return to the polls. The budget revealed this week by the Minister of Finance, actually plans to spend over $50 billion on interest in 1996-97. If we could take a moment to imagine all the good that $50 billion could accomplish in the lives of Canadians, we begin to realize how much our failure to deal with the debt is costing us, our children and our grandchildren — the daycare spaces that will never be created; the university educations that will go uncompleted; the job opportunities that will be lost because of crippling taxation. These are the true costs of our debt.

Faced with such a problem, honourable senators, is it too much to ask the government to at least acknowledge in some form the need to balance the budget. Are we not entitled to be a little dismayed at a government which does not even set that as a goal? What our nation needs is a national deficit-reduction strategy consisting of both the federal and provincial governments.

The Minister of Finance in his speech spoke many times of giving provinces more say, more control. That is pure spin-doctoring. What the minister was really announcing was the abandonment of the federal commitment to social programs and the offloading of the debt to the province.

Let the record show, honourable senators, that in the budget of 1995, the Chrétien Liberals ignored their promise to talk to the provinces before changing the safety net. They promised no unilateral cuts to transfer payments in their Red Book. Then they did just that. A far better approach would have been for the provinces and the federal government to set common objectives and then sit down and decide who was to deliver what service. Not only could this ultimately save more money, but it would also show that federalism works.

Many Canadians are breathing a sigh of relief over the minister's budget, it is true. Through slick political manipulation, orchestrated leaks and so on, he managed to convince many Canadians that, "Hey, we are about to lose everything." It is akin to being told one's house has burnt to the ground and, if you rush home and find that only the furniture has been stolen, there is still an overwhelming sense of relief. We must all bow to the minister and the government's shrewd political instincts.

But let us step back a moment and survey the damage. The $8 billion in cuts to transfer payments that will hurt health, health care, education and seniors — with the worst yet to come — were left deliberately vague so that the truth is obscured by terms like "future negotiations" and "adjustments." The back of the deficit may not be broken, but the pain will certainly be felt by Canadians everywhere.

Honourable senators, the challenge of eliminating the deficit is a big one. Atlantic Canadians realize that. We do not mind doing our part to put Canada's finances in order, but we need to know that the burden is being shared fairly. When I look at the cuts to unemployment insurance, to defence and to transfer payments, I do not get the sense that this budget passes the test of regional fairness. For instance, in the last budget, the Liberals announced cuts to UI that discriminately punished Atlantic Canada relative to other regions of the country. Of the $2.4 billion which was cut from UI in the last budget, $634 million came from Atlantic Canada. That means that Atlantic Canada, with only 8 per cent of Canada's population, endured 27 per cent of the cuts to UI. Over $195 million of these cuts came from my home province, New Brunswick. Well, this budget continues in the same trend, honourable senators, with unemployment insurance getting hit for another $700 million. While the Main Estimates did not provide regional breakdowns, we can anticipate how this measure will hit Atlantic Canada.

I also want to take a moment to draw the attention of the Senate to the elimination of the Maritime and Atlantic freight subsidy. These are programs to allow Atlantic Canadian businesses to sell their products to other Canadians. The freight subsidy does not compensate for the disadvantage of higher transportation costs for Atlantic producers. Even with it in place, our businesses face much higher costs to get their goods to markets, but it helps. It is a hand up, not a handout, part of a program designed to ensure that Atlantic industries can compete fairly and that Atlantic Canadians can make a living.

Honourable senators, as of July 1, that program is gone. In its place, the federal government has created a pool of money from which five provinces will draw over five years. I know this will be the government's response to the cries of dismay over the loss of this vital program, the Transportation Adjustment Program.

Here is what the money allocated to that program will mean: If New Brunswick were to receive half of the money, it would be able to build about 17 kilometres of four-lane highway each year for the next five years. That amounts to a total of about 85 kilometres in highways. This will be the total benefit to New Brunswick if it gets half of all the money allocated to the adjustment program — 17 kilometres a year for five years. After that, it will receive nothing.

What will the Atlantic region lose when it loses that subsidy? Without the subsidy, freight rates will rise by between 35 per cent and 40 per cent. Let us make no mistake: many businesses will not survive such an increase. In 1983, independent consultants found that without the subsidy, some 12,000 jobs would be lost. I ask honourable senators what their reaction would be if the government had announced in this budget that it was taking measures that would cost Ontario 80,000 jobs? That is the kind of hit we are talking about in Atlantic Canada.

The decision to end the subsidy is about to devastate the Atlantic economy. Last year, David Ganong of Ganong's Chocolates said that the subsidy was critical to the ability of his company to compete, and extremely important to future investment in their New Brunswick plant.

John Wheatley of Lantic Sugar, for whom transportation is a major cost component, said last May that without the assistance Saint John would lose 200 to 300 direct jobs, with a corresponding $15-million payroll. He said that the city would lose 20 longshoremen jobs and 15 to 20 vessel visits a year, as well as a loss in local purchases of $10 million. Honourable senators, there will be a loss in capital spending, which has amounted to $25 million over the last 10 years. Saint John will lose $8 million per year in transportation-related employment.

Fred Beairsto of Petrofab stated that without the subsidy, Petro Fab would likely be forced out of business altogether. Similar statements have been made by representatives of the Maritime Lumber Bureau, the Atlantic Division of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and many others in the lumber and manufacturing industries.

There were also grave concerns about a snowball effect, whereby the loss of one producer forces others to seek their components outside the region, something which would force their costs too high to survive. The entire transportation network, including ports and rail, will be placed in jeopardy.

While the citizens of the Port of Saint John watch their customer base collapse, what are they to think of the millions of dollars our government will continue to pour into ice-breaking operations in the St. Lawrence Seaway when the Port of Saint John remains open all winter? This is an enormous underwriting to the cost of shipping to Ontario and can actually be classified as a transportation subsidy to producers in Ontario. What does this say about the fairness of this budget and this government?

We have in this little measure the potential to create a regional recession. This decision, not surprisingly, was made without consultation with the Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, despite its repeated entreaties to the Minister of Transport.

Honourable senators, I will close by returning to a point I have mentioned before and will continue to raise since I believe it is critical to the future of the Atlantic region. We have a problem of regional disparity in our country. Is it a problem we want and need to address? According to our rhetoric, yes.

What, then, is our plan? How does this government propose to make the Atlantic region of Canada full and prosperous partners of Confederation? They say they do not want to give handouts. That makes two of us, as we do not want to receive them, either. However, we want to have the playing field levelled, and we want to have our concerns addressed. We want to know that regional development is not just an election slogan but an important goal of this government.

To date, so much of the evidence of this government points to some inescapable facts. They have no plan for Atlantic Canada. It is not a priority — it is barely a concern. Measures will be implemented without consultation or even consideration of their effects upon us. Where are the 31 voices representing Atlantic Canada?

This is the reward Atlantic Canadians receive for supporting this government rather than embracing parties of regionalism or separation. It is not even to be ignored. No, it is far worse than that — it is to be betrayed.

Honourable senators, when measures such as this take place, I wonder how much longer the patience and the sense of compromise and fair play of Atlantic Canadians can be taken for granted? How many times will this government hurt Atlantic Canada before there is nothing left of the ties that bind our nation together?

As this government dismantles the support for transportation links between Atlantic Canada and the rest of the nation, it is dismantling one of the founding principles of Confederation. What will take its place? What does this government propose to build to replace what it now destroys? What is its plan for Atlantic Canada? Is anyone over there really listening?

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, this afternoon I wish to talk about the budget of February 27, the Liberals' second attempt to chart an economic course for the country. I believe they have failed miserably. The previous year, some four months after the election, they charted a course built on their version of the country and their obvious belief that the building and repair of sewers, roads, bocci courts, duck ponds and hall-of-fame buildings in the Prime Minister's riding would somehow deliver the country from the attempt of the Conservatives to build a competitive economy for the next century.

In their neglect of the spiralling debt in 1994-95, the Liberals spent the year showering the country with their magnanimity, making available a $6-billion slush fund to every elected official, municipal and provincial who had the wherewithal and the linguistic skills to prepare an application form. The country accepted this wholesale patronage, the Liberals being adept at such dispensing of patronage not only to hard-working Liberals, some of whom are with us today, but to everyone who asks.

Meanwhile, their economic principles took a deft turn from the past, and the Prime Minister and his colleagues embraced the concept of the North America Free Trade Agreement. They began to promote vigorously its expansion to Chile. President Clinton embraced "the four amigos" line. They further promoted this previously alien Liberal concept to the Far East.

Some have likened the transformation to St. Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus — but not I. St. Paul's conversion was one of illumination, although my Jewish friend, Senator Ghitter, does not agree. He thinks St. Paul was a typical Liberal. Nonetheless, I, being a good Catholic, still call it illumination. The Chrétien conversion to free trade was no different from Trudeau's road to Germany. When Trudeau returned, he gave us wage and price controls, something the Liberals fought hard against in 1974. They fought it with the same fervour they fought the free trade agreement in 1988 and 1993. This transformation could be called enlightenment.

However, I have reason to distrust the Liberals because of their economic policies. The Finance Minister asked us to judge them on what they do. I do, because I long ago lost confidence in what they say. For example, in 1994 the same Finance Minister, Mr. Martin, said in his budget speech:

> Canadians have told us that they want the deficit brought down by reducing government spending, not by raising taxes. We agree.
> This is a two-stage budget, with fiscal projections only to 1995-96. But in terms of deficit reduction, the budget does not wait for the second stage.
> The decisions in this budget by themselves set us on a clear path to achieving the government's deficit target of 3 per cent of GDP by 1996-97.
> The 1994 budget set in motion the most comprehensive, fundamental change to government programs in decades.
> As reform of the social security system kicks in, more reductions in the UI premium rate will be possible.
> The reform of the Goods and Services Tax is being accelerated, with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance reporting its recommendations on a replacement tax by June. The goal is a tax that is harmonized with the provinces, fairer to consumers and less burdensome for business.

I know the budget that Mr. Martin presented the other day is meeting with favour amongst Canadians. However, time not only heals all wounds, but it also creates an opportunity for gaining knowledge. The more people learn about this budget, the more they will see the unfairness of it.

The other day, I was skeptical about the government's seven-to-one tax-to-cut ratio. The reason I was skeptical was because a large portion of the cuts were relegated to the future, not 1995-96. This year, there is only $4 billion, 3.3 per cent of operating costs; in 1996-97, it is 8.5 per cent, $9.3 billion. By 1997-98, it is $11.9 billion, but here we do not have an estimated deficit number as we do for 1996-97, which Paul Martin claims will be $25 billion, or 3 per cent of GDP. I assume that the third year of reduction will bring program spending to $100 billion, an 11.9 per cent decrease.

Where have we all heard this before, honourable senators? Turn to the 1994 budget, where the Finance Minister promised a $1 increase in taxes for every $5 in cuts. Remember that budget. He said he would save $700 million in 1994-95, and I give him that. He came in at $118 billion. However, in 1995-96 he promised to save $6.6 billion, and in 1996-97, another $9.7 billion. We have a total of the 1994 budget savings of somewhere in the area of $16.3 billion. I know some of the eyes are glazing over here, but I think it is important to look back and reflect at that 1994 budget because I think it will tell us what will happen with the 1995 budget.

The way I calculate it, total government spending should be down to $101.7 billion based on the savings they predicted last year. These are numbers from their budget — they certainly are not numbers from mine — in "The Budget in Brief," February 22, 1994, on page 3, if it does not pain the Liberals to look at it.

By fast forwarding to 1995 and 1996, on February 27, 1995, we hear the Minister of Finance say he is going to cut $4 billion this year, another $9.3 billion next year, and another $11.9 billion the year after, for a grand total of $25 billion. It is all in the future. By their own calculations, that should make program spending go down in 1997-98 to about $95 billion.

Let us rewind back to 1994-95 where we had savings of $16.3 billion. If you add this budget and next year's and last year's, we have $30 billion, from the Liberals' numbers. That is what Paul Martin has saved between the two budgets and what he has told the Canadian people he has saved. How do we reconcile all of these savings, which should result in an operating expense, by their numbers, not by mine, of $88.4 billion in three years? Have all of these savings evaporated? Are they all gone? Perhaps they have just repeated — and that is what I think they have done — the savings from last year.

Amazingly enough, there is some consistency in the two budgets where the numbers are the same. Revenue is the same. I am counting the revenue from the tax increases of last year and this year, giving a total of $8.3 billion, by their own admission. At this rate, the Liberals will have saved us $41 billion by 1998. If they keep this up, they will have saved us $82 billion by the end of their term. We will be awash in savings. Mind you, with extra taxes of $8.3 billion, the government will have to save at least $68 billion by 1998 or else their seven-to-one ratio is not a true statement in fact. That is what they will have to do, and those are their numbers, not mine.

We have forgotten the 1994-95 budget. We are focusing on this one. However, if we go back to "The Budget in Brief" and "The Budget Plan" of 1994, we will find all those numbers. To get to the seven-to-one ratio, because the revenue figures for both budgets are over $8 billion, they will have to save in the area of $68 billion. If we use the five-to-one ratio which was last year's number, they will have to save somewhere in the area of $41.5 billion. By Liberal math, we are only $11 billion away.

If I have some reservations, some distrust, some suspicion, at least my side of the aisle will understand. All this budget did is repeat things from the previous year and drop cuts to other jurisdictions. The people of Canada will feel the results, not this year, but next year and the year after.

On motion of Senator Bacon, debate adjourned.

MOTION TO PRINT VOLUME I

OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE REPORT—SPEAKER'S RULING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That the Senate order the printing, in its original format, of 500 copies of Volume I of the Report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy entitled "Canada's Foreign Policy: Principles and Priorities for the Future"; and

That an amount not exceeding $7,500 be allocated for that purpose.

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Berntson, that the motion not now be adopted, but that the motion be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. — (Speaker's Ruling).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, last Wednesday, during debate on the motion of Senator MacEachen to order the printing of 500 additional copies of Volume 1 of the Report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy in its original format, a motion was moved by Senator Lynch-Staunton not to adopt the motion but to refer it to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. This motion was subsequently adopted.

[Translation]

Therefore, we began to ponder the original question. Perhaps confusion arose from the fact that the senators were unsure what kind of motion the Leader of the Opposition was proposing: Was it a motion to amend the original question or a distinct question?

[English]

There was no disagreement as to the admissibility of the motion itself. The motion was in order. According to rule 49(1):

> When a question is under debate, a motion shall not be received unless it is a motion to amend the question, to refer the question to a committee, to adjourn the debate, to postpone the debate to a certain day, for the previous question, or for the adjournment of the Senate.

Based on the wording of rule 49(1), of course, the motion of the Leader of the Opposition has the character of a distinct question. As such, if carried, there is no necessity to proceed to put the original question to the house as that question would have been superseded or displaced by the decision to refer the matter to a committee for consideration. The original motion to order the reprint of a committee report would no longer be before the Senate. It may presumably come before the Senate again once the committee has reported on this matter and the report itself becomes subject to a vote on concurrence.

It was agreed at last Wednesday's sitting that the Senate rescind the vote taken on the motion of the Leader of the Opposition so that the Chair could make a ruling. I therefore rule that the motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton is in order, that it is a distinct question and that if it carries, it will supersede the original motion that had been proposed by Senator MacEachen. I might point out that there are precedents in the Senate for such motions in the past. Barring an appeal to my ruling and, if no other senator wishes to continue the debate on the question proposed by Senator Lynch-Staunton, I will now proceed to put the question, which is as follows:

> That the motion not now be adopted but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, I have a few comments to make regarding this proposal.

Being one of those who listened attentively to Senator Lynch-Staunton's comments on February 22 in which he stated the reasons he felt that the issue should be referred to a Senate committee, namely the Committee on Internal Economy, I asked myself many questions.

Because it is always useful to know a little about what is at issue, I asked Senate officials about the current status of these publications and the current demand. They informed me that of the original document in question, the French version of Volume I of the report was out of stock, that the House of Commons had already made 500 photocopies of it, which had all been distributed and that the Speaker of the House of Commons had decided not to authorize further photocopying of the report in question.

According to the officials, at present, only about 50 photocopies of the English version of the report are left. For close to 10 days now, they have been out of copies of the French version. I have had requests for it. I must admit that I am a little embarrassed because I do not wish to disregard the decision of the Commons' Speaker on the matter nor do I want to ignore the decision to debate this issue which was made by the Speaker of this house. Two points regarding this issue bother me.

On the one hand, section 133 of this country's constitution states that everything, which means documents, minutes of proceedings and journals, must be available in both official languages for Canadians.

As you know, honourable senators, the Official Languages Act also stipulates that all documents published by this house must be made available in both official languages.

However, it is impossible to get a copy of this report in French right now. I recognize the validity of the motion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition to have the Committee on Internal Economy consider the appropriateness of having this report printed.

If my information is correct, printing costs would be approximately $5,000 or $5,500 for 500 copies. Honourable senators, the House of Commons and the Senate have spent nearly a million dollars for this study by a joint committee of the House and the Senate.

We have now run out of copies and will have to wait a few weeks longer before getting any more. Not only are the House of Commons and the Senate scheduled to adjourn, but a decision must also be made later on. Once a decision has been made, the report will probably be reprinted. I hope it will be reprinted. This report was, after all, unanimously passed by all members and all senators, be they Liberal or Conservative.

I do not see the point of quibbling over whether it will cost $7,000 or $7,500 or whether we will have unanimous consent on both sides of the house. I think we had agreed on that. This report is the joint product of the two parties concerned here today. It is a good report, even if I might be boasting a bit in saying so.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Jean-Robert Gauthier: Honourable senators, to avoid any constitutional complications and any breach of the Official Languages Act, I propose the following amendment to the motion you have just submitted to the House:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration report as soon as possible.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have listened to the ruling of the Speaker, and I should like to study it further and to be enlightened as to the precedence before I make any informed comment about the ruling. However, the ruling itself is not really my main preoccupation. It is the subject-matter that is before us.

I have had discussions with the Leader of the Opposition, and it is understood between us that the matter is to go before a committee without prejudging the outcome. In other words, it will be examined by the committee in good faith and a report made accordingly.

My fear was that the intent of the motion was to prejudge the matter. Senator Lynch-Staunton assures me that that is not the intent of the motion, that it is merely to send the matter to the committee without prejudging the outcome. With that, I am quite happy not to oppose in any way the adoption of the motion and the amendment. If I thought it contained a prejudgment, then I would take a different attitude.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have nothing original to add, but I think that the procedural situation is an interesting one. As I understand it, Senator MacEachen put before the Senate what would be called a substantive motion; that is, it stands on its own. It is not part of a process like a second reading motion. We are then told that another senator may rise and move a second, distinctive substantive motion, notwithstanding that there is already a distinct motion under debate.

We are told now by the Speaker that this is the practice of the Senate, that there are precedents. I believe it would be good to have those precedents introduced. I am not asking the learned Speaker to rise and give us a learned discussion on the matter, but I am sure a statement could be prepared.

I ask for this because I think the procedural implications, if we use our imagination, could be quite intriguing for future procedures in the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I thank the honourable senators for their comments. I will see to it that the precedents are produced and given to honourable senators.

The question before us is the amendment proposed by the Honourable Senator Gauthier.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment of Senator Gauthier adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: We are now back to the main motion. Is it your pleasure to refer the main motion, as amended, to the committee?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, and main motion, as amended, referred to Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 21, 1995, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 16, 1995

The Senate met at 6:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE ESTIMATES, 1995-96

VOTES REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEES OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES AND LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That Privy Council Vote 25 and Parliament Vote 10 of the 1995-96 Estimates, which were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the 28th February 1995, be withdrawn from the said committee and referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages and the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament respectively; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, if I might explain the purpose of this motion, the House of Commons referred these votes to standing joint committees, and the Senate must also refer them accordingly before the committees can proceed with their examination. Thus, I am seeking approval to withdraw these votes from the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and to refer them to the joint committee.

I will have other motions to follow.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1994-95

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) FOR YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1995

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995, with the exception of Parliament Vote 10d and Privy Council Vote 25d.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VOTE 25D OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in Privy Council Vote 25d of Supplementary Estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VOTE 10D OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (D) REFERRED TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

> That the Standing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament be authorized to examine the expenditures set out in Parliament Vote 10d of Supplementary Estimates (D) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

WEST COAST PORTS OPERATIONS BILL, 1995

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-74, respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at West Coast ports.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Before obtaining a decision on leave for second reading, honourable senators, I should like to point out that it is unfortunate that so few of our colleagues from the west are with us tonight to discuss this important matter, the reason being, of course, that the notices calling us to this meeting were received less than 24 hours before this meeting started. While that is respectful of the rules, and the issue is within the public interest, it does mean that the Senate has once again been treated by the House of Commons as an unnecessary adjunct which must move at the pace of that other place.

I do not want to get into a discussion on the annoyance that we must all feel. However, I do think that there is reason to tighten up our rules with respect to being recalled before the agreed-upon resumption date, and that at least 48-hours' notice should be given.

The second suggestion I should like to make is that the purpose of the special meeting be included in the notice to members so that, at least, we can be briefed ahead of time on the topic which is to be discussed. As it were, we learned of the circumstances only through the newspapers this morning or through television late last night. I hope that we can have a solid discussion on the bill which is to come before us.

The government has certainly moved hastily on this matter. I am not pointing a finger at the Leader of the Government. She probably did not have much choice in the matter, unless she wanted to cause disruption within her own caucus and cabinet. However, it is a rather cavalier way of treating this chamber, and I think we deserve a little better than that if we are to be responsible for studying legislation as seriously as we try to do.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 57(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Gauthier, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

WEST COAST PORTS OPERATIONS BILL, 1995

SECOND READING

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-74, respecting the supervision of longshoring and related operations at West Coast ports.

She said: Honourable senators, first, I should like to thank colleagues on both sides of the house for answering the call to attend tonight's sitting. I am cognizant of Senator Lynch-Staunton's comments about the shortness of notice for this very special sitting. I acknowledge as well that it is not convenient, however, it is also not convenient to have the largest port in our country closed, with ships idling in that port and shipments of goods from Canada and abroad being held up.

As my honourable friend has noted, it is within our rules to recall this house during a time of emergency or crisis. I would note, for the benefit of my friends, that the closing of the port did not occur until Tuesday night. It was the decision of the government that action had to be taken immediately, and that action commenced yesterday in the other place. From the standpoint of public interest, one really had an obligation to ask members of this place to come at the earliest opportunity in order to debate this legislation and hopefully to pass it.

The involvement of this house, of course, is important to the parliamentary process. Again, I thank all honourable senators who have made the effort to be here. I realize that some of our colleagues are on important Senate business outside the country. I also know that for many the distances are great. It is possible to get here, although perhaps not convenient. However, I think that our duty will be upheld by those in attendance tonight.

Bill C-74 is legislation to deal with the failure of the collective bargaining process at our West Coast ports. If that failure is not addressed quickly by Parliament, the damage to the welfare of our grain farmers and, indeed, all of those shipping out of West Coast ports, as well as to our international reputation as a reliable trading partner, will be severe.

To give this house some background information, the dispute that has given rise to Bill C-74 involves the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Local 514, which represents 485 longshore foremen, and the Waterfront Foremen's Employers' Association, which represents 16 companies operating in the Port of Vancouver as well as on the dock sites in Prince Rupert and the Fraser River. Six of the companies have stevedoring operations, six are general wharf operators, while the remaining four companies are bulk cargo operators.

The most recent collective agreement between these two parties, which was concluded with the assistance of a conciliator, expired on December 31, 1992. Since then, the employers' associations and the union have pursued various avenues in an attempt to fashion an agreement. The failure of direct negotiations led to the appointment of a conciliation officer from the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service on August 5, 1993. The officer worked with the parties from September of that year until March of 1994. For a short period in March last year, direct negotiations resumed. However, conciliation meetings began again in April and continued until last August. During the conciliation phase, 20 meetings were held and many of the major issues were, in fact, resolved. Unfortunately, a final comprehensive agreement could not be reached, and on September 16, 1994, the conciliation officer filed his final report.

The following month, in October, the parties were advised of the Minister of Labour's decision to appoint Dr. Mark Thompson as Conciliation Commissioner in the dispute. Dr. Thompson, a professor of industrial relations at the University of British Columbia, held five meetings with the union local and the employers' association over the next four months. Again, although a number of issues still in dispute were resolved, a final agreement remained elusive.

The two major stumbling blocks were the increasing of retiring allowances paid to longshoremen leaving the industry and the changing of so-called "side documents" relating to certain labour practices that the union had with three member companies of the employers' association.

On January 31, Dr. Thompson filed his report to the minister who, in turn, on February 10, released it to the parties. At that time, the minister urged both sides to seriously consider using the report as a basis for settlement.

In his report, the commissioner states, among other things, that there is "a climate of hostility" between the parties, adding that the association members, the employers, "believe that the union is unwilling to react to economic changes in the industry," while the union sees employers "trying to undermine their position in the collective agreement, in particular with regard to employment opportunities."

He concludes that:

> There was no indication that the parties are willing or able to work together creatively to resolve their problems.

While the employers' association indicated general acceptance of the recommendations contained in the report, the union expressed very strong reservations. Thus, on March 10 the two parties held their final meeting but could not reach a consensus.

On March 13, the employers' association announced that, effective the following week, it would implement the terms and conditions of the conciliation commissioner's report. That same day, in response, union members walked off the job but at that point indicated that they would allow grain shipments to move through the ports. Two days later, at 1:00 a.m. on March 15, the employers' association initiated a lockout, thereby effectively shutting down the ports.

Senator MacDonald: Was that 1:00 p.m. Vancouver time?

Senator Fairbairn: It was 1:00 a.m. on March 15.

That is the current situation, honourable senators. Nothing, including grain, is moving through our western ports.

Last March, 1,336,000 metric tonnes of grain were shipped out of the Port of Vancouver. In that one month, the total for all commodities shipped out of Vancouver was 4,750,000 metric tonnes. Clearly, a prolonged shutdown would be devastating, not only to our grain growers across Western Canada, but also to a wide number of other economic entities that depend on export markets for their survival.

The Vancouver Port Corporation indicated yesterday that 28 ships were idle in Vancouver Harbour and that a further 17 ships were expected to arrive in port in the following three days. It has been reported in the media that the shutdown could lead to an estimated revenue loss to the port of $1 million per day in the container business alone.

Honourable senators will recall that last February we were faced with a very similar situation because of a dispute between the British Columbia Maritime Employers' Association and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, Canadian Area. At that time, collective bargaining broke down and the union instituted a lawful strike but offered to continue to move grain and other perishable commodities. When the employers' association then responded by locking out the union membership on January 29 last year, all shipping activities on the West Coast were brought to a halt. They were brought to a halt during the peak market period for our grain exports.

Parliament responded by passing Bill C-10 on February 8, which legislated the resumption of port operations, provided for the appointment of an arbitrator, and instituted a final offer selection process. That was in February of last year.

Today, one year later, although the parties are different, the result of an unsuccessful collective bargaining process is the same.

At a time, again, when grain exports are hitting record levels, we have lost our ability to make deliveries to our overseas customers. A prolonged work stoppage could prove disastrous to our western agricultural economy. The reputation of the Port of Vancouver is also at risk. To make matters worse, the reputation of that port is placed at risk at a time when we are facing increased competition for container traffic with U.S. West Coast ports willing and eager to move our products.

When Bill C-10 was before us last year, Senator Lawson from Vancouver said:

> Many countries are willing and anxious to displace Canada if we cannot honour our contracts and meet our commitments, whether we are talking about wheat, coal or any other product. In this highly competitive, shrinking world of trade and free trade, we have no lock on those markets.

Honourable senators, that reality has certainly not changed with the passage of a year. If anything, it has become more pronounced. Consequently, in dealing with this most current shutdown of West Coast port operations, the government has decided to adopt an approach that will deal with the immediate situation, as well as the longer-term concerns we face as a major trading nation.

Bill C-74 is designed to address our immediate problem. It would require the resumption of port activities within 12 hours of receiving Royal Assent in Parliament. It provides for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator, who would begin by trying to mediate the remainder of the matters which are in dispute. If that proved unsuccessful, the mediator-arbitrator would render an arbitral award on those outstanding matters, following representations by the parties.

In making a final determination, the mediator-arbitrator would be required, under the bill, to take cognizance of the report of the conciliation commissioner, Dr. Mark Thompson. A new collective agreement flowing from either the mediation process or the arbitration phase process would cover the period from January 1, 1993, to at least December 31, 1996.

The government believes that the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator represents a fair and balanced approach to this strike and lockout. Such an approach has been used in previous back-to-work legislation, such as the Thunder Bay Grain Handling Operations Act of 1991, the British Columbia Grain Handling Operations Act of 1991, and the Government Services Resumption Act of 1989.

Honourable senators, this legislation will solve the current dispute. However, as my colleague the Minister of Labour indicated in her speech in the other place last night, we need to find a long-term solution. This is the second time in little over a year that we have had to legislate settlement in this port. These disputes indicate that there is something fundamentally wrong with how the collective bargaining process is organized in the British Columbia ports.

For this reason, the minister has stated her intention to appoint an industrial inquiry commission. That commission will provide information and advice on how the parties involved in the movement of cargo through the ports can bargain collectively without having to resort to shutdowns and lockouts; actions which threaten our competitiveness and our credibility as an exporter, and which require the repeated intervention of this Parliament to force settlements with which, I believe, no one in this chamber is comfortable.

When we had Bill C-10 before us last February, Senator Gustafson said, and I quote:

> Certainly we need collective bargaining, but there must be some type of settlement which could be negotiated that would not cause the country to be choked in the way it is being choked in this case. We must look at other ways.

Honourable senators, the Industrial Inquiry Commission will be mandated to do exactly that — look at other ways to resolve collective bargaining disputes at our nation's sea ports. In my view it is long overdue in terms of ensuring that those ports retain a viability and a competitive advantage for Canada.

Today, we have a duty to help those in this country who make their living through trade to get to their markets. Our customers in Asia and the Pacific Rim have been watching the events of this dispute closely this past week. Our competitors are also watching closely. Tacoma and Seattle, Washington, are raising their hands and saying, "Come on down, Canada. We can move your products."

Honourable senators, we have in Vancouver one of the finest ports in this world. We must prove to the world that we can make it work and that Canada can be relied upon to keep its word and to fulfill its commitments. This is not simply a Vancouver issue, nor is it simply a western issue; it is a national issue.

In the public interest of all Canadians, I urge colleagues on both sides of this house to pass this bill tonight so the Port of Vancouver will be back in business tomorrow.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have no doubt that this bill is in the public interest. I am not here to assess blame as to why the West Coast ports are shut down. We have a work stoppage, and it is a situation this country can ill afford.

Honourable senators, this is the second significant work stoppage that has closed the ports and literally the West Coast in a little over a year. However, there are a couple of significant differences in the approach taken by the government this time as opposed to last time.

A year ago Mr. Axworthy indicated a desire to let the collective bargaining system work, which is why he let the port remain idle for 12 days. He said:

> As one who strongly believes in collective bargaining, including the rights and responsibilities it places on the parties, I was reluctant to allow the two parties to abdicate their responsibilities to the Canadian public.

He said that in the Debates of the Senate on February 8, 1994. Today, one year later, the same government has enacted back-to-work legislation 15 hours after the stoppage began.

Once again, honourable senators, I am not passing judgment as to which approach is the best, but there seems to be a different approach this time as opposed to last time. This is only one example.

Another example relates to final offer selection as opposed to mediator-arbitrator solutions. Approximately one year ago Mr. Axworthy, during second reading on Bill C-10 said:

> Members may ask why a final offer selection in this particular case? The provision of final offer selection procedures puts the onus back on the parties and once again requires them to make clear, economic, rational decisions on behalf of their members, the companies and the public interest at large.
> To do otherwise, in my opinion, would curtail the responsibility and onus of each of the parties in this dispute.

The minister goes on to suggest that final offer selection would send a message to other parties currently in negotiations.

> It would provide a message to other parties who are beginning to engage in collective bargaining... to rely on their own best efforts to resolve their differences and come to a conclusion. We will not provide a constant crutch for them...

That was Mr. Axworthy, once again, in February of last year.

The minister during Committee of the Whole proceedings actually indicated that final offer selection should be used in future cases. He said:

> I would argue that it is very important to use final offer selection for the cases to follow. If we simply... went back to the traditional forms of arbitration then it would once again be a crutch that they could rely on.

Honourable senators, with Bill C-74, final offer selection is nowhere to be found. We are back to the old traditional approach.

The other point to be made — and one which has already been touched on — is the question of Canada's reputation as a reliable trading partner. The Port of Vancouver is Canada's main source of export to Asia and Pacific Rim markets. Over the past year the government has devoted considerable energy to promoting trade with these countries. However, it is well documented that these labour disputes and shipping disruptions have shaken our reputation abroad. Once again, in last year's debate, Minister Axworthy said, with regard to the strike action:

> The reputation of Canada as a reliable shipping partner has been put in some jeopardy...

During debate on Bill C-74 last evening, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources Development indicated that the government representatives are being told that Canada's reputation was suffering. He further stated:

> Some of our customers have questioned our reputation for consistent and timely delivery of quality grains and oilseeds.

He went on to indicate that the Minister of Agriculture had been in Japan, Korea, China and Hong Kong last April and May, and to say:

> While there he was told face-to-face by some very angry customers that they were not happy with Canada's performance. The message was clear. We had better clean up our act or our customers would find other suppliers.

Once again, that comment comes from the Hansard of March 15, 1995.

A year ago, honourable senators, we were promised, as we have been promised several times since, that long-term solutions would be found to these disruptions that seem to happen on a semi-regular basis on the West Coast. Not only do we have concerns relative to our reputation abroad, but our people are losing confidence in this system as it relates to their ability to deliver to those customers abroad. I point to a recent announcement by Canpotex, the umbrella offshore marketing association for the potash producers in Saskatchewan. Two or three weeks ago, it announced the development of a $20-million handling facility in, I believe, the Port of Seattle to move their potash out through the state of Washington, as opposed to the Port of Vancouver. My recollection of the design is that the initial capacity will be about one million tonnes a year, going up to five million tonnes a year. That is a significant piece of economic activity that we have exported, as well as the potash.

If you were to talk to many of our producers and grain-handling companies in Canada, you would find that they are exploring ways around this regularly imposed bottleneck on the West Coast.

Once again, I am not here to assess blame; I am here to urge again that we find some mechanism, some long-term solution to the labour strife situation which regularly occurs on the West Coast.

We have had promises in the past that something will be done in terms of finding a long-term solution. It simply has not worked. Whatever has been tried — if anything has been tried — it has not worked. Once again, there are promises: We heard them yesterday during second reading debate in the House. As the Minister of Labour stated yesterday in the House of Commons:

> This is the second time in little over a year that Parliament has had to intervene in a dispute involving the West Coast ports. This would seem to indicate that there is a basic problem in the structure of the collective bargaining in the B.C. ports.

The minister went on to promise that a special board of inquiry will be formed to examine this question, and that she is personally committed to finding a long term solution to this problem.

I hope that this minister's actions will speak louder than her words, unlike those of her predecessors.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to make a few brief comments about this particular work stoppage. As has been pointed out by the Leader of the Government, and also by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate —

Senator Berntson: A close friend and colleague.

Senator Olson: Yes, my close friends and colleagues have pointed out that this stoppage will have very serious economic consequences, whether it lasts for a few days, a few weeks, or any length of time at all.

As has been pointed out by my colleague on the other side and by the Leader of the Government, as well as by the Minister of Labour, we have here a very pointed reminder that Canada's reputation is at stake as a reliable supplier of high-quality agricultural and other products. We will not be able to maintain our usual supplier-customer relations in the world if we do not find a solution to the basic problems underlying this particular work stoppage.

It is important for members of this house to know how this problem manifests itself, and although I do not pretend to be an expert on all labour-management relations on the West Coast, I will tell you about one aspect. We must realize that the collective bargaining process and the conciliation officer's report did deal with all of the outstanding problems within reason, if I may use that expression. They have agreed on everything, including the wage. Both sides accepted the "three plus three plus three" formula.

However, the problem that exists in this situation boils down to something else, and I understand why the minister in this house and the minister in the other place will not say it. I am a little more free, and I can state what I have found to be the fundamental reason, or at least the excuse, for this work stoppage. The excuse is that they could not agree on how many foremen were needed. In some cases, it is down to one foreman over two other employees. In certain instances, that may be reasonable; however, in most cases it is unreasonable. It sets up a cost factor for the hiring of foremen over other workers which the companies feel they simply cannot accept. They feel that they cannot remain competitive if they must meet that demand.

If that is the only issue, why could they not reach an agreement? This whole situation is unfortunate. Beneath that issue lies another small reason. Apparently, the union wants these conditions to be forced upon them by an act of Parliament. In other words, they would rather have it settled in that way than agree to it themselves. That is too bad. In many respects, that is ridiculous.

I took very seriously the words of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, my good friend and colleague. Since he is advocating that some action be taken to avoid these kinds of problems, I presume that means he will wholeheartedly support any reasonable change in the labour-management relations legislation when we come to deal with such things.

As the Minister of Human Resources Development said last year, we do not want continually to be involved in settling labour-management disputes in Parliament, neither on the floor of this chamber nor in the House of Commons. It is perfectly legitimate for him to suggest that we do not relish that kind of procedure. It is far better if the parties can negotiate an agreement amongst themselves.

However, it seems to be our task to modify the rules, the legislation, and the law which sets out the methodology and the terms and conditions under which these parties can negotiate their agreements. On the West Coast, it is apparent that the present rules are not working, or, at least, are working imperfectly. We need to solve that problem. We will likely pass Bill C-74 tonight, and it will solve the problem for today, or perhaps even for a few days or a few months.

However, as the conciliator pointed out, there is a spirit or an atmosphere of hostility in these negotiations and within several other disputes which are presently taking place. We must address this problem with reasonable changes in the law so that that hostility can be removed from the system. It is that hostility which causes the whole system to be inadequate in dealing with such situations as they arise.

I made some inquiries of a number of people on the West Coast when I heard we were to be called back to try to settle this matter. I was told that, in the eyes of some very reasonable people who observe the labour-management relations in the Port of Vancouver, there probably are too many foremen now. Yet the foremen's union is holding out the proposition that they need still more men in place and that they want to change a number of other factors related to that. That adds up to a serious cost-of-operations factor which takes Canada out of the competitive area.

I am very apprehensive about these labour stoppages on the West Coast. About 12 years ago, Canada was involved in a situation with respect to the supply of coal, particularly metallurgical coal, into the Pacific Rim countries. There was one very large factor among several others affecting our ability to negotiate a number of things, including the cost of building the mines, the townsite, the railroad and the port loading facility at Ridley Island just south of Prince Rupert: That factor was the extreme unhappiness of those customers with the reliability of supply of the same kind of metallurgical coal coming from one of our sister Commonwealth countries, namely Australia. It was a difficult decision.

In Australia's case, that coal was mined less than 100 miles from export position or from tidewater. There is no doubt they had a better competitive position than Canada with regard to cost of transportation from mining site to export position.

However, we were able to negotiate with a number of countries, particularly Japan. There were others. A favourable arrangement for long-term tonnage and prices would warrant the several-billion-dollar investment in Canada. If you do not think it can happen because of unsatisfactory labour-management relations, all we need do is look around a bit. It has happened before in Australia.

I do not know how much Canada's reputation has been damaged because of these types of work stoppages. I know that a year ago, when the Minister of Agriculture was in Asia, he was told a number of times that some of our customers were unhappy with the reliability of supply on a steady basis. Fortunately, it would appear that we have been able to re-establish ourselves as a good supplier because we are breaking all records again this crop year with the amount of tonnage travelling through the West Coast ports, particularly to Asian markets. I do not have the numbers in front of me, but I believe we are up between 25 and 30 per cent over and above the highest year in history. That is extremely important to Canada.

In fact, we are at the stage where some United States farm organizations are beginning to complain again about Canadian wheat being exported into their country. I do not think the American government has taken any overt action with respect to those complaints, as happened last June and July. I refer to both of the major U.S. farm organizations representing grain farmers, and wheat farmers in particular. I hope that a number of senators from both sides of this house, who I believe are in Washington this week, will get an explanation of what it is they are so concerned about so that we can find a solution to that problem too.

I should like to say a word or two about Senator Berntson's comments to the effect that this is a different approach from last year's settling of the work stoppage. I do not think there is much difference. The situation is about the same. Whether or not there is final offer selection as the last resort is important if you think that is the only way of solving these matters.

Honourable senators, some of the basic, fundamental circumstances involved in this particular work stoppage are a little different than they were a year ago. Therefore, it calls for a different response.

In closing, I must say — because I do not think any of my colleagues in government ought to say it — that there are some unreasonable people out there trying to use the legislative process for a purpose for which it was never intended. The legislative process should be regarded as a last resort in dealing with such matters and where possible should be avoided. I agree with what the minister said a year ago, that we should not get into it and should try to let the collective bargaining process work. That has been the response of the government to date. It may be argued that they waited one day or five days too long; that is a matter of judgment. There is something fundamentally wrong when the parties prefer a settlement by legislation rather than by working it out themselves. I hope that when the time comes to find some better way — so we can avoid travelling this far down the road to a labour stoppage — honourable senators opposite will do as Senator Berntson has suggested and give us their whole-hearted support in getting that legislation passed.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have three or four questions to pose to both the Leader of the Government in the Senate and to our resident expert, Senator Olson.

I am concerned as to whether or not a fundamental change in policy has been enunciated in this legislation. Some of my concern was expressed by my deputy leader. I draw the attention of senators to clause 13 of the bill, and I will leave it at that.

We are breaking away, I think, when we exclude part of the penalty. It makes the $100,000 fine look rather weak if we take away the "in-lieu-of-jail-or-imprisonment" part of the penalty.

I have some concern about this chamber being used — and indeed I had the same concern for many years while in the other place — by individual members to serve behind the scenes, by one means or another, to resolve matters in dispute. The question of foremen and the numbers that are needed is properly a matter that should be discussed between the appropriate bodies. It is not a matter for us to discuss. This is a serious piece of legislation, and it is not for this place to discuss individual items. Therefore, I have some regret that the matter even came up.

I was aroused at 10:00 or 10:30 last night by a phone ringing and again an hour later by a fax running, both of which were to tell me that I should return to Ottawa. I did not have any idea why. I heard something about the matter on the news this morning as I was driving up to Dorchester. I believe drafters of legislation should be lodged on site to work out some of these problems. We are getting dangerously close to making law based on the value of cargo. Someone suggested that this dispute is costing $1 million a day. For the edification of the Leader of the Government and other senators, my own Port of Halifax is picking up $1 million a day at the expense of the Port of Montreal for the same reason. Due to the withdrawal of service, Montreal is shut down.

However, grain is probably more important than the cargo moving through Quebec. I have not heard any reference to the Port of Montreal or the East Coast situation in the last 24 hours, and I wonder why. I also wonder what in God's name would happen in this country if Saint John and Halifax said, "We don't want your cargo. Take your container ships elsewhere." Where would they take them?

I have serious concerns about the interpretation of "final offer" and the way we are playing with that expression. I suggest that it is dangerous. I think this procedure is precedent-setting. I have never seen it done before, although Senator MacEachen, and some others who have served long and faithfully in the other chamber, may have seen it done. I have not seen such a play with the words "final offer" as we seem to be experiencing here. However, I must admit that I have not had a great deal of time to study the bill, having received it only 10 or 15 minutes ago.

My concern is that, with this kind of legislation, we are continuing to tell the Canadian public that we have a problem which must be dealt with today; that tomorrow we will make better laws. However, we never carry through with that promise. It is a sham; it is a shallow promise, and it is somewhat repulsive to me.

I used to join in the pounding of desks and applause and say, "By God, there is guts." I have said that of both Liberal and Conservative administrations, both provincially and federally. Yet, in the days, the weeks, the months and the years following those promises, nothing has happened.

There is no doubt that we must do something about such situations. I wonder who has thought for even five minutes about the plight of the those carriers who use the Port of Montreal. Granted, although they do not have Saint John available to them, they still have Halifax, but what would happen if they did not have Halifax?

Suggestions that Canada is not a good provider and a good supplier are a lot of nonsense. This is my thirtieth year in public life in the Parliament of Canada. I have heard that argument used every year for those 30 years, and I tend to get a little touchy when I hear it because we are not sincere in what we say about such situations as this. We do not mean what we are saying. We think we do, but in reality we do not, and our actions prove it, over and over again.

My charge to the Leader of the Government is rather simple, and I will give her notice. I will ask her in 60-days' time what her colleague in cabinet has done to improve this situation.

Hon. John G. Bryden: Honourable senators, I have a few brief comments to make. They do not deal so much with specific items in the bill but respond generally to some of the issues and questions which have been raised.

The question was asked why we would be taking this sort of action in relation to the West Coast ports and not to Montreal. I do not know specifically why that would be the case. However, I do know that it may very well be based on the general principles of collective bargaining.

In our society, as we are all aware, the right to organize and bargain collectively is one of our most sacred and protected rights. Parliaments and governments interfere with those rights very rarely because they are so sacred. The collective bargaining process is, by its very nature, based on an economic balance of power. Employees have the right to organize and bargain collectively, and to withdraw their services. The employer has the right to continue to do his business and make his profit as best he can.

Since collective bargaining began, the only time that governments are ever justified in interfering with those rights is when there is an overriding public interest. It would appear, from what has been said here and from what I have been able to read of the discussion in the other place and in the media, that one of the reasons government and parliamentary action is required is that the overriding public interest in our global economic situation requires interference in that basic democratic right.

The question was asked why, on the last occasion, a final offer selection was chosen and recommended as the method to settle these disputes, while in this instance mediation and possibly arbitration is being recommended. Having practised in the field of labour-management relations for a long time, I can suggest that each case must be addressed on its merits and that there is no all-embracing panacea. Even though a minister said last year that this was it, there is no magical panacea which works in every instance.

One of the reasons that mediation and arbitration were chosen in this instance may be that there has been a great deal of negotiating progress made. There has been a great deal of progress made at the conciliation report level. It appears, from the discussion here tonight, that the issues are very narrow. Indeed, this bill directs the mediator-arbitrator to take into account the findings that have already been determined by the conciliation report. Whether or not that is correct, I suggest that the judgment has been made that this is a proper case in which a mediator-arbitrator can fine tune that to which the parties have already agreed and bring a solution.

My colleague on this side questioned why we are in this situation if the issue is only to determine the number of foremen required. In some instances, foremen are supervising only two or three people. It is very difficult for Canadians to get their heads around why a port would be losing millions of dollars a day over such an issue.

The answer is that it is not unusual to have a small "p" political solution in circumstances like this and to have someone from the outside come in. In some instances, an arbitrator can handle things; in others instances, it requires government action or parliamentary action.

This type of thing does not happen just with labour unions. For example, why do corporations in all kinds of industries require government intervention before doing what they know must be done to make adjustments to their plants and equipment to protect the environment? The answer is that they do not want to account to the shareholders for the $500 million that they have invested in tertiary pollution control unless they have been required to do it because it results in a reduction of the per-share profit. It is not dissimilar psychological thinking that is involved here.

The suggestion is always made that there must be another way. Surely, there must be. However, many wise people, from Mr. Justice Ivan Rand many years ago right up to the present, have tried to devise a better system for balancing the interests of the worker and the interests of capital. This system works. It does go off the rails sometimes, but somehow, for the most part, it works. We never hear about the ones that work.

It may be the case that there is no wonderful, greater solution out there. The solution may be that Parliament must carefully use its authority to interfere, as it is being asked to do now, in those instances where the greater good of the public must override the basic democratic rights of the employers and employees who are involved in the struggle.

I wish to make one final comment in relation to the suggestion that the $100,000 fine against unions and employer organizations is weakened because there is no proposed jail sentence in lieu of paying the $100,000 fine. Once again, that may be wise. If this matter goes before the courts, the courts will take a view of what, in their opinion, is reasonable. If it is clear that a union organization, the executive or an employer organization cannot immediately pay the $100,000 fine, the court would have no discretion left but to hand down a jail sentence. As many who practice law will know, sometimes the courts in those cases will find some way to find the person not guilty.

It is also the case that this is an economic struggle, for the most part. It is not criminal in the ordinary sense of the word. In lieu of a jail sentence under the Criminal Code, this measure allows the $100,000 to be registered as a judgment and enforced like any other commercial judgment. If this is in fact a commercial and business problem, it makes sense because we stopped sending debtors to prison a long time ago. It would appear that a solution that allows for the registry of the judgment as a judgment of the court would be a more proper method of enforcement than jail in any event.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, to be better informed, I went to the House of Commons yesterday to listen to the debate on the back-to-work legislation, the second one concerning the same port in less than a year. Far be it from me to say anything that would embarrass the new Minister of Labour, but I was really impressed by the wisdom of what she said in the House.

I would urge my colleagues to read her speech which appears on page 10,548 of House of Commons Debates of March 15, 1995, a speech by the newly-elected member, Mrs. Robillard, now Minister of Labour. It is a very wise speech, and it is obvious she did not act in the heat of anger or emotion but quite simply in the best interests of the Canadian people.

What inspired her and what inspired me as well was the report by the conciliation commissioner, Dr. Thompson. On page 10,549 of the House of Commons Debates, there is a quote from his report, which leads me to say why, after a work stoppage of only a few hours, it was probably better to have this legislation, since the commissioner himself said in his report, and I quote:

> There is a climate of hostility between the parties, at least as far as the Association and the Union are concerned.

The conciliation process, the dialogue or negotiations should be allowed to continue. When a conciliation commissioner realizes and does not merely report to the minister or Parliament but takes the trouble to write down that there is a climate of hostility, it is clear that further efforts would have been futile and that it made eminent good sense to bring in this bill.

My participation in this debate is based, as always, on the fact that even if this is happening in Vancouver, as a French Canadian and as a Canadian, I consider that what happens in Vancouver is just as important as what happens in the Port of Montreal. I make no apologies for taking part in this debate, be it ever so briefly, even though it has even greater relevance for our colleagues from the west, for Western Canada and for all our exports to Asia, this great modern market for the goods we produce.

I also noted in the minister's speech yesterday, and this is why I want to mention it once again, that she in additionn to introduing a bill, was already anticipating the remarks by the official opposition, the Bloc Québécois. These remarks must not be dismissed out of hand. There are experts in conciliation and arbitration matters. As I always say, hate is never a good master. There are those who say that because it is the Bloc speaking, we must not pay attention. This is not in my nature.

I noted that the minister listened carefully to the remarks by those who say that, perhaps, in the review she is preparing to do, she will probably — and I hope she does — take a look at anti-strikebreaking legislation. This cannot be the monopoly of a single political party.

When people say that being of the left means being against human rights abuses, do they mean that being of the right means supporting human rights abuses? That is crazy. A person can be of the right or the centre and denounce torture and all forms of inhumane behaviour.

There is no need to be a member of the Bloc or the Parti Québécois to realize that not only Quebec, but also British Columbia and Ontario have all passed excellent anti-scab laws, and we hope that the new minister will continue to proceed in this direction and will find a similar solution.

What is really good is that the minister gets a little ahead of the debate, even though the legislation would permit her to settle this dispute, and I quote her:

> ...we must find long term solutions... for this reason, I intend to strike a board of inquiry on labour relations, whose mandate will be to report on the ways that parties involved...

I would ask you to read her speech on page 10550. As the minister will see, passionate speeches have no place in the Senate. The Senate is a place for reflection. I do not know whether the minister is still here, but I do know one thing — she will realize that in this house, we watch and we observe. We do not need to repeat everything worthwhile that was said in the House of Commons, unless it is to support legislation such as this which is always unfortunate.

Obviously, it is always unfortunate to be obliged to intervene. The government and the minister were not thrilled to recall us. Senator Lynch-Staunton was not thrilled to recall his troops, nor am I thrilled to be called back to do this! It is no joy, but it is our duty! It is in the best interests of Canadians. We hope, however, that these bills do not become a habit. We would be setting a dangerous precedent if people began to say: "We are going to dig our heels in so deep that eventually..."

A "save-face" Parliament would put us back together. That would be a bad sign for the future if, we have to intervene every time. However, it is in the interests of Canada.

I remember listening last year to Senator Lawson. He has experience in these matters as a former union leader from British Columbia. Like me, he is an independent senator. We should remember what he said last year. It was not with joy that he gave his consent to that special bill. He is knowledgeable and he knew what he was talking about. I was in doubt because I was not as familiar with the issue. When he stood up to support the bill, who was I not to go along with him? Therefore, in the interests of Canada, I did not hesitate to give consent, and that is why I wish to say this evening on the record that Bill C-74 is in the best interests of Canada.

I wish the new minister good luck, not only with respect to this bill, but in her desire to appoint a special inquiry to look at the issue of labour relations.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Fairbairn speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing second reading debate on this motion.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to thank all my colleagues for their wise advice and the thoughtful speeches they have given tonight on second reading. There is a great deal of ability and experience in this chamber to be brought to bear on issues with which, as I said earlier, none of us are comfortable. I refer to these periodic obligations to legislate workers back to work and to move beyond the collective bargaining process. It is a delicate balance between those rights and the public interest.

I was particularly struck by the remarks of my friend Senator Forrestall, who has 30-odd years of experience on Parliament Hill in both houses, and those of Senator Lynch-Staunton on the recall and about not being advised of the substance for the recall. After consultations here tonight, I think we can guarantee that this will not be the case, should there be occasion to go through this type of procedure in the future.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There will be.

Senator Fairbairn: We hope not, but should the occasion arise, it will be made clear as to why members are being recalled.

In the case of the Port of Montreal, questions were asked and can be answered by my colleague the Minister of Labour when she attends Committee of the Whole. She indicated yesterday and today that the Port of Vancouver and the Port of Montreal are quite different cases. As my honourable friend Senator Prud'homme will know, there has not been a general strike at the Port of Montreal for over 20 years. Other ports in the province of Quebec are currently open and available as opposed to the situation on the West Coast.

However, the minister has made it clear that she has offered the services of a mediator to both sides in the dispute at the Port of Montreal. She will be evaluating that situation on its merits as it develops.

When my honourable friend Senator Forrestall said that we do not mean what we say, he sounded despondent. Over the years, a great many statements have been made in both Houses of Parliament with respect to how change must come and how these situations ought to be dealt with differently. Each government has approached these situations with a sincerity and a desire to do things better.

In this instance, the minister has indicated that, in her view and the view of the government, the time has come to move beyond the immediate to the longer term. I sincerely hope — maybe it will not come in 60 days as Senator Forrestall would like — that we will be able to achieve a shift in how these situations are dealt with and come up with an effective, long-term solution.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your cooperation in this debate. We look forward to hearing from the minister later this evening.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole and that the Senate do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to hear from the witnesses.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable P. Derek Lewis in the Chair.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would ask that the Honourable Lucienne Robillard, Minister of Labour, be invited to participate in the deliberations in Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Lucienne Robillard, Mr. Pierre Hamell and Mr. James Lahey were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to welcome my colleague Mrs. Robillard to this chamber. This is her first visit here since she was appointed Minister of Labour. We welcome her and hope that she will not be here very often under these circumstances, but yet be assured that she is most welcome here, as are her officials.

The Chairman: We are delighted to have you here, Madam Minister, with your officials. Before we proceed, do you wish to make a statement on Bill C-74?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucienne Robillard (Minister of Labour): Honourable senators, with your permission, I would like to start by telling you that I was very disappointed that my first action as Minister of Labour should be to introduce back-to-work legislation in the House of Commons.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, we always try to get the parties to come to an agreement. We strongly believe that this is the best way to settle labour disputes. In fact, most labour disputes are settled in this fashion.

This time, we were faced with a very serious situation. Before we introduced this piece of legislation, we tried to reach an agreement.

As you know, we appointed a conciliation commissioner but, unfortunately, we ended up with a lockout situation in all the western ports. The economic impact is such that we must act immediately to allow operations to resume. It is in this context that the House of Commons passed this bill which provides for a return to work 12 hours after Royal Assent, allows for a resumption of all economic activity in Western Canada and ensures that our credibility as exporters on foreign markets is maintained.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope that honourable senators will support this bill.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Madam Minister, before I get to the point I would like to congratulate you on your election in the riding of Saint-Henri—Westmount. It is a riding that I know well, since I lived there or very close by from the time I was born until quite recently. Although people in that riding continue to elect members from a political party I do not belong to, I must admit that it is a riding which knows how to choose well. I have no doubt that you will continue that excellent tradition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not envy you your responsibilities in the upcoming referendum.

I would like to point out that, for some time now, Conservative senators have been actively looking into these issues to ascertain whether or not they should play a role as soon as the campaign gets underway. I can tell you right now that we have good contacts in the No camp and that, if you ever think that our cooperation could be useful, you can count on it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have some questions here, Madam Minister. Rather than wait for a clause-by-clause study of the bill, I should like to go into various aspects of the legislation now.

Only a year ago, Minister Axworthy came before us. This was mentioned by Senator Berntson during the second reading debate. Minister Axworthy was here in relation to Bill C-10 two weeks after the work stoppage. When he was asked why it had taken so long to produce emergency legislation, he replied that he very much believed in:

> ...the collective bargaining process. We think it is still a fundamental component of labour relations in this country. Any precipitous move by the government in this matter would mark the beginning of throwing the entire principle of collective bargaining off track.

This year, with Bill C-74, the government has introduced emergency legislation only two days after the strike started. I hope that the conclusion to be drawn from this precipitous move, if that is what it is, is not that the government has lost confidence in the collective bargaining process.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, no, absolutely not. We have not lost faith in the collective bargaining process. All of our efforts are geared to help support the process to reach a collective agreement.

I must say that we acted sooner this year because we are more familiar with the labour relations dynamics in Western Canadian ports. I will explain.

As you know, last year, we had to pass back-to-work legislation for the longshoremen, who were in exactly the same situation. This time it is their foremen, that is, the immediate supervisors of the longshoremen.

The report from the conciliation commissioner told us clearly what he had discovered about the labour relations dynamics at play. He reported that the parties were not actively seeking to resolve the dispute, waiting instead for legislation to be enacted.

If we had waited another week before going ahead with this legislation, we would have ended up in the same situation, but with more serious economic consequences due to the passage of a week's time.

Accordingly, since it had become even clearer that there were problems with the whole labour relations dynamics in Western Canadian ports, we decided to appoint a commission of inquiry on labour relations as we drafted this legislation so as to avoid facing exactly the same problem next year or in two-years' time.

This is what led us to act as quickly as possible.

[English]

• (1940)

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The situation is that the two parties are at an impasse and the collective bargaining process has broken down, whereas last year there was hope that the collective bargaining process would work.

I do not want to belabour this point, but last year the minister suggested the final offer process. This year, you are abandoning that, despite the fact that Mr. Axworthy vaunted it as one way to force the parties to come to a solution on their own. As Senator Olson mentioned, we are returning to the old process. They just tell the government, "You resolve the problem. We cannot be bothered." Perhaps a final offer solution should have been tried in this case. Did it not work last year in the case of the dock workers? Was there a problem with the final offer process?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: The problem we have this year is very different from the one we had last year. You will remember that last year there was only one issue in dispute and it was of a financial nature.

I am talking about the salary. The dispute was over a salary increase of 65 cents or 70 cents. It was a simple decision to make. It had to be either 65 cents or 70 cents. At that time, the final offer process applied to a very specific issue.

This year, the situation is more complex. We do not think that final offer selection is the best approach. That is why we chose the mediation-arbitration approach. We have not lost hope. When we talk about mediation-arbitration, it means that we still hope mediation will be successful. If it is not successful, then arbitration will be used.

This year's dispute is much more complex than a simple discussion about a salary increase as was the case last year.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What is the dispute about? What are the outstanding issues?

Mrs. Robillard: A number of issues have been examined by Dr. Mark Thompson, the conciliation commissioner appointed in this dispute. I should say that his report could be a basis for a settlement.

The conciliation commissioner knew his report would not meet with unanimous approval by all parties, but it was a good basis for negotiation. The report was given to the parties on February 10, and negotiations have been initiated on that basis.

All of a sudden, management decided to impose all recommendations included in the report. That was followed by a walkout, and the lockout was then imposed. Going back to the report of the conciliation commissioner, Dr. Thompson stresses that there are outstanding issues concerning pensions, job posting, hiring, call-in pay, and the waiting period for disability benefits. A number of issues have to be settled.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: These issues should not give rise to a strike. This is just my opinion. It is not a monetary issue; it is a matter of benefits and job security. There must be other more serious things, unless in the west people are so touchy they create problems for their employers at the drop of a hat.

Mrs. Robillard: It is not up to the Minister of Labour to judge.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are trying to better understand why we are here.

Mrs. Robillard: What I can say and what was clear in the report of the conciliation commissioner is that there was a significant problem in labour relations dynamics.

When management decided to implement the report of the conciliation commissioner, the initial effect was that the employees went out on strike while maintaining transportation of grain and perishable goods. We took no action at that point. However, following the walkout by the foremen, management imposed a lock-out and all economic activity in Western Canada came to a halt.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let us move on to the role of the mediator-arbitrator. Is it usual to have the same person occupy both roles? Is this a precedent?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, no, this does not set a precedent. It is the formula normally used in labour relations.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What is the difference between a conciliator and a mediator? I know you have a conciliation and mediation service, but the dictionary does not show much difference in the definition of those words.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, in the end, you know that the code allows us to do several things; for example, naming a conciliator or a conciliation commissioner. Basically, the appointment of a conciliator or a conciliation commissioner is a required step leading necessarily to the acquisition of the right to strike or to lock out. If we appoint a mediator, we do not get into this process. It could be completely independent.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The new collective agreement will take effect on January 1, 1993, and yet in clause 6.1 the old collective agreement is extended from January 1, 1993. Is there an overlap there? The current agreement which expired at the end of 1992 is being extended to a date to be decided by the arbitrator, and the new collective agreement is effective January 1, 1993.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Yes, we want the employees to be covered throughout the arbitration process. We want the collective agreement to remain in effect throughout arbitration. Once the mediator-arbitrator has made a decision, the collective agreement may be in effect from January 1, 1993 until December 31, 1996 and even beyond. Employees must continue to be protected during the arbitration or mediation process.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have other questions.

[Translation]

Senator Rivest: Madam Minister, I wish to add my comments to those of the Leader of the Opposition to mark your entry on the federal scene. I feel we have met before, perhaps in a particularly happy former life, because your face seems familiar. I am certainly familiar with your reputation and your proficiency.

I would like to ask you to make some very brief comments before we go on to the clause-by-clause analysis of the bill because many people, particularly from Montreal, are wondering why the Minister of Labour acted so swiftly in the case of the Port of Vancouver whereas there is, as you know, a similar problem in the Port of Montreal which is beginning to worry management over there.

Mr. Tadéo made a statement yesterday about the economy of Montreal. You described the Vancouver situation as being urgent, but can you explain why, according to you, the Montreal situation is less urgent?

Mrs. Robillard: The situation in the Port of Montreal has a different impact. We try not to have to legislate and this is why we are using all possible means to reach an agreement before we have to bring a bill before the House of Commons.

We are bringing in this legislation because the consequences are considered so important that we have to act in the interests of Canadians. In the Port of Montreal, because of the strike or the lockout, operations are suspended. We have to admit that.

The situation is limited to the Port of Montreal. The impacts are limited to the Montreal area. This means that all other ports in Quebec are operating at this moment, whether at Trois-Rivières, Sorel or Quebec City. Economic activity is maintained through other ports.

The situation is completely different on the West Coast because the foremen this bill is intended for are all part of the same bargaining unit, wherever they work. Therefore, work is suspended in every port on the West Coast, not only in one. That is a first major difference.

The second difference is that, over the years, a tradition has been established at the Port of Montreal, and they have always been able to agree, to negotiate and to reach an agreement.

It has been over 20 years since there was a general strike at the Port of Montreal. This allows me to be more confident in the negotiating process which should lead to a solution. We are monitoring the situation very closely because, as I said, it might have an impact on the Montreal area. That is why I have decided to offer both parties mediation to reach an agreement, to facilitate an agreement.

Senator Rivest: I was told that, for technical reasons, other ports located in the Montreal area — even though they are still operating — cannot play the same role nor have the same functions as the Port of Montreal, so that the bottom line is that operations which cannot be carried out by the Port of Montreal cannot take place in the other ports either, because they lack the equipment necessary to overcome the situation and the difficulties at the Port of Montreal. Is this true?

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, I have been told a completely different story about the state of affairs. Reports are to the effect that the other ports can make up for what is not done in Montreal, including Halifax, which can take on port activities that would otherwise go to Montreal.

I was told that business activity was going on through the other ports, but I must admit I am concerned over the impact the closing of this port will have on the Montreal area. That is why I am asking the parties to sit down at the negotiating table with a mediator to help. I really hope that the parties will reach an agreement.

[English]

Senator Olson: I do not have any questions or criticism of the bill. It contains no more than what is required to deal with this type of situation.

I have had a lot of experience with these types of situations over the last number of years, as has been pointed out. We have had situations where there was not quite enough in the bill, and sometimes there was more than necessary. It came down to the business of actually trying to settle the outstanding differences. This bill is appropriate and balanced.

I have a question with respect to the last two paragraphs of the minister's speech made before the other place yesterday. You indicate you will set up a board of inquiry on labour relations, the mandate of which will be to report on ways that parties involved in handling cargo at these ports can avoid closing down ports in the near future. You say at the end of that comment that you think it almost forces Parliament to take rapid action.

You continue by saying that we must avoid repeating this situation in the years to come. As I have told my colleagues, I am personally committed to finding a long-term solution to these labour relation problems which have become endemic to West Coast ports.

Madam Minister, when do ou think you will get this inquiry set up? Perhaps even more pointed, when will you introduce legislation? When do you expect to deal with the matter?

Earlier today, just before you came into this chamber, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate offered the full cooperation of the opposition to get some remedial action in the ports in Western Canada, action such as what you have described in your last two paragraphs.

I would ask the minister to give us some indication of the timetable for this matter? We know, for example, that at least two commodities, cereal grain and potash, are presently breaking all records in the amount of volume being exported through Western Canadian ports, and, therefore, the situation we face is economically costly. The underlying reasons of why they forced Parliament to take action, are not well understood by the public in Western Canada, especially by some of the people who are very directly and profoundly affected by these work stoppages.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the concern regarding a long-term solution. I think this is essential. The goal is to prevent Parliament from passing legislation on a regular basis to address this problem.

A board of inquiry is needed to review the structures as such. Here is what I intend to do as soon as this bill is promulgated. The employees will go back to work. A few weeks from now, we will officially appoint this board of inquiry which, as you know, comes under section 108 of the Canada Labour Code.

In a few weeks, we will have to choose the right person to head this board of inquiry. I give myself a few weeks to pick and officially appoint this individual. I hope that the draafting of this report will not take years so that we can implement recommended legislative amendments as soon as possible.

I think that we can reasonably expect to receive the report in the fall so that we can make amendments during this session in order to avoid the same situation when the collective agreements expire in Western Canada.

[English]

• (2000)

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, there is one comment in Conciliator Thompson's report which is particularly disturbing, and that is his indication that there was a feeling of hostility between the two parties involved. I think we can take from that comment that hostility was one of the main reasons why they could not come to a solution and it was referred to Parliament.

Can you give us some indication of how you will deal with that, minister?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Any labour minister wants labour relations to be as harmonious as possible in any company. This is our main goal and objective. This should be what any employer wishes for in the first place.

We know quite well that successful businesses are competent and competitive. The reason is that they rely on very good human resources management. Thus, it seems to me that the main responsibility of employers is to ensure good staff relations.

In this case, thanks to mediation and arbitration processes which will follow and thanks to the board of inquiry, I hope that both the union and the employers will examine that problem with the investigation commissioner.

I am really not in a position to guarantee it, but this is surely the objective we, along with both parties, will be aiming for.

[English]

Senator Andreychuk: I should like to pursue that matter. This summer when the Special Joint Committee on Reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy was travelling in the west, there were expressions of a loss of confidence in the port system on the West Coast. Many expressed their views on what was wrong and how it should be corrected. I am concerned that the loss of confidence directly hurts those industries and products to which Senator Olson referred, which come from my area of the country.

Why would you set up a board of inquiry to continue to study the problems? The problems are in the open. They have been discussed and studied. We need a board of inquiry to look at the options for resolution, rather than another study which lets both parties off the hook for coming to an understanding.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Mr. Chairman, I think so. The problem is more and more obvious to all the parties involved, including the Department of Human Resources Development and the Department of Labour. The issue was examined over the years — and again this time — except that we may not have spent as much time analyzing the possible solutions.

I believe it is important to have an idea of the type of solutions which must be applied to problems like this one. It is said that a careful analysis of the problem is half the solution. The investigation commissioner should not take several months to find possible solutions, analyze the consequences and decide on the best option with the parties involved. That is the idea.

It seems to me that if we were to unilaterally decide today which solution to apply to that problem, the impact of that solution would not have been adequately examined.

[English]

Senator Andreychuk: What assurance will you give to farmers whose livelihood is in jeopardy that this time there will be a lasting solution? Transportation is in crisis on all fronts in the west. This is a compounding factor. While we look at the best solution for the port authorities in a gentle way, what assurance are you giving to the others who find their jobs and their livelihood in crisis?

You have not reassured me that we will have an answer by September. There will be an analysis and a rethinking. New people will be sent in to look at it again. They will review the history, point out the hostility of the two sides and perhaps make some recommendations, but what will be different at the end of the day? The two parties will still be in a hostile situation. Why will this inquiry be different from any other?

I must say, however, that I appreciate that you are bringing a new eagerness and willingness to your task, which is commendable.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: First, I want to make it clear that we were forced to legislate last year. The longshoremen at West Coast ports are currently subject to a collective agreement expiring at the end of this year. Now we have to pass a bill concerning the foremen, whose collective agreement will then last until December 31, 1996.

These two pieces of legislation ensure stable economic activities for this period of time. There will be no strike and no lockout during this period, which does not mean that the dynamics of the employer-employee relationship will necessarily be better, but at least western farmers and exporters will be assured that West Coast ports will be in operation.

I have already explained the time frame. The board of inquiry will examine the structures of the collective bargaining process, report to me in the fall and, if changes to the code are recommended, we will act immediately before the expiration date of the various collective agreements so that we will not end up again in the same situation.

Senator Gauthier: In much the same vein, will the board of inquiry sit when certain employees and employers are facing the threat of a work stoppage?

For instance, the situation in Montreal has not been resolved. If I understood correctly, the recommendations of the board of inquiry will apply to all Canadian ports and not exclusively to West Coast ports. If the board's recommendations apply to all Canadian ports, it is quite possible that Montreal will be in a strike situation, and there may be a labour dispute while the board is doing its work.

Is that correct?

Mrs. Robillard: The board of inquiry will concentrate exclusively on West Coast ports to examine the structures there. The recurring problems on the West Coast have do to with the structure. The board's findings will not apply to all Canadian ports.

Senator Gauthier: Not to the Port of Montreal.

We should find a solution to our problem in the west within 90 days. Bill C-74 is a rather fast solution since I understand the matter will be settled in less than 90 days. The board of inquiry would not begin its hearings before 90 days at least.

Am I mistaken or is it possible for the board to start its proceedings before the matter is settled on the West Coast?

Mrs. Robillard: The board of inquiry can start its proceedings before that.

Senator Gauthier: Without prejudice to the conciliation officer's task.

Mrs. Robillard: No, because the mandates are totally different. Essentially, the mediator-arbitrator must find a solution to the very specific problems that I mentioned earlier, problems relating to retirement, the various social benefits and so on. The mediator-arbitrator will not examine the whole structure of collective agreements in Western Canada. These are two different mandates, and I think that they can be carried out simultaneously.

Senator Gauthier: Are we not legislating piecemeal in this case? From what I understand, the work of the board of inquiry will only apply to Western Canada. It could happen that a board of inquiry would be necessary to find solutions also in the east, or in Montreal or Quebec City, if things got worse.

Mrs. Robillard: That does not seem to be necessary and obvious for the Montreal area.

[English]

• (2010)

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I join with you in welcoming the minister to this chamber. However, I suggest to her that perhaps she should not run too fast, that she should walk a bit. This is a strange community you have moved into. It is not anything like a provincial legislature or that scene at all.

Minister, you must be careful because you are suggesting to me — someone from Atlantic Canada — that your approach to policy development may lead to one law for one part of Canada and another law for another part of Canada. You seem to suggest, perhaps, that what is being moved will dictate — Minister, you may smile and laugh, but I am discussing policy with you. Perhaps you might give the board or the commissioner the benefit of a clear enunciation of labour policy so that all Canadians will understand what you are doing. It might go down a little easier. However, to sit here tonight and suggest that you will move swiftly to develop a solution for Vancouver is to suggest, at least to me, Madam Minister, that you may get your "comeuppance" somewhere along the line. I ask you to beware of that possibility.

Implicit in what you say is a fundamental policy change in two areas. The first relates to the nature of the final offer, how you are using it and how we intended to use it in the past. The second is much more minor. Why clause 13? Is it a change of policy? Why have you taken away the jail term for failure to comply?

Would the government, in its wisdom, once it has consulted its Red Book, which I understand is a little bereft in this area — much like "Where's the beef?" — take a look at the development of a broad policy statement with respect to the public interest or some other common starting point that would have application to all parts of the country or application to all aspects of labour law and its use in our evolving system?

This is a good idea, but I would hate to see it fail because someone said it is not for you but for someone else. We are still all Canadians. If you are taking these measures just for the West Coast, what are we to assume? Are we to assume that these measures have no value for us?

Madam Minister, you are confusing a great number of Canadians. Without the benefit of public dialogue, you are changing very significant policy positions in the area of labour policy.

Perhaps you might respond to clause 13. Why has the option of jail been taken out? That might shed some light on whether you intend to change policy.

On the basis of what policy or understanding would you ask the commissioner to recommend changes to labour practice in Canada, as applied by the federal authority, that would have force in one part of the country without regard to another?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: In response to the first question concerning clause 13, I would like to indicate that this procedure has been in place since 1991. It certainly is not anything new or a precedent.

Since 1991, imprisonment is not an option in our labour relations legislation. If you take a look at the amount of the fines imposed on anyone who contravenes the act, you will see that it is large enough to qualify as a serious penalty.

I do not know what the legislators' intent was back in 1991, but I imagine that this legislation must also have been based on some social or moral values. Do we have to imprison individuals who contravene a labour relations act? We should ask ourselves this question in terms of social values. This is just an idea I am putting forward.

My point is that this had not been used since 1991, and you can rest assured that the fines are large enough to strongly penalize offenders.

With respect to the second question, I would like to make one thing quite clear.

[English]

• (2020)

Senator Forrestall: Madam Minister, while you are on that point, may I ask a brief supplementary so that we do not have to return to my question later?

If it is not in the law, what then is the need for clause 13 of the bill? I was unaware that jail sentences in lieu of fines were stricken from the law. It may well be, and I do stand to be corrected. If that is the case, I am not at all sure that I agree with it. It may or may not be a good thing; I just do not know. If it is the case, then why is clause 13 necessary?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: Imprisonment has to be specifically excluded in this legislation, because otherwise the provisions of the Criminal Code could apply. That is why it has to be specified in the bill.

As for the second question, honourable senators, perhaps I should give the following clarifications: the legislation before us is designed to solve a problem in the short term in all our West Coast ports by ordering the employees back to work and by applying the mediation-arbitration process.

This problem on the West Coast resurfaces quite regularly, as we have seen over the years, and that is why a board of inquiry has been established to look specifically into the collective bargaining structure at West Coast ports.

This being said, you certainly know that the Canadian Labour Code is currently under review and that this review will give us the opportunity to establish nationwide, comprehensive policies. We have not yet reached this stage, but the review of the Canada Labour Code is under way with a consultation process that will give all regions the opportunity to provide their input.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have two brief questions. You know as well as anyone in this chamber that Quebec was a frequent user of back-to-work legislation and has backed away from it since the creation of the Essential Services Council, which has worked well overall. The council decides with the two parties which services will be maintained during a strike. Do you see this sort of concept as applicable on a national basis?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: I think the whole concept of essential services is an interesting idea that deserves to be studied thoroughly. Maybe we could amend the Canada Labour Code along those lines. We will have an opportunity to take such ideas into consideration during the review of the code.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: One of the essential services which is now being disrupted in this country is rail service. The situation does not seem to be getting any better. There are even threats of lockouts by CN. We know there are major dislocations taking place in certain industries on a national basis, though sporadic here and there. How long will the government let this situation deteriorate before it realizes that it will have to step in, as it has in previous years under similar conditions?

As Senator Andreychuk pointed out without being specific, farmers are being hit by the port strike and by the rail stoppages. Although our more cynical friends out west may say that it will not matter after August 1, once the Crow benefits disappear, the basic question is what does the government plan to do should the rail situation deteriorate further?

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: In fact, there is also a labour relations problem with respect to the railways, at CP and CN as well as VIA Rail, as you know.

Furthermore, I repeat, whenever there is a difficult situation, we make all the necessary efforts to bring the parties together and help them reach a negotiated settlement. I would add that, in the railway industry, which is quite complex, it would be preferable if both parties reached an agreement instead of the government having to legislate. Our objective is therefore to get the parties to agree.

As you know, different positions were taken, and the union decided to take action at CP by organizing rotating strikes in different provinces. As we speak, CP has managed to come to an agreement with three unions representing more than 3,000 workers. An initial agreement has already been reached. They are negotiating with two other unions and, at the present time, operations at CN and VIA are not affected. We are keeping a close watch on the situation, and I do hope it will not lead to a general strike or lockout which would require Parliament to intervene. This is not our objective. We want the parties to solve their problems themselves.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If the situation worsens and develops into a general strike or lockout, can we then, expect that Parliament will have to do something and that another board will be created to try to prevent the same problems?

Mrs. Robillard: Let us not assume anything.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: But we must be prepared.

Mrs. Robillard: We will see what the situation is. We should never generalize. We must judge each situation on its own merit. Let us see what is happening in the area of labour relations. About 60 per cent of all collective agreements are reached without the intervention of the Labour Department or anybody else; the parties come to an agreement by themselves. The other 40 per cent, requiring help from the Labour Department, are signed without any strike or lockout in 90 per cent of the cases.

We must trust the collective bargaining system which exists everywhere in Canada.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am not asking you to speak highly of your department. I am simply asking you if the government will be ready to do something if the situation with the railways gets worse. Some areas of our economy are already affected, and there is already a company which threatens to declare a general lockout if certain conditions are not accepted.

Is the government going to wait and see, or is it already drafting legislation that it will introduce, legislation which was drafted, I assume some time ago?

Mrs. Robillard: First, I am not speaking highly of my department. I am speaking highly of parties who can work out an agreement on their own.

Second, as far as railways are concerned, it is too early to consider legislation. We are still hoping that the parties will reach an agreement. We will monitor the situation on a daily basis.

Senator Murray: Did Canadian National's president formally petition the federal government to legislate in order to avoid the worst, to avoid a strike, and how did you react to this petition?

Mrs. Robillard: As a matter of fact, Mr. Ritchie came to see me to discuss the possibility of legislation. I clearly stated that I had no intention of legislating, that I would rather have the parties negotiate their collective agreement by themselves.

Senator Murray: Canadian National's president does not have as much confidence as you in the process.

Mrs. Robillard: I must add that Mr. Tellier was also present when I met Mr. Ritchie, and that they both received the same message.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if there are no further questions at this stage, we will proceed to a clause-by-clause study of the bill.

Shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 7 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have one question.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Madam Minister, is this the usual clause that we see in clause 8?

Mrs. Robillard: I am told it is the usual clause, except for 8(2)(b), where if the parties fail to reach an agreement, the mediator-arbitrator must take cognizance of the report of the conciliation commissioner.

Senator Beaudoin: The same philosophy still prevails. Agreement between the parties, first and foremost.

Mrs. Robillard: Mediation first and foremost.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: With the exception that previously, both parties were allowed seven days to agree on the choice of an arbitrator, in the bill before us, it says that the government will appoint the arbitrator.

Mrs. Robillard: In fact, the duties of the arbitrator were entirely different as well, since they were based on the final offer principle.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That may be, but my question is this: Why not give the parties seven days or 10 days to agree on the choice of an arbitrator?

I want to make a distinction between mediation and arbitration. Mediation means you try to get the parties to agree, while the arbitrator will impose a settlement, I believe.

The two roles are entirely different. Here it says that if the mediator fails, he may take on the role of an arbitrator, which gives him the opportunity to succeed where previously he had failed. I think there is something wrong when the same person is asked to play both roles.

The mediation process fails, and then the same man or woman becomes the arbitrator and says "Well, this did not work when I was the mediator, but now I can put on my arbitrator's hat, and impose a settlement."

Mrs. Robillard: I am of a different opinion. I believe it is possible since a mediator-arbitrator has a clearly defined role: to bring the parties to an agreement before making a decision. That formula has been successfully used in the past.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would like your officials to inform me of the cases in which the concept of mediator-arbitrator was adopted in the past.

The Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 12 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: Madam Minister, I do not oppose clause 13 at all, but I understand that the use of criminal law is ruled out as a matter of principle, is that right? Are we not trying to resolve the problem by other means?

Mrs. Robillard: Yes, Senator Beaudoin, for the purposes of the failure to comply and the fines.

Senator Beaudoin: And the fines. Thank you.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 13 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 14 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: After clause 15 in Bill C-10, there was a due diligence clause which we do not see repeated here in this bill. That clause said that nothing in the act shall be construed so as to restrict a person from raising a defence of due diligence. This does not come into play in Bill C-74. That was to protect the employee who is called back to work and who, for valid reasons, does not show up. That protection is not found in Bill C-74.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: I am told that this clause is no longer required, since the Supreme Court of Canada rendered its decision in January 1994 after the 1986 legislation on port operations was challenged before the court.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In February of 1994, no one told Mr. Axworthy about it.

[Translation]

Mrs. Robillard: It was a few days before, was it not?

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The employee who has a valid excuse will be excused from whatever clause he might be penalized under, is that correct?

Mrs. Robillard: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall clause 15 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 16 carry?

[Translation]

Senator Prud'homme: Madam Minister, will the bill receive Royal Assent tonight and, if so, is a 12-hour delay sufficient to contact all the people involved in British Columbia who will have to comply with the legislation?

Mrs. Robillard: Yes, I think that a 12-hour delay is sufficient.

Senator Prud'homme: You have been assured of this?

Mrs. Robillard: Yes, I have been assured of this.

[English]

Senator Prud'homme: Do you expect Royal Assent tonight?

Senator Graham: Yes.

Senator Prud'homme: Therefore, that means the bill will come into effect 12 hours from the moment it is signed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 16 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause one, the short title, carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: I should like to thank the minister for her attendance this evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-74, respecting supervision of longshoring and related operations in the West Coast ports, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): With leave, now, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CITIZENSHIP

CONFERRAL OF CITATION UPON YUDE HENTELEFF, Q.C.

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I rise to inform you that one of Canada's outstanding lawyers, Yude Henteleff, Q.C. of the City of Winnipeg, is today receiving The Citation for Citizenship.

The Citation for Citizenship honours 25 individuals and organizations each year for their outstanding contributions to Canadian citizenship and the values it represents. Canadian citizenship is what draws us together as a people and as a nation. The Citation for Citizenship pays tribute to the outstanding accomplishments of Canadians and recognizes a range of activities which mobilize individuals and groups into meaningful citizenship participation. Such active citizenship stimulates the awareness and practice of the rights and responsibilities of being Canadian. It helps our fellow Canadians participate fully in society and promotes our key citizenship values of freedom, justice, equality and respect for diversity.

Honourable senators, I have known Yude Henteleff, a quiet-spoken gentleman, for several years. I know of his legal competence and of his generosity in giving his valuable time in assisting others in need. Mr. Henteleff is a most deserving recipient of this citation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CELEBRATION OF FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND CUBA

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, last week I was in Havana, Cuba. While there, I attended the fiftieth anniversary reception recognizing the establishment of formal diplomatic relations between Cuba and Canada. The celebration was hosted by our ambassador, Mark Entwistle.

Apart from the fact that I was honoured to be included, I was amazed by the number and diversity of those who attended. The diplomatic corps, officials from the Cuban government, personalities from the cultural community and many others, including Canadians doing business in the country, were guests of the embassy that evening.

It was clear to me that our ambassador and the staff of the entire embassy are highly regarded and have done, and continue to do, a great job in establishing good relations with the people in that country. In fact, I got the feeling from those with whom I spoke that Canada is a country for which Cubans have a high regard and that we are welcomed there, not only as tourists but as people with whom Cubans would like to do business.

I got the feeling that although Cuba is a socialist country it is slowly moving toward a free market economy. It is a country looking for foreign investment from countries friendly to them, as well as business interests willing to work out mutually beneficial arrangements. Countries such as Spain, France and Mexico have established themselves through various arrangements. I believe there is a big opportunity for Canadians to do the same.

Honourable senators, I note that the Chairman of the House of Commons Foreign Affairs and International Trade Committee, Bill Graham, who is an MP from Toronto, while in Washington last week, made a comment in relation to the bill that will punish Canadians who ignore U.S. sanctions against Cuba. He said that Canada has a right to trade with any country and does not need lessons from the United States.

Under the bill sponsored by Republican Senator Jesse Helms, business people who buy or rent land or property confiscated by Cuba from U.S. citizens would be denied entry to the United States. This same bill would see Washington bar sugar, molasses or syrup imports from countries, including Canada, that import sugar from Cuba.

I think Mr. Graham's comments were right on. He should be congratulated for having the courage to make them. He was right when he said:

> They're playing domestic politics on the one hand, and on the other, they're saying one thing about Cuba which they themselves don't practice in lots of other countries.

He was also right when he said that Canada should not defer to U.S. foreign policy on Cuba because of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

Canada has a great opportunity in Cuba. While other countries are already establishing themselves, it is not too late for us to make an effort to begin connecting with Cubans, since, I believe, there are a great many opportunities that would benefit both countries.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Marjory LeBreton: Honourable senators, I rise to express my concern over statements that were made recently with regard to women being responsible for the abuses of men. These statements were made to a gathering marking International Women's Day. Interestingly, they also coincided with other events in the news as they relate to women: namely, those surrounding a woman prosecutor in that so-called "trial of the century" who, because of her long work hours, is faced with a situation that questions her role as a mother and her ability to care for her children. One wonders, with justification, if questions would be raised about her working habits if she were a man.

It has also been reported by the Federation of Independent Businesses that women entrepreneurs have more difficulty obtaining bank loans to launch their businesses and that those who do obtain such loans pay a higher interest rate.

Violence in all forms is reprehensible, but statistics, common sense and knowledge surely point to the fact that women should not have to bear the burden of blame for such abuses. In 1987 in my own province of Ontario, the Ministry of the Attorney General recorded 16,282 domestic assault occurrences, 93.5 per cent of which resulted in charges laid against men.

In fairness, however, it must be pointed out that studies conducted in women's shelters provide evidence that children in families in which the mother is being abused may also be at risk of abuse or neglect by their mothers. These children learn that violence is an accepted way for men to relate to women, and to resolve conflict in the family. For boys, their learned behaviour becomes an imitation of their fathers' violence and a perpetuation of a cycle of abuse in future relationships.

It is my sincere hope that the government will disavow such views and distance itself from the statements that were made by one of its own supporters. These same misogynic views were expressed a few months ago in the other place by a Reform member of Parliament for British Columbia. The Reform members are undoubtedly pleased to know that they have a potential supporter in this place.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SENATE COMMITTEE ON AFFIRMATIVE ACTION

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, if California sneezes, sooner or later we in Canada catch a cold. I fear that we will soon be smitten by the right wing wave against affirmative action in the United States. Now is the time for us to act. I urge the leadership of this place to establish a standing Senate committee on human rights.

As those of you who are aware of the history of the Senate will know, the recent requests for the establishment of such a committee are far from new. In 1968, such a committee was strongly recommended in a comprehensive report on possible changes to the Constitution, referred to as the Lamontagne-Goldberg report.

If such a committee was deemed necessary in 1968, I submit that it is absolutely vital to establish one now. From my perspective, I see rights and programs which were fought for over many years, and finally established in the seventies and eighties, under constant attack. The attack on affirmative action programs in Canada is still in its infancy, and basically subscribed to only by supporters of the Reform Party. However, the same cannot be said of the United States.

Affirmative action began as a dream during the Johnson presidency and was enacted into law in the period from 1968 to 1972. President Johnson's explanation of the need for affirmative action was simple:

> You do not take a person, who for years has been hobbled by chains, liberate him, bring him to the starting line of the race and then say, 'You are free to compete with all the others,' and still justly believe you have been completely fair.

But the political situation in the United States has changed. The Republican right wields its influence in Washington and has virtually taken over in California.

There is a right wing proposal for a plebiscite that would ban state-sponsored affirmative action programs. The proposal reads as follows:

> The state shall not use race, colour, ethnicity or national origin as a criterion for either discriminating against or granting preferential treatment to any individual or groups in the operation of the state system of public employment, public education, or public contracting.

In the words of Professor Thomas Wood, one of the two University of California professors pushing this initiative, "The worm has turned, and we are going to put a stop to affirmative action."

Honourable senators, the worm has not turned for those of us who fought for sections of provincial human rights legislation allowing affirmative action programs. Those of us who argued vociferously for section 15(2) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms know that these policies are necessary to reverse past injustices. Only when discrimination and racial bitterness has left our land, only when the people of all races start from the same beginning point will such programs not be necessary.

Without a human rights committee in the Senate, there is no forum for reasoned discussion on the need for or the effectiveness of these programs. In such a committee, senators could get ahead of the public discussions, as we have done in many other areas, such as poverty and aging. Intense and enlightened public hearings could then be held.

Again, I implore the leadership of this institution to look at the importance of human rights and at the benefits that would flow to the Senate and to all Canadians with the establishment of a standing Senate committee on human rights.

QUEBEC

STRATEGY OF SEPARATISTS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, for the benefit of those among you who do not read French, I should like to give you the gist of an article that appeared yesterday in the Journal de Montréal, which generally is separatist in its outlook. The article is written by the Ottawa columnist Michel Auger. Mr. Auger said:

> It was a beautiful strategy. In the first period, Quebec would elect a majority of Bloc Québécois MPs. In the second period, it would say Yes to Mr. Jacques Parizeau, and elect the Parti Québécois. Then would come Yes to the referendum, and that would be no more than a formality.

Mr. Auger then goes on to state:

> This is not what happened. Why did this strategy go awry?

One of the problems discovered by the separatists who are in Ottawa is that "a certain Jean Chrétien" did not turn out to be exactly as they had expected him to be. They expected that Jean Chrétien would be the "scarecrow" they had imagined him to be: someone on whom they could always rely to say the wrong thing and give them an opportunity to score points for separatism.

Mr. Auger continues:

> The Prime Minister has made some mistakes, but generally we are forced to admit that Mr. Chrétien and his government have not been the easy target that the separatists thought they would be.
> When the government acts, it does so with a political skill to which everyone must admit. For instance, the Paul Martin budget, the toughest budget in the last half century, has succeeded in the tour de force of making the popularity of the government increase without affecting the referendum at all.
> Even Mr. Chrétien seems to have found a new self assurance.

He always had it, but perhaps these people had not noticed.

Mr. Auger then goes on to state:

> There was a time when he did not particularly like appearing anywhere in Montreal. Yet, only two weeks ago, on Radio-Québec—

That is, in a program called Droit de parole —

> — he was as much at ease as if he were sitting in his own living room. He was defending his budget before other guests of the program who were far from being his political friends.
> In the strategy of the PQ, the government —

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Gigantès, I would remind you that your time is up. Honourable senators, is there unanimous consent to allow Senator Gigantès to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, honourable senators.

> In the strategy of the PQ, the Liberal government of Mr. Chrétien was supposed to be the brutal centralizer that would have done everything it could to step on the jurisdictional territory of Quebec. The crisis of public finances has allowed the Liberal government to put this perception of it aside.
> Thus, the PQ has every problem in the world to make its campaign take off against the federal budget. The same thing has happened with their campaign against the Axworthy reform.

The separatists have very serious difficulties convincing Quebecers of the dangers of the budget and of the Axworthy report. Mr. Auger then concludes by saying:

> The enemy upon which the PQ counted is not there for it to seize. That is a big hole in the strategy of the separatists.
> I would like to remind you —

— continues the columnist —

> — of what Mr. Brian Mulroney said:
> In politics it is important to have friends, but it is also important to have an enemy.

Honourable senators, the separatists just cannot get hold of that enemy.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

COMMENTS MADE BY SENATOR COOLS ON INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S DAY

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, I think I share with most of you a sense of public trust that we have been given in becoming senators. This is why it hurts us all when a member of this chamber abuses his or her position by making unsupported claims in public which, by virtue of her position as a senator, are then picked up by the media and displayed on the front page of major newspapers across the country. I am referring here to comments made by Senator Cools on International Women's Day.

On that occasion, Senator Cools claimed, and I quote:

> Behind every abusing husband is an abusing mother.

No research was cited or statistics used to support this outrageous statement, and yet it became the headline for this year's International Women's Day.

As a former member of both the Canadian and New Brunswick Advisory Councils on the Status of Women, and having been active in the creation of a shelter for battered women in Saint John, I am only too painfully aware of the reality of family violence. The situation is far too complex and far too serious to let such statements as that made by Senator Cools go by without comment.

The Library of Parliament was unable to provide me with any national or international statistics to support Senator Cools' statement. However, in a study done in 1991 by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women, one witness is quoted as saying:

> Children who witness violence usually directed at their mothers experience an insidious form of child abuse. Most bear life-long scars from watching their mothers being abused...they feel robbed of the affection and support of their mothers and they exhibit physiological symptoms similar to those of children who are physically abused.

Are we to take a statement such as this and use it to blame mothers for turning their children into abusers? To do so would be to roll back the clock 30 years and pick up the age-old patriarchal argument of blaming the victim and claiming family violence to be a private matter.

Research has shown that abusive men characteristically blame their victims for making them act violently. If we do the same, are we as a society any less guilty for the violence that is perpetrated against women and children? Surely the painstaking work of women's groups across the country cannot be undone so easily.

Studies have shown that the mothers of abusers are too passive and submissive. In other words, they adhere to the traditional image of female behaviour that our society accepts. Another characteristic of these mothers is that women from abusive homes are more likely to enter into relationships with abusers when they become adults. This does not, however, make these women into abusers themselves.

Canadian studies show that women who have been victims of abuse as children grow up to have debilitating illnesses such as migraines and eating disorders, as well as high instances of alcohol and drug abuse, prostitution and suicide. The violence they do is to themselves, not to their children.

The phenomenon can only be understood by examining the social context of women's lives. A resource manual for confronting domestic violence, published by the United Nations in 1993, points to the social acceptability and tolerance for family violence as the reason that it is so prevalent. As long as women are kept in a position of social, political and economic inferiority to men, violence against women and children will continue.

I strongly suggest that a public apology by my colleague, Senator Cools, to the women of Canada would be in order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the time for statements is over, but I noted that Senator Kinsella had tried to rise on several occasions. Would it be agreeable that we hear from him?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

UNITED NATIONS

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Today being March 21, I am sure that all honourable senators would not want the day to pass without this chamber marking the fact that today has been declared the International Day for the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

As honourable senators will recall, this particular day is the anniversary of the racially motivated massacre that occurred in Sharpeville, South Africa, 35 years ago today. One can note with some degree of satisfaction that circumstances have much improved over the years, and thus Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II is presently in Cape Town.

We all can be proud of the role played by successive Canadian governments which had firmly, forcefully and repeatedly condemned the practice of apartheid as abhorrent and a gross violation of fundamental human rights.

Honourable senators will also recall that in October of 1970, Canada ratified the United Nations International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. Article 2 of this convention provides that:

> State parties condemn racial discrimination and undertake to pursue, by all appropriate means and without delay, a policy of eliminating racial discrimination in all its forms, and promoting understanding among all races.

To this end, to guarantee all of the rights recognized by the convention, including such rights, honourable senators, as:

> 5(a) The right to equal treatment before the tribunals and all other organs administering justice.

In the past, honourable senators, the Government of Canada has developed a number of programs designed to eliminate racial discrimination. The former government's Ministry of Multiculturalism and Citizenship gave high focus in its race relations work, and, as you will recall, Parliament passed legislation a couple of years ago to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation.

It is important that this leadership role not be eroded, but rather that the Race Relations Foundation be set in place and that the Government of Canada maintain effective machinery within the organization of government to provide the necessary leadership in the struggle against racism and the promotion of our Canadian constitutional and legislative values of diversity and equality, irrespective of race, ethnic origin or ancestry.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources have power to sit at 3:30 o'clock in the afternoon, Tuesday, March 28, 1995, and Tuesday, April 4, 1995, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit at 3:15 in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 95(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MEXICO

PRESENT STATE OF AFFAIRS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, March 28, 1995, I will call the attention of the Senate to the situation in Mexico.

CUTS BY MINISTER TO NATIONAL DEFENCE ADJUSTMENT FUND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it concerns the decision to cut millions of dollars from the National Defence Adjustment Fund.

The Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has done it again. It has come to my attention that he took it upon himself to cut the funding allocated by the Department of National Defence under that program to Atlantic Canada. That fund was implemented to assist communities hurt by the base closures announced in the 1994 budget. The defence minister promised the funding when he authorized the closing of military bases back in 1994.

Can the leader please advise honourable senators whether the Prime Minister will restore the funding, or will this be another broken promise?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take Senator Comeau's question as notice and try to get information on the funding as it was originally proposed. I understand that his concern relates to the funding proposed under last year's budget. I will seek to get that and any other information that may apply under the current budget.

Senator Comeau: Under the program, the funding was allotted by the defence department. What concerns me in this case is that the minister for ACOA, through no authority provided by the minister or the Department of National Defence, simply took it upon himself to make the cuts. If the cuts were to be made, it would have been more appropriate had the defence minister made them. The cuts amount to $10 million.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will look into that matter with both ministers and get an answer for my honourable friend.

SEARCH AND RESCUE—REPLACEMENT OF SEA KING AND LABRADOR HELICOPTER FLEETS—EFFECT OF REPLACEMENTS ON VIABILITY OF CANADIAN FORCES BASE SHEARWATER—PERFORMANCE STANDARDS FOR REPLACEMENTS

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is a follow-up to questions I have been asking over a period of several years regarding the search and rescue and maritime fleet helicopter replacement program. It has been about four months since I last raised the issue. Is the minister in a position to advise us?

This matter comes to mind because we have recently learned that a group called the Canadian Search and Rescue Helicopter Project and the Maritime Helicopter Project have been set up specifically to allow for the continuation of search and rescue and maritime surveillance from our warships. Could we ask the minister for an update as to where this matter stands?

At the same time, to avoid a supplementary question because the subject is closely related, I have a question about the closure of Canadian Forces Base Shearwater. This base was a primary base for the maritime search operation, for training, overhaul and maintenance. Does the minister have a positive response with respect to the replacement program? If so, would she ask her colleague the Minister of National Defence whether, with the replacement of the Sea King, the base at Shearwater could then find an further ongoing functional role in this regard?

I thank the minister for her earlier considerations. It is important that we get on with this matter. People need to be kept up to date with respect to replacements for both the Labrador and the Sea King.

Perhaps the minister can obtain for us the performance capabilities which have been set out for the replacement equipment?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Forrestall for his question. I am very much aware that this is not the first time he has sought information on this subject. As he has indicated, projects are in place to consider replacements going into the next century. I cannot give the honourable senator a definitive answer today as to when this work will be complete. However, teams are on the job studying various procurement options with a view to satisfying operational requirements.

I will speak again with the minister to see how much more explicit I can be in this regard. Indeed, in terms of the replacement aircraft, I will ask the question regarding Shearwater to see what answer I can obtain. It depends, of course, on how the project teams are working.

I am not sure that I can come up with an answer to the honourable senator's third request. However, I will try.

PURCHASE OF UPHOLDER CLASS SUBMARINES—COST TO GOVERNMENT

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Is she in a position to tell us where the government is in terms of purchasing four Upholder Class submarines from the Royal Navy?

It is my understanding that the cost of purchasing four submarines will be somewhere around $800 million. Can she tell us what the actual costs will be? Given the recent budget, where will the Department of National Defence find the money?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be pleased to forward the question of the honourable senator to the Department of National Defence.

When this issue was dealt with last, there was a question concerning some discussions about the possibilities vis-à-vis the submarine issue. I will try to find out at what stage those discussions might be. If at this stage there are any explicit cost projections available, I shall endeavour to find out.

POSSIBILITY OF PURCHASE OF NUCLEAR-POWERED VESSELS—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable senators, will the minister also inquire as to whether the department is looking into diesel-powered vessels, or is it examining the possibility of nuclear-powered vessels?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall do my best in that regard.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

CANADA SCHOLARSHIPS PROGRAM—EFFECT OF CUTS—
POSSIBILITY OF REPLACEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The government, and the Minister of Human Resources Development in particular, have placed tremendous emphasis on the importance of education and training of young people in order for them, and for Canada, to compete in the labour market of the 1990s and beyond. In light of such an emphasis, why has the government put an end to the Canada Scholarships Program?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Quite frankly, honourable senators, I cannot answer the Honourable Senator Cochrane's question today. I will seek an answer for her as soon as possible.

Senator Cochrane: Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government is doing that, would she also find out if there are any plans to replace the Canada Scholarships Program with some other program?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I shall be glad to do that.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to questions raised in the Senate on December 1, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer regarding Bosnia; on December 15, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Andreychuk regarding the compensation of Canadians for past injustices; on February 16, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Sylvain regarding the peacekeeping costs charged to departmental budgets; on February 16, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Robertson regarding HIV infection in women; and on February 28, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Atkins regarding the privatization of Canadian National.

BOSNIA

CONDITIONS FOR CONTINUATION OF PEACE-KEEPING MISSION—VISIT OF UN SECRETARY-GENERAL—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer on December 1, 1994)

Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali visited Bosnia in early December 1994 in order to obtain from the parties to that conflict that they reaffirm their commitment to the peace process.

The Secretary-General tried to convey two positive messages, responses to which would directly condition his recommendation to the Security Council regarding the future of the UN Mission in Former Yugoslavia. Canada fully supported this initiative. These messages were:

- First, that all parties must continue to negotiate in good faith with his Special Representative, Mr. Akashi, and his key subordinates, both political and military;
- Second, that UNPROFOR must have complete freedom of movement throughout Bosnia and the full cooperation of all parties in the execution of UNPROFOR's mandate, particularly the delivery of humanitarian aid.

Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali met with both Bosnian Muslims and Croats but unfortunately was unable to meet with the Bosnian Serb side who insisted that such a meeting take place in Serb held territory.

In his subsequent report to the Security Council, the Secretary-General reported some progress on the question of freedom of movement but was not confident that conditions were auspicious for substantial advances in the peace process.

In the intervening period Contact Group efforts and the Carter Initiative have produced some positive movement. At this stage, the resultant ceasefire and cessation of hostilities Agreement, except for the Bihac area, are holding but are very fragile.

Boutros-Ghali does not determine whether UNPROFOR remains or withdraws from the Former Yugoslavia; this decision is reserved to the Security Council. The Security Council, of course, will, inter alia, take into consideration the views and recommendations of the UN Secretary-General. It is expected that his Report on the situation in UNPROFOR will be tabled at the end of March. Essentially, the Secretary-General's bottom line is that UNPROFOR continues to make a serious contribution to the resolution of the ongoing conflict, in cooperation with the effort of the Security Council, the Contact Group and other involved actors. In this regard, even the minimum adherence to fragile ceasefires and continued dialogue would result in the determination to continue the efforts of UNPROFOR. Widespread denial of freedom of movement for the Force and/or direct threats to members of the Force would, in all likelihood, lead to the Secretary-General's recommendation to withdraw UNPROFOR.

President Tudjman's demand that UNPROFOR withdraw from Croatia has resulted in intensive efforts to achieve a compromise solution. It is widely held that the absence of any UN presence in Croatia would inevitably lead to an outbreak of widespread violence in Croatia with serious consequences for Bosnia, as well. In recent days, there have been strong indications that concerted international efforts have had a positive impact and President Tudjman might compromise. The outlines of such on accommodation would be a separate UN Force with smaller numbers. This revised force would essentially monitor a line of separation between Croatians and Serbs. If current negotiations are successful, the details of such a settlement will be outlined in the upcoming Secretary-General's Report to the Security Council at the end of March.

COMPENSATION TO CANADIANS FOR PAST INJUSTICES

(Response to question raised by Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk on December 15, 1994)

In response to the question raised by the Honourable Senator Raynell Andreychuk on December 15, 1994, regarding redress for ethnocultural communities, attached is a press release and a letter written by the Honourable Sheila Finestone, Secretary of State (Multiculturalism), to eight ethnocultural organizations. You will note that Mrs. Finestone's letter indicates that, "In the past, Canada enforced some immigration practices that were at odds with our shared commitment to human justice. Canadians wish those episodes had never happened. We wish those practices had never occurred. We wish we could rewrite history. We wish we could relive the past. We cannot."

Further the letter also states that, "We can and we must learn from the past. We must assure that future generations do not repeat the errors of the past."

Finally, the letter also states that, "Indeed, we believe our obligation lies in acting to prevent these wrongs from recurring. The Government will continue to take concrete measures to strengthen the fabric of Canadian life by combatting racism, prejudice and discrimination through education, information and the promotion of the values of fairness."

As Canadians, we are proud that our citizens trace their origin to every part of the world. Together, we have built this country on the principles of fairness, generosity and compassion.

Our history records the remarkable success we have achieved by applying those principles. Our history also records that, at times, we have strayed from them. There have been episodes that have caused suffering to people. In the crisis atmosphere of war, some Canadian ethnocultural communities found their loyalty questioned, their freedom restrained and their lives disrupted.

In the past, Canada enforced some immigration practices that were at odds with our shared commitment to human justice. Canadians wish those episodes had never happened. We wish those practices had never occurred. We wish we could rewrite history. We wish we could relive the past. We cannot.

[ Senator Graham ]

We can and we must learn from the past. We must assure that future generations do not repeat the errors of the past.

Seeking to heal the wounds caused by the actions of previous governments, six ethnocultural communities have requested redress and compensation totalling hundreds of millions of dollars. The Government understands the strong feelings underlying these requests. We share the desire to heal the wounds.

The issue is whether the best way to do this is to attempt to address the past or to invest in the future. We believe our only choice lies in using limited government resources to create a more equitable society now and a better future for generations to come. Therefore, the Government will not grant financial compensation for the requests made.

Indeed, we believe our obligation lies in acting to prevent these wrongs from recurring. The Government will continue to take concrete measures to strengthen the fabric of Canadian life by combatting racism, prejudice and discrimination through education, information and the promotion of the values of fairness.

We have already made progress. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms now guarantees equal protection and benefit of the law without discrimination. Through the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, we are committed to the full and equitable participation of individuals and communities of all origins in shaping Canada's destiny. Through passage of the Canadian Human Rights Act and through our upholding of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, we have moved ahead in entrenching the precept of equality.

A further major step forward is the establishment of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation. The Government will proclaim the Act establishing the Foundation in the Spring of 1995. The Foundation, first proposed a decade ago, will play a fundamental role in moving towards the elimination of racial discrimination in Canada.

We honour the contribution of all those communities whose members, often in the face of hardship, persevered in the building of our land. Together, we must ensure that all Canadians can face the future with pride in Canada, in our values and in their own heritage. We are a nation of inclusion. Our task is to strive together to guarantee that the actions of this country match the principles of its people.

PEACEKEEPING COSTS CHARGED TO DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to a question raised by Hon. John Sylvain on February 16, 1995)

Prior to Fiscal Year (FY) 1976-77, DND paid all the costs associated with its participation in UN missions. Payments received from the UN in settlement of National Defence

Invoices were then taken directly into departmental revenue to offset the costs incurred. The UN was frequently unable to reimburse the Department in a timely fashion. This delay in effecting recoveries from the UN created difficulties for the Department and, as a result, the Treasury Board was approached to institute an alternate funding arrangement.

In FY 1976-77, the Treasury Board provided DND with a Base Funding Level Adjustment of $10.5M, or $30M in current year dollars, to compensate for peacekeeping operations. In effect, the Department was paid in advance for peacekeeping costs. The funding base was provided with the agreement that future revenues related to UN missions would be credited to the Consolidated Revenue Fund rather than to departmental revenue. The only exception to this process is Letters of Assist (LOAs) which are formal requests from the UN to procure special items that are not available from normal sources of supply. Funds recovered under an LOA are credited to Departmental revenues.

There are currently no initiatives under consideration to alter this funding arrangement.

Cost and recoveries associated with the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) Mission in Yugoslavia (Croatia-Bosnia) are as follows ($000,000):

| FY | Full Cost to DND | Incremental Cost[1] | Potential Recoveries from UN[2] | Recoveries from UN[3] |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| FY 92-93 | 268 | 98 | 4 | 4 |
| FY 93-94 | 384 | 153 | 60 | 49 |
| FY 94-95 | 390 | 134 | 66 | 64 |
| TOTAL | 1,042 | 385 | 130 | 117 |

[1] Incremental costs are those incurred above normal operating costs.

[2] Potential recoveries are forecasts and do not represent existing claims or invoices against the UN.

[3] Recoveries may not occur in the same fiscal year in which the costs were incurred. Potential recoveries are only forecasts and do not represent existing claims or invoices against the UN.

HEALTH

HIV INFECTION IN WOMEN—REPORTED INCREASE IN RATE—APPLICATION OF DISCRETIONARY PORTION OF DEPARTMENTAL BUDGET—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Brenda M. Robertson on February 16, 1995)

The Government of Canada remains committed to allocating an annual amount of $40.7 million under Phase II of the National AIDS Strategy.

As recently as February 8, 1995, in an appearance before the Parliamentary Sub-Committee on HIV/AIDS, the Minister of Health indicated that one of her priorities is to ensure that the limited HIV/AIDS resources are used effectively and efficiently throughout the remaining of the Strategy.

The government is also much concerned about the recent statistics indicating that HIV infection among women is on the rise. Under the National AIDS Strategy, meeting the unique needs of women is a priority.

A federal action plan to address HIV prevention and education among Canadian women has been developed and is presently being coordinated by Health Canada.

The HIV/AIDS trend in women is upward. There is an alarming increase in sexually transmitted disease among young Canadian women (15-24 years of age) and many of these diseases are known to increase susceptibility to becoming HIV infected.

Although women comprise less than 6% of all persons with AIDS, there is no evidence to suggest that the epidemic in females is declining. The continuing incidence of new infections in women suggests that more cases of AIDS in Women is yet to come.

The following are specific initiatives undertaken by Health Canada under the National AIDS Strategy:

* COMMUNITY HIV PREVENTION PROJECT, NEWFOUNDLAND

This project with the Eastern Newfoundland Health Unit will address the high incidence of HIV infection among women in the Conception Bay area of Newfoundland. It involves a comprehensive approach, including education and prevention, epidemiological data collection, and care, treatment and support.

* PILOT TEST OF THE CANADIAN HEMOPHILIA SOCIETY (CHS) EVALUATION MODEL AS PART OF THE ALBERTA MEDICAL ASSOCIATION'S PILL AND CONDOM CAMPAIGN.

The Alberta Medical Association will pilot the CHS planning and evaluation model as part of the province-wide "Pill and Condom Campaign". The campaign, which was successfully implemented in Calgary, encourages physicians to include a condom and an educational message with all packages of birth control pills prescribed to women.

* PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT PROJECT WITH THE SOCIETY OF OBSTETRICIANS AND GYNAECOLOGISTS OF CANADA.

The Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists of Canada, through its Social and Sexual Issues Committee, is developing an educational plan for its members incorporating the principles of health promotion and healthy sexuality. The plan will address HIV counselling and testing issues for women, care of infected women, contraception, reproductive choice, care of the pregnant HIV-infected woman, and drug therapies.

* DETERMINANTS OF HIV — RELATED RISKS BEHAVIOUR

This project involving a network of small innovative studies will support exploratory community-based research on the dynamics of risk behaviour in women at high risk.

PRIVATIZATION OF CANADIAN NATIONAL— REOPENING OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH CANADIAN PACIFIC— GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Norman K. Atkins on February 28, 1995)

As announced in the Minister of Finance's Budget speech on February 27, the government has decided to privatize Canadian National Railways.

The mechanics of the sale have not been determined yet but it is not the government's intention to reopen negotiations with CP Rail System or to begin negotiating with foreign rail companies.

Instead, the government intends to sell its stake in CN through a public share offering when market conditions are favourable. This will ensure that Canadians continue to have a voice and a stake in the future of Canada's largest transportation company.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., for the second reading of Bill C-37, An Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, in replying to Bill C-37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, what is most worrisome are not the specific amendments per se. What is confusing and unsettling is the fact that the government has not put forward its rationale and philosophy for dealing with young offenders.

When the Young Offenders Act was passed, it had a stated philosophy naming three principles. Already at that time, some compromises had to be reached which served to water down those principles. Further amendments were brought forward in 1986 and 1992 to give the act greater flexibility and to impose tougher sentences for violent crimes. However, those amendments were still within the spirit of the philosophy of the Young Offenders Act.

The amendments contained in Bill C-37 continue to extend the act in such a way as to completely water down those fundamental principles. In fact, I believe it is a perception shared by Minister Rock, since he has put forward these amendments as phase one while simultaneously announcing a comprehensive review of the act to be undertaken in phase two. I can only assume that he has come to the conclusion that by yielding to public pressure in putting forward these amendments, no sustained approach can be argued. Therefore, the concern with Bill C-37 is simply: Where is the Young Offenders Act headed? In what direction are we going?

Honourable senators, I spent some 12 years as a youth court judge during which I handled hundreds of cases annually. It is within this context that I am able to make the following comments.

Canada as a society has been concerned with its youth, and has taken on the role of supporting parents in the rearing of children. At a minimum, we have been mindful to pass laws that will help children grow and develop in a positive environment while enjoying the best resources that we can offer. This has been balanced with the need to impress upon young people that they are responsible for the consequences of their actions, to the extent that they are able to do so.

While we are far from determining the causes of youth crime, it is generally accepted by most that the younger the offender, the more likely the rehabilitation will be successful. It is noteworthy that, in Canada, we are prepared to understand that each young person develops differently according to genetics, environment and influences.

However, the type of society in which the young person finds himself is very much controlled by adults, be they parents, the community or the government. Therefore, there is at least a moral duty, if not a legal one, for the adult population to be concerned and to be involved in the appropriate development of children.

Therefore, the struggle has always come down to how to determine what to do in the best interests of young people, versus how to make young people accountable to, and respectful of, the laws. One might ask if this is also not the general aim of the adult penal system. However, in the adult system, the basic underpinning of our criminal law is that all people are equal before the law.

If, as adults, we are able to form the intent to commit the crime, then status, level of intelligence, economic status and other distinguishing criteria are not to be taken into account in any way. It is only in the sentencing stage that we take into account the individual's particular status and capacities.

On the other hand, with respect to youth, society as a whole has made the distinction that the age of reason is a factor that must be considered, and that young people do not have the full, mature capacity to understand the consequences and import of their acts. Further, to presume in criminal law that they do would be unjust and counterproductive to rehabilitation.

Society has never been clear as to when that age of reason occurs. Of course, this is explainable. As we grow and mature, we are given more responsibilities because of our ability to assume them. Therefore, societies have always struggled in deciding when a person should be able to vote, drive a car, drink liquor, or when they will be fully accountable for their criminal acts. The Young Offenders Act chose a model that eased youths into adulthood. Subsequent amendments pushed accountability more quickly onto the young offender. This fact, coupled with the amendments contained in Bill C-37, serve only to cloud the purpose of the youth justice system with inconsistencies and incongruities.

It is often said that children today are not so different from the children of yesterday in terms of maturation and development. What is different, however, is the type of society that young people live in. It should come as no surprise to my honourable colleagues that the world young people now live in is not the world we grew up in. The problems facing young Canadians are numerous and increasingly complex. In recent years, youth unemployment has decreased and levels of child poverty have increased. Furthermore, we as adults have given young people more freedom, different family lifestyle alternatives and structures, more mobility, more information — both positive and negative — through the communications media, and an environment in which there is more prevalent use of drugs and more violence. It is small wonder that a maturing mind reaches for negative as well as positive alternatives.

Have we as a society stopped and sufficiently taken into account the ramifications of the changes we have made in Canada and around the world? Have we analyzed how these changes may affect children and how our structures, resources and actions affect children? It is not just an issue of making children accountable in society, as adults must also be accountable. If the contributing factors alluded to earlier, as well as childhood neglect and disadvantage, are not altered or interrupted, there is a strong likelihood that delinquency and crime will develop in sequence over time. Any changes to the youth justice system must take into account, not only the proper punishment for crime, but also the problems facing today's youth in general.

Before turning to the amendments currently before us, it would be useful to outline the two previous pieces of legislation amending the Young Offenders Act, which was enacted in 1984. Bill C-106 was passed in June 1986. It included new exceptions to the limitations on disclosure by permitting youth courts to allow, at the request of the police, the publication of the youth's identity to assist in the capture and arrest for an indictable offence. This bill also empowered youth courts to impose consecutive sentences for crimes committed by young offenders.

The Young Offenders Act was further amended as recently as April 1992. Bill C-12 allowed the courts greater flexibility in sentencing youths who are found guilty of murder. It permitted youth court judges to impose longer sentences, and it made it easier to transfer accused youths to adult court. It increased the maximum sentence for first and second degree murder from three years to five years. In the case of transfers to adult court, it stipulated that where the principles of rehabilitation and public protection were irreconcilable, the latter principle must be found paramount.

I am sure that I do not need to remind honourable senators that it was the previous Conservative government which took these important steps.

It is clear that these two important pieces of legislation were enacted by the previous government in the name of public protection. After considering the previous amendments to the Young Offenders Act, it becomes apparent that the amendments proposed in Bill C-37 are in the same vein but go much farther. We are looking at another amendment seeking to toughen the Young Offenders Act.

Bill C-37, honourable senators, contains amendments that can be grouped into three categories. First, it toughens the Young Offenders Act for youths found guilty of violent offences; second, it emphasizes rehabilitation and non-custodial sentences for non-violent crimes; and, third, it enhances the sharing of information regarding young offenders.

The get-tough aspect of the legislation seeks more punitive sentences for youths found guilty of violent offences which include murder, attempted murder, manslaughter or aggravated sexual assault. For example, whereas the maximum sentence for murder is currently five years less a day, Bill C-37 increases the maximum penalty for murder to seven and ten years for second and first degree murders respectively.

This new bill, C-37, also reverses the onus regarding transfers to ordinary court. Currently, a youth 14 or older charged with an indictable offence may be proceeded against in adult court if the court deems it necessary. The proposed legislation reverses the onus by sending all youths charged with violent offences to adult court, unless a youth court is convinced that the objectives of public protection and rehabilitation can be achieved in youth court.

As mentioned earlier, the difficulty with Bill C-37 is that it serves to cloud the purpose of the youth justice system. This is particularly true of the amendment which reverses the onus for transfers to adult court. It has pushed the limits so close to adult court, particularly for 16- and 17-year-olds, and made the line in between so blurred and confusing that it can very easily become counterproductive to either society's wish to protect itself or, indeed, to society's wish to help and rehabilitate young offenders.

With the complexity of the new amendments, young offenders will be confused, at best, or great manipulators of the system, at worst. This being the case, it calls into question the rationale behind having two separate systems in the first place. We need a just system that is clear, precise, and one that Canadians can reasonably expect to understand. This may very well mean re-examining the age at which we consider a youth to be an adult or capable of forming the proper intent. At what age do the decision-making processes change? These important questions regarding age are nowhere to be found in the proposed amendments. It is therefore imperative that they receive significant attention in the second phase.

With regard to the significant increases in the sentences for first and second degree murder, I caution honourable senators that we react to facts rather than misperceptions. This is especially important when considering that the most recent amendments to the Young Offenders Act, which also increased sentence lengths, have not yet had a chance to be evaluated. At a reported cost of up to $300 a day, increased lengths of incarceration come at a considerable expense to the Canadian taxpayer, and their merits as a long-term deterrent to criminal behaviour have little supporting evidence. In fact, many studies show that the longer periods of incarceration serve only to breed criminal behaviour rather than to deter crime. This, then, is only a short-term measure to hopefully ensure public safety.

Will these amendments simply "warehouse" our youths? What good can come of this? Indeed, Professor Nicholas Bala is right to say that Bill C-37 is counterproductive. I am sure that Mr. Rock agrees that society will get only a short reprieve from some criminal elements, but we will exacerbate the problem and end up with criminals who are more hardened and dangerous. Our only hope is that phase two will show this, and we will place the welfare of young people as a priority for our attention and our resources.

Simply increasing incarceration does not deal with the root cause of the crime. Often, important societal inequalities are exacerbated in the justice system. Take the case of aboriginal groups, for example. In my home province of Saskatchewan, 70 per cent of the young offenders in custody are aboriginal youths. This number is obviously vastly disproportionate to the population. Locking them up for longer periods of time ignores the real problems that led these young people to crime in the first place.

Supported by research and personal experience, aboriginal groups detail the hardships and perceived prejudicial treatment their young persons experience in formal youth justice systems. The same can be said for youths belonging to ethnic gangs in Canada's major metropolitan centres. Are their needs being met? Are their circumstances being considered? Is it inevitable that the young person who comes out of such a justice system is embittered, outraged and probably less apt to accord any legitimacy to the system? This is obviously not a desirable outcome. For young people, we must look to the situation from which the behaviour originated rather than solely considering the offence.

The emphasis on rehabilitation is demonstrated in Bill C-37's preference for non-custodial dispositions for non-violent offences. When considering a custodial sentence, youth courts are to ensure that custody be imposed only after consideration of all reasonably available alternatives. Youth courts are also required to give reasons for issuing a custodial disposition. Bill C-37 also sets out limitations on the use of secure custodial dispositions. This change is based on the principle that the least degree of restraint is desirable. The stated rationale behind these amendments is that the protection of society, which is supposedly the goal of this legislation, is best accomplished through rehabilitation.

I should like to commend this emphasis on rehabilitation for non-violent offenders. I believe that by using the least intrusive disposition, the rights and best interests of youths at risk will be duly considered. These amendments call for more creative, community-based programs to be made available to non-violent offenders. This is desirable if we ensure that these programs are implemented in a way that makes youths accountable in a realistic manner, while ensuring that they are given the opportunity to learn and grow as individuals. A hands-off bureaucratic approach is simply not the answer. We need to get into the process community groups and clubs that clearly have an interest in the well–being of our youth. Non-custody alternatives can involve accountability, which is more challenging, stimulating and rewarding. When considering long-term solutions to crime, experts advocate that public safety can best be ensured through rehabilitation.

Although the measures dealing with non-violent offenders appear to be on the right track, I am not holding my breath. These programs are in need of adequate funding. One need not go too far back to remember the difficulties encountered with regard to funding of the Young Offenders Act or even the Juvenile Delinquents Act before it. The failure of these acts was not putting in the requisite resources to make them viable. Upon review of the Department of Justice statistics, it is easy to see that the sentences for young offenders have increased, giving them a further measure of protection for society. It is equally clear that judges in youth court have few rehabilitative techniques and community-based programs at their disposal for non-violent offenders. They are in short supply. While we were attempting to find these resources, young people have not been dealt with appropriately and consequently find themselves escalating their negative behaviour.

I recall that when the Young Offenders Act was being debated in the early 1980s, rehabilitation was to be the key. I also recall the provinces indicating that operating open and secure custodial services would demand a much higher utilization of already scarce resources. In other words, we were already conceding that it would take a monumental task to supply the resources that could lead to true rehabilitation. Also, with the passing of the Young Offenders Act, some provinces had to move the maximum age from 16 to 18, further compounding the lack of resources available.

What should lead us to believe that, in these times of economic restraint and with fewer resources going from the federal government to provincial governments, we will be in a better position to increase our attention to rehabilitation? Bill C-37 gives no assurances as to the critical issue of funding. Yet these amendments continue to stress non-custodial care and rehabilitation. Anyone working with young offenders knows that rapid response with appropriate resources is the only way to change behaviour. Too often as a youth court judge I found myself facing delays and a lack of resources, when dealing with young persons who continued to offend. As I have often said, when the resources of the parents, the community and the school fail, they turn to the youth court to do something to change the behaviour of the young person. All that a youth court judge has that others do not is the disposition of custodial care. How many children can be locked up and how many times must a young offender offend before he is locked up? In many cases, it is simply pious invocation to talk about alternate sentencing. Unless the resources and the attention of governments are put into it — which does not seem likely — a more realistic assessment of the Young Offenders Act is necessary.

Honourable senators, with regard to the protection of the privacy aspect, Bill C-37 provides additional exceptions to the rules against publication. It allows for disclosure of information to those in the community designated by the provincial Lieutenant Governor-in-Council. This is done to ensure that the safety of staff, students or other persons is taken into account. The youth court may also permit disclosure to other persons upon application to the provincial Attorney General. Regarding criminal records, Bill C-37 provides measures that permit youth court records to be kept for longer periods of time.

I am generally supportive of these changes dealing with information sharing. The provisions for more effective interaction among those who deal with troubled youth is desirable. It allows for information to go to the essential parties, such as, school representatives and social agencies. This should enhance the development of a more comprehensive and integrated response. It should be cautioned, however, that it is imperative that such information be dealt with carefully so as not to hinder the reintegration process by undue stigmatization.

Honourable senators, I should like to stress the importance of undertaking a thorough review that adequately addresses all the problems facing our young people today, not simply a review of the justice and criminal component. It is essential that we not let political motives and media sensationalism hijack the agenda. Decisions made in haste are rarely sound ones. The future rests in the hands of our young people. We owe it to them to do our best to ensure that their best interests are met.

I ask Minister Rock to step back and take a fresh look at the youth justice system in order to get to the heart of the issue. The question he should ask himself is: What do we want our youth justice system to look like in the 21st century?

The government would have us believe that this bill is timely because Canada is in the midst of a youth crime crisis. That is simply not the case. Research and statistics, including studies done by the Department of Justice, indicate otherwise. Canada's youth crime rate has remained stable in recent years. Young offenders charged with murder actually fell to 32 in 1993 from 45 the year before. In fact, the greatest number of murders committed by youths 12 to 17 was 68 in 1975. As well, youth crime accounts for only a small percentage of the overall crime rate. Of the 32 murder charges in 1993, only six were random acts, with the others being motivated by various reasons, such as hate or substance abuse.

As abhorrent as these six murders are, and in no way meaning to justify the other 26, this statistic calls into question the notion that the public need live in fear.

If we are putting our resources toward public protection, one might look instead to other problems. For example, in 1992, 132,377 impaired driving accidents were reported by the police. Impaired driving, of course, is a contributing factor, and it is estimated that it is a factor in 1,800 deaths and 60,000 injuries each year. We must make sure we are targeting the real problem areas and not the lesser ones.

The facts I have just outlined tell an important story. Evidently we are not in a youth crime crisis. This being the case, it appears that the Minister of Justice has caved in to political pressures. Indeed, when he appeared before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the minister conceded:

> The change we proposed in connection with the maximum sentence for murder has nothing to do with statistics...

He goes on to say that it is a matter of principle. The Minister of Justice should note that principle alone cannot offer an adequate response. It must be backed by statistically proven arguments. It is unwise to look at one to the exclusion of the other. The principles we are applying must be responsive to the problems we are addressing.

Also worthy of mention is the fact that the impact of the 1992 amendments have not yet been assessed. For example, does it make sense to make changes to the maximum sentences considering that these maximum sentences were increased less than three years ago? The issue of youth crime is one that deserves careful consideration rather than hasty measures.

In conclusion, I should like to say that this bill contains some worthwhile changes and some changes which are doubtful at best. However, that is not my main point. The fact of the matter is that we cannot continue to proceed with piecemeal measures that serve only to cloud our youth justice system. We need to get back to the core issue, and that is to provide Canadians, in particular Canadian youth, with a youth justice system that is fair, effective, and adheres to the long-term notion of public safety.

Honourable senators should keep in mind that legislation is only one part of the solution. It is important to understand that merely changing the laws dealing with youths will not achieve the goal of preventing youth crime in Canada. We must also be able to deal effectively with the problems of poverty, substance abuse, family violence, parental neglect, changing moral values, glorification of violence, inequality, racism and illiteracy, just to name a few. It is my feeling that the proposed amendments do not adequately take into account these problems and do not seek to understand the youths they are put there to deal with.

It is interesting to look at the problem of youth crime in Canada from an historical perspective. In 1908, when legislating the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the predecessor of the Young Offenders Act, Minister of Justice Aylesworth stated that his bill was intended to obviate the necessity for children accused of crimes being tried before ordinary tribunals. Then when proposing the Young Offenders Act in 1981, the Solicitor General outlined the basic thrust of the act as being a balance between the needs of young offenders and the interests of society. Now we are here in 1995 and it appears that Minister Rock has brought us full circle. We are still vacillating on the distinction between youth and adult justice systems. It is apparent that the time has come for a comprehensive review. We must ascertain in which direction we want to take with our youth justice system. I wish the Minister of Justice the best of luck in this regard.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Before we proceed to other items on the Order Paper, I should like to draw to the attention of honourable senators the presence in the gallery of representatives of the Canadian and Manitoba Beet Growers Associations, who held their national convention here in Ottawa this past weekend.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the thirteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, entitled "Regulation and Consumer Protection in the Federally-Regulated Financial Services Industry: Striking A Balance," tabled in the Senate on November 22, 1994.—(Honourable Senator Angus).

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while I do not wish to spend a lot of time engaging in this particular debate, I do have a couple words to say that I would prefer to say at some later time. Rather than try to fool you into thinking that my motive is pure, my real motive is to breathe new life into this motion because I have a couple of colleagues who are interested in speaking on it. In order to get this back to day one and the clock ticking again from the beginning, I move the adjournment of this debate.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995. — (Honourable Senator Bacon).

Hon. Lise Bacon: Honourable senators, when it brought down its budget on February 27, the federal government acted decisively to rein in the deficit that is eating away at our economy and to start paying back this enormous debt that has mortgaged our future.

Canada intends to meet the challenges of the year 2000 and remain one of the best countries of the world, but it cannot hope to do so unless it restores the fiscal health of this country.

We know that these are the most vigorous budgetary measures introduced by a federal government in 50 years. Canada had no choice. Reducing the deficit is important if we want a healthy economy, which in turn is necessary to ensure the future health of our social programs and maintain our standard of living.

We have the best rate of economic growth of any G-7 country. Last year, 433,000 full-time jobs were created. Economic growth peaked at 4.5 per cent, our best performance in six years and the highest rate among OECD countries. Canada's exports have never been higher.

However, there is a very real threat to the economic future of this country because of a debt of $500 billion, which makes us extremely vulnerable to swings in interest rates. This makes it imperative for the government to be firmly committed to creating the kind of economic climate we need to take full advantage of the resources we have.

The budgetary measures introduced by the government are aimed at reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by 1996-97. Some people claim that the markets dictated the content of this budget. My answer to that is that this government was guided by its commitment to building a more prosperous and more secure future.

To stabilize public finances, we had to reconsider the role and the very structures of government. We have therefore eliminated or downsized certain programs, while others have been restructured or regrouped. A number of activities will be commercialized or privatized, while others will be transferred to other levels of public administration.

Certain services such as foods and meat inspection, drug qualification and fisheries control will now be subject to cost recovery and user fees.

These changes will affect the delivery of the services provided to Canadians. It would be silly to say otherwise. We are committed, however, to carrying out the required reform in a fair-minded way and in compliance with the principles of social fairness that have always governed the actions of Liberal governments.

This budget is a major building block of our collective future, the dividends of which Canadians themselves and their children will reap in the years to come.

Honourable senators, the deficit and the debt are national problems. Canadians from all regions have asked us to cut expenditures.

Subsidies are not creating lasting employment. No one was more adamant about this than the business sector itself, and people are coming to the same conclusion all over the world.

Therefore, this is a harsh budget, of necessity, but also a fair budget. It does not target any group or region in particular. In this budget, cuts are shared equitably among industries, generations and the various regions, and the principles of equity among individuals and regions are upheld to the fullest extent.

When a specific region is affected by a massive reduction in subsidies, transitional measures have been put in place, such as the five-year, $326 million transportation adjustment program that among other things will help modernize the highway system in Atlantic Canada and Eastern Canada.

The federal government undertakes to have national standards to make sure that all Canadians, wherever they live in this country, continue to have access to social programs of comparable quality. The provinces will continue to receive federal assistance to ensure this equity.

Honourable senators, this budget clearly shows that federalism is indeed a dynamic and cooperative process. This budget illustrates a new approach to managing this federation, a simpler and more efficient approach which is more respectful of provincial areas of jurisdiction.

The federal budget gives the provinces ample leeway to address the specific needs of their residents. However, we remain firmly committed to certain national objectives and principles that a vast majority of Canadians endorse.

Canadians are proud of their health care system. Every survey shows that they are very attached to it. The principles of universality, portability and access to free health care, which are very important to Canadians, are guaranteed by law. These principles are of fundamental value to our party and our government.

The Canadian social transfer combines under one single transfer three different areas, namely social services, health and post-secondary education. This will reduce the administrative burden of the provinces while providing them with all the flexibility necessary for the development of programs that are tailored to the specific needs of their population.

This new, comprehensive transfer reduces the constraints that the federal government can impose in areas under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. It simplifies federal-provincial relations and allows each level of government to adequately play its role. It announces a new way of doing things: less paperwork and more results, which means that everything will be simpler and more efficient.

The provincial governments will have control over their own budgets and their own decisions. Therefore, they will be able to use any innovative approach that they deem appropriate. They will be accountable for their actions solely to the people of their province.

[English]

Honourable senators, the government promised in its first budget not to cut transfers to the provinces for the two years following. That promise has been kept. We wanted the provinces to have enough time to get ready. They now know the cuts will be in 1996-97, and they can start planning accordingly.

Transfers to the provinces currently amount to almost one-quarter of federal public spending in Canada. Yes, the provinces will have to cope with cuts. Such a reduction in transfers would equal about 3 per cent of aggregate provincial revenues. Those cuts will be less severe than the ones the federal government will be experiencing, on the order of three cents for every dollar of provincial revenue. The proposed reduction of 4.4 per cent in transfers to the provinces in 1996-97 is much smaller than the bite that federal programs will be feeling, 7.3 per cent for the same year. In 1996-97, social transfers to the provinces will amount to $26.9 billion. Total transfers, including equalization payments, will be about $37 billion. Equalization is one of the pillars of Canadian federalism, and the government has not altered this commitment. Equalization will be renewed for a five-year period.

As I have already noted, no region will suffer more cuts than any other. Transfers to Quebec in 1996-97 will decline by $350 million, or 3.1 per cent, less than the average of 4.4 per cent for all provinces. I would remind you that, for the same period, we will be cutting federal spending by 7.3 per cent, or almost twice as much.

All sorts of assertions have been made about old age pensions, but the truth is that the budget did not announce the end of the old age pension. On the contrary, it spelled out the principles that will guide the reform of old age security and the Guaranteed Income Supplement, a reform aimed at ensuring a decent income for older Canadians who have done so much for their country and need it the most.

In Quebec, the subsidy program for dairy farmers has not been eliminated, although it will be cut by 15 per cent as of the next fiscal year and by another 15 per cent the following year. The program's future will be decided in consultation with producers.

We recognize that closing or reducing military bases and units in Quebec will have an impact on local regional communities. However, the Department of National Defence still has installations that surplus to Canada's future military needs, despite last year's cuts.

It is in the interests of all Canadians, including Quebeckers, to reach an understanding on our shared principles and objectives. I should also point out that 69 per cent of respondents say that the federal government is on the right track, including 55 per cent of Quebeckers.

The budget is tough, but necessary and fair. The federal government has proved that it lives up to its commitments, and it is demanding nothing of other governments that it is not prepared to demand of itself. Everyone has to contribute to deficit reduction. Many people have called on the federal government to reduce the size of its bureaucracy. We are doing just that. The number of civil servants will be cut by 14 per cent over three years. Some jobs, most notably 6,000 at the Department of Transport, will be privatized. Of course, possibilities for retrenchment vary from one department to the next, but all departments are doing at least some restructuring. Seventy-three federal bodies have been eliminated and 47 others entirely reorganized. Our plan is not simply leaner government, but to reform spending structures so that savings will continue after the period covered by the plan comes to an end.

The budget takes the vigorous measures needed to meet targets set out in the Red Book. To meet those targets, we will be making cumulative savings of $15.6 billion over the next two years. Over the next three fiscal years combined, the budget provides for nearly $7 of spending cuts for every $1 in new revenues.

Apart from the changes to the size and structure of government, difficult choices have been made in the setting of priorities. In 1996-97, program spending will drop from last fiscal year's $120 billion to just under $108 billion. It is the first time in almost 50 years that program spending will have shrunk three years running.

I should like to stress what is perhaps the most important point. In 1996-97, the debt will stop growing faster than the economy. The ratio of debt to GDP will start to decline. This is vital. If Canada is to maintain its financial capability, the debt ratio must be reduced.

The budget will enable us to achieve our deficit reduction target without raising personal income taxes for the second consecutive year. For the second consecutive year, the government is refusing to fight the deficit on the backs of this country's taxpayers. Moreover, tax loopholes have been closed, and we are ensuring that big business contributes more to the war on the deficit. We are making the tax system fairer. In the end, it is all Canadians who will benefit from the restoration of good health to the country's finances.

Our philosophy is clear: Rethinking the government's role is essential for getting the economy back on track, sustaining growth and restoring confidence. We must cut spending significantly while respecting the values dear to Canadians, such as access to employment, the protection of society's most vulnerable members and the maintenance of the social safety net.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, less than a year and a half after we came to power, the two budgets already tabled have significantly reduced public spending and redefined the way government operates. This budget will lead to significant savings, allowing us to honour our Red Book commitment to reduce the deficit. Our ultimate goal is to start repaying this enormous debt which threatens our future by putting us at the mercy of interest rate fluctuations.

In conclusion, we are confident that Canada needs this budget, which maintains the Liberal tradition of strengthening national unity because it is firmly based on the principles of economic leadership, compassion and increased fairness.

Honourable senators, with this budget, the government is honouring its commitments and serves Canadians by creating favourable economic conditions that will enable us to face the future with confidence. The budget gives priority to reducing expenditures. Spending will be reduced by almost $7 for every dollar of new revenue. New measures will make the tax system more equitable and increase the contribution of large corporations to deficit reduction. The budget introduces the structural changes required so that the deficit will continue to shrink significantly until 1997-98 and beyond; defines a new, more effective role for federalism and the federal government in our rapidly changing economy; and meets all these goals while ensuring a fair distribution of the restriction burden among the regions.

Although this is indeed a tough budget, it is required by our economic situation and supported by Canadians.

ABSENCE OF APPROVAL FOR VARIOUS PROJECTS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Doyle, calling the attention of the Senate to the absence of Senate approval for various projects in the purview of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets, and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton).

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the story is much the same on this one. This order has reached Day 15, and I should like to breathe new life into it, since we have some colleagues who are interested in speaking on this issue at a later date. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—MOTION TO STRIKE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO PRIVATIZATION CONTRACTS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton, Leader of the Opposition, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 1, 1995, moved:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed to examine and report upon all matters concerning the policies and negotiations leading up to, and including, the agreements respecting the redevelopment and operation of Terminals 1 and 2 of Lester B. Pearson International Airport and the circumstances relating to the cancellation thereof;

That seven Senators, designated by the Standing Senate Committee of Selection no later than two weeks after adoption of this motion, act as members of the special committee, and that three members constitute a quorum;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have the power to sit during adjournments of the Senate;

That the committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical, stenographic and such other staff as deemed advisable by the committee;

That the committee have power to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings; and

That the committee present its final report to the Senate no later than one year following the striking of the committee.

He said: I want to make it clear at the outset, honourable senators, that it is with little enthusiasm that I rise to ask support for this motion. The necessity for it has arisen as a result of the refusal of the Government of Canada to institute an independent inquiry into serious charges that its ministries have made regarding the conduct and motives of hundreds — if not thousands — of Canadians directly and indirectly involved in the more than three years of negotiations which led to the conclusion of what are known as the Pearson Airport Agreements.

These charges could easily be dismissed as rhetorical excesses had they not been spat out again and again by senior members of the cabinet, including the Prime Minister himself. To spread by innuendo, insinuation and outright accusation tales of impropriety and law breaking is shameful for the government. To let them fester, masquerading as truth, is intolerable to this opposition. The principal ministerial spokesman for the Government of Canada says that those of us who occupy opposition benches are attempting to line the pockets of our friends. The House of Commons majority concurs with sheepish docility.

The Senate must not, and cannot, be in league with those who, consciously or not, are providing frightening reminders of the evils of McCarthyism, which blighted the United States in the early 1950s. Who will forget how reckless and unsubstantiated accusations of disloyalty and treason were to ruin reputations? Who will forget how the political establishment at the time reacted too slowly to the terrible injustices being done to innocent citizens?

Some who hear me today may wince at the comparison. I was a student in Washington at the time, and believe me, it is a fair comparison to anyone who remembers those wretched days and today bears witness to the tongue-lashing this Senate has taken from the government in power.

A summary of certain events is necessary to better appreciate the motion before us:

A final signature was put to the Pearson agreements 18 days before a general election. The then Leader of the Opposition, now Prime Minister, was quoted on October the 6th, 1993, as saying:

> If it is a good deal, we will sign it if we form a government... You can't make a deal like that without all the facts. The people have a right to know all the facts before they are stuck with a deal.

We agree, and such is the purpose of the motion: to allow the people to know all of the facts which the Liberal Party seemed anxious to seek out, but the Liberal government seems anxious to put aside.

On October 28, Mr. Chrétien, who was still Leader of the Opposition, announced that he had directed Mr. Robert Nixon, a former leader of the Ontario Liberal Party, to carry out a review of — > ...matters pertaining to the privatization of terminals one and two at Pearson Airport in Toronto and to report...by November 30th.

After some 30 days of closed and sorely limited hearings and assessment, Mr. Nixon presented the new Prime Minister with his findings in which he summed up:

> My review has left me with but one conclusion. To leave in place an inadequate contract, arrived at with such a flawed process and under the shadow of possible political manipulation, is unacceptable. I recommend to you that the contract be cancelled.

Buttressed by the 14 pages — that is right, only 14 pages — of text in the Nixon report, on December 3 the Prime Minister announced that the government was cancelling the contract, and on April 13, 1994, the House of Commons gave first reading to Bill C-22, respecting certain agreements concerning the redevelopment and operations of Terminals 1 and 2 at Lester B. Pearson International Airport.

On April 26, the Minister of Transport initiated debate on second reading. Instead of detailing the reasons why the government was cancelling the agreements, which is their undoubted right, the minister initiated a smear campaign which today, 11 months later, is still the government's major argument in favour of proposed legislation which is unprecedented in the rights that it would strip from Canadians who sought to do business with their government.

I do not intend to debate Bill C-22 today, but I must refer to it, since it has led to extraordinary and disturbing assertions surrounding negotiations which lead to the agreements themselves, those who are party to those agreements, and members of this chamber who are questioning the constitutionality of Bill C-22.

• (1540)

During second reading debate in the House of Commons, the Minister of Transport maintained that:

> ...a reliance on lobbyists, the backroom dealings, the manipulation of bona fide private sector interests and the lack of respect for the impartiality of public servants are absolutely unacceptable.

From the first day, obviously, the government was determined to support this unprecedented legislation, but not with argumentation limited to the content of Bill C-22 nor confined to the documentation of the misdeeds which allegedly inspired it. Instead, we got the demand that whatever the flaws inherent in the new government bill, they must be accepted in order to punish those who had rigged the political process to their own ends with the connivance of the governments of the day. Suggestions of illegal activities were made repeatedly, to the point where many Canadians have concluded that such statements merit examination by a third party. The government which once threatened an investigation now refuses it, and the motion under discussion is the result.

Honourable senators, let me be perfectly clear. A parliamentary inquiry such as we propose is far from the kind which is appropriate to the circumstances and events which have been described in the last year. An independent inquiry is what is required. However, the government refuses. The inquiry which I am asking honourable senators to support will be able, however, to get to the bottom of very disturbing allegations which have been made about events surrounding the Pearson agreements. The inquiry will also provide those who have been maligned by the government's allegations a proper forum in which to answer their accusers.

I do not intend to give a full listing here of the charges and accusations which government spokesmen have been tossing about in the last year. I will give only a few in order to remind everyone of the severity of the attacks and to give some idea of the damage they have inflicted. I am only one of the many who can speak from special knowledge of the hurt involved.

On July 5, 1994, before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the Minister of Transport when reacting to certain comments of mine with which he did not agree, which is certainly his right, said:

> However, at some point I would like to know who you are speaking for, if it is not the people who are involved in the process.

Honourable senators, has there ever been a time before this when a minister of the Crown came before a Senate committee and imputed venal motives to one of its members?

After hearing representations from learned witnesses that the bill offended the rule of law, the Senate returned Bill C-22 to the House with remedial amendments. A few days later, the Prime Minister reacted as follows:

> I don't think the Tory Senators will last very long in the public opinion trying to help their friends...We'll let them boil in their own juices...

The Minister of Justice, not to be outdone, said, "me too!" in these words:

> I observe that the majority on the Committee that made those recommendations are Progressive Conservative Senators. I think that has a lot to do with it.

As to the worth of the amendments, not a word was said. Honourable senators, listen to some of the litany of invective which Canadians have had to endure over the last few months:

> ...one last snatch at the public purse by the Tories and their friends...
> ...the biggest ripoff in Canadian history...
> ...one last trip to the trough...
> ...the Pearson deal stinks out every Tory in Toronto...
> ...a cesspool of intrigue and manipulation...
> ...one of the most dastardly deals ever put together in the history of the country...
> ...we are not going down the road of trying to line our friends' pockets with money, which the Conservative majority in the Senate is trying to protect now.

This selection, colleagues, is incomplete, but typical of the government's attempt to force through repugnant legislation on the canard that those involved in the Pearson agreements are themselves repugnant.

I started these remarks by saying that this motion is presented with little enthusiasm. Only circumstances which result exclusively from a government cannonade of statements raising serious concerns about all aspects surrounding the Pearson agreements have led us to this stage in the Senate. The attempts of the Leader of the Government to justify certain accusations as expressions of frustration, rather than a slight on anyone in particular, are a commendable example of sustaining cabinet solidarity but not at all convincing. Off the cuff and impulsive as she may claim the statements quoted were, the evidence leads one to conclude that they were really part of a planned, massive character assassination campaign which persists and aggravates.

How else, then, to explain a letter dated March 1, 1995 from the Minister of Transport in answer to one dated October 7, 1994 from the member from Kootenay West-Revelstoke? I will read certain extracts, and I assure honourable senators that they are not taken out of context.

The minister writes:

> ...I must stress that Bill C-22 was in fact designed to protect taxpayers from an unprecedented raid on their pocket books...allowances have been made to recompense those involved for 'out-of-pocket' expenses, something which the government would not have been required to do even under common law, if wrongdoing had taken place. This government is merely emphasizing that the deal was a bad one, both for the traveller and the taxpayer...this deal did not provide value to anyone.

This was not said by an individual pressured under questioning in a scrum. It was written in answer to a letter dated nearly five months earlier. Of all the minister's verbal assaults, it has to be the most grotesque. He appears to be telling us that the Government of Canada is willing to pay millions of dollars in claims for out-of-pocket expenses, even if wrongdoing had taken place. Surely, all honourable senators will agree that any suspicion of wrongdoing should automatically preclude a payment of even one cent as long as grave uncertainty persists. What better way to get to the bottom of this issue than through a full-fledged inquiry, which would also allow an examination of the accusation repeated many times over — that those in this chamber who question the constitutionality of Bill C-22 are really motivated by seeing that the "recompense" is as generous as possible?

The motion before us, honourable senators, is to strike a special committee to examine the policies behind the government's preparing a request for proposals for Pearson airport, the bidding process, the negotiations, the agreements themselves and their cancellation. The government has repeatedly indicated that all but the final step just mentioned were tainted to give an advantage to particular government supporters. The inquiry will have to study in depth these serious charges and report accordingly.

While I hope that mudslinging can be avoided along the way, I am confident that much, if not all, of the mud which has already been slung will be removed from those who have been smeared repeatedly, including 52 members of this chamber. If the Senate inquiry only accomplishes this, it will have more than justified its existence.

Let me be absolutely clear and unequivocal about one thing. Whatever the ultimate fate of Bill C-22, it in no way has any bearing on the motion before us, as far as this side is concerned. Our challenge to the bill is on constitutional and legal grounds, while our pressing for a Senate inquiry into the Pearson Airport Agreements arises from the government's repeated refusals to institute an independent inquiry into the agreements and the alleged improprieties and illegalities surrounding them. There is, in our minds, absolutely no connection between Bill C-22 and the motion, and anyone suggesting one is barking up the wrong tree, so much so that even if the government withdrew the bill, this motion would remain, as withdrawal of the bill would not withdraw the unsubstantiated malicious statements which have wounded so many innocent fellow citizens.

History is replete with examples of offensive policies being supported with clever insinuations and innuendoes, for no outrage is necessary if wordsmiths conjure outrage, and no truth is required if repetition recycles lies. I doubt if many Canadians are pleased to see this sort of sordid behaviour followed by this government.

I will not elaborate any further, as a number of caucus colleagues want to speak on particular aspects of this motion. Thus, I will end with the following reflections.

No purpose has received more attention from my colleagues on this side of the chamber than restoring Senate credibility in the country we all wish to serve — not just restoration of a political image, but faith in the honest reflection of good intention and better effort. I have sensed the same high purpose in the approach of the Leader of the Government in the work we must share with each other in the Senate.

Shakespeare, in the third act of Othello, explains that for man and woman a good name is the "jewel of their souls". Senator Fairbairn, I am sure, would agree with him that "he that filches from me my good name robs me of that which not enriches him and makes me poor indeed."

I am straying from the business of the Senate inquiry, perhaps. Let me leap from the bard to the Red Book which became "God's armour" for members opposite during the last election. On page 91 we find the lesson as follows:

> The most important asset of government is the confidence it enjoys of the citizens to whom it is accountable...If government is to play a positive role in society, as it must, honesty and integrity in our political institutions must be restored.

A couple of pages on in the Red Book it states:

> We will follow the basic principle that government decisions must be made on the merits of a case rather than according to the political influence of those making the case. We will take an approach of openness in decision making.

There is nothing in here about letting senators boil in their own juices.

I urge the government to reconsider its position. I urge it to set up an independent inquiry with the same terms of reference as those set forth in this motion. That is the fairest route to take for all involved. Canadians have a right to know all the facts surrounding the Pearson Airport Agreements. They certainly have a right to know why the government has so far refused to allow the facts to come out, satisfying itself with malicious insinuations and accusations.

Honourable senators, if the government refuses to act, many innocent Canadians are doomed to be tainted by their inability to seek justice following the reckless and inflammatory accusations smeared across the country for more than a year. In such a case, then, let us make the Senate available to them so that lustre can be returned to "the jewel of their souls".

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, March 22, 1995, at 1:30 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE LATE JOHN PETERS HUMPHREY

TRIBUTE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish to make a brief recollection this afternoon of John Peters Humphrey, who passed away last week at the age of 89 in Hampstead, Montreal.

Mr. Humphrey, who is called the godfather of human rights in Canada, drafted the 1946-47 preliminary Declaration of Human Rights, which was adopted with amendments by the United Nations in 1948. To such a daunting task he had been nominated by Eleanor Roosevelt. Since then his name has never been absent in penetrating discussions on human rights. The Universal Declaration itself has been said, by Pope John Paul II, to form "the basic inspiration and cornerstone of the United Nations," as its predicate is, "everyone" is to bar not one human life. So wide was the renown of John Humphrey that even at the age of 86 he received from Soka University in Japan the Award of Highest Honour.

Recipient of numerous degrees and honours, Mr. Humphrey distinguished himself especially in the professorship of law at McGill University in Montreal and as a director of the Division of Human Rights at the United Nations Secretariat during its first twenty years in existence. He published significant works on human rights all through his public life, including Human Rights and the United Nations: A Great Adventure, translated into French as recently as 1989, and another book, No Distant Millenium: The International Law of Human Rights, published the same year.

Mr. Humphrey participated in many commissions, such as the 1970 UN Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities — of which he was chairman — as well as the recent 1988-90 International Commission of Inquiry into the famine in the Ukraine of 1932-33. He was also principal secretary to the UN mission to war-torn Vietnam in 1963, president of the Canadian Commission for the International Year for Human Rights from 1968 to 1970, National President of the UN Associations in Canada, and he was even a member of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Deeply respected for his penetrating mind and regarded widely as an authority in his field, Mr. Humphrey received very many awards and honours, including the John Reid Medal for International Law in 1973, officer of the Order of Canada in 1974, the Order of Quebec in 1985, and the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, also known as the Knights of Malta, in 1986. Incidentally, in Malta, Mr. Humphrey acted as vice-president in 1987 of the UNESCO conference on the Teaching of Human Rights. Tutoring others as to the intricacies of efforts to reclaim or defend human rights became the lasting work of this indomitable soul.

I would like to state also that Mr. Humphrey's passing last week was marked by recognition and the profound sense of loss of a prime mentor and, indeed, a pioneer by many associations in which he was active or an honorary member, including the Canadian Human Rights Foundation from which he retired as recently as 1991 with the deserved honour of President Emeritus. Having been president of the Canadian branch of the World Conference on Religion and Peace, among his many other affiliations, the person of Mr. Humphrey will be sorely missed, while the far-reaching influence of his insight and his guiding principles in human rights abide as a shining example to Canada and the world.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

REPORT OF CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators may have noticed that, in the other place, Mr. Derek Lee has introduced a motion that there be a parliamentary oversight review committee formed to deal with the activities of the Communications Security Establishment, or CSE, which, it has been suggested, has not come under parliamentary oversight review for the fifty-odd years during which it has been in business. It is, therefore, appropriate to make a comment on the latest report from CSIS on the question of international terrorism. I will be as brief as possible.

• (1340)

According to its report published in January 1995, CSIS conducted a situational assessment on international and domestic terrorism. First the good news: Left-wing terrorism is distinctly on the wane. The Germans have effectively broken the Red Army faction; the Italians have done the same with the Red Brigade. Belgium has been very successful against Action Direct. Only Greece and Turkey, in particular, still have significant problems with left-wing terrorism. State-sponsored terrorism in the USSR has been virtually eradicated, due to the breakup of the Soviet Union. So much for the good news.

The bad news is this: Although the collapse of the Soviet Union has meant an end to state-sponsored terrorism from the USSR, it has removed the restraints from age-old ethnic rivalries that have broken out. Ethnic rivalries in the former Soviet Union and the former Yugoslavia have introduced particularly odious actions against the civilian population under the rubric of "ethnic cleansing."

Terrorism sponsored by the fundamentalist Islamic states, particularly Iran, remains a major problem. Right-wing terrorism is on the rise in Africa, Germany, the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Luckily, right-wing terrorism tends to be state-specific and is not yet spilling over geographic or political boundaries to become international.

Issue-specific terrorist groups, such as anti-abortionists and animal rights activists, are on the rise and becoming increasingly militant, violent and sophisticated. State-sponsored terrorism by Iran, Iraq, Syria, Sudan and Libya remain a serious problem, with the Iranian regime leading the pack in terms of ferocity and dedication. Iraq has muted its support in order to avoid spoiling its efforts to remove UN sanctions. Syria has also reduced its support for terrorist groups as part of that country's tentative move to rapprochement with the West. As long as the U.S. remains a superpower, and the only one, it will continue to attract state-sponsored terrorism.

The "nut fringe," comprised mainly of Islamic cells such as the one that detonated the bomb in the World Trade Centre in New York, are cause for considerable concern. Because they are very small and fragmented, and have no particular state or other organized ties, and because of their fervour, they are difficult for security intelligence agencies to watch, but are indeed very dangerous.

Anti-Israeli terrorism from breakaway, mainly Marxist, Palestinian groups is on the rise in response to the PLO-Israel Accord.

CSIS predicts that terrorist attacks will focus increasingly on high profile private sector targets such the World Trade Centre. CSIS forecasts that over 50 per cent of terrorist incidents in the future will relate to business or industrial premises, 10 per cent to diplomatic premises, and 5 per cent to other government and military premises.

CSIS foresees a continuing trend toward massive car and truck bombings in crowded cities and spectacular attacks on symbols: airports, diplomatic facilities, et cetera, designed to capture maximum media attention.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must inform you, Senator Kelly, that your time has expired.

Honourable senators, is it your wish that Senator Kelly be allowed to conclude his statement?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kelly: The growing sophistication of computers and terrorism data are becoming increasingly important in the fight against terrorism. To contain terrorism, democratic states must not lose their resolve to fight terrorism, but continue to cooperate and collaborate on anti-terrorist actions, follow a "no surrender/no deals" policy with respect to terrorists, penalize state sponsors of terrorism, and bring terrorists to justice.

Honourable senators, I found it peculiar that this assessment did not refer at all to narco-terrorism, which must still be a major threat, or to what I understand to be increasing cooperation between traditional terrorist organizations and organized crime.

I wanted to make these remarks at this time because we are just completing an examination of CSIS with regard to what may or may not have been done and what secrets may or may not have been kept. In the work of intelligence gathering, there will always be a point at which some secrets must be kept.

I support the position of Mr. Derek Lee that some oversight should exist with regard to CSE, but I urge that we be very careful not to erode the confidence of the Canadian people in our intelligence-gathering activities or the confidence of the intelligence gatherers themselves that they can carry out their job efficiently and safely on behalf of all Canadian citizens.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. John B. Stewart, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 22, 1995

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-47, An Act to amend the Department of External Affairs Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, has, in obedience of the Order of Reference of Wednesday, February 22, 1995, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN B. STEWART
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Stewart, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO EXTEND DATE OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. John B. Stewart: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(a), I move:

That notwithstanding the Order of Reference of the Senate adopted on April 27, 1994, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized to monitor and report on the implementation and application in both countries of the Canada-United-States Free Trade Agreement, and on the implementation and application in Canada, the United-States and Mexico of the North American Free Trade Agreement, be empowered to present its final report no later than May 31, 1995.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VIOLENCE IN SOCIETY

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, pursuant to rules 7(1) and 57(2), I give notice that on Tuesday next, March 28, 1995, I will call the attention of the Senate to the issues of violence in society, in the family, and of children at risk.

[ Senator Stewart ]

HEALTH

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am pleased again to place in the hands of the Clerk petitions expressing a plea identical to the one I made in the chamber on March 17, 1994. These petitioners pray that the Senate in Parliament assembled protect health care workers with regard to freedom of conscience in the workplace.

Honourable senators, these petitions contain signatures of 1,375 Canadians from Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. The total signatures in petitions thus far presented by me represent 8,034 petitioners.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT—REASONS FOR DISBANDMENT

Hon. Duncan J. Jessiman: Honourable senators, I rise to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate on issues surrounding the Canadian Airborne Regiment. Will the leader tell this chamber why the Minister of National Defence decided not to heed the advice of his military staff, including the Chief of Defence Staff, not to await the outcome of the minister's own inquiry, and, instead, to react in such a precipitous fashion?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of National Defence has been quite clear in his statements leading up to the decision taken on the airborne. He took his decision on the basis of the evidence put before him, his responsibility for the Armed Forces, and the credibility of the Armed Forces to the Canadians whom they serve.

I will relay Senator Jessiman's questions to the minister. He announced yesterday a full public inquiry, in the broadest sense of the word, into these issues that have disturbed Canadians and others. I refer to the events that took place in Somalia and the circumstances surrounding them. His desire for a public inquiry was to enable all of the issues to be aired, along with the documents, and all individuals involved to be heard.

In terms of the minister's decision on the airborne, he has spoken about the matter clearly and openly. While I can relay my honourable friend's questions to him, the decision he took was made with great care and full understanding of the seriousness of the decision, as well as the implications surrounding the situation with the airborne, which had been of concern to Canadians for some time.

Senator Jessiman: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell this chamber what happened between the release of a video on Thursday, January 19, and the announcement of the disbandment of the regiment on Monday, January 23? Specifically, what happened between the Friday and the Monday for the Prime Minister, who was in Argentina at the time, and the Minister of National Defence to make such a decision and take such drastic action?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I will relay the question to my colleague and obtain for the honourable senator whatever information I can.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

REFORM OF CHILD SUPPORT SYSTEMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the Task Force on the Tax Treatment of Child Support, which was set up last May.

As honourable senators are aware, this task force was set up to tour the country for the purpose of soliciting the views of Canadians with respect to the tax treatment of child support payments. Will the honourable senator provide an update on the status of the findings of this task force? Will the task force be reporting its findings to the House in the near future and, if not, why?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot give you a sense of timing on the results today. I will inquire and communicate with you at the earliest opportunity.

Senator Johnson: Honourable senators, the report of the federal-provincial-territorial committee on family law and its recommendations on child support were released in January, and the task force completed its cross-Canada tour many months ago. When can we expect action on the part of the government with respect to reforming the child support system? What exactly is the government's timetable for this reform? Will legislation be tabled in the House this session?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, this issue is very much in the minds of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Human Resources Development. I will attempt to get for the honourable senator as quickly as I can as much detailed information as I can on the process of the issue.

INQUIRY INTO THE ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Further to the statement I made about the Airborne Regiment, will the minister and the government allow the members of the inquiry to fully investigate the advisability of disbanding the Airborne Regiment? Will they be able to look at the management of the decision-making process that led to the disbandment?

Supplementary to that question, will the inguiry also be looking into, not only the wrongdoing or alleged wrongdoing, but also the actions of those who served honourably? Will there be recommendations on how to acknowledge and pay tribute to those who served honourably within the regiment?

Honourable senators, in asking these questions, my concern is that we not wrong those in the Airborne Regiment who acted appropriately and fairly and with honour while representing the people of Canada.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Andreychuk for her question.

Honourable senators, the public inquiry on Somalia, as I have indicated, will be broad. A three-member panel has been struck to handle that inquiry.

I will put the honourable senator's question directly to the Minister of National Defence. I honestly cannot answer the question, nor do I wish to speculate on the reply at this point.

One thing I have no hesitation in doing, however, is joining my friend and the Minister of National Defence, who has already done so, in paying tribute to the fine service of the many members of the Airborne Regiment over the years.

Honourable senators, the disbandment of the Airborne Regiment is undoubtedly to many people a very sad and tragic incident. As my honourable friend knows, over the last number of months, serious occurences and breaches of proper conduct have come to light and as a result a decision was made. That decision does not, in my view, take away from the honour of the many people who have served in that regiment courageously and with distinction over the years.

Senator Andreychuk: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary question, will the government indicate today, instead of awaiting the outcome of the inquiry, what action it intends to take to reassure Canadians, particularly members of the regiment who have acted appropriately, that the contribution of the Airborne Regiment will be recognized in some tangible way, either by reinstating the regiment or some other means?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, the Minister of National Defence has made it clear that the decision regarding the Airborne Regiment was a final one.

As for the remainder of the honourable senator's question, I will be pleased to forward it to the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE AT SAINT-JEAN—DECREASE IN RECRUITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I read recently that the recruitment drive for the Royal Military College at Saint-Jean has resulted in a drop of approximately 30 per cent in the number of applications compared with previous years. What does the Minister of National Defence intend to do to remedy that intolerable situation?

[English]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the statistic cited by the honourable senator is one of which we are aware. The Minister of National Defence made it clear in the House of Commons a few days ago that one of the reasons for the reduction in the number of applications was the confusion and uncertainty which surrounded the future of the college, until the decision was made last summer as to the structure in which it was to be maintained. It has also interfered with the timing for the promotional information that was to be sent out about the availability of educational advancement in the college for the persons to whom my honourable friend refers.

The Minister of National Defence has indicated that in the last few weeks the level of recruitment and the number of applications have begun to increase. He has indicated as well that the percentage of officers and recruits into the military in Canada will be maintained. That is something about which he is confident.

JUSTICE

IMPACT OF GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION ON RURAL SOCIETY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerry St. Germain: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to a speech given a few days ago in Montreal by the Honourable Allan Rock.

Senator Fairbairn comes from the Lethbridge area in rural Alberta. I would ask her about her reaction to the comment by the minister that, more than anything else, Bill C-68 is about the kind of country we want to live in and about the kind of society we as Canadians want. Does she not think that that was somewhat presumptuous on the part of the minister, who was speaking to people in the rural areas of Canada, the areas of Canada from which she, I, and several others in this place hail?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure Senator St. Germain will agree with me when I say that Canadians from the rural parts of our country are just as strongly interested in the safety and protection of our population, whether it be in rural or in urban areas. I think that is an underlying desire on the part of all Canadians.

My honourable friend may know that recently the Alberta government conducted a poll on the view of Albertans as it concerns the issue of gun control. To the surprise of the government of Alberta, as well as some people in the rural areas of Alberta, it was found that an overwhelming majority support gun control.

As honourable senators know, the bill is before the House, after which it will be referred to a parliamentary committee. There are aspects of that bill which can be discussed and debated. For all I know, changes may be made to it. However, the fundamental tenets of the bill are ones which the Minister of Justice has stated openly. He has gone into every area of this country to discuss them, including rural areas in Alberta, Saskatchewan and other places.

Something on which Canadians who take this issue seriously seem to be agreed is the sentiment expressed in the words of the minister to which my honourable friend has referred. As general as they are, they are an expression of a fundamental belief in the kind of safe society that Canadians cherish and treasure. Unlike, perhaps, any other country in the world, it is something which we in this country have protected.

Senator St. Germain: Honourable senators, I hope that the present government will leave governing by polls to the Reform Party. I trust that the governing of this nation will not be done strictly by polls.

What I find strange is that the Leader of the Government in the Senate should say that everyone seems to be in favour of this measure. Yet, the minister is seeking support for his legislation and is asking people to write to their representatives in the federal and provincial governments in order to gain that support.

What is disturbing is that in his statement the minister seems to indicate that it is offensive to mount an opposition to the bill. Mr. Rock has said that there is no room for an American-style gun lobby in this country. I do not think the groups that are out there have anything to do with anything American. I think it is a question of the government being uncertain of its position and trying to stifle debate on the issue.

I see nothing sinister in law-abiding citizens of this country, who for years have been involved in sports and hunting, now coming to the point where they can see possible confiscation and other Draconian measures being brought against them.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I could not agree more with my honourable friend. There is absolutely nothing sinister about this matter. In fact, one of the healthiest signposts of our democracy is that people in this country, no matter from where they come, can express their views, concerns, enthusiasms and fears openly and without fear of any kind of reprisal. That is a fundamental tenet of the Canadian society which we treasure.

My honourable friend refers to the minister being in hiding. Good grief, the man has been all across the country. He has been before the public everywhere. There is no question that he has sought the views of every segment of Canadian society. He has tried, and continues to try, to fashion a law that will not lead, as some would suggest, to confiscation. I am not referring to my honourable friend in that regard. However, I recognize that there is a fear which is accentuated by some of the lobby groups. However, the minister has tried to clarify that aspect of the legislation time and time again, and he will continue to do so.

In terms of there being no room for an American-style gun lobby in Canada, I hope everyone in this house agrees with such a statement. There are some in this country who, perhaps, wish that there were constitutional rights pertaining to the question of bearing arms, as there are in the United States. Our Constitution does not provide that right. I know in the areas from which I, my honourable friend and other members of this house come from, there is sometimes confusion about that aspect.

The motivation of the Minister of Justice is not unlike the motivation of a former Minister of Justice with the previous government. We worked very closely together to push through gun control legislation. That was accomplished with some pride and enthusiasm in this house. I am referring to the Right Honourable Kim Campbell.

I am a little puzzled by the reference made by my honourable friend with respect to governing by polls. I raised the polls only as a matter of interest. It had nothing to do with the Reform Party. We are talking about the very valid, lively, well-entrenched and very popular — by the polls — Conservative government in the province of Alberta. On its own initiative, and rightly so, it sought to employ that method along with many others, and that was done to test the reaction of the people of the province of Alberta. The population responded in a way that was interesting from a polling point of view. It was possibly not conclusive, but perhaps a little surprising.

FISHERIES

NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERY—PRESENCE OF SPANISH WARSHIPS ACCOMPANYING FISHING VESSELS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in rising to ask my question of the Government Leader in the Senate, I should like to first of all express my appreciation to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries for their swift action with a view to saving the turbot fishing off the Grand Banks.

In view of the news we heard early this morning that Spanish warships, in company with Spanish fishing boats, are on their way to the Grand Banks, can the Leader of the Government give us an up-to-the-minute report on that matter?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure I can give an up-to-the-minute report. I would far rather have my colleague the dynamic Minister of Fisheries, who does have the latest reports on these matters, give you a reply.

Honourable senators, I am not so sure about the warships. I believe there is a frigate circling out there somewhere. There are Spanish vessels moving in and out of what we regard as a protected conservation zone.

At the moment, the Canadian government, from the Prime Minister on down, is doing everything within its power to reach a negotiated settlement to the dispute over zones, as well as the fundamental protection and conservation of what is left of the fishing stock in the North Atlantic waters. The Prime Minister has been in contact with the President of the European Union. He has been in contact with the Prime Minister of Spain on these issues. The Minister of Fisheries will be involved in discussions on this matter at the United Nations a week from now.

The whole purpose at this point in time is to reach a negotiated settlement that will protect the viability of the fishery for everyone, not just Canada, and to extend as necessary a moratorium among all fishing nations if — as we and others maintain — the fishing stocks are depleted to the point of almost extinction. This is why Canada has taken the extraordinary action it has. It is not just selfishly to protect ourselves. It is to protect for the world the North Atlantic fishery. That is what we are doing now. One has to wonder whether the vessels now moving into those waters are doing so to try and undermine the negotiating process which is taking place. I would hope that there can be a positive conclusion to the whole situation.

PRESENCE OF CANADIAN NAVAL VESSELS ON GRAND BANKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I thank the government leader for this report on the events taking place on the Grand Banks. Can she tell us whether vessels or units of the Canadian Navy are patrolling the Grand Banks at the present time?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to update the situation with the Minister of Fisheries, but I believe there is a Canadian vessel in the area keeping an eye on things.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD—QUALIFICATIONS OF NEW EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On March 2, the Minister of Immigration, Mr. Marchi, unveiled changes to the structure of the Immigration and Refugee Board. At the same time, he announced the appointment of a deputy chair and an executive director.

Of note in this round of appointments is the selection of a Mr. Jean-Guy Fleury as executive director. In its press release, the government failed to mention the fact that Mr. Fleury was a former deputy director of CSIS from 1988 to 1991. In effect, it appears as if the government has taken great pains to omit this important information. Instead of releasing his curriculum vitae, they released a brief overview of Mr. Fleury's credentials.

During the previous government's mandate, when the Ministry of Public Security was announced by then Prime Minister Kim Campbell, the then Liberal opposition strongly criticized the association between immigration and Canada's security agencies. Given the Liberals' election campaign platform and the Red Book statement surrounding the immigration and CSIS relationship, how can the government justify the appointment of a former deputy director of CSIS to such a senior post within the Immigration and Refugee Board? Why is the government hiding Mr. Fleury's professional qualifications?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that the gentleman in question has very strong qualifications for the job. I do not accept my friend's suggestion that the government is trying to hide the background qualifications of this gentleman in any way. However, I shall take my friend's questions to the minister and obtain a more precise answer for him.

RAILWAYS WORK STOPPAGE—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS AT CANADIAN PACIFIC RAIL AND VIA RAIL

Hon. Lowell Murray: What can the Leader of the Government tell us about the status of negotiations between Canadian Pacific Rail and its employees, and VIA Rail and its employees? I ask the question because Bill C-77, which is now before the House of Commons — and which I presume will be arriving in the Senate in due course — imposes mediation arbitration on Canadian National and its employees, but defers the coming into force of any such legislation affecting CP Rail and VIA Rail.

The Minister of Labour seems to be of the view that in the case of both CP Rail and its employees and VIA Rail and its employees, they are close to agreement.

Can the Leader of the Government bring us up to date on the status of negotiations?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Senator Murray, in response to your question, my understanding is that discussions have been continuing in the two cases. I do not have any up-to-the-minute information that I can convey to the house at this moment. However, there is constant communication between this chamber and the House of Commons in terms of the legislation that is presently before that house, and we are not yet aware of how it may be proceeding today. As I leave the chamber this afternoon, I will try to find out more about the talks that have been under way. If I have any information to convey to my honourable friend this afternoon, I will do so.

• (1420)

Senator Murray: I appreciate that, honourable senators. I appreciate also that the government prefers, as do we all, to have these matters settled by negotiation. However, I wonder whether the Minister of Labour has indicated to the parties, that is Canadian Pacific, VIA Rail and their employees, how long the government would wait before proclaiming those provisions, assuming the bill is passed. On the one hand, she seems to feel that in those two cases the parties are close to agreement; on the other hand, there seems to be less urgency to resuming operations.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question, other than to say there is a great desire on the part of this government to have all systems operating just as fast as possible. I agree with my honourable friend entirely that the more desired route is through negotiated settlements. Collective bargaining as it has existed in this country is very important. Probably every member in this house has received phone calls. I see Senator Gustafson sitting over there. There is no question that Parliament feels the tremendous urgency to get our transport system operating because, as the days and the hours click by, we are not only losing money, but our reputation in the world is suffering from our inability to reliably deliver goods to our customers.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the time for Question Period has now expired, but Senator Comeau has been on his feet several times. Is it agreeable that we hear Senator Comeau and then conclude Question Period?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FISHERIES

NORTH ATLANTIC FISHERY—SIGNIFICANCE OF PRESENCE OF SPANISH WARSHIPS IN RELATION TO NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, I will keep it short.

My question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it relates to the turbot war which she mentioned a few minutes ago.

[ Senator Murray ]

We seem to have embarked on a process quite different from the usual process of negotiation. For some reason, negotiations failed. We then embarked on a process of arresting and towing in Spanish trawlers caught fishing turbot on the nose and the tail. However, we now seem to be backing away from that process. Is it due to the fact that the Spanish trawlers now have warships to protect them? If that is the case, by blinking before the Spanish do, will we not be causing all kinds of harm to ourselves?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, all options continue to be open to the Canadian government. Some of my colleagues in this house, including Senator Beaudoin, are far more in tune with how international law of the sea conventions are created and moved ahead. The action required was taken out of necessity.

I recommend to my honourable friend a speech made by my seatmate here back on May 6, 1992, which was almost prophetic in terms of what is happening today, except in that case it was little Iceland that went vigorously into the fray, and this time it is Canada.

I think my honourable friend will agree that our action has captured vividly the attention, not only of people around the world, but, most particularly, that of our friends in the European community and others in the area who have been turning a blind eye to what has been going on in this important fishery.

Our response was very dramatic and further such action remains an option. In keeping with Canada's past international reputation, we are presently trying to seek agreement through negotiation. The ships that may be there are not an issue. The issue is to build upon what appears to be a will and an interest in negotiating a conclusion satisfactory to Canada and to all our fishing partners in that area.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers: one in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 1, 1995, by the Honourable Senator David Tkachuk regarding elimination of the Crow rate subsidy; a response to a question raised in the Senate on February 21, 1995, by the Honourable Senator H. A. Olson regarding the improvement in the international grain market; and a response to a statement and question raised in the Senate on March 2, 1995, by the Honourable Senator John Lynch-Staunton, the Honourable Senator Pierre Nolin, and the Honourable Senator Finlay MacDonald.

ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE SUBSIDY— EFFECT ON GRAIN SHIPPING PORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. David Tkachuk on March 1, 1995)

The impact of Western Grain Transportation Act (WGTA) change has been studied for many years and the effects of change on the Seaway and the ports have been the topic of several studies. Under the WGTA, grains, crops and products have to move through the West Coast ports, Thunder Bay or Churchill, in order to be eligible for the subsidy. With the repeal of the WGTA, there will be no stipulation on where or how grain, crops and products are exported. Shippers will be free to choose the least cost method to ship grains, crops and products to export markets.

Canadian ports, such as those on the West Coast, will face competition from the United States (U.S.) West Coast ports such as Portland and Seattle. Rate comparison with the U.S. West Coast ports have found that the U.S. ports have lower handling charges. However, there are many factors, such as the volumes through the U.S. port at any particular time, which impact on these charges. In addition, using U.S. ports would require special arrangements for cleaning and inspection of the grain prior to shipping. Canadian ports, therefore, remain a practical choice for Canadian shippers.

The Department of Transport has not undertaken any studies on the effect of eliminating the Western Grain Transportation Act subsidy on Canadian ports except for the analysis provided as input to the report entitled "Seaway Round Table - Impact of Changes to the WGTA on the Seaway" dated November 4, 1992.

IMPROVEMENT IN INTERNATIONAL GRAIN MARKET— REQUEST FOR ANALYSIS OF SITUATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. H.A. Olson on February 21, 1995)

Canadian wheat exports are expected to increase to 21 million tonnes in 1994-95, despite lower production and lower supplies of Canadian wheat this year. As a result, Canadian carryover stocks of wheat are expected to be quite tight by the end of the year. In its latest PRO the CWB is forecasting increases of $18 to $24 per tonne in the pool return in 1994-95 for most grades of non-durum wheat compared to 1993-94. Because of the strong import demand for durum wheat and reduced subsidies under the U.S. Export Enhancement Program, there have been historically high export prices for durum wheat in 1994-95. As a result the CWB's 1994-95 pool return for durum wheat is forecast to be $2 per tonne higher than the 1993-94 pool return, which was itself an exceptional return.

World wheat production in 1995-96 is forecast to increase by 33 million tonnes to 560 million tonnes as the area seeded to wheat is expected to increase in response to higher prices in 1994-95. As a result world wheat prices will likely be lower in 1995-96. Wheat acreage and production is expected to increase in Canada in response to the good pool returns for wheat in 1994-95 and the shift in acres out of oilseeds to wheat. However, total supplies of Canadian wheat will be lower in 1995-96, despite the higher production, because of the low carryout from 1994-95. Consequently, Canadian wheat exports are forecast to decline in 1995-96. The CWB is forecasting modest declines in pool returns for non-durum wheat for 1995-96 of $5 to $11 per tonne. However, durum wheat prices are forecast to decline sharply. In its February PRO, the CWB is forecasting a decline of $57 per tonne for No. 1 Canada Western Amber Durum wheat in response to higher world durum wheat production and much lower world durum wheat trade in 1995-96.

TRANSPORT

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—PUBLIC STATEMENTS BY MINISTER REGARDING MOTIVES OF CERTAIN SENATORS— DELAY IN OR EXISTENCE OF ANY IMPEDIMENT TO REDEVELOPMENT OF TERMINALS 1 AND 2—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. John Lynch-Staunton, Hon. Pierre Nolin, Hon. Finlay MacDonald on March 2, 1995)

The impasse over Bill C-22 does provide a continuing impediment to the redevelopment of Pearson International Airport.

On January 16, 1995, Honourable Mr. Justice Borins rendered a judgment ordering the deletion of the registration of T1T2 Limited Partnership's rights, title and interest in the lands and premises subject to the Pearson agreement between the Government and T1T2.

Of course, the Pearson agreement entails not only agreements between the partners, but also between the partners and the partnership.

One such agreement — calling for the subleasing of undefined space in Terminals 1 and 2 for up to 25 years — had already been entered into between T1T2 and Allders (Canada) Ltd. when the Pearson agreement was signed on October 7, 1993.

Allders registered this sublease against the title of the lands and premises conveyed to the partnership (Terminals 1 and 2) and pledged this sublease as collateral to its banker, which, in turn, registered its own interest in the property conveyed to T1T2. Both of these interests are subject to a non-disturbance agreement given by the previous government to Allders as part of the T1T2 deal.

Complicating matters further, Allders has been and continues to occupy space in Terminals 1 and 2, based on a lease between the Crown and Allders that existed prior to the deal with T1T2.

Because the orders of the Court are binding only on the two parties to the case brought before Justice Borins — namely T1T2 and Her Majesty — neither the lease between the Partnership and Allders, nor the non-disturbance agreement between the Crown and Allders, were affected. Thus, Allders and its banker retain a registered interest in Pearson Terminals 1 and 2.

Under its sublease, Allders was given the right to operate the duty-free concessions in Terminals 1 and 2. These concessions are a major source of revenue to the airport operator, and as such their presence will be a focus of the financial negotiations between the Crown and the Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority. At the very least, the presence of these agreements will slow down the negotiation process until Bill C-22 is passed. As well, Allders may well bring an action against both T1T2 and the Crown on this matter, which would further complicate negotiations.

The passage of Bill C-22, which specifically cancels all estates, rights, titles and interests of Allders, as well as the non-disturbance agreement between the Crown and Allders, would eliminate all impediments outlined above and put this company on the same footing as T1T2.

Despite the complications due to the impasse over Bill C-22, the Ministry of Transport has not been idle at Pearson Airport. The Government is committed to the provision of a new North-South runway and its construction will commence this spring. Funds have also been expended in Terminals 1 and 2 to ensure that they remain safe and reliable until they are transferred to the Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority, which could then undertake the major redevelopment required.

Presently, the Greater Toronto Regional Airport Authority can only advise the government vis-à-vis Terminals 1 and 2. The transfer of control to this non-profit airport authority, and the subsequent redevelopment, cannot proceed until Bill C-22 is finally passed into law.

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Spivak, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday, February 27, 1995.—(Honourable Senator Bacon).

Hon. Fernand Roberge: Honourable senators, in the budget tabled February 27, the government announced reductions in government spending, among other things. It kept increases on personal taxes to a minimum, raised corporate income tax, applied a surtax on their profits and imposed a temporary capital tax on large deposit-taking institutions. Most Canadians approved these measures. I am one of them.

I am even prepared to say that the minister has succeeded in carrying on what the Mulroney government began some 10 years ago. Mr. Martin would perhaps be embarrassed at the compliment, but I believe he would have made an excellent Conservative Minister of Finance.

Like millions of other Canadians, no doubt, I must confess that I fell briefly under the spell of the minister's comforting words on budget night, especially when he unveiled his deficit reduction forecasts: a smaller deficit than forecast this year and a deficit of $24.3 billion for 1996-97, perhaps even less. I waited for the magic words: "and we will have eliminated the deficit and balanced the budget by..."

However, just when the minister could have completely seduced us with his history-making words, it was a sort of "budgetus interruptus" for us. Our pleasure will have to wait for a few more years. What happens after 1996-97? When will the deficit finally be eliminated? When will we have a balanced budget? When will we finally be able to start repaying our debt?

Of course, we must commend the minister for wanting to reduce the deficit to $24.3 billion in 1996-97. This is a very realistic short-term objective. It becomes meaningless, however, without the backing of a specific objective of reducing the objective to zero in the medium term, by a specific date.

With a deficit of $24 billion, our debt continues to grow. It is our ability to repay our debt, and not just to control our deficit, that gives cause for concern to investors and Canadians.

What will happen if there is another slowdown of the economy sometime in 1997, as most economists are predicting?

There is no doubt that Mr. Martin knows how to drive a car, but as a navigator, we have seen better! He says he can get us to Casselman. Good for him, but we want to go to Montreal!

Why is the minister so restrained, so modest?

In his budget statement of February 28, the minister explained to us that it was unwise to set objectives for more than two years, that it was in fact a bad habit of the preceding government.

Yet, the objective he unveiled of reducing the deficit to $25 billion can be found in the famous Liberal Red Book that appeared in September 1993, four years before the target date.

Is it possible that the date for a balanced budget will be announced in the next red book, just before the next election?

Like many other senators, I have some experience of the world of business. In particular, I am familiar with the importance of financial planning. I know that Mr. Martin, who also has very solid business experience and is quite aware of the importance of financial planning. I am sure, for instance, that when he had the opportunity to buy Canada Steamship Lines from Power Corporation, he would have asked himself some serious questions about the long-term prospects of the company. He would certainly not have been content with a two-year forecast.

While we applaud the government's efforts to reduce its spending, we would still have liked to see some sign of an employment program or strategy, that being the best guarantee of lasting economic renewal.

Far from being disturbed by the excessive number of unemployed Canadians, the minister finds acceptable an unemployment rate of 9.5 per cent this year and 9.4 per cent for the following year. However, we have not forgotten the number one election promise of our friends across the way: "Jobs, Jobs, Jobs"!

The only concrete initiative taken by this government was the famous infrastructure program, and even this program was cut by $200 million, although the Minister of Finance certainly did not brag about it in his budget.

The method chosen to reduce transfers to the provinces is not much more logical. For example, the provinces have been asked to discuss national standards with respect to health and post-secondary education, areas of provincial responsibility from which the federal government is trying to withdraw.

[English]

• (1430)

In all, the federal government announced over $8 billion in cuts to transfer payments. In the Red Book, which precedes and is still more revered than the budget in Liberal circles, we can read:

> Expenditures reductions will be achieved by cancelling unnecessary programs, streamlining processes, and eliminating duplication. This effort will take place in partnership with provincial governments.

Did this government consult the provinces on the cuts announced February 27? No.

The minister also claims proudly that "...much of the federal overlap with the provinces has been eliminated." On page 21 of the Red Book, we read:

> Creating jobs and economic growth in the 1990s requires a renewal of fiscal federalism, including unprecedented cooperation among federal and provincial governments. Canadian governments must coordinate their policies and eliminate duplication in areas ranging from transfer payments and income support to taxation and trade barriers.

Was this the case? No.

Before he became Prime Minister, Mr. Chrétien vowed not to touch transfer payments to the provinces. In this budget, cuts to transfer payments represent about one-third of total cuts. In light of this spectacular reversal, the least the government could have done would have been to spell out clearly their vision of this new relationship between the federal government and the provinces.

However, the most obvious bottom line of this budget is that promises made in the Red Book and elsewhere, both before and after the election, were forgotten. What, if anything, does this government stand for? Perhaps the answer lies in Mr. Chrétien's autobiography — a recent best seller in China — wherein he wrote:

> That is one of the great things about being a Liberal; you can base your decisions on the circumstances, without having to worry about your established public image.

As the well-respected columnist Andrew Coyne noted recently in The Globe and Mail:

> In other words, a Liberal does whatever works, or whatever the situation demands, or whatever will get him elected, but never for any reason that could be identified as a political philosophy.

[Translation]

Driven by financial need, the federal government could have redefined federalism and the distribution of powers between the federal government and the provinces. Unfortunately, it followed the approach it uses in so many other areas: on a piecemeal basis, without an overall plan, without any obvious logic other than fiscal constraints.

Everyone agrees that the provinces must assume more responsibility in several areas. That is what they want, anyway. However, in a federation like ours, which is based on respect for jurisdiction, the relations between the various levels of government must not be upset without consultations or without an overall vision.

No real consultations took place before the budget, and no overall vision came out of the budget.

In closing, I must mention something that struck me, namely that the Minister of Finance failed to mention the GST.

The Liberals are in power. They have tabled two budgets but the GST is still here — and this place is much quieter — not to mention free trade, this idea which had our friends up in arms before the last election and which they are now embracing with an almost obscene passion.

Let us not disturb this honeymoon right away!

[English]

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise today to say a few words about the government's budget, which was tabled in the other place less than a month ago. In doing so, I will also pick up on some of the comments made by Senator Roberge in his speech.

Honourable senators, the 1995 federal budget takes direct action to reduce government spending and refocus government activities on key priorities and needs. The goal of this strategy is clear. The goal is what it had to be in the current economic climate, which is to restore fiscal health to the Government of Canada and, equally important, honourable senators, to reshape the role of government itself in order to build a stronger and more dynamic Canadian economy.

This is a budget, honourable senators, about getting government right so that government, in turn, can do a better job of helping to get the economy right.

This budget reflects the critical role of government to sustain economic growth and confidence and, as promised in the last election campaign, to create new jobs.

• (1440)

A number of media comments on the February 27 budget have accused the Liberal government of stealing a page from the Reform Party. Some commentators have even made the outlandish statement that this budget adopted the policies of the previous Conservative government. While this budget does, in fact, do many of the things which the Conservatives had said they would do, as opposed to the things they did, it also reflects a truly Liberal set of philosophical positions. This budget has developed a plan which adapts government in the 1990s to the problems of the 1990s, while simultaneously preserving its ability to help those in need.

It is important to understand that, contrary to the approaches of other parties, including that of the previous government which approached budget cutting with the very simplistic view that it was best to cut all departments and programs equally across the board, this budget has sought to make specific cuts to specific areas. At the same time, because of its approach to reducing the size of government and the size of the public service, this budget seeks to change the very structure of how government operates, refocusing government on meeting the needs of the people it was elected to serve.

Through this budget, and through the program review exercise which the government has been undertaking, every department of the government has been asked to spell out clearly what its goals and mandates are, and what they should be, in order to refocus the entire method of operation of the government.

In the broad public policy debates that are taking place in every industrialized country at this time in history, the fundamental issues are what the role of government should be in the 1990s, and what the role of government will be as we enter the next century. The answer to this question must, of necessity, include the answer to the question of what are the responsibilities of other parts of society. I do not mean only governments. What are the responsibilities of the private sector, volunteer organizations and individual citizens as we look at reshaping the way society governs itself?

This budget reflects the principle that the fundamental role of government in the late 1990s and into the next century should be to set the broad policy framework within which other parts of society operate. This government believes in that approach and, in so doing, is seeking to reduce the role of the federal government with respect to specific programs and specific service delivery issues.

The budget seeks to make people more efficient and more self-sufficient, and to reduce the role of government in terms of detailed program delivery issues. It reflects the need for government in the 1990s to be streamlined, simplified and modernized in the way it runs its business.

Equally important, honourable senators, the program review in this budget clearly reflects the need for government to substantially reduce the amount of money it spends on providing goods and services to itself, as opposed to providing services to individual Canadians.

This budget also seeks, as Senator Roberge commented in his speech, to substantially reduce the overlap and duplication between the federal and provincial levels of government.

However, this budget still recognizes, as the government recognizes in a number of other policy areas, that there is a vital role for government in the 1990s in terms of setting national standards with respect to the services that Canadians receive. The key in setting standards is to recognize that the detailed way in which programs and services are delivered to Canadians need not be the same in every community across Canada. In fact, substantially greater flexibility is needed at the local level.

This is not a new phenomena. For a very long time, national programs in this country have been designed much more for the ease of administrators than for the purpose of helping the individuals whom the program is designed to help. This has to end.

This budget and the program review recognize that government must become much more flexible than it has historically been with regard to the methods by which programs and services are delivered. Those delivery mechanisms must reflect local conditions much more than they have until now. One of the principles underlying the program review and the budget is the recognition that it is important that government programs and services value people and community needs ahead of rules, that flexibility is more important than rigid adherence to a particular administrative structure. It is this flexibility which, in the future, will be regarded as one of the hallmarks of this government's approach to government in the 1990s.

This budget is no mere reaction to the dire fiscal situation which the government inherited a year and a half ago. However tempting it is for me to digress at this point and make partisan comments about the fact that during the previous administration the total amount of debt in Canada more that doubled, and to cite all kinds of statistics about the cause of the fiscal situation which we inherited, I will of course resist that temptation and deal much more directly with the positive aspects of the budget. I want to deal with its adaptability, its flexibility and the way it treats specific individuals. I also want to deal with the way it reflects today's fiscal reality, which is clearly a very important part of the budget.

This is a tough budget. It meets the fiscal targets which the government set during the last election campaign and also substantially constrains government expenditures. It proposes $29 billion in cuts over the next three years. That figure, it is worth observing, is more than any other budget has proposed to cut since post-war demobilization.

Indeed, in two years, program spending will be $10.4 billion less than it is today. Structural changes now under way will ensure that very significant reductions that begin in 1997-98 will extend into the indefinite future because of the way in which the organization of government is being changed.

Further, this budget delivers on the commitment of the government, made during the election campaign, to cut the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in two years. The numbers given in the budget — and I hate to use this adjective, honourable senators — are very conservative estimates. They show that the deficit will fall to $32.7 billion in 1995-96 and to $24.3 billion the following year.

All of these numbers are based on conservative assumptions. They are based on protections built into the budget against further increases in interest rates. Consequently, honourable senators, there can be no doubt that these targets will be met because of the prudent way in which they have been forecast, and because of the contingency reserves that have been established. If necessary, that will be used to help the budget meet its targets.

It is important to note that this budget meets the fundamental targets which the economic community wanted and expected from this process; that is, it provided Canada with fiscal certainty into the indefinite future. Prudent economic assumptions and substantial contingency reserves of $2.5 billion next year and $3 billion the year after that ensure that Canada is on the right track.

However, cautious forecasts, prudent planning and a comprehensive review of government functions under the program review are only one part of this budget. A second part, and in many respects the most critical part, has to do with the issue of the way government operates and the role of government in the 1990s. Under this budget some 45,000 public service positions will be eliminated over the next three years. To some people that sounds like a lot of jobs, while to others it sounds like very few. The reality is that if you look at the cuts in employment which have taken place in every other major institution, particularly private sector institutions in Canada and elsewhere in the industrialized world, cuts in the order of magnitude such as this, 12 per cent to 13 per cent of the work force, are not unreasonable.

Similarly, government will cut substantially a number of the subsidy programs it has provided over the years, including subsidies to business, which will be cut by nearly two-thirds over the next three years.

Another big change in this budget has to do with modernizing federal-provincial fiscal relations in order to more clearly demarcate what responsibilities will rest with the federal government and what responsibilities will rest with the provincial government. As honourable senators know, that demarcation began many years ago when Established Programs Financing first replaced the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Relations Act in 1977. That was a measure undertaken by a Liberal administration. The changes proposed in this budget reflect a move to the Canada Social Transfer or CST, which will be a lump sum transfer to the provinces. The CST represents a significant change in terms of long-term, federal-provincial fiscal relations and an advancement in terms of disentanglement between the two levels of government.

This budget also takes strong measures to improve the fairness of the tax system without increasing personal income taxes, as Senator Roberge pointed out. Two examples of what I mean by increased fairness as a result of this budget are the elimination of tax advantages for family trusts and the temporary lowering of the upper limit on RRSP contributions so that benefits do not flow to people who earn more than two-and-a-half times the average wage in Canada.

To be sure, there are a few small tax increases. They are tax increases, however, that are overwhelmingly outweighed by expenditure reductions; expenditure reductions that deliver seven times what tax increases deliver in this budget. That is, for every new dollar of tax revenue, there are $7 worth of expenditure reductions in this budget.

Moreover, to fulfil the objective of fairness, the tax increases in this budget have been targeted at those who can most afford to pay. There is a tax on large corporations and a tax on the capital of large deposit-taking institutions. This is a budget that attempts to bring a strong element of fairness to taxation. It is also a budget that attempts to put the government's house in order with respect to fiscal expenditure on programs. It starts Canada down the road of substantially revolutionizing the way in which programs and services are delivered to Canadians by the federal government. It also reduces the role of the federal government while simultaneously ensuring that the federal government will have the legislative power to establish national standards in those programs which are absolutely critical for Canadians.

It is therefore important to understand that in spite of the fact that there have been some reductions in terms of the number of civil servants who will be involved in various programs, the federal government has not in any way, shape or form abandoned its traditional role in terms of setting national standards. I say that because, frankly, national standards are fundamental to the nature of defining Canada. They are fundamental to how Canadians define themselves and what it is they hope and expect to get from their government. Therefore, in areas such as medicare, protecting the benefits of the elderly, and ensuring an adequate distribution of revenue across the country through programs like equalization, this budget ensures that no erosion of national standards will occur.

It is for that reason that the equalization program was not changed. The budget makes it clear that equalization will continue to grow. Indeed, with respect to programs for the elderly, any reform of benefits will be done with full regard to continuing undiminished protection for all seniors who are less well off and the full indexation of seniors' pensions in order to protect them from inflation.

In short, honourable senators, what this budget does is fulfil the commitments made in the Red Book. I must say that I am delighted to find senators opposite quoting from the Red Book, and I think it is a sign that their literacy is substantially greater than people such as myself might have expected.

Page 11 of the Red Book. It states:

> Economic growth is not a matter for market forces alone. Jobs, health care, a safe and sustainable environment, equality for women and men, care for the very young and the aged, and the alleviation of poverty are societal issues that cannot be addressed simply by having each individual aggressively pursue immediate, narrow self-interest.

That is why there is a role for the federal government in setting national standards. That is why this budget and the program of this government will aggressively pursue that position.

This budget takes a balanced approach. It has also met some very tough issues. This Minister of Finance has shown himself willing to take on many of the tough decisions that previous ministers of finance of the last eight or nine years have really talked about but not actually implemented. This budget actually makes those tough decisions while, at the same time, keeping an eye toward imposing a minimum of hardship on individual Canadians and calling on all sectors of society to make some modest sacrifice in the interests of putting our fiscal house in order.

That is why the forecast in this budget will be met. That is why the commitments made in the Red Book and the 1993 election campaign will be met. That is why I believe that this budget is the first step in putting the country on a path to sustained economic growth and fiscal responsibility.

This budget is truly fair to all Canadians and to all regions of the country. It is a budget that will have a lasting impact as it begins to redefine the role of the federal government in Canada. I honestly believe that this budget is not only reform minded, but also consistent with all of the things that this party has stood for over the last 20 to 30 years, and, therefore, I am very proud to support it.

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Will the honourable senator entertain a few questions?

Senator Kirby: Absolutely.

Senator Kinsella: Many Canadians are puzzled by the articulation of one set of principles, the reflection of an ideology which we find when we examine the record of Liberal opposition over the past nine years, another set of principles identified in the Red Book, and yet another vision as we attempt to understand this budget. Is it the honourable senator's position that there is absolute congruency between all three expressions of policy?

Senator Kirby: It is difficult to understand exactly what are the three differences mentioned by the honourable senator, but I will try to explain. Certainly, I think even the honourable senator would find it difficult — perhaps not impossible, but difficult — to make a believable case that there is a significant difference between the commitments made in the Red Book during the election campaign and this budget. In fact, the budget implements what we said we would do during the election campaign. I think that takes care of the second and third case.

The honourable senator's first premise is an interesting one in that essentially it argues that because this party, when it was in power in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, started a series of programs that were right for the time, a modification in those programs in a different time, in a different economic climate, in a different social climate, is a violation of Liberal principles. I would counter that argument by stating that in fact the world of public policy is not a static one. It is a world in which the appropriate public policies for any given time need not be the same as the public policies of 20 or 30 years ago. Change does not make any comment on the correctness of the policies of 20 or 30 years ago at the time that they were made.

If your point is that some of the principles being espoused today in the Red Book — which are very consistent — are different from the policies of the immediate post-war era, I would not argue that. However, we do live in significantly different economic times. Any party that attempts to stick to something because it was the right idea 40 or 50 years ago is doing a disservice to itself as well as to the Canadian people. The reality is that times change.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Principles do not count.

Senator Kirby: I cannot resist the comment. It is an interesting question as to what you elevate to the level of principle.

When your party was in power, it was always difficult for me to tell what the level of principle was. Upon reading and listening to budget speeches by Mr. Wilson and others, I was frequently reminded of a great political line from John Mitchell. Some of you may recall he was the Attorney General of the United States under Richard Nixon. When he was asked at one point to explain the inconsistency between what he was saying and what he was doing, he responded, "Watch what I do, not what I say."

I find it semi-amusing, therefore, that the issue of principle should be raised by members of a party for whom there was a huge discrepancy on many occasions between what they said and what they did. I have difficulty when you attempt to raise something to the level of principle because your own principles were incredibly flexible, over time.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): I find that a remarkable answer, particularly because in the budget we find many Conservative policies that were ridiculed only a few years before by the Speaker and his colleagues on the other side.

Second, speaking of principles, at least there are a few left in the Liberal Party to uphold them. I would direct that reply to the member from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce whom I recognize as being a man of principle who, for the last 30 years, has stood for what Liberalism in Canada is really about. He is currently in despair, along with many others, on seeing the complete change of heart undergone by the same party to which he has been committed for so long. Everything the Liberal Party stood for is beginning to crumble because the polls say we want a change.

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask Senator Kirby how this budget ensures the maintenance of national standards in those programs that have been covered by the Canada Assistance Plan and Established Programs Financing?

In asking the question, I cannot help but remark in passing that, two years ago, the honourable senator was seated in almost that same place, and at that time denounced with the greatest vigor the modest and very moderate restraints on the federal government spending power that were introduced as part of the Meech Lake accord.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to point out that speeches have a 15-minute duration, including questions. That is the rule. However, do I assume that there is a desire on the part of honourable senators to allow the honourable senator to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: We shall continue.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, is there some suggestion that the rules which were jammed down our throats some time ago now are causing some problems for members opposite? I am sorry to see that.

To respond to Senator Murray, my opposition to Meech Lake was not based entirely on the spending powers. It was based on a whole variety of other issues.

I said that national standards would be maintained. I said that they would be maintained not only through the budget but through other measures. Take medicare as an example. The Canada Health Act is obviously not a budget bill or a fiscal measure. I do not believe it is inconsistent to move in the direction where you have greater flexibility at the local level, while still maintaining national standards.

Senator Murray: I appreciate that. The honourable senator knows in considerable detail how these things work. The question is one of enforcement. The government has committed itself to enforcement to the extent that at least one minister, perhaps the Prime Minister himself, has said that they would find other ways of reducing cash transfers to provinces, perhaps even reducing equalization payments to provinces, that did not conform to the federal government's notion of our national standard. There are three provinces that do not even receive equalization payments.

I ask the honourable senator whether he does not believe that these threats are pretty hollow?

Senator Kirby: Without getting into a discussion of what particular enforcement mechanism is likely to ultimately come into effect, the fact is that I do believe there are a variety of ways in which enforcement can be carried out. I honestly believe it will be relatively straightforward to develop processes which ensure that national standards are implemented without necessarily doing it exclusively through the replacement of the Established Programs Financing, or EPF. There are other ways of doing it.

Senator Kinsella: We all accept the dynamic nature of society. Because of that, we recognize in public policymaking that one must look forward and be progressive.

Senator Kirby: Let the record show that my colleague said "progressive" and not "Progressive Conservative."

Senator Kinsella: Towards the end of your speech, you make reference to Reform. This is what has a lot of Canadians quite concerned. Many of us feel that there has been a shift, in policy and in principle, from the grand tradition of the Liberal Party of Canada towards a Reform type of agenda.

I was somewhat startled to hear you use that word. Perhaps you would like to explain it, particularly in light of the vision that you hold as to where we are headed, for example, when the budget speaks of a $7 billion cut from the social envelope? What is the vision of Canada for tomorrow? Will we be the caring and compassionate society that successive governments have been progressive and liberal towards, in the world of the 21st century as well?

Senator Kirby: First of all, given the gun control bill which is in the other place, I find it difficult to accuse this government of having a Reform-minded agenda. It is hard to argue that we have adopted the position of the Reform Party when you see the reactions of their members to gun control.

I assume you were only talking about a certain portion of the Reform agenda. The reality is that in order to be able to afford to finance social programs and other programs down the road in this country, you must have your fiscal house in order. That is the economic reality.

I accept Senator Kinsella's observation that this party has stood for, does stand for, and will continue to stand for being compassionate, caring and concerned about individual Canadians and regions of the country that need assistance or an element of redistribution to help them continue with an adequate quality of life. However, unless the government ultimately gets its fiscal house in order, unless we begin to clean up the mess that we inherited, the reality is that we will not be able to provide those services or a lot of other services that Canadians need.

If you look at what is happening federally and provincially with respect to parties, be they Liberal, Conservative or New Democratic, and if you look at what is happening in other Western industrialized countries, you will understand that the number one priority of all governments these days must be fiscal responsibility. If you do not meet that priority, you will be unable to do the other things that you correctly identified this party as having stood for, for a long time.

There is no doubt that this is a very tough budget, but it is also as fair as possible under the circumstances we all face. It is not a heartless Reform budget. It is consistent with Liberal values and principles.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I can understand the attitude of Mr. Martin, the Minister of Finance, who is partly dismantling what his father built. I can understand that because he belongs to a different generation, while his father lived at a time when certain things had to be done. What I do find puzzling is that a man like Senator Kirby, who was one of the principal arhitects of this structure, is saying today that it must be dismantled, and that he seems to say it so gladly. This is really beyond me.

[English]

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, unfortunately the honourable senator's claim about my role is substantially exaggerated.

• (1510)

Let me comment again on what I said to Senator Kinsella. The practical economic reality facing whatever government happens to be in power in the provinces or federally is that unless you get your fiscal house in order, you will be unable to do all those other things we have stood for, some of which the honourable senator's party has stood for and some of which it has not. The reality is that times have changed.

As I said in response to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, one of the great dangers in politics is taking something and elevating it to the level of principle so that it becomes immutable over time and entirely independent of the circumstances.

Honourable senators, the budget does precisely what we said it would do in the election campaign. That approach is a novelty in this country at the federal level. The budget preserves, very adequately, the major programs which, to use Senator Kinsella's words, have reflected the compassionate, caring nature of this party for a very long time. It begins the process of reforming government in terms of its structure and role. These elements make it a very significant document.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, the honourable senator claims that the budget reflects the promises made by his party during the campaign. There must be two Red Books out there. In the Red Book I have, there are flagrant contradictions between what was pledged during the campaign and what we see in the budget.

Without belabouring the point, honourable senators, let us talk about the GST. The GST was to have been eliminated and replaced with something else. It has neither been eliminated nor are there proposals in this budget for its elimination. Can Senator Kirby explain to us why that campaign promise still remains? It was accepted by all Canadians as being not only a promise, but to become fact, because the GST was identified by the Liberals as the most hated tax in Canada.

Senator Kirby: It is interesting that the Leader of the Opposition should describe the GST as the most hated tax in Canada given the honourable senator's role in implementing the tax. However, I will set that minor point aside.

Honourable senators, the Red Book was designed to cover a mandate and not to cover 6 months, 12 months or 18 months into a mandate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Sixty days to get you elected.

Senator Kirby: Perhaps that is a question the honourable senator ought to raise with me again the day before the writ is issued for the next election. I will be happy to address it at that time.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: For the record, I wish to point out that the budget projects three years ahead. The receipts from the GST are projected for 1996-97. The Minister of Finance is already projecting revenues using the GST as one of his main sources. That must mean the government should admit today that it has abandoned any hope of dropping the GST and that the GST will stay with us.

Senator Kirby: Honourable senators, any such discussion of the GST was always in the context of replacement and was not in the context of simply dropping it as a source of revenue. If at some point the GST is to be replaced by another source of revenue, presumably that line in the budget will have a different label on it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I guess there are two Red Books after all.

Senator Kinsella: If that is reality, honourable senators, there is more than one Red Book.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators are aware of the situation in the rail industry and the ongoing negotiations taking place in the other place. After consultation with my colleagues opposite, I move that we adjourn during pleasure to the call of the bell at approximately 5:30 this day.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate give us an explanation as to his expectations? Is there some degree of optimism that we will be back here at 5:30?

Senator Graham: If I could have the kind of wisdom that other honourable senators in this place have, or if I could get inside the minds of those members in the other place who are holding up unanimous consent to proceed, I could give the honourable senator a definitive answer. Unfortunately, I cannot do that. I cannot predict what may unfold.

Honourable senators, my suggestion is that we adjourn to the call of the bell at approximately 5:30 in the hope that we will have more intelligence at that time. It may be that an agreement will have been reached by that time. I hope that by that time we will know whether or not an agreement has been reached that would require us to sit later this evening.

Senator Berntson: Honourable senators, I presume that in the event no agreement is reached today and there is no call by the bell, we would come back at two o'clock tomorrow?

Senator Graham: The rules dictate that if there is a call by the Chair, we must come back at approximately 5:30 and put the formal adjournment motion for two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned at pleasure.

• (1730)

At 5:30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting of the Senate is resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regrettably, I have to report that no agreement has yet been reached in the House of Commons with respect to Bill C-77. However, we are still hopeful that such an agreement might be possible. I must admit that the chances are somewhat remote, but they still exist.

It is my understanding that by 6:30 or 7:00 we should have a definite answer as to whether there is any chance of receiving the legislation this evening. I certainly regret the uncertainty, but I am sure that all honourable senators would agree with the importance of the legislation, and if there is any chance of receiving it this evening, that we should be here to receive it.

I therefore move that we adjourn at pleasure, to resume at the call of the bell at approximately seven o'clock.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, naturally we will accede to the suggestion that we revisit this matter at seven o'clock. I wish to say, though, that it is a heck of a way to run a railroad.

I do not think anyone enjoys dealing with this kind of legislation, nor can the country afford the continued impact of this stoppage. Depending upon who you listen to, the impact is already anywhere from $3 billion to $5 billion. That is a great deal of money. We will accommodate the speedy passage of this particular piece of legislation in any way we can.

It is understood, of course, that when the bill comes to this house, we will have some witnesses to bring before the committee. Again, we wish to accommodate them as best we can, so we would appreciate the earliest possible notice. I wished to have that comment on the record.

We do not know how quickly this bill will come from the other side, or whether or not a deal will come together. However, because of the very serious impact this work stoppage has had on the Canadian economy, we are quite prepared to sit on Thursday, Thursday night, Friday, Friday night or even on Saturday.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Graham: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for his encouraging remarks. They are certainly in the national interest. We will do our very best to be more definitive at approximately seven o'clock.

I also acknowledge that the Deputy Leader gave us on this side advance notice that the opposition would want to call witnesses, and of course we will accommodate the witnesses as best we can.

Again, honourable senators, I move that we adjourn at pleasure, to resume at the call of the bell at approximately seven o'clock.

The Senate adjourned at pleasure.

• (1920)

At 7:20 p.m., the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Senate): Honourable senators, unfortunately there has been no agreement in the House of Commons with respect to Bill C-77. I thank all honourable senators for their courtesy and patience.

I regret the uncertainty surrounding our activities in this place. You know that the other place is beyond our control. We will revisit the situation tomorrow. We have had discussions with the leadership opposite and, consequently, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before doing so, and without committing the government side, I understand that tomorrow is Opposition Day in the House. It may be that the bill cannot be brought back to the House before Friday, which would mean that the bill would not come to us until Monday. Am I correct in that, unless there is unanimous consent to change the rules?

Senator Graham: The Leader of the Opposition is absolutely correct in his statement.

As you know, I am not yet an expert on procedure. I should tell honourable senators that when I was asked how I was getting along in my new post as deputy leader, I responded by saying that I was reminded of the story of the world champion ski jumper. He was asked how he became so proficient. He said, "I made a fool of myself thousands and thousands of times, but I kept practising."

Honourable senators, I continue to practise. I stand to be corrected, but I believe that in his analysis of the procedure, the Leader of the Opposition is correct. However, it is to be hoped that we will revisit the situation in the public interest and see what we can do tomorrow.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I raise that issue, honourable senators, because none of us here and in the rest of the country understand why a certain faction in the House of Commons is delaying a most essential piece of legislation.

That being said, it appears that the Canadian public must suffer from this work stoppage through tomorrow, Friday, Saturday and Sunday. The bill would come to us Monday night. Obviously, everyone will be anxious to see us dispose of it.

Since there is agreement by all of us to hear witnesses, perhaps the government would consider finding a way, if the rules allow or if dispensation is needed, to hear witnesses before the bill comes to us. Once the legislation arrives, we would have the minister appear as a witness. We could then dispose of the bill as quickly as possible. I leave that suggestion with the government.

I can assure the government that we sympathize with the problems created outside of its control. It can count on our full cooperation to pass this bill as expeditiously as possible.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Lynch-Staunton for his suggestion. I concur in what he says. It is truly unbelievable that we, in this chamber, in this Parliament and in this country, find ourselves in a situation where great damage is being done by the activities of one group in the House of Commons.

As honourable senators know, anything can be done by unanimous consent. However, the honourable leader is quite right in indicating that tomorrow is a supply day in the House. Under the rules of the House of Commons, members cannot vote until Monday.

Honourable senators, we will ascertain first thing in the morning if any sanity has struck overnight and if, through their procedures, the House of Commons can make some progress on this bill. There has been some talk of that. We will certainly be ready for whatever might occur.

We will certainly consider the suggestion of my honourable friend. Perhaps the Senate can aid in bringing this matter to conclusion in an expeditious manner.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us who is blocking the bill?

Senator Fairbairn: My understanding, honourable senators, is that the "blocking" is being done by the Bloc Québécois. Earlier on in the proceedings, there was a coalition between the Bloc and the NDP. I believe now that the opposition rests solely with the Bloc.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate know if the government is prepared to issue notice of closure? Is the Government of Canada now prepared to serve notice that there will be 24 hours of debate or 40 hours of debate?

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Forrestall, the government has used time allocation as best it can. Closure is the final step. Closure stretches the process out even further. We have been working with the Reform Party and anyone we can in this matter. However, there has been an implacable lack of will to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Graham, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 23, 1995

The Senate met at 2:00 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

FORUM FOR YOUNG CANADIANS

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, only a couple of hours ago I once again had the honour and pleasure of enjoying the company of approximately 125 young men and women from across our country at the senators' lunch for the Forum for Young Canadians. The dozen or so of them with whom I was able to chat during the limited time available impressed me as intelligent, concerned and committed Canadians with open and inquiring minds, without the cynicism to which we are often witness.

Unfortunately, one of the most often asked questions was, "Why are there so few senators in attendance?" I believe there were five members of this chamber present at the event.

During four different weeks throughout the year, the Forum for Young Canadians brings together approximately 500 Canadian youth from across the country to learn firsthand how government works. The participants look forward to meeting members of Parliament, particularly those from their own regions. There are two further sessions scheduled for this year, during the weeks of April 24 and May 1.

I urge all senators to make a special effort to attend the senators' luncheons scheduled for April 27 and May 4. You will be rewarded and entertained by the bright, enthusiastic and grateful young constituents you will meet. You will be impressed by their interest and wisdom and you will be enriched by the experience, as I was.

CANADA'S ARMED FORCES

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I note with some alarm the plans in the budget to carve another $2.8 billion from the budget of the Department of National Defence. That, in addition to the $7 billion taken out last year, totals approximately $10 billion in overall reductions in defence expenditures. I leave it to others to decide whether that was required or necessary. I am not so much concerned about the question of military spending as I am about the more fundamental issues of vision and a basic attitude.

As honourable senators are well aware, the glorious Liberal Party in this country has been somewhat ambivalent in recent years with respect to the Canadian Armed Forces. I invite you to cast your mind back to 1964 and the white paper on national defence, which led to the ill-considered unification of the Armed Forces over the protests of those concerned and, indeed, a large portion of the general public. We were told that it was in the interests of economy and efficiency. There were, of course, the Trudeau years of wandering in the wilderness with respect to national defence, years of neglect and indecision.

Between 1970 and 1982, there were seven different ministers of national defence. Since I came to Parliament in 1965, I think there have been 12 or 14 ministers of that department. As the government played a game of musical chairs, our defence policy floundered, rudderless in a sea of Liberal rhetoric and indecision.

We come now to the present government and to the events of the past year involving the dissolving of the Canadian Airborne Regiment. The Prime Minister told us that the prestige of Canada was at stake. He called the first-ever disbanding of a regiment in Canada a difficult decision, but one that had to be taken. Why did it have to be taken? Was the security of Canada at risk? Was the integrity of our Armed Forces in question? Rather, was it a shameless question of polls and popularity?

Honourable senators, I come back to the notion of vision. What is the role of Canada's military? Are these people diplomats, aid workers or policemen, or are they soldiers, sailors and air personnel? That is the question the Liberal government should be asking itself these days.

I need not remind you that the men and women of our Armed Forces are a very important part of our society. They are not, as many on the other side of this house would apparently prefer, media-savvy, politically correct social scientists, committed to solving the problems of humanity for the greater glory of the Canadian government.

To the contrary, they are dedicated people who, to paraphrase one member of the Armed Forces, have chosen to enter into a contract of unlimited liability with their nation. They are people trained in the values of loyalty, integrity, dedication, self-discipline, and tradition. They are people who believe that living in society involves responsibilities, not just rights. They are people worthy of our respect for the job they do; the job they have chosen to do. I suggest we should spend a little more time recognizing that.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

NINETEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, March 23, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

NINETEENTH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the budget presented to it by the Special Senate Committee on Euthanasia and Assisted Suicide, for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee for the period ending May 24, 1995, for the purpose of its examination of the legal, social and ethical issues relating to euthanasia and assisted suicide, as authorized by the Senate on February 23, 1994, November 29, 1994 and March 1, 1995. The said budget is as follows:

|---|---|
| Professional and Other Services | $23,500 |
| Transportation and Communications | 500 |
| All Other Expenditures | 2,300 |
| TOTAL | $26,300 |

Respectfully submitted,

EARL. A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TWENTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, March 23, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

TWENTIETH REPORT

Your Committee has examined and approved the supplementary budget presented to it by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for proposed expenditures of the said Committee, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995, to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it, as authorized by the Senate on February 22, 1994. The said supplementary budget is as follows:

|---|---|
| Professional and Other Services | $35,100 |
| TOTAL | $35,100 |

Respectfully submitted,

EARL. A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Thursday, March 23, 1995

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT

Your Committee has re-examined the Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1995-96 (Estimates) which it presented to the Senate on December 8, 1994 in its Thirteenth Report. The Report was adopted by the Senate on December 15, 1994.

Your Committee now recommends that the Estimates be reduced as follows:

| Estimates | Reduction | |
|---|---|---|
| $ 42,014,993 | $ 1,765,000 | (4.2%) |

This proposed reduction in the Estimates, combined with the 5.8 per cent reduction made over the three previous years, amounts to a total reduction of ten per cent.

Your Committee has exercised fiscal restraint and intends to continue in this manner. During fiscal years 1992-93 and 1993-94, actual spending by the Senate was reduced by 10 per cent.

Your Committee recommends that it be authorized to identify those areas within the Estimates where spending reductions are feasible. Your Committee notes that these proposed reductions are largely dependent on concurrence by Treasury Board in an early retirement program adapted to the requirements of the Senate.

Respectfully submitted,

EARL A. HASTINGS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TRANSPORT

MEASURE TO TERMINATE RAILWAY STRIKE—MOTION TO DEBATE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

That the question of the desirability of enacting immediately a measure to terminate the present railway strike be referred to a Committee of the Whole, and

That the Committee meet later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I thank the house leader for his extraordinary cooperation with me, even though I am independent. Speaking for myself, I know he is getting everything he wants. That is the way to run a good railroad, and that is the way to run a good Senate!

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I appreciate very much that the Deputy Leader of the Government has acted on the suggestion of my very own leader. For the record, can he tell us who the witnesses will be and in what order they might appear?

Senator Graham: As I understand it, the witnesses will be Mr. Paul Tellier, President and Chief Executive Officer of CN, and he will be accompanied by Mr. Terry Leneker; from CP, we will have Mr. Rob P. Ritchie, President and Chief Executive Officer; and from VIA Rail, Terry W. Ivany, President and Chief Executive Officer.

In addition, from the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees, we will have Mr. Gary Housch, Vice-President; from the International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Mr. George Hucker, Vice-President and National Legislative Representative; and from the United Transportation Union, Mr. Tim Secord, Legislative Director.

That is the list of witnesses who have been invited and have indicated a desire and a willingness to appear before the Committee of the Whole. It is my understanding that they will be available. As to the order, I understand that Mr. Tellier has indicated that he has other commitments later in the afternoon, and he has asked to appear first.

The clerk of the committee will be bringing in the witnesses in due course.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TAX CONVENTION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-9, to amend the Canada-United States Tax Convention Act, 1984.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Graham, bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, March 28, 1995.

THE BUDGET 1995

DEFENCE INDUSTRY PRODUCTIVITY PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gerald J. Comeau: Honourable senators, my question to the honourable minister in the Senate concerns the Defence Industry Productivity Program, currently known as DIPP. For more than 35 years, DIPP has been a proven success, helping Canadian industry receive the seed money it needs for high-tech, high-risk invasions. It has helped ensure that meeting our defence needs also provides for civilian benefits. It has given our aerospace industry a fighting chance against other countries where defence procurement is seen as a tool for economic development.

In the Red Book, the Liberals made a clear commitment to expanding this program. As a result of the measures announced in this year's budget, the funding for DIPP will be slashed from $167 million in 1993-94 to $22 million in 1997-98. By winding down this program, the Liberals have broken another Red Book promise.

Could the Leader of the Government advise the Senate whether the government has any strategy for either research and development or defence conversion?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the most recent budget brought forward by my colleague, the Minister of Finance has some serious messages which reflect the government's efforts to bring down the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in three years.

Those messages were preceded by some difficult decisions resulting in reductions across the board to many programs across Canada which in the past have served the country well.

My colleague the Minister of Industry John Manley continues to give great emphasis to his responsibility of science and technology. On the question of defence procurement, I will have to get back to the honourable senator with an answer.

RESTRUCTURING OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES RESERVE—REQUEST FOR TERMS OF REFERENCE OF COMMISSION

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators may recall that on January 27 of this year, the Minister of National Defence announced the formation of a special commission to review the restructuring of the Canadian military reserve. Given that the commission will begin its work on April 1, will the Leader of the Government in this chamber indicate when Canadians can expect an announcement regarding the terms of reference, and indeed, the composition of the committee?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): I will be pleased to seek that information for honourable senators. I know this is an important commission for the reserves in this country. I believe that this commission will undertake its work in an open and full manner and will be served by excellent members. I will provide that information to my friend as soon as I can.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have a brief supplementary question. Given that there is only one week before the commission is due to commence, would the Leader of the Government be able to receive an answer by early next week? Could she at least make an effort to do so? Canadians are curious about who will sit on the commission and its terms of reference.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do that. It is also a matter of some interest to me as an honourary lieutenant colonel of a regiment.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAYS WORK STOPPAGE—LONGER TERM ARRANGEMENTS FOR DISPUTE SETTLEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Leonard J. Gustafson: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. The question is in regard to the rail strike. The cost to Canadian people and the various sectors of Canadian industry — such as agriculture, where it is affecting the movement of grains and fertilizers, and the automobile industry — is in the billions of dollars.

As I understand Bill C-77, it seems to me that it is a short-term solution to an immediate problem, which I support in that sense. However, has the government given any consideration or any thought to a long-term solution?

This seems to be happening year after year. It happened during our administration, usually right in peak season, and it costs this country billions of dollars. There must be a better way to negotiate and give consideration to labour at the same time. Has the government given any consideration to a long-term solution to deal with a problem which continues to cripple this country?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as a result of the longshoremen's strike last year in the Port of Vancouver, studies were initiated by my colleague the former Minister of Labour Lloyd Axworthy, in an effort to come up with longer term ways and means provisions in the process of updating the Canada Labour Code. Nothing has been done to Part I of the Labour Code now for 20 years.

A considerable investigation was conducted in recent months, and I am certain that the new Minister of Labour will be wanting to push ahead on that matter and possibly on new initiatives in the months to come. Also, Mrs. Robillard has moved to set up a special commission of inquiry on the most recent labour dispute, which we addressed in this house a week ago.

Certainly, one of the reasons for Mrs. Robillard putting together a special commission of inquiry is to look at these issues in the long term to see how we can deal with them in a way that will not offend the fundamental values of the collective bargaining system in this country. It is an effort to make some of the provisions more relevant.

The Prime Minister himself expressed, yesterday in the House of Commons, the same frustration Senator Gustafson has expressed today. I believe that is also a concern of the new Minister of Labour.

PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS IN FORMER YUGOSLAVIA—DEMISE OF CANADIAN AIRBORNE REGIMENT

Hon. John Sylvain: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what effect the dismantling of the Airborne Regiment will have on present and future tours of operations of our Armed Forces in the former Yugoslavia?

• (1430)

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will need to ask that specific question of my colleague the Minister of National Defence.

As Senator Sylvain knows, the review of the positioning of our forces in the former Yugoslavia in the future is ongoing and will take place following another parliamentary debate in the weeks ahead.

Honourable senators, there are always concerns about the uncertainty and danger in that part of the world. Nonetheless, the government is pleased with the decision of the Croatian leader to permit a UN presence to remain in that country.

I cannot answer the specific question with respect to the Airborne Regiment vis-à-vis those missions, but our military personnel in this country are preparing for duty in that area on the rotation system. They will perform with the skill, competence and compassion that has made them one of the most valued forces in the former Yugoslavia.

LENGTH OF TOURS OF PEACEKEEPING FORCES—
REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. John Sylvain: By way of supplementary, when you garner the information from the Minister of Defence, will you also obtain from him information pertaining to the state of morale in the Armed Forces, given the length of extended tours and the shortened interval between tours? Specifically, what is the normal time period for an individual to be away from home on a tour of duty, and how long is it before he returns for another tour of duty?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): He or she, as the case may be.

Senator Sylvain: I am sorry; I am from the old school.

Senator Fairbairn: I would be pleased to seek that information.

I am sure the honourable senator has met and been in touch with young people who have served in the former Yugoslavia. I have met such individuals. Peacekeeping is an incredibly stressful assignment. However, when I have asked these individuals, "Will you go back?" the answer has always been an eager "Yes."

The point of your question is well taken, senator.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

IMPLEMENTATION OF NATIONAL CHILD CARE STRATEGY—
GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Janis Johnson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and pertains to child care.

Canada participated in the UN-sponsored World Summit on Social Development just last month. Our chairman at this summit, the Minister of Human Resources Development, commented with approval on the Swedish model for child care. I quote:

> In Canada, there is growing poverty among single parents. In Sweden, no, and the reason is an effective system of child care.

Honourable senators, the Red Book indicates quite clearly that in each year following a year of 3 per cent or more of growth, a Liberal government will create 50,000 new child care spaces. Last year, the country met the growth requirement, and yet there was no mention of a national child care strategy in the budget. Can the leader indicate to me whether or not this promise will be met?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Human Resources Development would put the situation of children and child poverty at the top of his list of concerns.

The honourable senator is quite right in quoting the intention in the Red Book. She also knows that the situation in this country in recent months has been such that there has been a re-evaluation of programs across the spectrum of government activity. Nevertheless, the minister remains firm in his commitment to proceed on the issue of child care as the fiscal situation permits.

Activities are proceeding on three fronts: There are ongoing negotiations and discussions with the provinces, because this area requires federal-provincial agreement; second, the government is proceeding with the component of child care that focuses on First Nations and Inuit people; third, the government is moving ahead in the areas of research and development.

Honourable senators, this answer is not one which will satisfy my honourable friend, but we are working under budget constraints. We will proceed in the child care area as broadly and as quickly as our economic situation permits.

Senator Johnson: By way of supplementary, can the Leader of the Government advise and enlighten us as to the progress that is being made with the provinces in this regard?

The Red Book is very clear that the federal government's portion for federal child care spaces would be $120 million. Can the minister bring to the attention of this chamber where that money is allocated in the 1995-96 Main Estimates? Is her government serious about implementing a national child care plan?

Senator Berntson: Perhaps it will come from the gun registry.

Senator Fairbairn: I will be pleased to get as precise an explanation as I can from my colleague.

Once again, we are constrained in the amount of money available across a wide spectrum of government programs. I can assure honourable senators that the Minister of Human Resources Development will be dogged in his pursuit of the quickest and widest possible response in the area, not simply of child care but of all issues concerning members of this house and the government in the area of child and family poverty.

Senator Johnson: If there is light at the end of the tunnel on this issue, we cannot see any; yet so much attention was paid and commitment given to this issue during the election campaign. To date, there has been no action. I look forward to the answer from the Leader of the Government in terms of the Main Estimates for last year.

Senator Fairbairn: I will attempt to enlighten my friend as best I can.

AMOUNT OF FUNDING AVAILABLE FOR CHILD CARE
STRATEGY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on that very point.

Less than a month ago, the Prime Minister was on a Radio-Québec program in Montreal called Droit de parole. He was asked a question along the same line as the question we have heard today from Senator Johnson. He responded that, yes, he was aware of the commitment and that $300 million was available. He indicated that Mr. Axworthy — I will not say "pledged" — would discuss this matter with the provinces. He was waiting for the provinces to come on side, and the program would then be in place.

Can the leader confirm that the figure in question is not $120 million, but that, less than a month ago, the Prime Minister indicated that the federal government has $300 million available in the first year after the growth in the economy reached 3 per cent, which would be this year?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will look at the statements of both our honourable colleagues and the Prime Minister, as well as the statements of the Minister of Human Resources Development, so that I can bring a solid answer to this chamber.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will send you the transcript of the radio program, if you wish.

STATUS OF WOMEN

REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN OF PROGRAM SPENDING FOR CURRENT AND NEXT FISCAL YEARS

Hon. Erminie J. Cohen: Honourable senators, as a Progressive Conservative, I can appreciate the need to cut back on administrative costs within the government. However, as a former member of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women — which, by the way, is being abolished as of April 1 — I should like confirmation of the claim made by the Secretary of State for the Status of Women in Monday's edition of The Toronto Star that:

> The Advisory Council's important research and public education functions are not being cut, but simply rolled into the federal department of Status of Women Canada to avoid duplication and improve efficiency.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate use her resources as leader to provide me with a breakdown of program spending by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Status of Women Canada, and the Women's Program of Human Resources Development Canada for the current fiscal year? I should also like to have a projected breakdown of program spending for Status of Women Canada for the fiscal year 1995-96. I believe that this chamber would welcome the information as an assurance that the priority which the government claims for women's issues is being reflected in real program spending.

May I please have the minister's commitment to provide this information?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will do my very best.

ARMS TRADING WITH TRANSGRESSOR NATIONS— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, the oft-quoted Red Book, the promises of which are, at best, in a state of flux, undertook that if the party which produced that book took power — which it did — the Government of Canada would, as a matter of human rights policy, never trade arms with a country whose human rights record was in question.

Is that Canadian government policy today, or is that a promise which, like so many others, is in a state of flux?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are too small to be involved in human rights. Don't you remember what Chrétien said?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend will know that there are very strong guidelines which the Canadian government observes in all of its trading relations, and those guidelines are consistent with the views which have been expressed by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs on a number of occasions.

DISCUSSIONS WITH TURKEY ON SALE OF AIRCRAFT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, Amnesty International issued a special report last July on Turkey, claiming that the human rights situation there is very serious.

Is it the view of the Government of Canada that the human rights situation in Turkey is in order, and that is why the government is negotiating with that country for the sale of our CF-5 aircraft?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to the first part of my honourable friend's question, Canada has been and continues to be concerned about the human rights situation of the Kurds in Turkey. This concern has been expressed very directly by the Minister of Foreign Affairs to his Turkish counterpart.

With regard to the CF-5 aircraft, it would be premature to talk about negotiations, as the media have done. There have been some preliminary discussions about those aircraft between officials of the two countries. Any conclusions that would result from those discussions will certainly be dealt with within the guidelines which I suggested in my first response to my honourable friend.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if the Turkish record on human rights is as appalling as we read, particularly as it relates to their treatment of the Kurds, surely the officials should be told immediately to break off negotiations.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, we are not in a state of negotiation with the Turkish government.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are just discussing.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, we are discussing. It is not possible at this time to know what the results of those discussions will be.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Then why have discussions?

Senator Fairbairn: Again, if those negotiations ever reach an official stage, they will be carried out under the umbrella of the regulations, guidelines and safeguards which have been Canadian policy in the past 18 months and previously.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are we to understand that the Government of Canada believes that, in return for the sale of a few aircraft for a few dollars, it can elicit guarantees from the Government of Turkey that it will stop the genocide it is now committing against the Kurds in its territory and in Iraq?

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, that is not at all what I am suggesting to my honourable friend. I am suggesting, as I did to his colleague, that we as a government have concerns about the situation in Turkey. We have conveyed those concerns to our NATO ally and will continue to do so.

Discussions on the aircraft may or may not proceed. Those questions will need to be asked and answered in the future.

REPORTS ON RECORD OF VARIOUS COUNTRIES COMPILED BY FOREIGN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, if I recall correctly, the Red Book made another promise, to the effect that reports on various countries would be prepared by officials in the Department of Foreign Affairs pertaining to the human rights records of those countries and that those reports would be tabled in Parliament. If that promise were kept, then, based on the technical data which such reports should contain, our ability to ask intelligent questions would be much improved.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise this chamber whether that remains government policy? If it is, then when might we expect to receive those country reports? Finally, is Turkey in that report this year?

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will speak to my colleague the Minister of Foreign Affairs and try to get specific answers to your questions.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers. One is in response to a question raised on February 14, 1995, by the Honourable Senator Brenda J. Robertson regarding regional development, application of similar rules in all provinces. The second response is to a question raised in the Senate on November 17, 1994, by the Honourable Senator Ethel Cochrane regarding post-secondary education.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

APPLICATION OF SIMILAR RULES IN ALL PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Brenda J. Robertson on February 14, 1995)

Effective April 1, 1995, FedNor business incentives will focus on repayable loans as opposed to grants.

FedNor's new policy on repayability of contributions is consistent with the policies of the other Regional Development Agencies and the direction announced in the recent federal budget.

FedNor's financial assistance and business services will continue to focus on the needs of small and medium-sized enterprises. Non-funded client services and service standards will receive increased emphasis.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

GROWTH IN REVENUE FROM EPF TRANSFERS TAX POINTS—POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFER TO INSTITUTIONS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Ethel Cochrane on November 17, 1994)

The Established Programs Financing Arrangements were introduced in 1977 to replace previous federal-provincial cost-sharing arrangements for health and post-secondary education.

The funding of post-secondary institutions is strictly a provincial responsibility, and the post-secondary education portion of the EPF transfers has always been unconditional. Thus provinces can allocate the resources to PSE or other responsibilities according to their own priorities.

Nevertheless, the data show that all provinces spend more on post-secondary education than they receive in EPF-PSE from the federal government.

EPF-PSE transfers consist of tax and cash components. The tax transfer represents the current equalized value of a certain number of personal and corporate tax points ceded by the federal government some years ago.

In the current year, the value of the total EPF-PSE transfer is estimated to be $6.18 billion, of which $3.80 billion is in the form of tax transfers and $2.38 billion is in the form of cash.

Details of current EPF-PSE cash and tax transfers for the four Atlantic Provinces are attached, along with projections for 1995-96.

As announced in the Budget, transfers in support of health, PSE and social assistance (the Canada Assistance Plan) will, as of 1996-97, be consolidated into a single Canada Social Transfer (CST), thus enhancing the flexibility with which provinces can utilize the available resources.

Later this year, the Minister of Human Resources Development will work with provinces to develop, through mutual consent, principles and objectives that could underlie the CST.

In 1996-97, the value of the Canada Social Transfer will total $26.9 billion including an estimated $14.1 billion in tax transfers. For 1997-98, the CST will total $25.1 billion, of which an estimated $14.7 billion will be in the form of tax transfers. No figures have been provided beyond 1997-98.

For 1996-97, provincial allocations for the CST will be based on the 1995-96 distribution of EPF and CAP transfers. Amounts for the Atlantic Provinces are attached. CST allocations for future years will be determined at a later date, following consultations with provinces.

With respect to the question on tax points, no up-to-date projections for post-secondary education transfers are available after 1995-96, as beyond that point, PSE and Health transfers will be merged into the CST.

Speaking generally, the value of tax points depends on the economy; typically their value grows with Gross Domestic Product (GDP). Moreover, since the tax points are equalized, differences in rates of growth between provinces are minimized.

Post-Secondary Education Transfers for the four Atlantic Provinces

Projections for 1994-95 and 1995-96 entitlements are as follows:

| EPF–PSE for the Atlantic Provinces ($ millions) | | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | 1994-95 | | | 1995-96 | | |
| | Tax | Cash | Total | Tax | Cash | Total |
| Newfoundland | 64 | 59 | 123 | 68 | 55 | 123 |
| PEI | 15 | 13 | 28 | 16 | 13 | 29 |
| Nova Scotia | 104 | 94 | 198 | 110 | 88 | 199 |
| New Brunswick | 84 | 76 | 160 | 89 | 72 | 161 |
| May not add due to rounding | | | | | | |

Beyond 1995-96, the new Canada Social Transfer will be introduced to cover health, post-secondary education and social assistance/social services. The following amounts for the Atlantic Provinces in 1996-97 are derived from data provided in the Budget:

| Canada Social Transfer 1996-97 ($ millions) | |
|---|---|
| Newfoundland | 551 |
| PEI | 124 |
| Nova Scotia | 875 |

PICTOU LANDING INDIAN BAND AGREEMENT BILL

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-60, respecting an agreement between Her Majesty in right of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian Band.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-47, to amend the Department of External Affairs Act and to make related amendments of other Acts.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I would like to comment briefly on this bill which is now at third reading. I was struck by the fact, and we talked about this in committee, that the mandate of the minister and his department is very vague. That is usually the case in legislation to establish a department, but at least there are a number of other acts that identify more specifically, for instance, within the Department of Finance, the responsibilities of the Inspector of Financial Institutions, and a department responsible for consumer affairs. There is a whole set of acts that provide guidelines and tell us what the minister should do and what his officials should do and that identify the parameters within which they must operate and set up their programs.

In the case of Foreign Affairs, for probably historical reasons, the legislation is particularly vague. Take, for instance, section 10(3), which reads, and I quote;

> The Minister may develop and carry out programs related to the Minister's powers, duties and functions for the promotion of Canada's interests abroad, including:
> (a) the fostering of the expansion of Canada's international trade and commerce; and
> (b) the provision of assistance for developing countries.

It all sounds marvellous. No one could be against this. In concrete terms, this provision gives the minister enormous discretion.

I suppose that historically it was because the Department of Foreign Affairs went back to a time when it was the Prime Minister's responsibility, and when the Prime Minister spoke, he spoke for all members of his cabinet. Since at the time there was no quorum in cabinet, the Prime Minister had more or less carte blanche.

Still, it is rather strange. I realize that one may have to exercise greater discretion regarding international matters, but to say that diplomacy, defence and international aid are government programs does not say much. My point is that the minister and his officials are given very broad discretion. We must not forget that ministers have their officials. The minister is the spokesperson, but the officials often do the work, and that is true the world over.

As foreign policy is becoming increasingly important, it has a major impact on what happens within the country. I remember an American representative from Boston saying: "All politics are okay."

It is somewhat the same now, in a way. "All politics are okay in Canada." There is, however, an impact on international policy, and international policy affects domestic policy in almost all areas. This is increasingly commonplace.

The government wants parliamentarians to participate to some extent, to exercise a certain right of regard on what is happening, on the way departments and programs are operating. A joint committee has proposed a number of guidelines, which we will discuss. We started discussing some, and the government issued a policy statement, which we will talk about as well.

Foreign affairs will require parliamentarians and senators to be ever more vigilant. We are already doing studies in our committee, and I think we are going about it pretty seriously. We have already done it, for example, for the free trade agreement, NAFTA and the GATT. We must realize these are treaties negotiated between governments, which are subsequently ratified by Parliament. Treaties are like royal prerogative: Parliament considers them only after agreements are reached. It simply ratifies the treaty, even though we must amend a series of laws to do so.

I wondered whether one solution to this — and I have not discussed this with my leader and so am not making a formal proposal — might not be for parliamentarians to participate by examining budget estimates in the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. This could be a relatively permanent job of the committee.

Let me elaborate on this. I know all about the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance because I am a member of the committee. It traditionally does not study the content of programs as much as it looks at the government's administrative policy, including finanial administration, staffing, procurement, et cetera. In areas like employment, education and health, we examine more the public administration policy end of things than the content itself.

I think that has been the traditional role of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and Senator Doody will confirm this. The committee is not bound by this, but reports done on the issue over the past several years do show that, by and large, the committee does focus on administrative policy much more than on public policy.

This is why I propose that we look into the estimates in order to get a better feel for the activities of the Department of Foreign Affairs. This is important because senior officials, be they ambassadors or departmental executives have considerable leeway. Approximately 11 or 12 per cent of Foreign Affairs employees are executives, whereas, in other departments, that figure is only 2 or 3 per cent. They perform important functions. They participate in negotiations on international trade, like Mr. Reis, for example, while others are involved in consular affairs or work on defence committees. They play very important roles. It seems to me that this could be a reasonable proposal. I am not making an official proposal, but I would like to submit it as food for thought and I would like to see us study the issue one day.

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, clause 7 of the bill to amend the Department of External Affairs Act provides that hereafter section 10(3) will read as follows:

> The Minister may develop and carry out programs related to the Minister's powers, duties and functions for the promotion of Canada's interests abroad, including:
> (a) the fostering of the expansion of Canada's international trade and commerce; and
> (b) the provision of assistance for developing countries.

That is the general and vague language to which Senator Bolduc has referred. In substance, this new subsection will be the same as the one it would supplant.

I agree with Senator Bolduc entirely when he says that the language is general and vague. At the same time, it seems inevitable that when Parliament confers powers and duties on ministers in relation to foreign affairs, the language used must lack the precision of laws of domestic application. At the same time, we all recognize that how ministers perform their duties and exercise their powers is becoming increasingly important to the people of Canada. In the report of the Special Joint Committee Reviewing Canadian Foreign Policy there is reference to this matter. At page 87 of the report, it states:

> In today's interdependent world, international relations have an increasingly direct effect on the well-being of Canadians. They should therefore have the opportunity to deepen their understanding of the complexities of foreign policy, and to have an input into decisions that affect them.

Over the page it states:

> If Parliamentarians are to play a larger role in assisting Canadians to appreciate the impact of international relations on their daily lives, it is important that they themselves be well informed.

Last December when Bill C-57, to implement the agreement establishing the World Trade Organization, was before the Foreign Affairs Committee, we spent a fair amount of time talking about the need to assure that this new international organization will not come to be operated by officials cut off from the representatives of the people of Canada. If the organization, or any of the other comparable international organizations, operates in isolation, it will not be able to do its work with full efficiency.

The question that Senator Bolduc has addressed is the same one which concerns me: How can we help assure that those ministers who have heavy duties and great powers in foreign affairs, affairs which are increasingly important to Canada, remain responsible to Parliament and retain the support of Parliament? I think Senator Bolduc is right. The way to do it is the traditional way of referring the spending estimates of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade to the appropriate committee. As Senator Bolduc has said, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance normally deals with the spending estimates, but quite often it attempts to get an overall view of some particular aspect of expenditure. Normally, it does not normally descend upon the detail of the policy which is being carried out by a particular department. In the case of Foreign Affairs, we need a committee that will review with the minister and his officials what the department is doing and do this year after year.

I agree with Senator Bolduc that this is not something that we should decide now. However, it is a proposal to which we ought to give serious consideration. Increasingly, what we do internationally is almost as important as what we do domestically. This is true in trade. It is increasingly true in international finance. It is true now in the fisheries, and I could go on. I support Senator Bolduc's proposal enthusiastically.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, I would like to proceed the way they do in the House of Commons, with questions or comments regarding what was said by our esteemed colleague Senator Bolduc.

An idea I always wanted to develop with respect to the business of the Senate goes along the same lines as what was suggested by Senator Bolduc. I am not going to make a formal proposal. I am simply working on a proposal to change the way we work in the Senate.

I thought Senator Stewart was very encouraging. I appreciate that, and I am referring to the suggestion that the responsibilities of a standing committee should include more than examining the estimates which, as we know, are examined in the House of Commons —

[English]

— or are deemed to have been accepted on May 31 of each year.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I always thought it was a rather unfortunate way to examine the estimates. I agree it would be hard to do otherwise in the House of Commons, but I think the Senate is the ideal place to engage in detailed scrutiny of programs and spending.

Not long ago, Senator Olson commented on my suggestion that the estimates should be examined under the headings of six or eight government envelopes, and that senators who were particularly interested or had particular expertise could sit on these committees the year round to engage in detailed scrutiny of each program. They would have the power to call witnesses, especially departmental officials as well as the minister.

I continue to promote this idea, and I was delighted to hear what Senator Bolduc had to say. I would appreciate hearing his comments on this.

If I am not mistaken, his suggestion is to have the Senate play an important role in examining bills and estimates. I am afraid I must disagree with Senator Olson, who said that we could examine anything we wanted on the Finance Committee. I think that is too much for one committee to handle.

I want to thank three senators who offered their assistance and those who urged me to persevere and to go and see them if I wanted further comments.

I would appreciate it if Senator Bolduc would comment. I know he is an expert on public affairs. He was a formidable administrator in the public service in Quebec. He knows everything there is to know. We must give everyone his due. We must also recognize a person's qualifications. I must admit that Senator Bolduc is eminently qualified in the field of government administration.

[English]

I would say the same about Senator Pitfield. If there is someone who knows the federal structure, it is Senator Pitfield.

If we could contribute more, the net effect would be a better Senate and a better understanding of the importance of the Senate. The Canadian population would see that the Senate can play a greater role. In this respect, I should like to ask —

[Translation]

— my friend Senator Bolduc if he has a few comments to make.

Senator Bolduc: If the honourable senators will permit me, I might say a few words on the subject. I would perhaps, qualify the remarks made by Senator Prud'homme.

He spoke of a detailed review of programs and votes as such. I believe we must be careful here. I would qualify this somewhat.

In terms of votes, we must remember that the role of the Senate is supposed to be more limited than that of the House of Commons. This review, which may not necessarily be of the fine details, could include a look at the policies behind the programs.

This, in my opinion, is one important role the Senate could play, given that senators have a variety of expertise. They have been here long enough, whereas, in the other place, there is a high turnover rate. Senators have practical experience in various areas. It seems to me that senators could play a role in the review — and I stress this point — of the underlying values, policies, programs and approaches of departments.

I was involved in this a little during a year I spent at the National Defence College, where we spent a lot of time looking at defence issues, but we looked at foreign policy matters as well. Public officials around the world have a lot of discretionary room. We have to see things the way they are. This is true in Ottawa as well. The minister is often away travelling, and so decisions are often left to those guarding the fort in his absence. This was my experience in the past.

It seems to me that parliamentarians should question public officials on their approach in various areas.

I am thinking of CIDA, for example — and this is not meant to be criticism — whose foreign aid policy is inconsistent in certain areas. Even in the government's policy statement or in the report, it would seem that everyone is in agreement, except that, in Africa, we note that it did not bring about the expected results.

Therefore, there comes a time when we must wonder because some people want to keep the machine running at all times, even though in some instances the machine is not effective. I think that this is an important point.

I am not advocating that we have the same amount of control as the elected representatives of the people, because I realize that they should decide on such issues. One area where senators have a lot to give relates to the positions taken, something I believe is important not only for this issue but also for others. I am only thinking about this one area in particular because we are discussing it.

Senator Prud'homme: I would like to continue this discussion with Senator Bolduc because I will certainly make a proposal to the Senate in the coming months. I have been reading everything that has been said on the issue, and it is quite extraordinary what one can find with the help of our good researchers in the library and elsewhere.

I agree with you that it is not within our mandate to veto expenditures which have been accepted by the House of Commons. The proposal which I am planning to make would not give us the power to reject, but the power to comment.

I do not mean to say that the Senate would have the right to veto expenditures proposed by ministers, but after having studied a project like the one at CIDA about which you were speaking, after having gone over it with a fine-toothed comb, slowly, patiently, as only the Senate can, and having found absurd things which have been passed by Parliament, we could make our comments known to all of Parliament.

As you can see, I am searching for a way of doing this. Instead of going about it privately, I am trying to do it publicly in order to solicit the advice of various colleagues. I am of the opinion that Senator Bolduc and I differ in opinion on but a few issues.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have concluded that these are questions put to Senator Bolduc and not part of a speech. Of course, if this had been a speech, it would have contravened the Rules of the Senate. Thank you, honourable senators.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining motions and inquiries stand.

Hon. Eric Arthur Berntson (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the calendar should remain the same; that is, the clock should not move on those items.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Senator Berntson: Honourable senators, before we move into Committee of the Whole, I understand that it is virtually impossible to keep your finger on the pulse of the dynamics of the other place. I also understand that there have been ongoing discussions as to how long Bill C-77 will take to arrive here.

Can the Deputy Leader of the Government paint the various scenarios that we may be facing over the weekend? Would he expect that we might be dealing with this bill in this chamber, tonight, Saturday, Sunday, or not until Monday? The reasons for asking this question are obvious. We do not want to come back from right across the country to deal with it on the weekend if it is advisable that we should stay here to deal with it tomorrow or Saturday.

Senator Graham: I thank the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Opposition for his question. My response to painting a scenario may look like a Picasso at its worse or at its best. Yesterday afternoon, I indicated that the chances of getting unanimous consent to proceed were remote. They were worse than that; they were zero. I thank honourable senators for their patience and their understanding.

However, being an eternal optimist, I am sure that efforts to gain unanimous consent will be ongoing at appropriate times today and tomorrow. In the event that unanimous consent is obtained, it is not beyond the realm of possibility that we could receive the legislation later today, however remote that possibility may be.

That having been said — here again I will be skating on thin ice, and I may have to resort to my ski-jumping story once more — it is my understanding that there is a house order in the other place, if all other efforts fail with respect to unanimous consent, to have report stage at 9:00 a.m. on Saturday with time allocation in the absence of unanimous consent.

That house order also includes, if required, a sitting in the other place on Sunday at 1:00 p.m. with time allocation to deal with third reading. In due course, the bill could be received in this place later Sunday. We will keep honourable senators informed as events unfold.

MOTION TO DEBATE MEASURE TO TERMINATE RAILWAY STRIKE—REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

Motion of the Honourable B. Alasdair Graham:

That the question of the desirability of enacting immediately a measure to terminate the present railway strike be referred to a Committee of the Whole; and

That the Committee meet later this day.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the motion and hear witnesses, and that Senator Corbin take the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

---

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the question, the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is now in Committee of the Whole on Senator Graham's motion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, before we call the first witness, I would like to thank colleagues on the other side for agreeing to our suggestion that we proceed at this stage, before the bill comes to the Senate, with the witnesses whom we were hoping to have appear before us following second reading.

This has been done for two reasons. One reason is that the affected parties are given a chance to come before Parliament. I understand that during debate in the other place, the affected parties were not given a chance to testify or to give their view on the legislation. It is important that we hear them.

This is in the spirit of cooperation to accelerate the bill through Parliament. Had we waited until Monday, there would have been additional hours spent before the vote. By this procedure today, we are accelerating the process in the Senate. It is in the spirit of an understanding before the Canadian people that we have taken this unusual step of studying the legislation before it has been referred to the Senate

I hope that the Bloc Québécois in particular will realize that despite their obstructionist tactics, there are enough people in this country who are concerned about Canada's future that we can move ahead in this way.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to follow with a few remarks in response to my honourable friend. I concur entirely that this is a situation where the attention of this Parliament is essential. It is important that under the circumstances we carry out our function in a speedy manner to afford those who are most intimately involved with this issue the opportunity to come and explain their points of view. Their considerations are important to the deliberations of this chamber, and also to the people of Canada. I join with my honourable friend in hoping that those who would choose to obstruct this kind of legislation will realize the enormous risks for this country in doing so.

• (1520)

The Chairman: Before we proceed, I should like to call to your attention the presence in the gallery of the Minister of Labour, Madam Robillard.

Honourable senators, our first witness is Mr. Paul Tellier, President and Chief Executive Officer of Canadian National. He is accompanied by Mr. Terry Leneker.

I understand there is a loose agreement to allow approximately 30 minutes to each witness. I will not adhere strictly to that time-frame, but will attempt to recognize all honourable senators who wish to put questions.

Honourable senators, I believe the witnesses have been informed that we expect from them a 10-minute statement, with the remaining 20 minutes left to questions and answers. As I have said, however, the chair will be flexible.

Mr. Paul Tellier, President and CEO, Canadian National: Honourable senators, I will be brief in making my general comments. We believe the current situation to be quite serious for Canadian National and for shippers, manufacturers, plants, businesses and farmers across the country. As well, it is a serious situation for the economy as a whole.

Negotiations have been going on for 18 months. The media has reported that these collective agreements expired 15 months ago, which is accurate. However, in September of 1993, roughly three-and-a-half months before the expiration of these collective agreements, we resumed negotiations with the unions to put in place new collective agreements reflecting the economic realities of the 1990s. Therefore, while we find ourselves in the most unfortunate situation of a strike at Canadian National, it is not because we did not try very hard to negotiate.

I should like to explain why we think these negotiations are important for Canadian National. When negotiations commenced, we had four priorities. The first priority was to do something about employment security. Much has been written about this priority of the rail industry. However, there are other equally important priorities. Wage structure was one priority. Another was trade flexibility and an attempt to eliminate artificial barriers between various trades on the shop floor. Elimination of these barriers could save Canadian National $10 million. I am referring to the jurisdictional disputes between the various trades, such as electricians, machinists, and boilermakers. The final priority has to do with introducing flexibility into the working rules, especially in relation to the running trades that operate the trains.

These four priorities are important for two reasons. The first reason relates to a reduction of our cost structure. Why do we start there? Because 46 per cent of Canadian National's operating costs are directly related to labour costs — salaries and benefits. This is 30 per cent higher than the so-called class one railroads in the U.S. If we are to do something about the cost structure at Canadian National, we must start with labour costs.

These four priorities are also critical if we are to, at long last, become customer-focused and if we are to improve the quality of service. I will give you two examples. At this point in time, collective agreements allow members of unions to move to a position when the position becomes vacant. As a result, in our customer service centres across the country, for example, we have a tremendous turnover of personnel. These individuals interface with customers. We believe that this provision of the collective agreements must be reviewed in 1995.

The next example is very sensitive because some people say it involves safety. In terms of the running trades, we would like to extend the number of hours of work from 10 to 12 hours? Why? Because this issue relates to quality of service. Twelve hours is the norm in the U.S. We firmly believe that if it is safe in the U.S., it should be equally safe in Canada.

The current regulations of the Department of Transport in Ottawa provide for a shift of up to 12 hours. The collective agreements specify 10 hours. If we make that change, we could eliminate roughly half of the terminals and the crew changes one must go through in order to better serve the public. For example, the average journey of a locomotive engineer or a conductor is 130 miles. If we take a shipment of chemicals out of Sarnia and carry it to Halifax, a crew takes care of that shipment in Sarnia. There is a change of crew in Toronto, Belleville, Montreal, Quebec City, Edmunston, and a final change in Moncton before the train arrives in Halifax. We must sit down with the union leadership and examine how we can do things differently in order to reduce our costs and, more importantly, improve the quality of service.

[Translation]

The other issue I would like to raise, Mr. Chairman, is the direct relation between competitiveness in the rail sector and competitiveness in Canadian industry as a whole.

Take coal, for example. You know that 92 per cent of the coal produced in Canada, particularly in the west, ends up on the Japanese market.

When you look at the price of a tonne of coal delivered to Tokyo, over half of it represents the cost of transportation, if the cost of rail transportation and shipping are combined.

[English]

The railroad is the backbone of the transportation system in Canada. If we are not competitive, cannot reduce our rates, and cannot assist our producers — be they farmers, coal miners, the potash producers, or the car producers — the Canadian economy will be affected.

The last point I wish to make has to do with the viability of Canadian National.

• (1530)

[Translation]

It is obvious that if Canadian National wants to become a financially viable operation year in and year out — not just in good times when the economy is booming and we make a profit, as was the case in 1994 — it is essential that our costs be lowered.

[English]

A great many things have been said about the fact that last year, 1994, Canadian National had profits of $245 million. Compared to the $79 million in losses the year before, this is an impressive turnaround. However, one must keep in mind that we lost $1 billion the year before. If we are to put Canadian National on a financially viable basis for the short and long terms, some of these issues must be addressed.

My colleague and I, being responsible for labour relations, have done everything we could to avoid a confrontation. We were never looking for a confrontation with the union leadership. We have been trying to establish a new partnership with the union leadership. Unfortunately, to this point in time, we have not succeeded.

We would be happy to answer questions.

[Translation]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Tellier, thank you for joining us and for your presentation, which gives us a better idea of the problems facing you and your employees.

[English]

Unfortunately, I have not had a chance to read the conciliation report thoroughly. However, the flavour I get is that the unions and the railroads are at an impasse and that bargaining on a voluntary basis is pretty well fruitless. Is that a quick summary of what Mr. Hope is telling us?

Mr. Tellier: Yes, very much so.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Not to take sides one way or the other, he also says that the railways have made it plain that while the form of the demands of the railroads is negotiable, the substance is not. The demands of the railroads have taken on the cast of conditions precedent to an agreement.

It seems to me that the railroads have taken such a hard-nosed stance that they will even go to legislation to ensure that their demands are accepted. If my interpretation is correct, it seems to be a strange form of collective bargaining when one side comes in and says, "Take it or leave it."

Mr. Tellier: Mr. Leneker and I met with the commissioner. The commissioner has done his best to describe these issues. What he was saying is that these demands are very significant, and therefore it is very difficult for the leadership of these unions to say, "We recognize your financial situation, and yes, we will agree with these demands." It would be difficult for elected officials in these unions to agree to that.

I suppose that management of these railroads has come to the conclusion that it was a mistake to make these concessions in the 1980s. I was asked recently why I think employment security was granted in 1985. I was not there, as you know. Given the fact that I have been there for only two-and-a-half years, and not being a railroader and too old to become one, I surely do not blame my predecessor in any way, shape or form. I think these concessions were made because our predecessors thought that the downsizing in the rail industry was more or less completed. I cannot talk about CP, but Canadian National had in excess of 120,000 people on its payroll in the early 1950s. In 1985, employment was down to around 40,000. The belief was that the restructuring had already taken place and that it would no longer be required to further downsize.

The record has demonstrated that they were in error. You are aware that we are now two-thirds of the way through the downsizing program. Once we have finished, we will have taken the employment of Canadian National down from 32,000 to 21,000 or the mid 20,000s. It was a mistake. I do not wish to speak on behalf of CP, but we in CN came to the conclusion that we have no choice. This is not a question of asking where we come out. Either employment security exists or it does not exist.

Was it a "take it or leave it" proposition? No. We put various alternatives on the table. One of the things that is hurting us today is that there is no universal forcing. Not only is a person entitled to employment security, but he or she does not have to move to where there is employment. There were periods in 1994 where we were recruiting off the street in Western Canada, while in Eastern Canada we had 600 people drawing their full salary without working for it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will ask one more question and then come back at the end if there is time. I will ask this question of every witness.

In Quebec, after a great deal of labour strife and repeated back-to-work legislation, the Essential Services Council came into force, and it seems to work. As you know, the two parties get together before the strike actually takes place and agree on what services are decreed essential. The strike goes on, and basic services are offered.

Do you see the advantages of that in your industry, which is certainly an essential service, and other national industries which can be considered essential, either privately or publicly owned, in order to allow a minimum of service while a strike takes place?

Mr. Tellier: This is obviously something which needs to be explored at some time. We at Canadian National have an open mind about this. My initial reaction, when I was asked the question recently, was that it would be perhaps more difficult in the rail industry to define what constitutes an essential service than it would be in Quebec with health services, for example. Management at CN has an open mind. If it were the desire of the government to have us explore this subject, we would be delighted to do just that.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Tellier, how many collective agreements are in play in the negotiations involving your company?

Mr. Tellier: There are 59.

[ Mr. Tellier ]

Senator Kinsella: Building on the question of my colleague Senator Lynch-Staunton, do you feel that the Canada Labour Code is presently deficient in its provisions in terms of providing solutions to avoid this kind of situation in the future? If so, what kinds of changes should the government be examining?

The Leader of the Opposition has made reference to essential services. To the extent that the rail service is an essential service, is that a mechanism which has to be in place? In general terms, from your standpoint, are there currently some glaring deficiencies in the Canada Labour Code?

Mr. Tellier: I would be hesitant to say that there are some major deficiencies in the Canada Labour Code. However, we have examined every labour dispute that required the intervention of Parliament since 1950. When there is a strike affecting the rail industry, it has such a tremendous impact on the Canadian economy, people and businesses that it tends to distort the bargaining process. If we, the management, are ready to tough it out with the shippers, Parliament would intervene nevertheless because the economy is influenced so badly.

Therefore, over the last 40 years, every time there has been a major dispute, there has been intervention by Parliament. If you do not want to distort the negotiating process by such intervention, some mechanism must be found. Whether it is the one that the Leader of the Opposition was proposing a few moments ago in terms of the essential services or something else, I do not know. However, I would surely agree with the senator that something must be found. Canada is unique in the sense that when there is work stoppage, the economy quickly comes to a halt.

Senator Kinsella: Mr. Tellier, we must deal with this type of legislation from time to time. I assume you have seen Bill C-77 which was introduced in the other place. In the bill, there is provision for getting the workers back to work, for helping the parties to deal with the problem, and for binding arbitration. Is that not correct?

Mr. Tellier: Yes. What is being proposed is something similar, if not identical, to what Commissioner Hope suggested in his report. It is a phase one approach, phase one being mediation, involving a neutral chair, a representative of the unions, and a representative of management. Then there is binding arbitration if the mediation phase does not work out.

Senator Kinsella: Sometimes the model of binding arbitration that is advanced is final offer arbitration or final selection. Occasionally we have enacted legislation with final offer arbitration as the binding arbitration model. From your standpoint, which would you prefer to see as the arbitration model?

Mr. Tellier: I tend to think that interest arbitration, the traditional arbitration approach, whether or not it is based on final offer, is not the way to resolve this type of issue. In this sector, as in many other things, the world is not black and white. There are important nuances which must be taken into account. We believe the mediation and arbitration process is much better than straight interest arbitration, whether or not it is based on final arbitration.

Senator Olson: I should like to get down to what triggered this whole problem. The commissioner, for example, characterized in his report certain company demands, "extremely controversial and provocative." I presume one of those was the companies' demand that employment security be removed. Is that correct?

Mr. Tellier: Yes. Based on the reading of his report and the conversation we had with the commissioner, the commissioner came to the conclusion — at least that is the way I read his report — that it would be very difficult for the unions to accept our position to start negotiating this because they have a membership. Therefore, as soon as they started bargaining employment security away, membership would say, "Where is your mandate to do this?"

Senator Olson: I understand that. The companies insisted months ago that that be one of the concessions before moving on to any useful collective bargaining.

Mr. Tellier: We were insisting that these priorities should be negotiated. Our biggest frustration was that there were no serious negotiations for most of these 18 months that I am describing.

Senator Olson: I understand that. We were led to believe that the companies were not making any effort in other areas. However, there were no other matters as controversial as this one. You wanted to get out of that job security problem that was already in their collective agreements before you would try to make any progress on other things. In fact, the other things were not serious problems.

Mr. Terry Leneker, Chief Executive Officer, Canadian National: That is not what happened during the course of negotiations. In fact, it was quite the opposite.

The unions occasionally stated that unless CN withdrew proposals to change the employment security provision, there would be no substantive negotiations. Two of those unions immediately advanced us to the conciliation stage of the bargaining process. Therefore, it was quite the opposite in terms of how it played out at the table.

The approach we adopted on the various issues was that we tried hard to find solutions. The solutions have been very elusive. We are at an impasse at this point in time. We have been open to any suggestion which would allow us to address the fundamental needs for changes in the industry.

Senator Olson: We have had opportunities over the past three months or so to discuss some of these matters with the leaders of the union. They told us that job security, which they realized was a problem and an outstanding difference, was part of the bargaining process and that they got it some time ago. I do not think anybody disagrees with that. They got it.

However, the next question is whether or not the companies or the unions give something of reasonably equal value in exchange for this job security that is such a problem to the companies now.

Mr. Leneker: If they did, it certainly has not shown up in any of the packages I have been able to examine since 1985, which was when employment security was negotiated.

In fact, average weekly earnings increased by 66 per cent between 1983 and 1993. That is a Statistics Canada figure. I believe the auto workers increased by approximately 67 per cent. The competition we face only went up by approximately 26 per cent in terms of average weekly earnings. One of the groups with which we are trying to deal is represented by the Canadian Auto Workers Union. Their rate of increase exceeded inflation by 7 per cent during that period of time. If they have given up something, it certainly was not in terms of wage increases.

Senator Olson: We will ask them later on today what they think they gave up.

You have been talking about job security now for months and have apparently come to an impasse. How do you solve the problem? Do you expect us to legislate it away from them?

Mr. Tellier: My understanding is that the Minister of Labour has introduced a bill in the House of Commons, and that bill provides for a process which begins with sending the workers back to work, then a mediation-arbitration process within a time frame, to which we will appoint a representative. Every union will do likewise. The government will appoint a chair, and every issue will be addressed. If that happens through mediation, hopefully mediation will succeed. Otherwise, it will become an imposed arbitrated decision. My understanding is that this will take place within a 70-day period. Every party will have a chance to be heard, to argue his or her case, and then the arbitrator will speak.

• (1550)

Senator Olson: That is my understanding, too.

Senator Jessiman: Mr. Tellier, regarding the $225 million which was earned in the last fiscal year, is your fiscal year-end December 31?

Mr. Tellier: Yes, senator.

Senator Jessiman: I understand there are 59 agreements.

Mr. Tellier: Yes.

Senator Jessiman: Have they all expired?

Mr. Tellier: Yes.

Senator Jessiman: Do they all expire on the same date, or are there various dates?

Mr. Tellier: The situation is this: In the shops, there used to be six unions. In 1993, we went before the Canada Labour Relations Board and argued that there was such similarity among the six bargaining units that they should be combined. We received an affirmative decision from the Canada Labour Relations Board and, as a result, the six shop unions were reduced to one.

Then there was a representation vote, and one of the six unions, the Canadian Autoworkers Union, won the vote not only in CN but also in VIA and in CP.

Prior to that, when there were six unions, CAW had signed a collective agreement in 1991. That agreement expired on December 31, 1993. In terms of the other five unions, they have been without collective agreements since December 31, 1991.

Senator Jessiman: Will they now all expire at the same time?

Mr. Tellier: Yes.

Senator Jessiman: Are they all for the same period? Are they all for two years or for three years?

Mr. Tellier: The bill introduced in Parliament by the Minister of Labour provides for new collective agreements which would stay in place until December 31, 1996.

Senator Jessiman: Would they be retroactive to the expiration of the other agreements?

Mr. Tellier: Yes.

Senator Jessiman: How is CN doing for January and February and March of this year, exclusive of what you have lost in these last few days?

Mr. Tellier: The first two months of 1995 have been as good as the 12 months of 1994. We were doing extremely well until this labour dispute started 10 days ago, senator.

Senator Jessiman: You are still working under what you call "horrible conditions." However, you must remember — although, as you say, it was not you yourself but the person who previously filled your shoes who has given up whatever it is that was given up. That is how a bargaining procedure works. For whatever was received in return, they probably had to give up something, too.

What would you predict? What are your estimates of profit for the fiscal year ending December 31, 1995, assuming you remain as you are now?

Mr. Tellier: Senator, if you want me to say that we should be profitable again in 1995, I agree with you that, under normal circumstances, we should be. However, senator, it is important to keep in mind that, traditionally, the balance sheet of Canadian National looks like a roller coaster. Most of the time, this company has been losing money as opposed to being profitable.

In order to be profitable on a longer-term basis, you must improve the operating ratio, to use the jargon, and to bring it down. The operating ratio is how much you have to spend in order to collect one dollar of revenue. Two years ago, in order to collect a dollar of revenue, we had to spend 97 cents. This means we had only 3 cents left to reimburse our debt or to pay the interest on our debt and to pay for capital budget, buying new rolling stock, improving the road bed, and what have you.

We succeeded in 1994 in improving our operating ratio from 97 down to 90 cents. That means that, in 1994, we had 10 cents left on every dollar of revenue to pay the interest on the debt and to invest in improving the property. In order to be profitable year in and year out, and during a recession, for instance, we must bring it down to about 85 cents. This is the level for the U.S. Class I.

Last year, you know that the Canadian economy was exceptionally good. We had a rate of growth of close to 5 per cent. This will not be there forever. If we do not bring our cost structure down quickly, the next time we face a recession or a slowdown in the economy, again we will go into the red.

The last time the Government of Canada recapitalized or invested money in Canadian National was in 1978, because the debt load was dangerously high. The government then said "You must sell some of your non-core assets, such as hotels, and you must apply the proceeds of those asset sales to the reduction of your debt." Now the debt is increasing again, and if we do not reduce our cost structure, when the next recession comes, whether it be in two years or five years, we will face the same situation again.

Senator Jessiman: This $225 million is a true profit. What would be the cash flow for the year ending December 31, 1994, adding back depreciation and whatever?

Mr. Tellier: I think it is just slightly under $400 million. However, Mr. Chairman, it is very important to note that the $245 million of profit in 1994 was not sufficient for us to avoid increasing our debt in 1994, nor was it sufficient to finance our capital budget with our cash flow. Our capital budget to improve the railroads in 1994 was in excess of $450 million. In spite of the fact that we had profit of $245 million, we nevertheless needed to borrow in 1994.

One reason that our debt keeps growing is the necessity of paying for these buyouts, these termination benefits. Although some people have employment security, we offer a termination benefit package to employees who renounce employment security. Last year, this cost us in excess of $100 million, cold cash.

Senator Jessiman: Of all the other unions in Canada and the United States, do the union members who work for your company have the best benefits? Are there any other companies in the same position as you? Do you know?

Mr. Tellier: In terms of employment security, I would say yes.

Mr. Leneker: I believe the employment security benefit is an exceptional benefit based on railway standards in North America. On the operating side of the house, there are similar provisions in place in Canada as those which exist in the United States in terms of protection for surplus people. We call them furlough boards. In the United States they call them reserve boards. They pay income protection at the rate of about 80 per cent of a person's income. On the operating side, it is very comparable. On the non-operating side, it is not.

The Chairman: We are well over the half-hour mark. However, flexibility is in order. I have five more senators wishing to speak. I would invite them to be concise and to the point.

Senator Tkachuk: Mr. Tellier, I have a couple of questions. You mentioned the percentage of labour costs in the operation of your railroad. I think it was 46 per cent. Does that include non-union employees?

• (1600)

Mr. Tellier: Yes.

Senator Tkachuk: It includes everyone. What would the percentage of the cost of non-union employees be compared to the total cost of operating the railroad?

Mr. Tellier: Just in excess of 80 per cent of our labour force is unionized. Roughly 19 per cent would be managerial jobs, supervisors, and clerical jobs. They are not members of a union.

Senator Tkachuk: How would that compare to the labour costs of American railroads?

Mr. Tellier: Our overhead is higher than in the U.S. We have been reducing our overhead, but it is still too high. For instance, of the 11,000 jobs that are being abolished over a three-year period — we are in the third year — roughly 25 per cent will be non-scheduled or non-unionized employees. You are perfectly right, senator.

You will be interested to know that when we began our downsizing program, I started right at the top. After 10 weeks on the job, I abolished five vice-presidential positions. We started right at the outset, right at the top, and moved down the ladder.

Our overhead is still much too high. I expect to be able to reduce this by another 750 non-scheduled employees in the first part of this year.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, the government had to act, and it acted promptly. Although it is somewhat impertinent of me to say so, I think the government acted quite responsibly in dealing with the procedural problems in the House of Commons. That being said, the question is whether the bill that Mrs. Robillard has introduced is the best way to go.

You are aware, Mr. Tellier, that the commissioner, Mr. Hope, suggested a rather different process to deal with this standoff. Why is this bill superior to the process advocated by Mr. Hope?

Mr. Tellier: I am not sure that the process the Minister of Labour is proposing is different from that proposed by Commissioner Hope. What is different is the time frame. Commissioner Hope proposed a 60-day period for the first phase, the mediation, and then a 120-day period for the second phase. The Minister of Labour has shortened this time frame.

If you are asking me whether this is the way to go, I would say that 70 days is a very long period of time. In the U.S., they resolve issues such as this within 30 days.

Senator Murray: It is not for me to say why Mr. Hope made a particular proposal. However, it seems he was motivated somewhat by considerations of the psychology and the dynamics that exist.

One of those considerations in his view — and I am quoting him indirectly — is a perceived bias on the part of the government as to the policy outcomes. I think, therefore, he wished to have a somewhat more elaborate process with a view to attaining a wider measure of agreement or consensus among the parties. However, you seem to prefer the shorter time frame.

Two problems arise with that perceived bias. The Senate passed a bill a couple of weeks ago with respect to the West Coast ports in which we instructed the mediator-arbitrator to take cognizance of the report of the Thompson Conciliation Commission that had reported previously. I do not see any such provision in the present bill. Would you have objected to such a provision, had it been contained in this bill?

Mr. Tellier: As I said, the process that the Minister of Labour is proposing is similar, if not identical, to what Commissioner Hope recommended. During the Christmas holidays, a great deal of work went into drafting briefs and expressing views before Commissioner Hope. The parties' cases have been extremely well-documented. I am sure that whomever is appointed by the government, the railroads and the unions will draw very heavily on the recommendations that already exist. That is one reason why I believe it should be possible to proceed in a much shorter time frame, given the fact that, as Commissioner Hope himself has said, the parties have spoken ad nauseam about their position over the last 18 months.

Senator Murray: I will put that question to the minister when she testifies before this committee.

Mr. Tellier, you have had experience with this kind of legislation in the past. I note that clause 12 of the bill now before the House of Commons is described as "Guiding Principle," and reads:

> Each Commission shall be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment that are consistent with the economic viability and competitiveness of a coast-to-coast rail system in both the short and the long term, taking into account the importance of good labour-management relations.

Can you recall any precedent for that type of clause in back-to-work legislation?

Mr. Tellier: I am no expert in back-to-work legislation or labour relations. However, I find clause 12 extremely important because, in the past when it was only an arbitration process, the arbitrator attempted to split the dispute in the middle, very often creating a totally unmanageable situation.

One of the previous arbitrators produced a report that made the management of railroads extremely difficult. The recommendations in his report were simply not practical.

Senator Murray: The information you have placed before us in your opening statement and in reply to questions from senators is not only relevant but extremely important. However, Parliament is being asked to act in an urgent way in an emergency situation to end a work stoppage and get the railroads running again.

I do not know that we should be asked to solve all the other problems at the same time — and I do not wish to be unduly critical, because I have some appreciation of this matter — particularly the problem of a lack of definite government policy in some of these areas. I do not think that, with this bill or with this mediation-arbitration process, we can be expected to solve all the problems you have described so well to us. I think it would be very dangerous for us to attempt to do so.

Senator Oliver: Following in the footsteps of Senator Murray, I have two questions arising from the legislation. I am not asking for facts, but for your opinion on some of the clauses in the bill.

Clauses 11, 33, and 55 of the bill would permit the mediation-arbitration commission, in the absence of an agreement between the parties, to fix a termination date for the new collective agreement. The date could not be earlier than December 31, 1997. Should the commission not be given the unfettered ability to fix the termination date for the new agreement?

• (1610)

Mr. Tellier: It is important to bring about some stability and some certainty. To have a four-year period of stability would make a lot of sense for the employees, their unions and management. I do not think a four-year term for a collective agreement is excessive. To the contrary, I think it is highly desirable for the industry and for the economy.

Senator Oliver: Why not give the commissioner the discretion to do it in another period of time?

Mr. Tellier: I suppose it could have been left. It is very similar to the question asked by Senator Murray about the guidelines. I personally find this a very useful guideline. The parties are trying to put in place something that will bring stability to the industry for four years.

Senator Oliver: Further to a question asked by Senator Kinsella about the process, I direct you to clauses 10, 32 and 54 where it provides for the establishment of a tripartite mediation-arbitration commission. In view of the fact that there are so many parties and this has been going on for 18 months, do you favour the tripartite or single arbitrator-mediator? Do you not think a single arbitrator-mediator in these circumstances might bring about results more quickly?

Mr. Tellier: That is a complex question. One could argue both sides of the case. A separate commission for every railroad — one for CN, one for CP, one for VIA — could speed up the process and reflect the differences that exist between the three. It means that if you want some degree of consistency, some discussion would have to take place between these three commissions.

The same is true in terms of our representatives. The railroads will have to decide whether we want one person to represent us vis-à-vis every bargaining unit or have only one representative in that process. Again, it all depends on how the panel or commission is structured.

Senator Andreychuk: Mr. Chairman, I wish to follow up on your comments with respect to safety. I understand why, for competitive reasons, you are comparing your positions and your work employment situations with the United States. Going from 10 hours to 12 hours is a very dramatic increase. Are you looking to statistics beyond the safety records that may be within the U.S. system?

Mr. Tellier: No. There is an organization called the American Association of Railroads, and the two freight railroads belong to this organization. Therefore, when statistics are released on safety records, Canadian National and Canadian Pacific are compared with the large American railroads.

Last year, I am pleased to say, Canadian National was the second safest railroad in North America. We are always in second or third place. A situation which is safe for ConRail, which is operating in the northeast of the U.S. under conditions similar to ours, is equally safe for Canadian National.

We are not suggesting that every crew should be working 12 hours. However, we are saying that if an additional hour or two is required to complete a journey as opposed to changing or replacing that crew, we think that is highly desirable, especially in terms of customer service. I do not think this should compromise the safety records of Canadian National.

Senator Andreychuk: I am asking what other independent studies you have done. You are relying on one source, as I understand it. You say we should not compromise. I think I would want more assurance than that. That is an issue being raised in communities.

Mr. Tellier: The safest railroad in North America is operating under the 12-hour rule. In Canada, the Department of Transport allows the operating of train crews for up to 12 hours. What is preventing us from asking the crew to work up to 12 hours is the collective agreement, not the safety regulations of the Department of Transport. There is no evidence that extending to 12 hours would affect our safety record because some of the safest railroads in North America are already operating under that norm.

Senator Andreychuk: You are presently running an advertising campaign, are you not, about the change of direction of the railway?

Mr. Tellier: Yes.

Senator Andreychuk: When was that instituted, for what purpose, and what is the cost of that campaign?

Mr. Tellier: That campaign was designed a couple of months ago. The work on that campaign started approximately three months ago. Canadian National is the twenty-fifth largest organization in Canada. We advertise regularly. I do not have at my fingertips the design costs and media costs of that campaign, but I would be delighted to provide you with that information.

Senator Andreychuk: When did it commence?

Mr. Tellier: I think it commenced about a week ago.

Senator Stewart: You made reference to the 10-hour shift. What limits are there on the number of hours to be worked in any one week, if any?

Mr. Leneker: There are no limits per se on the number of hours to be worked in any one week, but there are rest provisions in the collective agreement to ensure that people have the appropriate time to rest between shifts. The number of hours is essentially controlled by mileage, and the mileage is dictated by collective agreement. It gets into a rather complex explanation about the pay system that is in place.

Senator Stewart: You will have to tell us more than that. You leave us with the possibility that they will work six or seven days a week, 10 hours a day. You will have to be a little more explicit.

Mr. Leneker: The collective agreement allows a person to book rest after 10 hours on duty.

Senator Stewart: What is the rest period?

Mr. Leneker: After 10 hours on duty, I believe the rest period is 12 hours.

Senator Stewart: Would the rest period be hours which, without that provision in the agreement, would not be worked?

Mr. Leneker: That is right. Once a person has completed an assignment, they then can book rest and not be called back for a period of time. The number of times that they can be called is dictated by the number of miles that they are allowed to run over the course of a month.

Senator Stewart: For one or more of the more important trades, how many hours do they actually work on average per week?

Mr. Leneker: Perhaps I can come at this in two ways. Let us take our Western Canadian crews as an example. The operating people on our Western Canadian crews would work probably 10 assignments in the course of one month's time.

Senator Stewart: That is 100 hours.

Mr. Leneker: Yes. In terms of the non-operating people, our trades people and our clerical people, the basic hours of work are 40 hours a week.

Senator Stewart: Mr. Chairman, I have quite a different kind of question now. Mr. Tellier has made reference to downsizing and rationalization. I do not know that those are his exact words. Changes have taken place which were not contemplated in 1985, relating particularly to employment security. We all realize that we live in a rapidly changing world. I am concerned with the prospects for a reasonably satisfactory ultimate outcome.

• (1620)

Without going into great detail, could you tell us what you see as the major changes which affect the operation of your company in either the transportation industry or the general economic circumstances in which you have to compete?

Mr. Tellier: Do you mean over recent years?

Senator Stewart: Since 1985.

Mr. Tellier: First, we continue to lose traffic to trucks. This is a steady decline. More and more goods are being shipped via the highway as opposed to rail.

Second, our rates have been going down systematically in real terms year after year, on the average of 2 per cent to 3 per cent per year.

Senator Stewart: Why is that?

Mr. Tellier: That is because of the competition and because of the downward pressure being applied by the shippers. In order for coal producers, potash producers or lumber producers to be competitive on the world markets, they have to bargain hard with Canadian National to get better rates. Every time we increase our productivity, as we have done by about 70 per cent over the last 10 years, we pass these increases in productivity to the shippers through lower rates.

Senator Stewart: However, the ultimate cause of change, to which you have referred at least twice, is competition from trucking?

Mr. Tellier: Yes, trucking and the U.S. railroads.

Senator Stewart: Is the competition from the U.S. railroads a new factor?

Mr. Tellier: No, but that competition increases all the time. Therefore, a cost structure which was making sense in 1985 is no longer affordable in 1995. In short, this is why we are asking for these changes.

The Chairman: I wish to remind honourable senators, some of whom may not have been here earlier, that there is a loose understanding that we will allow half an hour for each witness, including the statement, questions and answers. We have now been in Committee of the Whole for one hour. I invite honourable senators to be brief and to the point. We have yet to hear four other witnesses.

Senator Bryden: Mr. Tellier, you indicated that at one point CN employed 120,000 people. Approximately when was that?

Mr. Tellier: That was in the late 1940s, early 1950s.

Senator Bryden: It took 120,000 people to run a national railroad. Now, you think it takes about 25,000 people to run a national railroad. What has happened?

Mr. Tellier: There has been a tremendous increase in productivity and changes in technology. Of course, we are no longer using coal or steam engines. We no longer have cabooses at the end of trains. This has all changed as a result of technology.

For instance, the purpose of cabooses was to ensure that the train was ridden in a safe fashion. We now have what we call "hot box detectors" along the rails which detect bearings or journals which are burning or getting hot. Through a computer system the crew is informed and they can stop the train. It is basically as a result of the advanced use of technology that we have considerably reduced the size of the labour force.

Senator Bryden: How much of the reduction would be accountable for the reduction in service to various parts of the country?

Mr. Tellier: The network has been rationalized or reduced to a very limited extent. As you know, since the 1987 adoption of the National Transportation Act, there has been a complete freeze on the abandonment of grain branch lines. Therefore, there has been no rationalization of the network. Except for a couple of hundred miles which we have sold to a shortline operator between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia, we are still running the two main lines going through New Brunswick to Halifax. The network of Canadian National has not changed very significantly in Quebec or Ontario.

The number of miles of tracks abandoned over the years has been quite small. You may recall that in the National Transportation Act of 1987 there was a clause which said that the railroads should never be allowed to abandon more than 3 per cent of their total trackage. We did not come close to abandoning even that much. I cannot remember as far back as 1950, but in recent years there has been no major reduction of the network.

Senator Bryden: You mentioned that one of the reasons the number of employees was able to be reduced was the technological changes. Would I be correct in saying that the basis for the employment security provisions was primarily to offset displacement by technological change? In other words, the reason for the technological change was that it made the railroad more efficient and more profitable, and therefore the employees should not suffer because the railroad became more efficient and more profitable through something over which the employees had no control.

Mr. Tellier: I suppose so. To put it bluntly, the union leaders were very smart. They outsmarted the management. They got very good agreements for their members. We cannot blame them for having achieved success. They negotiated a very good deal for their members in 1985. They are the last people I would blame for getting these concessions from management. I suppose management was weak.

Senator Bryden: Parliament is now being asked to correct the weakness of management in 1985.

Mr. Tellier: Parliament is being asked to ask the workers and the companies to go back to work and to put in place a process whereby these issues will be addressed in an impartial and unbiased fashion which, hopefully, will resolve this dispute in a mutually satisfactory fashion.

Senator Bryden: I agree that the situation has to be resolved and that it can only be resolved by Parliament. However, I understand, although I have not seen the bill, that it contains a highly unusual provision which directs the arbitrator to take into account the future profitability of the company in coming to his decision.

Senator Haidasz: Whatever happened to the CN Express? I used to work for them during the summers when I was a student. Was that service replaced with something else, or was it abandoned?

Mr. Tellier: It was abandoned. It has not been replaced.

Senator Haidasz: Who performs that service now?

Mr. Tellier: Either private sector firms or Canada Post.

Senator Haidasz: Why did you abandon that service?

Mr. Tellier: That happened long before my time, but I think it was abandoned because it was losing money.

[ Mr. Tellier ]

Senator Haidasz: What are the comparative rates between delivery by CN and by the trucking industry?

Mr. Tellier: Senator, it would be difficult to give a general answer because it depends very much on the commodity or the shipment about which you are speaking. As you know, all our rates since 1987 have been negotiated on a confidential basis with the customer, the shipper and so on. It varies depending on whether you are talking intermodal, moving a trailer or container on our train, moving cars on a tri-level for General Motors, Ford or Chrysler, or about moving potash and so on. I do not want to go beyond that because I am not able to give you an accurate answer on whether on average our rates are about the same or slightly higher or slightly lower. Also they vary in various parts of the country.

Senator Haidasz: Is overtime work an issue during this present strike?

Mr. Leneker: No, it has not been raised as an issue. The discussion in terms of overtime has centred primarily around the employment security issue. There are areas where people work overtime. Unfortunately, there are also areas in Canada where the employment security provisions caused a surplus of employees, while in other areas of the operation there is overtime accumulating. There are surplus tradesmen in the Atlantic region, for example, and we are unable to redeploy those people to the Metropolitan Toronto area where there are people working overtime.

It is important for the chamber not to conclude that Canadian National is simply trying to pull the employment security provision out from under the workers. We are trying to put in place what we believe is a very beneficial income maintenance program. There are provisions being proposed which would allow a person up to six years to make an appropriate life or career transition with income benefits of up to 85 per cent.

We are attempting to substitute the "job-for-life" arrangement with something that makes a great deal more sense from the point of view of today's industrial setting. It is important for people to understand that it is not simply pulling the benefit away and abandoning the workforce to the vagaries of the economic situation.

Senator Comeau: Notwithstanding what was said regarding the average weekly earnings that were made by the rail workers, my understanding is that certain bargaining units of the railroads did, in fact, concede earnings in exchange for what has been termed "gold-plated protection" by certain media outlets. You do not seem to doubt that these concessions were, in fact, made in 1985.

Having said that, and since these people did, in fact, bargain and work under those provisions for the past number of years in good faith, I do not think you should be coming to Parliament every few years and saying, "Our predecessors made a mistake, therefore we would like you people to correct the mistakes of those who were sitting in our chairs in the past."

Have you made any kind of provision under the earnings protection system for those people who have been working over these last number of years under the strain of technological change? Would those people who have earned those rights continue to have them under some sort of grandfather clause?

Mr. Tellier: No. However, there are provisions on our balance sheet in 1992 for attempting to buy our way out of these provisions and for paying termination benefits. We took a special charge in our balance sheets for $924 million. That gives you an indication of how big this commitment and this liability is on the balance sheet.

As a result, if somebody agrees to give up his or her employment security, and we give, let us say, $75,000 or $80,000 in termination benefits, and so on, this has been accounted for in our balance sheet in 1992 where we took that special charge in excess of $900 million.

Senator Comeau: Do I understand that those who have had this protection since 1985, under the new contract which you are proposing they would suddenly lose the rights with which they have worked these past years?

Mr. Tellier: That is correct.

The Chairman: I thank honourable senators. On your behalf, I wish to thank both Mr. Tellier and Mr. Leneker for their appearance and their testimony this afternoon.

Honourable senators, our next witness will be Mr. Gary Fane, Director of the CAW, Canadian Autoworkers.

If you are ready, Mr. Fane, on behalf of the committee I wish to welcome you to the Senate and invite you to proceed with your statement.

Mr. Gary Fane, Director, Canadian Autoworkers Union: Mr. Chairman, thank you for giving us the opportunity to be here today.

Buzz Hargrove, the President of the CAW, was expected to be here today, but we have had a death in the organization and he could not appear. Thus, I was drafted to come today and to put forward the position of the Canadian Autoworkers Union.

The Canadian Autoworkers Union represents approximately 200,000 people in Canada. There are in excess of 20,000 railway workers: 13,000 at CN, 3,000 at VIA Rail, and 4,500 at CP Rail. Our union is fairly new to the railway. We have only been on the rail since 1989 when one of the shop craft unions joined our organization. Three years after that, there was a vote of shop craft workers. That vote ended in 1993, and our union was successful. Shortly after that, an organization called the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway and Transportation Workers joined the CAW, and that is how we got to be the largest railway union, if you add up all three railways.

I go to the bargaining table for all three railways, and I chair all of the bargaining sessions. It was inevitable that we would end up here, before the Senate and before the government, because for the longest time we have been attempting to negotiate a collective agreement without any government action or interference. Unfortunately at this time, with the railways all being closed, we have come to the realization that this will be impossible to do.

On behalf of all of our members, we have not gone on strike anywhere. We have not gone on strike at CN, VIA or at CP. We attempted to negotiate. We used the strategy of picking one railway, CP Rail, and ensuring that customers could deliver their goods on CN and that commuter traffic would keep moving on VIA Rail. Our approach was to pick one railway only, since we seem to have a history in our country where all the rails go down together, and then legislation and arbitration are effected. We are not happy that this has happened. We had been trying to ensure that it did not happen. As you know, we have not been successful. There are a number of different unions in the railway, a great deal of frustration with the bargaining process, and some felt that they had to act.

We have been negotiating on an employer's agenda for the last 16 months. There are major concessions on the bargaining table. The employers have gone so far as to say to us, "We will change things to the point where you will give us our concessions or we will get them one way or another." We used to have a fear that "one way or another" meant that the Government of Canada would pass legislation that would take things out of our collective agreement. Now after studying the legislation, we have great fears about article 12 where it says the terms and conditions of employment shall be consistent with the economy, economic viability and competitiveness of a coast-to-coast railway system.

The employment security that has been talked about so much by employers was also mentioned two years ago when the Department of Transport, together with CN, prepared a brief saying that this protection had to be taken out of the collective agreement. It is like having an insurance program. We have had it for 10 years. It did not cost anything. Now, when the company wants to get rid of thousands of workers, you pull it out and say we have to change it. Our union is used to downsizing. We have gone through a lot of it in our other industries. We have reduced our membership by thousands of workers at CN particularly, people who have taken a modest amount of money or a pension and given up their jobs.

We spent a lot of time on the Hope process, and the Hope report pointed out that there had been a great deal of interference in the collective bargaining process. The Honourable Mr. Young, the Minister of Transport, declared numerous times that the collective agreements had to be changed, and, if they could not be changed by the bargaining process, perhaps the government would have to change them. We have negotiated a collective agreement, and the government transportation chairperson says, "We want to take everything away." I have personally been to the bargaining table with CN when they have said to us, "You can give us what we want or we can get it another way." Mr. Hope said that it would be wiser for the union to negotiate the best price they could receive if they want to change things.

On the employment security question, the union has proposed at least 10 or 11 different changes directed at diminishing the company's liability. Our people do not want to sit at home and get paid to do nothing. That is not what they want. The employment security was a protection so that when the company increased their profits through technological, operational, or organizational changes, the workers would be protected and not tossed out into the street.

Compare what our members are paid with the average pay in the industry. Shop craft workers, tradespeople, machinists, electricians and all the other trades are paid between $18 and $20 an hour. The average is $25 an hour in industry, and in any major industry it is usually more than $25 an hour.

The railway workers work hard. They like working for CN, CP and VIA. They provide a quality service. They have not wanted to negotiate a collective agreement in a manner in which they have to be afraid that the government will take away their protections.

I wish to talk particularly about two or three things that have gone on, starting with CN. There is a shop in Montreal called AMF. In September, 1993, CN created a second separate company and told 1,600 workers that although they had been CN employees for 20 to 30 years, they had no more seniority at CN now that they were AMF employees. This case has gone to the Canada Labour Relations Board. It is in arbitration. We have been trying to negotiate a settlement for it. After being faithful CN employees for 20 to 25 years, they told these people, "You have no seniority any more. You are not allowed to bump over and go back to work at CN."

We also have 3,500 shop craft employees who have had no contract since 1991 because the unions representing them at the time would not force them to move from Montreal to Vancouver or Winnipeg when the company was moving their work into those places. The other unions did not sign those types of agreements. These are the same people who said, "Even if you were to give us a raise of 3 per cent one year and 3 per cent the second, we prefer not to do that because it is not in the best interests of our families and our communities."

At VIA Rail, we have had absolutely no quality collective bargaining. The company has said to us, "The Liberal government is cutting back subsidies just like the Conservative government did. All of your workers must take less. You can take less now or you can take less later." Originally there was some discussion on whether they would be included in the legislation. The company did not want them included in the legislation because they knew that the fight could go on for a long time, and even though the workers would be hurt, the government could say it was cutting the deficit by closing VIA. VIA is a very touchy situation with us. We have not been aggressive there. Our people are now locked out. We did not go on strike.

With CP Rail, there is a place called Angus where 1,200 people used to work. When they closed the place down in 1991, they gave everyone a signed agreement that said, "Even if employment security changes in collective bargaining, your employment security will not change, even in future collective bargaining sessions." This document was signed by CP Rail senior management. When they came to the bargaining table, they told us that even though that agreement was signed when our union was not on the railway, they expect us to change that agreement to move 250 Québécois to Calgary, or else they will not negotiate a collective agreement with us. They want that case to go to an arbitrator because they know it is morally wrong to hold up a collective bargaining session for 4,500 people to change an agreement that they wrote in blood in 1991.

These are some of the problems we face at the bargaining table. We did not want legislation. We purposely did not have a strike. We tried to put some economic pressure on CP Rail to negotiate a fair deal with us so that we could have a collective agreement that would be a precedent for the other railways. As you see, we were not successful. We are not happy that the rail service is closed down in the country.

• (1650)

We think it is a serious mistake to leave the Hope Commission report out of the legislation. It does not refer to the Hope report and the good work he did. I spent a whole month with Mr. Hope, as did the other unions and the companies. He is a labour relations specialist who is attempting to find a balance. We think the balance is not there yet.

We can live with mediation. If you have a good mediator and mediate properly, you do not need arbitration. However, the arbitration process as it is set up in the legislation is not right. It is not proper and fair when you can leave the employers sitting on clause 12.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say on behalf of our organization. I once again thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today.

The Chairman: Questioning will begin with Senator Lynch-Staunton.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Chairman, one thing we agree on is that we are all unhappy being here for the third time in 13 months having to pass back-to-work legislation — twice this month. Something is desperately wrong with our system of negotiation when we must automatically come to this conclusion, one which is unsatisfactory to all.

I do not want to put words in your mouth, Mr. Fane, but I gather you feel that decisions regarding the next agreement, once the legislation passes, have pretty well been taken and that the companies' views will prevail. Is that what you are telling us or suggesting to us?

Mr. Fane: I have negotiated many collective agreements. I have found absolutely no creativity or flexibility on the CN or VIA bargaining tables. I have seen some on the CP table. Yes, I think there are limited options. Much will depend on the quality of the mediation-arbitrator.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I find a contradiction with respect to the mediation-arbitration commission. You are asking a panel of three people to reach mediation between the parties. Should they fail, then these same people become arbitrators. Is it usual that the same person who fails at mediation can then impose his failure — to put it in simplistic terms — as an arbitrator under compulsory arbitration?

Mr. Fane: In my opinion, yes, it is because the power of the mediator to be the arbitrator will squeeze a lot of people into being extremely reasonable. The arbitrator may look you in the eye and tell you that you are not being reasonable and that he or she has the power to decide on something that will affect your collective agreement. Even though I prefer a freely bargained collective agreement with no third party, a good mediator-arbitrator can cause people to be as reasonable as possible because of the power he or she has.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Mr. Hargrove has told us repeatedly that you have been locked out. Your original tactic was to use various pressure points, such as discouraging traffic from one railroad and moving it to the shippers. I understand the unions had all agreed to this strategy, and then something happened and the agreement fell apart. The unions are no longer together on strategy; is that correct?

Mr. Fane: They are definitely no longer together on strategy because the CAW strategy would have ensured that VIA Rail and the travelling public kept travelling. We would have had at least one freight railway working. Obviously, we do not agree on strategy. One union in particular felt that CP Rail was ignoring them and decided to speed up the strategy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are you open to an essential services concept where a strike may go on but certain basic services by the struck industry are still available?

Mr. Fane: We believe that free collective bargaining should include the right to strike and walk out. We are not convinced that the railways as a whole are an essential service. Our strategy would have ensured that CN kept moving while we dealt with CP. We prefer to deal with one railway at a time while ensuring that customers get their goods to market on the other railway.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: When the threat comes that the whole system will be shut down, as we saw it developing not so long ago, would an essential services concept help to keep basic service? Instead of three trains between Montreal and Toronto, we could run only one.

Mr. Fane: We would certainly be open to that concept to see how it would work.

Senator Oliver: You said that sooner or later you knew you would end up here. That in itself is a disappointment. You then said that the strike is not something that makes you happy, that you are negotiating on an employers' agenda, and that Minister Young said of collective agreements that they must be changed to give us what we want or we will get it another way. Finally, you said that there has been no meaningful collective bargaining at VIA Rail.

All of those are very negative statements when you take them at face value. When I compare those statements to the draft legislation now before the House of Commons, do you actually support the mediation-arbitration provisions in the bill? Is mediation likely to be successful? In your opinion, would conciliation be useful? Finally, and the most important question of all: In your opinion, is the imposition of a settlement likely to do long-term harm to the bargaining relationship, particularly in view of the comments I read off that summarized what you said to us today?

Mr. Fane: Let me take one question at a time, sir.

I think you are right. Those four points are negative. From the union perspective, the agenda has definitely been the employer's. At any time in the last 6 to 12 months have you heard us talk about cost of living increases? Have you heard us talk about increased responsibility for employees? Have you heard the media talk about better training for employees?

One of the oddest scenarios at CN and VIA Rail is that management has so many different structures and managers have so much power that they can tell a worker, after 20 years of service, "We are getting rid of you and putting you out to pasture," although the worker is only 44 years old. At the same time, that person cannot bump or use his or her seniority to work somewhere else because the manager does not like that person or the manager has complete discretion in making such a decision. Employers say that employees are on employment security forever, but at the same time the employers refuse to train people to do jobs. If employees are trained, the employer refuses to let them move into those jobs because the manager has had a kingdom of his own.

Let me return to your question: Do I think mediation-arbitration can work? I prefer free collective bargaining; but, yes, it can work. How much damage will it do? That will depend on how much you tie the arbitrator's hands. If you tie the arbitrator's hands with clause 12, you do not have a free-thinking, creative third party who can do what he or she thinks is best. That individual is restricted.

This brings me back to my earlier statement: What happened to Mr. Hope and his report? He was chosen by the government as a free commissioner-conciliator, if I can use the term. We have already done that. However, all the work he has done has been ignored. Instead, we have clause 12. Have I answered your questions?

Senator Oliver: Will there be a long-term effect on the bargaining relationship if a decision is imposed? Will the bargaining relationship be harmed?

Mr. Fane: It depends on the quality of the decision, whether it is fair and equitable, whether it balances what the workers have now with what the company has now.

I am always amazed to hear that the companies are never making enough money. I probably agree with that one in relation to VIA Rail where they are not making any money. However, with CP Rail, this is probably one of the few lovely buildings that they do not own. They make lots of money, and they are continuing to make money.

How will that affect future collective bargaining? That depends on the quality of the settlement using the mediation-arbitration process. That will focus in on the future. If the workers as a whole feel as though they have been hard done by, it will affect productivity and the profitability of the railways for a very long time.

Senator Lucier: Thank you, Mr. Fane, for a great presentation. You and Mr. Hargrove have both stated that you did not want a general strike of the three railroads. That is probably a clear position?

Mr. Fane: Yes, it is, senator.

Senator Lucier: You were to pick one railroad and ensure that freight and people continued to use the others. That sounds like a reasonable strategy.

As you may know, passing back-to-work legislation is not the favourite pastime of parliamentarians. It is like trying to break up a family fight. We end up being scratched up by both sides eventually.

In your opinion, sir, considering the economic impact brought on by the closing of all three railroads, contrary to your wishes, was there any realistic way that back-to-work legislation could have been avoided at this time?

Mr. Fane: Our strategy was developed to put economic pressure on CP Rail. You may have seen some of the advertisements we took out. By denying CP Rail their 100 per cent profitability margin, by having customers move to trucking, by having customers move to CN Rail, we knew it was having an impact. We were getting closer to a collective agreement.

As soon as the situation at the other railways went down, the quality of the bargaining diminished immensely. For the bargaining to have been successful, we needed more time. Perhaps we needed more solidarity on the union side to avoid the situation we have now.

Senator Lucier: You needed more time, but it was time that you definitely did not have because of the economic impact of the strike.

Mr. Fane: Yes.

Senator Lucier: I agree you needed more time, but the answer to my question then is that once the strike had started, there was only one direction in which this situation was going, and that was back-to-work legislation. Whether it was done last Monday, tonight, or Sunday, that was the route.

Mr. Fane: We have had no bargaining at all since the strike, if I can use the term, or lockout from VIA Rail. We have had no bargaining since then, sir.

Senator Kinsella: Senator Oliver alluded to a comment you made in your opening remarks which concerns me, and I should like you to focus in on it. It relates to statements of the Minister of Transport, Mr. Young, to the extent — if I have understood your comment correctly — that he was interfering with the collective bargaining process that was ongoing. Did I understand that correctly?

Mr. Fane: You sure did, sir. In our submission to Mr. Hope, we used at least eight or nine statements saying it was impossible to negotiate a collective agreement at VIA Rail.

Mr. Young, on numerous occasions, said that the whole fate of VIA Rail was in the hands of the workers; that they would have to take less or they would have to close down more. He made other statements that workers with a grade 8 or 9 education were not responsible for what their unions had done. He appeared on CBC talk shows.

I would not mind sending you the submission we made to Mr. Hope. We noted at least a dozen times when Mr. Young was making collective bargaining impossible. Every time he made a statement, VIA Rail management came to us, wrapped it up, took the front page of the newspaper and put it on the bargaining table.

Senator Kinsella: They would quote back to you inflammatory statements made by the Minister of Transport. Is that what you are telling us?

Mr. Fane: Yes, sir. I am afraid that is exactly what I am telling you.

Senator Kinsella: Did you complain to the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Fane: No, not to the Minister of Labour, to be honest. We certainly sent some communications to the Minister of Labour, at the time who was the Honourable Mr. Axworthy. We did better than that; we complained to Mr. Young. Some of our workers were so angry about the situation that they occupied his office in Bathurst for a day or two.

We then went and had a discussion with him. We asked the president of our union, Buzz Hargrove, to look for some common ground so that it would not sound as though the Minister of Transport was attacking the workers every day.

Senator Kinsella: There is a very serious matter here. In the history of the Crown and the representatives of the Crown, whether it be in pure public sector collective bargaining or in industrial sector bargaining which impacts upon the public interest, the Minister of Labour is traditionally very careful and very judicious in his or her comments so as not to interfere with the collective bargaining process.

It is not only discouraging but alarming from a parliamentary standpoint to hear you testify that the Minister of Transport was interfering in the collective bargaining process by making inflammatory statements.

Is there a vehicle available to you, or to the employer, to any parties at the table, to file an unfair labour practice under the Canada Labour Code? Did you consider doing that against the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Fane: No, sir, we did not consider it. In order for us to file an unfair labour practice, it would probably have to be against the employer, being VIA Rail, and not against the Government of Canada. Although we did not agree with what the minister was saying and doing, we tried to concentrate on bargaining a collective agreement at VIA Rail.

As a matter of fact, at VIA Rail in particular, at one stage we offered to use a mediation-arbitration process because we were so frustrated with the collective bargaining process where the employer each day would say to us, "You will give us more tomorrow because we have no agreement today."

Senator Kinsella: Certainly, discipline of the tongue does not seem to be a virtue that is strong with that particular minister.

I wish to turn your attention to clause 12. You have raised this issue as one of your major concerns. As I read this clause, it provides that the commission must be guided by the need for terms and conditions of employment which are consistent with the economic viability and competitiveness of a coast-to-coast railroad system.

How could those words not also be in the interest of the employees of the rail companies, as well as of interest to the rail companies and of interest to the Canadian public?

Mr. Fane: Let me see if I can answer. On economic viability and competitiveness, the workers whom we represent have absolutely no say over capital expenditures, over the number of layers of management, over the competence level of the people running the firm. Under this clause, we will end up before a commissioner, and we will do very much what Mr. Tellier just did. He came in here and — if I heard him properly in the other room — listed all the finances of how the railway is run compared to competitors.

We will do some of that in return. For example, we will start off with the cost in the United States compared to Canada, and is that a good measurement? They only have 250 million people in the United States. We have 27 million here. You get into a statistical argument. They talk about their productivity. When we measure our productivity, we think it is higher. They talk about their cost. They do not tell you, for example, in comparing figures, that they do not have the medicare cost tied in which American employers must pay. We will argue about what workers should deserve in Canada compared to Canadian industry. Mr. Tellier and friends will argue that they should be making as much money as the best or second best railway in the United States. It is a little bit like apples and oranges, to be honest with you.

We want the companies to do well. We like it when CN is making money. I know the management likes it. They received big bonus cheques that were passed out yesterday or the day before. We want the company to make money, just like we want CP Rail to make money.

We do not want to be responsible for their competence or incompetence. We do not want the commissioner using that as a yardstick on how workers that we represent, the 20,000 of them, should be dealt with in the land of collective bargaining and a new collective agreement.

Senator De Bané: Mr. Fane, did I understand correctly when you were discussing what potential harm can occur over the years between employees and management that you stated that it all depends on whether the commission is balanced? Is that it?

Mr. Fane: Yes, sir. It is based on whether the commissioner is balanced. It is based on how the hands of the commissioner are tied. Right now at CN rail there are 3,500 workers who have had no contract since 1991. There are 1,600 workers who have been dealt a serious psychological blow financially. They suddenly woke up September 1, 1993, and they were not CN employees anymore. There was a new company called AMF Transport set up by CN. All the CN employees were told that they had no collective agreement because AMF is provincial. Our union had to recertify those people who have had no collective agreement for the last year.

Yes, how the arbitrator deals with these people will be very important. I worry about the relationship between the workers and the employer and the relationship between our union and the employer. If you tie the arbitrator's hands and he is limited in scope with respect to what he can do, and he is tied by clause 12 of this bill, these people can be hurt even more.

Senator De Bané: You just told me again that some shop craft workers have been without an agreement since 1991. What makes you hope that without binding arbitration you can reach a negotiated settlement, which has been elusive since 1991?

Mr. Fane: The shop craft workers have only been in our organization since the vote of the shop craft people. I can live with the binding arbitration, sir. We can live with it. We know the economic impact on the country right now. We believe we can live with it. It is not our first choice.

We are saying that you should let the arbitrator be free to analyse the issues, to analyse the situation, just like Mr. Hope was free. You should not tie the person by clause 12, because it was put in there after a great deal of lobbying by CN, CP and VIA. This particularly tilts the degree of fairness.

Senator De Bané: I think that economic viability and competitiveness are laws in economic activity which are as imperative as laws of physics or any other laws of nature. Just look to history. Can you tell me of any human economic activity that has been pursued for a long period of time if there was no economic viability and competitiveness? Do you not think that those two words go without saying?

In my opinion, no government in the world can change the law of physics or economic viability. Clause 12 also contains words to the effect that the process should also take into account the importance of good labour-management relations.

Would you not agree that any decision rendered by that commission must talk about the real world, and the real world deals with economic viability?

Mr. Fane: If you are right that economic viability and competitiveness are found everywhere, that is a good reason why you do not need them in clause 12 of this legislation.

Senator De Bané: I understand that the Minister of Labour met with you last Saturday and suggested that you design your own binding settlement mechanism. Have you made any efforts to reach such an agreement?

Mr. Fane: The minister was kind enough to meet with us on Sunday to give us that opportunity. We have talked and continue to talk to the employers to see if it is possible, particularly on VIA Rail. The employers tell us, "No, absolutely not." They will not come to any terms on a mediation-arbitration approach to solve the issues. They want to be free to do whatever they think is necessary in the economic viability and competitiveness question.

When it comes to VIA, I am not sure what they want to compete with. We have met with them. We have talked to them about it. I would imagine that we will continue to do so and probably have a little more time to see if we can conclude something.

Senator Stewart: In your answer to Senator Oliver, Mr. Fane, you implied that part of the problem involves complexity at the management level. You referred to people having their own kingdoms or empires. Were you referring particularly to CN rail, to CP, to VIA, or to all three?

Mr. Fane: That problem particularly exists with CN and VIA. Thousands of our workers are shop craft workers. There are also approximately 7,500 non-shop craft workers who may dispatch trains, work in offices, work in accounting systems, work on computers, particularly in CN. The people about whom I am speaking in VIA are customer service people. It is in those places that we find a great deal of bureaucracy.

Even though the collective agreement gives workers limited rights to work at other jobs or in other positions, we come by managers who say, "We have the power to decide that John is not suitable. I do not want to spend any money training him. I like Susie who is already doing the job. I do not care if John ends up on the street. I do not care if he ends up on employment security. He is not my problem."

• (1720)

Senator Stewart: Could we put VIA Rail aside for a moment and deal with CP Rail and CN Rail? You are saying that, from the workers' viewpoint, CP Rail is a more satisfactory employer.

Mr. Fane: No. I am saying that we represent 4,500 tradespeople at CP Rail. They are all trades people. It is a different group compared to VIA Rail.

Senator Stewart: Is there no area where you can make a real contrast?

Mr. Fane: No, not on the issue you raise, senator.

Senator Stewart: Does your union represent workers in other industries?

Mr. Fane: Yes, it does.

Senator Stewart: Are you saying that management in the rail industry is more difficult than in automotive plants, for example?

Mr. Fane: Let me word it this way, senator: I personally find that with respect to management, CN Rail, with its serious downsizing, has brought in outsiders and non-railway people. They have a mission to do things that I would describe as being difficult to understand or to find agreement with.

Senator Stewart: You implied earlier that you had heard Mr. Tellier's testimony. He told the committee that the arrangements made in 1985 with regard to employment security were no longer viable, especially given the emergence of two new factors: one is the competition with trucking, and the second is competition with U.S. railways.

Do you think there is severe competition with regard to the rail operations of one or both companies? If so, would you attribute this severe competition to the trucking industry, to U.S. railroads, or to both?

Mr. Fane: I would agree that the level of competition is higher than it has been in the past. We see fewer goods moving from east to west and more from north to south.

I would not agree that our employment security is the problem. Thousands of workers have left the workplace. In our union alone, 3,000 people over the last three years have left the workforce.

There are civilized methods of reducing a workforce. We cannot accept that we should suddenly give up the minimal job security we have enjoyed. CN has 13,000 employees, and it wishes to get rid of 4,000 or 5,000. As well, the company wants us to give back job security.

We recognize the question of competitiveness. We also asked the employer to recognize increases in productivity from the workers. The protection we have in the collective agreement allows the company to continue with technological and organizational changes. However, it cannot accomplish those changes at the cost of throwing people on the streets.

Senator Stewart: My next question is prompted by something you said concerning bonus cheques. Did I understand you to say that one, two or three of the companies have made bonus cheque payments recently? If the answer is "yes," tell us which company or companies, and tell us if there have been negative penalties when the companies have not made profits.

Mr. Fane: That question is easy to answer. I know of no recent negative penalties at either CN or CP. I know that a day or two ago, CN declared millions of dollars in profit. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were distributed to management to reflect the profits posted by CN.

Senator Stewart: Can you be more specific as to the number of thousands and who received them?

Mr. Fane: That is a question you should ask them. I know hundreds of thousands of dollars are being distributed to senior management.

Senator Stewart: I ask the question because we were told earlier by Mr. Tellier that there will be ups and downs. If that is the normal pattern in this industry, there should be no particular reason for a bonus, unless you intend to balance it out when the companies post a loss.

Senator Murray: I should like to say a word about the roles of various people in this matter.

The role of the Minister of Transport is to report to Parliament on behalf of these two Crown corporations, CN and VIA Rail. It is not his job to manage those corporations. It is certainly not his job to conduct collective negotiations for them. Wise Ministers of Transport, in the past, have stayed well clear of that scenario.

It is not the minister's job to be responsible for the Canada Labour Code. He leaves that to his colleague, the Minister of Labour. However, Mr. Young has chosen not to do that. He rushed in like a bull in a china shop and made a bad situation worse.

Given that background, I am not surprised at the attitude of the unions with regard to clause 12. When I picked this bill up this morning, it came off the page and hit me between the eyes. I can understand why the unions would consider what some think to be fairly obvious by way of a guiding principle as almost provocative. That, and the absence of any reference to the Hope report in the legislation, struck me as soon as I read the legislation this morning.

When the minister testifies before us, I hope she takes advantage of the opportunity to say that it is the intention of the government or that as a matter of policy she would want the commissions to take cognizance of the Hope report. I will put that question to her.

Mr. Fane, I appreciate what you have to say about your union's strategy and position. However, the fact is that on Monday morning the minister had to act. The question is this: Given the unpalatable alternatives to you and all of us, is this bill the best way to go? Do you agree with Mr. Tellier that there is no real difference between the process in this bill and the process suggested by Mr. Hope in his report?

Mr. Fane: I understand that the minister had to act: I am not living in the dark ages. Our organization understands that. As I said earlier, we can live with it.

We felt Mr. Hope's approach was well-balanced, although it did not have us jumping up and down. It was the first time someone had acknowledged that the labour relations process and the collective bargaining process of mutual respect between the two parties was being interfered with by a third party.

We have a new Minister of Labour. As I said before, she was kind enough to spend time with us. We are not critical of her, nor of the Department of Labour.

We believe that clause 12 tilts the playing field on fairness. If I were an employer, I would be singing and dancing in the streets, because the employers wanted that clause. They threatened us numerous times in collective bargaining with something that looked like clause 12. Now when we attempt to define the importance of good labour-management relations, that will be much more difficult to do when compared to U.S. railway lines.

• (1730)

In attempting to answer your question, senator, we understand that the country is not where our organization wanted it to be. A strike was the last thing we wanted. We understand that the minister must get the country rolling again. We ask for a larger degree of fairness or, if I can use the term, a balance of fairness. We can take out the importance of good labour-management relations by taking out the whole clause that speaks of economic viability, and then the third party will be able to use all their creative skills to find a balance.

Senator Murray: Given the current economic situation of the country and the urgency of the situation, my offhand and personal opinion is that amending the bill is a rather difficult process.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: They can still do that in the House.

Senator Murray: Yes, that is true. As my friend the Leader of the Opposition suggests, perhaps they might do that. They have already amended the bill over there.

I can understand why Mr. Tellier expressed his agreement with clause 12. He considers it important. We all know that there is some restructuring coming. It has been coming for a long time. The country had been expecting it from the previous government and from the present government.

However, as I suggested to Mr. Tellier when he was here, I think we are going too far if we try to solve all of these problems at once. This is a back-to-work bill. Apart from that, perhaps it should be as neutral as it can be on longer-term policy considerations.

When she introduced the bill, Mrs. Robillard, the Minister of Labour, in talking about security of employment, said that agreements concluded recently by Canadian Pacific with three of the unions which represent smaller bargaining units within the company are clear indications that the process can work.

> The three unions, the Transportation Communications International Union, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Rail Canada Traffic Controllers, managed to agree with the company on wage increases, conditions relating to job security, and a number of improvements to social benefits.

Do you know anything about that? Is there any chance that those kinds of provisions, whatever they are, would be applicable to the situations that you and other unions are dealing with?

Mr. Fane: I know a great deal about that. I do not want to appear to be rude, but all of the companies would be happy to sign that agreement tomorrow with all of the unions. In all of the bargaining during the last 16 months, we have something the employers want to take away from us. We do not want to give it up. How can we survive this round of bargaining by giving up a little bit of it? We have been bargaining on the employers' agenda. We believe the other three unions took it down to the bottom line. We could sign that agreement tomorrow. You would have had no railway dispute if you could have had the union leaders of the CAW, the Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way, or anybody else, sign that type of agreement.

That agreement is, in my opinion, extremely poor. It is like having an insurance plan one day and deciding that you will pass away in the next week so you should sell it off early.

Senator Murray: Those unions agreed to it.

Mr. Fane: That is fine. We do not have a problem with that. We do not have a problem with union leaders who come from their own organizations and make that type of deal. If it is good for them, that is fine. For example, in the RCTC group, one of the unions, the dispatchers, are paid $65,000 to $80,000 a year.

Our people are paid $35,000 a year. When you tell a dispatcher in the trains that he has to move somewhere, if he does not move, he will not be a dispatcher for the Montreal Bus Commission. The needs of the organizations are different.

The agreement for those three unions might have been good for their people. We will find out if they are ratified. Usually collective agreements are ratified when the leadership signs them. For our organization, it would not be a good deal. It would be a sell-out.

Senator Murray: Mr. Leneker, when he was here with Mr. Tellier, was at some pains to explain to us that what the railways were proposing was not simply to take away the ES provisions and replace them with nothing. He outlined to us briefly a proposal that he had made, which I take it you have rejected. Having said what I said about Mr. Young, the last thing I want to do is start negotiating with you on the floor of the Senate. However, there must be some place for agreement between the present provisions and what the management have proposed.

Mr. Fane: There is. I think there is. Our union has been extremely creative in putting forward a number of proposals on the bargaining table. The problem with Mr. Leneker is that he has not moved off his position in 18 months. The only difference is that he says he will get it one way or another. We have put forth numerous positions on the bargaining table that are all less than what we have now.

Senator Murray: On that issue of employment security?

Mr. Fane: Yes, absolutely. We have put things on the bargaining table that are less. Unions do not usually do that. We understand, however, collective bargaining; we understand the mood in the country; we understand the economics of what is going on. I do not want to say we have been bargaining backwards, but we have not been bargaining forwards, if I can use that term.

I hope you got more straight answers from Mr. Leneker than I did, because I have been bargaining with him for 18 months and have not been able to get any.

Senator Comeau: You have been moderate, or at least controlled, in your comments regarding Mr. Young. I should note that we have had our crosses to bear in the Senate regarding Mr. Young. We had a valiant effort on the part of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to defend Mr. Young. I must say we should be applauding the leader. She has had her cross to bear, as well.

I found that Mr. Young had shown his cards very early in the game in favour of the rail companies. A more careful minister might have waited a little bit. That leads me to my question: Do you think that Mr. Young is guiding the agenda, or would Mrs. Robillard be guiding it at this point in time?

Mr. Fane: I think at this time Mrs. Robillard is definitely in control of the agenda. She was kind enough to meet with us. She has been consulting with us. In our opinion, and in the opinion of the Canadian Auto Workers Union, she has been fair, just and honest. We have absolutely no complaints at all with the way in which she has been operating and dealing. For a new minister, we think she has been doing extremely well.

Senator Comeau: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Tellier conceded that concessions had been made by the workers back when the employment security clause was negotiated, and what was happening now was because his predecessors had made mistakes, the implication being that since they had made mistakes, we, as parliamentarians, should now correct those mistakes.

Do you think it is a good idea for parliamentarians to come in every few years and say, "Oh, well, these previous managers were not too good, so we will correct it this time"? Does that not send some kind of signal to Canadians that we should be looking at management and not the contracts?

• (1740)

Mr. Fane: I did not come here to rap management. I am more interested in a free collective bargaining system. Obviously, with a third party the system will not be as free as we would like it to be. I am more interested in trying to put across this point. The power that parliamentarians have right now is to ensure that the process is as well–balanced as it can be. It is not an easy job for anyone at this time.

I do not know if I have answered your question, senator. I do not know if I have an answer for it.

Senator Comeau: Given that management is asking parliamentarians to support a process by which we will take away retroactively concessions that have been made in the past to your workers, and that we agree with this process, what kind of impact will that have on the workers in terms of their goodwill toward the companies in the future, as well as their motivation to work for those companies?

Mr. Fane: I do not see the situation as being one where the government is trying to balance off the past. What the employer is trying to get the government to do is ensure that the arbitrator rules in their favour before the evidence and the debate starts by securing clause 12. I do not know if that answers the question.

Senator Comeau: I may be calling a rose by another name.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If clause 12 is used to give Mr. Leneker what he wants, or close to it — in other words, make employment security provisions unacceptable to the union — and it is imposed through the compulsory arbitration process in the next agreement, what will be the reaction of your union, since this is the main issue and has been for the last long while?

Mr. Fane: You talk about it as though it were the main issue, senator. Our union would trade employment security tomorrow. We do not want people sitting at home with no jobs. We want people to work. We have told the employer this more than once. The nonsense set out in The Globe and Mail advertisement says that we want people to be paid to sit at home. We do not want that. We would trade in employment security tomorrow if everyone who is there now could continue working there and the normal 6 per cent attrition rate could continue.

You ask what the reaction of our membership would be if we were to lose employment security through an arbitration process. I imagine they will look at the mechanism and the guidelines that have been set out. If the guidelines are fair, which means the removal of clause 12, then the onus is on us to put forward a clear position. In the mediation process, there will be some bargaining. We have absolutely no problem showing a third party how we have not only been moderate but have done so so that we have nothing to fear. If you stack the deck, it becomes much more difficult.

Once the legislation is passed, people will ask our organization, "How do you look at the process? Are we going into a process that is fair or one that is not?"

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What is your answer to that?

Mr. Fane: My answer to that is obvious. I would like to see some changes to clause 12 we can say that it is as fair as it can be.

Senator Bryden: Mr. Fane, I would like to thank you for your attendance. Is this your first time in front of this august body, or have you been here before?

Mr. Fane: I have never been here before, sir.

Senator Bryden: Welcome to the club. This is my first time doing this, too. You will notice that this chamber of sober second thought is only interested in the truth, is totally nonpartisan and does not try to score any political points.

Mr. Fane: Pardon me, sir?

Senator Bryden: Mr. Fane, you have indicated that your union has put some economic pressure on CP. Could you tell us what type of pressure that is?

Mr. Fane: We felt the best way to get CP to deal with us fairly was if they were not running to full capacity, if they were not maximizing their profit levels. We took out a full-page advertisement in The Globe and Mail in which we suggested to shippers that there could be some economic activity that could end up in a dispute with CP Rail. We had put in place a 1-800 number, explaining to shippers that if they needed assistance to move their goods to market we would be more than willing to help them find other reliable service.

We know that some of the major shippers with whom we deal had been calling. We suggested they could ensure their goods get to market by moving them on CN because we had chosen to bargain collectively with CP.

Senator Bryden: You said that there seemed to be a remarkable lack of creativity on the part of the employers in this bargaining process. I am trying to understand why. Is it not the case that, historically, the collective bargaining process started from a position where all the rights were basically management's rights? Is it not the case that over the years the unions and the bargaining agents have been able to put a good number of those rights and protections that used to be in the bundle that was management's into collective agreements?

Mr. Fane: I agree with that, senator. Anything we have not written in a collective agreement remains the management's right. Thus, the only rights we have are the ones we have negotiated.

Senator Bryden: On a global basis, it appears to be a time of downsizing and trying to become more efficient and competitive. Does that make it particularly difficult for you to get management to provide more things to go in the collective agreement?

Mr. Fane: Yes, it does.

Senator Bryden: Is that the lack of creativity about which you spoke?

Mr. Fane: No. The lack of creativity I talk about is illustrated by the fact that the company took a position that they would get rid of employment security 18 months ago. They have not moved off that position at all. As a matter of fact, any time they moved one step forward, the next day they moved two steps back, which brings us to the conclusion that they did not move at all.

Senator Bryden: You have been quite flexible in this regard, have you?

Mr. Fane: Yes, we have been flexible to the point that the company was singing a song as to how people had a job for life. We contemplated and put forward positions whereby, perhaps, instead of someone having an income for life, they would be guaranteed an income for modest periods of time. For example, a worker who is 50 years old could get five years' bridging to the pension plan when they were 55 years of age.

It is complete rhetoric when you hear that people have a job for life. We do not have anyone sitting at home for life collecting an income. We have offered to trade for giving people work until their proper retirement age.

Senator Bryden: A former president of the Canadian Auto Workers Union made a very considerable name for himself in the labour movement by taking a very adamant position. I am speaking of Bob White. He said that as long as he was president, the Canadian Auto Workers Union would not make concessions on anything they had won in previous collective agreements. I am assuming you are saying that the CAW's position has changed in that regard?

• (1750)

Mr. Fane: No. The CAW's position has not changed. What has changed is that if we can work a deal, if we can collectively bargain a new negotiation which helps the employer and helps us, it is a wise thing to do. For example, the present employment security forces people to move within large regions. We have said to the employers, if you want to give that up because there are no jobs to move to, we could instead have employment security for four or five years rather than for life. This is not a matter of concessions. We expect to bargain collective agreements that improve life for workers. Yet we also remain flexible enough that if employers can show a serious problem which needs adjustment, we can be open-minded about it.

Senator Bryden: These are not concessions in the sense that economic benefits to employees would continue to be at least equal to what they had in their existing collective agreement, are they?

Mr. Fane: We measure the whole collective agreement, and there has to be some balance, yes.

Senator Bryden: But you mean a balance that is at least equal to what exists currently.

Mr. Fane: Let me give you an example, sir. We gave three or four proposals to the employer to use if they want to continue to reduce workers. We gave them three or four suggestions on how to do it modestly so that people were not hurt. One example I told you about was the bridging. Another example I suggested was to have our people take work in outside industries, which would limit the employer's liability. We would not only ask our workers to take work but force them to take work so that CN does not pay them when they are sitting at home.

Senator Bryden: How many of your members are currently not working and being paid under these arrangements?

Mr. Fane: We have approximately 240 on CP Rail who, as I said earlier, had been given this written agreement in 1991 that if employment security changed, it would not hurt them. They come from the Angus shop closure. With respect to CN, I believe we have about 200, although I am not sure of that number.

When one is on employment security, they are expected to stand by and be available every day to come to work to do any work the employer can find for them. The employer will say 200 people are on employment security, but the reality is that last Wednesday, 95 per cent of them could have been at work and working.

Senator Bryden: They could have come to work.

Mr. Fane: We have had days where that is exactly what happened. Employment security means it is a different manager's budget and they come in to work.

Senator Bryden: On average, of the 240 employees, how many days per year would each one be called into work?

Mr. Fane: Probably for the majority, it would be 60 or 70. It depends on work location, but in Montreal it would be 60 per cent or 70 per cent.

Senator Bryden: In the event that any given employee in an average position does not come in, what would that person's annual pay be?

Mr. Fane: If a person when called said, "I am not coming to work," they would receive absolutely nothing. They would be cut off of employment security.

Senator Bryden: My question was about a person who under employment security is not called into work and does not come in during the year. I take it there are some instances where that can happen?

Mr. Fane: They are slight but they might equal $25,000 per year.

Senator Bryden: Are there benefits that go with that?

Mr. Fane: Yes, there are regular benefits.

Senator Bryden: Would that be the normal 20 per cent?

Mr. Fane: I think the benefit package is 13 per cent.

Senator Bryden: Thank you. Is this the package which you referred to as a "Cadillac package" and which you would have to change to a "Ford package"?

Mr. Fane: Not a Cadillac, I refrained from using that term, but I am glad you are staying with the vehicles we build. No, I think it was the other way around. We have paid for an insurance plan. The employer now wants to take it away from the workers. That is the way we look at it. We know there will be changes. We know we will probably come out of this a little scarred.

The Chairman: Senator Bryden, we have other witnesses waiting. Please proceed quickly.

Senator Bryden: I will be as quick as I can.

As you are aware, many unemployed or working poor Canadians make significantly less than $25,000 and do not have this Cadillac provision. What do you say to them when you are closing down the railroads in order to protect this type of situation? And it is not just you, by the way, but the railroads are being closed down.

Mr. Fane: I am glad you said it is not just us because absolutely none of our 20,000 workers are on strike. Right now I would not say anything in response to your phrasing, "when we are closing down the railway." We have not closed it down. The CAW has not gone on strike anywhere.

Senator Bryden: I have one last question which relates to the concern over clause 12 in the bill dealing with the direction to the arbitrator. Have you had instances before where your union has gone to arbitration, not rights arbitration but interest arbitration?

Mr. Fane: Sir, no, I have not, although I used to work with another railway, and I had the pleasure in 1987 of dealing with the Larson Commission, which heard from unions and management. Mr. Larson had free rein to write a report to the best of his abilities from the information that he gathered, and his hands were not tied by a clause 12.

Senator Bryden: Has it been your experience, as it has been mine, that without some parameters, one party comes in very high while the other comes in very low, and the arbitrator simply splits the difference and it so becomes a game?

Mr. Fane: No, sir, that is not my experience at all. As a matter of fact, I believe in the recent West Mine arbitration in British Columbia, the CAW workers lost terribly in the arbitration process. The arbitrator was not guided by a clause 12. If you want a fair system, you have to set it out as fairly as possible. The best way to do that would be to eliminate clause 12.

Senator Prud'homme: I will be brief even though I do not feel we are under pressure for time. If we have other witnesses, they can come tomorrow. The Senate should take the time it needs.

What amendment would you suggest? You do not like clause 12, but you most likely feel there will be a clause 12 of some kind. I am sure that you had expertise at your disposal as you read that clause. What would you suggest as a draft that would be palatable? Of course, if it is totally acceptable to you, it will probably be totally unacceptable to the other side, and vice versa.

Have you and your group given any consideration to the kind of amendment that you would like to see to clause 12?

• (1800)

Mr. Fane: No, I have not spent a lot of time on an amendment to clause 12. I would prefer clause 12 to follow the guidelines set out by the Hope commission. Mr. Hope considered the economic situation of the railways but balanced it by ensuring that if the employment security were so very important to the union, the union should be remunerated in some manner reflecting that importance or the worth of employment security.

Senator Prud'homme: I am not sure we should not consider recalling Mr. Tellier. I am in that kind of mood, since we may have the time. Were you a witness at the House of Commons committee last night?

Mr. Fane: No.

Senator Prud'homme: Were you called?

Mr. Fane: No, sir.

Senator Prud'homme: Would you have gone if you had been called?

Mr. Fane: Absolutely.

Senator Prud'homme: It is strange that you were not called last night. Did you make any movement towards —

Mr. Fane: I do not know, sir. As I said earlier, that is why I did not show up in my shirt and tie.

Senator Prud'homme: Please, feel at ease.
